Note how differently, both as to date and in form, this last anecdote is given by my B—r, and Gerber. Würzbach tells it still in another form, and makes Leopold the hero of it instead of his grandson. True, it is not very important just what words were used on so trivial an occasion; but when you have had occasion to make yourself pretty familiar with almost all the works produced in more than a century and a half in a certain department of literary and artistic history, and find that a general and all-pervading characteristic is an utter carelessness in repeating facts and anecdotes, you begin to despair of ever getting at truth. This is true to an astonishing degree of the Germans. They plunder one another for anecdotes and stories, yet rarely repeat one without contriving to make it sound more or less differently. It is only about 25 years since Wegeler and Ries's "Notizen" about Beethoven appeared; and yet their anecdotes have by little and little become so changed as often to be hardly recognizable. So Marx, in telling of Beethoven's trouble in the first performance of his Choral Fantasia, though he had (or might have had) the anecdotes as told by three persons present, follows neither; but of all writers he is one of the very worst in this respect—you cannot trust him a moment. Thank fortune, there are a few conscientious writers even on music, and in Germany—Jahn and Chrysander for instance. Being easier after this expectation, I go back to Carl VI.

As on the nameday of the Emperor and the birthday of the Empress new operas were given, so on the birthday (Oct. 1) of the Emperor, and nameday of the Empress (Nov. 19), there were given in the Palace at Vienna, "Serenatas."

(To be continued.)

Professor Wylde's first Lecture at Gresham College.

(Concluded from page 163.)

Now, of all forms used, the song form is the simplest and most ancient; next comes fugue, the oldest of the elaborated forms. The song form depended entirely on the verse or poetry to which it was allied; and, if we take a specimen of the earliest piece of music written, we find it contains not a note, much less a bar, more than is required to sing the words. The song which I am about to give you was found inserted in a poem written by one Lambert de Cors, nicknamed "the short."* It was commenced in the year 1140.

The music is written in Gregorian notes of the old lozenge shape; it is quaint, but not void of a certain melancholy sentiment. No bass or harmony is found to this song. If it were sung accompanied by instruments, it is most probable they played the same notes as the voice sang.† (Here follows Illustration the 1st). Now, I want you to remark, in this early example of the song form, how allied it is to the Gregorian chant.‡ There is another song called "Chanson de Roland," which some have said was that to which the Normans marched to battle at the great historical combat at Hastings. The words here are doubtless as old as the date claimed for them, but the music is not authenticated. It has a more modern character than the song you have just heard, so that I do not think it can be cited with confidence; but you will perceive also how the form of the music depends on the verse. The words of the song are—

"Let every valiant son of Gaul
Sing Ronald's deeds, his greatest glory,
Whose name will stoutest foes appal,
And feats inspire for future story.

"Ronald in childhood had no fears,
Was full of tricks, nor knew a letter,
Which, though it cost his mother tears,
His father cried, 'So much the better:—

"We'll have him for a soldier free.
His strength and courage let us nourish;
If bold the heart, though wild the head,
In war he'll but the better flourish."

"Roland too much adored the fair,
From whom e'en heroes are defenceless,
And by a queen of beauty rare
He all at once was rendered senseless.

"One hapless morn, she left the knight,
Who, when he missed her, grew quite frantic.
Our pattern, let him be in sight,
His love was somewhat too romantic."

* History does not say why this Lambert de Cors was nicknamed "the short." Perhaps it was in contrast to his poem, which is long. The poem consists of 20,000 lines.

† The verses of this song are Alexandrine, or of twelve syllables. The words are—

"Thus blindly he proceeds whom love at pleasure leads:
As all who live must bear the ill which mortals share,
So all who love with zeal must pain and anguish feel;
Thus blindly he proceeds whom love at pleasure leads."

‡ To the old monks not only are we indebted for the preservation of art in the dark ages, but to these "church tunes" are we indebted even for our secular music—for, in fact, the "Love Song."

(Here follows Illustration the 2nd.) Now, some who are only acquainted with musical ballads, old and new, may imagine that whatever form may have been to instrumental music, the form of vocal music still depends on the verse to which it is allied, and consequently that no change has taken place in this form of composition. It is not so, however. Musical ballads, it is true, still keep to the form of the verse to which they are welded, but most vocal pieces are lengthened out, and are not generally confined to the sort of verse with which the music is associated, but follow a conventional and usually-adopted form, like the well-known song, "Deh vieni, non tardar," by Mozart, which you shall hear, and so be able to compare with the form of the early specimen of song. (Here follows Illustration 3rd.)

Now, in the song you have just heard, if you take away the words, and sing the melody to any vocal syllables, the effect upon the mind is the same, for it is the melody which captivates quite independently of the words. Such a song requires no charm of "verse." It is pure abstract "music," and so differs entirely from the first song you heard, which, without the verse, has but small attraction.

I said that the oldest elaborate form was that of fugue. This form of composition originated in the desire to add other parts for other voices to a plain song. In a canon or fugue, the song or subject commenced by the first voice is, as soon as it has finished its phrase, taken up by another voice, whilst the first voice continues to sing something which agrees with the song sung by the second voice; as soon as the second voice has ended its phrase the third commences, the other two continuing to sing parts which agree in harmony with the third voice, and so on. This continuation of the voices after they have given out their phrase or song produces a form much more lengthened than that of a simple song, and constitutes a form which has been followed ever since. It was an immense stride in the art, and the specimen I am about to present to you is wondrous for the time in which it was written, viz., in 1250. It is the earliest piece of music we possess in parts. The words are "Summer is icumen."* (Here follows Illustration 4th.)

I said this composition is a wonderful specimen of art for the time in which it was written, i.e., it must be regarded as such in comparison with the then existing part compositions of the Gregorian school. It contains, however, some of the worst features of that mode of harmonizing a subject or theme, viz., consecutive fifths, and is very monotonous from want of any change of key. In form, however, this old canon, "Summer is icumen," has been the precursor of our modern canon, which is a strict fugue, and, in fact, of all fugues, a style in which Bach, Mozart and Handel, and of late years Mendelssohn, excelled. You shall hear a specimen of this form of composition by Cherubini, called "Perfidia Clori," a canon for three voices; also a fugue by S. Bach, who flourished at the end of the 18th century. (Here follow Cherubini's Canon, Illustration 5th; and Bach's Fugue, Illustration 6th.)

Now, in Bach's time these fugues were considered the most difficult compositions for a keyed instrument like the pianoforte and organ. What would they have said in those days to a modern fantasia by Thalberg or other great digital writers of difficulties, a specimen of which, by way of contrast, you shall now hear. (Here follows Illustration 7th, Thalberg's Fantasia.)

Fantasias of this kind abound in astonishing effects, and they afford immense scope for display of mechanical dexterity and command over the instrument, but they possess neither the form nor the charm of the beautiful, and soon pall upon the ear. On comparing a fantasia of this kind to the fugue you previously heard, I do not ask you all at once to admire the former in preference to the latter, but I feel convinced that when your taste has been cultivated, and the novelty of the effects produced by digital execution is worn away, the one will be cherished as a work of beauty—and "a thing of beauty is a joy for ever"—and the other cast away as a faded flower.

* Each voice which sings this "canon" sings the same notes. There is an additional part for two male voices, but these have nothing to do with the canon.

My lecture, so far, has shown you that a knowledge of form in musical composition is the great secret of the art; that musical composition is not a mystery, but an imitative art, which can be taught and learnt and, "parsi passu," as the forms of musical art are more or less successfully employed, so does the degree of imitation appear greater or less, the mystery of production more or less wonderful and the result more or less delightful. I would say to those who have an ear and taste for music, study the forms of composition; if you derive pleasure from hearing music without understanding it, your pleasure will be infinitely greater when the mind is satisfied as well as the ear delighted, and there can be no real mental satisfaction in listening to that which is not understood. But, the mind satisfied and the ear delighted, there ensues a pleasure which may well be envied by those from whom nature has withheld one of her best gifts—a love and taste for the beautiful in art.

From a Musical Sufferer,

Do enlighten me,—Is it from weakness or choice
Comes this villainous tremolo habit of singing—
This new "wiggie"—as somebody terms it—of voice,
Which these lyrical songsters are constantly bringing?

If I go to the opera, big, burly throats
Of the amorous tenors and chivalrous basses,
That appear as if formed for sustinment of notes—
And the even prolongment of all vocal graces,—

Their heroics declaim in a quivering way.
That all vocal propriety clearly outrages.
And in their shaky cadences their passions convey,
To remind one ofague in all its bad stages.

And obese prima-donnas—whose figures suggest
An addition to lager, if not a style largo,
With their arias wavy with vocal unrest,
On legitimate pleasure lay hopeless embargo.

Cavatinas are corkscrewed, and recitativ
Is a weak undulation of vocal delivery,
Nor does sonorous unison bring its relief,
But is dip in tone, and in climaxes quivery.

If at church I attend—where some petted quartet
Of their florid accomplishment give exhibition,
In place of devotional method—I get
The same tremolo, only in cheapened edition.

I had thought that the concert-room nuisance had reached
Its extent in the ignorant chatter and giggle,—
But let ballad be sung or bravura be screeched,
There's a trial yet worse—the inveterate "wiggie."

The great organ is played,—I am there,—for at length
Is the fortunate time to hear harmonies semblant
To the instrument's masiveness, finish and strength;
The performer commences—and out comes the "Tremblant."

It would seem that all vocalization, before
It were fit to the auditor's ear to be taking,
Must, like physis, observing medicinal law,
Undergo the anterior process of shaking.

"Wiggie" on then, ye singers, both lyric and local,— Fashion tolerates, so I submit without blinking;
But, as strange as it seems, such performances vocal
Are, in popular phrase, "no great shakes," to my thinking.
—Transcript.

Gounod's "Faust."

From the New York Tribune.

*** It is some two hundred and fifty years since the opera—in the effort to revive ancient Greek dramatic music—was first evolved; and for the last half century or more, other polite nations have had skilful composers setting the languages of their several countries to music. The works of the great masters of the past century, Handel and Haydn, live, but none on the singing stage, although they wrote operas, and the former composer was especially voluminous. Gluck, the reformer, (whose contributions to the illumination of the philosophy of the opera can hardly be overestimated), owing to the defunct nature of the Greek fables which he set, and likewise to the improvement in the beauty and ecstasy of melody, since his day, has now only a partial life, and the effort to wake him into being in this country ended in a signal failure—all interest in Orpheus and Euridice being dead, as much as in the allegories on an old ceiling. So too Beethoven's only opera, Fidelio, upon which he spent so many years of his passionately artistic life, was played three times at the Academy—twice with Carl Forster, the most famous bass of Germany, and more recently by Mr. Anschütz's present company, and each time to nearly empty benches—rendering it impossible for the most classical manager to continue such a losing game. Of Cimarosa, Winter, Jomelli, Piccini, Trajeta, Paisiello, Cherubini, Spontini, Grétry, Lesueur, Sir Henry Bishop, and many others who made a name, at least nationally if not universally, in their day, not a single work may be said to have possession of the stage as a standard living opera—known throughout the audiences of the different nations. In fact, any connoisseur can readily call to mind the thirty standard operas of some half-score composers: Mozart, Von Weber, Rossini, Bellini, Donizetti, Verdi, Herold, Auber, Meyerbeer—which comprise the entire repertory of permanently attractive works to all nations; although the paucity of this supply has caused it to be so much drawn upon, as to hackney about one third of the small list beyond endurance.

The very latest additions to opera have afforded very little or no hope toward extending this standard and threadbare list. Take, for example, the two Italian operas produced at this Academy—Jane and Judith. Jane was, as regards ideas, (though academically well constructed) "full of sound and fury signifying nothing," and it is utterly impossible that such a farrago of notes can live after the first echoes of its exaggerated tones have died away. Judith, which we did not hear, we are told was almost still-born. Beside these, there was produced, some two years since, Meyerbeer's opera of Dinorah, written with great elaboration and listened to with the most devoted respect, which was a failure here.

This view of the difficulties attending the composition of any opera, destined to live and have a cosmopolitan acceptance, and the claims put forth for a work said to possess preeminently these attributes, lead us to the critical consideration of the production, last night, at the Academy of music, by Herr Anschütz's German company, of the Opera of Faust, composed by M. Gounod of Paris, and not only justify us in a lengthened article, but demand such an analysis at our hands.

This opera is of French origin. We have a copy of the work with the original French text, the Italian and the German versions being translations. The structure of the vocal music therefore is French, if the French poet has not written his verse upon the models of another nation; and he has not done so. Hence the music has much that is melodically disproportionate: some bars crowded with notes, others without enough to fill them, so as to secure continuity of phrasing.

The opera of Faust is in five acts, and embraces nineteen pieces—solos, duets, trios, quartets, and choruses. The scenes are the same as in the well-known acting play given in English at Niblo's, and therefore we do not describe them. Among all these nineteen pieces we look in vain for a first-class memorable melody, the prime requisite for an opera, and without which it cannot live—however much adventitious circumstances may combine to give a local or passing life.

We shall look now very briefly, and under the greatest disadvantages, not having musical notation to quote with, at the pieces.

Overtures, so many of which were essayed and so few good ones achieved by composers, have recently fallen into disuse, and short introductions, or a few preliminary measures in the orchestra now precede the rising of the curtain. The introduction here is a grave, slow movement, evidently written by a harmonist accustomed to organ music, and the most of it would be effective on that instrument. We cannot perceive the transcendentalism of resolving the last chord of bars 7 and 15 by exceptions; as the ear demands the augmented sixth to have its customary resolution by the descent of a half tone in the bass. Where there is an infraction of a rule, and a beautiful or transcendental object is gained, well and good; but here the effect is simply mean and ugly. The curtain rises with No. 1 of the musical pieces. Faust, a very old and decrepit man, is in his laboratory, and the recitative he delivers is unexceptionably good. A chorus in triple time, of peasants, heard outside, is very poor—compare it for a moment with the peasant music in Don Giovanni or La Sonnambula, and the difference between genius and the want of it is evident. To these ensue a very short andante maestoso by Faust, one of the best vocal passages in the opera, but wanting the suavity of uninterrupted oratorical flow, owing to the French versification. In the course of this, the scena for the tenor, we hear another chorus, outside, which is also uninspiring. Following this chorus is a recitative by Faust, ending with a sudden bolt from the key of F, one flat, to B, five sharps—said bolt caused by the appearance of the devil. We do not think even his presence warranted such a change of key, unless he was so ugly as to scare Faust to death, and finish the opera with this chord. Experience, and Rossini especially, have established the possible surprise transitions of key in the scale, which come under the head of High Art; and this is not one of them, and utterly lacks justification. In the grand Greek group of the Laocoon, there is something left to the imagination, in the sculptured agonies of the man and his sons. The artist is not hideous in his representing contortions. Art, the beautiful still, has some claims. So, too, in music. Symmetries and logical sequences must be observed, even though the devil or a creditor is suddenly introduced.—The conversation of Mephistopheles and Faust in the recitative, which opens No. 2, is well written, and leads us to a melody-allegro—by Faust;—and here again M. Gounod is simply common-place without being beautiful, nor does the devil help him in his difficulty. Now comes some supernatural music; and what relates to fiends is ground so grandly travelled over by the great German Von Weber, that very little space is left to glean anything—as M. Meyerbeer proved in Robert le Diable. The supernatural apparition of Marguerite at this point of the drama is an opportunity for a movement in the orchestra, such as is afterwards heard in a lovers' duet. Following this is the repetition of the allegro air by Faust, this time intermixed with counterpoints in the odd bars where the commas come, symmetrically uttered by Mephistopheles:—by courtesy called a Duet, and meanly ending the act.

Composers, if sane, try to end their acts efficiently by the music, if the action permit. Here was a splendid chance for a Duet for Tenor and Bass—the fiend of chance being deep-voiced:—such a duet is so rare in music that but some four or five occur to us: a man of genius like Rossini, in the plautudes of the libretto of William Tell, created a masterpiece of a duet: Auber, not addicted to the sublimest musical perceptions, rises above his ordinary style, inspired by the situation between Masaniello and the fellow conspirator, and throws out a hymn of liberty worthy to be sung by the heroes of Marathon or Gettysburg on the field of battle. The poverties of this duet are therefore both positive and relative. But moreover there is a grave blunder such as a man of talent might, but as a man of genius could not, make, in giving music without any ecstasy of style or pitch to Faust now aged 21, over Faust etait 81. But yet more: the most vigorous music as to pitch and emphasis is in his mouth supposed to be without teeth, and his lungs without breath, and his heart without love. And all that Faust Jr. gets is the cold-meats of the ex-old man to express the unexampled feeling of a person with 60 years knocked-off his head at a clip. If the poet, and the costumer who "makes up" the actors to any age from 18 to 1800, the years of the wandering Jew, had executed their parts with no greater fidelity to nature than the musician, Faust would have been a young man first and the devil would have changed him into an old one.

Act II. opens with a chorus, No. 3, of mixed characters, affording a chance for some beautiful melody such as Weber or Rossini, or Auber, give their crowds. This, however, is not beautiful, though correctly rhythmical. A novelty is a strophe by old men—much applauded, because they sing with weak voices. So too there is clapping and stamping for the anvil-pounding in the Trovatore; and would be for a scene of Broadway where the laying-down of a railroad was set to music. Such applause, however, is neither genuine nor sublime. The peroration of this chorus of Faust is well-worked up and counterpointed, in which kind of elaborate production M. Gounod is a master.

A well-written recitative follows, leading to No. 4, a bacchanalian song by Mephistopheles. This is vigorous and artistically tinted and balanced, but wanting in melodic flash, necessary to a popular bibbing-ditty. No. 5 is the scene where the fiend shows his power to the chorus, and they keep him off with the crosses on their sword-hilts, which were specific to that end in the middle-ages. This is brief concerted music thoroughly well told. No. 6 is a waltz and chorus. This is well-rhythmical and melodic, and the Coda is finely worked up; but the melody is not first-class. In the course of this piece is an episode in the waltz-measure, but moderated in quickness, where Margaret crosses the stage, and Faust addresses her for the first time. The phrase he uses is musically deficient in grace, though the note of interrogation is rightly indicated by a rise of the voice. Margaret responds, but on the same chord with which Faust opened the conversation with her a moment before. Her reply is not interrogative, but positive, and therefore the chord should not begin on the dominant of sol, as is Faust's question, but on the tonic. The words are Non, monsieur: (no, sir:) demanding the color as punctuation. Then those words follow: Je ne suis demoiselle ni belle, Et je n'ai pas besoin qu'on me donne la main (I am not a young lady, nor beautiful, and I have no need of your hand—or your courtesy). The proper way of declaiming these words is not that adopted by M. Gounod, because he repeats demoiselle ni belle, without meaning or necessity. It is very correctly conceived, so far as it is musically in the opera, the same as in the drama; that is to say no musical attitude is struck, or undue parade of style made.

Act III opens with some good orchestral music, No. 7, followed by a pretty little air of the Boy Lover, Siebel. It lies well under the voice. Well-constructed orchestral details and vocal recitative follow, coming to No. 8—a cavatina by Faust. The first four bars of this are beautiful, but would be better if a second line were set under the third and fourth bars, instead of a repetition of the first. Bar 5 is good and logically follows the other—and logical sequence comprehends much of the success in melody. But bars 6, 7, in view of the manner in which the receptive faculties of the hearer are moulded by the previous bars, are hobbling. The succeeding eight bars are good but intricate, because of the condensed transitions of key. Then comes a series of modulations and transitions where the best singer has to look as to what keys he is rushing into, and where only a limited number of hearers can follow him. A bit of recitative between Faust and Mephistopheles ensues, and to this succeeds No. 9, a scene and air of Margaret. This opens with these words: "Je voudrais bien savoir quel était ce jeune homme; si c'est un grand seigneur, et comment il se nomme?" (I should like to know who this young man is; if he be a great Lord, and what is his name?) All this is given on the same notes—absolutely monotonous, and indicating in the speaker an indifference to the subject so spoken or sung. Then follows a ballad of the antique mould. Here was a good chance for something nice. Mark how Rossini, in his Cinderella, as the girl is over the kitchen-fire embers, takes an advantage of the situation. Una volta era un Re—(once a king there chanced to be) sings Cinderella; and what an old, old ballad it is, with beauty and grace, however, in every note. This may be said to be a little matter in the list of musical pieces of an opera, but we take issue there, and think it is a very important and indispensable matter, that airs, simple strains, chosen by the composer for really more emphasis than much more stately stage business, should be up to the mark. Now M. Gounod has either adopted the first eight bars of his ballad from some old relic, or he has invented them. In either case it is lifeless. True, there is the minor seventh, and some of the aroma due an old ballad, but it wants essence and beauty. It is well-harmonized, however, and would go well as chords on the piano. After some recitative we come to the Aria of Margaret, which is in 3-time. It is not a first-class effusion, as it ought to be, though the melody is not tornanted, as the French say; and where there is so much that is, we should be thankful for the boon. The writing for Margaret's music is very judicious as to pitch for a mezzo-soprano voice; and it is to M. Gounod's honor that he does not strain his voices with high notes, to get a transient effect.

We come now to a scene and recitative where Mephistopheles is humbugging the old woman, to give Faust an opportunity for the grand and decisive attack on Margaret. This is introductory to a Quartet, No. 10. Now, the difference between a quartet, and solos, consists in the union of the voices; for if they are pretty much one after the other, and only in little bits, bearing to a full state of melody the same relation that the gravy giblets do to the entire body of the turkey, it is only a quartet in name, without even the sustained merit of solos. This is the case with the so-called quartet in question. It may be said that the business of the scene is carried on with it perfectly, and so it is; but the musical requirements of a quartet are not; and if these be not considered of paramount importance in an opera, why not be satisfied with the speaking drama? And moreover the great superiority of the musical over the spoken drama is, that in concerted pieces, by means of harmony which is only known to music, different and extremely varied passions and emotions are expressed absolutely at the same moment. In speaking simply, this would be mere label or jargon, like the disturbance of a mob. It is a composer's duty to take advantage of this power of music, and the composer of genius always does. But M. Gounod in a quartet gives as little as possible to the voices in simultaneous combination. This may be a difficult thing to effect, but genius knows how to accomplish it: and it is one of the points that the public is quick to appreciate if well managed. In this piece, M. Gounod doles out four bars of absolutely four-voiced music; then we have a number of pages of narrative talk by the characters, too much piecemeal for any interest, and next the voices come together for about twenty short bars or measures. The first four of these concerted bars bear a perfectly phrased melody; the first measure beginning on the tonic or key-chord, and going to the dominant chord or that of the fifth, on the second measure; the third measure commences on the dominant chord and goes in the fourth measure to the tonic chord. The words are: Je ne vous crois pas, etc. Now this is a perfectly square-cut four bars of a melody, and it requires a response. A tyro in the art of constructing a melody should not begin bar 5, as bar 3, or on the dominant: (the appoggiatura which M. Gounod introduces both in the treble and the bass in the commencement of bar 5 not altering the chord of the dominant or fifth of the scale). This gawky repetition of the chord of bar 3 is followed in bar 5 by matter which not being sequential consequently the genius of melodic propulsion, or what should be the inevitable logic required of single notes, is lost, and the remainder of the so-called quartet is without further interest; except that which is merely dependent upon chords. After the quartet there is a harsh jump, without warrant in the change of stage business, from La flat to Re natural, where there is some "general utility business," upon orchestral figures.

This is followed by some diabolical utterances of Mephistopheles in measured recitation; and conducts to the lover's Duet. The first ten measures of this on the pedal bass of the dominant are skilful and graceful in the orchestra and in the voice-writings, leading to the positive melody, commencing with the words Laissez-moi. These also commence on the dominant, which is a want of contrast with the opening of the introductory matter. There is, it is true, a drone-bass on the key-note, but this simply disparages and renders hardy-gurdyish what ought to be the very soul of love and passion. Let us however, this apart, examine the melody of the duet as it commences with the words Laissez-moi—a melody said to be the best in the opera. The notes are la, sol, with a rise to do—followed by re, do, with a rise to sol—constituting the first and second bars of the phrase. Now a melody which goes from sol up to do and then from do up to sol octave, sounds like tuning a violin, and has no more inspiration or passion. The next bar "contempler ton vi-" (sa-ge) is melodically good, but had harmonically: because, the drone-bass is kept throughout, and the chord on the last beat, being a return to the chord of the dominant (as the two first beats of this bar 3 are the tonic chord) is a doubling on the track instead of being harmonic progress; and is freezing cold, beside being, if music may be compared to manners, snobbish. The proper and the only love-passionate chord under the notes do si, on the third beat of this third bar, is one on the sub-dominant, represented in the figured-bass system by 6-3; and would be correctly from the bass up, b, d, g. This chord of 6-3 fetches perfectly the chord on the dominant whether a fifth, or precluded by the 6-4, as is the case with the 6-4 chord c, f, a in the next or fourth bar of this phrase, over the second syllable of the word vi-sage. The next four bars, being made up of the same poetical line (a very feeble musico-verbal proceeding, however), ought to balance precisely in their syllables and accentuations the first preceding four bars. But they do nothing of the kind, and there is a total want of symmetry, and consequently of melodic beauty. The words Laissez-moi here are only given once, and not twice as in the first instance, and hence the second syllable of vi-sage is sprawled over a whole bar. The accents of the bars with the words sous la pâle clarté, Dont l'astre de la nuit, are symmetrical with the opening bars, and constitute a melodic phrase of four bars more. Then comes a closing which is not four bars, but five hobbling ones. The first bar of these five is a delicious passage, (the seminal idea of which is in Von Weber's Oberon, and which composers have repeatedly copied since); but the delirium does not necessitate disorder, or the use of an odd bar. We beg to remark parenthetically here, that in nothing are the great composers more particular than in the symmetry of their rhythms and melodic phrasings, confining them to groups of two and four bars; or their multiples, and avoiding, excepting under very curious circumstances, rhythms of three or five bars which the ear refuses to accept. For example: Beethoven, in the longest movement of his most extended symphony, the Eroica, that is in the first allegro which comprises several hundred measures, always proceeds by twos and fours. Rossini, the most spontaneous melodist who ever existed, is so particular with his rhythms as to put in an extra odd bar of the preparatory ictus chords, when the want of it would make the melody sum up odd. When we say that the ear refuses these oddities of rhythm, in serious and dramatic melody, we mean that it is akin to the disagreeable effect of inharmonious coloring to the artistic eye, or unjoined metre to the poetical ear.

—To return to the Duet: Margaret repeats the same phrases as Faust's just noticed. To this ensue some interlocutory passages on orchestral phrases, followed by an Andante in 4-4 time, where Faust sings eight good melodic bars with an appropriate climax: in which, however, the word-setting is chaotic, for the end of a line commences the second phrase on bar third, and the end of a line begins the third phrase, bar 5, and cannot be too much condemned. The words of the eight bars of Margaret are equally chaotic. This melody of Margaret does not properly balance or respond to the previous eight bars,—for it commences without variety on the same chord. This is followed by an allegro agitato of no distinct melody, but of two bar phrasings, and restlessness of key. A good clean large declamatory statement would have been much preferable to such unsatisfactory niggling. Some general vocal business follows on orchestral details.

Act IV. commences with an orchestral interlude, and recitative. When a composer chooses one sharp for his signature, and writes in five, it makes a very confused page; better put in the five signatures. Why such a paradox of "accidents?" Great men get along without them. It may occupy the attention of a certain class of amateurs in picking out the chords at the piano-forte, and may look very learned to fools; but true music lies deeper than all this. Beethoven, pretty good authority, will give three hundred bars, counting the repetition, in a symphony with one change of key, and no parade of accidental notes. Mozart, in his divine Non più andrai, has a single change of key, and one accidental note (the fa sharpened) in the whole piece. . . . We might multiply scores of examples on this head.

No. 12, a minor air of Margaret, tremulously accompanied, is about the completest piece of sustained melody in the opera. Some recitative follows.

The scene outside the Cathedral is introduced with some transcendental harmonies in the orchestra, followed by organ music in the right strain. Margaret on the church steps, having been betrayed, is beset with the voices of demons and the potential curses of Mephistopheles, who appears in a mysterious manner behind her—the agonies of conscience, in other words.

No appeal on the stage is so powerful as the religious one of scenery and situation, especially in this country where we have no cathedrals of architectural sublimity to excite the emotions which lift the soul to the infinite. A stage representation of a cathedral, with the organ heard within, addresses itself directly to the imagination, which supplies the place of size, and creates feelings akin to those experienced in a vast ecclesiastical building of the middle ages. This is a powerful scene ready to the hands of a composer; and the choral which is heard within, intermixed with the demoniac ragings of the fiend without, followed by the ecstatic cries to God by Margaret, control the audience as no common scene can. It is in such ready-made situations where a composer can hardly go wrong that M. Gounod creates a real impression on the audience. The choral is simple and good; the shrieking of the demon properly sustained according to rule by minor chords and much trombone-work, and the organ is judiciously interspersed. The agitated invocation of Margaret, which closes this scene, is liable to criticism for its insufficiency of melodic flow, and the inconsequence of the harmony.

No. 13, is a Soldier's Chorus. The first movement in 6-8 time is fluent and well-rhythmed. This of course must be effective in the same proportion that it is symmetrical. There is a second movement in 12-8 time which is in a higher style, and is very captivating in its genre. This is said to be the most popular piece in the opera, and we should judge so, as it seems to be the most persistently melodic. It is, we beg to remark, very easy for a composer, though it may be difficult or impossible for other people, to write an opera without melody, or with poor melodies. For the composer of operas, worthy the name, and there is generally one or two living, can write against time, if he do not have to stop for a first-rate melody to make a scene. But if he come to a place where it is necessary to present as good a melody as "The Last Rose of Summer," and does not use M. Flotow's receipt of bagging such game, as in Martha, the composer may be forced to stop for a day, or a week, or a month, because the melodious spirits of the lyrical deep will not answer to call. But harmony and intricacies and orchestral effects and varieties of coloring are always at his command, if he know his business. The affluence of melody which characterizes the works of the great masters is so signally striking a need of M. Gounod, that this melodic piece, the Soldier's Chorus, claims and receives an extraordinary degree of notice from public and critics.

Following this chorus is a recitative and a serenade, No. 14; which, being by Mephistopheles, has everything but love in it—it is of the grotesque school suited to the character.

No. 15 is the "Trio de Duels," where the brother of Margaret is wounded. It is made up of exclamations, and is deficient in melodic interest.

No. 16 is "The Death of Valentine," the brother; he curses his sister so unhandsonably that his demise ought not to be regretted. This is a good piece of sustained and measured declamation.

No. 18 is "The Walpurgis night," in which there is some wild chorus work, of a characteristic kind, very well written. This is followed by some excellent passages for orchestra, and another chorus intermixed with solo work by Mephistopheles, which is fluent. A bacchanalian song by Faust, is not a great success.

No. 19, a trio finale, is next in order. After some appropriate orchestration and recitative, is a measured duet—allegro non troppo—which has some bars of eccentricity in it, and others which run naturally enough. We cannot perceive the beauty or propriety of the harmonic sequence of the 5th bar, with the words les fers la mort, or the worth of the oddity of the notes over ne me font plus peur. Some adonized reminiscences of Margaret follow, quoting the first admiring words of Faust. Broken dramatic traits ensue, and then comes what ought to be a religious ecstatic movement—which begins well and loses beauty in the third bar. The piece is in Sol, and immediately changes to La, three sharps, and further rises to B, five sharps. It is a trio between Margaret, Faust and Mephistopheles. The vehement changes in the peroration are warranted by the climacteric intensity of the situation and are finely worked up. A short recitative follows where Mephistopheles fails to get his prey. Harp and angelic voices are heard, with a plainness of religious poetic statement that we would not dare to quote into English. The organ then comes in, and we suppose the opening of the choral phrase with it must be copied from some ancient manuscript before the laws of harmony were understood, or we would not be helped on the same dish to consecutive whole-toned fifths and to consecutive octaves between the extreme parts, either of which would make a funatica per la musica tear his hair, and wish Margaret on her way to the devil, instead of the direction she is going in, angel-tended, to the skies.

We have treated only incidentally of the orchestration in the above analysis. We may say generally that of this M. Gounod is a master. He understands the technical proprieties of individual or solo painting in the orchestra; the traditional and suggestive uses to which such and such instruments are best adapted; and is economical, and wisely so in the use of his means. In short he displays the knowledge scientific and artistic, which may be gained by a man of high talent, with devout study, bringing all the rays of his mind to a special focus. It is difficult to judge of the splendor of instrumentation or the setting of musical jewels when there are so few to set. Time, the great arbiter, will decide M. Gounod's place in the ranks of dramatic composers. So far as we can judge of his work by reading and hearing, we should say that it lacks the indispensable vitality of divine melody—and adventitious aids before its appearance, and on the stage during its performance, may confer on it a temporary renown—but that will not endue it with immortality.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JAN. 23, 1864.

Italian Opera.

For three weeks have Max Maretzek and his strong company at the Boston Theatre had the encouragement of very large and approving audiences, every night, for every sort of opera. great, without mistrusting our memory of Lind, Bosio, Grisi, Sontag, Mario, and others. There

People were soon persuaded of the unusual completeness of the combination, and the more than average excellence (to say the least) of all the singers in their several ways; while half a dozen of them have proved themselves artists of high mark. This, with good orchestra and chorus, with good acting as well as singing, is a great deal, and goes far to compensate for the absence of any single singer whom we can confidently call are no positively bad ones in this company, none positively offensive, no mere sticks. All seem to take an artist pride in their work, striving to act well their parts without shirking, affectation or egotistic nonsense. Verily they have their reward, and they deserve it.

We have now to pass hastily in review the "business of the week" (fortnight), as the theatrical critics say, having spoken only of the two opening nights. "Ione" and "Norma," were followed on Thursday evening, the 7th, by Verdi's Traviata; for many sittings through of which a man's life ought to be too valuable. It presented, however, another of the prime donne, Mlle. BRIGNOLI ORTOLANI, who found much favor, we are told, as well as her able supporters, Mazzoleni and Bellini. We had the pleasure of hearing her through one act of Lucia in the Saturday "Matinée;" a pure, even, honest style of singing, with a pleasing voice of moderate power; bright black eyes, slight, pretty figure, and quite an earnest, truthful impersonation of her part. Mazzoleni was Edgardo, and Bellini the stern brother; and the famous sextet finale, as indeed the whole scene of the dire and dismal wedding was made remarkably effective.

Fourth night, Friday, the 8th. A very respectable and sensible performance (for these times) of what is and what deserves to be the most popular of operas, Don Giovanni. There was an immense audience, in character the best of the season, inasmuch as more of the real listeners, and fewer of the gabbling would-be fashionables, await their turn in such an opera. Here, too, as at Covent Garden, the upper amphitheatre is always packed on Don Giovanni nights;—one of the cheering signs among so many that discourage any earnest music-lover. There were no parts greatly rendered to be sure, but there was a high average of excellence throughout. Mme. MEDORI's Donna Anna did not supplant for us such ideals of the character as Grisi, Lagrange, or even Truffi (who suggested the moral height and beauty of the part so finely), have left to us; but there was dignity, nobility and earnestness in her acting, and her singing in the great moments of the part surprised us. It was particularly fine in the impassioned recitative where she relates the outrage to her lover, and the splendid burst of declamatory song which follows: Or sai chi l'onore, &c. In the Trio of maskers, her part of the melody was admirably sung, so well conceived and so expressively conveyed, that one could pardon one or two failures of the voice to reach the true pitch of a high note. The "letter" aria, so frequently omitted, was sung very artistically. The tremolo, that afflicts all voices trained in the gladiatorial Verdi school, was less obvious than usual. The lover Ottavio (Sig. LOTTI), being a small man, seemed to shrink away under the shadow of so huge a mistress, but he used his clear, penetrating small voice to good purpose, even in Il mio tesoro. The Elvira of Miss FANNY STOCKTON was a rather unripe, tame and pupil-like performance; but her pleasing voice and person, with carefulness, freedom from affectation, and a fair degree of execution, made her contribution not uninteresting. These two slender voices were out of proportion to the larger calibre of Medori's, and this was about all there was to mar the beauty of the Trio. Elvira's finest recitative and air: Mi tradi, was, with obvious prudence, left out.

Miss KELLOGG, was, of course, charming as Zerlina. Her voice has gained in power, and has lost none of its flexibility or brightness. A very facile, finished, true, expressive singer is she. In the action of the part her pretty, rustic and coquettish ways were sure to please; but we question her conception of the Botti, batti scene; that pettish, half vexed, half roguish way of pinching and punching her Masetto hardly harmonizes with the serious beauty of the music. All very well for a coquettish little witch of a country girl; but such was evidently not Mozart's conception, if we are to read it in his music, and not merely in the libretto. Far truer, to our mind, than all the other Zerlinas, was that of the incomparable Bosio; that for us remains and always must remain the best ideal of the part; she played it as if she sympathetically divined in Mozart's music a certain fine, superior nature disguised in the rustic maiden. We wish we had room to insert here, not for the first time, Oulibicheff's delicate portraiture of the character in this sense. He drew it from the music, paints us Mozart's Zerlina, not Da Ponte's. But our exception to Miss Kellogg's Zerlina applies only to the piece in question, and here only to the action, not the singing. In general we liked it, and would not have withheld one particle of the applause she fairly won. She was well seconded by M. DUBREUIL's Masetto, which was natural, loutish enough, but within artistic bounds. His modest parts are always in good taste.

The fine person and bearing of Sig. BELLINI combined with his superb baritone, so large, rich, round and organ-like in quality, to make one of the best representatives that we have had of the seductive, heaven and hell defying Don. His action was elegant and courtly, full of vivacity, and his singing (with the exception of La ci darem) was always fine; his voice (happily free from the chronic tremolo, which has settled like an ague upon nearly all the voices in this company) was grandly telling and sonorous in the dread scene with the statue. Sig. BRACHI developed a fine comic vein—serio-comic much of the time—in Leporello, which he looked and sang and acted remarkably well, with quite as much of the true humor and less farcical extravagance than Formes, and most of our Leporellos in times past. Herr MUELLER delivered his ponderous bass tones with effect as "L' uom di sanse." Chorus and orchestra (under MARETZK's own energetic baton) were up to the mark, and, if there were some of the usual threadbare deficiencies in the presentation of some scenes; if the banquet scene lacked the three orchestras upon the stage, &c., why, there was no pretence of such completeness, and the whole thing looked fair and honest. They still persist in turning the Sextet scene inside out, Leporello and Elvira absurdly trying to grope their way into houses, when they are supposed to be inside of some place from which they would escape.

Second week. Passing what we are told was a very spirited, sonorous, strong performance of Ernani (Monday, 11th), as it of course must have been with Medori, Mazzoleni, Bellini and Biachi in such music—Verdi's best type of himself; leaving Martha, too, in spite of Kellogg and Sulzer, to senses upon which its sweets have only begun to pall—for does not that begin with the first hearing—we drop in to see if Verdi's Macbeth (given on Wednesday and Saturday) has in its music intrinsically any of that charm, which a handful of listeners, one stormy night at the Howard Athenæum, many years ago, may remember to have been wrought upon them through Bosio's inspiration, with Badiali as Macbeth. We think that was the only time it ever was performed here, and our own recollection extends only to the banquet scene with its brindisi (Lady Macbeth stepping to the footlights to sing a drinking song!) and one or two witch scenes, which, it seems to us, were better managed then than now. Well, Wednesday night satisfied us that it was Bosio and not Verdi that made that half hour memorable to us. This time we had true and powerful acting in the principal parts by MEDORI and BELLINI: but the music of the opera seemed beneath contempt; the merest commonplaces of Verdi, poor shreds and patches of the same musical stuff which he had already worked up into more semblance of life and completeness in Ernani; with the exception of one or two ensemble finales (much inferior to the O sommo Carlo chorus), scarcely a passage to redeem it. The same unnatural staccato choruses, the same loud empty unisons, nothing but trivial hum drum dance tunes for his stage full of witches, nothing but the cheapest melodramatic orchestration going on during the murder scene. It is a mistake to call it one of his earliest works; it sounds more like Ernani gone to seed, a hopeless repetition, for perhaps the seventh time, weaker and weaker, of the effete inspiration which had flowered out in that. And we have verified the suspicion: Ernani was first produced in 1844, Macbeth in 1847.

And so we hasten to what all are waiting for, and all are praising, Gounod's Faust. It has achieved great popularity in all the theatres of Europe, even in Germany, which accepts so little from the French. It has run many nights with unabated enthusiasm in New York, both the Italian and the German troupe making it their strong card. And now we have it here; four times in these two weeks it has crowded the great theatre, and would have done so twice as often, perhaps, had it been presented, for there seems to be but one general chorus of delight and admiration. Yet it must be owned that not the most musical or finely appreciative sort of audiences are the first to flock to any such new nine day's wonder, and that amid the noise and gabble of so many thoughtless people many of the finest traits of the music, which lie in the orchestra, pass unnoticed save by a few. We have copied from time to time, since Faust was written, various analyses and criticisms from French, English, German papers; one or two also from New York critics; our correspondents have written about it; so that our readers came to it with a certain familiarity, at least with its subject and arrangement, and the opinions pro and con about it. To-day we give also the larger part of an extended analysis by Mr. Fry of the Tribune, who goes into some details of technical criticism, which the more curious student may like to verify, while he has much to say which any one will understand. Whether we agree with him in the main points or not, it will be useful to bring the various views of men who examine and think for themselves together. In times past we have oftener differed than agreed with Mr. Fry, perhaps, on questions of Art; all the more pleasant is it therefore now to find that our impressions of a new work coincide essentially.

In a word, then, after some study of the music privately, and after two hearings of the opera as so admirably performed by Maretzke's company, while it has interested us and charmed us on the whole more than any new opera for many years, not excepting the last works of Meyerbeer, we cannot say that it strikes us as a great work, or as a new revelation of musical genius of a very high and individual order. It seems to us to have more of ingenuity than genius; more of good judgment, common sense, taste, poetic feeling, than of creative originality; more of acquired musicianship, and careful study of dramatic truth, than inspiration; more of the boldness, enterprise and patience, than of the lyrical genius, of the Art reformer.

And, as for imagining that M. Gounod's music has risen to the height of Goethe's wondrous poem,—that were as wild as to pronounce him the peer of Beethoven, Schumann, Schubert, &c. That will do when we find his music equal to the real poetry of that first scene of Faust, not shrinking from rendering those finer interruptions of his soliloquy, the Easter bells, the visions of spirits of beauty and delight, &c., instead of simplifying it all into commonplace choruses of peasants and laborers heard through the window, and no whit superior to those in "Martha." Think of Weber, of Rossini, not to look even higher, and what is there in this opera from beginning to end which bears the stamp of a positive original genius, a native individual vein of melody, or melody and harmony combined, like the least thing that such men do? The Mozarts, Rossinis, Webers, Mendelssohns are just as individual and personally present to you in their music, as they would be if you saw their faces and conversed with them. Is that the case with Gounod? In Faust, at least, we do not find him, do not touch him, seize not the traits by which we should always instantly recognize him again, although he makes a pleasant impression on us and we must credit him with a great success such as it is. His handiwork, his judgment, learning, taste and feeling, these assert themselves; but his genius, is it palpable and do we feel we know it?

Faust does not entirely lack melody; but such few distinct melodies as it has are the most commonplace parts of it; if they are delicate, if they are true to situation and to sentiment, as in the love scenes of the third act, still there is nothing very marked or memorable about them; they sound more studied than inspired, do not spring up spontaneously, each with the ever fresh individuality of a wildflower. The only really rounded pieces, with a marked tune in them, are the waltzes, which scarcely can be said to rival Strauss, and the soldiers' march and chorus, which, however spirited, are not better than you may hear almost any day when there is a band parading in the street. No, the charm of Faust we find, first of all, in the instrumental accompaniment, which is rich and varied with poetic illustration, refined, chaste, clear, fascinating, as well as learned and complex. It is free from humdrum guitar strumming of mere chords, which only support, but add nothing to, the voice. It is wholly free from the ugly common-places, the everlasting brazen emphasis (the common swearing of music) of the Verdi orchestra; it reaches its ends by more quiet, wholesome, unexceptionable means; beauty is not sacrificed to effect (except for a moment now and then, as at the first appearance of the devil). This is refreshing in these days; and these are not merely negative virtues. There is interesting matter in nearly all of the orchestral work; it will reward you to give your ear principally to that—if the gabbling fools around you, who think there is nothing going on, unless some one is singing, will only have the decency to let you listen! For from this cause perhaps the most interesting musical piece in the work, the grave and sombre introduction, with its deep tones groping about in shadowy modulations, its brooding, introspective Faust-like mood, and its expressive little fugue was scarcely audible. To be sure, it soon passes into a phase of more ordinary sentimental melody and ends with pretty-pastoral phrases which are common enough; but then, as the curtain rises, another sombre introduction, special to the scene, and more impassioned, is played. The orchestra, too, keeps up the musical continuity and interest well throughout all the recitative, which is full of character. It has many genial traits in all the dialogue which is in any way humorous, especially in setting off the satirical courtesy and bonhomie of Mephistopheles. The music of his part, by the way, is the most ingenious and novel of the whole, and quite felicitously characteristic. His song of the "Golden Calf," and much more so his "Serenade," are Satanic enough to relieve a long spell of sentimentality. But the weird, the supernatural, the mystery that makes you shudder, you never get; nothing of such power as Weber's in that element; and we may safely say, not once in the whole opera a thrill of aught approaching the sublime, whether the Evil One be near or out of thought. Not even the church scene, with its sound of choir and organ, and the demon interrupting Margaret's prayer, has in it anything of intrinsic musical greatness, although the opportunity is cleverly employed. This, and the prison scene too, with Margaret's ascension, owe more to scene and situation than to purely imaginative musical reproduction. Would not the author of Fidelio and the Egmont music have made infinitely more of it?

Next, we find the charm of Faust in the wise common sense and tact displayed in the dramatic treatment, in the fitting of the music everywhere to character and subject—the story itself, kept so close to Goethe, coming in for a large share of the interest. Gounod seeks dramatic truth and consistency before rounded musical form. Letting this go, he gives us a musical drama free from the usual operatic absurdities of situation. Everything is nicely calculated to serve the business of the play. He has chosen as it were the good side of Wagner without the bad, and, with as much musicianship, has finer instincts of fitness and a finer sense of beauty. But Fidelio has all this merit, with entire preservation of musical form as such; Fidelio is in the first place great music, and a true drama none the less. So all Gluck's operas, his great ones, solve the same problem perfectly within the bounds of clearly defined melody and musical form. This surely is a truer and a greater thing to do. Were Gounod a great musical genius, he would have done it here, for not even Mozart in Don Juan had so great a subject.

Then we must give this opera credit for many passages of beautiful music; delicate and charming traits scattered liberally throughout. Nearly the whole third act is beautiful, from the pretty little song of Siebel gathering flowers, to the lovers' duet, which is delicacy and purity itself. The quartet, too, if not all that our friend Fry would have it, is genial, and contrasts four individualities quite charmingly. And here we must confess our pleasure in Miss KELLOGG's exquisite impersonation of Margaret, so delicately conceived, so well sung and acted. The "King of Thule" ballad, with its little interruptions, the mind running still upon the handsome stranger, was touchingly natural, simple and poetic. And the confession and embrace of the true lovers, (Sig. MAZZOLENI entering into the whole scene with the same spirit, with all the sentiment and delicacy which such a voice as his permits), was so far from the coarse, conventional stage way of such things, that one could witness it almost as he could read it in the poem.

If the sentimental portions of this opera are the best, the bright and lively spectacle scenes are doubtless next best in the popular estimation. The "Kermesse" is crowded with life scenically more than musically; but if the musical ideas or themes sound rather common, yet they are worked up with no slight art and complication to produce such a swarming, variegated, bright-hued whole. The real skill lies in the weaving in of the dialogue, and the keeping of the characters so musically distinct. The brass band and the soldier chorus are rather a cheap appeal to popular effect; and as they add nothing to the scale of musical importance in the work, they occupy too large a space, especially when the entire procession and performance has to be repeated.

But to point out the beauties and to weigh the merits of such a work we should have room to analyze it in detail and in order. We have hardly room enough in which to speak of the admirable manner in which the Faust was put upon the stage and represented. Principal singers, orchestra and chorus left but little to be desired. We have spoken of the Margaret. Sig. MAZZOLENI, in spite of the strained, hard quality of his voice, sang the part of Faust exceeding well and was carefully true in action. Sig. BIACHI took so kindly to the part of Mephistopheles, that hereafter, whether he play Leporello, Duke Alfonso, or what not, we shall still look for the cloven foot. Sig. BELLINI, the superb baritone, made the small part of Valentine a very notable feature of the piece; and Mlle. SULZER was better suited to the pretty part of the boy lover Siebel, than to any in which we have yet seen and heard her.

Concerts.

A pile of interesting programmes of the past three weeks are before us. We can barely skim them over.

The MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB opened their second concert (Jan. 7), with a Trio by Schumann (in F, op. 80), new to us, a work full of genius, and ably rendered by Messrs. Daum, pianist, Schultze and Fries, (pray give it to us again); and closed the evening with the Mendelssohn Quartet in E minor, op. 44. Part of Spohr's Quintet, op. 69, a couple of piano pieces ("Liedeslied" by Henselt, and "Song without Words," Mendelssohn), made out the rest of the instrumental selections, and Miss ADDIE RYAN sang with charming voice and style the "Cradle Song" of Gottschalk and a song by Spohr, with 'cello obligato.

Messrs. KREISSMANN, LEONHARD and EICHBERG had as eager an audience as ever for their third soirée, with this very choice programme:

1. Sonata (Op. 105), for Violin and Piano.....Schumann.
2. Aria, from Iphigenie in Tauris.....Gluck.
3. { a. Scherzo (Op. 38.) }.....Chopin.
- { b. Nocturne (Op. 62.) No. 1, }.....S. Bach.
4. Chaconne, for Violin.....S. Bach.
- (with Piano Accompaniment by Schumann.)
5. { a. Widmung, }.....R. Franz.
- { b. Frühlingssong, }.....R. Franz.
- { c. Willkommen im Wald, }.....R. Franz.
6. Sonata, (Op. 80), No. 1. (violin and piano)...Beethoven.

The Sonata Duos were interesting in themselves and in their contrast, that of Beethoven being naturally the best appreciated. The glorious Chaconne we should have liked better without any accompaniment, or with Mendelssohn's; we have heard Mr. Eichberg play it with a purer tone. The Chopin Scherzo in C sharp minor seemed still more wonderful by repetition, and Mr. Leonhard surpassed himself in the execution of it, and of the exquisitely fine Nocturne. Mr. Kreissmann's songs went to the heart of the audience.

The ORCHESTRAL UNION were on the eve of action, it appears, while we were pleading for orchestral music. True it is a small orchestra for the great Hall; true, an Afternoon programme can be only in part classical; true, we have to take it with interpolations of "Gréat Organ"—incongruous mixture of two good things;—still it was very good to hear the sound thereof in overture and symphony. On the last two Wednesdays they have played for us Beethoven's exquisite 4th Symphony, and Mendelssohn's "Italian," which every one can now trace directly to those happy hours when the wonderful youth was writing his letters from Italy. And they have played Nicolai's "Ein feste Burg" overture, with Organ, and the Zauberflöte overture, and lighter waltz pieces, &c., very wisely placed at the end of the programme,—all quite nicely rendered. The organ pieces have been good ones, Mr. THAYER playing a Battiste Offertoire, and Mr. LANG Schumann's Fugue on the letters B, A, C, H (i. e. Bb, A, C, B), a Mendelssohn Andante, and Rink's concerto with flute solo. The audiences have been encouragingly large, in spite of doubled price.

The GREAT ORGAN CONCERTS have chiefly taken the form of late of Sacred Concerts on Sunday evenings, and the plan works well. In the first, Mr. PAINÉ played of Bach the Tocatta and Fugue in D minor and the Passacaglia, sublime works both, the concert piece in C, by Thiele, with something of the Beethoven impetus and fire in it, and his own variations on the Austrian Hymn, and accompanied Mrs. KEMPTON in the beautiful Ave Maria by Franz, which she sang finely. Mr. WILLCOX played the Benedictus from Mozart's 12th Mass, and accompanied Miss Houstoun in Cherubini's Ave Maria, in "With verdure clad", and the two ladies in the duet "Quis est homo." Dr. TUCKERMAN accompanied Mrs. Kempton in "He was despised" and "O rest in the Lord", and Miss Houstoun in "Angels ever bright and fair" and played an Offertoire (op. 39) by Wely. Mr. WILLCOX also improvised, modestly and briefly. A rich programme, but by far too miscellaneous and too long. The singing was excellent, except that the soprano lady has a nervous tendency to sharpen sometimes. The largest audience since the Organ opening sat it all through with remarkable patience, encoring several of the songs. We did not hear the second Sunday concert, when Mr. HENRY CARTER (from Quebec), Dr. TUCKERMAN and Mr. WILLCOX officiated as organists, with also a long programme, and a whole flock of singers (Mrs. Fowle, Mrs. Shattuck, Mrs. Cary, Mrs. Gilbert, Miss Anna Carey, Mr. Gilbert and Mr. P. H. Powers). The majority of the pieces were vocal, from the sacred works of Handel, Haydn, Mendelssohn and Weber, with a Quartet by Tuckerman. Mr. Carter played the G minor Fugue of Bach, and there were Offertoires by Wely and Battiste, as usual, for show pieces.

The purest Organ Concert that has yet been given was that of Mr. J. K. PAINÉ, last Sunday evening. His pieces were all strictly organ music, with the exception of the vocal pieces.

The most earnest music-lover could listen with interest to every piece, although he could dispense with one or two of the songs more willingly than most of the audience. Mr. Paine's rendering of those noble works of Bach was masterly; clear, even, dignified, with well chosen registration, in the pure legato organ style. They grow more and more impressive to the audience every time he plays them. The great round-toned 16-foot diapasons gave out the solemn theme of the Passacaglia very grandly, and you felt its ground-swell under all the variations, as the great work grew and grew with ever renewed inspiration. The "Choral Variations" [Vorspiele], with softer and contrasted stops, were singularly beautiful, especially the last, where the great trumpet sings the theme. The singing won much applause: and Mr. Paine's Benedictus was encored, more for the beauty of the composition, than the singing, the voices being too unequal.

Another and a unique Organ Concert, was given Jan. 7th by the three brothers CARTER, Cathedral organists of Canada, a rare brotherhood of talent.

We were only able to hear two of them, who displayed great ease and brilliancy of execution, and an uncommon facility and critical nicety in the combining and contrasting of stops. The Lobyesang piece was beautifully rendered; the Chopin Scherzo, No. 2, was a strange experiment, and brought out some new effects; the "Dead March" was accompanied with altogether too much thunder.

THIS EVENING Messrs. KREISSMANN & Co., give the fourth and last of their delightful soirées. Trios by Schubert and Beethoven, songs by Schumann and Schubert, &c. HENRY MOLLENHAUER assists.

To-morrow evening Mr. WILLCOX gives the Sacred Organ Concert, with a choir of twenty-five singers.

The Handel and Haydn Society are rehearsing Costa's "Eli."

PHILADELPHIA. We are sorry to have to abridge at all the following already brief letter, dated Jan. 16.

"Since my last, we have had the Marczek Opera troupe, now in your city. We owe them thanks for excellent performances of Don Giovanni and Norma. We owe them none for keeping us out of classical concerts during December. The only novelty they gave us was Petrella's Jone. Some one has said that it takes a clever composer to write even a poor opera. If the test be a true one, Petrella is a clever composer.

"Mr. WOLFSOHN deserves congratulations for the success of his first soirée. Of him but little need be said, as we have all come to know him as an artist whose presence with us is a pleasure, and whose success does credit to the judgment of the musical portion of our citizens. Herr HABELMANN, the tenor of the German opera troupe, assisted. He sang the "Adelaide" with exquisite taste. Since Stigelli and Johannsen, we have not had so successful an interpreter of German songs. His advantages are a pleasing voice, a correct style, and a fine, though not passionate conception of the songs he renders.

"A few words of Mr. AHREND. Without invidious comparisons between the gentlemen who took part in the Trio by Beethoven (in B flat, for piano, clarinet and 'cello), I would remark that Mr. A.'s playing, in that beautiful work, was a feature of the concert. His good taste and style there found full scope, while the Concerto by Kummer gave opportunity for the display of his powers as an executant. The latter composition was so full of ideas and so very long, that it failed to excite the interest due to it. In the Trio, all played so well that the performance was almost perfection itself. I know of no variations more interesting than those on the subject of the last movement: an old Italian air. How different from those modern variations that seem written solely to display digital dexterity, and in which the musical idea is so tortured and covered by forms and groupings, that possess no beauty of themselves and yet hide the charms of the original air.

"Who will not turn sick
"When" Liszt "calls music what is only trick;
Trick—that may serve to kill an idle hour,
And teach the ear, though not the soul, its power?
Trick—that might to expression lend a grace,
But when she's banished, ill supplies her place."

"Of this order is the Liszt paraphrase of the Faust waltz. It is showy and exceedingly difficult. Mr. Wolfsohn played it in a masterly manner and made the most of it. The brilliant Sextet by Onslow was played with care and precision, and pleased greatly. Especially interesting was the Andante con variazioni.

"I have also to note Messrs. CROSS and JARVIS's first soirée. Judging from the large attendance and the ability of the performers assisting them, the present season bids fair to prove as successful as the last. I regret that I was unable to get to the concert in time to hear the Beethoven Quintet, and the whole of the glorious Schubert Fantaisie for Piano and Violin. Mr. Jarvis played Liszt's transcription, "Einzug der Gäste auf dem Wartburg," with vigor and with judgment. There is in this solo little of the merely ornamental. The few runs and lours de force are as added arabesques, and, by their gracefulness, agreeably contrast with the massive harmonies of the subject. The object here seems rather to transfer orchestral effects to the piano. The genial, ever-fresh and for the piano, difficult Septet by Hummel was played with such finish, on the part of Mr. Jarvis, and such precision on the part of the other performers, as to leave but little to be desired.—For next week, we are promised the "Creation," two Gottschalk concerts and a Hartmann matinee."

S.

MUSICAL CRITICISM. Some wag in the Saturday Evening Gazette humorously hits off some of the styles of operatic criticism nowadays in vogue, as follows:

The amount of intellect and refined perception employed in the criticism of musical performances is quite unappreciated by our reading public. Thinking that it would be interesting to place before our readers some instances of the nice discrimination, elevated tone, scholastic attainments and impartial judgment of the critics of the day, we have selected a few examples from our files.

The "Daily Puffer" has the following singularly well-digested remarks on the performance of "Il auditorio in garbo splendido":

"Words cannot portray the magnificence of the dresses worn by the lovely ladies who graced the parquette and balcony on this occasion of delight. We have it, on undoubted authority, that four hundred and thirty new dresses were ordered for this occasion. A hairdresser of our acquaintance positively informed us that he had dressed sixty-nine ladies' heads in the latest style. We particularly remarked the colors which were apparent from a back view; the dark, wavy tresses, the snowy necks, the splendid silks and high-toned opera cloaks combined to form a picture never before presented in this house devoted to fashion and display. We cannot describe the emotions which the sight of these divine beauties awoke in the breasts of sensitive observers. We wish we might name some of these hours; but the veil of privacy should not rudely be drawn from the splendor of their charms.

"Signora Cantabile is a wonder. She is the greatest wonder in the world. She sings magnificently and acts more so. She is superb. She is incomparable. Her voice is a soprano sfogato of immense power and exquisite sweetness. She has sung in every city in the world and is universally acknowledged to be the greatest singer in every one of them. Her undertones are great and her middle notes quite pretty. She has a charming way of singing and captivates her hearers by the childish sweetness of her manner. She was dressed elegantly and looked splendidly.

"Signor Vocedipetto is magnificent. He sings splendidly. He is the most wonderful tenor in the world, and sings like one. His role in this opera is said to be the most stupendous performance on record. Mario is nowhere; and he is universally acknowledged to be the greatest tenore robusto ever heard on the Italian stage. He was dressed with great beauty and looked 'every inch a king.'

"The management of this troupe is in excellent hands. We receive our tickets with great despatch, and as many as we want, from the urbane and gentlemanly agent, Herr Watzisnahm. We congratulate Signor Burbo on the choice he has made of an assistant."

This is the gushing vein; the exuberant, the overflowing, the sensuous, the enthusiastic style. The "Morning Stenograph" says of the same thing:

"The house was full last night, and everything went off to the acceptance of everybody. The opera was 'Il auditorio in garbo splendido.' Some of the choruses were well done and others were not. The tenor, Signor Vocedipetto, has a fine voice and sings with spirit. Signora Cantabile sings well. Her voice is a good one. It has timbre in it. She is a large woman. The orchestra was fair. Altogether it was a very pleasant performance, and we think that the season will be a very successful one. We congratulate Signor Burbo on coming here, as he will probably meet with a full return for his exertions."

This is the crisp, even, non-committal style, adaptable to everybody and everything, from Jenny Lind to Mme. Berkel.

The "Daily Eclectic" thus discourses:

"The powers of combination, as instanced in the harmonious adaptation of song and harmony, were well exemplified in the graceful and nicely adjusted balance of dramatic and vocal effects. The concentrated force and the refined expression of Signora Cantabile gave full meaning to the rhythmical flow of the music, and brought out in their full effect the happy thoughts of the composer. Soaring above the mere mechanical expression of the musical notes, her song rose in an exaltation springing from refined mental conception and a thoroughly artistic comprehension of the author's intent. Rarely have such delicious notes arisen in the tumult of mingled orchestral and vocal storm, as those which, emanating not only from the natural physical powers of the performer, but also from the intelligent perception which pervaded the whole course of her dramatic and vocal portrayal, rose above and beyond the cruder mass of sound by which they were borne up.

"Sign. Vocedipetto comes to us as a realization to those ideas of a union of strength and tenderness and manliness combined, which so many of his predecessors have lacked in their portrayals of character and their delivery of song in its best attributes and loftiest aspirations. His gallantry and his abandon and his constantly appreciative regard of the requirements of the scene, in its call for a proper attention to those points which go so much to make up a unity of conception as displayed in the success of the performance, were significant of intelligence both in song and action."

This is the æsthetic, the philosophic, the intellectual.

"The Independent" has the following:

"Mulum in parvo. If the small and circumscribed frame of the lady who figured in sweeping robes last night were taken, ceteris paribus, as the whole weight of her importance, we should scarcely arrive at a fair estimation of her powers. The voluminous voice which possesses a sesquipedalian rotundity of body is certainly of far greater import to the listener than the frame whence it proceeds. But, ore rotundo, those tones come forth "a voice so sweet that even silence was taken, &c.," and wrap the soul in "sweet Elysium." Pope Gregory used to say, when asked how he liked a thing: "Verbum sat; exeat omnes," which, in the vernacular, might be rendered "Wouldn't you like to know?" Well those who like to know our opinion of the Signora Cantabile shall be told, pauca verba, that she is tall and slim, with a voice extending far into the pure notes in alt, and sometimes sharps shockingly therein. Now we are "just before we are generous," and our duty to the public leads us to gloss over no faults, though they may be emanations from the throat of the divine Cantabile herself. Fiat justitia, etc., the proverb is something musty, as "gentle Will" says. But she is really a choice singer and as Mohammed once said: "A thing of beauty is a joy forever;"—we presume the old fellow was thinking of his own paradise.

"Vocedipetto is a genuine tenore robusto and sings with a real robustness of vehemence which is a delight to hear, after the affectations of those pouncet-box dandies who have "strutted their little hour on the stage" odorously of perfume and suggestive of the hair-dresser. Vade Satanno, we have now something of a better sort, strong, manly, vigorous. "With his own breath puff back the northern blast" is the motto now. No more whinings and whimperings. We have the real man, "il uomo intero."—"l'homme parfait," the man with a brain and a throat combined. As the Duke of Magenta once said: "Take him for all in all, we shall ne'er look upon his like again." We rejoice in the possession of a real tenor, a live tenor; and, if we express ourselves with warmth more than perhaps ought to be expected, we can only say peccavi, and vow that the enjoyment of such an artist is so rare that unwittingly we may have written exuberantly."

This is the scholastic, the witty, the independent, the free. We commend these extracts to the consideration of our readers, and doubt not that they will be perused with interest and attention.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Sing, O sing me to rest. Ballad. B. Covert. 25

One of the simple songs that goes directly to the heart. A good ballad for the people.

A stranger dark. (Das Erkennen.) Song. Prock. 35

Brings vividly before the mind of those familiar with Germany, a walled village with its paved street, and a tired and dusty "wanderer" entering through the ancient gateway. In the song, one of these exiles has returned to his native town, and, first, greets the old toll-keeper at the gate. He does not recognize the stranger, although they had in former years been fast friends. Neither do the villagers in the street know their returned neighbor. Even his sweetheart, at a window, is unconscious that the sun-browned man before her, is the "schütz," she has so longed to welcome. But his mother, on her way home from church, meets and accosts him at once as her son. Good music.

Language of the eye. Song. C. J. Dorn. 25

The language of the organ of sight, skillfully interpreted for the organ of hearing.

In the language of love. (Le perlate d'amor)

"Faust." 25

The charming song of Siebel, while arranging, in Marguerite's garden, a bouquet, for a present to his loved one. Deservedly one of the chief favorites of the opera.

The pleasures of youth. (Io voglio il piacer.)

"Faust." 25

Dr. Faustus, disgusted with science, knowledge, and everything else, here expresses a desire for the pleasures and follies of youth, and sings a fine song, much to the admiration of Mephistopheles, his only auditor.

Instrumental Music.

Gems of "Faust."

Gounod.

No. 1. Celebrated Valse.

" 2. Bijou song.

" 3. Kermesse.

" 4. Flower song.

" 5. Faust and Marguerite. Duet.

" 6. Soldier's chorus.

The above are some of the instrumental pieces from the opera, which has become quite "the rage." The instrumental portions seem to please full as much, perhaps even more, than the vocal, there being an almost constant succession of flowing, graceful melodies and harmonies, with many brilliant points, from beginning to end.

The first is that light and airy dance, which at each performance, sets the dancing nerves of an audience in strong vibration. The third includes the varied, crisp melodies of the singers at the fair. The last is brilliant and war-like, and the others equally pretty.

Books.

LIBRETTO TO FAUST.—With English and Italian words.

Some persons of extra fine musical organization need no words to enhance their enjoyment of an opera. But ordinary mortals do. Here is a translation, just completed, giving the whole story, with English and Italian in parallel columns, and a number of the favorite airs inserted. Opera goers and opera lovers should have sets of Ditson's librettos. The music in the book is worth more than its price.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 596.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, FEB. 6, 1864.

VOL. XXIII. No. 23,

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Opera in the Family Hapsburg.

[Concluded from page 170.]

And now again to B—r's list of the private "family" performances.

1722, January 17 and 24. "Aloida," comedy and ballet, performed by the nobility at court.

1724, May 16 and 18. "Eurysteo," musical drama in 3 acts. Text by Zeno, music by Caldara, with three ballets, music by Matheis.

Is it asked, how came Vienna,—instead of London, which latter city had the greatest dramatic composer of his age, thirty-five years long giving her new works on an average one a year,—to be during all the second half of the last century at the head of the world's music. Let an answer be found in the list of performers in "Eurysteo," as given in the imperial palace.

ACTORS AND ACTRESSES IN THE DRAMA.

Ismene.....the Italian Countess Orsini.
Erginda.....Judith, Countess of Staremburg.
Aglatida.....Joseph, " " Berg.
Ormonte.....C. Joseph, " " Gallerati.
Ciseco.....Carl, prince of Savoy.
Elearco.....Ferdinand, Count Harrach.
Glaucia.....Peter, Marquis Stella.

FIRST BALLET.

Rosalie, Danced by.....Countess Thurn.
Christine....." " Salm.
Joseph....." " Henkl.
Antonia....." " Sinzendorf.
Carl.....Count Salm.
Anton....." " Strasoldo.
Joseph....." " Zobor.
Christian....." " Westenrod.

SECOND BALLET.

Ledly, the Archduchess Maria Theresa (b. 1717).
Eleonora.....Countess Goes.
Joseph....." " Fünfkirchen.
Isabella....." " Styrum.
Francisca....." " Thürlheim.
Frederick.....Count Schlick.
Franz....." " Schrottenbach.
Wenzel....." " Bernier.
Cassa....." " Capitani.

THIRD BALLET.

Maria Theresa, Archduchess Maria Anna (b. 1718).
Amalia.....Countess Althan.
Anna....." " Serbelloni.
Wilhelmine....." " Souche.
Sophie....." " Wrba.
Carl.....Count Althan.
Leopold....." " Kinsky.
Peter....." " Rofrano.
Carl....." " Cobenzl.
Sigmund....." " Kherenhüller.

ORCHESTRA.

Harpsichord.....Ferdinand, Count Pergen.
Flute.....Ludwig, " " Salaburg.
Bassoon.....Ferdinand, " " Cavriani.
".....Constantine, Baron Digher.
Contrabass.....Adam, Count Lozy.
Violins.....Christian, Prince Lobkowitz.
".....Ferdinand, Count Lamberg.
".....Christian, " " Proskau.
".....Carl, " " Apremont.
".....Joseph, " " Stubenberg.
".....Carl, " " Natal.
".....Christopher, " " Pertusati.
".....Casimir, " " Werdenberg.
".....Octavius, " " Piccolomini.
".....Franz, " " Pachts.
".....Michael, " " Casari.
Theorbo.....Adam, " " Questenberg.
Oboe.....Count Truchsess von Zeil.
" Siegfried....." " Count Lengheim.
Violoncello.....Johann C., " " Hardegg.
".....Sigmund, " " Herberstein.
".....Johann B., " " Pergen.

Thus every performer, whether singer, dancer or player of an instrument, belonged to the highest nobility of the Emperor's dominions. With such a nobility, and with such an imperial family, is it strange that music should flourish? Especially in an age when there was no public for the higher music, as we understand the term, but when that kind of enjoyment was a luxury of the high born and wealthy, and when composers depended upon Meccenas for encouragement?

1729, March 2. "Sesostri," tragi-comedy in 3 acts. Music by Porcile, performed at court by the nobility.

1735, Carneval. "I Cinesi," a prologue to a ballet; text by Metastasio; music by Reutter; performed by the archduchesses Maria Theresa and Maria Anna, and ladies of the court.

During the same Carneval, another "Introduzione d'un ballo," text by Metastasio, music by Caldara, was given, by the two young archduchesses and the Countess Fuchs.

Same year, Aug. 28. "Le Grazie vendicate," Serenata, text and music as above, performed privately in the Favorita palace, by the two archduchesses, prince Charles of Lorraine, and a lady and gentleman of the court.

Oct. 1. "Il Palladio conservato," in 1 act—Metastasio and Reutter—on the Emperor's birthday, also in the Favorita, by his two daughters and Countess Fuchs.

1740, Oct. 1. "Il Natale di Giove," in 1 act, text by Pasquini; music, Bono; performed in the same place, on the Emperor's birthday, by his two daughters, Prince Carl of Lorraine, and a lady and gentleman of the court.

1740. "Attilio Regolo," text by Metastasio, was written for the Emperor's nameday, Nov. 4, but was not performed, owing to his decease on the 20th of the preceding month.

Unlucky as, upon the whole, Carl VI. had been in the wars he had undertaken, he had succeeded in the great enterprise of his reign, namely in having, on the failure of male heirs to the German branch of the Hapsburg family (through the death of his infant son Leopold, Nov. 4, 1716), his eldest daughter recognized by Europe as the inheritress of the family titles, powers, dignities and what not?—i.e., the right of succession confirmed to a female,—and thus Maria Theresa became the head of the Austrian monarchy.

She and her sister Maria Anna had for husbands Francis and Carl, sons of Leopold Joseph, duke of Lorraine—the elder, Francis, taking that title in due course, adding to it that of Grand Duke of Tuscany, and, after the death of Carl VII., becoming by election, Francis I. Emperor of Germany.

The two archduchesses had been thoroughly trained in music—strange if they had not been—by Wagenseil on the harpsichord, and by Nacini in singing. We have already seen their names as vocalists in many of the pieces above named. In 1739, while in Florence as Grand Duchess of Tuscany, Maria Theresa sang a duet with Senesino, who after the break-down of the two Italian operas in London, had returned to Italy, and according to the reports of that day, her part was executed in such style as to draw tears from the old eunuch's eyes. Tears from the eyes of him—the cunning, revengeful old Italian—who had just come from his pleasant work of aiding in Handel's ruin—do not infallibly prove that the reigning princess was indeed a very great songstress—but there is proof enough from other sources that she did both her masters honor. Maria Theresa's accession to the throne guaranteed to her by the pragmatic sanction, she being then but twenty-three and a half years old, was the signal for the Elector of Bavaria, the King of Poland, the Elector of Saxony, the King of Spain, and above, all, Nutshell Carlyle's, spotless, honorable and high-minded hero, Frederick II. of Prussia, to invade and seize her territories. Little time had she for music during those first years of her reign, engaged publicly in defending her realms, attacked thus from all sides, and privately with her almost annual infant. For she gave to Austria an archduke or archduchess in 1737, 8, 9, '41, 2, 3, 5, 6, 7, 8, '50, 1, 2, 4, 5 and 6, in all sixteen, several of whom, however, died in infancy.

Hence the first festive performance noted by B—r, which belongs to this article, was upon Jan. 8, 1744, upon occasion of the marriage of the archduchess Maria Anna to Carl Alexander of Lorraine. "Ipermestra," musical drama in 3 acts, with dances. Text by Metastasio, music by Hasse and Holzbauer (ballet) Metastasio says of it, "Esecuto da grandi e distinti personaggi a loro privatissimo trattenimento; ma poi rappresentato da musici e cantatrici nel gran Teatro di Corte." (Executed by great and distinguished personages for their own most private entertainment; but afterwards by the singers and songstresses upon the great court stage).

1749. "La Danza," a cantata for two voices; text Metastasio, music Bono; sung for the first time in presence of Francis and Maria Theresa by a lady and gentleman of the court.

Same year, Nov. "Augurio di Felicita," festive piece, at Schönbrunn—same authors—for the nameday of Elizabeth, Maria Theresa's mother; sung by her (the latter's) daughters, Maria Anna, Christina and Elizabeth, aged respectively eleven, seven and six years.

1750, Oct. 15. "La rispettosa tenerezza," a dramatic sketch,—text, Metastasio; music, Reutter—sung on Maria Theresa's nameday, by the same three young archduchesses.

This Reutter is the same who brought Joseph Haydn a few years before from the country to sing in the imperial chapel.

1751, April. "Il Re pastore," musical drama, 3 acts; text, Metastasio; music, Bono; performed in Schönbrunn by the nobility.

1752. "L'Eroe Cinese," musical drama, 3 acts, same authors, on the birthday festival of the Empress at Schönbrunn, by young gentlemen and ladies of the court.

1754, Sept. 24. "Le Cinesi," dramatic piece,

Metastasio, music Gluck, performed at Schlosshof, residence of the prince of Sachsen Hilburgshausen, during a visit of the Emperor and Empress there. The ballet in the piece was danced by two of the young archduchesses and a lady of the court.

1754, December. "La Corona, Tributo di rispetto e d'amore," Metastasio, music, Reutter. Birthday of Emperor Franz, sung by three of his daughters.

1755, May. "La Danza," dramatic sketch by Metastasio and Gluck—introduction to a ballet danced by the ladies of the court, sung by the famous Gabrielli and a Signora Friberth at the summer palace of Laxenburg, near Vienna.

1755. "La Gara," dramatic sketch, same authors, on occasion of the birth of Maria Antoinette (Nov. 2), in the Empress' private apartments, sung by archduchess Marianna and two ladies.

1756. "Il Re pastore" again.

1757. "Il Sogno," dramatic sketch, Metastasio and Reutter, in the private rooms of the Empress, by Marianna and two ladies.

1762. "Atenaide, ovvero gli affetti generosi," dramatic sketch, by Metastasio and Bono, written for and rehearsed by five daughters of Maria Theresa, but the performance was prevented by the illness of Elizabeth.

1764. "Egeria," dramatic festive piece by Metastasio and Hasse, performed, on occasion of archduke Joseph being crowned King of Rome, by four of his sisters. His brother Leopold, now 17 years old (afterwards his successor as Emperor) danced the part of Cupid.

1765, Jan. 23, "Il Parnasso Confuso," dramatic piece by Metastasio and Gluck. This was performed in Schönbrunn, during the festivities on occasion of Joseph's marriage with the Bavarian princess, Theresa Josepha, by his sister Maria Elizabeth, (Apollo), Maria Amalia, afterwards Duchess of Parma, Maria Joseph, afterwards Queen of the Sicilies, and Maria Caroline, afterwards the notorious Queen of Naples, (three muses). [But Gerber differs from B—r in the notice of this piece.]

Same year, "La Corona," by Metastasio and Gluck, was rehearsed by four of Maria Theresa's daughters, (all sopranis) but the sudden death of their father, Francis I., Aug. 18, prevented the performance.

Everybody who has read Austrian history of that period, knows how the Empress took the death of her husband to heart, and no one can be surprised that with "La Corona" B—r's list closes.

Seventeen hundred and sixty-five! Handel, who for a generation towered as grandly above all contemporary composers of Italian opera, as now for three generations he has above all composers of oratorio, had been dead some six years. Mozart was a child of nine years, astonishing the musical world by his precocity. Joseph Haydn was overwhelmed almost with the multifarious duties of chapelmaster to Prince Esterhazy—which place he had now filled for five years; and Gluck, while composing the regular Italian operas for the imperial stage, had three years before (April 5, 1762) produced one shockingly irregular—Orpheus and Eurydice—but which of all up to that time, by any composer, is the only one now to be heard.

Joseph II., now 24 years old, and associated with herself by his mother in the government, can hardly be expected amid the cares and duties of State to learn music anew, or to give up at once the school in which he has been educated, for one which did not yet exist—and which was not really developed until the child Mozart had become a man, twenty years later.

A. W. T.

Professor Wyld's second Lecture at Gresham College.

(Continued from page 171.)

Last Monday I commenced my series of lectures with a discourse on "Form in Musical Composition." Although the subject is not nearly exhausted the lecture this evening will necessarily bring the series to a conclusion in this term. I intend, therefore, to resume the subject on a future occasion, and will proceed now only so far as time permits. My object, as expressed at the commencement of my first lecture, is to show that the art of musical composition is an "imitative art," that the highest flights of genius, the most exalted conceptions of the beautiful, are only of use to the patient art laborer, to the imitator of acknowledged models of form and design; who, fluent in the power of expressing his conceptions, experienced and felicitous in the art of construction (by the exercise of his powers of imitation), becomes free to transmute the conceptions of the beautiful when they present themselves to his mind, and to convey to us such glimpses of ideal beauty as incline us to believe that inspiration is everything, and that art has little or nothing to do with the effect which in so remarkable a degree charms us. To show how art is necessary to the composition of music, I likened the power of expressing the beautiful through it to that required by a painter or sculptor, who wished to create a form of supernatural beauty which he had seen in a vision. I showed how the unskilled artist would merely exhibit his incapacity of expression, in any attempt at describing the form he had seen, whilst the skilled artist, competent to delineate whatever he saw, or conceived, would, when more than natural beauty was revealed to him, produce a work as far above all his other works as the beauty revealed to him was above that of an ordinary kind. In like manner I showed that conceptions of the beautiful in music would be of more or less use to a composer, according as he possessed more or less knowledge of art.

Of the various forms which musical composition has assumed, I showed that the "Song Form" was the earliest (not considering Gregorian chants as having any form); after which was invented the "Strict Fugue" or "Canon," out of which arose a form still adopted at the present day; then the "Motet Form," in which a "canto fermo," or plain-song, was selected and counterpoint added, from which originated our present "Part Songs," or harmonized airs for several voices, not Fugato, nor in Canon. We now come to the next form which sprang into use after the above, viz.: Recitative, "Musica parlante," or "speaking music." The use to which this form of music was applied, or rather the object of its invention, was to ally music to poetry without destroying the symmetry of the verse, as was the case in canons, or strict fugues and early motets. A poet's idea of what was beginning to be left as a want in musical form at the end of the sixteenth century, in order to unite music to poetry, may be gathered from the following extract from Doni's work on the Dramatic Art, printed and published at Florence:—"At the latter end of the sixteenth century, during all the rage for fugue, elaborate contrivance, and the labored complication of different parts without rhythm, grace, melody or unity of design, the lovers of poetry were meditating the means of rescuing her from musical pedants, who, with a true Gothic spirit, had loaded her with cumbrous ornaments, in order, as was pretended, to render her more fine, beautiful, and pleasing, after having fettered, maimed and mangled her." "Now, this is most likely the Philippic of a rhyme-monger, but there is no doubt that poetry was sacrificed in all the "Musical forms" adopted up to the time alluded to, viz.: in the canon, fugue, and motet form, in fact in every form, except in the early "Song Form;" and as that could not accommodate itself readily to variable kinds of verse, it did not prevent the want being felt of a "form" to which we are about to allude, viz.:—the recitative, "Musica parlante," or speaking music. The prevalent idea at the end of the sixteenth century, doubtless, was that the supposed lost art of allying music to verse, as practised by the Greeks, could be recovered. This, by the way, has always been a hobby in all musical periods; people will never be convinced that music, as practised by the Greeks, was not worth preserving. The recitative form was thus an invention intended to make up and atone for this supposed lost art. Giovanni Baptista Doni, a learned writer, to whom I have before alluded, and who published his work in 1763, says in his dissertation on the origin of stage singing, that the beginning of the seventeenth century was the era of musical recitation on the public stage at Florence. In this city resided Signor di Verno, an accomplished nobleman, particularly attached to the study of antiquity and to the theory and practice of music, to which he had applied himself for many years so closely that he became, for the time in which he lived, a correct and good composer. His house was the constant rendezvous of all persons of genius, and a kind of flourishing academy, where the young nobility often assembled to pass their leisure hours in laudable exercises and learned discourses, but particularly on musical subjects. Amongst this company sprang up a laudable desire to recover that art, of which the ancients related such wonders; and, it was particularly wished, in order to obviate the objections advanced (viz., that the present forms of music destroyed the poetry to which it was allied) that some species of "Cantilena or Melody" should be tried, by which the sounds should not be rendered unintelligible, nor the verse destroyed.

And so Vincenzio Galilei (encouraged by the Florentine nobleman to whom I have alluded) was the first who composed "cantilenas" for a single voice, having modulated that pathetic scene of Count Ugolino, written by Dante, which he sang himself to the accompaniment of a viol. After this he set in the same style the Lamentations of Jeremiah, which he performed before a devout assembly. Nevertheless, some persons (Doni naively remarks) laughed at the attempt to set the "Lamentations" of Jeremiah to music. It was this same Florentine nobleman who, in conjunction with two others, engaged Rinuccini and Peri to write and set to music a drama, which was privately performed in 1597, and entitled "Dafne." This is the first work of the kind of which we have any record. It was the commencement of opera, a drama wholly set to music, in which the dialogue was neither sung in measure, nor declaimed with music, but recited in simple musical tones, which did not amount to singing and yet was different from speech.

Now this kind of music (recitative) must not be confounded with that kind of chant, to which metrical verses were sung by the early minstrels. These minstrels were the successors of the ancient bards, and were called by our Teutonic ancestors "Scalds," which means "Smoothers" and polishers of language. The origin of their art was attributed to Odin or Wodin, so ancient was it. There is no doubt that poetry with them was everything and music merely an inflexion of the voice, which we may designate a chant, and most likely was used over and over again, in fact, as often as there were verses to sing. Indeed how could epic poetry derive advantage from music? A poem like the Iliad or Eneid, if set to music, could not be sung on lengthened tones. It is only lyric poetry—ancient or modern, consisting of short effusions of passions or sentiment, that is capable of being set in measure, or to any lengthened tones. A narrative so sung, like the epic poems of the ancients by the bards, would have been utterly unintelligible unless sung, as we suppose they were, to a simple chant. When you hear therefore of poems being sung to music, previous to the invention of the recitative form, you will understand that speaking music of those days is not identical with that of the sixteenth century. Pulci, who is said by Crescimbeni to have sung his Morgante Maggiore at the table of Lorenzo di Medici in 1460, and is sometimes spoken of as a recitative singer, sang only like the earlier bards or harpsodists, that is to say, he sang his poetry to a kind of chant.

Immediately after the invention of recitative, musical dramas were publicly performed. One called Euridice is supposed to be the first, or at all events the first of which we have any record. The libretto, or drama was written also by Rinuccini, and the music is composed by Peri and Caccini. It was performed at Florence in 1600, on occasion of the marriage of Marie de Medicis to Henry IV. of France. The poet, in his dedication to this work, which was printed, says:—"It is generally imagined that the tragedies of the ancient Greeks and Romans were entirely sung; but this noble kind of singing was not revived, or even attempted to my knowledge by any one until now; and I used to think that the inferiority of our music to that of the ancients was the cause, till on hearing the compositions of Jacopo Peri to the Fable of Daphne I wholly changed my opinion. This drama pleased so much that I have been encouraged to produce Euridice." The only copy of this opera that was to be met with used to be in the library of the Marchioness Benuccini, a descendant of the author, at Florence. The recitatives in this work formed the models of subsequent composers of early Italian operas, as well as of Lulli. Figures are to be found over the Bass notes, as we use them, to express that to the Bass are to be added sounds at the intervals indicated by the figures. In these early operas there was very little form of composition, besides the recitative form; the recitative was not used as an introduction to a song, quartet or chorus, but was the Alpha and Omega, the beginning and end, the sum and substance, of the opera. I purpose now to give a few specimens of early recitative, which, according to what I have just said, will also serve as an example of what opera was in those days.

(Illustrations of early recitatives.) The only melodic phrase in the "Song form" found in the opera of Euridice is contained in a bit of symphony at the commencement. The orchestra (according to Peri, who took part in the performance) consisted of a harpsichord, a guitar, a viol di Gamba, and a large lute, placed behind the scenes.

In modern operas the recitative is the dialogue set to music, which is usually succeeded by a melody, or ensemble, to which the lyric verses are allied. At the present day an opera audience gets impatient in listening to long recitatives and are anxious to hear the melodies which follow. As lately, however, as Gluck's time, the greatest interest was centred in recitative, and the same cry was heard as when recitative was first invented. "It is the music of the Greeks restored," shouted a Parisian audience after hearing Gluck's Orfeo and other operas. (Illustrations of Gluck's recitatives.)

The recitatives of Gluck are doubtless very fine, in fact the recitatives and choruses constitute the greatest attraction in his operas, and are superior to the melodies, arias and other pieces. Gluck's first opera was performed in Paris. Representations take place occasionally up to the present time, particularly in Germany and France; but the difficulty of finding singers with great declamatory powers renders Gluck's operas difficult to produce.

In general, singers of the present day only look for arias, songs, or ballads in an opera; they do not excel in declamatory powers, and consequently prefer that which they can master more easily, and which is more agreeable to their tastes.

When Richard Wagner, the "composer of the future" (as he is styled by his opponents), has succeeded in making the musical world appreciate his theories, then it may happen that "melody" will be less cared for in operas; and recitative music, capable of expressing the various passions and emotions of the dramatic characters, usurp its place. Provided music in "recitative form" could be written to equal that of Gluck there would not be much cause for regret, if English composers of the present day would forego introducing so many ballads and songs in their operas. For, good recitative music is far superior to vulgar tunes, to be met with in modern English operas. The recitative style has also been introduced in instrumental music, but I cannot recall any instance of its being employed by any earlier writer than Beethoven, who has introduced it in several of his works. The greatest of all his great works, the Choral Symphony, contains several recitative passages, not only in the choral parts, which would not excite notice, but in the instrumental. The beginning of the second movement, in which the double basses play so prominent a part, is chiefly in the recitative style. In the same composer's sonata for pianoforte, in D minor, Op. 27, the recitative style is used with singular effect. The D minor sonata is one of Beethoven's favorite works, and in order to give you an idea of instrumental recitative, I intend to offer it to you as an illustration. (Illustration, Sonata in D minor, Beethoven.) Mendelssohn, imitating Beethoven, has also introduced "recitative" into the only sonata he has written for the Pianoforte "Solo," although the so-called Fantasia in F sharp may justly be entitled a Sonata. Spohr likewise has not omitted to show his skill in this form of composition, and in his Concerto Dramatico for the violin has introduced recitative with great propriety and effect.

The first written operas contained, as I have mentioned to you, little else besides the recitative form of music. But, in order that you may not be misled, I must remind you that, although I have given the year 1600 as the date of the first opera, or work in "Stilo rappresentativo," or recitative, long previously, there were performed "Masques" in which songs, canons, and motets, species of composition which I have before explained to you, and well known and studied prior to the invention of recitative, were introduced. Thus Sulpitius, in his dedication of Vitruvius, speaks of a tragedy that was recited and sung at Rome in 1480. In 1560 there is a record of a so-called opera performed for the entertainment of Henry III. of France, on his return from Poland. These and other recorded performances of opera have led many people to conclude that recitative is not so modern a style as I have described; but these opera performances were "Masques" or plays, in which all the then known forms of composition in vogue were introduced, but contained no recitative which, as it enables the drama to be sung throughout, forms what we call the grand opera. Time will not permit me to give you a specimen of all the great improvers of operatic music up to the present time. I will select a few illustrations of the modern style of opera and defer to another opportunity giving you examples of the gradual advancement of this style of music. I have said enough to show you when, and why, the form of recitative was invented, and how it forms often the introduction to modern arias and songs. (Illustrations, opera music.)

Although I am obliged to conclude my present series of lectures, I intend, as I before stated (instead of finishing the subject I have selected this term), to continue it on another occasion, and to introduce to your notice several other forms of composition, such as the "Rondo" and the Sonata forms, etc., etc., used principally in instrumental music. The "form" for vocal music is simpler than that which is generally adopted for instrumental. Vocal music was cultivated, as I have shown you, long before instrumental music. All the compositions of an early date, which have been preserved, are for voices; although the first mention of music in historic writings is that of instrumental music. Even at the present time vocal music is more generally cultivated than instrumental. The system of class singing (introduced by Wilhelm and now taught by nearly every village schoolmaster) has been the means of enabling a multitude of persons with small attainments to take part in vocal music, who would otherwise never have succeeded in mastering the difficulties of any musical instrument. The difficulty of playing upon an instrument is far greater than that of singing on the system I have mentioned, but still greater is the difficulty of understanding instrumental music compared with vocal. Now if you would understand instrumental music, a knowledge of form is absolutely required. Do you take a delight in hearing the sonatas and instrumental trios and quartets of Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Spohr, and Mendelssohn? With the knowledge of the form in which these works are written your delight would be increased amazingly. Do you admire the symphonies of these composers, and are you struck with the power and variety of effect produced by the performance of their great tone-pictures? Study the "form" and behold opened to you a new field of admiration! What trouble some people take at the present day in acquiring a reputation for being connoisseurs of music and the fine arts, but who are content to remain in ignorance of that in which their beauty consists! Philip, of Macedon, asked his mentor, Aristotle, what he could do in order to be thought a good musician; the curt reply was "Become one." If you ask me, as your mentor, how you are to become one, my reply is, "Study form in musical composition!"

Finally, I wish to remark that it has been said, "Art is a sacred thing." So indeed it is, and yet there are to be found some who call music frivolous and useless. Music, like any other gift to man, may be perverted, degraded, allied to unworthy language, scenes and sentiments, or used as a mere display, but its mission is to raise within us lofty aspirations, to purify and refine, to stimulate the mind to action, or dispose it to devotion. No doubt different tastes and sympathies incline to different kinds of music.

The frivolous are satisfied with what is superficial: the intellectual are moved only by what is profound and comprehensive; but, it does not therefore follow that frivolous tastes should be conciliated; although the majority of mankind may be pleased with what is little. On the contrary he alone may be called a true musician who seeks to elevate the mind through the medium of the senses, who strives to instruct whilst amusing, and endeavors to combine pleasurable excitement with mental exaltation.

From a worldly point of view the Fine Arts may be considered as superfluities, in no way contributing to the necessities of human existence. Food, clothing, fire and shelter, it has been alleged, are all that is absolutely required for life; but, if poetry, music, painting, and sculpture do not bring wealth to a nation, or endow it, with greatness; if they do not give stability to its government or confer security on its commerce, they at least tend to its civilization and add ornaments to the structure of society. To those who feel the charm of music, who have proved its healing powers, and moral influence in social life I would say study it as a "science," become acquainted with the "forms" in which it is presented to us by the great composers, and try and disseminate a taste for it; for it is a taste for the pure and beautiful, and it is a means of directing the mind to the study of that from which is derived truth, delight, and mental satisfaction without alloy.

Carl Maria Von Weber.*

* From the Niederrheinische Musik Zeitung.

Carl Maria von Weber, a Life-Picture. Vol. I., with Portrait. Leipsic, Ernst Keil, 1864. XXXVII, and 569 Pages, in 8vo.

Under the above title has Herr Max Maria von Weber, in Dresden, handed over the first part of his father's biography to the German people, who will receive with joyous expectation a gift which promises to set before their eyes the picture of the life of a composer towards whose magnificent works their hearts and feelings are attracted with undying love from generation to generation. It is our task first of all to inform the readers of these pages, artists and friends of art, what they will find in the book. We will, therefore, begin by explaining what the author intended, and then examine whether, and how he has performed his self-imposed task. The more his book—the fruit of nearly sixteen years of collecting, sifting, comparing, and investigating—differs from other biographical works of our time, in consequence of his notion of what ought to be the fundamental principles adopted in the portrayal of an artist's life, the more incumbent is it upon us to state those principles. We take the leading ones, in the author's own words, from the preface, which occupies 17 pages. After Herr Von Weber has spoken of the relative position of the son-biographer to the father, he proceeds thus:

"I reflected that the long period which had elapsed since the master's decease, rendered it easier for me than it otherwise would have been, to attain the necessary objectivity, and that it was certainly preferable that true love, with all the dangers in its train, should set about the beloved master's portraiture, than that cool, analytical criticism, or blind enthusiasm should undertake the work, or, still worse, that a professional musician should take up his pen for the purpose. The more eminent such a person was, the more danger would there be for the fidelity of the picture, because: the more marked, profound and original a professional man is in his own peculiar views, the more difficult must it be for him to weigh in a true scale, to measure by an honest standard, his fellow professional. Every acknowledgement which an artist, really enthusiastic in his intentions, extorts from his intelligence in favor of views differing from his own, is, properly speaking, to some degree, a denial of that gospel which has been revealed to him by the god whom we must recognize as the only god.

"Furthermore, I armed myself against the painful feeling of being taxed by the world with too much love in one place, and too little in another, with the consciousness that I had certainly followed the right standard in my heart, though I might, perhaps, have failed to do so here and there in my narrative, and lastly I was also put at my ease, as to my incompetency in musical knowledge, by my views, which continued to grow clearer and clearer, as to the nature of the materials of an artist's and more especially, a musician's biography. Mendelssohn observes, somewhere or other in his Letters, that, if music could be described by words, he would not write another note, and Weber, in a letter to Lichtenstein, says: "I do not write anything to you about my works, hear them!" and subsequently: "In the sounds of my songs you will find me again!" Here we have, really, the law for the composition of an artist's biography. The individual man whom, in his works the reader already loves and honors as an artist, such a biography should exhibit as a man.

"Who could be interested in the biography of an artist of whose works we know nothing? It is, therefore, a peculiar and doubtful thing to undertake the analysis, criticism, and so-called explanation of the works of an artist, particularly of a musician, in a narrative of his life. To the reader who has never seen or heard the works all descriptions and analysis convey either no idea at all or a totally false one; for him who knows them, however, the mere mention of their names suffices to call up as clear a picture as his memory will, under any circumstances, allow him to create . . . . .

"With my adhesion to these views, the work I had to do gained all the clearness of a precisely defined task and consisted in nothing more or less than in my narrating the inward and outward events, which could be positively set forth in the life of Carl Maria von Weber, always in connection with the creation of his works, and then the influence exercised by those works upon the outward world (for it is in the creations of but few artists that the mutual influence of their genius and the listening world is so pregnantly manifested as in Weber's), but without any attempt at their critical illustration or exposition. But a biography may be written in two ways. One way is to compose it so as to facilitate the study of an individual, his deeds, works, and times; in this case, the author will have to add, in the form of notes, appendices, etc., to the continuous and strict exposition of events, as to an extensive topographical sketch of the ground surveyed, notices of all the materials employed, all the sources consulted, all the paths followed for obtaining facts, all the methods adopted to master the subject, so as everywhere to pave the way for the further investigation of every tributary of the principal stream into its most distant ramifications. This form of biography, as agreeing especially with German profundity, is the one which has been cultivated with predilection in Germany, and finds its fullest and highest justification more especially in such narratives as the works of Pertz, Jahn, etc.

"But the other form of biographical productions can boast of equal justification. This form removes the scaffoldings employed for the erection of the edifice, and puts its veto upon the extension of the latter, presenting the work in a narrower frame, though sharply defined and rounded off. It does not afford the means of studying further the object delineated, but requires that the reader should receive, upon trust, as truly and honestly painted, the portrait of a life which is set before his eyes. Its narrative should flow evenly along, like a stream whose waves, more or less conspicuous, consist of events, and out of whose waters, illustrated by their very origin, the works of the great man whom the book depicts, blossom forth like inspired emanations of the productive power, possessed by the stream of life, like lotos flowers out of the bosom of the all-creating Ganges.

† As the complement of my book in an artistic sense, although constituting a perfectly independent work, there will shortly be published a musical and scientifically arranged catalogue of all the musical productions of C. M. von Weber. It is from the pen of Herr F. W. Jahn, the well-known composer, of Berlin, who possesses probably a more thorough knowledge of Weber's compositions than any one else living. I beg to refer my readers to this book, which will on the whole, be treated after the model of Kiechel's masterly work on Mozart.—The Author.

"This form of biographical exposition appeared to me the most appropriate for a life of Weber, whose productions exercise a greater influence by simply appearing than by being studied, and whose existence comprehends so endless an amount of human and professional incidents, pleasure, love, and suffering, that it is particularly fitted for minutely painting the life picture of a noble, much misunderstood and offended man, who was a great artist.

"I felt impelled, too, from the bottom of my heart, to do this—not with the pretentious and bold pencil of history, but with the affectionate carefulness of Gerhard Dow and Terhourg; not in the style of the man's works, but in that of his life; to let the reader wander, travel, laugh and cry, triumph and curse with Weber; sit at his table and with those whom he loved; look over the shoulder of the master at his sitting-table, in the pangs and the delight of production; hear his heart beat when he raised the conductor's staff; watch him when, playing with his children, he crawled in the grass, when he taught his little monkey to dance, and his sporting-dog to retrieve!

"I felt impelled to paint the composer of Euryanthe, Der Freischütz, and Oberon, not only with the lyre and laurel-wreath, but also in court costume, in shoes and in pumps; in his old grey dressing-gown; as a poor traveller; as head of his family, in good and in bad humor; and, shortly, under all the conditions, great and little, constituting the world in which his works grew like golden fruit; in a word, to make the reader live with him."

Connected with this, also, is what the author says respecting the ample materials at his disposal, and his treatment of them, as well as respecting his narrative. Besides the printed accounts, his chief authorities were some thousand letters from and to Weber, together with the latter's notebooks from February 26, 1810, up to three days before his decease.

"I never exercised greater caution," he continues at page xii., "than when receiving oral or written reminiscences, supposing the former were not based upon previous memoranda, from contemporaries; this applies even to the family traditions, and to the statements of my mother. It is really incredible how the stream of life mixes up events with each other, as regards time and importance, in our memory. I have received from highly honorable contemporaries, theatre officials, and friends of my father, circumstantial communications relating to facts, whole series of events and occurrences, the correctness of which my informants guaranteed, and yet in those communications, as was proved by a comparison of reliable authorities, all the dates were incorrect, and events separated by long periods from each other were mixed up into one. Nay more; I extended my caution in the reception of materials, especially when describing subjective circumstances, even to the correspondence, because I am well aware that a man at his desk is very different from a man engaged in the struggle of life, and I did not even except Weber's own letters, particularly those to his wife. For this beloved woman, to whom his life and reputation were dearer than they were to himself, and who used to await with the most nervous anxiety good news from him, Weber, without departing from the actual truth, often affectionately made matters appear in a more pleasing light than that which, now and then, they really emitted.

"With regard now to the outward form of representing the life-picture to be produced from this mass of materials, it appeared to me that an artist's ought to be narrated in a different tone, and described in a different style from that of a hero or a scholar. I have endeavored to impart to my narrative the local tone of the period of life described, though letting the whole stream on in that tempo in which Weber's short life, eagerly, hurriedly, and restlessly, wore itself out. In consequence of this endeavor on my part, combined with the fact of my having availed myself of the unusual mass of separate particulars at my disposal, the narrative, as I do not conceal from myself, has here and there, assumed a peculiar character, as though the gaps in the course of the historically authenticated facts had been filled up by fictitious details, and thus that this or that portion had been rounded off into a romance-like story. But such is in no instance the case! Even in details I have never consciously swerved from the facts, and though I have not given any of my authorities, I am most ready, in answer to any reasonable questions which may be addressed me, to mention the authorities from which I took each fact, or, as is allowable, cautiously drew my inferences.

"To carry out consistently the principle of my narrative, it was requisite that—and I shall, perhaps, be blamed by prudish and fanatic admirers of discretion—I should cast a stronger and clearer light than it has hitherto been the fashion to cast upon that sphere of the life of Weber's soul, which as primum mobile comprised his world, the working of his heart, and the objects of it. But it struck me, although most biographers, with a misconceived feeling of delicacy, have only dared to give in the way of hints timid and pale reflections of this sunshine in the world of an artist's soul, that such a course was equivalent to painting a panorama without a sky.

"I therefore, hazarded the experiment, as I think I was entitled to do, for as great men always grow after their death, while little ones disappear like will-o'-the-wisps, the feeling which in the case of human non-entities is called sentimental enthusiasm and youthful folly, becomes in that of great men, mighty, creative, and plastic power. Besides, it was no part of my intention to write a panegyric on my father."

Finally, Herr von Weber, with the same impartiality, and irrespective of the persons concerned, promises to give an account, also, of his father's official relations in Dresden. Weber's position there was a painful one; he was not able to gain, either in an artistic or political sense, the confidence of those placed above him, Count Vitzthum excepted. His importance as an artist was so little valued there, "that, on one occasion his last official chief, observing, as he travelled with him, the manifestations of high esteem which were offered him on all sides, exclaimed in deep astonishment: 'Weber, are you really then a celebrated man?'"

(To be continued.)

The late Stephen C. Foster.

HIS MUSICAL CAREER—THE FUNERAL CEREMONIES.

From the New York Evening Post.

On the tomb of Donizetti, in the cathedral at Bergamo, is a modest inscription saying that the dead composer was "a finder of many melodies." The simple record—too unpretending for the merits of the Italian composer—will be peculiarly applicable to the late Stephen C. Foster, the song-writer, who died on the 18th instant in this city.

Mr. Foster was born in Pittsburg, July 4, 1826, the same day on which Thomas Jefferson and John Adams died. His father was a well-to-do farmer, and laid out on his property a town which he intended to call Foster ville. "Soon afterwards," says Mr. Charles McKnight, of the Pittsburg Evening Chronicle, in his interesting biographical notice of the late song-writer, "the gallant Captain Lawrence was killed, fighting his ship, the Chesapeake, and Mr. Foster patriotically changed the name of his town to Lawrenceville, adopting as the motto on the corporation seal the dying words of Lawrence, 'Don't give up the ship.'"

When seven years old young Stephen Foster showed enough musical precocity to learn, unaided, the flageolet; and later he played other instruments, though, like most composers, he was never eminent as a performer. Like Moore, he was fond of singing his own songs, and when he accompanied himself on the piano or guitar, there was a charming and plaintive sadness in his voice which touched the hearts of his listeners.

His melodies are so sweet, so simple, so unpretending, that few people supposed that he had studied music scientifically, and was familiar with the more classical works of Mozart, Beethoven and Weber. He, also, was a man of considerable versatility in other branches. He understood French and German, painted in Water Colors, was a good accountant, and wrote all the words as well as the music of his songs. These words were in style almost identical with his melodies—sweet, simple, and no worse in rhyme or rhythm than the majority of popular lyrics.

George Willig, the Baltimore music publisher, published his first song in 1842. It was called "Open thy lattice, love," and was followed by "Old Uncle Ned" and "Oh! Susanna," which were issued by Peters of Cincinnati. Then appeared "Louisiana Belle," "Nelly was a lady," "Camptown Races," "My Old Kentucky home," "Massa's in the cold, cold ground," "Nelly Bly," "Oh, boys, carry me 'long," "Old Folks at Home," and others. With these Foster established his reputation as a writer of negro minstrelsy, and at the same time made considerable money, his New York publishers, Firth, Pond & Co., paying him over $15,000 on "Old Folks at Home" alone—the most profitable piece of music ever published in this city. E. P. Christy paid Foster five hundred dollars for the privilege of having his name printed on one edition of this song.

During the past ten years Foster's compositions were of a more sentimental and refined character. He dropped the burlesque negro words and wrote and composed such songs as "Willie, we have missed you," "Ellen Bayne," "Maggie by my side," "Come where my love lies dreaming," "Little Ella," "Jennie with the light brown hair," "Willie, my brave," "Farewell, my Lillie dear," "Oh, comrades, fill no glass for me," "Old Dog Tray," "Mollie, do you love me?" "Summer breath," "Ah, may the red rose live away," "Come with thy sweet voice again," "I see her still in my dreams," "Suffer little children to come unto me," "Ella is an Angel," "I will be true to thee," and over a hundred others. His last composition—a song said to include one of his most beautiful melodies—will soon be published by Horace Waters, of this city. His later works exhibit greater grace and tenderness than his earlier ones; and had he lived, and taken proper care of his health, he might have obtained the most enviable eminence as a musician. As it is, he had the blessed, heaven-sent gift of melody, and his compositions, if not his name, are known all over the world. Russians, Italians, Germans, French, and even Egyptians and Chinese, have heard and admired these sweet strains which made Stephen C. Foster pre-eminently the ballad writer of America. We hope his publishers will make a collection—if not of all—of his best songs and choruses, and publish them in some enduring form; for their popularity will not die with the man whose genial imagination gave them birth.

Mr. Foster—who for the past three years had lived in this city—was buried at Pittsburg. The Evening Chronicle of that city says of his farewell:

"His death took place on the 13th instant, in New York city. With praiseworthy state-pride, the President of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company gave orders that his remains and the party in charge of them should be passed over the road free of charge. The Adams Express Company also declined to take any pay for conveying his remains from New York to Harrisburg.

"As stated in the previous notice given of the deceased, he married a daughter of the late Dr. McDowell, who, with an interesting daughter of twelve years, survives him. Some of his friends here, and other lovers of music who acknowledge his numerous and valuable contributions to musical science and literature, have united in having impressive and appropriate ceremonies at his funeral. At Trinity Church the exercises were vocal, led by Mr. Klebar; at the grave they were instrumental, some of Mr. Foster's most popular airs having been introduced. Mr. Foster has won a fame which is unyielding. His influence extends over every land where there are voices to hymn forth sweet notes and hearers to be moved by them."

Music Abroad.

Germany.

BERLIN. Mendelssohn's "Elijah" was produced in the latter part of December, and excited a lively interest. Very interesting pieces formed the programme of the first concert of the Domechor: for instance, the Crucifixus by Lotti, the Misericordias by Mozart, a Motet in five parts by Bach, and an air from the Passion music by the same, sung by Frl. Decker.

A new ballet, Morgano, by Taglioni, (whose ballets, with Hertel's music, are poems both to eye and ear), has been brought out at the Royal Opera House.

Gluck's "Orpheus and Eurydice," was performed Dec. 8th, to a full house. Frau Gericke took the part of "Amor," instead of Frau Lucca, the latter being hoarse. Gericke looked charmingly, and sang as well as her voice, totally unwitted to any lyric rôle, would permit. Frau de Ahna as "Orpheus" was, notwithstanding her diligent application to her studies, not very good, but the public was lenient towards her, even calling her out at the end of each act. Frau Santer, as "Eurydice," was really good and showed great dramatic talent. The orchestra was excellent and well conducted by Taubert, but the female chorus often showed want of harmony.

Among the representations to take place next week the following deserve to be named: "Don Giovanni" with the celebrated Frau Köster as "Anna," the ladies Santer and Gericke, and Salomon, Kräuse, Kruger and Fricke; also Gluck's "Armida." The repetition of "Martha" has likewise filled the house. Frau Harriers Wippen is still prevented from acting on account of illness.

COLOGNE. The third Gesellschaft's Concert took place under the direction of Herr Ferdinand Hiller, in the Gürzenich. As usual, it was devoted to the performance of an oratorio, occupying the entire evening, viz., Handel's Messiah, which the public had not heard for some time. In the course of the winter, another grand oratorio, and after that J. S. Bach's Matthäus' Passion will follow.

The fifth Gesellschaft's Concert, under the direction of Herr Ferdinand Hiller, took place on Tuesday, the 29th ult., when the following was the programme: Part I.—Symphony, No. 6, Niels W. Gade; Soprano air from Saul, Ferdinand Hiller (sung by Mdle. Pauline Wiesemann); Concerto in C minor Mozart, (Mad. Clara Schumann). Part II.—Overture to Lodoiska, Cherubini; Pianoforte solo, R. Schumann and Ferdinand Hiller (Mad. Schumann); Eichen-dorff's "Flucht der heiligen Familie," for chorus and orchestra, Max Bruch; Songs, Schumann (Mdle. P. Wiesemann); Fantasia for Pianoforte, chorus and orchestra, Op. 80, Beethoven (pianoforte, Mad. Schumann). The Zeitung says:

"A new composition, by Max Bruch, of Eichen-dorff's pleasing poem, is worked out with the same happy talent which the gifted composer of the opera of Lorelei has already exhibited most satisfactorily in several smaller vocal pieces for chorus and orchestra. The work consists of only two movements in E flat major, an Andante, 6-8 time, which modulates into an Adagio, 4-4 time, at the words "Und das Kindlein hob die Hand." It is a charming picture of feeling, an Idyll, in which the tones stream fragrantly forth, and a profound sentiment of devotion is gently cradled upon soft pinions. No rhythmic jerk, no harsh modulation, in fact, no trace of affectation of any kind disturbs the pure, quiet flow of the melody, which is supported by agreeable harmony and charming instrumentation."

BRUNSWICK. The new Association for Concert Music lately gave its fifth concert. The primary object of the society was to give twelve concerts—four with a full band (Sinfonie-Soirée), and eight for chamber-music. The following artists have already appeared:—Herr Hans von Bülow, Madame Clara Schumann, Joachim and Madame Joachim, Herr Carl Reinecke, Herr Ferdinand David, and Herr Lübbeck. Herr A. Franz Abt is the conductor. At the fifth concert the proceedings commenced with Schubert's D minor quartet, executed by Herren Blumenstengel, Sommer, Eygeling, and Kindermann. In the course of the evening Madlle. Sara Magnus, from Stockholm, performed Chopin's "fantaisie-improvisé," Jensen's "Stille Nacht" and Liszt's "Rigoletto fantasia."

Herrn Carl Reinecke, Ferdinand David, Louis Lübbeck (from Leipzig), and Madlle. Storck, took part in the third Subscription Concert, when the following compositions were performed:—Trio, in C minor, Mendelssohn; air, "Glücklein im Thale," from Euryanthe, and song, "Fahr wohl, der Goldene Sonne," Reinecke; Pieces in the popular style for pianoforte and violoncello, Schumann; "Rondo brillant," for pianoforte and violin, Schubert; "Suleika," and "Es weiss und äth es," Mendelssohn; and trio, in B flat, major, Op. 97 Beethoven.

ROTTERDAM. Hiller's opera, Die Katakomben, has been produced with great success. The singers were repeatedly called on. The same compliment was paid the composer at the conclusion of each act.

VIENNA. There were 326 performances at the Imperial Opera House during the past year. The repertoire, which was pretty much the same as usual, consisted of Die Zauberflöte, Le Nozze di Figaro, Don Juan and Weibertreue (Così fan tutte) (Mozart); Fidelio (Beethoven); Les Huguenots, Robert, and L'Étoile du nord (Meyerbeer); La Juive and Les Mousquetaires de la Reine (Halévy); Jessonda (Spohr); Le Pontillon de Jonjumeau (Adam); La Dame Blanche (Boieldieu); Norma (Bellini); Les deux Journées (Cherubini); Lucrezia Borgia, Maria di Rohan, Lucia, * Niederrheinische Musik-Zeitung.

Don Sebastian, and Belisario (Donizetti); Lohengrin, Tannhäuser, and Der Fliegende Holländer (Wagner); Faust (Gounod); Ernani, Trovatore, and Rigoletto (Verdi); Martha, Stradella (Flotow); Hans Heiling, and Templer und Jüdin (Marschner); Wanda (Doppler); Lalla Rookh (David); Der Freischütz, Euryanthe, and Oberon (Weber); The Bohemian Girl (Balfe); Guillaume Tell (Rossini); Die lustigen Weiber (Novotny); and Das Nachtlager in Granada (Kreutzer). This list contains the names of twenty-three composers and thirty-eight operas. To render it complete we have still to hear the best works of Auber, Boieldieu, Bellini, Donizetti, Gluck, Lortzing, Rossini, Spontini and Schubert. In the rather long period of an entire twelvemonth Lalla Rookh was produced for the first time, while Weibertreue, Templer und Jüdin, and Les Mousquetaires de la Reine, were revived. There was also a new ballet entitled Jotta. Of a truth the good Viennese are perfectly right in asserting that neither the manager nor the artists shall kill themselves by over-work. Indeed the public are not at all satisfied with the mode in which things are conducted. For instance, Herr Ander, who was unable to appear during more than six months last year, is again laid up with an affection of the throat. It is really high time that he should retire, for his continuance on the list of the effective members of the company causes only frequent disappointment and confusion. Much dissatisfaction is manifested, also, by the press with other artists connected with the same establishment. It is said that when three singers, to wit: Mad. Dustmann, Herr Beck, and Herr Walter, receive respectively an annual salary of 14,000, 18,000, and 10,000 florins, they ought to possess some power of attraction. This, it is pretty evident, they do not possess, for, at the last performance of Hans Heiling, in which they sustained the leading characters, the house was absolutely deserted.

In the way of concerts, I beg to state that Herr Ernest Pauer, from London, will give a concert on the 10th instant. He will shortly be admitted to an audience of the Emperor, to thank the latter for the Order of Francis-Joseph recently bestowed on him by that august personage—Leonold de Meyer has announced a concert for the 10th inst.—On New Year's Eve, the members of the Mannergesang-Verein executed a comic quartet entitled the "Markthallen-Quartet" (the "Market-Quartet"), the singers, or rather actors, being dressed as four market-women. The performance was greeted with shouts of laughter and elicited continuous applause.—Herr Laub has brought his series of Quartet-Evenings to a termination for the present, by an admirable performance of Haydn's F minor quartet, Bach's difficult Violin solo, and Beethoven's quartet in C sharp minor.

The Niederrheinische Zeitung announces that the music of Robert Schumann's Faust was about to be executed in this city, Herr Jules Stockhausen-singing the part of Faust.

At the imperial opera house the 72d anniversary of Mozart's death was lately observed with a performance of Zauberflöte; the 88th anniversary of Boieldieu's birth by a performance of La Dame Blanche; the 93d of Beethoven's by a performance of Fidelio; and the 77th of Weber's by a performance of Oberon. A German author informs his readers that Mad. Nissen, the widow of Mozart, told him that the cash amount at her disposal at the death of the great master was 12 cents.

LEIPZIG. At the fourth concert of the Euterpe the following compositions were performed under the direction of Herr Hans von Bülow—Symphony in C minor (Haydn); Pianoforte Concerto, in E flat major (Beethoven); "Des Sängers Fluch," Orchestral Ballad (H. von Bülow); second Pianoforte Concerto, in A major (Franz Liszt); and the overture to Ali Baba (Cherubini). The Ossian Choral Association, under the direction of Herr A. Härtel, gave a concert lately, to which, however, only those persons who had received invitations were admitted. But the number of invitations issued was above a thousand. The vocal compositions comprised Schiller's "Lied der Glocke," set by Romberg; choruses by F. Becker, R. Franz, M. Hauptmann, A. Härtel; and "Schön Rothtraut," by Schumann, but they were given in a very slovenly manner, not at all creditable to any one concerned. The "Infant Prodigy," Miss Krebs, played some pianoforte pieces. Altogether the concert was not a success.—The programme of the ninth Gewandhaus concert comprised: Symphony in B flat, major (No. 4), Gade; Violin-concerto in A minor (No. 5), Molique (played by Herr Dreychock); the "Hebrides," overture, Mendelssohn; and the Sinfonia Eroica, Beethoven. The programme of the tenth concert of the series was as follows: D major Symphony, Ph. M. Bach; air from Rossi's Mitane, sung by Mdle. Bettelheim, from the Imperial Opera, Vienna; Pianoforte Concerto in D minor, J. S. Bach [played by Herr Carl Reinecke]; Overture to Iphigenia in Aulis, Gluck; air, from Handel's Hercules, sung by Mdle. Bettelheim; Variations for the Pianoforte, on a theme by J. S. Bach [composed and performed by Herr Carl Reinecke]; and songs [with pianoforte accompaniment], sung by Mdle. Bettelheim.—Weber's Oberon has been successfully produced with recitative, the words by Herr von Meyern-Hohenberg, and the music by Herr Lampert.

The programme of the eleventh Gewandhaus Concert was composed as follows:—Cantata for solos, chorus, and orchestra, J. Seb. Bach, [first time]: soloists, Mdle. Dora Narz, from Frankfort-on-the-Maine, and Herr Julius Stockhausen; overture [Op. 124] Beethoven; New-Year's Song, for solos, chorus, and orchestra, by R. Schumann, first time: soloists, Mdle. Narz and Herr Stockhausen; and C major symphony, Franz Schubert.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, FEB. 6, 1864.

Concerts.

GREAT ORGAN. The "Grand Sacred Concerts" at the Music Hall on Sunday evenings have grown into a fashion. They are at least very "popular"; they "succeed" materially if not artistically. We are glad that they not only reduce the organ debt, but put money into the pockets of the organists, who thus far have so generously given their services in introducing the great instrument to the public; we should be still more glad if they did this in the direct instead of the inverse ratio of the said organists' fidelity to pure Art and true organ music. But it is not to be denied, ad captandum programmes catch the crowd. Whether musical taste is raised thereby, whether the love of music is deepened and strengthened, whether musical sentiment becomes more earnest, more refined, poetic and religious, by listening to medleys made up on the principle of something to please everybody, is a question always met by opposite answers. The common notion is, that the many, by hearing what they can enjoy without mental effort of any sort, will gradually begin to crave something a little better, this sop to Cerberus meanwhile securing toleration, if not attention, to one or two specimens of the better, perhaps even of the best, slipped in among the rest, pearls among the pebbles, as an artistic make-weight, so as to save at least the name of Art. There may be something in this; but then on the other hand it is hard to see how feeding upon sugar-plums can tend to create a healthy appetite, or how long listenings to incongruous miscellanies of things hacknied, trivial, sentimental, popular, and what not, can do otherwise than muddle one's musical perceptions, and discourage any hope of higher gain in music than amusement. (Actually one of the papers called attention to the first performance of Allegri's Miserere as a "public entertainment!") Seriously, is it not a sad day for Art, when we make it the prime requisite, the sine quâ non of a musical performance that it shall be "popular"? An artist is not in soul and truth an artist, until he can afford to "seek first the kingdom of righteousness" and wait for "these things" to be "added."

But we will possess our souls in patience, trusting that somehow all things are working together for good, and that whether by or in spite of all these jumbles and compromises between what is true and what is false, there is really some progress, and that each year adds to the number of those who appreciate and love and crave that which is best and truest in each department of musical art. Perhaps when every sort of experiment shall have been tried with our great Organ, when it shall have exhausted all ingenious ways of stepping down from its own dignity, when it shall have masqueraded through all the characters (all less noble than its own) which idle, wondering people "seeking for a sign" demand of it, when it shall have shown all that it can do not as an organ, and it shall all be found after all to be no miracle,—perhaps then the ignorantly curious public will be content to take it as an Organ, and find an infinitely higher satisfaction in its normal, unpretending, characteristic functions, in the real organ music, which, if it may not blaze and flash like fireworks, may shine all the more sweetly into the inmost soul of the fatigued and disappointed runner after these things.

Now, do not suppose, because we criticize these concerts without regard to the popular test, that, therefore we can see no merit in them. Granting that they have contained much that was very excellent in its way, and that from a certain point of view, by no means the lowest, we could describe them in rose color, still is it not our duty, while everybody praises from the popular standpoint, to hint at least how the whole thing must look from the standpoint of serious artistic criticism? All successes have to come at last into the scales of artistic truth to be weighed. It is far better that what is done be true, than that it be popular; for by the latter standard Bacchus any day beats Bach, even in a "sacred" concert.

In point of execution we certainly could find little fault with either of the three concerts thus far given; organists and singers have displayed skill and taste. But in point of programme only the first of them can be called in any sense an Organ concert. Miscellaneous as they are, we record these programmes as matter of history. That of Mr. PAINE, to which we barely had room to allude last time, came very near to being a true organ concert; the organ pieces predominated, and they were all pieces really written for the organ, Bach taking the lion's share by a sort of divine right which no serious musician would dispute; the work of Thiele having enough of what Beethoven, speaking of Schubert, called the true spark in it to warrant all the repetitions it has had; and Mr. Paine's own compositions being earnest and musician-like in form and spirit. But for the vocal pieces, it would have been an altogether pure and unexceptionable organ concert. These did credit to the singers, but we cannot say they added to the artistic value of the concert; they rather disturbed its unity, appealing to a different audience, conjuring up another spirit. (Mind, we are applying the severest test.) That Mr. P.'s "Benedictus," conforming more to the Catholic style than is his wont, has beauty, we have said before. And now here is Programme No. 1, of Sunday evening, Jan. 17, the Music Hall perhaps one-third full, but the attention and applause encouraging.

1. Grand Concert Piece in C minor.....Thiele.
2. Vocal Duet, Sung by Miss Adams, and Miss Ryan.....
3. a. Andante con variazioni, from Fantasia Sonata } J. K. Paine.
- b. Caprice.....
4. Contralto Solo, Prayer by Stradella, Miss Ryan.....
5. Grand Toccata in F.....Bach.
1. Choral Variations: a. "By the waters of Babylon.".....
- b. Christ our Lord to Jordan came.....Bach.
2. Tenor Solo:—"In native worth.".....Haydn.
- Sung by Mr. Wheeler, accompanied by Mr. Daum.....
3. Passacaglia in C minor.....Bach.
4. Vocal Quartet—Benedictus.....J. K. Paine.
- Miss Adams, Miss Ryan, Mr. Wheeler and Mr. Kimball.....
5. Variations on Old Hundred.....J. K. Paine.

The next two concerts were principally vocal, the Organ serving admirably the purpose of accompaniment to the miscellaneous selections, but doing little by itself; only a couple of pieces each time; and these not of the best; Offertoires of the showy French school, by Battiste and Wely, much more operative than religious in their spirit; offerings indeed, not to the most High, but rather to the curious crowds that frequent the churches just to hear the music and to see the sights. We do not ask that these things should be excluded from all chance of a hearing; let them have their turn (they have had it very often lately); but it does seem singular that just these "sacred" concerts, in which each organist is made free to arrange all after his own ideal, should have no organ music to present, on such an organ, but these gay-colored late French fashions. The one exception has been the "Dead March" from "Saul," which has been fairly run into the ground since the great Organ came. This is strictly an occasional piece; for a funeral occasion, or heard in its order in the Oratorio of "Saul," it is all right, one of the most solemn of all dirges; but brought continually forward thus in concerts, and with all this ad libitum superfluous accompaniment of pedal "thunder," it becomes a tedious bore. Is it not high time that the concert organists agreed to lay it on the shelf? Programmes become wearisome when pieces are put into them simply for the reason that they have been applauded in previous experiments. Make up a programme merely of pieces that are always encored, and who will have the patience to sit through it? The continual re-appearance of Handel's "Pastoral Symphony," and of some of the vocal pieces, such as "With verdure clad," is also questionable; they are good, if we do not allow them to become hacks; yet a great singer might renew their life. Such things appear also in Leipzig and Berlin programmes, do you say? Yes, once perhaps in a season, but not in concert after concert. With these qualifications, the vocal matter of the two concerts was certainly rich in intrinsic interest and beauty.

Sunday before last Mr. J. H. WILLCOX gave the concert, aided by the choir of the Church of the Immaculate Conception, twenty-four well-trained voices, and such good solo singers as Mrs. J. M. MOTTE (formerly Miss Washburn), now of New York. Miss A. L. CARY, Mr. P. H. POWERS, &c. It was a concert of Catholic music, and great was the curiosity, as it is with travellers going abroad, to hear something of the sensuous and gorgeous music that we read of in the Roman service. This, with the great popularity of the concert-giver, and of the singers, drew such a crowd as almost overflowed the Music Hall. This was the programme:

1. "Gloria," from Mass No. 16.....Haydn.
  2. Tenor Solo and Chorus—"Ave Verum Corpus." Falkenstein. Solo by Mr. W. F. Barrell.....
  3. Soprano Solo and Chorus—"O Salutaris".....L. Provost. Solo by Mrs. Prescott.....
  4. Organ Solo—"Offertoire" for Soft Organ.....Battiste. Mr. J. H. Willcox.....
  5. Song—"Ave Maria Stella.".....Proch. Mrs. J. M. Motte.....
  6. Chorus—"Benedictus.".....Hummel.
  7. Bass Solo and Chorus—"Pat e Soultum".....Costa. Solo by Mr. P. H. Powers.....
  8. Soprano Solo and Chorus—"Agnus Dei"—First Mass. Mozart. Solo by Mrs. Motte.....
- Part II.
1. Contralto Solo. "He was despised.".....Handel. Miss Cary.....
  2. Soprano Solo and Chorus. "Pater Noster".....Gordigliani. Solo by Mrs. Prescott.....
  3. Organ Solo—"Offertoire" in G.....Lefebvre Wely.....
  4. Tenor Solo and Chorus—"Et incarnatus," 12th Mass. Mozart.....
  6. Solo—"Gratias Agimus".....Guglielmi. Mrs. Motte.....
  6. Benedictus—from Mass in G.....Weber. Mrs. Motte, Miss Cary, Mr. Barrell, Mr. Powers.....
  7. Solo. "Pietà Signore".....Stradella. Mr. Powers.....
  - 8 "Credo"—from the "Imperial Mass".....Haydn.

The Mass music of Haydn, Mozart and Weber, although often verging on the operatic, has a rare charm to one whose whole experience of church music has been the dry husks of Yankee psalmody, or the chanted cadences or even the Te Deums of the English service. There is life and glow and feeling in it, and a free careering of the fancy in ideal realms of sentiment. We should be ungrateful to forget the musical enthusiasm with which it once inspired us; for then indeed it was a glorious revelation; after a while one learns that is not the highest and the greatest kind of sacred music; there is another, not so sure to fascinate at first, but more sure never to relax its hold upon the deepest sympathies to which music can appeal. No wonder, and no harm either, that the great mass of an audience should be delighted by these Glorias, &c. They were in the main finely sung, allowing for deviation from perfect tune now and then, in the isolation of the little choir at such a distance from its "base," the organ. Most impressive of all was the Incarnatus of Mozart, in which the Tenor solo was the revelation of a new, fresh voice of exceeding smoothness, purity and beauty. The Weber Benedictus, too, is lovely; and the Agnus of Mozart displayed the large voice and noble style of Mrs. Motte to great advantage. Miss Cary has a superb contralto, of which she seems to be fast gaining the control; pity only that her song had been of late so often sung. The "Ave Maria stella" of Proch seemed to us scarcely worth the singer's powers; the "Date sonitum" by Costa not much better, except in the winding up by full choir and organ, which does indeed "give sound."

Last Sunday evening the programme took mainly the complexion of the English Episcopal music, Dr. S. P. TUCKERMAN presiding. Music Hall almost full.

1. Organ Solo. "Offertoire" in C. Op. 35, No. 3. Lefebure Wely.
2. Te Deum Laudamus. (In G Major.) For two Chords. S. P. Tuckerman
3. Trio. "Lift thine eyes." Mendelssohn. Mrs. Gilbert, Mrs. Flek, Miss Annie L. Cary.
4. Soprano Solo. "With verdure clad." Haydn. Mrs. Fowle.
5. Chorale. From Fifth Motet. Bach.
6. Quartet. "Benedictus." (Mass in G.) Weber. Mrs. Fowle, Mrs. Shattuck, Mr. Sanglier, Mr. Powers.
7. Contralto Solo. "O rest in the Lord." Mendelssohn. Miss Annie L. Cary.
8. Quartet. "Their sun shall no more go down." S. P. Tuckerman. Mrs. Gilbert, Mrs. Flek, Mrs. Shattuck, Miss Cary.
1. Organ Solo. Dead March, from "Saul." Handel.
2. "Miserere." Allegri. First Choir—Mrs. Gilbert, Mrs. Shattuck, Mr. Sanglier, Mr. Ryder.
- Second Choir—Mrs. Flek, Mrs. Hall, Miss Cary, Mr. Powers. (The verses are sung by two Chords, alternately.)
3. Verse Anthem. S. S. Wesley. Mrs. Fowle, Mrs. Shattuck, Mr. Sanglier, Mr. Trowbridge, Solo, Mr. Ryder.
4. "Eia mater fons amoris." Boesidl. Mr. Ryder, and Chorus.
5. Bass Solo. "The soul's errand." Wm. H. Callcott. Mr. P. H. Powers.
6. Solo, Quartet and Chorus. "Gratias agimus." (16th Mass.) Haydn. Mrs. Shattuck, Mrs. Fowle, Mr. Sanglier, Mr. Powers, and Chorus.
1. Terzetto. "Not unto us." Mendelssohn. Mrs. Gilbert, Mrs. Flek, Mrs. Shattuck, Miss Wood, Mrs. Henry, Miss Cary.
8. Chorale. Bach.

Most of these pieces had been sung in previous concerts of Dr. T. in St. Paul's church; but many of them were rare enough and good enough to warrant reproducing. The famous Miserere by Allegri most people did not find so very wonderful an affair; of course they could not outside of Rome in Holy Week. It is a little thing; only a few musical periods repeated over and over to new words; but there is a quaint charm in the harmony, which is supposed to have grown about it from year to year traditionally in the singing. It was as well done as we could suppose here possible; only we should have liked it quite as well without the cheap effect of putting one of the choirs beneath the stage. The first Choral of Bach was truly edifying; the second, too, is fine ("Ein feste Burg"), but somehow it did not sound so well as we expected. Dr. Tuckerman's Quartet for female voices gave genuine pleasure; a pure and delicate piece of unaccompanied vocal harmony. The bass solo by Callcott was delivered with admirably clear elocution by Mr. Powers, but the music is not half good enough for the words of the old song.

To-morrow evening it is Mr. LANG's turn, when the Organ will present itself under still new phases, for instance in a Trio with violin and piano, and a duet with violin, Mr. EICHBERG and Mr. WILLCOX assisting; also Miss HOUSTON will sing the noble song in praise of the organ, from Handel's "Ode to St. Cecilia." A song from "Elijah," will be played on the Vox Humanastop.

ORCHESTRA. Symphony concerts by really a "Grand Orchestra," are still a desideratum and for the present, we fear, an impossibility with us. But already the call for orchestra music is met in a tentative and a small way, not only by one but by several proposals. Two are already in successful operation; one public, one amateur and private; and two more plans invite subscribers.

1. The ORCHESTRAL UNION, at their third Wednesday afternoon concert, had the Music Hall crowded; and the best attention was paid to the sterling classical pieces, namely, the C minor Symphony of Beethoven and the "Midsummer Night's Dream" Overture, which have come to be appreciated by frequent hearing, and which are of the stuff that does not stale by repetition. The Organ pieces were two of the brilliant popular favorites, played by Mr. WILLCOX, to wit: Kullak's Pastorale and Wely's Offertoire in G. Two light orchestral pieces formed the afterpiece, dear to the juveniles as a postscript in a letter: a Strauss waltz, "Promotionen," and the Faust potpourri again. Everybody seemed to enjoy themselves; to the more exacting is it not enjoyment to see the crowd enjoying the Fifth Symphony?

2. The MOZART CLUB treated their friends to a second "social orchestral entertainment" last Monday evening, and played, most creditably for amateurs, the following pieces:

1. Grand Symphony in D Major, No. 19. Haydn. Adagio; Allegro assai—Largo cantabile—Minuetto and Trio—Finale; Presto, ma non troppo.
2. Turkish March, "Ruins of Athens." Beethoven.
1. Overture, "Idomeneo." Mozart.
2. Andante, from Seventh Symphony. Beethoven.
3. Concert Waltz, "Lustschwaermer." Jos. Strauss.
4. Overture, "Anna Bolena." Donizetti.

The Haydn Symphony and the Idomeneo overture were happily chosen, being very characteristic of their authors and seldom if ever before heard here. These went smoother than the two Beethoven pieces, in which some of the wind instruments were not quite in tune.

3. "PHILHARMONIC" concerts also loom on the horizon again. Better late than never. Mr. CARL ZERRAHN has issued his subscription papers for a series of three concerts, in the Music Hall, with the completest orchestra that Boston can supply. There will be Symphonies and Overtures, classical and modern, and the best solo talent in the country, vocal and instrumental, is promised for "attraction" as they call it. If subscribers come forward as they will do if they know what is good, Mr. Zerrahn will commence in March on Saturday evenings. We only beg, seeing that the concerts are to be so few, that the time may be wasted on as little as possible besides choice and sterling compositions—i. e. real works of genius about which there can be no doubt.

4. Mr. JULIUS EICHBERG, one of our very ablest and most complete musicians has started quite a new experiment in the way of orchestral concerts. He seeks subscribers in a private way for Two Orchestral Soirées at Chickering's Rooms. We quote from his prospectus:

The Orchestra will be composed of twenty-four competent performers under my direction. This number, in a hall of medium size like the above, will produce an effect at least equal to three times that number, in a hall of larger dimensions. The Programme will be selected from the Symphonic works of Haydn, Mozart, (so seldom performed of late), Beethoven, and the modern Symphonists. Solo, in keeping with the general character of these Soirées, will also be given by the best available talent.

To enable me as much as possible to give to these performances the character of Private Soirées of high refinement, I have limited the number of subscribers to 250. This number secured, no more tickets will be sold.

These Soirées will undoubtedly be very choice, made up altogether of such pieces as real music-lovers wish to hear; nor can we doubt that, with this guaranty, 250 such will speedily send in their names. The evenings fixed upon are those of Saturday, Feb. 20, and March 5.

CHAMBER MUSIC. The four delightful Soirées of Messrs. KREISSMAN, LEONHARD and EICHBERG reached their finale (alas! that we must say it) on Saturday evening, Jan. 23, at Chickering's Hall. No concerts this whole winter have been so thoroughly vivified with the artistic spirit and fresh interest throughout, as these. Every item in the programmes has been choice, and has had such interpretation as ever a Dresden or a Leipzig concert room, with its motto: Res severa est verum gaudium, would not be ashamed of. The last was on the whole, perhaps, the most enjoyable of all, and had this programme;

1. Trio B flat. (Op. 99.) Schubert. Allegro, moderato, Andante un poco mosso, Scherzo, Rondo.
2. Dichterliebe. Schumann.
3. Siciliano, for Violin, from Sonata No. 7. Tartini.
4. Der Erlkoenig. Schubert.
5. Capriccio, for Piano. (Op. 33, No. 2.) Mendelssohn.
6. Trio (Op. 11.) Beethoven. Allegro con brio, Adagio, Allegretto con Variazioni.

In the two Trios Messrs. Eichberg and Leonhard had the cooperation of Mr. HENRY MOLLENAUER, of New York, truly an admirable violoncellist, and the wonderful Schubert Trio bristled with difficulties which he put out of thought with ease, calling attention only to the meaning and expression of the music. The early Trio by Beethoven is that one of which our Philadelphia correspondent wrote not long ago, written originally for clarinet instead of violin, but set down in the catalogue for either. The variations, on a very familiar old Italian air: Prima ch'io l'impegno, are indeed full of interest. Variations with Beethoven are not mere mechanical changes on a theme, but new imaginative creations prompted by the theme, real additions to its thought, beautiful children of the first thought in which the family likeness is strangely modified, it may be, never lost. Mr. Eichberg and Mr. Leonhard never played better. The Capriccio by Mendelssohn is one which we seldom hear, full of delicate and brilliant traits requiring fluent fingers and fine touch. The songs of course, were sung by Mr. Kreissman. We wish we had room to copy the little poems which make up the cyclus of Schumann's finely impassioned "Poet's Love". Its many moods were exquisitely rendered, and the "Erl King," so dramatically sung and powerfully accompanied by Leonhard, made as great impression almost as if it were new.

We seriously hope those artists will vouchsafe us a few more Soirées. The opera is out of the way, there is rather a dearth of all but organ music, and how can they but feel certain of their audience.

OPERA. Maretzek's four weeks included twenty-three performances, at nearly every one of which the Boston Theatre was well filled, while on the "Faust" nights it overflowed. This piece is one which improves on further hearing, and it became immensely popular here, so much that, besides six evening performances, it was given as the farewell of the company on Saturday afternoon. Certainly the music, though not great, has many beauties, much refinement and dramatic fitness and is far better music than the crowds of curious new-comers seemed to be aware of, who would encore the brass band march, and seemed more occupied by Punchinello than by the musical complication in the foreground of the Kermesse scene. Miss KELLOGG's Gretchen will be ever memorable among the lyric impersonations of our stage. Other novelties of the last two weeks were Sig. Peri's "Judith," which found few admirers, although the proud part must have been acted well by MEDORI, Verdi's "I due Foscari," an intensely overstrained piece of lyric tragedy, in which the acting was the main thing. BELLINI making a grand old Doge, and a repetition of Ione. It is in this straining, tragic Verdi sphere, which has been steeling, if not stealing, their voices, making them hard and tremulous, that such singers as Medori, Mazzoleni and Biachi show their chief strength; of course they were the people for the Trovatore for Ernani, and, as far as acting goes, for Lucrezia Borgia. One refreshing interval, one green vale not passion-scorched, must have been the Sonnambula with Miss Kellogg as Amina.

In the great success of this troupe the public paid its tribute to the honest average excellence, completeness and reliability of the whole company.

WORCESTER, MASS. The Mozart Society are rehearsing Romberg's "Song of the Bell" for the annual concert on Fast Evening. The Mendelssohn Quintette Club, on their second visit for the season, played Beethoven's Quartet in B flat, No. 6 of Op. 18, besides plenty of the "popular", including the attraction of Miss Addie Ryan as a singer; yet the people failed them. "Stella" mourns over it in terms which will have the sympathy of many such sufferers elsewhere:

Worcester, we are sorry to say, can no longer lay claim to being, as has been said of it, "the most musical city in New England, out of Boston." The concerts of the Mendelssohn Quintette Club, given in an annual series, have been a sort of test by which we have been accustomed to measure the growing taste for music of standard excellence. If the Club drew good audiences, we could depend upon as good success for other musical attractions, whether presented by foreign or home talent. This season the Club has not had its wonted success. Balls, parties, &c., have absorbed the attention of our little "fashionable world," upon which, here, as elsewhere, music depends not a little for patronage; while they who were getting interested, seeking to discover whether Mozart and Beethoven were not for them as well as for others, have been tried and found wanting—led away by countless attractions, which "well enough in their way," are the obstacles which are to be met and stoutly overcome before we can advance to the comprehension and enjoyment of what is highest and best. With very many the season has brought demands unparalleled upon money and time. Charities, all seemingly real, meet one at every turn; and yet the majority of the people have the wherewithal with which to meet any cause in which their hearts are interested. The truth of the matter must be found, we fear, in the deterioration of the character of our popular amusements. The tricks of street-advertising—the gaily painted cart that carries a pitiful drum; the showy bulletin board that carries "humbly" on its face; the brass-band that excites the populace with spirited airs, and draws after it the boys with their huzzas, and their parents with their quarters; these are the festivities upon which the public dance attendance, seeking only amusement, nothing farther than the enjoyment of the passing hour,

"Pleased with a rattle, tickled with a straw."

But this is in accordance with the spirit of the times. Politically, we are out of the "slough of despond"; and with a fickleness which the French never exceeded, we rush to the utmost extreme of frivolity, and are doing what we should condemn in any other nation situated as we are. Extravagance in expenditure and dress is on the increase, and with this comes a change over the face of society, which is not what it was when we were all fully alive to our obligations to God and our Country, willing to sacrifice everything to the good cause, to forget self and selfish interests in this common struggle for individual freedom and national life. We love not croaking nor croakers; but "whatever is, is" not, now, just "right!"

NEW HAVEN. Oratorio music appears to be zealously cultivated among the singers of the chief cities of Connecticut. We have already had a report of successful performances of "Elijah," in both cities, by the "Beethoven Society" of Hartford. Now we learn that the "Mendelssohn Society" in New Haven is occupying itself with such works as Haydn's "Seasons" and Mendelssohn's "St. Paul," neither of which for many years has found a hearing here in Boston.

CAMBRIDGE, MASS. The two musical clubs of undergraduates in Harvard College, viz., the "Pierian Sodality" and "Harvard Glee Club," gave a concert in Lyceum Hall, on the 13th ult., with the following programme of part-songs and pieces for their little embryonic orchestra:

1. Overture, ("Iphigene in Tauris").....Gluck.
2. Artillerist's Oath.....C. F. Adam.
3. Der schönste Engel.....Hoffman.
4. Allegro, (from the 2nd Symphony).....Haydn.
5. Miller's Daughter.....Härtel.
6. Waltz.....Otto.
7. Priest's March, (from Athalia).....Mendelssohn.

1. Concert Waltz, (Die ersten Curen).....Strauss.
2. The Ruined Chapel.....Böcker.
3. Ungeduld, (Transcription).....Schubert.
4. Hunter's Song Champagne Song.....Abb.
5. Overture, ("Martha").....Flotow.
6. College Songs.

ST. LOUIS, MO. The third concert of the Philharmonic Society [Jan. 7], under the conductorship of Mr. E. Sobolewski, had a remarkably rich programme, including: Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony; Mendelssohn's music to Schiller's "Ode to the Artists" [male chorus]; a chorus "Gloria Patri," by Palestrina; Bennett's Overture, "The Naiads," by Kreutzer's overture, "Das Nachtlager in Granada, &c."

CHICAGO, ILL.—This growing metropolis of the North West, has a goodly account to show of its activity in the way of classical music. A correspondent writes us (Jan. 29):

"You know we have our PHILHARMONIC Concerts, which, according to home critics, rival if not outshine those of New York, Brooklyn and Boston; and, although in our opinion they are very far behind, we are very thankful to hear as much good music as they give us, so acceptably rendered. They have played this season Beethoven's "Seventh," a Symphony by Gade, and Schumann's glorious one in B flat. None of these performances were perfect, but all were creditable. Mrs. Kloss, of your city, gave us in these concerts a Scherzo by Chopin, and Mendelssohn's Concerto in G minor, with orchestra, besides some smaller pieces of Schumann, Chopin, &c. The vocal performances were mostly good, but, like all debuts of amateurs, principally of "local" interest. The lighter portion of the programme generally contained some Potpourris by BALATKA, the popular and able conductor, and some overtures."

"Mrs. Kloss also gave a series of classical Chamber Concerts, with the assistance of Mr. Lewis and Dr. Fessel (violin) and Mr. Balatka (cello), which were the best we ever had had. The selections were unexceptionable throughout, and the performances artistic."

"The MUSICAL UNION has this year dissolved into a "chamber concert giving society." Their concerts have been well attended: but think of your Handel and Haydn Society giving a Chamber Concert without even an attempt at chorus singing! and that is what is called the Choral society of the great North West. Before entering upon our opera season, which is to open February 1, with Grau's troupe, we had quite a treat in the shape of a sacred concert, principally gotten up to exhibit the organ of the 2nd Presbyterian church, which had been enlarged by the addition of 12 stops, and a hydraulic engine to work the bellows, by Mr. W. H. Chant, the organist, who is also a practical Organ builder. Messrs. Chant and Knopfel were the instrumental performers. The Mendelssohn Society, which for the last five years has given us many a treat, assisted, and sang Flemming's "Integer vita," for male voices; Mendelssohn's hymn, "Hear my Prayer," for soprano solo and chorus, and Nos. 7 and 9 [Bass solo and chorus] from the "Walpurgis night." The soloists were Miss Garthe, who sang a posthumous "Concert Aria" by Mendelssohn, Mrs. Carpenter, who took the leading part in "Hear my prayer," and Messrs. Sabine [Tenor] and Johnson [Bass]. This society, although they seldom give public performances, have for a number of years kept up their interesting rehearsals with a success and harmonious good feeling, which is seldom to be found in musical societies, and, under the able leadership of their conductor, Mr. Dohn, have not only become familiar with a great deal of good music, but have, whenever they have sung in public, carried away the prize."

"A more than ordinary success was gained by a young German, Mr. SCHUTZ, who sang at the last M. U. Chamber Concert the tenor aria from Masaniello, and who, with proper care and cultivation, promises to become one of the very best tenors in the country. At the end of the season I will report what more good things may have come to us, Grau's Italian opera included; may he only bring us something truly good."

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

In the language of love. (Le parlate d'amor)
Romanza. "Faust." 25

There is an indescribable air of sweetness, simplicity and purity about the character of Siebel, which renders his part a great favorite in all performances. In this "flower scene," the pretty address to the flowers, his dismay at their suddenly withering, the happy thought to sprinkle them with holy water, their reviving and the musical shout of "Victory," constitute one of the most charming songs.

Thou who art sleeping. [Tu che fai l'addormentata. Serenade. "Faust." 35

In strong contrast to the above is this most extraordinary serenade, in which the wheedling tones of the commencement of each verse are interrupted by boisterous laughter, and contrasted with the warning at the end, for which we may thank the good-natured demon, who has a spice of honesty and good sense in his sarcasm.

O when in the chrysal clear, [E' strano poter il
viso]. "Faust." 50

Marguerite, discovering a casket of jewels at her door, is childishly delighted with the glittering gems, with which she arrays herself, and appears "like a princess whom they salute in the street." Her expressions of joy constitute a charming scene, unlike a common song, but piquant and attractive.

Toast to the New Year. Ross. 25
A wide awake welcome to New Year's day, and wishes for the success of Union and Liberty.

The unknown heroes. Song and Chorus. Bricher. 25
A song, well worth singing, in memory of the brave soldiers who died for us, but whose names we do not yet know. Music smooth and melodious.

Instrumental Music.

Quadrille, from "Faust." In colors. Chas. Coote. 75

Contains many of the favorite airs of the opera. Faust's "Pleasure" song, the Flower song, the Soldier's chorus, and La voga pupila, the morning song, all easily and brilliantly arranged. The title page contains a fine colored picture.

Estelle waltzes, Ch. D'Albert. 50
Another of the quite easy and brilliant compositions of this popular author. Excellent for pupils.

Union March Quickstep. Salem. 25
Spirited. Warlike.

Artot waltz. Alberti. 30
Commences with the favorite "Kiss" melody of Arditi, on which the succeeding waltz movements are variations.

Troubadour et Chateleine. Blumenthal. 60
Difficult. Of high character.

Books.

Buck's Motette Collection; containing a variety of pieces suited to the opening and close of Divine Worship. Composed, arranged, and selected by Dudley Buck, Jr. Cloth, $2.50
B'ds, 2.25

A book evidently conscientiously put together, and contains music from Mozart, Haydn, Mendelssohn, Beethoven, Schubert, Meyerbeer, and other masters, besides a number of fresh pieces from our native composers. The book is worthy of careful examination by choir leaders. There is a piano or organ accompaniment to each piece.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 597.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, FEB. 20, 1864.

VOL. XXIII. No. 24.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Half a dozen of Beethoven's Contemporaries.*

II. ANTONIO SALIERI.

INTRODUCTION.

The basis of the following biographical sketch is, of course, the short work (212 pages 8vo) upon Salieri, by Mosel, a great portion of which consists of notices of the composer's works—a kind of writing which is seldom very satisfactory. In certain cases descriptions of forgotten compositions have an interest; for instance, Chrysander's analyses of Handel's operas are a valuable feature of his noble biography of that master, as they give us an idea of the causes, which made him the most renowned musician of his day, long before the production of Samson, the Messiah, and the other great works of his last period. They are also interesting in themselves as opening to us a way to gain some knowledge of the form, spirit, style, and effect, of what were held to be the grandest operas of that era. Salieri lived, however, too near our own time to have any such interest connected with his works, that is in any high degree, and I shall spare the infliction of long disquisitions à la Mosel upon long forgotten works. The main thing, the principal object in view is, and will be, to enable the reader to live in Vienna, back in the days when Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven were the greatest, but by no means the only great composers—and to become acquainted with a phase of Vienna musical life at that time, which their biographies, except for a few years in Mozart's time, do not exhibit to us, but which nevertheless is necessary to any thing like an adequate conception of that musical world, of which in one direction they formed by far the most important part. For personal interest, the narrative of Salieri's life is not to be compared with that of Gyrowetz; and indeed, the principal inducement to write or read it lies in the fact, that seventy-five years ago in all Europe, no operatic composer stood, on the whole, so prominent before the world as he, except Gluck, whose career was just closed, and Mozart whose great successes were so speedily to be followed by his death. I say upon the whole, for he had great contemporaries—what if their names are now seldom heard? Piccini, Gretry, Paisiello, are certainly familiar enough, and a mass of German names might be added, which are associated intimately with the development of operatic art not in their own land alone, but south of the Alps. It is unfortunate for Salieri's fame out of Austria, or rather, I should say, in England and America, that his name is hardly known except in connection with his opposition to Mozart, which is so fully treated in Holmes's beautiful biography of the latter. For the present let that pass: His sins against Mozart have been punished sufficiently, whatever they were, and perhaps a cool judgment, if Salieri's side of the question could be presented with as much warmth as the other has been, might decide after all, that his fame has been clouded even beyond his deserts. I confess to a sort of liking for the little, dark, miserly, quaint, odd, rather vain (I judge), and envious Italian.

"For Heaven's sake, what can you find to like in such a character as that?" say you.

Perhaps, because nobody, hardly, now-a-days, speaks of him except as the enemy of Mozart, nobody has ever thought it worth while (in English) to take him up, because he is only a mark to cast stones at—like poor Süßmeyer. You know what Touché says about Audrey: "A poor virgin, sir, an ill-favored thing, sir, but mine own; a poor humor of mine, sir, to take that no man else will."

But there is another reason for writing the history of Salieri, and no less a one than that he was the successor, so to speak, (as will be seen), of him who wholly changed the character of the serious opera—not for one land alone but for the world—who, but Gluck?—and for years ruled that stage on which that change had been wrought. Among the strange absurdities which are current in the musical world are these two—the one, that what is now understood under the terms of grand symphony and string quartet,—that is, the quartet and symphony written in C. P. E., Bach's Sonata form, originated in Paris; the other, that it was there that Gluck developed and exemplified his operatic theory, and fought the great battle. Haydn and Mozart, (to be followed by Beethoven) were the reformers and developers of instrumental music, and carried it to the highest point which it has yet reached—both laboring in Vienna; while Gluck and Mozart, at the same time, in the same city, and in the same way, were acting upon the character of opera.

Not until Gluck had founded a school, was he engaged for Paris, and the contest there was in fact not so much between the two composers, Gluck and Piccini, as between the Italian and the Vienna schools—between the ideas, which Gluck had had aroused in his mind by hearing (1745 and those years) works of Rameau in Paris, and of Handel and Dr. Arne in London, and which some dozen or fifteen years of reflection had ripened into materials for a system—and on the other hand, the ideas, which lay at the foundation of the old opera in general.

The biography of Salieri is for many years a history of that stage on which Gluck fought his battle, his success in which, led to his engagement in Paris, where with the Austrian members of the French Court (Maria Antoinette and her party) upholding and aiding him, he carried the day on the boards of "La nouvelle Salle du Palais-Royal." Wonderful as the change wrought by Gluck appears, when his own works are compared with those of his old school contemporaries, it is far from being so striking, as when we study this change by taking Mozart's operas for our comparison. As Haydn was the inventor in instrumental music, and Mozart the perfecter, so was Gluck the inventor and Mozart again the perfecter in the opera. A certain one-sidedness of Haydn is not reflected in Mozart, and the remark is equally true if we read of "Gluck" instead of "Haydn." Salieri possessed great native genius, and was an eclectic; hence in his hands the Vienna school, of Italian opera at least, profited by the labors of all his great contemporaries.

But one must be careful, when writing a preface beforehand, lest he say more than the subsequent work will justify; therefore let us stop here.

A. W. T.

A hundred years ago and more Signor Salieri was a well-to-do shopkeeper or trader in the fortified town of Legnago, in the Venetian territory. He must have had a taste for music, for he gave his son Francis the means of becoming a good pianist, but, more than that, put him under the great Tartini to study the violin, upon which he became a distinguished player.

Antonio was born August 19, 1750, and as soon as he was old enough was sent to the public school to learn Latin, and put under his brother Franz to study violin, piano-forte and singing. In process of time Joseph Simoni, organist in the Cathedral at Legnago, and pupil of the famous Padre Martini of Bologna, became his musical instructor.

Franz was often employed at the church festivals in and about Legnago, to play the violin concerto—a common feature in the service on such occasions. The best musicians of the neighborhood usually assembled to take part, and thus the saint's celebration became a musical festivity. Little Anton was, from his infancy, passionately fond of music, and, when there was room in the carriage, which took his brother to and from the place of his engagement, he was allowed to accompany him. When he was ten years old, on such an occasion there was no room for him, but as the village was not far from home, he started off on foot, without asking permission of his parents, who subsequently suffered no small anxiety at his long absence.

Upon his return with his brother at night, the angry father threatened him with confinement in his room, and bread and water for a week upon a repetition of the offence. The boy, at first greatly frightened, thought the matter over, and concluded it was not so very bad after all. He was such a full-blooded boy, that he had been taught to drink nothing but water, and remained a water-drinker all his life; perhaps this was the reason for his extraordinary fondness for all sorts of sugar preparations and sweet dishes, for which he was noted in Vienna. According to his own account his father's threat was reasoned upon by him after this manner:

"The punishment is not so very dreadful, when one can hear such beautiful music in return. Wine, I never drink any way; I don't like the taste of it unless it is sweet; and as to bread, if I can only get sugar, why I had as lief eat it with bread as any thing else; and at any rate I will begin at once to lay in a little stock of sugar."

The boy had actually laid in a provision against imprisonment, by the time his brother had another engagement to which he was unable to take Anton. Let the old man himself tell his childish experience.

"This time I saw my brother drive off with great indifference, as I supposed, and remained quietly at home. After half an hour or so—it was still early in the morning, and my parents, brothers and sisters not yet up—I said to a servant girl I would go to mass, and did really leave the house for that purpose. Quite involuntarily, and contrary to my custom, I selected a more distant church, and one which stood near the city gate, through which my brother had been driven to the village church-festival. After service, I came out of the church really intending to return home, when the thought struck me that that village also was not far from the town. I stood and said to myself: 'My disobedience cannot be so very great a fault, as I am only guilty of it for the sake of hearing sacred music.' Thinking the matter over in this way, my longing for this, as it seemed to me, innocent pleasure, increased, and believing myself unobserved, off I started on the road to the festival. But this time I failed in my reckoning. A person, whom my father had set upon the watch, overtook me when hardly through the city gate, stopped me, and led me back home. 'So do you obey me!' cried my father, angrily, 'and so you have forgotten the punishment I threatened? Away to your chamber and get ready for a good dinner.' I sneaked away to my room, like a bird to its cage after a warm bath, and father locked me in. But, as my head was full of the idea that I had not committed any heinous crime, I was not much cast down; and having a good breakfast with my brother in the morning before he drove off, I was not hungry, so I set myself now to a book, and now to the piano-forte, and waited for the dinner hour, curious to see if my father would really carry out his threat. The hour struck, and sure enough next moment came the servant and brought me a piece (not so very large) of bread, a bottle of water and a glass. After the ugly old woman had placed them all before me, she went out of the room with an ill-boding smile and locked the door again. Well, I saw now that my father was really resolved to keep his word; but the thought of my hidden treasure of sugar lessened the pain. Now I go to the clothes press where I had concealed my store to get a portion of it; I hunt and hunt, not a trace of sugar is to be found! I had entrusted my secret to my sister; she had entrusted it to my mother, and she had entrusted it to my father, who on that very morning before I was brought back, had confiscated my entire stock as contraband of war. And now, indeed, I felt the full weight of my punishment, and, as I had on other occasions learned that my father was a man of his word, the terror came upon me of being obliged to pass eight everlasting days shut up, and upon such small rations. Overcome with shame and pain I broke out into loud crying. At this moment, my father, who had been listening, opened the door, and said: "Ah, ha, my fine gentleman, pretty tricks these of yours! disobeying my orders, hiding away sugar—what will be the end of it all?" Full of repentance I prayed forgiveness, which was granted, with the proviso, that in future, when brother Franz went to a festival, and there was no room for me in the carriage, I must be shut up all day in my room—which sentence was rigidly carried out. For this time, after this pathetic scene, I was allowed to go to the table. But as several friends dined there that day, and the story of the sugar had got out, I had to put up with many a banter; indeed for a long time afterward, when I met any one of them, I always had to hear the question: 'Well, Tony, how are you off for sugar?'

* See Nos. 9 et seq. and Nos. 20 et seq. of this volume.

A queer boy, ardently fond of music (and sugar)!

Mosel gives the following anecdote from Salieri's papers as a proof of the feeling for difference in style and for fitness in music with which he was born. He was walking once with his father, when they met a monk who was the organist of his convent. The boy was in the habit of attending the mass and vespers of that church, when performed musicaliter, and had often heard this monk, "in the almost universal style at that time in Italy," preluding on the organ in a scherzando, and therefore, for the place, improper style. The father greeted the monk and talked a few moments with him. Tony also greeted him, but with marked coldness, which had also on other occasions attracted his father's notice.

"Why didn't you greet the monk more respectfully?" asked the father after they had separated.

"I would gladly greet him properly," said the boy, "but I don't like him, because he is a bad organist."

"Why, how can you, boy, judge in such matters, you, who have hardly begun to study music?"

"True, I am only a beginner, but if I was in his place, seems to me, I would play the organ with more solemnity."

Before Anton was fifteen years old he had lost, first, his mother, and soon after his father, and misfortunes of divers kinds had fallen upon the family, so that the children,—Franz, the violinist, another son, a monk in Padua, a third son, of whom not even the name is given, Anton and two sisters—six in all—were left almost in bitter poverty. Anton took refuge with the brother in Padua, where he remained until some time in the year 1766, when a Venetian nobleman, Johann Mocenigo, an old friend of his father, who had heard of the sorrows of the Salieri family, became his protector. Mocenigo took the little musician from his brother to Venice, with the intention of sending him to Naples to acquire a thorough musical education.

One evening while in Venice, Anton was present at the first performance of an opera, probably "Adriano in Syria." His seat was in the parterre and hard by a box occupied by a lady, who was greeted by a tall, thin man, quite enveloped in a fur cloak, standing near, also in the parterre. The tall man crowded himself before Anton to have a chat with the lady, so that the broad sleeve of his cloak rested against the boy. In course of the conversation it became clear to him that the stranger was no other than the composer of the new opera—Kapellmeister Pietro Guglielmi—who some two years later brought out his "Ezio" and other works in London.

Nothing but the absorption of his attention by the lady prevented Guglielmi from noticing with what enthusiasm the boy beside him hugged his coat sleeve to his breast, out of pure reverence and love for the composer. Forty years afterwards the French National Institute had occasion to elect a corresponding member in the musical section—the deceased member was Guglielmi, his successor Anton Salieri.

The stay of Anton with Mocenigo in Venice lasted but some three months, during which, however, he was not idle; he studied thorough bass with Pescetti, vice kapellmeister of St. Marks, and singing with Ferdinand Pacini, a tenor singer in the same Chapel, and lodger in Mocenigo's house.

One of the Carneval operas of that year (1766) at Venice was the "Achille in Sciro," by Metastasio, and the ballet and chamber music composer at the court of Vienna, Florian Leopold Gassmann, a native of Brüx in Bohemia, was called thither to compose the music. Ferdinand Pacini was one of the singers employed in it, and consequently made Gassmann's acquaintance. Quite by chance he spoke to the Kapellmeister of the boy Salieri as a youth of much talent, and passionately devoted to music. Gassmann was interested, desired to see him, and was so pleased with Anton's skill, both on the pianoforte and in singing, as to beg him of Mocenigo, and take him to Vienna as his pupil in composition. And thus it happened that the orphan boy, instead of the proposed journey to Naples and musical studies there, entered Vienna, June 15, 1766, as the pupil of the Bohemian-German Gassmann, two months before completing his 16th year.

"And here," said he, "I cannot pass over one circumstance which always floats in my grateful memory. The day after my arrival in the capital, my master took me into the Italian church, to offer there my devotions. As we were going home he said to me, 'I thought it my duty to begin your musical education with God. Now it will depend upon you, whether its results shall be good or bad; I shall at all events have done my duty.' Men of that sort are rare! I promised him eternal gratitude for all the good he should do me, and, praised be God! I have the right to boast, that I honorably proved myself grateful so long as he lived, and after his death to his family." A truth which all Vienna can confirm, and which, no less than his distinguished talents, made him the object of universal respect—adds Mosel.

Gassmann, at that time just entered his 38th year, and still a bachelor—arranged the boy's studies, and divided his time, in a manner, which fortunately the pupil in later years put upon record,—fortunately, for it shows why "there were giants in those days," to use the Old Testament phrase, or rather how those whom nature intended as such, reached their full development. It must not be forgotten that the pupil had already conquered the ordinary difficulties of the pianoforte, the violin, and singing—reading of music being a matter of course—and had had instruction in thorough bass. At this point Gassmann takes him in charge, the end aimed at being the mastery of vocal—especially operatic—composition.

Anton was at once provided with a master in the German and French languages, and a priest, Don Pietro Tommasi, gave him lessons in Latin, Italian, poetry, and other branches of knowledge, which bore upon the science of his future profession. All these teachers gave him daily instruction. With a young Bohemian, whose name seems to have escaped Salieri's memory, he continued his studies in thorough bass, in the reading of scores and the violin, and at the same time, Gassmann himself began to teach him counterpoint. To make his progress in this branch—better to say, in the very foundation of the art of composition,—more easy and rapid, Tommasi was directed to devote a part of every Latin lesson to the translation of a passage from Fux's "Gradus ad Parnassum," which celebrated work was made by Gassmann the basis of his system of instruction.

Mosel, the mutilator of Handel's works, a man whose name one cannot bear with patience, when one thinks of his editions of Samson and Belshazzar (God save the mark!)—Samson with the entire part of Harapha, the Philistine giant, omitted—this J. F. Edler von Mosel, infinite as he was in some points, had also some good ideas. And here is one of them. "One sees," says he, "with what zeal, circumspection, and at the same time adaptation to the end proposed, Salieri's musical education was arranged and conducted. The disciples of art in those days did not gain the title of composer so cheaply as now, when every one, as soon as he knows that two pure fifths or octaves must not follow each other immediately, believes himself a master of composition, and that all other branches of knowledge, which a real and worthy composer considers indispensably necessary, are superfluous, and the study of them as mere loss of time.*

One of Gassmann's sternest commands was that his pupil should confine himself entirely to his study of the rules in his music; but the latter's longing to compose was irresistible, and when alone he gave way to it, now writing an instrumental, and then a vocal piece, as it happened, composing his own text for the latter. These pieces he carefully hid in his bed, to enjoy at leisure, but they were discovered, and his master gave him a severe reprimand and forbade him, without special permission, to take note paper from his room—he was not yet ripe for composition. Salieri took care to obey in the matter of the note paper, but the injunction to confine himself, for the present, exclusively to the grammatical rules of music he very soon forgot, and every bit of white paper he could lay his hands on was immediately ruled with staves and filled with his musical ideas, good, bad or indifferent.

(To be continued.)

Carl Maria Von Weber.

(Continued from page 180.)

Even his biographer has been unable to clear up the obscurity which hangs over C. M. Von Weber's birthday. The supposition that it is the 18th December, 1786, is based upon a written note of the composer's father, in which, however, the name of the month in Roman ciphers is not very plain. Besides, not much reliance is to be placed on Franz Anton, who, as is notorious, in public documents, frequently made his son a year younger. But in the family, the 18th December was always kept as Carl Maria's birthday. The other supposition is founded upon the parish register of Eutin. In this register, his baptism is stated to have taken place on the 20th November, according to which, as the Roman Catholic baptism is usually celebrated on the day of the birth or the next day, Carl Maria must have been born on the 18th (or 19th) November. The author states, moreover, that in after years Weber was fond of assuming this to be the true date, because then his own birthday and that of his wife, Caroline Brandt, fell together.

The principal fact, namely, that Weber was born in the year 1786, is certain. Consequently, in his earliest childhood, as his father left Eutin as far back as 1697, to commence the irregular life of a theatrical manager, he scarcely ever had the benefit of any permanent place of abode where his mind could be properly educated and developed. He was taken with his father in the latter's wanderings, the course of which his biographer has very carefully traced, as far as it was possible to do so. They extended by way of Hamburg, Vienna, Cassel, Meinigen, Nuremberg, Hildburghausen (1796), Salzburg (where Michael Haydn gave lessons to Carl Maria, who was then twelve years of age, and who lost his mother in that city), Munich (where he made the acquaintance of Sennefelder, the inventor of lithography, in which art he made such progress as to lithograph himself and publish "Six variations for the piano," of his own composition), &c., &c., to Freiberg in Saxony.

He here set to music Das stumme Waldmädchen, by the Baron von Steinsberg, who was stopping in the place with his company of actors. "The grand romantic, comic opera, music by a pupil of Haydn, C. M. von Weber, 13 years old," was played in October, 1800, at Chemnitz, and, in November, at Freiberg. In the announcement making the composer a year younger than he was, and omitting the Christian name "Michael" before "Haydn," we recognize Carl Maria's father. The opera had been well received at Chemnitz. After it was performed at Freiberg, there appeared a short but mild and inoffensive criticism, in which it was stated that expectation had previously been excited to too high a pitch, &c. The young composer, of course in obedience to his father's order—answered this, and became involved, in consequence, in an exceedingly vexatious paper war. As a proof to what melancholy, nay, pernicious influence his mind and character might easily have succumbed, had not the inward power of genius at length awoke and triumphantly manifested itself, we will quote some passages from these first literary essays of Weber. Answer to the first criticism:—

"That my composition would not please, since a premeditated and base cabal, actuated by the most bitter envy and malevolence, gave the tone for its performance, and as an instrument out of tune can never sound well, was something I had to expect; why did the work please then at Chemnitz?—because—the instrument was in tune.—My own conscience and the testimony of great men and contrapuntists, who, by the way, must be somewhat rare here, put me at my ease; but my first blossoms were acknowledged as much as two years ago, and in the second volume of the celebrated Leipzig Musical Paper, as being already tolerably fine and ripe fruit! my original work, however, is open at all hours to the inspection of any one, and I shall feel indescribably thankful to the person who will show me my faults and teach me something better. C. M. von W., Composer."

"Even if the style of this exhortation, as unpleasing as unwise, allowed of any doubt as to the boy's having only given his name to the effusion of Franz Anton's pen, it would be cleared up by a glance at the dispositions of the two persons. As was often subsequently the case, Franz Anton's hot temper, offensive vain-gloriousness and externality, already lay his modest, simple son into differences which lay like dark shadows upon his life and disposition. With regard, however, to the praises which the celebrated Leipzig Musical Paper showered upon the boy's productions a year before [to say it was two years is not correct], we have already spoken of them, and shown they were very hypothetical."

Carl Maria's opponents were not silent, and so there appeared with his signature, in the supplement to No. 7 of the Allgem. Freiburger Nachrichten, two sharp replies. In the dry aggressive tone of these exercises in style there is a truly humorous audacity:—

Mein Herr Stadtmusicus, you are very much mistaken if you believe I expected my work would be so very successful.—But every laborer is worthy of his hire, which by your performance has been infamously sacrificed; why did the grand rehearsal go so admirably? And why was the performance so wretched a one? It was not the worthy persons in the orchestra who were to blame, but your sleepy conductor,* who neglected his first duty, correct intonation; paid not the slightest attention to forte or piano, crescendo or decrescendo, and never marked the tempo according to the written directions; he thus deprived the picture of all light and shade, spoiling everything, and rendering it an impossibility for the work to succeed! Your envy and malevolence have consequently gained their end. In addition to this, it is not enough to find fault;—people must understand and be able to do the thing better than I myself. The composition of my opera is not an English dance.—That, according to your own confession, you are no theoretician in musical knowledge and counterpoint, I am very willing to believe, and hence your presumptuous censure contradicts itself; it is best for the shoemaker not to go beyond his last.—That I was born on the 18th December, 1787,† at half-past ten in the evening, my baptismal register testifies; therefore your favorite epithet: 'pretended' loses its force.—Oh, how deserving of pity is a composer who is compelled to see a work thus mangled! And now to answer your dear friend, whose aid you invoke in No. 5, etc."

* Such I suppose to be the proper rendering of Anführer.—TRANSLATOR.

† An evident error, as the date of his birth is thus made to fall an entire year later than it really did. THE AUTHOR.

"—I, too, could not help being surprised at your great audacity, Herr Cantor, in endeavoring to put down my opera Das Waldmädchen, merely in order to be praised and rewarded by your malevolent but truly devoted friend. Otherwise I know of no cause for your behavior, as, Herr Cantor, I never offended you even by a look. How could you allow yourself to be induced to criticize a work, with which you have nothing in common? If I chose to discuss the matter en detail with you, the echo would not fail to sound rather rude; but this is contrary to my nature, and opposed to the principles of the education bestowed upon me. The point relating to the 'pretended' year of my birth has already been discussed in the answer above, but I may inform you further that my father married my mother in Vienna, on the 20th August, 1785. That I possess eminent intellectual gifts is a fact for which I thank my Creator; and that during my life, which at present has extended over only a short period, I have seen and heard more than many persons in fifty years, is also a truth capable of being proved. That, moreover, I have been acknowledged by the greatest conductors of the first Courts and Royal Private Bands as one who has properly and fundamentally studied counterpoint, and consequently understands how to treat correctly the instruments, as well as words, harmony and rhythm, together with the vocal parts, serves to tranquillize me; thus it is only palpable envy and malevolence which find faults! Good Heaven! I do not wish to become a Cantor or a Stadtmusicus, and am fully aware that for both these places I am, on many accounts, wanting in the necessary knowledge and skill, etc. I am very ready to allow myself to be put right, and thank any one who will do so modestly, but not a person who comes domineering over me with arrogant pride. You, however, mein Herr Cantor, are not at all competent to judge me, and I will no more learn anything from you than I will entertain the reprehensible notion of teaching you aught. Furthermore, I have not the slightest ill-feeling against the worthy individuals of the orchestra here, and will also believe that the Stadtmusicus can conduct for them, if he only chooses. Unfortunately, however, with this opera, he has proved the contrary, and thus robbed me of the applause of a public generally so kind and noble-minded, too noble-minded, indeed, to feel any inclination to smother the germ of a rising plant. A clear proof of this is afforded by our unbounded respect and enthusiastic love for the public of Freiberg, my father having left a celebrated capital and undertaken an expensive journey, in order to enjoy the intercourse of so kindly, upright, and friendly a public, and to spend the few remaining days of his old age in this noble circle. And if I really had committed errors, it would not be at all astonishing, since I was too much pressed by the manager, and wrote the second act in four days (!), &c. I care as much for those who hate me as I care for rain-water. It flows by very soon, and if they shrink from me they must suffer God to be my help, &c. I beg to inform the unknown gentleman from Chemnitz that I pay no attention to the barking of small dogs."

C. M. VON WEBER."

The squabble elicited two more insipid letters, pro and con, in one of which the writer congratulates Weber "on being really only thirteen, because he still has time to learn modesty," and ends by saying that the Webers had lost their footing in society, and left Freiberg.

In his autobiographical sketch, Weber informs us that Das Waldmädchen, which he himself calls "a most immature production, and only here and there not entirely devoid of invention," was more generally performed "than could be pleasing to himself." He says it was given 14 times in Vienna and favorably received at Prague (where it was translated into Bohemian), as well as at St. Petersburg. Despite of diligent researches, says his biographer, it has been impossible to find accounts of these performances, except of those in Vienna, where the opera was given, under the title of Das Mädchen in Spessartwalde, eight times, during the month of December, 1804, in the Leopoldstadt Theatre.

(To be continued.)

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Elise Polko's "Musical Sketches."*

Those great men of genius who, in the republic of letters, tower above their surroundings, are, all of them, representatives of special directions of mental * Musical Sketches, by ELISE POLKO. Translated from the Sixth German Edition, by Fanny Fuller.—Philadelphia: Frederick Leypoldt, 1864, pp. 297.

* Few signs of progress in our American music are so encouraging, as the fact that Harvard can count so many of her sons devoted to music in some form or other.

effort. There may be parallels, but there are no fac-similes among them. There is no German Shakespeare, nor is there an English Goethe. To him who has but one language at command, the literature of foreign lands is as an unexplored country, in which he fain would travel, yet dare not. There are those who can go over into that country and bring back of its fruits and flowers; and they are the translators.

The labor of translation, though usually considered as demanding but mediocre powers, calls for peculiar talents and considerable skill in their use. To preserve the author's meaning, and to do this in graceful periods, without sacrificing the substance to the style, or cramping your English in foreign forms, is all that is required. But to meet these requirements is no easy matter unless you have both languages at your command; unless you weigh words and phrases and nicely distinguish between the various shades of meaning, and unless you have that sympathy with the tastes and the style of your author, that would enable you, were all other qualities equal, to express yourself as he has done—to think his thoughts over again.

Without this last essential, you may produce one of those literary abortions, a literal translation. Or, your version of your author, be it ever so fine otherwise, may vie in grace with the polygonal periods of Carlyle. He who should look there for the aroma of the original, would be as successful if he sought the fragrance of the rose in the wax imitation. There is something better to be desired than to have your "thing of beauty" reduced to its skeleton.

The work before us does not exact of these attributes their highest excellence, but as Miss Fuller has shown her ability to solve the difficulties that attended her labors, her translation must satisfy. There are but few instances of evitable Germanisms, or sentences susceptible of improvement by transposition. Her diction is simple and easy and is, therefore, well adapted to the subjects of the sketches.

To save this notice from standing as a monograph on translators, it were well to add a few words about the book itself. "A Melody," is charming; "Iphigenia in Aulis" is pretty, but vastly inferior to Hoffmann's "Ritter Gluck," in poetic warmth and interest; "Violetta," by its delightful descriptions and conversations, awakens pleasant memories of the journey of "Consuelo" and Haydn; the "Midsummer Night's Dream" cleverly interprets one phase of Mendelssohn's muse, but conveys rather a mawkish conception of the composer himself.

The sketches lack the sensuousness and the exquisite imagery of Heine or Hoffmann, but they are fresh, natural and enjoyable. The style is unpretending, the object of the author to amuse. The publication is an addition to our musical light literature and, as such, is valuable, because there is so little that is good and pretty, concerning music, in English.

SECOND NOTICE.

There are some works which can be best judged by intelligent young persons, and this new translation of Miss Fuller is one of these. Yesterday I lent my copy of "Musical Sketches" to a clever young girl—a nice musician by the way—telling her if she returned it to me by the last of the week it would be soon enough. To-day she surprised me by bringing it back.

"What! Have you finished it?" I asked.

"Oh yes! I never stopped last night after I began it. I did not go to bed until I reached the last word."

"How do you like it?"

"So much! So very much! It is lovely! I went to bed, and dreamed all night about it. This morning when the housekeeper awakened me, I was dreaming that my room walls and door were covered with John Sebastian Bach's name in shining letters—each word a brilliant chord, and I was waiting for these strange letter-sounds to call me."

"Which story did you like best?"

"The Bach particularly, then Violetta. Oh yes, and the Beethoven too, 'A Leonora.' Before I got half through 'Violetta,' I knew Amadeus must be Mozart."

She was standing by the piano, and as she said this her fingers wandered lightly over the keys, playing the first measures of the Mozart Sonata in F major, (Opus 6. No. 1). She looked up with a pretty smile as she did so, saying:

"He used to run about in the woods to steal melodies from the dear little forest-birds—at least the story says so."

She slipped quietly into the piano seat and went through the Sonata, giving it a sweet, tender expression which she had never thrown into it before. Then she came to bid me good-bye, and as she stood by the library table she took up the "Musical Sketches" and turned over its leaves with a half sigh.

"What are you thinking?" I asked.

"I am wishing I had just such another nice book," she replied, with a pretty, shy laugh. "I shall miss it so much to night."

Now what nicer compliment could author and translator have than that? Before the girl left me I made her look at the book still more lovingly, by telling her that the translator was young, only a few years her senior, and that she was wondrously gifted in languages.

I am sure "Musical Sketches" needs no higher commendation than the unconscious praise of my young friend. The appearance of the book, too, is attractive; its typography, the pretty vignettes, tinted paper and novel binding are all unexceptionable and in excellent taste. Mr. Leypoldt has made a fine reputation for himself as a publisher of works of Art. He has paid the best compliment, too, to the public, by presenting to it books of a high and refined character. He does not seem to think or say, "This will not sell," or "That is above the popular fancy." He must believe in Goethe's generous maxim, for he treats the public as if it had the fine, correct taste it ought to have, which is certainly the wisest way to create that taste. May he continue to meet with the success he has already obtained, and not only that, but with all that he merits; each one of us who loves and serves Art, surely should wish this heartily, for besides the furtherance of Mr. Leypoldt's own good, which is but fair, the cause of Art will be well advanced thereby.

A. M. B. B.

Bridgeton, New Jersey.

Mendelssohn on Liszt and Thalberg.

Liszt was here for a fortnight, and caused quite a paroxysm of excitement among us, both in a good and evil sense. I consider him to be in reality an amiable, warm-hearted man, and an admirable artist. That he plays with more execution than all the others, does not admit of a doubt; yet Thalberg, with his composure, and within his more restricted sphere, is more perfect, taken as a virtuoso; and this is the standard which must also be applied to Liszt, for his compositions are inferior to his playing, and, in fact, are only calculated for virtuosos. A fantasia by Thalberg (especially that on the "Donna del Lago") is an accumulation of the most exquisite and delicate effects, and a continued succession of difficulties and embellishments that excite our astonishment; all is so well devised and so finished, carried out with such security and skill, and pervaded by the most refined taste. On the other hand, Liszt possesses a degree of velocity and complete independence of finger and a thoroughly musical feeling which can scarcely be equalled. In a word, I have heard no performer whose musical perceptions, like those of Liszt, extended to the very tips of his fingers, emanating directly from them. With this power, and his enormous technicality and practice, he must have far surpassed all others, if a man's own ideas were not after all the chief point, and these, hitherto, at least, seemed denied to him; so that in this phase of art, most of the great virtuosos equal, and indeed excel him. But that he, along with Thalberg, alone represents the highest class of pianists of the present day, is, I think, undeniable.—Letter from Leipzig, 1840.

Mendelssohn and the Queen.

I have really been urged to do too much. Lately, when playing the organ in Christ Church, Newgate street, I almost thought, for a few moments, I must have been suffocated, so great was the crowd and pressure round my seat at the organ; and two days afterwards I played in Exeter Hall before three thousand people, who shouted hurrahs and waved their handkerchiefs, and stamped with their feet till the hall resounded with the uproar; at the moment I felt no bad effects from this, but next morning my head was confused and stupefied. Add to this the pretty and most charming Queen Victoria, who looks so youthful, and is so gently courteous and gracious, and speaks such good German, and who knows all my music so well; the four books of songs without words, and those with words, and the symphony, and the "Hymn of Praise." Yesterday evening I was sent for by the Queen, who was almost alone with Prince Albert, and who seated herself near the piano and made me play to her; first seven of the "songs without words," then the serenade, two impromptus on "Rule Britannia," Lützow's "Wilde Jagd," and "Gaudeamus igitur." The latter was somewhat difficult, but remonstrance was out of the question, and as they gave the themes, of course it was my duty to play them. Then the splendid grand gallery in Buckingham Palace where they drank tea, and where two boars by Paul Potter are hanging, and a good many other pictures which pleased me well. I must tell you that my A minor symphony has had great success with the people here, who one and all receive us with a degree of amiability and kindness which exceeds all I have yet seen in the way of hospitality, though this sometimes makes me feel my head quite bewildered and strange, and I am obliged to collect my thoughts in order not to lose all self-possession.—Letter from London, 1842.

A Forest Festival.

Within a quarter of an hour's drive from the road, deep in the forest where lofty spreading beech-trees stand in solitary grandeur forming an impenetrable canopy above, and where all around nothing was to be seen but green foliage glistening through innumerable trunks of trees,—this was the locality. We made our way through the thick underwood, by a narrow footpath, to the spot, where, on arriving, a number of white figures were visible in the distance, under a group of trees, encircled with massive garlands of flowers which formed the concert-room. How lovely the voices sounded, and how brilliantly the soprano tones vibrated in the air; what charm and melting sweetness pervaded every strain! All were so still and retired, and yet so bright! I had formed no conception of such an effect. The choir consisted of about twenty good voices: during the previous rehearsal in a room, there had been some deficiencies, and want of steadiness. Towards evening, however, when they stood under the trees, and lifting up their voices gave my first song, "Ihr Vöglein in den Zweigenschwank," it was so enchanting in the silence of the woods, that it almost brought tears to my eyes. It sounded like genuine poetry. The scene too was so beautiful; all the pretty female figures in white, and Herr B— standing in the centre, beating time in his shirt sleeves, and the audience seated on camp stools, or hampers, or lying on the moss. They sang through the whole book, and then three new songs which I had composed for the occasion. The third ("Lerchengesang") was rather exultingly shouted than sung, and repeated three times, while in the interim strawberries, cherries and oranges were served on the most delicate china, and quantities of ice and wine and raspberry syrup carried round. People were emerging in every direction out of the thicket, attracted from a distance by the sound of the music, and they stretched themselves on the ground and listened.

As it grew dark, great lanterns and torches were set up in the middle of the choir, and they sang songs by Schelble and Hiller, and Schnyder, and Weber. Presently a large table, profusely decorated with flowers and brilliantly lighted, was brought forward, on which was an excellent supper with all sorts of good dishes and wines; and it was most quiet withal, and lonely in the wood, the nearest house being at the distance of at least an hour, and the gigantic trunks of the trees looking every moment more dark and stern, and the people under their branches more noisy and jovial. After supper they began again with the first song, and sang through the whole six, and then the three new ones, and the "Lerchengesang" once more three times over. At length it was time to go; in the thicket we met the wagon in which all the china and plate was to be taken back to the town; it could not stir from the spot, nor could we either, but we contrived to get on at last, and arrived about midnight at our homes in Frankfort. The donors of the fete were detained in the forest till two o'clock, picking up every thing, and lost their way along with the large wagon, finding themselves unexpectedly at Isenburg; so they did not get home till long afterwards.—Mendelssohn's Letters.

Music Abroad.

Paris.

A correspondent of the New York Albion writes:

The musty, forlorn, and most thoroughly uncomfortable Salle of the Conservatoire opens its doors to the eager public on Sundays, when classical music, given with the greatest degree of orchestral perfection, regales the ears of those whose hereditary right to a box therein entitles them to a place among the elect of this musical Paradise. The acoustic properties of the Salle are so admirable, that the moving of a chair in the charmed precinct is considered an innovation too dangerous to be admitted for an instant; so that generations of Parisians, heroic in behalf of Art, have submitted, and will continue to submit, to the discomforts of what is physically a place of torture.

Under the kindly auspices of a beautiful and gifted country-woman, at one of the recent concerts of the Conservatoire, I was so fortunate as to occupy the box, and enjoy the presence of Mr. Auber. Inexorable biography affirms a fact, which the appearance of the distinguished composer would never indicate—that he is eighty-two years of age. Time has left undimmed the lustre of his dark eye, which is in pleasing contrast with his crown of silvery hair, while his vivacity and charm of manner, and scrupulous grace of toilette, evince none of the selfish preoccupation of old age, but show him ever mindful to please and ever considerate of those around him. The melodious brilliancy of Mr. Auber's music, its well considered appropriateness, delicate finish, and compactness of form, seem to me in many respects a reflection of his personal traits, and embody at once the characteristic genius and national attributes of France.

At this concert of the Conservatoire, after enjoying Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, given with the admirable precision which always distinguishes the performances of this famous orchestra, a young pianist of great talent, Mlle. Rémaury, was introduced to the audience. This young girl, not relying on a success of beaux yeux to which she was fairly entitled, conquered legitimately, by force of merit, the plaudits of this most fastidious public—plaudits which, I am told, were but sparingly bestowed last winter on Mme. Clara Schumann.*

The piano, as an instrument, certainly receives its due share of attention in Paris, and among its exponents, Mr. George Matthias, as composer of ability and pianist of talent, enjoys an enviable reputation.

But if the tutelary Saint of Paris—wishing to make an artist essentially Parisian—had breathed into his compositions, and had imparted to his playing, the elements peculiar to her own irresistible city, in the personality of Mr. Charles Delouix she would have been satisfied with the perfection of her handiwork. The same esprit of Paris, so extensively diffused throughout the poems of Alfred de Musset, has found happy musical utterance in the songs of Mr. Delouix. This artist has set to music some of Musset's most touching lines, as well as some replete with delicate raillery; and quick sympathy has always enabled him to preserve, and reproduce with success, the contradictory attributes of the poet's verse. As a pianist, Mr. Delouix unites the mechanical perfection of severe training with the captivating style of a poetical nature. His piano compositions also reveal power of construction, together with the priceless gift of natural melody, and over all the crowning, nameless grace of Paris itself.

One of my most interesting souvenirs of Paris is that of a visit paid to Ambroise Thomas, the composer, who impressed me on this occasion, both by appearance and manner, as partaking less of French than of German characteristics. As an antiquarian of research and fastidiousness, his apartments, though small, are separately a study of different historical epochs; and his personal air of sombre dignity seems to harmonize well with his mediæval surroundings, with the massive oak carvings and ebony cabinets inlaid with ivory, and the various quaint articles which enrich his store of relics.—Hamlet affords him the theme of the opera, on which he is at this moment engaged; and although the idea of a mercurial French tenor in black tights does not precisely embody the English conception of the moody Dane, there can be no doubt of the power of Mr. Thomas's well tested genius, to preserve a firm foothold on the slippery descent that leads from the sublime to the ridiculous. An interesting biography of Ambroise Thomas has appeared in Paris, due to the elegant pen of Mr. Gustave Chouquet, who in his double capacity of musical critic of distinction, and poet allying his verses to the choral music of Mr. Thomas, has had ample opportunities for probing the depths of the composer's capacity. Mr. Chouquet says: "If we are not utterly deceived, posterity will realize that the author of the Songes d'une Nuit d'Été and Psyche has introduced new features into the repertoire of the Opera Comique; and, in placing Mr. Thomas between Auber and Adam, it will recognize his exquisite distinction, and his admirable mode of treating the voice and the orchestra. In regard to his latter qualification, all artists agree in considering the power of Mr. Thomas unsurpassed.

At the new and beautiful Théâtre Lyrique, erected in the recently improved part of Paris, Hector Berlioz's Opera of "Les Troyens" is in full tide of success. Deeming it necessary, perhaps, when ancient Troy was the theme, to impart to his work a local and appropriate coloring of vagueness, Mr. Berlioz has, in my estimation, succeeded in producing the wildest and most disappointing jumble of sounds, that even faith and courtesy have yet consented to call music. Still, large audiences grace nightly the elegant Salle of the Théâtre Lyrique, and listen to the "Troyens," with the air of complacent superiority assumed by those, who make a conscientious duty of admiring what they do not in the least understand.

LEIPZIG.—The programme of the Gewandhaus-Concert, on the 7th inst., consisted of: Part I.—"Suite" (No. 2), Franz Lachner, conducted by the composer; Recitative and Aria from Faust, Spohr, sung by Madlle. Ongeni, from Baden-Baden; "Frühlingsode," concerto for pianoforte with orchestral accompaniment, Joachim Raff, played by Mad. Ingeborg von Bronsart (first time). Part II.—Overture to Les Abencerrages, Cherubini; Cavatina, from Semiramide, Rossini, sung by Madlle. Ongeni; Solos for Pianoforte, played by Madame von Bronsart: Gavotte, Bach; Notturmo, Chopin; Novelette, R. Schumann; and Overture in A Major, Julius Rietz. The programme of the concert on the 12th inst. included: Part I.—Overture to Jessonda, Spohr; Concerto for violoncello, composed and played by Signor Alfred Piatti; soprano Aria, with chorus from Rossini's Stabat Mater (Madlle. Julie Rothenberger); Fantasia for violoncello, composed and played by Sig. Alfred Piatti; Trio, from Medea, Cherubini. Part II.—Symphony, No. ix., Beethoven (soloists, Madlle. Rothenberger, Madlle. Assmann, Herr —, and Herr Bergstein.)

MENICH.—From Jan. 1 to Dec. 31, there were altogether 310 performances at the Theatre Royal, of which 247 were given in the Court and National Theatres, and 63 in the Residenz-Theatre. In these 310 performances were included 130 operatic representations, and 31 ballet-representations. The operatic novelties consisted of Die Fiskari, by Max Zenger; Lalla Rookh, by Felicien David; Der Vetter auf Besuch, by George Krempelsetzer; and Das Conterfei, by Carl von Perfall. The revivals were Fra Diavolo (not played since 1860); Le Domino Noir (not played since 1840); La Muette de Portici (not played since 1860); Tito (not played since 1859); Iphigenia in Aulis (not played since 1859); Die Schwestern von

Prag (not played since 1860). The operas performed most frequently were Le Postillon de Longjumeau (four times); Le Domino Noir (four times); Rothkäppchen (five times); Rübezahl (three times); Lalla Rookh (six times); Faust (ten times); Der Vetter auf Besuch (four times); Das Nachtlager in Granada (three times); Das Glöckchen des Eremiten (five times); Le Prophète (five times); Robert Le Diable (three times); Guillaume Tell (four times); Der hässliche Krieg (three times); Der Freischütz (four times); and Oberon (three times).

STUTTGART.—The works performed at the first three subscription concerts of the King's Private Band, under the direction of Herr Erkert, were: Symphonies by Haydn (Nos. 3, 8, and 9); the four Leonora overtures; Schumann's overture, Scherzo and Finale; overture to Das Leben für den Czar, Glinka; and overture to Der Vampyr, Lindpaintner. Herr D. Pruckner performed Franz Liszt's concerto in E flat major; while Herr Sieger executed the first movement of Paganini's concerto in D Major, and, on the Beethoven night, that composer's two Romances.

VIENNA. Robert Schumann's music to Goethe's "Faust" was produced for the first time on the 20th Dec. by the Society of "Musik-Freunde," under the direction of Herbeck, with Mme. Dustmann and Herr Stockhausen (tenor) as principal singers. A German critic (as translated for the New York Musical Review) says of this work of Schumann:

Where, judging from his power, we expect great and striking effect, he does not fulfil our expectations, while in those places where the subject presents the utmost difficulty for a composer, he has really surpassed our expectations.

The overture is one of the poorest which we have heard of Schumann. For a Faust Overture, all who have comprehended Goethe's idea of Faust, and who have heard Schumann's Manfred Overture, expect a different treatment than that which Schumann gives us in his attempt. It is a composition which does not excite the hearer, and is wanting in a great many respects.

The scene in the garden, a charming love-duet, with real Schumann colors, again brings us back to the genius of our author, though it does not present extraordinary excellence. The "Ach neige, du Schmerzenseiche," is more wild and despairing than he interprets it, and the church scene, probably the most agreeable and easy for a musical interpretation, the terror of Margaret, the terrible whispers of the evil spirit, the Dies Irae—all these are on too moderate a scale for the wild genius of Schumann. Neither the distressful affliction of Margaret, nor the grim words of the evil spirit, and least of all, the Dies Irae, have been done full justice to. The hard, imposing beginnings of the chorus must certainly have the sacred coloring, and present a strong contrast to the song of Margaret, and of the evil spirit. Sacred expression is, however, not the forte of Schumann; indeed, it was rather a strange element to him.

Ariel's singing in the second part, with the fairies which encircle Faust, and the sun-rise scene, constitute very acceptable subjects for musical effect. But the light and fairy element which the elf scene admits of, and the grand and powerful effect which could be given in the description of the gradual sunrise, are sadly missing in Schumann's interpretation. The reflecting spirit and appreciation of nature which characterized the spirit of Goethe, whose immenso breadth can well be observed in these passages, may be very difficult to be expressed in music, and would, perhaps, be more appropriate for a melo-dramatic treatment. Schumann is so thoroughly musical that it is much easier for him to give his tone-pictures in grand features than to govern his imagination by a fixed text and a correct declamation. With the appearance of the four weird women, the composition assumes a more decided and important character. Not only the dryness and hopelessness of want, guilt, care and distress are given in a few powerful strokes, but also Faust's resistance, the conquering power of his spiritual activity, his will and noble bearing, enchants the interest of the hearer. Individual words of Goethe, full of meaning, which exist throughout Germany as golden monuments of his genius, have been interpreted by Schumann with a noble pathos.

After the eminently truthful dying scene: "Die Uhr steht still, der Zeiger fällt," we have the most powerful, and, undoubtedly, the richest scene of all—"The Glorification," an elaborate and intricate commingling of choruses and solos, which in their soaring to the highest and purest regions, certainly present a more grateful subject for a musical genius of the first order. We may doubt, indeed, that Schumann has been completely successful, inasmuch as the church element, which Goethe here expressed in certain places does not attain that peculiar fine character without which we could not well imagine the Anchores, the Blessed Boys, the Angels, the Pater Profundus, Pater Searaphicus, Dr. Marianus, the Mater gloriosa, &c., &c. On the other hand, the expressions of the human, and the absolution of the penitent, are beautiful and pathetic compositions.

* So much the worse for the "fastidious" Parisians!—Ed.

The audience evinced a greater interest, a deeper appreciation than we had expected, and they gave many marks of approval to distinguish the performance of the orchestra and Herr Stockhausen. The general effect of the Faust music has neither a completely overcoming, nor, indeed, a very powerful character; we would not, however, notwithstanding certain wants and deficiencies, be suspected of being opposed to this work of Schumann's; on the contrary, we think that it contains so much of the really beautiful, the attractive and charming, that a circle of appreciative hearers cannot fail to be highly excited by the exquisite pleasure which they experience.

TURIN.—Among the new operas produced in Italy during the past year were: Rienzi, by Peri, Milan; Feruccio, by Maglioni, Florence; Cincica Sismondi, by Bridangali, Assisi; Zaira, by Corona, Leghorn; Piccard Donati, by Masenza, Leghorn; Beatrice Cenci, by Rota, Parma; Vittoria, by Bona, Genoa; Ivanhoe, by an unknown composer, Bastia; Orio Soranzo, Zescevic, Trieste; Il Di di Micheli, by Quarenghi, Milan; Rienzi, by Raschperoff, Florence; Giovanna di Castilia, by Battista; La Fidanzata di Marco Bozzari, by Frontini, Catania; Ezzelino da Romano, by Naberasco, Genoa; Profugghi Fiamminghi, by Faccio, Milan; Il Riapimento, by Pincherle, Perugia; and Ladislao, by Pisano, Florence. How many works of merit are there among these operas, and how many will ever be heard beyond the limits of Italy?

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, FEB. 20, 1864.

Concerts.

MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB. The club had the valuable assistance of Mr. B. J. LANG as pianist for their third Thursday evening, Feb. 4. The attendance was large and the attention never flagged, for it was a fine programme that was under discussion.

1. Quintet in C, No. 19, op. 44. . . . . Onslow.
Introduction, Lento and Allegro spiritoso—Andante con moto quasi Allegretto.
2. Quartet in B minor, for Piano, Violin, Viola and 'Cello.
Allegro molto—Andante—Allegro molto—Finale, Allegro vivace. . . . . Mendelssohn.
3. Adagio for clarinet, op. 214. . . . . Reisinger.
4. (a) Agitato in A minor, op. 15. . . . . Schülhoff.
(b) Slumber Song in D flat, op. 81. . . . . Heller.
5. Quartet in F, op. 59, No. 1. . . . . Beethoven.
Allegro—Allegretto vivace e sempre scherzando—Adagio molto e mesto—Allegro, theme Russo.

We were never partial to Onslow's music; despite its clear and sound musicianship it has too often failed to quicken. (His very name, were one inclined to pun, suggests the criticism). Rather heavy, rather slow, not in respect of tempo, but of spirit, live originality and force. A certain unexceptionable respectability of talent and of culture, the very orthodoxy of genteel musical classicism, with perfect ease of musical deportment; all which commands respect, but may be tedious. More tedious, however, to the listener than to the performer. There is much music which one likes to play, or to take social part in playing, though he would seldom care to hear it; and we do not wonder when we hear amateur violinists, and professionals too, speak of the pleasure they have in playing together the Quintets of Onslow. The writing is all so musician-like and clear, the parts are so well individualized, the unity so well preserved, the chords sit so well upon the strings, while euphony goes so hand in hand with polyphonic development, that it is interesting, exciting and rewarding to them. Then again, these Quintets derive a new interest from the fact that their author (born in France in 1784, of English parentage, died 1853) had learned music merely as a gentleman's accomplishment, and took to composition rather late in life; and, above all, that these Quintets were written for private practice and evening entertainment in his own family: a guaranty that they were at least sincere works, and not made to order from the vulgar motive of display or gain. The selection given us this time, we must say, agreeably disappointed us; we found it full of charm and beauty, never for a moment tedious or indifferent, but really appetizing, as we have often found a cheerful work of father Haydn at the beginning of such a feast. After what has been said it will readily be understood that it was played con amore and right well.

The old "Rasoumofsky" Quartet was more wonderful than ever; and so it will always seem, however often one may hear it; it cannot be played too often; we could wish indeed that the Club might keep on and perfect themselves in the rendering of one such piece of pure gold, for the interest of the audience would keep increasing in the same ratio. Of course we might say the same of either of the three Quartets in this set, as well as of all the so-called "posthumous" ones. It was a good thing to end a concert with; one walked home with the feeling of a well-spent evening.

The Mendelssohn Quartet in B minor must be one of the earliest happy inspirations of the boy Felix, his opus 3, according to Julius Rietz, composed in 1824, two years earlier than the "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture. Truly a wonderful work for a boy; as full of charming and surprising thoughts, and skilful, genial mastery of means, as it is of difficulties of execution. These were admirably surmounted by Mr. Lang and his associates, and the whole work produced a fine impression. Mr. Lang's brace of piano-forte pieces were nicely rendered and very acceptable, especially the charming Slumber Song by Heller, which had to be repeated. Mr. RYAN gave us a new and not uninteresting piece for his clarinet solo, which he played with his usual skill.

ORCHESTRAL UNION. The Music Hall was crowded again at the fourth Wednesday Afternoon Concert, and everybody appeared pleased, as usual. One very encouraging symptom we have remarked this season in the audiences—or is it that we have been so very lucky in location?—there has been much less disturbance from idle chatter, fewer signs of inattention any way. All through the Symphony your neighbors helped you listen, they listening respectfully and pleased. It was not so once! We almost fear to mention it, lest it should break the spell. The programme was conformed to the pattern followed in the three preceding concerts, which we think a very good one:

1. Overture to "Der Freischütz". . . . . C. M. von Weber
2. { a Organ Introduction.
b Offertoire in F Major. . . . . Wely.
3. Symphony No. 2, in D. . . . . Beethoven
4. Performance on the Organ.
{ The First Commandment. From "Mt. Sinai". . . . . Neukomm
Andante Maestoso. . . . . Spohr
{ Aria Soave. From "Songs without Words". . . . . Mendelssohn
5. Grand Concert Waltz—"Thermon". . . . . Strauss
6. Potpourri from the Opera "Faust". . . . . Gounod

The sterling Overture and Symphony are too familiar to need any words; they enchained the audience even as sketched out by the small orchestra:—how would it be if we had three or four times as many strings! Dr. TUCKERMAN took his turn this time at the Organ, and "developed its resources" under a variety of phases. His "Introduction" was a short and serious strain of harmony, in which he illustrated the use of the great Crescendo pedal, rolling up the volume of tone from the softest single stop (Dolce), by gradual accession of new groups of stops, to the full power of the whole organ, and diminishing again. The Offertoire by Wely was one of the more dignified of that light and showy French kind. The majesty and richness of full organ tone told well in the "Mt. Sinai" piece, showing that those great 32-foot pipes are not for vain show merely. The Andante by Spohr was sweetly sung on soft and witching stops; in the Lied of Mendelssohn he took occasion to make special exhibition of the Vox Humana, Concert Flute and Gamba. The former was more suggestive of some queer sort of human voice than at any former time when we have heard it. Such curiosities of course please the fancy of a popular audience the first time; but they are of little worth in any really musical, artistic point of view. The Concert Flute of this Organ we all know to be the most liquid, clear, bright, musical flute tone that can be imagined; and the Gamba, as indeed all its many stops of the Gamba or violin kind, has more of the searching stringy quality, than almost any that we ever heard.—The "Faust" potpourri has become a standing item on the bill of fare during the reign of this last operatic favorite.

Fifth Concert. What a day for the butterflies! No wonder if they stayed in their warm homes and did not try to flutter over to the Music Hall through such a cutting, icy, furious wind, with the thermometer suddenly dropped to zero, after a whole winter flattering us with summer smiles, especially on Wednesdays. Of course the Hall this time was not crowded; and yet there was an audience that would have been accounted large a year ago, when Wednesday always brought bad weather. The serious substance of the programme (the three first pieces) was not only fine but new to nearly all of us—by us we do not mean the butterflies, who, as we have said already, could not come, any more than cherubs can sit down; none could come but such as carry weight, and therefore on this windy day there was a good chance for the lovers of what the butterflies and their friends the critics (crickets) call "heavy" music. But the concert was not "heavy", and the audience listened well and actually applauded a Bach fugue.

First came an overture by Mendelssohn, which had not been played here for twelve years, called Heimkehr aus der Fremde, or "Return from Abroad." It was written in his very youthful days, for a family festival, the "silver wedding" of his parents (1829), and first publicly performed in 1851 in Leipzig. It is a simple, graceful, fervent, lively composition, in which you can hardly fail to recognize the germ of the first movement of the "Italian" Symphony; the themes, the coloring, the treatment continually recall that; it is in the same vein, only not so fully worked. Of course it was relished.—Then Mr. LANG played a good sterling Prelude and Fugue in C, by Bach, one which we have not had before, and played it well and won applause. Listening to it, the genius loci became organ-like, the Organ looked instinct with life, looked permanent and real in its grandeur, and not like a piece of scenic effect theatrically vouchsafed by the withdrawing of a green curtain.—The symphony was one in B flat, by the Danish composer Gade, given for the first time here, and consisting of four movements: 1. Introduction and Allegro molto; 2. Andante; 3. Scherzo; 4. Finale, Allegro. It is truly a beautiful symphony, in a vein resembling Mendelssohn, but feebler and more vague. The Scherzo is quite happy and original. How came we to forget our purpose of translating (whenever Gade should be performed) Mendelssohn's letters to him on the receipt and trial of his first symphony! No praise could be more cordial and unqualified. But we hope to have this Symphony again. The rest of the programme consisted of the Adagio and Allegretto from Rink's Organ Concerto in F (with flute solo); the Turkish March from a Sonata by Mozart, arranged for orchestra by Thomas Ryan; and the "Faust" potpourri as usual.

GREAT ORGAN. Mr. B. J. LANG's Sacred Concert, on Sunday evening before last, was one of the most successful, both in the large attendance and the amount and quality of musical enjoyment. One of the few organ concerts which was not, and which did not seem, too long. We found much in it to admire, and little to regret, unless it were the solemn repetition of that puerile green curtain business, for which we presume the concert-giver was not answerable. These were his selections:

1. Fantasia in G (with full Organ). Bach
2. "Jerusalem, thou that killest," from St. Paul. Mendelssohn
3. Religious Meditation, for Violin and Organ. Eichberg
4. a. Fugue on Bach. Schumann
5. b. Pastoral Symphony, (Transcribed). Handel
6. Song—"O quam Suavia." Mendelssohn
7. "Gloria in Excelsis," from Second Mass. Mozart
8. Trio, for Violin, Piano and Organ. Bach and Gounod
9. Song. In praise of the Organ, from the "Ode to St. Cecilia." Handel
10. "If with all your hearts," from "Elijah." Mendelssohn
11. Hallelujah Chorus. Handel

The soul and substance of that Fantasia of Bach reside in the Adagio, which Mr. Lang has played once before, and which is very noble, rich and deep. But we were glad to hear it for once with the short skirmishing arpeggios with which Bach has seen fit to prelude and postlude to it. In few things could the musically blended masses of full organ tone tell with more majesty and beauty. Schumann's Fugue, with the notes Bb, A, C, H (B natural) for its subject, still grows upon one. For a Vox humana illustration, Mr. Lang changed his plan and wrought into a Fantasia frame the prayer from the Freyschütz, and a Quartet from "Eli." It was cleverly done and much applauded; but it was scarcely worth the doing. Contrary to our expectation, the effect of violin with organ was very beautiful. Mr. EICHBERG played it in a chaste and noble manner, and the composition of his own seemed worthy of such interpretation. The little Prelude by Bach (the first in the "Well-tempered Clavichord"), begun by Mr. Lang simply as Bach wrote it on the piano, the violin entering later with Gounod's melody, and then the Organ (delicately managed by Mr. WILLCOX) stealing in with low under-tones and swelling to a climax, seemed really illustrated by this exceptional treatment. It had to be repeated. Miss HOUSTON sang her three choice selections finely, though the St. Cecilia song seemed less effective out of its connection with the whole Ode. That song by Mendelssohn we certainly should never have imagined to be his; it has so little of the family likeness; we should sooner have guessed Cherubini, or some other of the nobler Catholic composers. But it was interesting.

Mr. W. EUGENE THAYER took his turn on a Friday instead of a Sunday evening, making his concert secular,—perhaps to accommodate a "Thunder Storm," for which some have long been calling, who seemed to think they had not really heard the organ so long as it had not achieved that miracle. They talked mysteriously of Freyberg, and the wonderful reports of travellers (musical ones?), and even hinted doubts of the competency of our organists to "bring the Organ out" or "develop its resources;" shall we not have to get a man from Europe, a real storm-king? Well, we shall see. Mr. Thayer's programme was this:

1. Grande Marche, from "Alceste." Gluck
2. Andante and Maestoso. Mendelssohn
3. Aria. O mio Fernando. Donizetti
4. Offertoire, for Vox humana. Battiste
5. Vire Tu, from "Anna Bolena." Bellini
6. Toccata and Fugue in D minor. Bach
7. Orage Fantasia—(Thunder Storm). Battiste
8. Aria. Che farò. Gluck
9. Andante, from Fifth Symphony. Beethoven
10. Duet, from "Faust." Gounod
11. American National Hymn, (Varied for Organ). W. E. Thayer

Well, the "Storm," with all its pedal thunder, and its murmuring, rushing, whistling winds, its clearing off, bird songs, &c., and even with the gas* turned down (!), did not produce a very great sensation. No fault of the player; but the thing itself, the composition, was not only weak and cheap, but unexciting. We trust the seekers for a sign, those who go out to see "a read shaken by the wind," are satisfied; or must we still send for a Freyberg magician? Mr. Thayer played the Toccata and Fugue of Bach clearly and evenly, and if it was not more applauded than the "Storm," it did stir the souls of music-loving earnest people. The march by Gluck sounded nobly. In the movements from the Mendelssohn Sonata in G, quite original combinations of stops were used, and to good advantage. "O mio Fernando" was an odd thing to introduce into an organ concert; "Che furo," from Orpheus, was much better. The singing was all creditable. A lesson might be drawn from a comparison of the methods of the two singers. Mr. WHEELER has the art of reserving force of voice against the right time; he is looking forward while he shapes his tones. Miss RYAN rather spends all in the present moment; there is a stress of voice on almost every tone, which becomes painful after a time, destroying the elasticity of the whole piece by too frequent emphasis; there should be more withheld, kept in the shade; in song, as in all human efforts, nothing is done finely unless it convey a sense of reserved power. The lovers' duet in "Faust" was sung with delicate expression, and encored. The accompaniments were played on a piano-forte by Mr. HAMANN.

Last Sunday evening Mr. WILLCOX, urged to repeat his concert of Catholic music, gave a second, with a programme varied, for the better, and was again honored by a very large attendance.

- Part I.
1. Offertoire, in C minor. Battiste
2. Chorus. "Credo," from the "Imperial Mass." Haydn
3. Bass Song. "The Battle Prayer." Himmel
4. Chorus. "Kyrie Eleison," from Mass in G. Weber
5. Song. "But the Lord is mindful of his own." Mendelssohn
6. Chorus. "Ave verum." Mozart
7. Soprano Solo and Chorus. "Benedictus"—16th Mass. Haydn
- Part II.
1. Organ. Improvisation. J. H. Willcox
2. Tenor Solo and Chorus. "Ave verum." Falkenstein
3. Song. "I will extol Thee, O Lord," from "Eli." Costa
4. Organ. "Offertoire" in G. Lefebvre Wely
5. Baritone Song. "God everywhere." Lachner
6. Duet. "Ave Maria." Mozart
7. Choral Motet. "Insanis et vana cura." Haydn

The Organ never seemed in better condition and sounded superbly, especially in accompaniment. Mr. Willcox was particularly happy in his improvisation this time. The choruses were sung by the choir of the Church of the Immaculate Conception, and with fine effect. The best of all was the Ave verum corpus by Mozart, that pure and noble piece of harmony; but the selections from Haydn were of the best to be found in that composer's warm, luxurious masses. The piece by Falkenstein, an organist in a Catholic Church in this city, showed a clever hand and feeling for this kind of music. The solo singers all made an excellent impression.

A series of Saturday Organ Concerts is the newest institution, inaugurated last Saturday Afternoon at 4 o'clock, and to be continued every week indefinitely. Their peculiarity is, that they are to be limited to one hour in length, the price, the character of programmes, and all else, remaining the same as usual. Let this custom be kept up without faltering, whether the audience be large or small, (and let the price be brought down as soon as it shall be thought fit), and it will henceforth enter into the calculations of strangers visiting our city not to miss the chance of hearing the Great Organ on a Saturday afternoon.

We lament that we have not any room to do justice to the magnificent Organ built by the Messrs. HOOK, for the Church of the Immaculate Conception, nor to record the interesting inauguration by Mr. Willcox and his choir, by which thousands were delighted, on the evening of the third inst. For the sake of giving a more adequate description, we prefer to wait until our next issue.

New Publications.

"BUCK'S MOTETTE COLLECTION." This is the rather awkward title of a variety of pieces of considerable length, some thirty in number, "suited to the opening and close of divine worship," some composed, some arranged, some selected, by DUDLEY BUCK, JR., organist of the North Congregational Church in Hartford, Conn.

The book smacks of a Leipsic culture; its author, we believe, studied there. This appears in the numerous selections from composers of the Leipsic school: thus four excellent pieces by Hauptmann, others by Richter, Julius Rietz, &c. This is good stuff to draw from. It appears also in Mr. Buck's own contributions, a dozen in number, which are elaborately written, with more or less of counterpoint and fugue, and with regular organ accompaniments with a pedal part, sometimes difficult; judging from a hasty glance there is good matter in them. There are also contributions from half a dozen other American organists and choir-leaders, some of which "look well." Among the other selections and arrangements we notice a beautiful Benedictus from one of Mozart's Masses; a part of a Requiem by Cherubini; the wonderful chorus of prisoners enjoying the air, from Beethoven's Fidelio—certainly religious enough; a Magnificat by Haydn; the chaste and lovely wedding chorus from Rossini's "Tell"; one of Beethoven's "Six Sacred Songs" arranged in four parts; the Lord's Prayer by Meyerbeer; one or two pieces by Mendelssohn, &c. These cover a variety of sentiments and subjects; they are Motets, not in the strict old sense of the word, but so-called, we suppose, for want of a better general term for sacred pieces of some length for a choir, not always fitly defined by the term "Anthem." Some of Mr. B.'s own pieces, however, do conform pretty nearly to one of the old Motet forms.

We are sure there is a great deal of beautiful and useful music in this book; and very few of the pieces have been used in similar collections before; so that it opens a fresh stock to our more enterprising choirs, and one which they will not soon exhaust. Perhaps upon closer acquaintance we shall have more to say of it. Ditson & Co. publish it.

"DR. A. B. MARX'S GENERAL MUSICAL INSTRUCTION." In this handsome octavo of 140 pages, Ditson & Co. give us a reprint of a very desirable book, hitherto locked up in a more expensive English edition. Dr. Marx, of Berlin, is the most philosophical and thorough-going of all the theoretic writers upon music. Here we have a popular abstract and summary of his great work the "Compositions-Lehre." Briefly, clearly and wisely, it maps out and explains the whole field of musical education, touching upon everything, from the first rudiments of scales and rhythm to the highest art of fugue and counterpoint; defining all the forms of composition, from a simple melody, a chorale, to a Sonata, a Symphony, an Oratorio; and all the instruments, of each class, even to a full orchestral score. It is good to get this matter all so well laid out, by so eminent an authority, even in the brief hints of such an abstract. It will teach you how to go to work to learn more.

CONCERTS AT HAND. This afternoon at 4 o'clock the SATURDAY ORGAN CONCERT in the Music Hall.

Tomorrow evening the HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY will perform Costa's "Eli." (first time since 1857), with good soloists, grand chorus, orchestra, and the Great Organ, ZERRAHL conducting.

In next Wednesday's ORCHESTRAL UNION concert, the organ will be played by Mrs. FRODOCK, who has won an honorable distinction in the West, as Miss Tillinghast, by her performance of the highest classical organ music, including the Fugues, Toccatas, Trio Sonatas, &c. of Bach. The Symphony will be Mendelssohn's "Italian."

Next Saturday evening, at Chickering's, Mr. EICHBERG gives the first of his two Orchestral Soirées. His select orchestra will play a Symphony by Haydn (in E flat); Overture to Preisosa; Beethoven's 1st Symphony, and the Allegretto from his 8th.

NEW YORK.—The third Philharmonic Concert wore a very "future" or "new school" complexion. Liszt's "Faust" Symphony occupied the first part, being given here for the first time. It consists of three movements: 1. Allegro, answering to "Faust;" 2. Andante, "Gretchen;" 3. Scherzo and Finale, with solo and chorus for male voices, "Mephistopheles." The "Arion Society" sang the chorus, and Herr Quint (Sig. Quinto) the tenor solo. The work had the advantage of Carl Bergmann's able direction, as did the rest of the concert, and seems to have pleased many; the Musical Review is even enthusiastic about it and thinks the motivo that portrays Gretchen as beautiful as any of the melodies in Beethoven's Adagios! Part II. comprised the Introduction to Wagner's Lohengrin; a chorus for male voice, "Treue Liebe," by Esser; a Lied, "To the storm," by Evers, sung by Herr Joseph Hermanns; and Weber's Euryanthe overture. "Mr. H. C. Timm presided at the organ," whatever that may mean.

In Messrs. MASON and THOMAS's third soirée of chamber music, three sterling and by no means too familiar compositions formed the whole programme. 1. String Quartet in F, (op 41, No. 2,) by Schumann; 2. Posthumous Sonata, for piano, in C minor, by Schubert (first time); 3. No. 1 of the "Rasoumoffski" Quartets (op. 59, in F,) by Beethoven (the same which our Mendelssohn Quintette Club gave us last time). The performers were William Mason, piano; Theodore Thomas, first violin; J. Mosenthal, second violin; G. Matzka, violin; and F. Bergner, violoncello. In their first soirée, this season these artists played: Quartet No. 2 (D minor), Mozart; Sonata in F sharp minor, op. 11, Schumann; Quintet in C, op. 29, Beethoven. In the second soirée: Quartet in B flat, Haydn; Sonata in A minor, op. 105, Schumann; Quartet in E flat, op. 127, Beethoven. Their audiences may be congratulated on such programmes.

Mr. ALFRED H. PEASE, a young American pianist, who has been studying in Berlin under Hans von Bülow and Kullak, gave his first concert last week, and won much praise for his executive ability. Pieces by modern writers for the piano are expected to enter largely into his programmes. This time he played two of Liszt's transcriptions: the March in Tannhäuser and "Rigoletto," and two pieces by Raff. He had the assistance of several singers, Mrs. Van Zandt, and Messrs. J. R. Thomas, Himmer and Abella, who sang songs by Schubert, Mendelssohn, Bellini, and one or two English ones.

The German Opera Company (ANSCHUTZ) have gone to Philadelphia, after giving with variable success Martha, Stradella, Fidelio, La Dame Blanche, Faust, Tannhäuser, and Nicolai's "Merry Wives of Windsor."

MARETZKE has secured BRIGNOLI, who was to appear this week in I Puritani. Also a Miss HOSMER, "a young girl about the age and size of Adelina Patti," and a voice said to be equal to Patti's, of English birth, a pupil of Manjocchi, was to make her debut at the Academy in Lucia.

HARRISON's English Opera troupe are playing alternately in Brooklyn and New York. Fra Diavolo is announced, after which it is said that they will come to Boston. The basso, J. R. Thomas, has been added to the troupe.

Mr. JOHN K. PAINE gave a fine organ-concert last week at St. George's Church, with a good programme.

Mr. Paine, in his two visits to New York, has been warmly welcomed by the more serious musicians and amateurs.

The committee having in charge the Musical Department of the great Metropolitan Sanitary Fair, of which Mr. WM. SCHARFENBERG is chairman, are vigorously at work, and have already instituted, among other plans, a series of private concerts for the benefit of the Fair. The first took place on Saturday, the 6th, when Messrs. Scharfenberg, Joseph Burke and Bergmann played a Trio of Mendelssohn, and Mrs. Kempton, Miss Simons, Mrs. Wilson, Messrs. Centemeri, R. Hoffman, and the German "Männer-Quartet," assisted.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.—One of the most enterprising of the young knights of harmony, who rarely lets himself be lost sight of during the musical campaign, is thus gazetted by the Brooklyn Union of the 25th ult.

Mr. Jerome Hopkins gave his first Piano Matinée on Saturday, at the Aquarial Hall, to an audience by far the most fashionable and numerous ever seen within the walls of that pretty and tasteful salle de concert. Not only was every seat filled, but after all the stools and chairs were called into requisition, several ladies quietly and sensibly sat upon the edge of the stage platform, while numbers stood up throughout a good part of the performance. The concert consisted entirely of the playing, and in a good measure of the compositions of the young virtuoso, whose versatility was exhibited in music of such opposite schools as the Fugues by Bach and Cherubini—probably the most difficult and classical music ever written—and mazurkas of Chopin, certainly as curious, not to say grotesque. The famous fantasia, for one hand alone, was also on the programme, and was loudly applauded, as were likewise Mr. Hopkins's own compositions, the "Don Pasquale" Fantasia "Il Trovatore," and the ever popular "Pearl Drops." The proverbial memory of this pianist was fully exhibited in the performance of this entire programme of fourteen pieces without a note of music before him!

PHILADELPHIA. ERNST HARTMANN, a pianist much admired in refined circles, has changed his purpose of leaving Philadelphia and will make it his home. His second matinée (postponed by severe illness) took place Feb. 6th, in the Foyer of the Academy of Music, when he performed, unassisted, the following programme: Liszt's "Schiller March"; Chopin's Prelude in D flat and Etude in G flat; two Songs without Words by Mendelssohn; Liszt's Campanella de Paganini; Romanza by Schumann, and Tarantella by Heller; Chopin's Polonaise in A flat.

The German Opera (Anschutz) reopened at the Academy on the 8th inst., with a "large and elegant audience." The Bulletin says:

Nicolai's opera, The Merry Wives of Windsor, was admirably performed—much better than it was last year. The advantage of having a first class basso and a first class tenor was manifest. Herr Hermanns, who played "Falstaff," is much the finest basso that the German company has ever given us. He sang excellently well, and looked and acted the fat knight to perfection. Habelmann sang deliciously in the rôle of "Fenton," while Steinecke, as "Mr. Flath" (the "Ford" of Shakspeare,) was admirable in all respects. Mmes. Johanneßen and Frederici were both good as the merry wives, and Mlle. Canissa as "Sweet Ann Page" did better than she has done in other operas. The audience seemed to enjoy the performance from beginning to end.

La Dame Blanche was performed in admirable style, and its charming melodies gave great delight. Mme. Frederici looked and sang beautifully. Her lovely ballad, sung at the spinning wheel, was heartily applauded. Mlle. Canissa, as "Jenny," did her best, but that is not very good. Mr. Hermanns was excellent as "Gaveston." The great part of the opera is that of "George Brown," and in this Mr. Habelmann appeared to great advantage. His first cavatina, best known by its French words, "Ah quel plaisir d'être soldat," was sung brilliantly, and in the last scene, where the quaint air of "Robin Adair" is introduced, he was remarkably effective. The concerted pieces of the opera were well done, and one delicious trio was encored. The orchestra was excellent as usual. La Dame Blanche will always draw well when Habelmann is the tenor.

Next came Wagner's Tannhäuser, new to the Philadelphians, about which the local critics differ and seem sadly puzzled. One says: "Judging from the number who left after the second act, it was a relief when Wagner's future music became a thing of the past." Spohr's Jessonda was to be given on Monday for the first time in America. The prospect also contains another work by Flotow, Indra, besides Gounod's Faust, of course.

CARL FORMES is again in this country; will Anschutz seize upon him? or will he Italianize himself?

CARL WOLFSOHN's second soirée was well attended. The programme was, as follows:

Sonata, (in D major) Piano and 'cello..... Mendelssohn
Messrs. Wolfsohn and Ahrend.
Song—"Widmung"..... R. Schumann
Herr Habelmann.
Solo Piano—"Faust"..... Wolfsohn
C. Wolfsohn.
Song—"Moorish Serenade"..... Kücken
Quintet—(E Flat).
Piano and wind Instruments..... Beethoven

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Glory immortal, and deathless fame. (O gloria cinto d'allor,) "Faust"

Here we have the music of the Soldier's Chorus, arranged as a song. As a large proportion of the original consists of unison passages, this is but little different from the other. Good for treble or tenor voices, and sounds well with a unison chorus.

The waves were dancing lightly. Barcarole.

F. Kücken.

A pretty song, with a simple melody, and an artistic and very sweet accompaniment. The words by Linley.

Slumber song. (Schlummerlied). F. Kücken.

The melody more varied and striking than the above. Very gentle and soothing. Both songs are of a high order. This one has German and English words.

Bury me in the sunshine. (Last words of Archbishop Hughes). J. W. Turner. 25

A pleasing sentiment, acceptable to all who take a cheerful view of death. The music is perfectly appropriate to the words.

If I sleep will mother come. Ballad. H. W. Luther. 25

One of the sweet little ballads elicited by events in the war. A young soldier, very near his last hour, and longing, as most young soldiers do, for "mother," and her soothing ministrations, falls asleep with the opening words of the song on his lips. But he soon passes to the sleep that knows no waking. Buy it for your collection of war songs.

O gloria. Quartet and Chorus from Faust.

E. Bruce.

The famous Soldier's Chorus once more, but arranged for four singers or a chorus. Italian and English words.

Instrumental Music.

The village maid. (Du Mädchen vom Lande)

Field flowers. Th. Oesten. Op. 128. 25

Another of the simple and unpretending Kornblumen, or "field flowers." Fits easily to the fingers in playing, and a good piece for learners.

Preciosa. (Bouquet de Melodies. No. 57).

F. Beyer.

Some of the choicest airs of the above opera, combined and connected in Beyer's well-known style. Of medium difficulty, and excellent for practice.

Off in the still night. Variations. J. S. Drake. 50

The old melody made new, by placing it in five sharps and accompanying with artistic variations.

Troubadour et Chateleine. Blumenthal. 60

Difficult. Of high character.

Books.

Lenhart's Elements of Music. A clear and systematic arrangement of rules for the piano-forte. To which are added, Burrowes' Guide to Practice, and Czerny's Celebrated Letters on the Art of Playing the Piano-forte. 40

A very "handy" book for teachers with young pupils, who are very apt to forget, and need a text book. These "rules" are given in very clear language, and the author, having the use of previous "catechisms," has improved, to some extent, on them all.

Czerny's letters are most valuable for a pupils' reading, and the Guide to Practice a good one.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 598.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MARCH 5, 1864.

VOL. XXIII. No. 25.

Translated for this Journal.

From Mendelssohn's Letters.

TO FANNY HENSEL IN BERLIN.

Leipzig, Jan. 13, 1843.

.... Yesterday we rehearsed a new Symphony by a Dane, named Gade, which we mean to bring out in the course of the next month, and which has delighted me more than any other piece for a long time. He has a great, a remarkable talent, and I wish that you might hear this altogether peculiar, very earnest, and well-sounding Danish Symphony. I write him a few lines to-day, although I know nothing at all of him, farther than that he lives in Copenhagen, and is 26 years old. But I must thank him for the pleasure; for really there scarcely is a better one, than to hear fine music, and to wonder more and more with every bar, and yet feel more at home. Ah! if it only did not come so seldom! ..

TO N. W. GADE, MUSICAL ARTIST IN COPENHAGEN.

Leipzig, Jan. 13, 1843.

HONORED SIR:—We had yesterday the first rehearsal of your Symphony in C minor, and, although I am personally quite unknown to you, I cannot resist the wish to address you, in order to tell you what extraordinary pleasure you have caused me through your excellent work, and how heartily grateful I am to you for the great enjoyment which it has afforded me. No piece for a long time has made a livelier or more beautiful impression on me, and, as I wondered more and more with every bar, and yet felt more at home, it became a necessity with me to-day to express to you my thanks for so much joy, to tell you how high I place your noble talent, how eager this Symphony, the only thing which I yet know of you, makes me to see your earlier and later things. And since I hear that you are still so young, it is to the later that I can look with especial joy,—for them I hail firm hopes in so beautiful a work;—and for them I thank you now already, as well as for the enjoyment I had yesterday.

We shall make still more rehearsals of the Symphony, and bring it out in three or four weeks. The parts were so full of errors, that we have got first to look them through together and have several of them newly copied; and then probably it will not go like a new thing, but like a thing familiar and dear to the whole orchestra. Indeed that was already the case yesterday, and among us musicians there was but one voice. Still it must go so, that every one may hear it. Herr Raymond Härtel told me, there was some talk of your coming here yourself in the course of the winter. I would that might be the case, and that I might then express or prove to you my gratitude and my high esteem better and more clearly by word of mouth, than mere written words can do it! But whether we become acquainted now or not, I pray you ever to regard me as one, who will follow all your works with love and sympathy, and to whom the meeting with an artist like yourself, and with a work of Art like your C minor Symphony, will always be the greatest and most heartfelt joy.

Your devoted,

FELIX MENDELSSOHN BARTHOLDY.

TO N. W. GADE, IN COPENHAGEN.

Leipzig, March 2, 1843.

HONORED SIR:—Yesterday in our 18th subscription concert your C minor Symphony was performed for the first time, to the lively, undivided delight of the whole public, breaking out into the loudest applause after each of the four movements. After the Scherzo there was a real excitement among the people, and it seemed as if there would be no end to the jubilation and the hand-clapping; so too after the Adagio—so too after the last movement—and after the first—after all in fact! To see the musicians so unanimous, the public so in raptures, the performance so successful—that was as great a joy to me, as if I had made the work myself! Or even greater; for in one's own one always sees the faults, the non-successful parts the clearest, whereas in your work I feel nothing at all but joy over all the glorious beauties.

Last evening has made the whole Leipzig public, that really loves music, your lasting friend; henceforth no one will speak of your name and your work otherwise than with the heartiest respect; and every one of your future works will be received with open arms, immediately studied with the utmost care, and hailed with joy by all the friends of music here.

"The man who wrote the last half of the Scherzo, is an excellent master, and from him we have the right to expect the greatest and most glorious works:"—that was the universal voice last evening in our orchestra, in the whole hall,—and we are not changeable people here. So you have gained for yourself by your work a great crowd of friends for life; go on and fulfill our wishes and our hopes, by writing many, many works in the same kind, of the same beauty, and help to give a new life to our beloved art, for which Heaven has given you all that it can give.

Besides the rehearsal, of which I had written you before, we had had within these last days two others, and, save a few slight and unimportant errors, the Symphony went with a life and an inspiration, from which alone one could already see how delighted we musicians all are with it. I hear that Kistner is to publish it; allow me the question, whether the superscription of the first introduction in 6-4 measure, which afterwards returns, might not lead to misunderstandings? It stands there, if I am not mistaken, Moderato e sostenuto. Instead of this sostenuto should not something like con moto or con molto di moto be engraved? The former superscription would (as it seems to me) lead to the right tempo, if it were 6-8 instead of 6-4 measure; but in 6-4 one is so very much accustomed to count off the single quarters heavily or slowly, that I imagine the movement would be taken too slow, as it indeed happened with me in the first rehearsal, until I kept no longer to the notes and superscription, but only to the sense. And since so many musicians cleave so fast to just these superscriptions, I wanted at least to express to you my doubts in this regard.

Receive my thanks, too, for your dear letter, and for the friendly purpose which you announce to me in it.* But still more I thank you for the joy that you have caused me through the work itself. Believe me, no one can follow your career with more sympathy, or anticipate your further labors with more hopes and greater love, than your respectfully devoted,

FELIX MENDELSSOHN BARTHOLDY.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Half a dozen of Beethoven's Contemporaries.

II. ANTONIO SALIERI.

[Continued from page 187.]

Let him go on composing and disobeying his master for a time, while we endeavor to put ourselves into the time and place in which the youth so singularly found himself, instead of being among Italians enjoying the exquisite beauties of Naples, and the musical advantages then so numerous there.

Maria Theresa lost her husband—Emperor Francis I.—Aug. 18, 1765, and never entered the theatre but once afterward, at the performance of Didot's "Father of a Family," in 1771. The Imperial theatres remained closed after Francis's death some eight months, during which divers changes were determined upon and effected by the new Emperor of Germany, Joseph II., who also shared with his mother the administration of the hereditary dominions.

The French troop of actors was dismissed, to the great dissatisfaction of the court-theatre public, the management by the Court given up, and the two theatres—that near the "Kärnthner Thor" (Carinthian gate) and that attached to the Burg (the Palace)—were leased. Of the excessively low condition of the spoken drama at that time in Vienna, and how through the influence of French actors and English dramas it rose to be the first in Germany, it is not in our way to speak. Suffice it, that there were three parties, one for extemporized plays, i. e., the plan of a drama given, the dialogue extemporized by the actors—a second for regular pieces, and the third for a French company. The lessee, Hilverding, opened the houses on Easter Monday, 1776; but gave way very soon to a Mr. Häring and two companions, who in turn transferred them to Affligio, May 10, 1767, who engaged a French troop again.

Joseph II. seems to have labored all his life under the misfortune of a disposition to begin great things and drive them so long as the novelty lasted only; so it was with the founding of a national drama now, and of a national opera some years later; and so the French drama came again upon the boards.

* Gade dedicated the C minor Symphony to Mendelssohn.

"And now a word more upon Joseph the Second." So begins an article in the Speyer Musikalische Correspondenz (July 28, 1790), which article is precisely to the point, and is confirmed by the hundred other authorities which—need not be cited.

"As in many an instance," says our writer, "in the matter of State-economy, he had the ill luck, to be misled by a sort of deceptive polish in the selection of persons who should help him in carrying his noble ideas into practise, precisely so it happened to him in music. If there was any one person in our imperial capital, who prized and loved music, and at the same time understood it, it was he. Every afternoon he enjoyed the pleasure of performing in a little concert with three of his chamber musicians and his chamberlain, Strack, who possessed his master's implicit confidence, and was also a musician. But rarely was the choice of pieces such as it might and ought to have been. You understand what I mean by this. Salieri, our worthy Salieri, it is true, was his idol; but then the position of a Kapellmeister at the head of his orchestra in the opera, is very different from that in the private apartment of his ruler. There he has full liberty of action; but here, where the constellations are very different, it is possible that even a hint from one of his subalterns must be obeyed as a command. But farther, the first violinist in these private concerts of the Emperor was Herr Kriebig—a man created to direct music, and one who has a fine knowledge of its theory, but, to his misfortune as an artist, also a little of a charlatan, perhaps more affected than real. His moral character good, &c., &c. * * * The chamberlain Strack played the violoncello, and had also care of the musical library. It would carry me too far to draw you a picture of the moral character of this man. You know this sort of people, who, as Schiller says, are the makeshifts, where numbers are few, in a moment make themselves seven times short, and seven times long, like a butterfly on a pin, and have to keep a register of their master's —. Enough, Strack was always about Joseph and knew so well how to take advantage of his opportunities, as to be able to do every thing in musical matters, whatever he had a mind to.

"Waborzil, cabinet musician and director in the theatre, a very good violinist, but a most mediocre director. It lies in his character, except when forced by the duties of his place, to do nothing at all for art, and he composes nothing. Hoffmann and Bonnheimer were formerly cabinet musicians in the service of Archduke Maximilian. [Joseph's brother and (1784) Archbishop and Elector of Cologne.]

"On extra occasions Umlauf, who has now the charge of the musical lessons of the royal children [Leopold's Joseph's successor], and whom the Emperor Joseph raised from being a viola player to the place of Kapellmeister, because his opera the "Bergknappen" had the luck to please him wonderfully, notwithstanding it was received by many with but doubtful applause.

"Finally, I mention a certain Krottendorfer, a man who gained Strack's good will by flattery and obeyed his every wish like a puppet.

"All these persons met together only in extraordinary cases. Usually only three of them with Strack and Joseph. The latter took often the piano-forte, often the violoncello, and not seldom a vocal part. Very rarely were quartets played, and when they were, none but such as Kriebig or Strack had recommended as palatable dishes. Why these gentlemen so carefully excluded a Haydn, Mozart, Kozeluch, Pleyel and other fine musicians, together with their works, I leave here unanswered. Enough, that Joseph was not allowed to hear a note of these certainly excellent composers; on the other hand, all the more from such as are not worthy to unloose the lachet of their shoes. The Emperor was fond of the pathetic, and sometimes had music of Gassmann, Ordonez, &c., placed on the stands. Generally, however, favorite passages from serious operas and oratorios were played from the score. Joseph had the fault of greatly enjoying it, when the music went at odds and ends; and the more Kriebig labored, and heated himself, and stormed, the more heartily Joseph laughed. These imperial concerts therefore had often a double object, that of artistic enjoyment and of sport. Kriebig in them played the part, for which in old times it was the custom to appoint a certain class of persons, that of butt for their wit. Kriebig is also really the man to bear a jest and joke, if one does not forget at every stroke to add a few drops of the universal balsam, called flattery.

"This private concert took place daily in the Emperor's own room. It began for the most part immediately after his dinner and lasted until time for the play. If public business interfered, it began later and lasted so much the longer, especially when nothing of interest was given in the theatre. Strack was always present, but the other chamber musicians took turns, three to-day, other three to-morrow. The Emperor visited the theatre very constantly, especially the Italian opera, in which he took great pleasure. Salieri's "Azur, Rè d'Ormus" was his favorite.

"You see that he would have done much for music, if happily he had chosen a different set of musicians. Salieri, no doubt, saw the real state of the case; but as I said before, the relations of a Kapellmeister in the public concert-room are very different from those in the cabinet of a Joseph. Salieri had too much policy to come into collision with the shadows of his Monarch, and the others must hold it a favor to enjoy their positions with the finger on their lips."

It will be noticed that the above was written after Joseph's decease and describes the confirmed habits of his later years. He was born March 13, 1741, and had consequently completed his 25th year, but three months before the boy Salieri was brought to Vienna.

He, like his ancestors, had received a thorough musical education, with a bias to the Italian Operatic School, which as yet had no rival but in the French comic opera, and this rivalry was little felt in Vienna, though a few years later, nay even now, it had the upper hand in North and West Germany, where Paris pieces were translated and given everywhere. Joseph played various instruments well, was a master of singing, and read scores with facility. Another writer says of the private concerts described above, that they followed his dinner, (which he ate alone in his music-room, giving hardly more than fifteen minutes to it) and lasted about an hour, in which he played viola or violoncello, or the piano-forte, in which latter case he sang a part. He took great interest in the opera buffa, selected the pieces to be performed, looked them through in those private concerts with his brother Maximilian, and attended the rehearsals in the theatre.

It was therefore natural that when Affligio took the theatres in hand he should devote himself to the French spoken drama, the ballet and the Italian opera buffa, to the utter neglect of the German stage, for which Joseph's zeal had, for the present, cooled, and which existed, one may almost say, only in the form of local burlesque pieces and farces. With the history of the German spoken drama in Vienna, which soon after began to rise, and in a dozen or fifteen years reached remarkable perfection, we have here nothing to do—not even with the energetic and indefatigable labors of Sonnenfels, a name of high honor in theatrical annals.

Divers changes in the management took place, but in August, 1770, the two theatres came into the hands of Count Kohary, with Franz Heufeld, a dramatic writer of some note, as manager. That such a position was no sinecure, see the following: there was a German and a French company for the spoken drama, an Italian opera, seria and buffa, and a very costly ballet under Noverre. The Italian operas were performed once a week in the Kärnthnerthor house, and twice a week in the Burg. The troop consisted of eight solo-singers men, and seven do. women. The expenses reached 30,275 fl., some $15,000. The serious operas given were not numerous, and confined almost to those of Gluck and, in time, of Salieri; but the lists of performances in those years show comic operas by Galuppi, Gassmann, Guglielmi, Paisiello, Piccini, Salieri, and, by and by, Righini.

Ballets were given daily in both theatres (?); in both Noverre directed, but those of the Burg—the French—far surpassed those in the Kärnthnerthor—German. In the Burg there were five solo female dancers, ten men, ten women, and sixteen pupils in the corps de ballet. The ballet expenses reached 50,000 fl. The two orchestras cost 15,000 fl. Gassmann was Kapellmeister and composer; Starzer composed for the ballets; Trani was director of the orchestra in the Burg, which numbered thirty-one members,—in the other house but twenty-six.

Gluck, at the time of Salieri's advent with Gassmann, had produced but one of the works, which was to live and keep his name alive, when the others above recorded are forgotten, the "Orpheus and Eurydice" (1764); the "Alceste" was however soon to follow. (1768). [The visit of Dr. Burney to Vienna fell in these years (1772), and to those who have access to his "Present State of Music in Germany," I recommend the reading of the last half of Vol. I.

(To be continued.)

Carl Maria Von Weber.

A LIFE PICTURE.

(Continued from page 187.)

Concerning Weber's change of residence from one city to another, after he had left Freiberg with his father: concerning the many events, frequently more saddening than cheerful, of his life—events which have hitherto been for the most part totally unknown; concerning his gradual progress as an artist, &c., we must refer our readers to the book itself, which contains the most truthful and unvarnished account of all these particulars, and is, perhaps, for some persons, here and there, too minute, though it is every where deserving of praise for the strictest conscientiousness, and, even in the slightest details, possesses importance for every thoughtful individual who feels an interest in the education of man by actual life. Weber was now in one place and now in another; in Salzburg, in Eutin, in Augsburg, in Vienna, in Breslau (where he was nearly killed from having swallowed a heavy draught of nitric acid, from a bottle which he mistook in the dark for one containing wine), in Carlsruhe (Silesia), at the Court of Prince Eugen Friedrich von Württemberg; in Stuttgart, as private secretary and managing man to the extravagant and debt-oppressed Duke Ludwig, where he was mixed up in the whirlpool of the Court life at the time, and in the affairs of the country, which were in a wretched state as far as regards right, honesty and morality. He became also involved in foolish acts, the sudden acknowledgment of which, however, produced a beneficial change in his character and mode of life. But happier days dawned for him in Mannheim, Heidelberg, Darmstadt and the neighborhood, except Frankfurt, where his old bad luck still pursued him, his very promising expectations of making a considerable sum by a concert being entirely annihilated, first by the ascent of the celebrated aeronaut, Madame Blanchard, and then by Napoleon's decree ordering a blockade of the continent and the burning of all English merchandise there.

We now accompany the young artist, whose appointment in Mannheim came to nothing, on his two more than usually long professional tours in the year 1811. On his first tour, he visited the South German towns of Aschaffenburg, Würzburg, Bamberg, Nuremberg, Augsburg and Munich, where he stayed a considerable time; at the commencement of the second, he had to suffer from the after-pains of the Stuttgart squabbles and the arbitrariness of the Royal Government, for he was again arrested and conveyed across the frontier. He then visited Switzerland, gave concerts in Schaffhausen, Winterthur, Zurich, Basle, and Berne, and freshened himself up by a trip into the mountains. His public performances were swayed by a strange fate, which only too frequently ruined all his hopes. When we recollect that the sum of 130 florins taken at a concert (as, for instance, at Basle) was considered something very extraordinary, we can scarcely comprehend how Weber could defray the expenses of his journeys. His three months' excursion in Switzerland contributed materially, however, to extend his reputation, and brought him into contact with a large number of distinguished men, original and liberal in their opinions. "The most important result of his journey," says his biographer, "was the enrichment of his inward world by the contemplation of the grandeur of nature, and, which is of equal weight, the shock given to the notion, which he had hitherto entertained and often expressed, that the atmosphere illuminated by princely love for art was alone calculated to develop the latter, especially music. The warm pulsations of true republican hearts at the tones of good music nearly cured him of the prejudice that high refinement of manners was necessary to string human nature with sufficient fineness fully to appreciate music."

On his next journey he was accompanied by Bärmann, the admirable clarinetist, of Munich. They went by way of Prague, Dresden, Leipsic, and Weimar, to Berlin, where Weber remained from the 20th February to the 31st August, 1812. The thirteenth section comprises Weber's professional life as operatic conductor at Prague, from April 1, 1813, to September 30, 1816. To this period belongs his magnificent music to Körner's Leyer und Schwert. Some portions of the period were, however, passed by him at Berlin, where he was greatly honored, and at Munich. The last chapter of the book treats of his betrothal to Caroline Brandt, and his appointment as conductor of the king's private band in Dresden, on the 21st December, 1816. He received the official notification of the fact on Christmas day. He had kept the whole matter a secret from his future bride, and announced this piece of good fortune for both of them in a humorous manner, by writing the young lady a most unimportant letter, and putting at the bottom, "My address is: To Herr Carl Maria von Weber, Royal Saxony Capellmeister, Dresden."

From the above lengthened notice of the Biography, and the extracts we have given, the reader will clearly perceive that we recommend it as a valuable addition to the literature of music. We anxiously await the next volume, and have merely to add that we trust the book, which is otherwise admirably got up, will be more carefully corrected. The fact of the biography containing interesting information connected with many musical celebrities, with whom Weber was closely connected, heightens the charm of its perusal. We will, in conclusion, quote an instance of this kind. We will select what is said, in various passages, concerning the Abbé Vogler, so highly celebrated at the commencement of the present century.

"The mind of Vogler and that of Franz Anton (Carl Maria's father) were twins possessing remarkable similarity, only somewhat weakened by external circumstances affecting their development, and this similarity had even impressed a character of affinity on their features. In the joyous brilliancy of Carl Theodore's Court, and among the cavaliers of the Kurtrier Guard, Vogler would, probably, have been the jovial, reckless Franz Anton, while the latter, at the pedal-harpsichord of Master Wenzel Stantinger, and amongst the monks and prelates of the Würzburg chapter, who listened to the boy as he played the organ, would, probably have been a very celebrated, and vain musician. Both were glowing with the love of art, for which they possessed eminent talent: both were fond of all kinds of splendor; both allowed, when it suited their purpose, pinchbeck to be passed off for gold, and both, therefore, even in art, valued form above matter, and effectiveness above depth; both took an equally lively delight in material ease; and both were led, with equal force, by vanity along roads which turned them from the employment of their talent in the interest of the highest aim of art. But Vogler enjoyed an advantage over Franz Anton; on his entrance into life he had immediately fallen among that middle class society, in whose opinion a person of his disposition was of no account. In constant communication with the strictly disciplined priesthood, immovably conscious of their object, he gained, even from his youth, that feeling for order, discipline, and a decided bias of the will, which had made him a celebrated man, while the want of it condemned Franz Anton to remain a poor musician strolling about with his phenomenon of a boy. Deeply versed in every thing to be gained in the world of tone by a strong memory, and a thoroughly critical judgment; conscious of the objects for which he had to strive; talented enough even to give animation to his views of works of art; skilled, as a pupil of the Jesuits, on every occasion to exhibit to the public that facet of his many-sided mind, from whose brilliancy he anticipated the greatest effect; weighty in his utterances; imposing and, at the same time, affable in his behavior; purposely eccentric in his habits, in order to be able, without exciting astonishment, to adopt any form of life, yet, on the other hand, without any philosophical consistency of thought, and hence in his expressions, full of obscurity which he endeavored to pass off as mystical profundity; conscious of the unsatisfactory scientific foundation of his systems and arrangements, which he attempted to mask by apodictics and assurance of enunciation; rising up and disappearing as a somewhat charlatanlike apostle of his musical gospel in all parts of the civilized world; everywhere patronized and supported by the priesthood; and everywhere opposed by the sturdy practice of art, Vogler was just the man to cause a large number of his brother artists and of the public to take an interest in him, but, at the same time, to divide them into two diametrically opposite parties, one of which swore by him, while the other branded him as a heretic and opposed what he did. But he was, however, also, just the man, in virtue of the above mentioned positive and negative qualities, and of his spiritual discipline, to influence most profoundly young minds, and to appear in the eyes of beginners as a prophet whose steps they had closely to follow, were he even to lead them to martyrdom. The form of his indisputable talent for teaching favored this influence amazingly, because he always understood how to appear before his disciples as a high-priest full of mildness and urbanity, but who, notwithstanding, dared to impart to them only a small portion of the irrefutable truths suggested to him by his God. His tone, his walk, his small tinsure, the holy water he himself brought from Rome for the Elector Carl Theodore, his order of the Golden Spur, and the sound of his voice, irresistible for Mad. von Coudenhove, together with his great talents, caused Vogler, in the year 1777, to be appointed Court Chaplain and Conductor of the Private Band to Carl Theodore, at Mannheim. His disposition had, however, too much of the artist and not enough of the Jesuit in it, for him to be able to look on coolly at Father Frank's infamous rule in Munich. He had such a violent misunderstanding with the Father, that he quitted Munich suddenly, in 1781, and set off upon a long course of travel, which took him to France, England, Italy, nay, even to Greece and North America, and during which he exerted himself strenuously to propagate his musical system. By this as well as by his masterly performances on the organ, he gained throughout Europe a great reputation as a learned musician, a teacher, and an organist. From these travels he brought back with him the principal elements of the old Greek music, which he asserted he had discovered in the traditions of southern climes.

"It is from this epoch that we must date Vogler's ardent passion for collecting national melodies, a passion to which he went on devoting more and more time and trouble. It was of great importance for everything connected with the romantic tendency in music, that on two of his pupils, Weber and Meyerbeer, who were destined subsequently to be the chief representatives of this tendency, he so succeeded in impressing his own high opinion of the worth and significance of popular and national melodies, that their works everywhere afford evidence thereof."

Vogler's reputation as a teacher of music induced Gustavus III., of Sweden, to invite him, in 1786, to Stockholm, and to confide to him, after giving him a brilliant appointment as Chef de la Musique du Roi, the charge of instructing the Crown Prince. In the far north, for thirteen years, did Vogler work, by word and deed, with indisputable advantage for art and artists. He did not go back to Germany till 1799, when, with the request that the modest living of Pleichach might be conferred on him, he turned towards Würzburg, where he desired to live entirely for music. On the same day that the refusal of his demand was sent from that town, he received an invitation to proceed as teacher of music to Prague. Vogler accepted the invitation, and, on the 9th of November, 1801, delivered his inaugural discourse, having a year previously produced with success, at Berlin, his opera, Hermann von Unna, and, in the spring, given concerts in Berlin, Brunswick, and Leipsic.

From the Worcester Palladium.

The Organ in Boston Music Hall.

Since the opening of the Organ in the Boston Music Hall, it has been a very general complaint, among those who have not heard it, that, from those who had they could obtain no satisfactory description of it, if indeed they could obtain any description at all. In reply to inquiries, the answer would simply be, "it is a fine," or "a noble," or "a magnificent instrument." The critic, now and then, chanced to find it "out of tune;" while the unmusical listener could not see wherein it essentially differed from one and another good organ of less pretension. Several musical writers have reported upon its merits in technical or in general terms, but there remains a vacancy which no pen has yet filled. Nor will it be filled at present. The truth is, that so great an instrument—one of such vast resources, the entire capacities of which must remain hidden, not for months alone, but perhaps for years, cannot be easily comprehended. Our American concert-organists have acquired themselves well as debutants. Diligent study of the instruments has put them in possession of the keys to many of its treasures. But a mine of wealth must be, as yet, hidden. And it is well that this is so. Did it admit of full development in a single year even, half its charm would be gone. Like the block of marble, the statue lies hidden within. Art alone can reveal it.

Whatever one may have thought of the Music Hall, the comparative height of which has sometimes seemed an obstacle to the perfect performance within its walls of certain kinds of music—the sound of which seems to lose itself in the "upper air" of the edifice, coming to the ear of the listener in the remote parts of the hall, in detached fragments which reflect less upon the performer than upon the acoustic properties of the edifice—whatever one may have thought of it hitherto, its very fault now comes to the rescue of the Organ, and takes it within its walls so completely, without crowding, without encumbering the hall, that both eye and ear become convinced that the union of the Hall and the great Organ is not incongruous, but one of perfect harmony.

And to this conclusion we are helped not a little by the outward adornment of the instrument—the great casket that holds inexhaustible jewels of beauty, grandeur, and sublimity. This has been so minutely described, and is, besides, so well known by photographs, &c., that further description would be but repetition. Taken as a whole, it is harmonious and artistic; and, like any great work of art, whether of sculpture, painting, architecture, or music, capable of suggesting ideas, not only of poetry, and beauty, but of Life and Truth. The massive foundation of the organ—black walnut, heavily carved, and most imposing with its caryatides, its Herculean giants supporting the huge towers, its Fates and Sybils, its bas-reliefs of musical instruments, &c., is in eloquent contrast with the upper and lighter portions of the facade, which takes almost a winged flight into the air, the great pipes, (of burnished English tin,) attracting the eye, by their soft radiance, to the top, upon which over the front, with attendant griffins, sits St. Cecilia with her lyre, and, at the summit of the towers, cherubim beautifully designed. The style of architecture, of the organ-case, (or house, as the Germans call it,) is technically known as the Renaissance. That the Gothic, in which we are most accustomed to think of large organs, would have been unsuited to the Hall, is manifestly obvious. It would have ill comported with its home-like cheerfulness, its modern air of elegance and taste.

And what of the Organ, of its inner self, of what the ear thirsts for when the eye has been satisfied with gazing? To describe it would require one qualified to bring out its resources; and, with the knowledge thus acquired, able to write as fully and as freely as he played. To the ordinary listener its tones do not come with the thunderous weight which its dimensions might presage. Powerful it is, to be sure, but such is its quality of tone that one does not realize the extent of that power. The crash of even a "Storm Fantasia" is modified by the delicate art of the builder, who aimed not at the creation of noise, but at that subtle power of producing a great volume of sound which should be grand and inspiring, but never painful in its immensity. What we have heard of the instrument has best shown its noble tones in the grand harmonies of Bach (whose music is not "all fugues"), which require the full organ-tone, and thus bring out its greatest power—a mighty, heaving sea of sound. Perhaps the final verdict will be that the instrument must first of all be remarked for the exceeding beauty of its tones. Its multiplicity of stops suggests an orchestra of the most complete description, and forms a temptation to the organist to revel in the sweets of music which should have no place in his repertoire, but be left in their proper sphere with the orchestra. "Gloria in Excelsis" was well inscribed over its keyboard; and the six thousand voices of the instrument tell most grandly in those strains which were written for them, and in such transcriptions as are made in reverent thought of the grandeur of the organ and the noble uses for which it is designed. The power and the beauty of its tones are at once apparent. Then its variety is almost incalculable. Listening to its strains we are carried far into the depths of some mighty forest. The grand old trees away to and fro in an agony of grief, as the storm-clouds pass over their heads. They bend almost to breaking, and their wild lament chills the heart of the listener. But soon the sweet south wind steals among their branches, and their groans are hushed to sighs, and anon to softest whispers. Now the wood is melodious with hundreds of tuneful-throated warblers, (none of them afflicted with the fashionable "wobble"); the cheerful sunbeams of Hope dispel the remembrance of the tempest, and the thousands of voices chant "Gloria to God in the Highest."

But the Organ is not to be heard in a single visit, nor yet in several visits. New developments of its wealth of beauty and grandeur will come with every hour that is spent within its sound. Of its "Vox-humana," of which so much is said, we can only say that it bears a marked resemblance to the human voice; but whether it equals that of either of the famous European organs, for instance, the one at Freyburg or at Lucerne, must be left to the traveled critic. Either the popular descriptions of this stop in these organs are over-wrought, or that in the Boston organ does not quite equal them. However, that is a matter of small moment.

Boston may well be proud of her Organ, and of the important step made by its introduction in the progress of music in America. It exhibits to the people what might hitherto be seen only in a European tour; it will familiarize them with musical works which have hitherto been lost, almost, to the public ear; and will give, has already given, an impetus to the building of fine organs, which will soon be sensibly felt in our churches and music-halls. We only wish for the day when, the organ-debt discharged, the people will begin to look upon the instrument as theirs; will feel a personal pride and pleasure in going often to see and hear it; and adopt it with their hearts as they do parks, and public-libraries; and, would we might add, free galleries of art!

STELLA.

On English Organ Building.

From the "Ecclesiologist."

*** It is useless to point to the admirable improvements in the mechanism of the organ, and to the facilities which are afforded in modern instruments for the display of dexterity and skill in the performer: these are well enough in their way, and proofs of the mechanical tendencies of the age are unfortunately too numerous without this additional one; what we feel to be wanting is the purity and grandeur of tone, the solemnity of diapason, the depth of love and feeling in voicing displayed by the ancient organ-builders—from old John Loosemore at Exeter to Green and England—and still to be found in the best works of the modern German school. * * Let us see how work is done by a modern English manufacturer.

Suppose an order for an organ given, and the builder fixed upon. Black mail to the "professional" man having been duly levied, the manufactory is at once set to work; the mechanism of our organ is beautifully set out, it being considered a religious duty, and a sign of the advance of science, to cram every detail into the least possible space—the newest dodges are introduced, and the comfort of the future performer is carefully attended to. But how about the tone, the all-important voicing of the new instrument?

"Well, why grumble?" says our builder; are not the best voicers employed at high salaries? isn't our diapason-man first-rate, and our reed-voicer the best in or out of London? Our firm employs the first talent, and therefore the result must be super-excellent accordingly."

Very likely it may be, looked at as an example of the mechanical skill and science of the age; but when all is finished there is that something wanting, that something which gives power and life to the architecture, sculpture, and fresco—however rude—of our great mediæval ancestors. It is love of the work shown in the work; which love springs from an earnest desire to make the best use of those talents committed to us, and for His sake who gave them.

And now, by way of contrast, let me describe the building of the great organ in St. George's, Doncaster. And let me first express the opinion that this organ is out of all proportion to the church; nor are churches built mainly to be good places to put organs in, as some seem to hold; and of this I am sure, that had this particular instrument been made half the size and power, and the remainder of the money spent in the proper adornment of the sanctuary, and in poly-chromatic decoration, thereby dispelling in part the Protestant frigidity which pervades the atmosphere of this church, it would have been used to better purpose. What I want to show, however, is the different spirit and sentiment which prevailed in the building of this organ. In the first place, four or five years were spent in the execution of this great work. It was built under the eye of the master-builder, by a few workmen, deliberately and substantially, without impatience or any scamping in the least detail. It was made with the intention that it should honestly do its duty for all the time that a human work like an organ ought to last, and German organs are considered to stand about four hundred years. The mechanism works in a strong straightforward sort of way; and while all reasonable improvements are made use of, the clever mechanical trickiness of modern work is avoided. Then, as to the all-important voicing, no pains, no labor, no time and trouble were spared to make the tone perfect in quality and "balance." Many and many an hour has the master-builder spent in touching and retouching; many the day's work perhaps nearly undone the next day; not because it was not admirable to all who heard, but because the artist thought it might be bettered. And what is the result of all this toil and pains spent? I say, without fear of contradiction, the noblest work of organ-building art that England has ever heard or seen. Here is purity combined with grand solemnity of tone, exquisite delicacy in the smaller flue stops, and a prodigious power of diapason and chorus, unassisted by reeds; in short, here we find that religious quality which makes the organ pre-eminently the Church's instrument. I speak of this organ, as of others by the same builder, that in our own parish-church of St. Peter's, for instance, at least those parts which were voiced by him—from no interested or prejudiced motives. I speak thus, because I have experienced emotions in listening to their tones which no English work had before produced; and because I know that others equally or more sensible of these musical emotions than myself, are also beginning to find that there is a vast deal to be learnt by our builders before they can touch the same chord of tone-feeling.

I account for this inferiority in modern English organ-building art, partly on the ground of the indifference which exists about organs, and the little interest people professedly musical take in encouraging it; but mainly in the fact, that the great run of organ-builders seem to take even less interest in the matter than their patrons. So long as they get good orders, and make their machine work well, they seem, with few exceptions, to care nothing about tone and quality, satisfied if the average excellence—or mediocrity—is sustained. Speaking more technically, the main deficiency of our English organs is to be found in the "flue work." Our builders are so unsuccessful in obtaining the requisite power and effect from the diapasons that they trust almost entirely to their reeds—which, it must be said, are generally of excellent quality—to produce this necessary power to fill a large church or music-hall. And this reedy, brassy quality is quite unfit for the accompaniment of human voices; it does not blend with and sustain them as does the pure diapason tone. It may no doubt be used for contrast and variety; but to depend so constantly upon it, as our organists are obliged to do, is destructive of that devotional feeling the church organ is so eminently calculated to produce.

I was specially struck with this on hearing the great organ in York Minster lately; and in mentioning this instrument I can do no injury to its builders, as their position in public favor is such as to render them quite indifferent to my criticism. The full power of this immense organ seemed so small and poor, and so totally inadequate to fill the vast minster, that it was only when the high-pressure "tuba" was added, a stop only to be compared in effect to the ranting of an angry bull, that any thing like a satisfying amount of sound was brought out, and this quality of tone—observe, not the amount of it—was quite unbearable for more than a short time. And if by sheer reduplication of flue stops our builders do obtain a considerable power of diapason—as in a few English organs which might be mentioned—the quality is felt to be harsh and vulgar, and the mixtures have that peculiar shrieking effect—I can describe it no better—which is so different to the silvery ring and sparkle of the old mutation shops and modern German chorus-work. But so long as our builders retain that calm assurance in their own supreme and unapproachable excellence, which seems to be their present state of mind, it is almost useless to protest or criticize. With the scream of the Great Exhibition organs lingering in my ears, I am, perhaps, somewhat uncharitable.

The dulcet tones of our old church organs are, alas! to be no longer heard, or in very rare instances. They have almost invariably been "rebuilt" or "re-voiced," or spoilt in some way, as the author of "A Short Account of Organs," &c., so justly deploras. The fact that they were intended for a specific purpose, i.e., the accompaniment of a small body of voices in the Church Services, seems never to have struck these "restorers;" and modern builders, under the pressure of ambitious organists, have attempted, by the addition of thundering "pedal pipes," and in other ways, to adapt them to the performance of heavy organ-music. Would that it had occurred to these men, that the work of Father Smith, Harris, or Snetzler, is as precious to the musician as an untouched "Cimabue," or "Fra Angelico," is to the connoisseur in painting! Reverently to be repaired, if necessary, no doubt, not to be repainted or added to. If they had only built their own organs in addition, these might have been removed at any time. But it is useless repining, the deed is done. Not that the feeling and wish for a grand organ-tone is wrong, the contrary; but the want must be satisfied in another way. The chancel-organ is one thing—an accompanimental-organ for the use of the choir alone—and the great western nave organ,* yet to be built in our cathedrals, is another; a want not yet perhaps adequately felt anywhere, but which will be a necessity when our "special services" have developed themselves into a regular and orderly worship of the Almighty.

Sir, I have a vision of the future, a dream that we, perchance, may yet see realized; when our renovated cathedrals shall glow and burn with more than hy-gone glory of fresco, mosaic, and color; when the bishop shall be restored with ancient dignity and authority to his cathedra; when the incense of the Blessed Sacrifice shall daily ascend before the Eternal Father, accompanied with all the pomp an adorning Church can add; when from the chancel-gate shall issue the whispered query, "Who is the King of Glory?" and from the triumphant multitude without, the ready antiphon shall arise, commingled with the ponderous tones of the great western organ, in one vast rolling wave of sound—"The Lord of Hosts, He is the King of Glory;" when from those same willing pipes the organist shall bring forth the music which flows from a full heart and ready fingers, or shall roll along the vaulted roof some mighty fugue of the Giant Musician, whose majestic subject, thundered forth by the great diapasons, then caught up by the silvery chorus, anon re-echoed by the pealing trumpets, is finally gathered up into one stupendous climax of gorgeous harmony; an echo of the celestial anthems lent to man. Such glories, I say, we may yet see; for though the Church on earth be militant, yet is "the King's daughter all glorious within." God hasten the time.—I am, sir, yours truly,

* Not on the stupid plan recently adopted at York.

LYNDON SMITH,

(Hon. Organist, S. Saviour's.)

Leeds, December, 1863.

Music Abroad.

London.

An English adaptation of Gounod's Faust, Mr. C. F. Chorley's version, has been successfully and repeatedly produced at Her Majesty's Theatre. The Times (Jan. 30) says of it:

Mr. Chorley's adaptation, though he has in few instances literally translated the words, is a tolerably effective imitation of the original. In occasional passages, as, for example, the opening soliloquy of Faust—which the philosopher, persuaded of the utter futility of life-long studies to help him to the goal of his desires, the ultima Thule of the heart's travels in its search after happiness, begins and ends with the emphatically suggestive ejaculation "foiled!"—it almost rises to poetry. Perhaps, on the whole, the libretto of Faust sounds better in English than in Italian, as it assuredly sounds better in German than in French. At all events, the audience of Saturday night was probably the first in this capital able thoroughly to comprehend every point of interest, and thus to estimate the consummate art—we had almost said genius—of M. Gounod at its proper worth. We own that the opera never appeared to us so beautiful, so symmetrical, so consistent in all its parts, and, as an infallible consequence, so essentially and legitimately dramatic.

The English performance of Faust is in few respects inferior and some superior to the Italian, at the Haymarket or at Covent Garden. Although Sig. Gnglini and Tamberlik are Italians, the English representative of the hero is a far more practised musician than either; and as M. Gounod would naturally prefer having his music, solo or concerted, sung as he wrote it, without shirking or subterfuge, it is probable that on hearing the most recent version of his opera, whether he understands our language or not, he would give the palm to the English Faust, as the one who most perseveringly adheres to the text. Apart from this, however, Mr. Sims Reeves, who had already played Faust in Italian with eminent success, reveals a conception of the part in the highest degree poetical. The first act, which in the Italian adaptation has hitherto passed for nothing, gives him opportunities for vocal declamation of which he takes such excellent advantage, that what was considered the weakest and driest portion of the opera now stands out as conspicuously as all the rest. There is no surer test of real artistic worth than the ability to give to every passage its intrinsic value. Even in the French Faust, the scene just before Mephistopheles appears to the bewildered and despairing investigator is one of the highest significance; and that M. Gounod saw this is evident, inasmuch as in no part of his opera does his music exhibit more intellectual power. It is to the credit of Mr. Reeves that to him the physically prostrate and mentally abused philosopher appears in a light no less interesting than the Faust newly restored to youth and once more, seemingly, with a whole life in prospect. Nothing can surpass his delivery of the accompanied recitative in which Faust gives eloquent language to his weariness and despair. In the garden scene, though not the solitarily prominent figure he appears in the opening of the first act, Faust at least divides the sympathies of the audience with Margaret; and as in this occurs the apostrophe to the abode of the innocent and lovely girl ("Salve dimora"), it offers, of course, the chief occasion for exhibiting the singer's art. A more expressive and perfect reading of this truly exquisite soliloquy has not been heard. The duet with Margaret, in which occurs the familiar passage, "He loves me, loves me not," is worthy to match with this, the crowning point of the third and most poetical act of the opera. The Margaret—or rather "Margarita," as Mr. Chorley invariably styles her—of Madame Lemmens-Sherrington stands midway between the well-known impersonations of Madame Miolan-Carvalho and Mademoiselle Tietjens, being neither so coldly statue-like as the first, nor so warm and impassioned as the last; but in this very beautiful duet she unhappily rather follows the French than the German model, scarcely daring to look at her lover, even when she has unequivocally confessed her love. Elsewhere—premising that she sings many parts of the music too slowly, especially the reply to Faust, in the scene of the Kermesse (which, after all, is merely an admonition to the adventurous cavalier to mind his own business), and the ballad of the "King of Thule"—her execution of the music is as correct and artistic as it is charming. In the brilliant air where Margaret, finding the jewels of Faust, straitway neglects the modest flowers of her devoted Siebel, the shake which introduces the theme of the quick movement is for the first time as intended. Madame Carvalho could never execute it in tune, while the imposing voice of Mademoiselle Tietjens could never accommodate itself to its light and glib delivery; but Madame Sherrington does it to perfection—as may be said, indeed, of the air itself, from beginning to end. In the grand—really grand—scene at the doors of the church, and the prison scene of the last act, the singing of this accomplished lady offers no point for criticism; but in the first both she and Signor Marchesi—the very zealous if not very legitimate impersonator of Mephistopheles, whom he represents as a sort of pantomimic buffoon—outrage all dramatic verisimilitude. Instead of the contrito and prostrate Margaret we have the heroine in a ballet of action, walking to and fro, to avoid the encroachments of a persecuting gnome. Fancy, moreover, the staid, ironical, and sardonic Mephistopheles—the devil himself, incarnate in a wig—executing the melodramatic postures and evolutions of an ordinary Zamiel, or Demon of the Woods! Of Mr. Santley's English Valentine we can only say what we have said more than once about his performance of the character in Italian, viz., that a comparatively small part was never made so much of in our remembrance.

ROYAL ENGLISH OPERA is in possession of Covent Garden. A new operetta, Fanchette, has proved a success. It is the work of Mr. W. C. Levey, and is said to be very French in its style, after the light ordinary manner of Adolphe Adam. "He writes," says a London critic, "with apparent facility, seems to possess a good share of the vis comica, and, while as yet thoroughly inexperienced, handles the orchestra like one who some time hence will, in all probability, acquire the skill to handle it as a master." The singers were Miss Louisa Pyne, Mr. Harrison (who still lives!), Mr. H. Corri, Miss Thirwall, &c.; Conductor, Alfred Mellon. — Blanche de Nevers, with the original cast, did not produce much sensation.—The new opera by Mr. Macfarren is thus mentioned on the morning after the first performance:

We must be satisfied at present to record that She Stoops to Conquer,—a new opera, in three acts, libretto (founded on Goldsmith's celebrated comedy of the same name by Mr. Fitzball, music by Mr. Macfarren)—was produced last night, with a success which we are inclined to believe as legitimate as it was brilliant. The mere demonstrations usually accompanying the first performance of a new piece can rarely be accepted with safety as tests of its actual merit; the experience of a single hearing, however, must have sufficed to convince any competent judge that She Stoops to Conquer is an opera of genuine pretensions, the work, in short, of a master; and, it may be added, the most thoroughly English opera—for English it is in the fullest sense of the expression—since Robin Hood. It was received, by a crowded house, with a favor which began with the overture and did not cease till the last note of the finale. The composer was three times called forward, and out of ten pieces almost unanimously asked for again, no less than eight were repeated. Even this injudicious obedience to an unreasonable and unhealthy custom did not succeed in tiring out the patience of the audience, whose enthusiasm was unabated until the fall of the curtain.

At the termination of the opera, after the principal singers—Misses Louise Pyne, (Kate Hardcastle) and Anna Hiles (Constance Neville), Messrs. Harrison (Charles Marlow), Perren (Hastings), Weiss (Old Hardcastle), and H. Corri (Tony Lumpkin)—had for the third time, been summoned, a universal cry was raised for Mr. Mellon, who deserved the compliment scarcely less than the composer himself. She Stoops to Conquer, is to be played every evening "till further notice."—Times, Feb. 12.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS. Vieuxtemps, the violinist, and Charles Hallé the pianist, took part in the 140th Concert, Jan. 25. The former led Messrs. Ries, Webb and Puque in one of the earliest Quartets of Mendelssohn, and in one of Haydn's, and the two played a violin Sonata by Mozart. Hallé played Beethoven's Sonata Appassionata. Vocal pieces, by Gounod, Benedict and Arditi, were sung by Mlle. Parepa and Mr. Santley, Benedict accompanying.—The succeeding concert was composed entirely of music by Mozart, in honor of that composer's birthday, (Jan. 27, 1756). Vieuxtemps led the Quintet in A, with Clarinet; Mme. Arabella Goddard played one of the solo Sonatas, a Sonata Duo with Vieuxtemps, and the piano Quartet in G minor with violin, &c., and airs from his operas were sung by Mlle. Florence Lancia and Mr. Santley.—The Mozart night was followed by a Mendelssohn night (Feb. 8); the pieces being: Quartet in E flat, op. 12; Caprice (piano) in E, op. 33; Quintet in B flat; Trio in C minor, and several songs.

THE MUSICAL SOCIETY OF LONDON, with its grand orchestra of 33 violins, 11 violas, 9 double basses, &c., conducted by Alfred Mellon, had a brilliant opening of its sixth season on the 27th of January. The programme included Spohr's "Consecration of Tones" Symphony; three overtures: Meyerbeer's to Struensee, Beethoven's to Coriolanus, and Gounod's to Le Medecin malgré lui; Mozart's D minor Concerto, the piano part being played by Miss Agnes Zimmerman, who won much praise thereby; and vocal selections from Handel, Rossini and Benedict.

ORATORIO. Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" and Rossini's Stabat Mater have been given in Exeter Hall by the Sacred Harmonic Society, with Mme. Sherrington, Sims Reeves, Santley, Mme. Laura Baxter, &c.—Martin's National Choral Society have performed Elijah. Sims Reeves, fatigued perhaps by his exertions in the character of Faust, is said not to have sung as well as usual. Mme. Rudersdorff was the leading soprano, Miss Emma Heywood the contralto, and Mr. Santley, Elijah.—Mr. Henry Leslie's Choir on the 4th ult. performed Mendelssohn's Cantata (for male voices and brass instruments) on Schiller's "Ode to the Artists"; besides a Motet for double choir, "In exitu Israel," by S. Wesley, and a selection of madrigals and part-songs. The band also played Mendelssohn's Overture in C, op. 24, for military band; and Mr. Dannreuther (of Cincinnati) played Beethoven's "Moonlight" Sonata.

Paris.

The latest events of interest in the operatic world have been the revival of Rossini's "Moses" at the Grand Opera; the production of a new comic opera by Auber, La Fiancée du Roi de Garbe, the plot borrowed from Boccaccio; and the reappearance of Adelina Patti. The Orchestra, (a new London musical weekly, brim-full of news from all parts of Europe) says:

You have heard, of course, of the "Fiancée du Roi de Garbe;" of its success, of its peculiar plot, of the left-handed allusions contained in it, of the delight with which French audiences receive a piece so eminently French. It would be needless to tell you the story of the Fiancée, for the English newspapers have in the majority of cases, given it as soon as it appeared; and you know all about the talismanic necklace, a pearl of which disappears whenever the wearer suffers an indiscreet liberty to be taken with her—meaning kisses, of course. Osculation predominates so much throughout the opera that, out of thirty pearls originally comprising the necklace, only one is left on at last, and this is sacrificed by the last kiss which ratifies the engagement of the Fiancée with the cousin of the Roi, kissing your affianced being indiscreet, of course; at least in France. It is a gorgeous spectacle, however, not the kissing, but the opera; all kings, queens, pages, pretty girls, velvet, sunsets, crimson, and azure. As for the music, it is ravissante; all Paris says so. It is another question whether the music would be considered ravissante in London; but the plot would, anywhere. Music is Parisian entirely, and you must judge it in that light; very little Auberish about it, but altogether what the papers call petillante d'esprit: There are very little couplets, delicate romanzas, a capital shaving duet, with orchestral accompaniment to represent the scraping of the barber, no, barbers' razor on the king's chin. A concerted piece, quintet, and a motif on (as it would seem) Spanish airs, are both excellent; and the finale to Act I is a highly colored number, approaching very near perfection in its kind, and producing immense effect. Acts 2 and 3, however, are better; Act 3 the best. A splendid number is the air of Mdle. Cico. It is a delicious calm, tranquil song, into which flows, for you cannot say it interrupts, a chorus of pretty lines, sung by the very pretty pages. The page symphony is especially fine. Pages, in fact, inundate the opera; pages represented in the overture; pages in all the acts; pages with the fairest of faces and roundest of calves: pages kissing and being kissed; pages whose model and prototype should be Mdle. Belia. As for the singers, Mdle. Cico has good qualities, of which she makes the most. Achard is a fair tenor, who sings with taste, aplomb and verve. Mdle. Tual has little to sing, but it is enough to look at her pretty face and figure. Sainte Foy is always good, and Battaille is a magnificent basso. People had commenced to utter an universal growl against the management of the Theatre-Imperial-Italian, and to contrast the "direction" of M. Bagier with the late away of M. Calzado; nay, some of the press had published the names of the relative companies side by side, in columns of the newspapers, making odious comparisons; when, happily for M. Bagier, Adelina Patti made her appearance. "Dieu soit loué!" exclaims La France Musicale piously, "il en était temps." Certainly it would appear time, for joyous Paris rushed to the Italien on Sunday last in unconcealed enthusiasm, and revelled in Adelina as French audiences can only. She was a goddess in Sonnambula—a diva; she was better than ever—more graceful, more expressive, sweeter, in voice, richer in manner: so Paris affirms. Their Majesties were there, and gave the signal for the reception she met with. Not that Frenchmen want to be told when to applaud; but it was polite, you know, to wait for the Emperor and Empress. And did they not applaud, too—that crowded audience! Six times during the opera Adelina was called on, and again at the fall of the curtain. They would have hissed all the other artistes, who were simply vile; but Parisian politeness feared to wound Mdle. Patti, and the audience ground their teeth and refrained. As for her, well, listen to our friend, La France: "Her voice appears to us to have acquired more power, and her song more aptitude. And then, what grace in all her person, what humor in her play, what expression in her physiognomy, what fire in her look! One really knows not which to admire most in this rich nature, so much harmony is there between the different parts of which it is composed. There is but one thing to say, it is the ideal realized."

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, MARCH 5, 1864.

Concerts.

JULIUS EICHBERG'S FIRST ORCHESTRAL SOIREE. Mr. Zerrahn's larger plan of Philharmonic Concerts having come to naught, the lovers of Symphony naturally turned to Mr. Eichberg's novel little cabinet experiment of orchestral performances in Chickering's Hall. The first of his two soirées took place last Saturday evening, with a select and eager audience, not exceeding 200 people. The concert giver had no thought of making money; he only wished to make his bow for the first time before the "appreciative few" in the character of a conductor of classical orchestral music; and to this end bring them into such close quarters with some symphonies (smaller gems in that kind, such as a small band might render), that no sound, no smallest trait of the musical structure should be lost. Hence the small saloon instead of the great Music Hall, and accordingly a small orchestra of 24 instruments. His selection of pieces, all of them familiar ones, was choice; it was a programme to keep one awake and lively. One listened with increasing zest; and it was well that there were none of the so-called "attractions" and "varieties," in the shape of songs and solos, to dull the appetite for a pure feast of orchestra. There were just four pieces:

1. Symphony in E flat major Haydn.
Adagio. Allegro con spirito, Andante, Menuetto, Allegro con spirito.
2. Allegretto Scherzando, from 8th Symphony. Beethoven.
3. Overture, "Praeludium." Weber.
4. First Symphony in C major, Beethoven.
Adagio molto, Allegro con brio; Andante cantabile con moto; Menuetto: Finale.

The result was not only new enjoyment, but a new sharpening of the critical faculties on the part of the listeners. On the one hand, probably the beauty and the marvellously cunning structure of those familiar compositions had never before been so keenly realized by them; while on the other hand all the defects and crudities in the rendering, unnoticed in the Music Hall, were glaringly apparent. All were convinced of one thing: that Mr. Eichberg has the musicianship, the brain, the feeling, quick perception, energy and self-possession, to conduct an orchestra in the execution of its highest tasks. Nothing on his part seemed wanting; although in candor we must say that much was wanting in the obedience of the musicians to his wishes and clear signs. There was, in the Haydn Symphony at least, a great deal of coarse playing, lack of delicate shading, a monotonous loudness in the first violins, and never anything like a pianissimo. This was largely owing, no doubt, to the untried situation; it revealed the habit of indifferent and uncritical rehearsal, that which had passed muster in the Music Hall not being equal to this finer test; and moreover, Mr. E. must have had small chances of rehearsal and of establishing a quick magnetic relationship between himself and his musicians. There was too much also of the same dead, level stress weighing upon the buoyant rhythm of the Beethoven Allegretto, which was taken the first time too slow—a fault corrected when a repetition was demanded. Weber's fresh, delightful and romantic overture went better; and the Beethoven Symphony better still; indeed that might be called an uncommonly nice performance; which seems to prove that the instruments required a little time to feel and measure their own power in the little hall. We doubt not that next time the experience of this first trial will be carefully and critically turned to good account, and that the pieces will be finely, as well as correctly, rendered. Conductor and orchestra will know each other better, and will know the medium in which they work.

Two drawbacks, of course, were intrinsic and unavoidable. First, the Hall is as much too small for any orchestra, as the Music Hall is too large for a small orchestra. Every forte tone upon a trumpet, for instance, startles you with a terrible blast, and this may not be remedied by blowing it piano, since that is not the kind of tone required. Secondly, alike for a small room or a great one, the proportion of the various classes of instruments in a skeleton or outline orchestra cannot be good; the retrenchment is wholly in one family, the strings, while the indispensable pairs of oboes, clarinets, trumpets, &c., remain at the full complement; for these there is no minimum below what the largest orchestra commonly requires.

If we have dwelt more than is our wont upon defects, it is because the unwonted conditions forced one to listen critically, making close scrutiny unavoidable. It was placing the Symphony under a microscope to play it in that small hall. It was not that the orchestra did not play as well as they do elsewhere; or that they did not play con amore and with much credit to themselves; nor was it that the conductor was not richly equal to his task. It only proved what unrelaxing patience of rehearsal, what nice continual refinement upon its own work, an orchestra requires in order to a really fine symphonic rendering under the magnifying lens of so uncompromising a test. A natural effect of such an experiment will be to prompt to much more close and critical rehearsals than have been found necessary (even if they have been possible) hitherto.

But with all these drawbacks, and far outweighing them all, there is no denying a positive peculiar pleasure which attended Mr. Eichberg's concert, and which has made it heartily talked over as one of the most delightful musical events of the season. That pleasure consisted partly in the good impression made by the conductor, and in this new confirmation of what we have long heard and known of his sound, intelligent, high-toned musicianship; partly in the tact and true refinement displayed in the programme; but above all in having such familiar, admirable masterpieces placed before us in so clear and strong a light, that there was no feature lost. It was a new revelation of many a trait of beauty and artistic treatment, which may ordinarily escape one. Every little accessory phrase, or bit of imitation in the middle parts; every coloring or tempering of a note by this or that wind instrument; in short, the whole logical internal structure or proper composition of the work, the strict evolution of the superb whole from its germ or motive, with all the appertaining graces, and the glorious freedom with which genius works out and illustrates law:—all this became unusually apparent, in fact unescapable. It only needs continuance of such trials, study of fine shades and delicacy, to realize for audience and performers ere long all this pleasure without any drawback of heaviness or coarseness. And we sincerely trust that Mr. Eichberg will be encouraged to go on in this good direction, and, having demonstrated in this small way to a few what can be done, and what he is competent to do, that then he will take a somewhat larger hall, and with a somewhat larger orchestra, give us no end of Symphonies according to his ideal. Such a talent and such culture should not be allowed to drudge forever in the nightly routine of a common theatre.

HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY. We presume no one went to the performance of Costa's oratorio, "Eli," Sunday evening before last, expecting to hear a great work, a work of real creative genius, taking rank with Handel; Mendelssohn, &c. It was pretty generally agreed, we think, when it was first performed here in 1857, as it is agreed in London, to accept it as a musician-like, pleasing and effective work of highly respectable excellence, but not of marked originality. The work of an Italian, who is not one-sided in his notions, who has lived long in England, and been for years the chief conductor, not only of Italian and all sorts of opera, but of the Birmingham and other festivals, of all the oratorios of the great German masters. Of course all this has given depth and breadth to his musicianship. Wherever his music flows the clearest, there is the reflection of a Mendelssohnian sky upon its surface. And even that is creditable. The best parts are the choruses, some of which are worked up learnedly to a grand result. There are some beautiful and touching airs also; and the orchestration is clever. Such as it is, it had the benefit of a very good performance this time. The great Organ, with its voluminous sub-basses, lifted up the choruses and added vastly to their fullness, certainty and grandeur. (Once or twice, perhaps, the weight of organ tone was even too great.) Mr. ZERRAHN had drilled his singers well; the balance of the parts seemed to us unusually good.

The solo singing was for the most part well up to all reasonable requirements, with the exception of the want of strength in Mr. WHEELER's tenor voice, which strove at disadvantage against the powerful accompaniments of those martial airs, (the voice of Reeves rings like a trumpet in them), and which by that very effort became dry and hard, sometimes a little sharp. We can respect this sacrifice of himself in an ungrateful service, for we have all known how sweet and artistically trained a tenor he is in the right place. Mr. RUDOLPHSEN's rich bass voice told well in the airs and rather sleepy recitatives which fall to the share of Eli. Miss HOUSTON was in excellent voice and, allowing for some nervousness, gave brilliant effect to the air, "I will extol thee," and fine expression so all the soprano solos. The most interesting solo part is that of the young Samuel, whose morning and evening prayer, as well as all his music, found most satisfactory treatment in the pure, chaste, fresh and innocent voice and delivery of Mrs. J. S. CARY.

ORCHESTRAL UNION. Two more interesting Wednesday afternoon concerts. That of Feb. 24th had for Overture, that to Weber's Oberon, and for Symphony Mendelssohn's "Italian" (No. 4, in A.), both of them genial works, which never lose their freshness. The latter claimed a special interest, heard so soon after the overture to his "Heimkehr aus der Fremde," in which its first movement seems to lie in embryo. The organist of the occasion, Mrs. L. S. FROMOCK, whose first appearance it was, amply justified the reputation which she has acquired in Western cities (as Miss Tillinghast), for her skill in rendering the great organ works of Bach. There was much curiosity to hear her, and the Music Hall was full. Bach's Toccata in F was a severe test to put herself to, and some nervousness betrayed itself in a certain unsteadiness of tempo; it would have been better, too, if she had not yielded to advice in trying to commend it to the popular ear by change of stops, where Bach intended none. But it was plain that she has talent, with remarkable execution both with hands and feet, that she understands and loves such music, and is indeed an accomplished organist. Yielding to advice again, instead of giving her own choice, a Sonata of Mendelssohn, for the second piece, she played an Offertoire by Battiste, one which we have not heard before, called Offertoire du Saint Jour de Pâques, consisting of variations on a Catholic Choral. It was not uninteresting, and was tastefully and clearly rendered.

Seventh concert. Last Wednesday Mozart's sterling overture to La Clemenza di Tito was revived, after a long interval; the instruments were in uncommonly good tune, and made a fresh, bright, clear tone-picture of it. Gade's 6th Symphony, in B flat, was played for the second time, and we enjoyed it even better than before. The same dreamy melancholy, wild, sea-shore-like, yet tender, which we feel in his earlier works, pervades it. The themes are interesting, the form develops naturally from them, the instrumental coloring is very harmonious, subdued and rich, and the whole thing is graceful and poetic. Since his first Symphony, in C minor, which drew such warm congratulations from Mendelssohn (see translations on our first page), the Danish composer has hardly kept the promise which that work held out. Succeeding Symphonies were weak and manneristic. We would give a trifle to know what Mendelssohn would say to this sixth one. Can there be any denying that it is a fine Symphony? It was smoothly and clearly rendered too. On the Great Organ Mr. J. K. PAINE played in his truly organ-like and masterly manner. First an Offertoire, of his own composition, a serious, calm, religious one, not a captivating effect piece; not catching the general ear like the French brilliants by that name, not particularly striking in its themes, but harmonizing well with serious meditation, organ-like in style and spirit, musician-like in treatment. Then he played again the grand, the inexhaustible Passacaglia in C minor by Bach, which came out even grander and clearer than before. How steadily and wonderfully it broadens, deepens, clothing itself with still more majesty as it grows and gathers onward, the great, deep bass tones of the same unwearied solemn theme still sounding on beneath! It swells the breast and lifts the soul, like climbing among mountains, to listen and give oneself fully up to such a work.

The New Organ at the Church of the Immaculate Conception.

This superb instrument, the last and highest triumph of the skill and taste of our Boston builders, Messrs. E. & G. G. HOOK, (whose works hitherto have never been excelled in this country), is one of the first fruits of the wholesome impulse given to the art here by the presence of that great masterwork of German art in the Boston Music Hall. This is only what the author and abettors of that bold, but admirably successful, project all along anticipated and intended. With that to learn from and to inspire emulation, we shall do better things, and many more of them, than we have done before. The people are learning what to demand in an Organ; much grows indispensable, which we had not before thought of, and builders stand ready with skill and willing, earnest spirit to answer to the call.

The crowd of music-loving people, who filled every seat and aisle of that vast church on the evening of the inauguration of the Organ (Feb. 3), were greatly impressed by the power, the richness, the delicacy and beauty of its tones. Having (at present) only 47 speaking registers, hardly more than half the number of the Music Hall Organ, with no 32-foot stop, and only five stops in the Pedal, it was indeed wonderful what a deep, solid, rich, sonorous flood was poured out from the full organ. The place itself, remarkable for its acoustic qualities, magnifying all tones, contributed something to this; but such contribution would have availed little had not the tones intrinsically been noble, true and fine.

The Organ occupies a space of 40 feet in height, 35 feet in width, and more than 20 feet depth. The case, built by Messrs. Smith and Crane of New York, from designs by P. C. Keeley, the architect of the church, is in perfect keeping with that noble Roman structure. It has three Manuals, from 8 ft. C to A, 58 notes each. The Pedal keyboard has 27 keys, from 16 ft. C to D. There are three "double action" composition pedals for the stops of the Great Manual, by which some stops are drawn in while others are pushed out: one pedal, of novel contrivance, partly answers the same end for the stops of the Pedal Organ, as the placing a portion of them in the Swell box in that of the Music Hall, i.e. makes the distinction of forte and piano Pedal; another pedal operates upon the "Pedal and Great" Coupler at pleasure. The "pneumatic lever" is applied to the "Great Manual" (with its couplings), and to the "Swell Manual", with the same success as in the Music Hall in lightening and equalizing the touch. The action is brought forward and reversed, so that the organist faces the Altar, besides being at such distance from the pipes that he can hear the sounds which leap out at his bidding. The contents are as follows:

GREAT MANUAL.

1.	16 feet Open Diapason, through in metal,	58 pipes.
2.	8 " Open Diapason, through in metal,	58 "
3.	8 " Clarabella, through in wood,	58 "
4.	8 " Stop'd Diapason, through in wood. (doppel floete)	58 "
5.	8 " Viola da Gamba, through in metal,	58 "
6.	4 " Octave, through in Metal.	58 "
7.	4 " Flute Harmonique, through in metal and wood.	58 "
8.	2-2-3 " Twelfth, through in metal	58 "
9.	2 " Fifteenth, through in metal,	58 "
10.	2 " Mixture, three ranks, large scale.	174 "
11.	1 1-8 Mixture, five ranks, small scale,	290 "
12.	16 " Trumpet, from C. in metal,	46 "
13.	8 " Trumpet, through in metal,	58 "
14.	4 " Clarion, through in metal,	58 "
15.	Blank Slider for additional stop when desired.

SWELL MANUAL.

16.	16 feet Bourdon Bass, through in wood,	58 pipes.
17.	16 " Bourdon Tremble, through in wood,	46 "
18.	8 " Open Diapason, through in metal,	58 "
19.	8 " Violina (new stop) through in metal,	58 "
20.	8 " Stop'd Diapason, through in wood,	58 "
21.	4 " Octave, through in metal,	58 "
22.	4 " Flute Harmonique, through in metal and wood.	58 "
23.	4 " Octave, Viol d'Amour, through in metal	58 "
24.	2-2-3 Twelfth, through in metal.	58 "
25.	2 " Fifteenth, through in metal,	58 "
26.	1 3-4 Mixture, 5 ranks, through in metal,	290 "
27.	16 " Fagotto, from G, through in metal,	44 "
28.	8 " Cornopean, through in metal.	58 "
29.	8 " Oboe, through in metal.	58 "
30.	8 " Vox Humana, through in metal,	58 "
31.	4 " Clarion, through in metal.	58 "
32.	Blank Slider.

CHOIR ORGAN.

33.	16 feet Bourdon Bass, wood,	12 pipes.
34.	16 " Zolina, metal,	46 "
35.	8 " Open Diapason, through in metal,	58 "
36.	8 " Dulciana, through in metal,	58 "
37.	8 " Kevulophon, through in metal,	58 "
38.	8 " Melodin, through in metal.	58 "
39.	8 " Stop'd Diapason, through in metal and wood.	58 "
40.	4 " Octave, through in metal.	58 "
41.	4 " Celestina, through in metal.	58 "
42.	4 " Flauto Traverso, through in wood,	58 "
43.	2 " Picolo, through in wood.	58 "
44.	8 " Clarionet, through in metal.	58 "
45.	Blank Slider

PEDAL ORGAN.

46.	16 feet Open Diapason, wood,	27 pipes.
47.	16 " Dulciana, wood,	27 "
48.	10-2-8 Quint, wood,	27 "
49.	8 feet Violoncello, metal,	27 "
50.	16 " Trombone, wood.	27 "

MECHANICAL REGISTERS.

51.	Coupler, Great and Swell, in unison.
52.	" Great and Choir, "
53.	" Choir and Swell, "
54.	" Pedal and Great, "
55.	" Pedal and Swell.
56.	Pedal and Choir.
57.	Pedal at Octaves.
58.	Tremulant for Swell Manual.
59.	Tremulant for Choir "
60.	Ventil for No. 48.
61.	Ventil for No. 48 and 50.

Considering the place and purposes for which the instrument is to be used, that it is for the Catholic service mainly, and not so much for Bach fugues and the like, here is a most ingenious and admirable specification. And it is mainly due to the experience and fine taste of Mr. J. H. WILLCOX, the organist of the Church, under whose hands it was so effectively displayed that evening. It is but justice to him, too, to say, that as yet a part of his design is only indicated; room is purposely left for a 32-ft. stop in the Pedal, and for an extra stop in each of the three Manuals. And even now, although the proportion of Pedal stops to the rest is much smaller than in most German organs, we doubt not that the staunchest Bachist would make the fugues roll out exultingly enough upon it. Besides, we must call attention to the abundance of 16 ft. and 8 feet stops in the Manuals, especially in the Swell. There is no lack of rich and lively diapason tone, the foundation of the whole; plenty of harmonic or "mutation" stops; while the "mixtures" (or "chorus work", as they are called in the article on English Organ-building on another page) give life and sparkle to the flood of tone, without unpleasant screaming. Of single stops, we were struck by the power and lustiness of the Trombone and Trumpet. The Gamba is remarkably successful; so too the Clarionet, Fagotto, Oboe, and all those softer stops for the voicing of which Mr. Hook has long been famous. The Flute Harmonique in the Swell, and the new stop "Violina" are exquisite. The Vox Humana startled and delighted the crowd by a closer resemblance to the human voice, than that in the Music Hall. It is pleasant enough for certain effects, sparingly used; but in no organ can it be valued as much more than a curious fancy; if the tone does suggest the human, it is more like that humming itself through a comb, than like frank, outright womanly or manly singing.

A new work, by M. Edouard Grégoir, of Antwerp, entitled, "History of the manufacture and the manufacturers of Organs, followed by a general Biography of all the Organists, and a catalogue of published works, didactic and historical, upon the Organ," is soon to appear in the French language. The book will principally comprise the history of the Organ in the Netherlands and Belgium.

A new Mass, with orchestral accompaniment, composed by Mr. C. C. Stearns, one of the resident musicians of Worcester, in this State, is soon to be brought out. A writer in the Spy, who has heard the rehearsals, speaks very highly of it.

The cry for "Anvil Chorus," in our own Symphony concerts, and for "Storms," national airs and popular ballads on our Great Organ, is not without countenance abroad. We copy from the Athenæum:

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL.—A Report of the late annual meeting of the directors and members of the Liverpool Philharmonic Society (which we derive from the Orchestra) is comical enough to claim the laughter of all musicians, though it holds up one of England's great towns in no favorable light to those who would believe the reiterated fact of the great musical progress made and making in this country. It appeared from the Report that the Society's finances are in a flourishing condition. Great discontent, however, was expressed by some present at the manner in which it has been managed. Some time since, if memory serves us, we called attention to a vigorous attempt made by that section of the concert-goers that loves best to hear the sound of its own voice, when the Piccolomini of the minute is silent—to rid the concerts of a Philharmonic Society of those horrible bores called classical German Symphonies. This was overruled, fortunately. But the other day the same body of singular rebels took the field (we perceive) in new strength. One spoke with more directness than civility, clamoring against "the foreign element" in the concerts, and also, in the formation of the committee—and another (much in the spirit of Goldsmith's tavern guest, who cried, "Rot your Italianos! give me a simple ballad!") was violent to have less of your German and Italian music, and more such things as "John Anderson my Jo." This orator, it is true, announced himself as a "non-musical proprietor;" an admission which throws an odd light on the interpretation of the word "Philharmonic" by many of those who frequent one of the most beautiful and commodious concert-rooms in Europe.

Have we a "non musical proprietor" among us?

MARETZEK, according to an exchange paper, has beyond question [?] the strongest opera company that has ever been in America, and his expenses are enormous in proportion—from $1200 to $1600 a night. The salaries of all his leading artists are payable in gold, every fortnight, no matter what its premium in the market. To Mme. Melori he pays $2500 a month, to Miss Kellogg, $1600, to Mlle. Sulzer $1000, to Mlle. Ortolani-Brignoli $1000, to Signor Mizzoleni $2000, to Signor Bellini $1000, and to Biachi $1000. When Faust was produced the number of "people" on Maretzek's pay-roll was 230. His last and of late greatest acquisition is the silver-voiced tenor, Brignoli, who fell out and into a lawsuit with his old manager, Grau, and now Maretzek promises greater things than ever.

ADELINA PATTI is now in Paris, and is as much of a sensation as ever. In Madrid her success was overwhelming. At her benefit in that city a magnificent medallion was presented to the young American prima donna from the queen. The hijou was enriched with sapphires and diamonds.—Virginia Whiting, Lorini and Adelaide Phillips have met with great success in opera at Havana.—Sivori is playing his magic violin in London at Jullien's concerts, where they have a full orchestra, three military bands, full chorus, the best singers, and Sivori, all for a shilling.—Madame Grisi will visit England next year and give another "farewell" series of performances.

Mrs. KATE THOMPSON, formerly best known as Kate Loder, has been distinguishing herself by composing a trio in D minor for the piano, violin and violoncello, said to be a splendid effort. She has also recently produced two four-part songs, "The Wounded Captid" and "Sir Knight," which are pronounced elegant, graceful and classically pure.

A review of Mendelssohn's letters, in the last London Athenæum, closes with these words:

"There is no leaving this book, which is fuller of artistic precept, and record of practice, and personal indications of character, than any collection of musical letters which, till now, has seen daylight. There will be no end of appeal to it, so long as people shall live who believe that Music is no sensual enchantress, no enervating Delilah, but a muse, a grace, a power, a truth, and a humanizing influence among the arts."

A celebrated Oxford scholar, who professed an indifference to music, was once asked what he thought of an orchestra which had been performing a grand overture; he replied that he only was impressed "by the wonderful coincidences of the fiddlers' elbows."

A CURIOUS CONCERT. Berlioz relates the following anecdote concerning Liszt and Rubini. They had both announced that they would give a grand concert in one of the northern cities of France. Nothing was wanting in the way of advertising, bill posting, &c. But all in vain, the concert did not draw, and on the evening of the performance, Liszt and Rubini entered the hall, which was almost empty, only fifty persons being present. Rubini was so enraged that he at first determined not to sing.

"On the contrary," said Liszt, "you must this evening do your best, for this small audience is evidently composed of all the music lovers in the province, and we must therefore distinguish ourselves the more."

They began their performance. Rubini sang and Liszt played; the programme having been carried out, Liszt stepped before the curtain and thus addressed the audience:

"Ladies and gentlemen (there was only one female present), will you do me the honor to sup with me?"

At first they declined, but after a little persuasion, they agreed to accept the invitation. The supper cost Liszt 1,200 francs. On the next evening of the concert, the house was crammed, the public having assembled in the hope of receiving a supper, but they were disappointed, and Rubini and Liszt were amply repaid by the profits of the second performance for the expenses of the first.

An international musical contest is to take place in London next summer between the musical artists of France and those of England. The prizes include gold medals, cups, diplomas, musical instruments, money, and a "gorgeous banner."

The above loose statement is going the rounds. Who are the musical artists of France and England? Are Messrs. Auber, Berlioz, Roger, &c., about to compete with Bennett, Balfe, Macfarren, Arabella Goddard, &c.? Probably the popular singing societies are meant, such as the Orpheonists, the Yorkshire chorus singers, and the like.

Sivori, the violinist is giving concerts in the south of France.

Thalberg, during the year 1862 and 1863, made by giving concerts no less than sixty thousand dollars.

American composers have, with those of other nations, a chance to compete for two prizes, of $400 and $200, offered by one Signor Baseri of Florence, for the best string quartet, to consist of four separate movements.

Leading journals of Paris administer a sharp rebuke to the "pretense and inflated bombast" of Manager Ullman, for sending extravagant puffs of Carlotta Patti to them, asking their insertion as editorial notices.

ROYAL RETORT TO A FEMALE VOCALIST. George the Second, who, it is well known, had very little taste for either poetry, painting, or music, being present at a concert, to no one part of which he paid the least attention, condescended to compliment a woman of quality on the excellence of her vocal powers; upon which the lady, who was one of the finest private female singers then living, curtsied to his Majesty with a sarcastic formality, saying:

"My performance, Sir, would have been better, could I have flattered myself that it was worthy a moment of your Majesty's attention."

"Nay, Madam," retorted the King, "your voice only requires to be equal to your wit, to command the attention of St. Cecilia herself."

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

'Twas thy loved voice. W. T. Wrighton. 25
One of the sweet songs with a melodious title, which does not disappoint you, when you open the leaves and sing it.

Oh say that you ne'er will forget me. Ballad. B. R. Trench. 25

Effie May. Ballad. " 25

Soldier's Return. Song. " 25

Mr. Trench has the art of creating a very "melodious" melody, as will be noticed especially in the first song above mentioned, which ought to rank high among songs. The second should please the ballad lovers, and the title of the third commends it to those who are anxiously looking forward to the time when their soldiers shall come "marching home."

Sleep and the Post. J. P. Knight. 25

A classical English song.

Why art thou far away. Song. Dr. Lighthill. 25
Given a good subject, and a well sounding title, and a competent composer is sure to turn out a good song. The title and the author fill both these conditions.

I'm not in a hurry to marry. Song. H. Walker. 25
What a great many people say who do not mean it. But if they say it they might as well sing it, and here is the song.

One by one. Song. A. Proctor. 25
You and I. " Claribel. 25

Agreeable songs by good composers.

I would not win a heart to share. Song. L. P. Whitney. 25
Mr. W. has composed many fine songs, and this will not diminish his reputation.

Instrumental Music.

Faust. Fantasia Brillante. E. Katterer. 60
The first of the Faust Fantasias. Of medium difficulty, and skilfully varied. Fine for practice.

Bouquet of Melodies. "Faust." F. Beyer. 50
Another high class collection of the now universally popular melodies. About as difficult as other pieces of the Bouquet and Repertoire. The various numbers of the Bouquet constitute a valuable collection of opera music, and are used extensively by teachers and amateurs.

Arion Waltz. J. S. Knight. 25
A bright arrangement of a melody from "Arion," and has already become a great favorite with those who have heard it played. A delicate tit bit of music with which to regale your friends of an evening.

There is no one like a mother. Variations. C. Grobe. 50
A pleasing melody, with variations, in good style for practice.

Troubadour et Chateleine. Blumenthal. 60
Difficult. Of high character.

Books.

War Songs for Freemen. Dedicated to the Army of the United States. With appropriate music. 20
No one can look through this spirited collection without being impressed with the idea, that it is just the book for soldiers in their tents, and for everybody else who wishes to sing on war topics. A vigorous and discriminating taste appears in the selection of first rate, wide awake melodies and words.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 599.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MARCH 19, 1864.

VOL. XXIII. No. 2.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Half a dozen of Beethoven's Contemporaries.

II. ANTONIO SALIERI.

[Continued from page 194.]

This much seemed necessary to give the reader even a faint picture of the scene and actors in the quiet drama in which we are to make the young Salieri our principal character—and to whom we now come back.

Gassmann, who had been called to Vienna as ballet composer in 1762, had become quite a favorite of the young Emperor, had been appointed chamber composer, and three times a week was one of those, who aided in the private concerts above described. Joseph learned in some manner, soon after the return of the composer from Venice, that he had brought a very promising youth with him, and expressed a desire to see him. Gassmann, of course, took his pupil to the palace, where he was very kindly received by the Emperor, who addressed him with: "Ah, good morning, how are you pleased with Vienna?"

Salieri, frightened, embarrassed, and accustomed in Venice to the title of Excellency, replied: "Well, your Excellency!" and instantly added by way of correcting his mistake: "Extraordinarily well, your Majesty!"

Some of the musicians of the chapel laughed at the boy's embarrassment and simplicity; but Joseph went on asking him about his home, his family and so on, and Anton, having fully recovered himself, answered all questions with great discretion, and embraced the opportunity to express to the Emperor his gratitude toward Gassmann, who was of course present, and whom he represented as his benefactor and second father. Joseph then required him to sing and play something from memory, which he did quite to the satisfaction of the monarch. Now began the ordinary chamber concert, of which the music that day happened to be vocal pieces from Hasse's opera "Alcide al bivio." Salieri sang not only the alto in the choruses, but several solos with ease and correctness at sight from the score. This pleased Joseph much and he ordered Gassmann always in future to bring his pupil with him; this he did, and so began Salieri's service at the Imperial Court, never to be interrupted so long as his powers lasted.

As a practical school, one in which the youth should learn the application of theoretical rules and forms, which at home he had studied in books and scores, Gassmann took his pupil regularly to the theatre. The master directed a new piece but three times, after which Salieri was put at the spinnet or harpsichord—for in the theatre the piano-forte as yet was not, nor had the old mode of directing from a keyed instrument, (kept up in the London Philharmonic concerts long after it had disappeared almost everywhere else) given way to the only true one—since the growth of the modern orchestra—that of a conductor, with his baton, standing or seated, elevated above his forces.

Of the mass of anecdotes and reminiscences which Salieri wrote down in his latter years, Mosel has given a few at length, which are characteristic both of the man—as a youth engaging in adventures and frolics, and as the old man recalling them to mind with evident satisfaction—and of the scenes in which he lived; they are therefore worth repeating.

On one of the first three evenings of some new piece, the music of which pleased him as little as did the public, instead of remaining in his place in the pit, to listen to the musical effects—as Gassmann demanded of him—he gave way to a desire to go upon the stage. He found the machinists at work behind a drop curtain preparing the table for a grand supper to come off in the next scene. Their work was done, but the youth stopped a moment to look at the papier mache pastries, capons, &c.,—when—potz tausend!—the prompter's whistle for change of scene sent up the curtain, and, not to be seen crossing the stage by all the people, and still worse, by his master, the poor boy had to pop under the table—a movement executed without being seen. Now came the actors and seated themselves singing at the table to feast upon their papier mache. There was plenty of room for Anton to remain without touching any one, and, as the scene closed the act, he was comparatively unconcerned, thinking himself safe enough from being discovered by any one, save perhaps a machinist or two. But one of the supperless supper eaters must needs drop his napkin, and stooping to pick it up must needs see something black in the darkness caused by the low hanging tablecloth; and must needs take that something black to be a great dog—and must needs at a pause in the music tell his neighbor of the discovery,—and his neighbor must needs pass the news along, so that in two minutes the four men and four women at table must needs all know about the great black dog, and one of the women must needs be terribly afraid of cats and dogs,—and she must needs spring up with a shriek,—and the small audience must needs have a great laugh—and poor Anton is there half dead with anxiety and fright—all because an actor happened to drop his napkin. However, the music went on, the dog was found to be a young man, the frightened songstress was relieved, and sat down again, laughing, to the papier mache, and so the act came to a close. No sooner was the curtain down than Salieri sprang out, and amid a shout of laughter explained the matter, beseeching the actors not to tell his master, who, as he knew, would soon be upon the stage, and hurried off to his place in the pit. Spite of Anton's prayers Gassmann was told the story immediately. At the close of the play he went into the pit as usual to get his pupil, but said not a word about the affair. Nor at supper, nor afterwards, and the poor fellow went to bed with a lightened heart. Nor at breakfast, and Anton's terrible anxiety was relieved. Nor at dinner, to which Gassmann had invited two friends, was a hint at the great black dog. Before leaving the table an Italian coachman (vetturino) entered, and said that he had been told the master wished to speak with him.

"I have sent for you," answered Gassmann, "to learn whether you are going back soon to Italy, as I am going to send that boy, there, home again."

Pale and frightened, Anton sprang up and told the whole story, half crying, half in fun. Neither Gassmann nor his friends could keep sober faces, and the boy was forgiven, with the proviso of stricter obedience in the future. The boy promised and kept his promise. He learned afterwards that the scene with the Vetturino had been planned beforehand by his master; but even that did not efface the memory of his terrible fright.

To the death of Gassmann, January 22, 1774, Salieri never received any regular salary for his services, either in the Emperor's private concerts or in the theatre; but Joseph made him a present every new year's day, on the first one of fifty, on the others of eighty ducats—the ducat being almost exactly $2.50. Considering what in those days a ducat would buy in Vienna, then an exceedingly cheap place to live in, the present was munificent. Anton always placed the money in his master's hands, who religiously used it for the youth's benefit, in the purchase of clothes and the payment of his other teachers.*

In the large house joining and belonging to the Michael church opposite the Burg theatre, and up four flights of stairs, lived the family Martinez, with whom Metastasio, the poet, lodged. The father, a Neapolitan by birth, Spanish by descent, was now dead; the son an assistant librarian in the Imperial Library; the daughter, Metastasio's celebrated pupil, was the young lady at whose music lessons under Porpora, some fifteen or twenty years before, young Joseph Haydn came down from his garret overhead to play the spinnet or harpsichord.

Miss Martinez played an important part in the musical social life of Vienna for many a year. Thither Gassmann took Anton and introduced him to Metastasio. Every Sunday morning he was there, both for the benefit to be derived from the conversation of the old poet—the most famous perhaps, except Voltaire, then living—and to make the acquaintance of the distinguished literary, scientific and artistic men, as well as others notable only for rank, who honored his Sunday receptions from 9 to 12 A.M. Young Salieri soon became welcome at other times and seasons, and especially evenings, when his aid was gladly accepted in the musical performances of the family; often when they were alone, Metastasio had him read entire scenes from his works dramatically, "which," says Salieri, "was for me an excellent school in declamation—a school, which, in the opinion of Metastasio, is an indispensable necessity to any one who will really cultivate a talent for musical vocal composition."

* Joseph Haydn had a story of his master Reutter, music-director of St. Stephen's, of another color. Time, Nov. 14, 1748; place, Kloster Neuburg, a few miles above Vienna on the Danube; occasion, festival of St. Leopold, at which the Empress Maria Theresa and her husband Francis were present. Haydn's voice—he had long been leading soprano in the Stephen choir—was breaking and the Empress had recently said to Reutter: "Joseph Haydn no longer sings, he croaks." The director had consequently to select another boy for the solos, and Michael Haydn, younger brother of Joseph, was selected, who sang a Salve Regina so exquisitely, that the Empress and her husband gave him each 12 ducats. "Michael," asked Reutter, "what will you do with so much money?" The boy thought a moment. "Our father has just lost a beast. I will send him 12 ducats, and beg you to take care of the rest for me until my voice also breaks." Reutter took such excellent care of the money, that Michael never saw it again.

In those days it was thought necessary to have an education as well as genius; to develop talent as well as possess it; to have the taste refined by an acquaintance with literature and the sister arts, as well as by a knowledge of the great productions in its immediate sphere; and to have the rules of harmony and counterpoint so thoroughly mastered, that the composer no more thought about them when at work, than I do of Murray's Grammar and Whately's Rhetoric while scratching off this sentence. To his acquaintance with Metastasio and the instruction in declamation thus gained was due, in great measure, the great perfection of Salieri's works in echoing the sense of his texts in his music; their real dramatic excellence—a quality so distinguishing them that he, the author, was far down into our own century the great teacher of dramatic composition in Vienna, as Albrechtsberger was of the theory of music.

(To be continued.)

Carl Maria Von Weber.*

A LIFE PICTURE.

(Continued from page 195.)

"The first things Vogler did in the character of a composer were as little to the taste of the refined public at Prague as his teachings and his disputations to that of the strict High School. His opera Castro und Pollux, produced under his own direction, proved an utter failure, while the concerts upon his newly invented instrument, the Orchestron, which had been announced with great pomp and all the means of puffing them known, caused competent judges to shake their heads, and the general public to smile. The learned members of the University called his theory an unfounded assertion, and said that in his propositions he rejected the good with the bad. His form of disputation consisted, according to them, in taking his opponents by surprise, thanks to clever turns and wit, and in gaining over his auditors by outward means without any depth of knowledge, properly so-called; in a word, had people not been compelled to do him justice as a performer on the piano-forte and organ, and had he not been successful in 'simplifying' some instruments of the latter kind, he would have carried with him from Prague, which he left in a very unsatisfactory state of mind, as early as December, 1802, almost the reputation of a declared charlatan. But Vogler was one of those fortunate men whose reputation rises from its ashes with redoubled splendor after each defeat. He proceeded to Vienna. There he had the luck to make his début with a brilliant anecdote, which brought together, in a way exceedingly flattering for him, his name and that of Dr. Gall, then the theme of every one's conversation; he immediately received a commission, as did also Beethoven, to compose an opera for the new Theatre an der Wien (to which commission Samori and Fidelio owe their existence), while the most distinguished musicians of Vienna received him with great respect and looked anxiously forward to what he would do. He knew how to excite this feeling of expectation by mysterious rumors of how he was getting on with Samori, his colossal opera, as it was called, though Beethoven never said a word about his Leonore. As was everywhere the case, by means of a clever mixture of genuine knowledge and ability; talent for teaching; brilliant diction; priestlike dignity; artistic show; aristocratic manners; and the grave demeanor of a thinker, Vogler spread around himself a nimbus which heightened in an extraordinary degree the impression produced by his real merit, and, above all, did not fail to exercise a powerful and victorious influence on the world of young artists, and on the dispositions, a priori, sympathetically organized with his own of elder men like Franz Anton, von Weber, Sonnleithner, Süssmeyer, &c.

* From the Niederrheinische Musik-Zeitung.

"Precisely at this epoch Franz Anton and his son arrived in Vienna, and, after all we have said, it was natural that the hearts and feelings of both should fly towards Vogler as iron flies towards the magnet.

"Carl Maria found a most kind welcome at the house of Count Firmian. There he became acquainted with a young officer, Johann Baptist Gänsbacher, who, having been decorated a short time previously with the gold medal, had quitted the ranks of the volunteer Tyrolean Sharpshooters, and, impelled by an ardent love for music, had sought at the foot of Vogler and Albrechtsberger to become initiated in the highest theory of the art, in which he had received preparatory instruction from his father, a worthy schoolmaster at Sterzing in the Tyrol. Gänsbacher possessed a good, sturdy, vigorous, material nature, fond of wine and women, in addition to art, and passionately attached to rifle-shooting, in which he excelled. Eight years older than Weber, endowed, thanks to his military career, with liberal views of life, broad shouldered and robust of body, besides being a good musician into the bargain, he speedily acquired a great influence over Weber, who began to love him tenderly. This love, cemented by many a youthful prank played in common; many an affliction shared by both; many a service rendered; and by similar yearnings and aims, became a truly fraternal affection, as Weber strongly proved by his actions up to within a few months of his death.

"In Vienna, Gänsbacher commenced by rendering Carl Maria the great service of introducing him, by means of his patron, Count Firmian, to Vogler, and of inducing the latter to hear him play. The rest was effected by Carl Maria's talent itself. Vogler immediately admitted him into the innermost circle of his favorite disciples, fostering and observing the young man's great and quickly recognized talent as it deserved to be recognized. Vogler's glance, sharpened by the most extensive practise in teaching, necessarily very soon caused him to perceive that he had to do with one gifted with natural qualities of the very highest description; one whose most inward being was connected with the production of the Brilliant, the Charming, and the Captivating, but who, in consequence of this, and of his circumstances, seconded by a vain father and early successes, had been led into the most imminent danger of sinking down to amateurish and pleasing trifles. He applied, therefore, with wisdom and love, the influence he had so quickly acquired over his admirable pupil, to inspire the latter with a love for the seriousness of art. All the weight of his opinion and advice was needed to lead back the impetuous youth, so successful in his efforts, from the bright sphere of original creation, and dreams of early mastership, to the narrow limits of modest, dark learning. The whole intelligence of the young musician was needed to understand the necessity of so hard a retrograde step, and to follow it up as consistently as he actually did."

At a subsequent period, after 1807, Vogler obtained a brilliant material position in Darmstadt, whither the Grand-Duke Ludwig I. attracted him. He was created there spiritual privy-councillor, with 2,200 florins salary, and board and lodgings in the palace, together with wood, and four wax candles a day. "His talents, however, lay pretty well fallow, as the Grand-Duke neither listened to his counsels, nor gave him, as a rule, the management of the musical performances, with the exception of those of his own works. Vogler was thus able to devote his whole time to his scientific labors and studies. With all this, as a man honored by the Grand-Duke, he was held in the greatest respect. Nearly every day he was the Grand-Duke's companion at table, where he greatly relished his burgundy, and at Court and in the town there was no better known or more popular figure, but scarcely, in outward appearance, one more striking, than that of Abbé Vogler. He was small and corpulent in stature, and possessed also strongly marked features, the expression of which was seldom a kind one. With his long arms and his large hands, so large that he could span two octaves, he appeared to have been made expressly for playing the organ, but this formation of body, admirable as it was for the above purpose, gave him somewhat the look of an ape. He had grown more vain than ever, and always dressed in a most elegant, broad-skirted black tail coat, black satin breeches, red stockings, and shoes with yellow buckles. He wore the grand cross of the Order of Leopold upon his left breast, while, attached to his right shoulder, the little black silk cloak of an Abbé hung down his back and reached the bend of his knees."

Here the more intimate circle at Vogler's was formed by Gänsbacher, Weber and Meyerboer, the last-named of whom, then scarcely sixteen years old, had already created a sensation (1810) and resided with the Abbé. "Most days were passed in musical exercises and works, which were frequently executed in Vogler's house, on his good instruments and under his advice. Often, also, the young men accompanied the greatest organ-player of the day to one of the churches, and never, as Weber frequently assured his hearers, did Vogler, in his fantasias and preludes, drink so immediately out of the virgin spring of the Beautiful, as when, in the presence only of his three beloved disciples, as he was fond of calling them, he caused angelic voices or words of thunder to issue from the organ. The evenings generally glided by in serious conversation with Vogler, or at Hoffmann's where Vogler or one of the young musicians extemporized, though now and then they went through some work of merit, or indulged merely in conversation. The old master, whose serious face did not well understand how to smile, grew young again in the society of the promising Epigoni, whose intellectual strength and talent were perfectly manifest to an experienced judge of men and artists like him. He was accustomed to say subsequently of Carl Maria and Meyerbeer: 'Oh, had I been compelled to leave the world before I had formed these two, what grief I should have experienced! There is something within me which I could not evoke; these two will do so for me! what would Pergino be, and what Fra Bartolomeo without Raffael!'

"But, as Weber expresses it, the three shook the dust from their skins, on leaving the society of the old gentlemen and going out of an evening, when they proceeded to 'collect melodies,' that is to drink wine in taverns where there was singing, or twanging on the either or harp. In the presence of soldiers and their girls, Carl Maria could there sling a guitar round his neck, and getting upon a table, sing roguish songs, as he used to do in the wildest time of his life, so that there was no end to the applause, till the tobacco smoke drove him away. In return, he obtained from national songs many hints in life and melody."

(To be Continued.)

The History of the Violin.

A London critic thus glances at this subject, à-propos to a new work (by W. Sandys and S. A. Forster) bearing the above title:

Of all musical instruments the violin is the only one that has not undergone continued and progressive improvement. Even the more ancient instruments, such as the harp, the flute, and the organ, have been subject to constant alterations and modifications down to the present time, the early types of these instruments having about the same relation to their present successors as the aboriginal hut to the modern villa. The violin, however, has remained in almost the same state for nearly three centuries, and appears little likely to be subject to the changes which have affected all other instruments—its symmetrical form and perfect adaptation to its purpose seeming to defy all innovations, whether of capricious taste or inventive skill. Certainly the art of violin making has rather retrograded than advanced since the days of the great Cremona makers, the Amatis, Stradivarius, and the Guarnerius family, who produced those masterpieces which remain still the despair of modern instrument makers. That age has some influence in perfecting the tone of violins and other instruments of that family there can be no doubt, but that much more is due to the superior skill of the great makers of old is also unquestionable, else why the vast superiority of the instruments made by these exceptional artists over the works of contemporary makers? Care in the selection of the finest wood, accurate proportion and well-rounded symmetry in the shape, and a perfect balance in the thickness of the corresponding portions of the instrument; all these, with other points of extreme nicety which escaped less skilful mechanists, have contributed to make up that perfection of tone and beauty of appearance which render the best Italian instruments of the seventeenth and early part of the eighteenth centuries unapproachable by modern imitators. The closest copies of these models, and the attempt to anticipate the effects of age by baking the wood and constant action of the bow on the strings by mechanical agency, have not succeeded in equalling the Cremona violin.

In many respects the violin is the most important of all instruments. Although not so independent as the organ or the pianoforte, nor so capable in itself of rendering a transcript of any music of combination; on the other hand it is the only instrument that, like the human voice, possesses the power of perfect intonation. Moreover, the direct agency, of the fingers on the strings, without the intervention of mechanical appliances, added to the sustained sound produced by the action of the bow, give to the violin a susceptibility to the feeling and passion of the player that no other instrument possesses. Then, again, the violin and its relatives, the viola, the violoncello, and the contra-basso, form the groundwork of the orchestra—the centre of the musical picture to which the wind instruments contribute little more than the lights and shades and accessories.

The colloquial terms "fiddle" and "fiddler" seem to have been in very early use, being met with in the old poets even before Chaucer; and as the "fiddle" was formerly the chief instrument of itinerant performers at merry-makings and "fiddlers" were frequently included among the humble retainers of the great and wealthy, the term was very frequently used as a reproach, implying low habits and servitude. Thus, in the "Taming of the Shrew," Hortensio is made to complain of being called "rascal fiddler, and twangling Jack, with twenty such vile terms." Even to the present day, "fiddle" and "fiddler" are almost unconsciously associated with something trifling and small, and convey an impression rather of street minstrelsy than of that refinement and importance which properly attach to the violin and its modern cultivation. To apply the term "fiddler" therefore (as is still sometimes done), to a skilful and intelligent performer on the violin is a solecism in taste and manners.

The origin of the violin, like all remote origins, is difficult to trace with any certainty. Its earliest type is doubtless to be found in instruments of the lyre or lute species, the strings of which were pinched by the fingers, or struck by the plectrum. The date of the introduction of the bow, which gives its speciality to the violin, is variously stated. In the tenth and eleventh centuries (and probably even earlier) a rude kind of bow was used with the old rote or crwth (crowth); these instruments being among the precursors of the violin. The book before us gives various theories and authorities on this subject, and the authors are disposed to attribute the introduction of the bow to this country. The nearest ancient approach to the modern violin and bow is to be found in a figure painted on the roof of the Peterborough Cathedral, considered to be of the date of about 1194. Judging by the representation of this which is given in the book, both instrument and bow bear a very close resemblance to the present form. The viol, which is played on by a crowned figure, has curved sides, four strings, and two sound-holes; so that there are all the essentials, in a somewhat more clumsy shape, of the violin of the present day. It appears to have been after the thirteenth century that the violin began to approach its perfection, which, however, it probably did not fully attain much before the sixteenth century, during which period the great Cremona makers arose, and apparently realized all the structural capabilities of the instrument. So precious have the best preserved specimens of this school become, that three hundred guineas and upwards have been known to be given for a fine Cremona, the original intrinsic value of the materials being scarcely as many pence. But, as with many other works of art (for these old makers were artists rather than mechanics), the cheapest materials may be moulded into the costliest productions. A fine Italian violin, with its beautiful outline, graceful proportions, and brilliant varnish, has a fascination for amateurs scarcely surpassed by any other art passion. To this class, and to all who take an interest in the subject, the volume before us offers much valuable information. The historical and antiquarian portion has been carefully and laboriously compiled; while, with some occasional irrelevancies, the practical portion of the subject is well treated. There are many illustrations representing ancient instruments, and full details of the principal makers of various periods and countries, and the volume is calculated to be a useful addition to the musical library.

Serenades.

Few associations are more romantic than those connected with the graceful old custom of saluting beauty and virtue with the dulcet strains of music, in the clear obscure of some climate in which large stars and perfumed breezes form a portion of the "properties" of the average summer night. It was by the passionate lovers of Southern Europe that the serenade was first devised, as a vehicle for the conveyance of compliments to their mistresses, after the latter were supposed to have let down their back hair and retired for the night. The usage is one redolent of much that is delightful. It is linked inseparably with lustrous eyes, orange bowers, gondolas, guitars, Tom Mooreish maidens, the crisp-leaved myrtle, and that erotic bird which seems to have been providentially created for the poet, as a rhyme to it. The serenade, as its name denotes, can take rank as an institution under serene skies only. As a general thing, indeed, music does not seem to flourish among the northern races. Æolian harps came by nature, but the Boreal variety of that combination of wind and string has yet to be discovered. Refer to that small but nimble savage the Esquimaux, and you will find that the nearest approach to a musical instrument possessed by him is the high strung snow-shoe, on which he performs marches indeed, but neither serenades nor any other sort of "lascivious pleasing." The Russian has his own idea of music as he has of meat, and there is a flavor of caviar in his cavatinas. His greatest musical triumph, perhaps, was the production of that renowned horn-band of twenty-four slabby serfs, who used to provoke calliopean blares from twenty-four straight brass trumpets varying in length from twenty-four inches to twenty-four feet. These musical moujiks of the Czar, however, were no exponents of the serenade. Their strains were rather of the reveille character, and better adapted as an accompaniment to the "shrill clarion" of the village rooster, than as a hushaby to fringed eye-lids closing like leaves of belladonna over orbs that are courting balmy sleep. For this, among other things, the northern races are to be pitied, for there is a wealth of poetry in the serenade.

In this country, whose inhabitants are not necessarily of northern race, and where everything seems to take root, just as everybody seems to take bitters, the serenade has become a plant of the soil. Like the Italian organ-grinder, however, it has come to be so greatly Americanized as to require tobacco-juice to stimulate its action. It is a peculiarity of all our great cities that they are provided with excellent bands—a fact which may or may not be owing to the German element that is sown broadcast among us. The foreign visitor to our shores, particularly if his coming is from sunny Italy or olivaceous Spain, will pause and "take the music," as Mr. Lincoln says, when he hears the pensive cadences of one of these bands vibrating in the soft air of the summer night. They remind him involuntarily of the orange bowers, Tom Mooreish maidens, et cetera, enumerated in the foregoing paragraph, and his thoughts revert to the well-fledged cupid of his own country, as he lights a fresh cigar. He marks the mellow horns of the Sax pattern pouring out the music of "Don Pasquale" to a brown-stone front, and a pardonable curiosity prompts him to watch the balcony for the wave of a gossamer handkerchief or the filly-like whisk of a yard or so of liberated back hair.

But no such sentiment actuates the musicians, who are practical men, and paid for what they are doing. Nothing in the shape of an orange bower blooms behind that brown stone front—though the lemon may be there, we admit, in connection with a bowl of punch. The myrtle plant bloweth not within, though the manufactured tobacco does. No gossamer handkerchief waves thanks from the balcony, but as the shadowed walls reverberate the well-timed staccato of Com' é gentil, the window opens, and a male person (possibly with but little back hair to speak of, and no front) steps on to the balcony, and returns thanks in a remarkably set speech for the compliment paid him. For all the foreigner from the sunny land knows, this may be Mr. Lincoln himself, "taking the music." Or, more likely, it may be some successful contractor of the shoddy stamp, running for aldermanic honours perhaps, if not for congressional, and who ogles his admirers with spectacles instead of with lustrous orbs, who, if he does possess a gossamer or any other kind of handkerchief, ought to use it in preference to his coat-sleeve for wiping the perspiration from his manly brow.

And the bewildered child of the sunny land turns and leaves the spot, a sadder man than ever, if not actually gone imbecile from what he has heard and seen. It is impossible for one brought up as he has been, to understand why a band of serenaders should apply Com' é gentil to a person like him who has just bowed himself out of the balcony, or with what interest they kept inviting that person, in the most beseeching tones, to "Come to them as daylight sets o'er the moonlit sea." But then he is only a foreigner, and can hardly be expected to realize the immense results connected with our style of serenading—such as the whiskey bill, for instance.—The Round Table.

Music Abroad.

BERLIN.—Mdlle. de Ahna appeared as Orpheus in Gluck's Orpheus und Eurydice, but was not so successful as Mdlle. Lucca in Martha. The position of a contralto is not a very important one upon the German stage, because it commands only a limited range of good characters. To obtain a first-class position, both in an artistic as well as a pecuniary sense, a contralto is obliged to attempt parts unfitted for her, and to force her voice. This is, in most cases, attended with consequences very prejudicial to the artist. This was one of the causes which brought Johanna Wagner's career to so early a termination, and a similar fate would appear to be destined for Mdlle. de Ahna, unless she alters her tactics. Like the lady just mentioned, she has been forcing her voice in such characters as Elizabeth in Tannhäuser; Donna Elvira, in Don Juan; and recently, Armande, in Herr Gustav Schmidt's opera La Réole. The consequence is that she is no longer able to do justice to the music of Orpheus, though the part is naturally adapted to her. Her acting, moreover, was not up to the mark, and altogether the impression she produced on competent judges was not satisfactory, although the general public were liberal in their applause. Mdlle. Santer was the Eurydice, a part filled on the revival of the opera some years ago, by Mad. Köster. Apropos of this lady; she has again retired from public gaze for a year, after having appeared in Fidelio, Don Juan, Die Vestalin and Armida. Every thing human, as most of us know to our cost, is perishable, and nothing more so than the human voice. What a pity it is that no kind friend will impress this fact upon Mad. Köster.

A young lady of this name of Kropp has cropped up from Vienna, and sustained, or, more correctly, endeavored to sustain the principal soprano part in Lucia, Robert le diable and I Montecchi e Capuletti. I am sorry to add that her ambition was greater than her vocal powers. She failed to please the public, or to obtain an engagement. She was to have sung the rôle of Venus in Wagner's Tannhäuser, but left without doing so, in consequence, so it is said, of her inability to await the arrival of another "Gast"—Anglière, guest; star; or artist out of an engagement seeking to procure one—Herr Hagen, from Hamburg, who was to be the Tannhäuser on the occasion, but was prevented from coming as soon as he intended. He paid us a visit, however, shortly after Mdlle. Kropp's departure, and sang in Herr Wagner's opera above-mentioned, as well, or, rather, as badly, as in Auber's Muette. My space is valuable, and, therefore I will briefly dismiss Herr Hagen by stating that I do not think him equal to the place he wished to obtain: namely, that of heroic tenor. I am afraid it is too much for him. In Tannhäuser, Mad. Harriers-Wippen was the Elizabeth. The music was, it is true, only Wagner's, still she might have learnt it, if it were but for the respect due to the public, who are always exceedingly kind to her. She was, however, not perfect, and, in consequence, spoiled the effect of her most telling "bit," the prayer in the third act. Yet, after all, who that is well acquainted—with the score before him, of course—with what Herr Wagner writes shall dare to blame her.

Before concluding my account of what has taken place at the Royal Opera House, I may mention that Madlle. Lucca played there the other evening for the last time, previously to her departure for Hamburg, where she is to give six performances. The part she selected, in which to bid adieu for awhile to her patrons here, was that of Cherubino in Le Nozze. The audience were loud in the manifestations of their delight.

We have had concerts galore; even a bare list of all of them would nearly fill one number of the Musical World. First comes the two Soirées of the Royal Domechor, the programmes of which were highly interesting and comprised, among other pieces too numerous to mention, the ten-part "Crucifixus," by Lotti; the motet, "Jesu, mein Freude," by J. S. Bach; a piece by Palestrina, "Velum Templi aciesum est;" a graduale, "Ecce quomodo moritur Justus," by Jacob Handel (1550-91) Mozart's Miserere; a motet, "Hilf Herr," by Homilius (1714-85); "O magnum mysterium," for two choruses, by Alessandro Scarlatti; a piece for male voices, by Ludovico Viadana (1625); "Requiem eternam," by Nic. Jomelli (1713-74); a motet (soprano, two contraltos, tenor and bass), by Melchior Franck (1580-1639); motet (two sopranos, contralto, and bass.) Sebastian Bach (1685-1750); and 97th Psalm, by Otto Nicolai. The above works were, with scarcely an exception executed in a most admirable manner. Then we have had the Sinfonie-Soirées of the King's Private Band, which fully maintained its reputation; the Subscription Concerts of the Frauenverein for the Gustavus Adolphus Fund; the Subscription Concerts of Carlberg's Orchestral Union; the Subscription Concerts of Herren Zimmermann and Stahlknecht; the Soirées of Herren Engelhardt, Hellmich, and Zurn; Herr Hans von Bülow's Piano-forte-Soirées, etc., etc. To attempt to send you a detailed criticism of them, or even to set down the various compositions comprised in the programmes, would go far to justify the belief that the person doing so stood in urgent and immediate need of a strait-waist-coat and a keeper.

A bright particular star, in the person of Mdlle. Artôt, appeared in our operatic heavens the other evening. The part selected for her début was that of Rosine in Il Barbiere. It is now four years since this lady made her first appearance before a Berlin public, in the same character, and as a member of the Italian Opera Company at the Victoria Theatre, her leading colleagues being Signori Carrion, Delle Sedie, Brémoud and Fricci. She was a great success, and for night after night, as I duly chronicled at the time, the theatre was crammed by an enthusiastic and enraptured audience. I am afraid that her present engagement will not turn out quite such a series of triumphs. I have spoken with a great many persons, and, with hardly an exception, they say she is not what she was.

The other operas performed since I wrote have been M. Gounod's Faust, Gluck's Orpheus, Donizetti's Figlia del Reggimento; and on the 10th inst., Mr. or Herr Jules Benedict's long promised, and impatiently expected opera, Die Rose von Erin.

So much at the present in the way of opera. Concerning concerts, I may mention that Herren Stahlknecht and Zimmermann have brought their this year's series of Soirées for Chamber-Music to a close. The programme for the last Soirée comprised: Quartet, in G minor, Haydn; Beethoven's Grand Trio in D major, and Quartet in E minor. Herren Zimmermann and Stahlknecht deserve the thanks of all those who love music of the first order. Handel's Judas Macabæus was executed the other day by the members of Stern's Gesangverein, but somewhat after the style of Hamlet without the part of the vacillating and reflecting young Dane. Herr Krause was so hoarse that the entire bass part had to be omitted. The remaining parts were entrusted to Mesdames Cash-Lowy, Pressler, and Herr Woworsky. The ladies were pretty good, but Herr Woworsky was not equal to the part of Judas. The choruses went well.—Corr. Lond. Mus. World.

The Orchestra of Feb. 20 states:

Benedict's new opera, "The Rose of Erin," has been produced, under which name Englishmen will have little difficulty in recognizing the "Lily of Killarney." As Erin is at the best a word better known than the lesser name, it was considered advisable to alter the title. The Signale in writing of Benedict, says: "The composer of this 'Rose,' born in Stuttgart, and living for the last twenty-five years in London, saw his talent betimes strew roses on the way. He had little trouble with the thorns, which tear the young wings of so many soaring artists. The son of a rich banker, Benedict, like Meyerbeer and Mendelssohn, enjoyed a youth free of care; and his means allowed him to study under Hummel at Weimar, as a pianist, and under Weber in Dresden, as a composer. In the English world of music Benedict is much admired, and, from his long sojourn in England, it is natural he should, in his 'Rose of Erin,' respect rather the forum of the London public than of the German art-critic." As the Signale indeed augurs, the music of the "Rose"—quasi "Lily"—falls flat on German ears, which cannot decide whether the composition belongs to the class of simple national melody, or aims at grand opera. The scenery absorbed general attention, to the detriment of the music.

LIEGE.—The Concert of the Conservatory, on the 6th inst., under the direction of that excellent conductor M. Soubre, was highly interesting, both on account of the pieces selected, and of the manner in which they were performed. The programme included specimens of the Symphonies of Haydn, Beethoven and Weber; choruses from Handel's Samson, and two pieces by Ferdinand Hiller: "Heloise und die Nonnen an Abelard's Grab," and "Palmsontag-Morgen." The audience received the two latter compositions in the most hearty fashion. Herr Hiller was called for several times, and had to bow his thanks from the orchestra. "Palmsontag-Morgen" was encored. The Legia Vocal Association for Male Voices, which lately carried off the prize of honor at Aix la-Chapelle, showed their respect for Herr Hiller, by giving him a serenade, despite the bitterly cold night, and finishing with some hearty cheers in his honor.

LEIPZIG. As it is interesting to keep the run of the 20 subscription concerts given every winter in the Gewandhaus—those concerts once conducted by Mendelssohn, who raised the Leipzig music to its high standard, afterwards by Rietz, and now by Reinicke, —we copy the following programmes:

Thirteenth concert. Overture to the opera La Chasse du jeune Henri, Méhul; Recitative and aria from Don Juan, Mozart, sung by Madlle. Orgeni; Concerto for the violin (first movement), Joachim, played by Herr August Wilhelm, Jun.; Recitative and aria from Norma, Bellini, sung by Madlle. Louise von Pöllnitz, from Berlin; Concerto (D major) for Piano-forte, with orchestral accompaniment, composed and executed by Herr Otto Singer, of Dresden; Songs with the Piano sung by Madlle. von Pöllnitz: "Loreley," Liszt, and "Frühlingssnacht," Schumann; Symphony (C major, No. 2), Schumann. At the fourteenth concert the programme consisted of the overture to Dame Kobold, Reinecke; concert air, Mendelssohn, (sung by Mdlle. Elizabeth Metzdröff, from St. Petersburg); Concerto for the violin (No. 19, D minor), Krentzer (played by Herr Lauterbach, from Dresden); Cavatina from Robert le Diable, Meyerbeer (sung by Mdlle. Metzdröff); Concertstück for the violin, composed and played by Herr Lauterbach (now, MS.); and Beethoven's music to Goethe's Egmont, with connecting words by Mosengell, the words spoken by Herr Hanisch, and the songs sung by Mdlle. Metzdröff.

Fifteenth. B flat major Symphony, by Haydn; Piano-forte Concerto, by Weber, (played by Herr Wilhelm Trieber, from Gratz); Overture to the opera of Dionys (unfinished), by Norbert Burgmüller (first time); E flat major Rondo, by Mendelssohn (Herr W. Trieber); and B flat major Symphony (No. 1) by Robert Schumann. The members of the Singacademie propose giving a performance on the 21st inst., of Mendelssohn's Elijah, for the benefit of the Schleswig-Holsteiner. At the 16th Gewandhaus-Concert, the following pieces were performed: F major Symphony (No. 8), Beethoven; Andante for the flute, Mozart (played by M. de Vroye, from Paris); aria from Brünnhilde, Graun (sung by Mad. Viardot Garcia); "Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt," Mendelssohn's air from Idomeno, Mozart (sung by Mad. Viardot Garcia); Fantasia for the flute, on motives from La Juive, M. de Vroye (executed by the composer); Songs at the piano (sung by Mad. Viardot Garcia).

COLOGNE.—The following compositions constituted the programme of the seventh Gesellschafts-Concert, under the direction of Herr Ferdinand Hiller: Overture to Prometheus (first time) Woldegar Bargiel; Piano-forte Concerto in E flat major, Beethoven (played by Herr Pauer, from London); "Busslied" for baritone solo, chorus with organ accompaniment (first time), Meyerbeer (soloist, Herr Max Stägemann from Hanover); Variations for the piano on a theme by Mozart, by Herr Pauer; "La Cascade" by the same (played by the composer); Songs by J. Rietz and L. Hartemann (Herr Stägemann); Symphony in G major, by J. Haydn; and Mendelssohn's music to "Die erste Walpurgisnacht," by Goethe.

WEIMAR.—No one has yet been appointed Capellmeister in the place of Dr. Franz Liszt. It was thought, at one time, that Herr Richard Wagner would succeed him, and then that Herr Hans von Bülow would be called upon to wield the bâton in the grand-ducal orchestra, but neither of these gentlemen have been nominated. The duties of the post are fulfilled by two leaders, Herren Carl Stör and Edward Lassen. The tenth anniversary of the Association for the Promotion of Art and Science, founded by Dr. Franz Liszt, was celebrated by a grand entertainment at which the following was the programme: "Orpheus" (a symphonic poem; arranged for violin, harp, violoncello, harmonium, and piano-forte, by Zellner, Vienna); two songs by Lassen and Stör; "Die Flüchtlinge," by Dr. Dingelstedt; Liszt's "Loreley Nocturne," Duet from Hector Berlioz's opera: Béatrice et Bénédict; Fantasia in F on themes from Euryanthe, by B. Lössmann; Bürger's "Leonore," with melo-dramatic accompaniment by Liszt; scene from the 2nd act of Herr Richard Wagner's Tristan und Isolde; and Schiller's "Punschlied" set to music by Lassen. The festival opened with a highly successful prologue by Dr. Dingelstedt. At the opera-house Die Zauberkolbe, Zampa, La Juive, Le Nozze, Stradella, Fra Diavolo, and Orpheus, went as well as could be expected, considering the feebleness of the first tenor, the inefficiency of the chorus, and the numerical weakness of the stringed quartet. The following were the programmes of the concerts given by the Grand-Ducal Private Band: at the first concert—Symphony, No. 8, Beethoven; "Requiem für Mignon," R. Schumann; Beethoven's Violin Concerto (played by Herr Kömpel, one of Spohr's pupils); and aria with obligato clarinet accompaniment by Mozart (sung by Mad. von Milde); at the second concert—Overture to Fidello (E major); Mozart's Jupiter Symphony; airs from Iphigenia auf Tauris, and Linda di Chamouni (Mad. von Milde); Fantasia for the flute, by Briccialdi (performed by Herr Winkler) together with "Rêverie pastorale" and "Galop fantastique," written and played by M. Louis Brassin. The usual grand concert took place at the Court, on the 7th inst., when the following pieces were selected for performance: "Pasacaglia," by S. Bach, scored by Esser; air and march from the opera of Die Brüder, words by Lohmann, music by Götz; scene from Wagner's Tristan und Isolde; Dr. Franz Liszt's "Loreley" with instrumental accompaniment; "Hexenlianze," by Paganini, and the first movement from Beethoven's Violin Concerto (played by Herr J. Lotto). Herr Schnorr von Carolsfeld, from Dresden, sang the tenor music on the occasion. Herr Ferdinand Hiller's opera, Die Katakomben, has been most successfully produced.

VIENNA. Offenbach's new opera, "The Rhine Fairies," has proved successful. The Orchestra (London) says of it:

So little is the Viennese musical world accustomed to novelty in opera, that people go about with the map or Denmark in one hand and the playbill of the Court Theatre in the other; and at night the seat of war is forgotten on the seats of the parquet. "Die Rheinnixen" is French in idea, romantic by name, elfin and absurd in construction. A young maiden who sings so long, that she sings herself to death, and, passing to fayland, is re-uscitated to a world of song, being only in a trance, forms the plot of M. Nuister, done into German by Herr von Wolzogen. The idea is so absurdly impossible, and, in fact, incomprehensible, that the wonder is, Offenbach was led to accept such a subject as the groundwork whereon to exercise his thorough dramatic knowledge and high musical ability. His music is of the romantic school, flowing in melody, true to the subject, clever in expression and instrumentation. It is a pretentious opera—far removed from the homastic; yet it goes farther in musical novelty than many another, and is more dramatic in melody. Offenbach's prominent gift lies in rhythmic force. Complaints may be levelled on the score of repetition; for the composer, like others of his day, is disposed to repeat himself here and there; for the rest, he is hardly admitted to the first rank of musical genius. His talent comprises rather simplicity and smoothness than lyric force; yet we should be content to have more melodious composers sharing his ability.

PARIS.—Lent in and the world fasting; Paris in sackcloth and ashes, and the Murchisio sisters at the Italian. Not that Paris troubles itself much about Lent, merely absolving itself from the nuisance of conventionalities, and devoting itself to legitimate theatre-going, which is compatible with fasting, of course. As for the sackcloth, so long as it is well made and the ashes odorous and suggestive of mille-fleurs, it is rather becoming than otherwise, and sic lieu. And as for the Marchisio sisters, they afford a pretext for going to the theatre and enjoying "Semiramide." Their debut was unqualified: enthusiasm there was, sufficient to chase even the shyness of Carlotta, who is painfully bashful, and requires two rappels nightly, as a "pick-me-up." She is a little undecided and embarrassed in singing; otherwise her modesty is charming. Her sister Barbara is somewhat similar in incertitude, but her voice is rich and delicate in shadow, and her reception cannot be gainsaid. Then, Paris has the debut of Mme. Spezzia in "Norma" last week to talk about. Everybody knew Mme. Vander-Beck's Adalgisa; and Pollio through the lips of Nicolini has sung all the season. Everybody knew, too, Antonnacci; and in short, Mme. Spezzia was the—I had almost written Spezziality! Joking apart, however (and Paris has hardly become Byronic), Spezzia has acquired a reputation in Italy—deserved or undeserved? Doubts have been suggested, but are rather ungenerous. She has a rich, full, sonorous voice, which she sometimes finds a difficulty in managing.

Patti and Mario are delightful at the Lyrique, where "Marta" will present Patti in conjunction with Delle Sedie; while at the Opéra Comique "Lura" is in active rehearsal, the parts having been distributed. An awful melo-drama, founded upon the history of Louis XIII., is the sensation at the Gaité, and is horrible enough to satiate even Parisian taste for novelty. Concert events consist of the third of the Conservatory—specialized, as most of these concerts are, by German music—and of the first concert of classical music given on Sunday in the Cirque Napoléon—also Mendelssohnish and Beethovenish in character. A series of official concerts are to follow the travesty halls given to the Ministers of State and Foreign Affairs by the Dukes and Duchesses De Morny and De Bassano. Rubini, Carvalho, Faure, Gardoni, Braga, and Ed. Battiste are the artists named. Patti and Mme. Trebelli-Bettini appeared at the Hôtel de Ville a few evenings ago.—Corr. Orchestra.

Musical Correspondence.

PHILADELPHIA, FEB. 28.—MR. WOLFSOHN'S third soirée was given last evening. The first part consisted of a Trio by Beethoven, for piano, violin and 'cello. It was the familiar and ever welcome one in C minor, the third of the first set—the opus 1 of the André edition.

The second part of the concert commenced with Liszt's Schiller-march. There is little to be said about this composition except that it is very, very difficult and quite uninteresting. It was encored, however, which, I take it, was rather in acknowledgement of Mr. Wolfsohn's skill, than because of the composition he had just played. He was kind enough to spare us a repetition of the march, but gave us Liszt's exquisite transcription of Schubert's "Lob der Thäner." The other piano selections were Chopin's "Polonaise Militaire" and Etudes by Chopin and Henselt. Than these nothing could have been more acceptable.

Last on the programme was a Quintet by Schubert, for piano and stringed instruments, played here for the first time. It is one of Schubert's lighter efforts, but is full of the characteristic genial melodic and harmonic forms of the great master, who, even in his lighter moments, cannot fail to interest. Of the five movements, the first (allegro vivace) and the second (andante) seemed the best. The fourth contains a series of beautiful variations on the song "Die Forelle." The effect of both of the concerted pieces would have been better, had the first violin been in the hands of a more efficient performer.

Fearful, lest the slight derangement of programmes, caused by the absence of Mr. Theodore Thomas, might be interpreted unfavorably, Mr. Wolfsohn has shifted the onus from his shoulders to those of the audience. Instead of being obliged to ask the indulgence of the subscribers, he has increased their debt to him. He had promised only one concert with songs, and we have already heard HABELMANN in three of his soirées. On this occasion he sang Beethoven's Adelaide and two of Abt's ballads.

Herr Habelmann is a favorite here, and has become the pet of "our best society." Besides the honors of such a position he will soon reap some of its profits, as his admirers, (the female portion of whom have already exhausted all the saccharine adjectives in the vocabulary of praise in his favor) are about to give a complimentary concert for his benefit. Gossip says that the marked preference bestowed upon him has created bitterness and heart-burning in the green room of the Academy, or, as I should say, among the members of the German opera company. As such scandal is not within my province, I have not cared to investigate it. Suffice it to say, Herr Habelmann has been voted a "lovely tenor," which is more than the Philadelphians were willing to say of Mazzoleni or any other singer since Brignoli. Could ambitious mortal desire greater praise than that? Is it not enough for one man to know that when he steps on the boards, every fair damsel grasps her lorgnette, and with its glass eyes hides her beauteous orbs from those who do not happen to be looking at the "lovely tenor," and that she does this merely to satisfy her curiosity regarding him? It is well that in this instance the recipient of such honors is a capable and deserving artist.

The German opera company has just left us after a season of three weeks, during which it met with varied success far below its deserts. The operas given here for the first time, were Spohr's Jessonda and Wagner's Tannhäuser. In spite of the numerous managerial shortcomings, it has hitherto struggled successfully against the accidents of fortune and the blunders of its friends. Its prospects seem very doubtful, and affairs seem to have reached such a crisis with the Anschutz opera troupe, that new aid will have to be furnished to prevent it from becoming disintegrated. I should regret this deeply, for I know of no event that would be so discouraging to those lovers of music who have the success of German opera at heart.

MARCH 4.—The Habelmann complimentary concert was quite a brilliant gathering. The hero of the evening was greeted with a perfect storm of applause. He bore his honors modestly and sang superbly. His songs were Schnbert's "Am Meer," Fesca's "Das Mädchen am Fenster," Abt's "Vogelgesang," and the inevitable "Schlafe wohl," &c. His assistants were a gentleman amateur with a rich baritone voice, and a lady amateur of mezzo soprano capabilities; they reflected great credit upon their preceptor, Signor Perelli, whose accompaniments were, however, discreditable. Another amateur, a pupil of Mr. Wolfsohn's, took part in a duet for two pianos and played with much ease and precision. As the concert was rather a private affair, intended as an act of homage to Herr Habelmann, and not for the purpose of displaying the abilities of the amateurs who assisted him, exacting criticism were out of place. For all that, it is but just to say, that their's was not the least interesting part of the programme. Herr Habelmann must have been delighted with the hearty fervor with which his admirers manifested their regard for him.

Messrs. Cross and Jarvis gave their second soirée last Tuesday evening. The concerted pieces were Spohr's Quintet for piano and wind instruments; Quartet No. 3 by Mozart; and a duet for two pianos by Kalkbrenner. The solos were "Vie oragrise" by Henselt, an Etude by Chopin, and the difficult A flat Polonaise by Chopin; also a violoncello solo by Servais, executed by Mr. Ahrend, and songs by Herr Habelmann.

Mr. Jarvis played all the piano solos and, with Mr. Cross, the piano duet. Mr. Gaertner led the Mozart quartet with his usual vigor and more than usual gracefulness of execution. The soirée was well attended, the performance excellent. s.

CAIRO, ILL., MARCH 2.—Knowing that everything which has a musical bearing is interesting to you, I send you a programme of an unpretending "grand" concert which has just occurred here, for the benefit of refugees in trouble. It is a musical straw which will serve to show that the westward current is carrying music with it. In fact I know New England boys and girls too, beyond the Mississippi and the Rocky Mts., are singing the old familiar home songs.

The concert was "grand" of course, like every other. It was an experiment, both subjectively and objectively. The ten singers had never practiced together, excepting at the few rehearsals necessary. The "string band" of eight had never performed in public. Such a concert had never been given in Cairo. In two particulars the result of the experiment was success, i.e., pecuniarily and in its reception by the audience.

The programme was necessarily light, on account of the mixed character of the audience, and the proclivities of a few of the performers.

There is some music in Cairo. Inspection of the young ladies' music stands does not show more than the average proportion of trash. Beethoven's Sonnatas appear there, and now and then one or two of Mendelssohn's Songs without Words. The Lieder are presumptive evidence of a love for genuine music. They are not "show" pieces.

In the limited circle of my acquaintance I can count two of Messrs. Chickering's pianos, two Steinway's, a Hallet & Cumston, a Bradbury and a Knabe. I do not include various superannuated machines, by unheard of makers, rebel trophies at the Naval Station. The above are new instruments and good ones.

It is amusing to find the old partisan warfare renewed here between the Chickering and Steinway pianos. W. B. Bradbury has recently established an agency here for his instruments.

Yours truly, &c

AN ISRAELITE IN EGYPT.

BETHLEHEM, PA., MARCH 13,—For a real sincere love for music commend me to the good people of this beautiful town. It has been my happy fortune to have a few days here, and I have found many strange and odd and charming things, but none more so than the wholesome and genuine devotion to musical art in its higher forms, of which I have just witnessed an evidence in a Concert of the Philharmonic Society. I enclose a programme.

Part I.		Kaliwoda, Conductor.
Overture.
Aria, Judith.	Madame Dressler.
Quintet for Piano forte, Violin, Flute, Horn and Violoncello.		Mozart.
Part II.		Mozart.
Chorus from "Magic Flute."		Reiniger.
Trio for Piano forte, Violin and Violoncello.		Mozart.
Choruses from 12th Mass.

Nothing could be more delightful than to see the real art spirit which pervaded it all. No display or apparent thought of self on the part of any one engaged, but complete devotion to the music. The concert room is a fine one—spacious, well-lighted with gas, and commodious. I think it is also used by one of the schools in the charge of the Moravian Society. The audience was made up of the people of the town—fathers with wives and children, young men and maidens, now and then a file of rosy cheeked school-girls from the great Moravian boarding-school. Very much such an audience as would in a New England town go to hear a Lyceum or Temperance lecture. The orchestra consisted of about twenty-five citizens of all ages. The inevitable bald-headed, jolly little man had the violoncello of course, and an ethereal youth the flute. By and bye in another generation the youth will doubtless drop his sentimental instrument, and, becoming qualified by age and baldness, will in his turn take the violoncello. I was assured by my neighbor that every member of the orchestra was a native of Bethlehem, and that generally their fathers and grandfathers had been members of the Philharmonic before them. The chorus, was made up of about fifty young men and maidens, of a singularly honest, simple and pre-possessing appearance. Entirely at their ease, as among their townfolk and friends, and seeming absorbed in what they had to do, and they did it well. The orchestral performance too was very good. But the earnestness and naturalness of all concerned were especially delightful. I don't if any thing like it can be found elsewhere in America. Of the Moravian peculiarities of this strange old town, of the great church, and the queer European-looking houses thereto attached, known as the "sisters" and "brothers houses," with enormous buttresses and innumerable little windows; of the strange traditions among these people, and many curious things in their history—why should I tell you? Come down here next summer, and you will find great pleasure in tracing them out as I have done.

G. D.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, MARCH 19, 1864.

Concerts.

ORCHESTRAL. The second and last Soirée of Mr. EICHBERG took place in Chickering's hall last Saturday evening, and was a very considerable improvement on the first. The audience was nearly as large as the room could hold, and of the most music-loving and refined complexion. There was every sign of interest and pleasure. And the list of pieces was signally select and proper in the circumstances:

1. Overture. "Coi san tutte," Mozart.
2. Menuetto and Finale, from Symphony. No 4. (Jupiter) in C, Mozart.
3. Concerto for piano, in D minor, Mendelssohn. Allegro appassionato, Adagio molto sostenuto; Finale. Mr. B. J. Lang.
4. Symphony, No. 8, Beethoven. Allegro vivace e con brio. Allegretto scherzando. Tempo di Menuetto, Allegro vivace.

The charming little overture of Mozart, in the same vein with that to Figaro, sparkling with life and gaiety, surcharged with a fine, delicate wit (if we may use the term of music), is so seldom heard here that it formed a pleasant surprise. Enough to say, however, that it was Mozart, the wondrous youth, in his exquisitely playful mood. It was nicely rendered, and the euphony of the instrumentation well realized even by the little orchestra of twenty-four; the chief want being that of the bassoon, (strange that Boston lacks bassoons!), which of course is only constructively made good by the violoncello.

The Finale of the "Jupiter" presented Mozart in his most earnest phase. The working up of those four themes, with such subtle complication, yet such clear, bold, vigorous outline, all so natural, so spontaneous, so enjoyable, concealing so much art and learning under so irresistible an appeal to the sense, is one of the greatest triumphs of musicianship and genius. If it needed more instruments, more strings especially, to give it mass and breadth, yet on the other hand it was interesting to come into such close quarters with it, so that you could not help following the separate, many-colored threads that run in and out from the curious complex web. It was made remarkably clear at any rate; and we doubt if it ever has been more enjoyed in this good city. It was wise, too, to prelude it with the insinuating, fascinating Menuetto.

We do not remember to have heard the D minor Concerto of Mendelssohn, his second, played here, since Mr. LANG made his mark with it years ago in the Music Hall. We do not think it is the greater novelty alone which makes it even more interesting to us than the other in G minor, which has served every pianist for a classical cheval de bataille. It unites all the deeper, manlier and finer elements of Mendelssohn's genius in a condensed and perfect shape. It abounds in fine imaginative touches. The sympathetic interplay between orchestra and piano-forte in the foreground is perfect; and the accompaniment is full of beauties, subsidizing and enriching not merely the expression, but the thought, of what the piano has to state as principal. Mr. Lang has vastly gained as an executive and interpretative pianist since the time alluded to, and did his work most admirably, with no lack of fire in the Allegro, of delicate poetic feeling in the Adagio, of crisp, sparkling precision in the Finale. We only questioned whether the very pronounced emphasis really demanded in one phrase, often repeated, was not overdone; whether that rushing upward with the left hand in the finale, with such spasmodic energy, was not forcing the tone beyond what is musical; but it showed that the player kindled with the passion of the music. Mr. Eichberg had drilled his orchestra into quite a delicate and more than mechanical rendering of the accompaniments.

Beethoven's eighth Symphony, the sunshiniest moment of the later period of his life and art, as rare a masterpiece as any of the Symphonies, though less pretending, is one of those happy inspirations which we cannot conceive of ever hearing listlessly,—at least when played as well as it was on Saturday. The ever popular Allegretto Scherzando is hardly more exquisite than every one of the four movements. The first movement, a marvel of symphonic development of themes and of instrumental euphony, might be set against the first movement of Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, for life and joy, and buoyant sense of an exhilarating, perfect atmosphere, while it is the joy of a much richer, deeper, stronger life, ringing with quick, positive, electric utterance. And the Finale might pass for a Beethoven's Midsummer Night's Dream, as fairy-like, but how different from Mendelssohn's. It is a critical test to subject an orchestra to, to play this Symphony: considering the short time for rehearsals, we think the result was most encouraging; you really felt progress, as if we were getting out of the ruts of habit, and putting thought and feeling into the work. Still there is much room for improvement. Once or twice we feared the thing was on the eve of falling to pieces,—probably from the want of a fagotto or some other instrument. The inherent drawbacks, as the too small size of the room, the want of more strings, &c., remained of course as before. But Mr. Eichberg has begun a very hopeful experiment, if he will only take it up again, at the earliest opportunity, and go on with it. Where we have the sense of progress, nothing but perseverance is needed.

The ORCHESTRAL UNION has given two more Wednesday Afternoon Concerts, with full houses. That on the 9th inst. opened with a Concert

Overture in A by Julius Rietz, Mendelssohn's successor at Leipzig, and now kapellmeister at Dresden, one of the best conductors and musicians of the day. It is a thoroughly musicianlike performance, genial and graceful, but singularly suggestive of Mendelssohn, even to identity of phrases, as well as general style and feeling. It was much the best thing of the concert. Mr. HENRY CARTER followed with another Overture (!) and on the Organ (!!)—pudding upon pie. It was the one in C composed by Mendelssohn for a military band. Whether owing to the choice of stops, or to the dragging tempo, it sounded dull, indefinite and purposeless upon the organ; but this is the era of experiments! Liszt's Symphonic Fantasy, "Les Preludes," was revived again. The impression on our mind was the same as heretofore, only less interesting: namely, fine effects of instrumentation, without much of original or striking thought. Mr. CARTER made his bow a second time in another character, that of pianist, and gave a very passable, amateurish, somewhat timid rendering of Mendelssohn's G minor Concerto. The last movement went much better than the first.—Two popular orchestral arrangements: Schubert's Lob der Thränen and the "Faust" potpourri (for the last time) wound up the entertainment.

Last Wednesday, Sterndale Bennett's romantic, Mendelssohnian, and yet original, "Naiads" Overture led off. It was uncommonly well played, and is indeed a right artistic, genial, pleasant thing to hear. The Symphony was Beethoven's No. 1, in C, which was enjoyed none the less after the new interest it had so recently awakened at Chickering's rooms. This too was well played. Mrs. L. S. FRODOCK appeared again as organist; and to great advantage in her first piece, a Fantaisie by Freyer, opening with full organ, and in solid organ style, passing by a diminuendo, exquisitely well managed, into a slow cantabile with soft stops, and ending with a vigorous fugue. In firm legato organ touch, in tasteful choice of stops, and in quiet, sure command of the resources of the instrument, this lady has already placed herself among the foremost of our organists. Her second piece was the "Offertoire de St. Cecile," in D, by Battiste. Why must everybody play Battiste? The after-pieces were, a Strauss Waltz called "Waldstimmen," which may have a political bearing, since a literal translation of the word would be "electoral votes;" and a Scene and Duet from Marschner's Hans Heiling.

Next Wednesday will be repeated Rietz's overture and the "Preludes," and the first finale to Don Juan will be played. We are glad to learn that Schumann's B flat Symphony is in rehearsal.

The BOSTON MOZART CLUB gave their third "Social Orchestral Entertainment" last Monday evening, at Mercantile Hall, which was filled with invited listeners. All seemed gratified, and had cause to be, with the steady progress which the little amateur orchestra evinces, under the tuition and direction of Mr. CARL ZERRAHN. This time they essayed quite high artistic tasks in rendering a Symphony and an overture by Mozart, each one of the most perfect models in its kind. They have never acquitted themselves better; and this time the wind instruments were generally in tune; which is a great point accomplished in the internal economy of an orchestra.

This was the programme:

- Grand Symphony in G minor. Mozart.
Allegro molto—Andante—Minuetto and Trio, — Finale: Allegro assai.
1. Overture. "Return from abroad." Mendelssohn.
2. Marcia Alla Turca. Mozart.
3. Romance, from "L'Eclair." Halevy.
For English Horn and Flute obligato.
4. Overture. "Zauberflöte." (Magic Flute). Mozart.

MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB. The fourth and last subscription concert of this fifteenth season, postponed a week on account of the illness of one of the members, took place on Thursday evening, 10th inst. Chickering's hall was full. The programme was a very interesting one, with a great work of Beethoven to carry home with one for a last impression.

1. Quintet in E minor op. 8. Gade.
Introduction, and Allegro espressivo—Allegretto.
2. Sonata in B flat, for Piano and Violoncello, op. 45. Mendelssohn.
Allegro vivace—Andante—Allegro assai.
Messrs. Carl Meyer, and Wulf Fries.
3. Andante from the Violin Concerto. Mendelssohn.
Carl Meisel.
4. Tema Con Variazioni for Piano. Meyer.
Mr. Carl Meyer.
5. Quartet in E flat, No. 12. Beethoven.
Maestoso and Allegro teneramente—Adagio ma non troppo molto Cantabile—Scherzo vivace—Finale.

The Quintet by Gade is one of the most interesting of the Danish composer's works, which, genial and classical as they are, have a certain sameness, the same melancholy sea-shore sentiment most of the time, with a cold and watery reflection of Mendelssohn. Of the wonderful Quartet of Beethoven, we can say nothing save to give thanks for every such opportunity of listening to it or the like of it. Mr. CARL MEYER is a pianist and an artist, whose sterling talent and acquirements, not injured by an unpretending manner, entitle him to appear oftener in the concert room than he has done. He and Mr. WULF FRIES proved adequate to a sound and artist-like interpretation of the beautiful Sonata by Mendelssohn. Mr. Meyer's "Theme with Variations" showed felicitous invention and clear, consistent, musician-like treatment. Mr. CARL MEISEL, with his modest manner, played the Andante from the Violin Concerto, in a pure, even, graceful style, which showed the spirit and the patient study of an artist.

The Concerts of the Quintette Club have been uncommonly interesting this year, especially in their selections; and we only regret that there should be so few of them. It does seem as if there should be an appetite for such a feast of classical chamber music once a fortnight for six winter months.

ORGAN CONCERTS.—The great Organ was played on Saturday afternoon, Feb. 20, by Mr. B. J. LANG, with this programme:

1. Concerto in G. Bach.
Allegro—Adagio—Allegretto.
2. Overture to "Der Freischütz." (Transcribed). Weber.
3. Choral—"Old Hundred." Luther.
4. Allegretto, from Sonata No. 4. Mendelssohn.
5. Overture to "Midsummer Night's Dream." Mendelssohn.
6. Improvisation, displaying the Vox Humana Stop.
7. Hallelujah Chorus, from "Mt. of Olives." Beethoven.

If the object be to make the people appreciate Bach, it will hardly be furthered, we think, by playing such a work as that Concerto, which, if Bach ever wrote it, must have been one of his earliest works, perhaps a mere exercise before his own style was formed. It is thin and dry for him; the Allegro might have been written by Corelli; the Adagio is more interesting; but the whole thing is rather a matter of historical curiosity for musicians, than a revelation of Bach's genius to an audience. Mr. Lang displayed his usual fine tact in the selection of stops, and finished execution in all his pieces. His orchestral imitations become still closer likenesses with each successive trial; and yet how much of the harmony is necessarily left out in such "transcriptions," and therefore, after all, how very unlike an orchestra must such things be!

On Saturday, March 5, the hour was filled by Mr. PAINE, who made the pipes discourse as follows:

1. Prelude and Fugue in G major, Bach.
2. Andante, Mozart.
3. Air, from "Airs and Galatas." Handel.
4. Chorus. "But the waters overwhelmed their enemies." Handel.
From Israel in Egypt.
5. Fantasia on the Portuguese Hymn. J. K. Paine.
A.—Pastorale B.—Interlude C.—Alla Marcia.
6. Variations upon the Choral: "Schmücke dich, o liebe Seele." Mendelssohn.
7. Sonata in B flat. Mendelssohn.
Allegro con brio.—Andante Religioso.—Allegretto.
8. Improvisation. Allegro Maestoso.

The Bach Fugue (played for the first time) was worthy of the name, and worthily expounded. The Mozart Andante was lovely, and the registration happy. The "Portuguese Hymn" made a good theme for Mr. Paine; the three movements of his Fantasia were well contrasted, and had pleasing matter in them. His "Improvisation" was the most musicianlike and dignified of the efforts yet vouchsafed to us by that name. The "Choral Vorspiel" by Bach and the Mendelssohn Sonata were new additions to the repertoire, each of the finest of its kind.

Last Saturday Mr. J. C. D. PARKER took his turn, having prepared the following programme:

1. Sonata No. 2. Mendelssohn.
(Grave, Full Organ.—Andante. Soft Stops.—Prelude and Fugue, Full Organ.)
2. Andante. (Transcribed.) Mozart.
3. Chorus, from "Israel in Egypt." Handel.
4. Andante and March. Battiste.
5. Slumber Song. (Transcribed, with Vox humana stop.) Schumann.
6. Funeral March. Chopin.
7. Offertoire in F. Battiste.

Toujours Battiste! Chopin's "Funeral March," too, hardly belongs in the same basket with fruits indigenous to the Organ or such exotics as have been made to flourish on its soil. Chopin of all composers is the most purely pianistic; his music hardly knows itself away from the piano. But, as we have said before, this is the age of experiments, and the Great Organ is the fertile field thereof. Pardon us that we begin, as is natural, with picking over the basket; plenty of ripe, sound, luscious fruit is left.

And first, the Mendelssohn Sonata is one of the most organ-like and satisfying pieces to be had short of Sebastian Bach, and Mr. Parker played it well; it is one of the most difficult of the six. The transcription from Mozart was delicately conceived and charming. The chorus from "Israel" was that quaint one, with such a marked melodic motive, "He led them forth like sheep," and was tastefully treated. The "Slumber Song" by Schumann was the lovely one from his "Paradise and the Peri," and, though not an organ piece, it was right comforting to hear it. By the way, are we never to have the "Peri" brought out here with orchestral accompaniment? The fine initiative taken by Mr. Parker and his Club of amateurs, a year ago, deserves to be followed up.

Mr. B. J. LANG gave a second Sacred Concert on Sunday evening, March 6, with the following programme:

1. Allegro, from Concerto in G. Bach.
2. Song. "The Quail." Beethoven.
Miss J. E. Houston.
3. Religious Meditation, for Violin and Organ. Elshberg.
Messrs. J. Elshberg and B. J. Lang.
4. Grande Offertoire in F. Lefebvre Wely.
Mr. S. A. Bancroft.
5. Song. "Tears of sorrow." Beethoven.
6. Selections from the "Hymn of Praise," displaying the Vox Humana and Biffo stops. Mendelssohn.
1. Trio, for Violin, Organ and Piano-forte, Bach & Gounod.
Messrs. Elshberg, Willcox & Lang.

2. Aria. "Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets." Mendelssohn.
from "St. Paul."
3. Grand Symphony, from the "Hymn of Praise." Mendelssohn.
arranged for two performers at the Organ. Mendelssohn.
Maestoso—Allegretto Agitato—Adagio Religioso.
Messrs. Parker & Lang.
4. "Let their celestial concert all unite," from Handel.
"Samson," Full Organ.

The pieces with violin made the same pleasant impression as before, although it would be hard to give a good artistic reason why such pieces, or arrangements, should be written. The selections from the "Hymn of Praise" were tastefully rendered, so were Mr. Lang's solo performances and his accompaniments. Mr. BANCROFT made his first public trial of the Great Organ, and very creditably. Miss HOUSTON gave us some new songs, that is to say, a new choice of songs; the two by Beethoven are so beautiful, so religious in their spirit, and were so truly felt and rendered, that both singer and concert-giver deserve thanks. Why do not Beethoven's "Six Religious Songs," or some of them, find their way into these Sunday Organ Concerts; they are simple, grand and worthy of a noble singer.

Mrs. FRODOCK had a stormy evening for her concert on Friday of last week; but the two or three hundred listeners bore away fine reports of her mastery of the Great Organ, in both the great and little styles of organ music. She played the great G minor Fugue of Bach, somewhat slowly perhaps, but firmly, clearly, with full organ throughout, and most impressively. Also the Fantasia by Freyer, which we have already mentioned; the Adagio from Mozart's Quartet in B flat; Rink's Flute Concerto in F; and, as if striking for the very apogee from Bach, the march from Tannhäuser. All these bore witness to the skill of the fair organist, though not all of them fair witness, we suspect, to her own taste in programme making. We think it must be martyrdom to a true organist to cater to the humors of the day (real or supposed) by the interspersing of such "experiments" as a solo on the "Saxophone" (Serenade from Don Pasquale), a military violin solo, and the "O mio Fernando" song, with Quintette Club accompaniment. A great Organ is in the best sense the most universal of instruments; that is, it is the organ of impersonal, sublime, universal thoughts and aspirations; but this is poorly paraphrased by the proverb "all things to all men."

The above are not all the musical entertainments with which our city has been visited of late. Mme. ANNA BISHOP, assisted by her daughter, organists, &c., has given two concerts with the Great Organ, one secular and one sacred. GOTTSCHALK, aided by Mme. D'ANGRI, the contralto, has given two "farewell" concerts, and has come back and clinched them with two more. Last and not least, the MARETZKE Opera Troupe, surrounded with the usual swarm of sharks and speculators, has set up its Ebenezer again for a time in the Boston Theatre, having played this week Faust, and Trovanore and Norma as before, and Martha as before, only with sweet-voiced Brignoli for tenor, who, it seems, has not lost his voice, as some of the critics in New York hastily figured from his first trial of it after recovery from illness. This afternoon he sings Don Ottavio in Don Giovanni.—The "Orpheus" Club are giving concerts in the neighboring towns in aid of the Educational Commission for Freedmen.

This afternoon there will be the usual Organ Concert, with Dr. S. P. TUCKERMAN as organist.—Tomorrow evening Mr. CARTER gives a Mendelssohn evening with the Great Organ and some of our best singers.—The HANDEL and HAYDN SOCIETY are rehearsing the "Messiah" for Easter.—Mr. LANG, we are happy to learn, intends to bring out the "Walpurgis Night" again before long.

ST. LOUIS, MO. The fourth Philharmonic Concert, under the direction of E. Sobolewski, contained overtures to La Dame Blanche and Le Pardon de Plœmel; solo and chorus from the "Messiah"; quartet and chorus (first finale) from Weber's Euryanthe; scena and chorus from Semiramide; Allegretto and Presto from Beethoven's 7th Symphony; Polonaise by Chopin; a clarinet solo, &c.

A DESIDERATUM DESIDERANDUM IN MENDELSSOHN'S LETTERS. Under this title the Leipzig Sigale not long since contained a communication from Dr. W. A. Lampadius, the author of an enthusiastic, incomplete, but interesting biography of Mendelssohn—at all events the best which has yet appeared—a not very faithful translation of which was transferred to our columns from a London journal several years ago. Dr. L., of course, joins in the general admiration of the "Letters," but complains that so many interesting ones are missing from the collection. Especially he instances the letters which the youthful composer wrote to Goethe from Rome. Goethe speaks of them as those "graceful, charming (allerliebsten), extremely interesting" letters; writing to Zelter (March 31, 1831), he says: "Above all I have to announce, that I have received a perfectly charming long letter from Felix, dated Rome, March 5th, which presents the purest image of the excellent young man. There need be no further anxiety about him; the beautiful swimming girdle (cork jacket) of his talent will carry him safely over through the waves and breakers of the barbarism that we have to dread."

Dr. Lampadius thinks that the young man must have expressed "the noblest and best" of his inmost thought and feeling to the old poet, whom he held in such grateful reverence, and that these letters, could he only get at them, would be of priceless value for the enlarged and improved edition which he hopes some day to make of "the little book: 'Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy, a memorial for his friends,' which, following the impulse of his heart, he published in 1847, but which he never intended to have pass for a complete biography, a thing impossible with the scanty materials then at his command."

A writer in a German musical journal, after hearing Beethoven's Ninth Symphony at Cologne, remarks:

Whenever I hear the Adagio of the symphony, or, as a rule, any Adagio by Beethoven, I think to myself: Were I the director of a conservatory, or otherwise a celebrated teacher of composition, I would require every scholar, as soon as he had gone through his theoretical course, and arrived at the stage of composition, to bring me an Adagio for some instrument, or for a quartet, or an orchestra. "If there was anything in it," as Mozart expressed it, I would say to him: "Go on; you have music in your soul." If, however, there were nothing in it, and he relied upon his original Scherzo, or a noisy Allegro con fuoco, or, even upon a correct but constrained fugue, I would advise him, if he wished to become a master, to do everything in the way of music, only never to compose.

The 93d anniversary of Beethoven's birthday (born Dec. 17, 1770) was kept at Vienna. The Öst-Deutsche Post states that, on this occasion, universal admiration was excited by the exhibition of a gypsum cast, the only one which Beethoven ever allowed to be taken, of his face. It was modelled when he was more than fifty. The features are reproduced with the greatest minuteness, even the pores of the skin being visible. Just as Beethoven never had more than one cast taken, he sat only once for his portrait, namely, in the year 1815, to his friend Mähler. This portrait was lately sold, and about to be despatched to America, when a Viennese lover of Art, Herr von Karajan, came to the rescue and saved it for the Austrian capital.

The cast here referred to must be the one after which our countryman, the distinguished sculptor, W. W. Story, modelled the face of his admirable statuette of Beethoven, which probably is nearer to the life than any of the busts or statues made of him. As for the portrait, has not our friend A. W. T. already poured out his grief over the loss of it in these columns?

MENDELSSOHN'S LETTERS. An English Review makes the following strictures upon Lady Wallace's translation of the first volume of the letters—those from Italy and Switzerland:

Before dealing with the matter of the volume, and treating the original and the translation as identical, it may be as well at once to say that the latter, though on the whole a faithful rendering, as translations go, and therefore very pleasant reading, does not convey in any sufficient degree the impression which we get from the original of the vitality—the fullness of life of the writer. The wine is with us, no doubt, but the bouquet has fled somehow in the process of decanting.

"The style is the man," no less in Mendelssohn's German than in his music; his notes "without words" are not more individual than his words without notes. Some of this short-coming must be laid to the inherent difficulty (or impossibility) of all translation; but some also to the besetting weakness of all translators—a dread of vulgarity (their favorite aversion), or, it may be, an inability to distinguish vulgar thoughts from common words—the familiarity which grows out of confidence and love, from the familiarity that breeds contempt. Two or three out of several special examples will be enough to show what we mean; though no special examples will quite justify an objection which applies rather to the tone of the whole translation than to this or that passage. At p. 3 (of the original) we have "Die Sache machte mir fast Freude (fast im biblischen Sinne)" reduced to "This circumstance gratified me extremely." At p. 164, in a passage explanatory of some of the offices for the Holy Week at Rome, we have "Es würden in jedem Nocturno drei Psalmen gesungen, weil Christus für die Jungfräulichen, die Verheiratheten und die Verwittweten gestorben sei," pared down to "Each Nocturn contains three Psalms, signifying that Christ died for all." At p. 165, in relation to some changes proposed by the late Baron Bunsen in the Lutheran Service, "Einrichtungen" is rendered "innovations"—a word, we think, never used without qualification in any but a depreciatory sense. At p. 168 the characteristic "Mann soll sich erst die Ohren tüchtig durchreiben, ehe man es besser bekommt!" is inane given, "It will be long before you can improve on this." At p. 250, speaking of mountains after rain, Mendelssohn says, "Sie sind nach dem Regen bekanntlich am schönsten; aber heut sahen sie so klar aus, als seien sie aus dem Ei geschält," which Lady Wallace softens into "They are acknowledged to be finest after rain; and to-day they looked as fresh as if newly created." And at p. 320 he tells us, "Die Musiker (of Paris) kreuzigen und segnen sich über all die Ehre, die mir das Conservatoire anthut," which (in deference to Protestant readers) his translator renders, "The musicians are all amazed at the honors conferred on me by the Conservatoire."

There are, as might have been expected, a few mistranslations of technical terms. "Alt" is not the English synonyme of Altimme (p. 177); "D dur" (p. 265) is D major not minor; "Windlade" (p. 267) is not "bellows," but "wind-chest." English Horn (p. 296, translation) is not an English musical term; the instrument so called, the lower or bass oboe, though well known in English orchestras, is anomalously enough always spoken of as the Corno Inglese, or as the Cor Anglais.

As a matter of course the musical illustrations present examples of inaccuracy. It would seem as hard for an English compositor to set up correct music as for a French one correct English. In pp. 177, 178, 181, 182, 185 and 186 (of the translation) the C (or Do) clef is uniformly placed on the wrong line—the second instead of the first; to the waste of much painful industry, by unlearned but honest readers. We would ask, too, in reference to another art, why the English woodcutter has been allowed to "touch up" the clever little sketches with which Mendelssohn has so pleasantly further illuminated his sparkling pages—fac similes of which are given in the original! We say nothing of the heavy hand which has been laid on the foregrounds; but why should distance, described in the text as absolutely invisible from mist or unintermittent rain-falling, be filled in with those writing-master embellishments which, before the advent of Mr. Ruskin, so often did duty for clouds?

ROSSINI ROBBED.—A new Rossini story is in the market which is curious; possibly, not true. "They say," that the industrious yet coy veteran, who is always writing, however chary in giving forth what he writes, not long since (it may have been by desire) forwarded two new compositions to the Queen of Spain;—that the Royal lady, by way of placing manuscripts so precious in honourable keeping, committed the same to the Library of the Conservatory at Madrid; that the manager and travelling agent of a popular prima donna gained access to the treasure, and purchased it for the sum of 5,000 francs! If this be true, whether the lady will be permitted to sing these strangely-acquired additions to her repertoire, becomes a question.—Athenæum.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Press the sweet lips together. C. A. Vorce. 25

"Lay the sweet hands together;" "Put the sweet curls together." Lines which begin the various verses, and sufficiently indicate the mournfully beautiful character of the words. The music is peculiar in rhythm, but a little practice will fit it evenly and very prettily to the words.

Liquid gem. Song. W. T. Wrighton. 25

A simple tribute to a dew-drop. Pretty melody.

On the banks of a beautiful river. Ballad.

W. T. Wrighton. 25

By the same author. Two good songs.

Angel of Love. (L'angelo d'amor.) J. Gerald. 25

A fine Italian song, with words both in English and Italian. It is somewhat difficult to sing and play, but will reward a thorough study.

Music of her voice. Song. W. T. Wrighton. 25

A first rate ballad, in good classical style.

Emancipation. Song and Chorus. 25

One of the best of emancipation songs, spirited, soul-stirring, and with music appropriate to the words, by a composer who does not add his name to the piece, although it would not diminish his well-earned reputation.

Instrumental Music.

I Puritani. Fantasie Brillante. J. Leybach. 75

A composition of much merit; not half-filled, as too many fantasias are, with unmeaning runs or chords, which one must hammer through, in order to enjoy the proportion of good music, but good and interesting throughout. Of medium difficulty. A fine lesson for advanced pupils.

Offertoire for the Organ. Lefebvre Wely. 10

This is one of those famous pieces which have had the honor of being played upon the great organ. It lost nothing, of course, through the brilliant execution and fine taste of Mr. Wilcox, but is, in itself, a great piece. Yet it is not too difficult for organists generally. The pedal passages are easy, requiring but a little practice to master them.

Faust Polka Mazurka. E. Ketterer. 50

Includes some of the best melodies of the opera, arranged in mazurka style.

Martha Quadrilles. Strauss. 35

The charms of newer operas do not drive our older favorites from our recollection. Strauss's brilliant arrangement of "Martha" melodies will be welcome to players and dancers.

Pot Pourri. From Faust. C. Grobe. 75

Our friend Grobe has not quite arrived at Opus 8000, although he is not at such a vast distance from it. This, his latest piece, is a plain, common sense arrangement of Faust melodies, easy, and capital for pupils.

Books.

Hayden's Mass, No. 7, in G. Cloth, $1.00; paper, 75

Every body knows that Hayden, Mozart, and others composed masses, but very few choirs and societies around the country have ever seen or practised any thing but Mozart's 13th Mass. This is not the only good one, by any means, and the above, with others in the course of publication, will furnish a most valuable amount of material for practice, both in common rehearsals and musical society meetings. Mass music, on an average, is not harder than that of difficult anthems, and some of it is perfectly simple.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

D W I G H T ' S

JOURNAL OF MUSIC,

A Paper of Art and Literature.

---

JOHN S. DWIGHT, EDITOR.

---

VOLUME XXIV

B O S T O N :
PUBLISHED BY OLIVER DITSON AND COMPANY, 277 WASHINGTON STREET.
1865.

Reprint Edition 1967

JOHNSON REPRINT CORP.
NEW YORK—LONDON

ARNO PRESS, INC.
NEW YORK, N.Y.

Library of Congress Catalog Card No. 67-24725

Manufactured in the U.S.A. by Arno Press Inc.

INDEX.

Abel, Mme., the Pianist, in Stuttgart..... 21
 A Curious Letter..... 352
 Amateur Concerts: Tribulations of a Musician, A. Adam..... 57
 American Standard Diapason, proposed, E. Wiebe..... 379
 American Students at Leipzig..... 255, 264
 An Enfant Terrible of a Piano, from H. Berlioz..... 401
 A Night in Florence..... from Heine..... 298, 305, 313
 Anthropoglossos, the..... London Times; Orchestra..... 292
 A Poet in a Pet. Pusch..... 220
 Arnold, G. B., his oratorio "Ahab," Orchestra..... 259
 Auber: his Secret of Long Life, 220; his Fra Diavolo..... 383
 Bach, J. S., Life of (New Am. Cyclopaedia), 138; discussed in Mendelssohn's Letters, 145; his Sacred Arias, 166; his Magnificat, 259, 283, 366; his Piano Concertos, 358, 359, 361; his Christmas Oratorio..... 366
 Ballad Writing, the Art of..... Lond. Orchestra..... 347
 Bartleman, James, the singer..... 3
 Beethoven: his Monument in Heiligenstadt, 72; B. in Saturn's Ring, H. Berlioz, 123; his Sonata Duo in G., op. 98, 166; his 93d Birthday in Vienna; portraits and busts of him, 308; on the Editions of his works (by O. Jahn), 226, 394, 410; 7th Symphony, 237; Quartet in B flat, op. 130, 366; his Fidelio (J. S. D.), 244, 247, 335; his Sonata Pathétique, as a piece for pupils, 347, 354; Sonata in D minor ("Tempest") 367; his Biographers (by Ludwig Nohl), 395
 Beethoven's Contemporaries, Half Dozen of, by A. W. Thayer..... 65, 73, 81, 89, 97, 105, 113, 121, 153, 185, 193, 201, 209, 217, 225, 233, 241, 249, 257, 265, 273, 281, 289, 297, 321, 329, 337, 345.
 Bellini, described by Henri Heine..... 305
 Benedict, Julius: his "Richard Cœur de Lion," 117
 Berlioz, Hector, sketch of, from Fliegende Blätter, 28, 33, 41, 49; his "Harold" Symphony, 29, 71; "Frances Juges" overture, 41, 49; "Les Troyens," 164; Translations from, 377, 385, 401.
 Bettelheim, Caroline. Vienna Presse..... 259
 Boieldieu; his La Dame Blanche..... 238
 Boston Music Hall Association, Annual Meetings..... 47, 255
 Boston, Review of the Musical Season in, 262, 270; Prospects of the Season, winter of 1864-65..... 318
 Boy Choirs..... 398
 Brahms, Johannes. Lond. Mus. World..... 269
 Broadwood & Sons' Piano fortes, History of..... 1, 10
 Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, the. Tribune..... 387
 "Buck's Motette Collection," reviewed..... 191
 Chimes: in Antwerp, 79; in Louvain..... 95
 Chopin, Liszt's Life of, translated by Mrs. Cook, 7, 14, 17, 25; Polish Songs, 63, 99; his Polonaises (by Liszt) 35; Scherzo in C sharp minor, 167; Concertos, 358, 359; Cracoviennes..... 358
 Choral, The, or Psalm Tune. Latrobe..... 5
 Christmas Music in Boston..... 374
 Church Music: "Trinity Collection," by Dr. Hodges..... 303
 Cinti Damoreau, Mme. Spiridon..... 9
 Classical, the Term in Music..... 222
 Concert Etiquette. New Nation..... 334
 CONCERTS IN BOSTON:
 Prof. Child's War Songs for the Army..... 6
 Gilmore's Patriotic Concerts..... 7
 Philharmonic (C. Zerrahn)..... 12
 Mr. Parker's Club of Amateurs..... 23, 30, 167, 281, 282
 Dr. Tuckerman's Mus. Festival at St. Paul's, 22; Sacred Concert at the Music Hall..... 391
 Orchestral Union..... 23, 175, 188, 190, 199, 306, 215, 223, 231, 247, 383, 391, 399, 407, 416
 In Aid of the East Tennesseeans..... 251
 Boston Mozart Club (Amateur)..... 23, 168, 183, 206, 281
 Hermann Daum: his Soirée, 30; Benefit Concert for..... 391

Gottschalk..... 31, 207, 389
 Bretto Children..... 31
 Camilla Urso..... 39
 Thomas Ryan..... 39, 245
 Mr. J. K. Paine's Organ Concerts..... 71
 Orpheus Musical Society..... 127
 Great Organ..... 133-5, 143, 146, 151, 159, 166, 167, 175, 182, 191, 207, 215, 222, 231, 256, 279, 287, 294, 310, 336, 351, 380, 407
 Organ Concert at Church of the Immaculate Conception (Mr. Wilcox)..... 199
 Public School Children..... 150, 255, 296
 Handel & Haydn Society: "Hymn of Praise" and "St. Cecilia" Ode (Choral Inauguration of Great Organ), 149; "Messiah," 167, 214, 374; "Hail," 198, 359; "Elijah,"..... 247
 Mr. B. J. Lang's Shakespeare Concert..... 231
 Messrs. Kreissmann, Leonhard and Eichberg..... 151, 166, 175, 183
 Mendelssohn Quintette Club, 153, 175, 190, 207, 388, 392, 399, 415
 Teresa Carreno..... 159
 Julius Eichberg's Orchestral Soirées..... 183, 198, 206
 Mr. Henry Carter (Bednett's "May Queen," &c.)..... 231
 Popular Concerts of Messrs. Ryan & Draper..... 319
 German Opera "Sacred" Concert..... 342
 Mr. Otto Drael..... 358, 367, 375
 Messrs. Campbell & Castle, vocal..... 368
 Miss Lucy Simons, Sig. Morelli, Gottschalk, &c..... 368
 Miss Laura Harris. Miss Carpenter and Mr. Farley..... 368
 Dr. Cutler's "Choral Festival,"..... 388, 407
 Boston Musicians' Union Benefit Fund..... 406, 415
 Costa, Michael; his new Oratorio, "Naaman," 315, 318, 356
 Criticism of New Musical Works. Timothy Trill..... 356
 Crystal Palace at Sydenham, The. H. W. Beecher..... 67
 CORRESPONDENCE:
 New York..... 8, 15, 22, 29, 38, 37, 60, 80, 127, 186, 157, 192, 319, 327, 328, 336, 343, 357, 369, 394, 372, 373, 380, 399, 406, 413
 Philadelphia..... 8, 16, 23, 30, 120, 133, 175, 192, 206, 223, 256, 273, 349, 364, 380, 381, 389, 400, 406
 Brooklyn, N. Y..... 23, 119
 Pittsfield, Mass..... 24
 Providence, R. I..... 42
 New Haven..... 56, 157
 Saratoga, N. Y..... 56
 Poughkeepsie, N. Y..... 54
 Newport, R. I..... 56
 Louvain, Belgium..... 86
 Milwaukee, Wis..... 120
 Chicago..... 128, 184, 264, 357, 372, 381
 Cairo, Ill..... 205
 Bethlehem, Pa..... 205
 Berlin, Prussia..... 255, 388, 404
 Hartford, Conn..... 327
 Halle, Prussia..... 392
 Cincinnati..... 390
 Dannreuther, Edward. London Athenaeum..... 32
 Diapason, an American Standard proposed..... 379
 Donizetti's "Don Sebastian," 370, 383; his Polio..... 375
 Don Quixote dramatized. Tribune..... 308
 Eichberg, Julius: his "Rose of Tyrol,"..... 14
 Elizabethan Music and Poetry, a Library of, sold in London..... 312
 English Opera Experiment in London. Mus. World..... 27
 English Organ Building. Ecclesiologist..... 196
 English Organ Playing. London Review..... 156
 Fashion versus Music. Orchestra..... 258
 FINE ARTS:
 Boston Artists' Reception..... 14
 Bierstadt's "Rocky Mountains,"..... 14
 Collection of Pictures at the Athenaeum, Dec. 1863, 8, 164
 Ball's Statue of Washington..... 165
 Athenaeum Gallery: Exhibition in aid of Sailors' Fair..... 348, 380
 The Old Masters as Portrait Painters and the Modern, —Copley and Stuart, —Staigg's Portrait of Gen. Stevenson..... 371
 Harriet Hosmer's Zenobia. A. A. O..... 396
 Fiorentino, P. A. Death of..... 264, 280, 285
 Foster, Stephen C. N. Y. Eve. Post..... 180
 Foundling Chapel, London, Music at the. Orchestra..... 369
 Franz, Robert; his first songs, by R. Schumann. 1
 Fry, Wm. H., his opera "Notre Dame of Paris,"

235, 243; Obituary notices of, 386; his works and character..... 404, 407

Gade, Niels W. His Symphonies..... 190, 193, 199; Mendelssohn's Letters to him..... 193
 Gluck: notes on by A. W. T., 132; his Iphigenie in Tauris..... 283
 Goldschmidt (Jenny Lind), Mme..... 67, 284
 Gounod: his Faust, 68, 70, 79, 147, (reviewed by W. H. Fry) 171, (in Boston) 174, (in English) 197; his Mireille..... 235, 248, 291
 Grétry. Brussels Guide Musicale..... 83
 Gyrowetz, Adalbert; A. W. Thayer..... 73, 81, 89, 97, 105, 113, 121
 Handel and Haydn Society: annual Meetings and Reports..... 35, 251, 255
 Handel: his music to Dryden's "St. Cecilia's Day," 150; his "Bolschazzar"..... 275
 Harmony and Melody. J. S. D..... 294
 Hauptmann, Moritz: Birthday Memorial, from the German, (Continued). Mus. Review..... 3, 11
 Hauser, Miska, his adventures..... 272
 Hayter's Church Music, reviewed..... 94, 111
 Hesse, Adolph Friedrich..... 107

Improvisatori in Rome. Story's "Roma di Roma"..... 215
 Incledon, Charles, the singer..... 19

Joachim, Joseph, his new Violin Concerto..... 277
 John Bull's Musical Delusions. Berlin paper..... 4

Kellogg, Miss C. L., as "Margaret." Eve. Post..... 220

Lamentations, the, in the Pope's chapel. "Klauer." 20
 Leipzig, Musical Culture and Tendencies in, 268; its Conservatorium, 268; its Gewandhaus Concerts..... 269, 324, 338
 "Light" and "Heavy" (in Music). J. S. D..... 310
 Liszt, Franz: in Rome, 102, 215, 245; what Mendelssohn says of him..... 188
 Lotto, Izidor, the violinist..... 79
 Lumley, Mr. His "Reminiscences of the Opera," 282, 284

Marseillaise, The. Miss F. M. Raymond, 76; the truth about (Félic)..... 85

Mayseder, Joseph..... 164

Mendelssohn: his "Midsummer Night's Dream," 9; Organ Sonatas, 222, 278, 286; his Letters (reviews and extracts), 32, 99, 107, 114, 137, 145, 154, 188, 193, 200, 208, 210; M. compared with Schumann (Vienna Rezensionen), 50; Rietz's Catalogue of his works, 122; M. as director of the Gewandhaus Concerts, 330; his Personal Appearance and Character (by Lampadius), 393; his Letters reviewed in the Atlantic Monthly..... 403
 Metropolitan Provincialism; Music in Boston..... 350

Meyerbeer, Giacomo: his Death, 246; Life and Career, 242; What they say of him, 252, 276; his MS. works, 264; Funeral honors to, in Berlin, 270; A. Weill's Conversation with, 308; his L' Africaine..... 365
 Minor mode, the, why sad. L. E. C..... 263
 Monster Organ, the. Washington Star..... 163
 Moscheles, Prof. His Seventieth Birthday in Leipzig..... 268

Mozart: his Trio, op. 14, 30; new Libretto of Don Juan, 46; Thematic Catalogue of M's works by Köchel (Athenaeum), 60; his relations with Salieri, 265, 281, 289; his Magic Flute, 331, 332, 334; his Violin Concerto in D, newly discovered..... 396
 "Mus. Doc." Apropos of..... 302

- Museum of Musical Instruments, in Paris. Spiridion..... 58
- Musical Pitch. E. J. Hopkins..... 108
- Music a Universal Language..... 262
- Musical Festivals:—in Germany, 61; in Düsseldorf (1863), 61; Königsberg, 73; Worcester, Eng. 109; Norwich, Eng. 114; Munich, 152; Philadelphia, 235, 240; at Aix-la-Chapelle, 275, 283; Birmingham, 301, 317, 324; Hereford, 318; New School Festival at Carlisle, 325, 332; Rossini Fest. at Pesaro, 325; Choral Fest. at Trinity, N. Y. 364, 372; Do. in Boston..... 398
- MUSIC ABROAD: (See also CORRESPONDENCE.)
- Paris, 12, 21, 53, 68, 100, 110, 116, 153, 189, 197, 204, 215, 221, 248, 301, 309, 340, 365, 381, 397, 406, 408
- Berlin, 12, 44, 64, 70, 112, 181, 208, 214, 221, 248, 261, 270, 272, 374, 408
- Vienna, 13, 20, 26, 44, 46, 55, 69, 62, 87, 110, 181, 189, 204, 221, 285, 382
- Birmingham..... 301, 317, 324
- Dresden..... 18, 70, 248, 298, 365, 366
- Trieste..... 13
- London, 12, 21, 27, 29, 32, 39, 45, 47, 61, 69, 79, 72, 87, 93, 100, 168, 197, 212, 263, 269, 276, 288, 300, 309, 341, 387
- Weimar..... 204, 214, 298, 397
- Worcester, Eng..... 109
- Stuttgart..... 20, 42, 110, 189, 222, 399
- Düsseldorf..... 21, 81
- Leipzig, 28, 44, 53, 87, 153, 168, 181, 189, 204, 231, 248, 255, 259, 264, 299, 298, 298, 309, 341, 368, 366, 373, 382, 396, 412
- Norwich, Eng..... 114
- Bremen..... 87
- Cologne..... 29, 46, 70, 181, 204, 223, 285, 341, 374, 413
- Genoa..... 89
- Rome..... 42, 44, 102, 215
- Hanover..... 46, 70, 214
- Amsterdam..... 70, 160
- Frankfurt..... 70, 108
- Rostock..... 70
- St. Petersburg..... 76, 262
- Königsberg..... 78, 214
- Baden-Baden..... 78, 87, 102
- Ems..... 78
- Munich..... 87, 153, 189, 286, 286
- Schwaben..... 87
- Bologna..... 151
- Florence..... 152, 286, 398
- Braunswick..... 181
- Rotterdam..... 181
- Turin..... 190
- Liverpool..... 200
- Liege..... 204
- Aix la Chapelle..... 248, 270, 275, 283
- Hamburg..... 264
- Mannheim..... 286
- Carlsruhe..... 298, 325, 382
- Milan..... 310, 398
- Naples..... 310
- Hereford..... 318
- Pesaro..... 325
- MUSICAL INTELLIGENCE: (See also CORRESPONDENCE.)
- New York, 5, 31, 32, 39, 43, 48, 55, 70, 104, 111, 113, 159, 215, 222, 232, 239, 272, 286
- Philadelphia..... 6, 7, 32, 48, 233, 240, 386, 388
- Poughkeepsie, N. Y..... 376
- Hartford, Conn..... 6, 31, 231, 352, 384, 392
- Brooklyn, N. Y..... 31, 45, 48, 192, 387, 408
- Salem, Mass..... 32, 228
- Chicago..... 32, 180, 215
- Cambridgeport, Mass..... 47
- Cincinnati..... 55, 215, 313, 362, 398
- Worcester, Mass, 56, 87, 104, 144, 184, 223, 232, 240, 296, 304, 351, 363, 408, 416
- Oxford, O..... 64, 296
- B. Greenwich, R. I..... 87, 392
- Newport, R. I..... 87, 376
- Farmington, Conn..... 160, 272, 362, 416
- New Haven..... 184, 266, 372
- Cambridge, Mass..... 184
- St. Louis..... 184, 207, 223, 231, 312, 368, 408
- Toronto, O. W..... 232
- San Francisco..... 312, 408
- Concord, N. H..... 362
- Milwaukee, Wis..... 408
- MUSIC IN VOL. XXIII:
- No. 1—12. Handel's "Messiah," concluded, [page 187 to 192]
- 13—17—Chopin's Waltzes, continued, [page 129—144]
- 18—26. Haydn's "Creation," Words and Music commenced, (pp. 1—84.)
- MUSIC IN VOL. XXIV:
- No. 1—4. "Creation," continued, (35—60.)
5. Chopin's Waltzes, continued, (49—56.)
- 6—7. Chopin's Mazourkas, continued, (145—8.)
- 8—16. Chopin's Waltzes, continued, (149—184.)
- 17—26. "Creation," continued, (47—83.)
- Musical Library in the British Museum, the. Athenaeum..... 290
- Musical Journalism. New Nation..... 212
- Music in Italy. Letter by Trovatore..... 156, 413
- Musical Machine..... 348
- New Hampshire State Musical Convention..... 392
- New Opera House in Paris. Spiridion..... 52
- New Operas in Italy..... 88
- New York, Organists and Singers in. Eve Post..... 236
- Nicolai: his "Merry Wives of Windsor." London Times..... 250
- Onslow's Quintets..... 190
- OPERA IN BOSTON:
- Gran's Italian Company: Don Pasquale..... 7
- Maretzek's Italian Company: Ione, 167, 183; Ernani, 174, 391; Norma, 167, 207, 391; La Traviata, 173; Il Trovatore, 183, 207, 383; Lucia di Lammermoor, 173, 214, 391; Don Giovanni, 173, 207, 375; Martha, 174, 207, 375, 391; Macbeth, 174; Faust, 174, 183, 207, 214, 383; I due Foscari, 183; Lucrezia Borgia, 183, 383; La Sonnambula, 183; Linda, 391; Polauto, 214, 375; Don Sebastiano, 383; Fra Diavolo, 383; La Figlia del Reggimento, 391.
- Grover's German Company: Martha, 238, 326; La Dame Blanche, 238, 335, 342; Faust, 239, 247, 326, 334, 343; Der Freyschütz, 239, 247, 327, 333; Die Lustige Weiber von Windsor, 239; Stradella, 239; Fidelio, 247, 335; Don Juan, 247, 334; Robert le Diable, 327; Die Jüdin, 334; Zauberflöte, 334; Huguenots, 343; Tannhäuser, 343; Mireille, 343; Nachtlager in Granada, 343.
- Opera in the Family Hapsburg. A. W. Thayer, 153, 161, 169, 177
- Operatic Criticism, satirized. Eve Gazette..... 176
- Operatic Finance. N. Y. World..... 12
- Organ: for Mechanics' Hall, Worcester, 87, 339, 351; for Second Church, Boston, 112, 119; for Church of the Immaculate Conception, Boston, 199; for South Congregational Church, do., 348.
- Organ, Great, in Boston Music Hall, 21, 73, 114, 117, 124, 129, 132, 139, 141, 146, 149, 163, 195, 316; its Uses, 102, 114, 141, 182, 271; its History (Dr. Upham's Report), 129; its Completion and Inauguration; a week of festivities, 133, 140; Choral Inauguration, by Hanckel and Haydn Society, 149; Letter from C. Jerome Hopkins..... 316
- Organ in Freiburg. H. W. Beecher..... 92
- Organ Music, what it is..... 142
- Organs, new History of, by M. Grégoir of Antwerp..... 200
- Orpheonists, in Paris and New York. Pioneer..... 280
- Our Musical Season (Boston, Oct. 1863)..... 110
- Paradies, Maria Teresa. Féts..... 221
- Paragraphs from Vienna. A. W. T...... 55, 59
- Petrella: his "Last Days of Pompeii." N. Y. Tribune..... 20
- Piano-fortes: Broadwood & Sons', 1, 10; New invention; the Cycloid..... 416
- POETRY:
- Legends of St. Cecilia. N. L. Frothingham..... 1
- A Catalogue of Great Composers. Charles Lamb..... 8
- Covent Garden Nursery Rhymes. London Mus. World..... 4
- Sonnets. D. A. Watson..... 9
- Open Table. From Goethe. J. S. D...... 25
- An Operatic Eulogium. Punch..... 27
- The Old-fashioned Chair. E. F. Tappin..... 99
- The Organ. From Herder..... 129
- Ode, recited by Miss Cushman at the Inauguration of the Great Organ. Mrs. J. T. Fields..... 181
- Impromptu: The Great Organ. Dr. O. W. Holmes..... 140
- "Adum": on the Death of Thackeray. Round Table..... 169
- The End of the Play. Thackeray..... 169
- From a Musical Sufferer. Transcript..... 171
- The Blithe Lark. Frederick Tennyson..... 217
- Stanzas from the German: "My heart, I bid thee answer."..... 296
- Seashore, by R. W. Emerson. Boatwain's Whistle..... 345
- "With Heaviest Sound a Giant Statue fell," by T. W. Parsons. Advertiser..... 385
- Laus Deo: by J. G. Whittier. Independent..... 393
- Patti Adelina..... 51, 59
- Phillips, Henry: his account of his Debut..... 280
- Folke, Elise: "Musical Sketches" reviewed..... 187, 188
- Polonaise, The. Liszt's "Chopin"..... 25, 35
- Prudent, Emile, sketch of..... 70, 85
- Psalm Tunes, Latrebe..... 5
- Raff, Joachim, his Prize Symphony "An das Vaterland"..... 405
- REVIEW:
- Musical Publications, 14, 55, 63, 94, 111, 159, 191, 263, 303, 359, 407
- Books..... 7, 14, 32, 99, 120, 144, 187, 188, 215, 359
- Robin Adair, Origin of, Notes and Queries..... 284
- Rome; Music of Passion Week. London Mus. World..... 42
- Rossini: his new Mass, 219; R. described by H. Heine, 305; his funeral Tribute to Meyerbeer..... 312
- Salieri, Antonio. A. W. Thayer. 185, 193, 201, 209, 217, 225, 233, 241, 257, 265, 273, 281, 289, 297, 321, 329, 337, 345
- Sangler, George, Death of..... 359
- Schneider, Dr. J. G. Obituary notice. Athenaeum..... 258
- Schubert & Chopin. Recessions..... 66
- Schubert, Franz, his Opera, "Domestic Strife"..... 5
- Schumann, Franz: On "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, 9; his "Paradise and the Peri," 22, 30, 37, 46, 54, 62; Oratorio, "Lazarus," 28; "Faust" music, 189; S. & Mendelssohn, 50; S. & Clara Wieck, 300, 307, 323; his Piano music, 358; his "Pilgrimage of the Rose"..... 383
- Schumann-ophibia in England..... 48
- Scribe, Eugene, Eulogies on. Spiridion..... 33, 43
- Scudo, Pierre, Death of..... 361
- Sensational Writing, a Plea for..... 228
- "Sensation" Works; Truth, Genius, Shakespeare..... 229
- Serenades. Round Table..... 203
- Shakespeare from the Anti-Sensational Critic's Point of View..... 228, 229
- Shakespeare in his Relation to Music, by E. Naumann..... 306, 314, 322, 353
- Shakespeare's Day: Tercentenary Anniversary; Concerts, &c..... 230
- Silas, Mr., his Oratorio "Joash," London Mus. World..... 116
- Singing Societies in Germany..... 42
- Smart, Henry, his "Bride of Dunkerron"..... 318
- Spohr, L., his "Weihe der Töne" Symphony..... 13
- His Autobiography..... 411
- Thayer, A. W., appointed U. S. Consul at Trieste..... 351
- The First Opera, a Novelette, from the French of Berlioz..... 377, 385
- Timothy Trill's Letters:—on a Choral Service at Trinity, N. Y., 37; on Costa's Naaman and the Critics, 356; on the Great Boston Organ..... 316
- Twilight Fantasies: A Great Organ Prelude..... 114
- Two Musical Biographies; (Spohr; Beethoven)..... 412
- Verdi: his Aroldo, 43; Macbeth..... 174
- Violin; history of the, by Sandys & Forster..... 202
- Voice, Phenomena of the; Dr. Gibb's Observations..... 92
- Wagner, Richard: What Schumann said of him, 46; in Zurich, 47; his Tannhäuser, 338—9, 343
- Walcker, E. F., the Organ Builder..... 22
- Weber, C. M. von: his Life, by his son (review and extracts)..... 179, 187, 194, 202, 211, 218
- Wild Flowers. Independent..... 28
- Wollenhaupt, Hermann, Death of. Tribune..... 111
- Wood, Mrs. (Miss Paton), Death of..... 295, 304
- Wylde's (Prof.) Lectures at Gresham College, 170, 178

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 660.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, APRIL 2, 1864.

VOL. XXIV. No. 1.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Half a dozen of Beethoven's Contemporaries.

II. ANTONIO SALIERI.

[Continued from Vol. xxiii, page 202.]

In the year 1768 the pupil began to hear specimens of his compositions performed in public. Gassmann, having charge of the Italian opera, often had slight changes, additions and the like, to make in the music, and these he occasionally entrusted to his pupil, mainly to put a stop to his constant entreaties to be allowed to produce something in public. That the pupil often composed texts, already set by his master, for the purpose of self-improvement—as the boy Benjamin Franklin re-wrote Steele's and Addison's Spectators—Gassmann did not know.

One of his tricks at that time which ended happily, is a good indication of his character, and, when an old fellow, he evidently heartily enjoyed the memory of the success of the young one.

They had an old spinnet in the theatre, which was moved from the orchestra to the rehearsal room and back, as it was needed in rehearsal or at performance, and was so superannuated as not to remain in tune even for a single evening. The singers complained, too, that they could not hear the accompaniment; and Salieri found it alike useless to play in the higher or lower octaves; here a string snapped, there one gave way; here some of the quills, which snapped the strings, were lacking, there they remained sticking above the strings—in short, the old thing already nearly useless, grew worse every day, and the manager was too miserly to buy a new one.

One morning after a rehearsal at which Salieri's martyrdom had been almost intolerable, he was obliged to wait for a copyist to make certain corrections in the parts, and found himself quite alone with his enemy. He threw the old instrument wide open, mounted a chair beside it and jumped in bodily. What havoc with the internal organism this kind of performance would make, may be safely left to the imagination.

When the copyist came the spinnet was as usual closed and locked, and Salieri was calmly busy in his corrections of the score, which the other was to transfer to the parts. All the directions were given as usual and the two left the room together. That evening was an opera, the spinnet was transferred from the hall to the orchestra, and an hour before the performance came the tuner to perform his daily task. He opened it; "Mercy on us!" and sunk back into a chair. He called the men who had brought it down. They were as overcome by the sad sight as the tuner himself. They hurried off to call Gassmann and the manager, and while seeking for a clue to the criminal, another instrument for that evening was brought in. Next day another rehearsal, at which the spinnet was thoroughly examined; nearly all the strings were gone, and the sounding board itself crushed—the career of that spinnet was ended.

"The cover must have tumbled in," said one.

"No, a music-stand," said a second.

"Not so," said the tuner, "all together would not have done so much damage; some devil or other must have jumped into it."

"The good man has almost guessed it," thought Salieri, who stood by, and not too much at his ease, though no one suspected—at least seemed to suspect—him, and who was not free from anxiety, until he heard Gassmann say:

"Be it as it may! Thank Heaven, the manager will at length be compelled to get a new instrument made." And so he was.

Such time as the young man could command from his various studies and duties he zealously employed in composition; and he remembered in later days as products of these essays, several little cantatas for a solo voice and bass; divers pieces of church music; namely, a short mass alla capella, a Salve Regina, and several Graduals and Offertoires with full orchestra; a short Italian opera for four voices and chorus; 6 violin quartets; two symphonies for orchestra; some pieces for wind instruments, and the pieces above mentioned which his master allowed him to write for the theatre, which consisted of ariettas, duets, terzets, some ballet movements, and trivial operatic last act finales to which in those days, very much as now, no audience paid any attention. Salieri remembered in his age, how at that time he had no little self-satisfaction and secret pride at his share in any successful piece; would pass sleepless nights and unhappy days when such a piece was damned. What a dust we make, said the fly. Of all this preparatory work nothing was preserved except such pieces as proved available for other compositions of a later date; the rest he destroyed.

Let him tell his own story of the first of his operas which came upon the stage—if it be rather long, it is interesting, characteristic, and gives us another glimpse into the operatic life of Vienna near the close of 1769, when the youthful composer had just entered his 20th year.

"My master, Gassmann, was called to Rome at that time to compose a tragic opera for the Carneval (1770). I remained behind in Vienna to conduct the rehearsals under Vice Kapellmeister Ferandini. Gaston Boccherini, a dancer in the Vienna opera house, a passionate lover of the art of poetry, had with the aid of Calzabigi (author of several excellent opera texts, among which are Alceste and Orpheus), written a comic Italian opera, entitled "Le donne litterate," which was intended for Kapellmeister Gassmann. Calzabigi advised him to give it to me, for I was a beginner in composition, as he was in poetry, and I could therefore the more easily come to an understanding with him. One morning therefore Boccherini came to me and, after the usual greeting, asked without the slightest preface: 'Would you like to set a comic opera text, which I have written, to music?' I answered coolly, 'why not?' And then he told me honestly, what his intention had been and how Calzabigi had advised him. Aha! thought I, so they think you able to compose operas! Courage then—we'll not let the opportunity pass unused. So I impatiently asked the poet to explain me the plot of his opera, and lay the text before me. Done; and after we had distributed the parts according to the powers of the company as it then was, Boccherini said: 'I will leave you now, in the mean time you can examine the text, and if you wish for changes here and there for the sake of the musical effect, when I come again, we will undertake to make them together.'

"Now I was alone again, and I locked my door, and with glowing cheeks—as was generally the case with me in later years when I had undertaken a work with real joy and delight—I read the poem through again, found it certainly well adapted to music, and, having read the vocal pieces for the third time, my first step was—as I had seen my master do—to determine which key would suit the character of each separate piece. As it drew near noon, and I consequently could not hope to begin my composition before dinner, I employed the remaining hour to go through the poem once more. I had already begun to think out the melodies for certain passages, when Madame Gassmann (for my master had married before this time) had me called to dinner. All dinner time my opera text did not once come out of my head, and I have never been able since to remember what I ate that day.

"After dinner, as I had been accustomed to do from my childhood, I, with a book in my hand,—took a nap; then I took my daily walk on the walls of the city,* and turned back to my lodgings, full of secret pride at the confidence shown in me; I told the maid—as I had also done in the forenoon—to turn away any possible visitor, under the pretence that I was not at home. The good-natured old woman, to whom no doubt the self-important look of the commonly so jovial young gentleman and this repeated injunction seemed rather queer, looked at me quite astonished, and could not help a half suppressed smile. But I said to myself: 'Let the poor simpleton laugh, and we will think how to do ourself credit.'

"As soon as I was alone, I felt an irrepressible desire to set the music of the introduction to the opera. I therefore sought to place the character and the situation of the persons of the drama vividly before my imagination, and suddenly discovered a movement of the orchestra, which seemed to me fitted to bear up and give unity to the vocal music which the text necessarily made fragmentary. Now I fancied myself in the pit, listening to the production of my ideas; they seemed to me characteristic; I wrote them down, put them again to proof, and as I was satisfied with them, went on. So in half an hour the outline of the Introduction stood there on the music paper. Who was happier than I! It was now six o'clock in the evening and dark. I had lights brought. Before 12 o'clock, I determined, thou goest not to bed; the fancy is inflamed—the fire must be improved. I read the first finale, which, as to the words, began very much like the Introduction; I read it again, form a plan of the rhythm and keys suited to the work as whole—giving three hours to this work, but without writing a note. I felt myself weary and my cheeks burned; so I paced my room up and down, and soon again was drawn to my writing desk, where I began my outline, and, when midnight came, had made such progress that I laid myself in bed in high enjoyment.

* The last two bastions of the walls are to-day disappearing. Jan. 1864.

My head had been all day long too full of music and poetry, not to have it also in my dreams. In fact I did hear in dreams a singular harmony, but at such a wide distance and so confused, that it caused me more pain than pleasure, and finally awoke me. It was only four o'clock A.M., but all I could do, I could not again get to sleep. So I lighted my candles, looked through all I had sketched with a lead pencil the day before, went on with my outline, and had got half through the first finale when the clock struck eight, and to my surprise my poet entered the room. He could hardly believe that in so short a time I had sketched the entire introduction, and half of the first finale. I played what I had written to him on the piano-forte; he was uncommonly pleased, embraced me, and really seemed not less delighted than I was myself. In short, keeping at work, with no diminution of my enthusiasm, within four weeks a good two-thirds of the opera was written out in score and instrumented. My intention was to complete it at once, but not have it performed until my master's return home from Rome, and his correction of my work. But circumstances gave another turn to the matter.

"The manager had just then brought out a new opera, which displeased his public, and he was therefore forced to replace it with something else new. Boccherini, without saying a word to me, had told Calzabigi, that I was pretty well on with my opera. He, a friend of the manager, desired to have a sort of rehearsal of what was already finished. He invited me, and I, without guessing at the real object, took my finished pieces and went with my poet. I was rather taken aback at finding there the manager, the Kapellmeister Gluck and Scarlatti;* but, supposing they were there only out of curiosity, their presence gave me uncommon pleasure. I sang and played what was finished, and in the concerted pieces Gluck and Scarlatti sang with me. Gluck, who had always liked and encouraged me, showed himself at the very beginning satisfied with my work; Scarlatti, who from time to time pointed out little grammatical errors in my composition, praised also each number on the whole, and at the close both masters said to the manager, that if I would immediately finish the lacking numbers, they could without delay rehearse and produce the work, 'in that,' such were Gluck's own words, 'this work contains what is sufficient to give the public pleasure.'

"Who can imagine the joyful surprise which these words gave me, through which I instantly saw the object of the meeting. Full of confidence—'superbo di mi stesso'—I promised my judges the greatest industry until the work was put upon the stage. I wrote day and night, ran to the rehearsals, went through the vocal parts with the singers, corrected the copyists, joined the poet in devising the costumes and decorations, and lived in such an unbroken strain both of mental and physical powers, that if study, drudgery and sweat did not throw me upon a sick bed, I can only think it was because my happiness acted as a protection.

"The general rehearsal took place the day before the first performance. That evening I went into the theatre with beating heart to hear my opera announced for the performance, which was done in these words: 'To-morrow the Italian operatic company will have the honor to produce a "new opera entitled Le Donne tulerate," poem by Herr Gaston Boccherini; music by Herr Anton Salieri; the first work of both.' Several persons in the audience applauded, which gave me sweet confidence and seemed to me a good augury. Next morning, early as I thought it possible that the bills could be posted at the street corners, I went out to see my name for the first time in print, which gave me deep gratification. But not satisfied with seeing it once—much as I had feared it might have been omitted from the other bills—I ran all round town, to read it everywhere.

"It would be vain for me to try to depict the restless delight which filled that day down to the hour of the performance; but when that struck the joy changed to fear; my cheeks glowed until my whole face was scarlet, and so with faltering step, I went to the instrument. As I entered the orchestra there was applause, which in some degree recalled my courage. I bowed to the public, seated myself with some equanimity at the spinnet, and the opera began. It gained much applause, but certainly more for the sake of encouraging the young author, who was well known, than on account of the worth of the opera. When the performance was over and I had embraced my poet, I hurried away to mix with the audience as it left the theatre, and hear the opinions expressed.

"The opera is not bad," said one. 'It pleased me right well,' said a second. (That man I could have kissed). 'For a pair of beginners, it is no small thing,' says the third. 'For my part,' says the fourth, 'I found it very tedious.'

"At these words I struck off into another street for fear of hearing something still worse; but hearing at that moment new praises both of poet and composer, and modestly satisfying myself with them, I returned to my lodging heated and tired, but full of joy and peace.

So ends Salieri's story—who does not like it—who has no taste for the old man's simple reminiscence of his youth—had better pass it over.

(To be continued.)

Mendelssohn's Letters.*

From the London Saturday Review.

It is certainly satisfactory to meet with a man of genius who is neither eccentric nor disreputable. It is the common reproach of men to whom that mysterious gift has been granted, that from some cause or other their personal history has been marked by oddities and infirmities, or by something worse. In fact, it has come to be popularly held that a man of genius cannot be a man of common sense or of self-denial. Whether it be that the peculiar organization of the brain which is requisite to the possession of genius is also necessarily deficient in solidity and healthy activity, or whether the cause is less purely physical, the world believes that genius, as such, is unfavorable to the development of the more practical and self-sacrificing virtues. Whatever be the real facts on which this popular prejudice rests, they are, moreover, considerably exaggerated by the equally popular prejudices in favor of respectable stupidity. It is comforting to one's self-love to reflect that if we cannot produce a great poem, or paint a grand picture, or invent logarithms or the differential calculus, or speak like Demosthenes, or write music like Beethoven, we are yet so admirable as sons or husbands, and have so sound a balance at our banker's, and are altogether such respectable members of society that, after all, we are practically of more value to the world than those who have possessed the most extraordinary gifts. The vulgar theory that there exists some hidden alliance between virtue and mediocrity is, in fact, neither more nor less than one of the forms taken by that peculiarly odious form of selfishness, the passion of envy. Yet it may be admitted that a man of genius who is at the same time a good son, a good brother, a good husband, a good father, temperate, reasonably economical, free from jealousy of all rivals, even pious, and, with all this, remarkably good-looking, and (notwithstanding an ugly trick of chewing his handkerchief) unquestionably gentlemanly, is such a phenomenon as we cannot hope to behold more than once in a lifetime. If anything more can be supposed needful to make up an almost impossible combination, let us suppose that the phenomenon in question was not only an extraordinarily precocious boy, but that in early youth he attained a wide-spread popularity, which continued increasing up to the time of his death, and that his special gift lay in the very art which is supposed to be singularly unconducive to the type of character which the world calls respectable. Yet such a man was Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy. And it is as furnishing illustrations of his personal history that the second volume of his correspondence, recently translated by Lady Wallace, is full of interest to the general, as well as the musical, reader. Many of his existing letters have, indeed, been kept back, as of too intimately private a nature to be suitable for present publication, and consequently we have but glimpses of that purely home life in which much of the singular charm of his nature was displayed. Still we have enough of the man, in all his relations, to account for that unusual degree of attachment which the last of the great musicians attracted wherever he was known.

Those who are fond of speculating as to a composer's personal peculiarities from the picture he gives of himself in his works, will not be far wrong if they judge of Mendelssohn by this test. Breadth of idea, seriousness of purpose, an aversion to everything hollow or superficial, untiring energy and activity tending to nervous and almost feverish restlessness, a deep inner love for the pure, the beautiful, the tender, and the calm—these are the characteristics of his music, as they were of himself. A man of strong and steady feeling, but not of intense, overmastering passions—of healthy, honest-hearted cheerfulness, rather than of mercurial vivacity or exuberant animal spirits—he uttered everything that was in him in the endless variety of works which he poured forth in the five-and-twenty years of his musical career. Music was to him eminently a language. He wanted no words when melody and harmony could speak his thoughts. In a passage in one of his letters he expresses his ideas as to the expressive powers of musical sound with a decision which will be incomprehensible to those who do not feel as he felt:—

There is so much talk about music [he writes to a friend at Lubeck], and yet so little really said. For my part, I believe that words do not suffice for such a purpose, and if I found they did suffice, then I certainly would have nothing more to do with music. People often complain that music is ambiguous, that their ideas on the subject always seem so vague, whereas every one understands words; with me it is exactly the reverse—not merely with regard to entire sentences, but also as to individual words; these, too, seem to me so ambiguous, so vague, so un-

* The three famous Scarlattis were, Alexander, of Naples, born about 1660, his son Domenico, 1683, and Domenico's son Giuseppe or Joseph, about 1718. Joseph is the one here referred to.

* Letters of Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy, from 1838 to 1847. Translated by Lady Wallace. London: Longman & Co.

intelligible when compared with genuine music, which fills the soul with a thousand things better than words. What the music I love expresses to me is not thought too indefinite to be put into words, but on the contrary, too definite.

This, in truth, is the root of the whole matter, and it is in this use of musical sound for the expression of ideas, apart from all verbal language, that the musical poet is distinguished from the mere maker of music. Sound speaks thoughts as truly as a landscape or a flower is full of expression, or as the human countenance speaks, though no articulate sounds are uttered. To those who are destitute of the musical organization such a notion may seem inexplicable and visionary; yet, by a similar deficiency, there are minds so constituted that a rose or a lily, the Cascade of Terni or the Bay of Naples more no more awakes any special thought or feeling in their breasts than does a dusty road or a meadow full of ditches. To the true composer and lover of music, on the contrary, these innumerable combinations of concords and discords, these successions of notes high and low, express with an inimitable accuracy all that multiplicity of conceptions and feelings which the human mind is capable of entertaining. All our ideas of law and order, of unity and movement, of moral beauty and sweetness, of human energy and strength and self-reliance and tenderness and sorrow and agony, with every variation in the fleeting moods of the heart, find as real and satisfying a vehicle of utterance in the combinations of genuine music as in the plays of Shakspeare or the Psalms of David. And it is in the power of creating these combinations, as expressions of the characteristics of an individual mind of an eminently vigorous, sensitive, and human constitution, that the great gift of what is called "style" consists. A composer whose character is strongly marked above that of ordinary men, and who unaffectedly and genially thinks in musical sounds, naturally and without effort writes with a special style which is emphatically new and his own. Inferior composers are but the imitators of other men's language. Either their thoughts are commonplace or they have not the imaginative and inventive faculty, wherewith to express them. A commonplace mind may be highly sensitive to the effects of music, and may possess moreover the inventive faculty, as such, in a considerable degree; but no commonplace mind can write music with a definitely marked and characteristic style of its own. It can but reflect its own mediocrity in the language it has borrowed from others. And thus it is that, when we attempt to analyse or describe Mendelssohn's style as a composer, we can do little more than point out its striking truthfulness as a representative of that which was in him. Hence, further, it is, what to many persons seems so surprising, that the greatest works of the great masters have been written in their full manhood or during the approach of age. The explanation of the fact is to be found in their increased experience of the realities of human life—its passions, its pleasures, its vanity, and above all, its sorrows. The more profoundly they have learnt to think and to feel, the more profound are the emotions they have to express. They have learnt to speak what they know, not merely what they imagine. And we entertain no doubt that, had Mendelssohn lived to be fifty or sixty, there would have been as vast a difference between his earlier and his later works as there is between Mozart's first mass and his Requiem. Mozart's Requiem was the work of a mind forced into contemplation of those realities of the unseen which he knew he was shortly to behold. His earlier masses are the graceful and brilliant poems of an imagination uninstructed by the pains of experience, and regarding the object of its faith from the point of view of a Kapell-Meister bound to supply Kyries and Credos to order in abundant sufficiency. In Mendelssohn's unfinished oratorio, Christus, the traces of this progress of his mind are fully manifest. Throughout, it displays that increasing feeling for purity of tune, and for repose rather than ingenuity in harmony, which accompanied the maturing of his mind and judgment on all affairs, whether musical or otherwise. From the first indeed, that union of cheerfulness with seriousness, of sober judgment with eager enthusiasm, which was so striking in his personal life, is to be discerned in his works. The passages for the wind instruments, equally novel and charming, in his overture to the Midsummer Night's Dream, were typical of that inner life of repose which lay hid beneath an exterior of eagerness and impetuosity. His likings and dislikings for the works of other masters were in like manner the result, not so much of taste and criticism, as of the essential qualities of his own mind. He recoiled from Auber as spontaneously as he worshipped Sebastian Bach. It was not that Auber and the modern Italians did not write fugues; his aversion sprang from an utter want of sympathy with their tone of mind as men. The emotions they expressed were not his emotions, and he never lived to the age when we learn to be charitable even when we cannot be sympathetic. He held them all to be sensual, frivolous, and of the earth, earthy. Indeed, in these letters he expresses in no measured terms his repugnance to the whole modern theatrical school, though we do not find in his bitterest censures anything so epigrammatic as the criticism of a kindred composer on Meyerbeer's Huguenots. "The Catholics and Protestants," wrote Schumann, describing this opera when it first came out, "cut each other's throats on the stage, and a Jew stands by and makes music to it."

Mendelssohn's own religious opinions appear frequently in his letters, and few writers have spoken with such unaffected simplicity on a subject so easily disfigured with cant or conventionalism. His theology was that which is characteristic of the Broad Church school of Christianity. As every one knows, he was the grandson of Moses Mendelssohn, the learned and acute Jewish philosopher; but he himself, and his brothers and sisters, were all brought up Christians, and the change in the family religion appears to have taken place in the previous generation. As a musician, he could not but entertain the strongest aversion for the Evangelical school, wherever he found it. Modern Germany, indeed, is not prolific in disciples of this most unmusical of religious sects; but the Elberfeld preachers—whose leader, Krummacher, was at one time all the fashion with the Low Church party in England—were sufficiently influential to cause him some annoyance. In a letter to Professor Schirmer of Düsseldorf, he refers to a report which misrepresented his opinions as leaning towards those of the Elberfeld school. It is too striking and characteristic of the man to be altogether omitted:—

So I am said to be a saint! If this is intended to convey what I conceive to be the meaning of the word, and what your expressions lead me to think you also understand by it, then I can only say that, alas! I am not so, though every day of my life I strive with greater earnestness, according to my ability, more and more to resemble this character. I know, indeed, that I can never hope to be altogether a saint, but if I ever approach to one it will be well. If people, however, understand by the word "saint" a Pietist, one of those who lay their hands on their laps and expect that Providence will do their work for them, and who, instead of striving in their vocation to press on towards perfection, talk of a heavenly calling being incompatible with an earthly one, and are incapable of loving with their whole hearts any human being, or anything on earth—then, God be praised! such a one I am not, and hope never to become, so long as I live; and though I am sincerely desirous to live piously, and really to be so, I hope this does not necessarily entail the other character.

This same conscientiousness and abhorrence of the artificial and the unreal was carried by Mendelssohn into every detail of his art. Being well provided for by his father, he could easily afford to keep what he calls an "artistic conscience" amidst all such temptations as the music-sellers had to offer; but he was equally proof against royal commands and blandishments. Not the least curious part of this volume are letters relating to the wishes of the King of Prussia that he should set certain choruses of Æschylus to music, as he had set certain choruses of Sophocles. Nothing would induce him to pledge himself to the undertaking, from his conviction that the choruses in question were utterly unsuitable to musical expression. To Englishmen it may seem strange to see a Prime Minister and an absolute Sovereign vainly entreating a musician to compose music for a few Greek verses. We can only extract some of the more remarkable sentences, but the whole correspondence is well worth reading as a rare example of that realizing of an artistic ideal which is so much talked about and so seldom witnessed. In justice to the King it should be added that, though the composer's persistence in his refusal caused him much vexation, it produced no diminution in his respect and esteem:—

Because I owe so much gratitude to the King, because I honor him in the depths of my soul as an admirable noble prince and man—on this very account I think that all I do by his command should be done with a good conscience, and in a cheerful spirit. . . . I will always obey the commands of a Sovereign so beloved by me, even at the sacrifice of my personal wishes and advantage. If I find I cannot do so with a good artistic conscience, I must endeavor candidly to state my scruples or my incapacity, and if that does not suffice, then I must go. This may sound absurd in the mouth of a musician, but shall I not feel duty as much in my position as others do in theirs? In an occurrence so personally important to me, shall I not follow the dictates of integrity and truth, as I have striven to do all my life.

We must add a word for the especial benefit of Birmingham and its musical amateurs. If they are disposed to plume themselves—not being generally too much given to modesty—on their admiration for Mendelssohn, let them lay to heart the opinion as to their discrimination and the real value of their praises which he expressed in a letter to Hiller in the year 1837.

Carl Maria Von Weber.

A LIFE PICTURE.

(Continued from Vol. xxiii. page 202.)

The author of C. M. Von Weber's biography does not so completely exclude his own opinions and those of others concerning the composer's works, as we should have expected from the views put forth in the preface; to be convinced of the contrary we have only to read in this first volume, which comprehends Weber's life up to the year 1816, all that is said about the compositions then completed—about, for instance, the first operas, Das Waldmädchen, Peter Schmolz, Sylvana and Abu Hassan; sundry cantatas and songs, the Piano-forte Concerto in E flat major, &c. But the reader must not expect an analysis extending into details.

With regard to the account of Weber's life, properly so-called, it contains much highly interesting matter that captivates our attention and offers an attractive picture of what C. M. Von Weber was, under the unfavorable circumstances of his youth, and until he obtained the appointment of Conductor of the Royal Private Band, at Dresden, on Christmas day, 1816.

The whole work is parcelled out into four divisions, of which three, in two volumes, will contain a picture of the master's life, and the fourth (the third volume) a new edition of his posthumous writings. The first volume, now published, comprehends the first two divisions of the biography, which have been designated by the titles that Weber himself was accustomed to give these portions of his life and labors. The first: "Years of Youth, Apprenticeship, and Wanderings" (from 1786 to 1812), takes up twelve sections (page 1 to 394); and the second: "Yoke-Years," or "Years of Servitude," three sections (page 399 to 546).

After devoting a retrospective glance to Weber's ancestors, who came originally from Upper Austria, and most of whom possessed a marked partiality for music and the stage, the author gives us a very interesting and characteristic picture of Franz Anton Von Weber, the composer's father, a picture by which he mercilessly destroys the notions we previously entertained of Franz Anton as a major, a chamberlain, &c., &c., as he is designated in the Encyclopedia articles on Carl Maria, and portrays, in strict accordance with the results of his researches, the strange being, who never settled down as long as he lived, and, unfortunately, distinguished himself as little by dignity of character or principle. Without having studied any profession in particular, but possessing a natural talent for music and everything connected with the stage, besides being a handsome man, remarkable for his aristocratic manners, Franz Anton was an ensign; a lieutenant in the Imperial Army at Rossbach; an adjutant, a steward, a court counselor of domains, well-off; poor; a musician on his own resources; a musical-director in Lübeck; a musical conductor for Eutin; town-musician at the same place, in bad circumstances (during which state of things Carl Maria was born, on the 18th December, 1786); and then a theatrical manager eternally roving from place to place. During the later period, it is true that he signed and called himself a major, but he never was one.

Such were the circumstances under which Weber first saw the light, and under which he spent his youth. Let us hear what the author of his biography says in a fragment from the second section. It will serve at the same time as a specimen of the author's style of narrative.

"The boy was very sickly. He suffered more especially from a local affection, which appears to have been seated in the upper part of his thigh-bone. He was four years old before he learned to walk alone, and every violent movement caused him pain. His complaint was never quite cured, and caused the lameness, subsequently remarked, in his right foot. It at first proved, when he was a child, a great obstacle to his taking part in the games of companions of his own age. He was—especially during the period his father entertained the hope of making him a young phenomenon, and while the never-ending music lessons disgusted and rendered him nervous—timid, and excitable, avoiding the mental and bodily movements and exertions with which boyish life and boyish games are inevitably connected. Subsequently, when, after his mind had freer scope, and his joyous, elastic temperament had got the better of material obstacles, he became aware that, despite his corporal weakness, his companions gathered around him with a kind of deference, and his soul grew able to free its action almost completely from the influence of bodily suffering, there sprang up within his breast a fullness of life which frequently almost became mere wantonness, and actually made him the very heart and soul of all the acts of violence and roguish pranks which occurred in the circle of his playmates. His power—already mentioned, and exercised from his earliest youth—of elevating the action of the mind above the pressure of the sickly frame, alone enabled Weber to embody the revelations of his genius in all their healthy fullness, for the sensation of enjoying vigorous health, and of not being burdened by the body, because the latter requires nothing, was one Weber never knew. It was amid the admonitory cries of weakness, the harsh sounds of pain, and from out the gloom of depression that he had to catch those strains which, by their spring-like freshness and their forest sweetness, delight and will ever delight us and our Epigoni. His father and step-brother Fridolin (called simply Fritz) taught him music between them. The poor child swallowed unwillingly the fare with which he was satiated, and, to his father's despair, appeared almost entirely deficient in talent. On one occasion, as Weber himself relates one of the earliest reminiscences of his childhood, Fridolin, throwing away the fiddle-bow, with which he had often in his rage rapped the child's little unskilful hands, exclaimed: "Carl, you may perhaps become anything else, but you will never be a musician!" For unluckily Franz Anton did not lose patience so quickly; it seems, too, that as the boy's mind was developed, his natural gifts became more apparent, so that his lessons were continued even during the wanderings of the Weberian opera company to Erlangen and Augsburg in 1793-4. But even though, at this early period of his youth, Weber's feeling for music had not extended as far as the awakening the talent of a child phenomenon, the circumstances amid which the boy passed the first years of his youth, and received his first strong and indelible impressions, exercised the most powerful influence on the direction taken by his talent in its subsequent development. It was these circumstances principally which gave that thoroughly dramatic character in which consists a great part of the originality of his productions.

"The playing-place in the house, the street, the garden, the wood, and the meadow, the battle-field upon the forms at school, a field on which, generally, the foundations of a boy's views and character are laid, were almost unknown to him. There is no doubt that the games in which he took delight with companions of his own age, and in which the germ of all a person's subsequent views is so frequently contained, were partially, as far as his bodily condition allowed, similar to those which fill up the hours of amusement of other boys, but the scene where they took place was different, and there were mixed up in them elements ordinarily foreign to boyish minds. For Weber, as the son of the manager, and playmate of the children of the musicians and of the actors, and as one compelled by his weakness to remain near his parents, the theatre, the orchestra, and the stage were that world usually found by a boy in the street, the garden, and the court-yard. The battles usually waged by the boyish host with sticks and switches upon the common, were fought out by Weber and his companions with swords covered with silver paper, and with pasteboard shields, borne, in the evening, by their fathers as bandits or heroes. The float was the fortress defended against the storming party in the orchestra; stage lumber furnished lurking-places and retreats, while dresses appropriated on the sly decked the kings and the officers. The wings, machinery, and painted woods were their home, just as the rustling forest is that of the hunter's son. Weber's first youthful reminiscences were most closely and firmly interwoven with recollections of stage and orchestral arrangements; with but half understood dramatic plots, which had to supply the place of scholastic absurdities; and with the whole technical mechanism of stage life, with which the boy became as familiar as with the laws regulating tops or hide-and-seek, at which he played with his companions. As, however, no study of the grammar and syntax of a language can replace the animation of words heard from youth upwards, this absolute intimacy with all the material detail of stage-business, an intimacy enabling a person to hit instinctively upon what is right, gave Weber an immense advantage in his efforts as a dramatic composer, because he instinctively knew a priori what was required to render effective for stage purposes an idea, an action, or a dramatic form, while it gave him, as a conductor, a vast superiority over all who were acquainted practically or theoretically with only certain departments of stage matters.

"But great as was consequently, on the one hand, the advantage the boy derived, in his subsequent development, from his association with his father's company, the dangers arising from it were, on the other hand, quite as great, on account of the irregularity of a new theatrical life, the lax morality belonging to it; and littleness of conception and outwardness in the treatment of Art. That he escaped these dangers better than many other persons was partially owing to the constitution of his inner nature, which threw off, as clear water does greasy fat, everything that defiled and diverted him from his upward course; but it was owing, also, and in a far greater degree, to the influence of the gentle, pure, and, at the same time, profoundly melancholy individuality of his young mother, a finely educated and sensible woman, who unceasingly instructed the ailing child and took him under the wing of her soul, undermining, as far as lay in her power, the effects of a theatrical life, for which she felt antipathy, and developing, with feminine care and delicacy, the boy's natural tendency to goodness of heart; but, finally, it was owing, likewise, to the fact that his lucky star placed him under the guidance of serious teachers actuated by noble motives, whose agency paralyzed those doubtful influences, the power of which, as we must to our regret avow, was the more to be dreaded, because the father's character did not offer the boy a model to which he might look up with sufficient confidence for it to be an effective safeguard.

(To be Continued.)

A Female Composer of the Last Century.

MARIA THERESA PARADIES, a remarkable composer and eminent pianist, was born in Vienna, the 15th May, 1759. Stricken with blindness at the early age of five years, she found in the study of music a consolation for her great misfortune. She evinced the most singular aptitude for this art, and was moreover endowed with marvellous facility for the acquirement of languages and sciences. Mlle. Paradies was equally familiar with Italian, German, French and English, well versed in the inductive sciences, a proficient in geography and history, danced with grace, and possessed such extraordinary facility of conception, and so tenacious a memory, that she played at chess, regulating her own moves according to the play of her adversary, as if she could have seen the board herself. Kozeluch and Righini were her masters for the piano-forte and singing; and she learned composition from the chapel-master, Freibert, receiving the advice of Salieri in the dramatic department.

She was only eleven years of age when the Empress Maria Theresa granted her a pension of 250 florins, after having heard her play some of the sonatas and fugues of Bach with rare perfection. In 1784, Paradies set out on her travels, visited Linz, Salzburg, Munich, Spire, Mannheim, Switzerland, and Paris, in which latter city she played with extraordinary success at one of the Concerts Spirituels in 1785. From Paris she proceeded to London, where she achieved a decided triumph. The most celebrated artists of the period—among others, Abel, Fischer, and Salomon—considered it an honor to assist in her concerts. On her return from England, Paradies went to Holland, then to Brussels, Berlin, and Dresden, and was everywhere received with marked approbation at her public performances. In 1786, she returned to Vienna. She there applied herself to composition and teaching, published a variety of instrumental pieces, and wrote several operas which were favorably received at Vienna and Prague. Her house became the rendezvous of the most eminent and distinguished persons of Vienna; foreigners solicited as the highest favor to be introduced to her; and all were equally captivated by the charms of her conversation and the amenity of her manners. This remarkable woman died at Vienna on the 1st of February, 1824, at the age of sixty-five. In 1791, she produced at Vienna Ariadne et Naxos, an opera in two acts; and this was followed by Ariadne et Bacchus, a duo-drama in one act, a continuation of the foregoing opera. In 1792, Mlle. Paradies gave at the national Theatre of Vienna, Le Candidat Instituteur, an operetta in one act; and in 1797, a grand opera, entitled Rinaldo and Armida, at Prague. A grand cantata of her composition, on the death of Louis XVI., which was printed with piano-forte accompaniment, was brought out at Vienna in 1794. She had already published her funeral cantata on the death of the Emperor Leopold. Among the other compositions of Paradies, may be mentioned Six Sonatas for the harpsichord, Op. 1 (Paris, Imbault); Six Sonatas, Op. 2 (ditto); Two Italian Canzonets, with accompaniment, for piano-forte (London, Bland); and Leonore de Burger (Lieder, Vienna).

FETIS.

Musical Journalism.

(From the New Nation.)

Musical Journalism in this country partakes of the following characteristics:

- 1st. Fulsome flattery of artists.
- 2d. Unblushing falsehoods to advertise certain publications or pianos.
- 3d. Malignant underrating of really earnest and artistically successful efforts.

Regarding the first of these, it is a lamentable fact that newspapers, and especially the dailies, will no more notice a great artist if he does not advertise with them, than they would think of drinking the health of the King of Dahomey at high mass. The performance of musical master-pieces does not come under the head of "news" at all. The public are not supposed to be interested in it half as much as they would be in the fact of somebody's inventing a way to make wheelbarrows or wash-tubs on a new principle. If we turn to the so-called "Musical papers," those published with a professed view to advancing the art in every possible way, we do not find it much better. Prejudice, incredulity, detraction, and contempt, mark most of the so-called criticisms on the one hand, while on the other, commonplace and conventional patronizing of acknowledged talent or classical works, with all the time-honored adjectives, "immortal," "unequaled," "transcendent," etc., greet one at every point. For instance, is not the country correspondence of some city musical papers most laughable? A band of scraping, puffing, blowing, wheezing, twanging amateurs, probably butchers, drovers, hay-makers or wood-cutters, counter-jumpers or high-school students, get together, and by dint of many months' creditable study, manage to murder a Mozart overture or Haydn Symphony. An admiring fellow-scraper or blower, having before-time secured a short list of subscribers for a city musical paper, is forthwith authorized to act as correspondent, and during his epistolary performance enters into an elaborate description not only of the performance, but also of the composition, which happens to be as familiar to the class of readers for whom the paper is intended, as A, B, C is to a college professor of Belles Lettres. Now is this what we look for in a musical journal? Do we find the directions for preparing hydrogen in Silliman's Journal, or the definition of the term "cog-wheels" in the Scientific American? Yet such specimens of correspondence are ludicrously common in periodicals quite as professedly devoted to music as others are to chemistry and mechanics, while the foreign budget of truly important events at the centres of artistic activity, Leipzig, Paris, and London, is thin, scanty, and unsatisfactory to the last degree.

If a young ladies' boarding-school in the country gives an examination performance, a two or three-columned article (in which the players and singers are lauded as if they were world-wide celebrities) is the least that can be expected from a paper in which the proprietors of the school advertise. And it is just so with individuals. A pianist or singer stands a poor chance of having his merit recognized in print, unless his concerts are advertised in those papers or his programmes and tickets are printed at their job offices. Yet we constantly see ourselves (as a nation) extravagantly praised for being so "generous to artists," so liberal in our encouragement of musical performances, and so ready to award the "proper (!) meed of honor to artistic aspirants," when the fact is, that we have hardly allowed the arts to receive equal courtesy at our hands with that awarded to boot-makers, tallow-chandlers, patent medicine venders, and sloop-shopmen generally.

If these facts are disputed, we have only to refer the reader to an old adage which is certainly true with regard to mercantile commodities, but is a grievous falsehood where art is concerned; namely: "A thing will bring as much as it is worth." Let any obscure composer offer one of his works for sale at a music publisher's, and see how much it will bring! Yet, we know that hundreds of literary "Bohemians," in this city alone, make a living by their newspaper pen-scratchings, a year's amount of which may not contain a tithe of the science or ability which four pages of this musical work possesses.

It is too true that a musical manuscript is only worth as much as the paper and ink employed in its composition cost, until the author is popular enough to make it sell. The genius or merit evinced therein to a discerning eye is nothing, and this is because the public have no discerning eyes wherewith to appreciate or discover either musical excellence or originality. The reason for this again, is because the public are not properly educated by those who assume to be popular educators, namely, editors, among whom few are to be found more jealous of their rights or vain of their supposed qualifications than musical ones.

Now, a composer, to be popular, must be puffed. Puffing is the only golden road to reputation, in this country at least. From a circus-rider or clog-dancer, to a new preacher or Presidential candidate, the rule holds good, and the worst feature of it is, that merit stands no better chance than mediocrity at first, and if one refuses to be puffed, he may as well resign himself to starve, however degrading he may feel it to see the pure emanations from his inspired brain, "soaped and oiled" by a paid pen, side by side with a rope-dancer or hurdle-rider. The only remedy for this truly disgraceful state of things lies with the editors, and as far as musical matters are concerned, with the editors of our musical journals.

As it at present exists, the very foundations of an eventually possible correct popular taste in the art are sapped. A man is judged only by what he does in public; hence any impudent varlet of a musical pretender, (and how many we could mention!) without education, or anything, in fact, excepting a low variety of Yankee smartness, gets himself into print, sows his productions (or rather rehashes) broadcast, and reaps a harvest of what Boccaccio calls "St. John's golden grease," while a neighboring student, and mayhap genius, is in want of the comforts of daily life, although his now worthless manuscripts may enrich a music-seller fifty or a hundred years hence. This state of things must continue until the public form some idea of a true criterion in art, and until the editors of these musical papers become first learned enough to judge of true merit in new men, (which they now seldom are), and secondly, honest enough never to presume to place charlatans and juggler pianists on the same footing with sound musicians, just because a silly gawgaw public of biped cattle choose to cry them up.

We are sensible how thankless a task it is to urge such a vast reform in this day and country of artistic superficiality, and that perhaps we had better "fold the arms of resignation on the bosom of patience," as the Persians say. Nevertheless truth is truth, and must at times be spoken, and no candid observer or experienced dilettante of fifteen years' metropolitan life can deny our premises or fail to sympathize with our yearnings as above expressed.

With regard to the unblushing falsehoods in laudatory notices of favored artists, and the cunning tricks so often resorted to by mechanics through performers in order to advertise their instruments, no one with half an eye or an ounce of brains need be enlightened.

To such a degree is this carried, that repeated instances have come under our observation where all ability in art has been denied to accomplished pianists, by certain persons, merely because they were not friendly to the maker of the pianos used at their concerts!

Concerning the critical portion of a musical editor's duties, that alone is subject enough for a volume. We are not of those who believe an impartial criticism by a fellow-artist an impossible thing. On the contrary we can imagine a person so learned yet so in love with his art as to lose sight of the person of an artist entirely when speaking of his labors in music, although we grant it is a very rare thing. Because our brother is an expert pianist, must we therefore proclaim him an original and great composer, when we know his good passages are stolen and all his unstolen ones are bad? Or, because my neighbor is a drunkard or is afflicted with the disease known as chronic imbecility, must we therefore deny to him any musical talent at all, when we know he has produced beautiful and original additions to the art? Yet these things are what we constantly see and deplore as stumbling-blocks in the way not so much of individual artists as of the public, in preventing their formation of a correct opinion regarding music and musicians.

Swift says of Criticism as idealized to him (See Battle of Books): "At her right sat Ignorance, at her left Pride. About her played her children, Noise, Impudence, Dulness, Vanity, Positiveness, Pedantry and Ill-Manners. She had claws like a cat, head, ears, and voice like an ass; her diet was the overflowing of her own gall, and her spleen stood out prominent above all else."

We are truly happy to say that seldom do we see a musical criticism which seems to embody all of these fearful characteristics, although so many daily appear with a choice selection therefrom. It is the most unpardonable thing for a critic to be accused of not understanding his subject, and yet when he has to write with a concert for a text, and does not know enough to stick to his subject, there is no cause for astonishment in his wanderings off to one he does understand. Hence we have observed such strictures upon a pianist as that he could not be what he professed, because he did not look like a certain other artist, and wore patent leather boots and white kid gloves! Another, from want of appreciation, always abuses a certain great German composer, (now dead, and whose music has become classic,) designating his works by so disrespectful and vulgar a cognomen as "broken crockery music." A third, in his blind adoration of Beethoven and ignorance of his works combined, writes a long abusive article on a quartet which he supposes to be by Schubert, and after his article is in print, has the mortification to learn that the quartet was the work of his adored Beethoven, and the critic had been a dupe of the designing and witty musicians who performed it!

But it is needless for us to multiply examples. What we have been suffering under, and still do, is a set of writers for the musical press who are not musicians. It now behooves us to obtain those who are, but this will always be difficult. Musicians are seldom writers, although some bright names, such as Schumann, Berlioz, and Howard Glover have proven that the two qualities are not incompatible, as some have asserted, and that because a man is eminent in art he must be necessarily a fool in letters. Did not Northcote write a life of Titian?

We hope to live to see a great and healthy reform in American Musical Journalism, through whose influence an otherwise intelligent and cultivated public will not betray a childish ignorance of art before they make their remarks on the subject, and will not mix up symphonies and negro melodies, piano fantasies, and masses for three voices, in an undistinguishable confusion such as you generally hear in the airy and self-complacent conversation of "our best society."

Music Abroad.

London.

The Italian Opera season is about to begin. Mr. Gye, first in the field with his prospectus (by 24 hours), opens his theatre on Tuesday, March 29th, also first (by 12 days)—a fortnight earlier than in 1863. His programme is full of interest. Several new singers are announced. Among the sopranos are found Mdlles. Emilia Lagrue, Destinn, Guiseppini Tati and Garulli. Of the first alone we know anything. Mdlle. Lagrue, who has been for many years renowned, both on the old and new continents, is to be the "Grisi" of the hour, and make her début as Norma. The basses are reinforced by three fresh comers—Signor Attri, Signor Scalseo and Herr Schmid. The first, from the Pergola, at Florence, is engaged for Walter, in Guillaume Tell, Elmiro, in Otello, Basilio, in the Barbiere, &c. Signor Scalseo is at present chief buffo of the Italian Opera in Paris, where he is favorably regarded. He will doubtless (if a good comic actor) be found useful in Bartolo, Leporello, and other parts. Herr Schmid is vaunted abroad as successor to Herr Formes. He comes well recommended from the Imperial Opera at Vienna. The tenors and barytones are as before, with the proviso that Herr Wachtel, who appeared (as Edgardo) two seasons ago, is again in the list of tenors. Changes have been made in the allotment of several important characters. Signor Mario is announced to play Faust, for the first time, and once more to assume the part of Nemorino (L'Elisir), which he gave up eight years ago, besides that of Fernando (La Favorita), which he has not played for six years. Mdlles. Adelina Patti and Pauline Lucca are alternately to appear as Margarita, in Faust—another fine chance for M. Gounod, at all events. Signor Tamberlik resigns Arnold (Guillaume Tell), Manrico (Il Trovatore), and Jean of Leyden, to Herr Wachtel; while M. Faure cedes Guillaume Tell, Alfonso (La Favorita), and Hoel (Dinorah) to Signor Graziani. Signor Ronconi is, for the first time, to essay Don Pasquale, Bartolo (Mozart's), and Sulpizio the Sergeant (La Figlia del Reggimento). Madame Antonietta Frizzi abandons Norma and Donna Anna, both in favor of Mdlle. Lagrue—taking refuge as the unfortunate Donna Elvira, Don G.'s cast-off mistress. Madame Nantier-Didiée leaves Fies to Mdlle. Guiseppini Tati (from Lisbon). Mdlle. Adelina Patti alone retains the characters she has supported at various periods, adding to her already extremely varied repertory the part of Susanna, in Le Nozze di Figaro; Margarita (Faust)—in partnership, as we have already stated, with Mdlle. Lucca; and including Dinorah, which (no one then present can have forgotten) she played once, at the end of the season 1862. Two new operas are promised—La Forza del Destino (Verdi) and Otto Nicolai's often promised Die Lustigen Weiber von Windsor (Merry Wives of Windsor). The four chief characters in Verdi's opera will be supported by Mdlle. Lagrue, Madame Didiée, Signors Tamberlik and Graziani, the original representatives at the Imperial Opera of St. Petersburg. To Mdlle. Lucca and Herr Schmid are assigned the principal parts in the opera of Nicolai.

The promised revivals are, L'Etoile du Nord—not given since 1855, the old theatre having been burnt down early in 1856; Le Nozze di Figaro, first time at the new theatre; Otello, first time for six years; and Dinorah, first time for two years. Mdlle. Lucca will play Catarina, in the Etoile du Nord, to the Pietro of M. Faure, (who succeeded M. Bataille in the same part, at the Opera Comique). Le Nozze di Figaro will have an entirely new cast:—Susanna, Mdlle. Patti; the Countess, Mdlle. Marie Battu; Cherubino, Mdlle. Lucca; the Count, Signor Graziani; Bartolo, Signor Ronconi; Basilio, Signor Neri-Baraldi; and Figaro, M. Faure. In Otello, Signors Tamberlik and Ronconi retain the parts of the Moor and Iago, Mdlle. Lagrue is to play Desdemona, and Signor Attri, Elmiro.

In the list of operas to be given this year, no allusion is made to La Guzza Ladra, despite the popularity, last season, of Mdlle. Patti's Ninetta; nor of Masaniello, revived with so much splendor in 1862; nor of Fra Diavolo, announced in the last two prospectuses, with Signor Mario as the Brigand; nor, lastly, of Stradella, which has figured conspicuously in the programmes for many seasons. That the company has undergone a thorough sifting may be judged from the absence of the following names:—Sopranos—Madame Miolan-Carvalho, Mdlles. Fioretti, Maurer, Elvira Dem, Dottini and Maffei; Tenor—Sig. Caffieri; Basses—Herr Formes, M. Zelger and M. Olvin. Very few of these, however, need be regretted. The other members of the troop, 1863, all remain. Mdlles. Salvioni and Zini Richard are engaged as principal danseuses in the Ballet, besides Mdlles. Raffaeli, Assunta, and Carmine—new comers. M. Desplaces retains his post of Maître de Ballet, but M. Nadud's place as leader is not yet filled up. That Mr. Costa, as Director of the Music and Conductor; M. Sinton as Chef d'Attoque and Deputy Conductor; Messrs. W. Beverley and T. Grieve (Mr. Telbin has gone over to the Haymarket), as Scenic Artists; Mr. Augustus Harris as Stage Manager, and the other chief "officials," before and behind the curtain, still hold their posts, is as pleasant to know as that the orchestra (minus poor Nulad) remain in statu quo. The military band is again that of the Coldstream Guards—director Mr. Godfrey, eldest son of the late Charles Godfrey. Whether the chorus is to be reinforced, as was suggested last year, we do not find stated; it was good as it stood, but would be none the worse for a few young and fresh voices. But enough for the present.

The prospectus of Her Majesty's Theatre is just as full of promise. Some amateurs will probably think it more interesting in one respect, inasmuch as it announces Herr Richard Wagner's Tannhäuser, and with a cast too, embracing the names of Mdles. Tietjens, Volpini and Harriers Wipern (from Berlin—one of the three Berlin Margarets), with Signor Giuglini, M. Gassier and Mr. Santley. Two other novelties are included, viz., La Forza del Destino and Le Spose Allegre (Nicolai's Merry Wives of Windsor), both of which are also promised by Mr. Gye. The revivals comprise Fidelio—with Mdle. Tietjens as Leonora; Der Freischütz, Anna Bolena, and Robert le Diable. Signor Verdi, it is stated, has undertaken to remodel the last act and personally superintend the production of La Forza del Destino. All the principal members of last season's troupe remain, with one important exception—Mdle. Desirée Artôt; one unimportant exception—Signor Baragli (the tenor); one neither important nor unimportant exception—Signor Vialletti (the bass); two tremendous exceptions—Madame Albani and Mr. Sims Reeves; besides one or two other "exceptions." Mr. Mapleson, moreover, has strengthened it in certain departments. Among the new "first ladies" we find Mdle. Guisepina Vitali, from Bologna; Mdme. Harriers Wipern (alluded to already), from Berlin; Mdle. Eleonora Grossi, from Rome and Barcelona; and Mdle. Bettelheim, from Vienna—the last two being contraltos. Signor Fancelli, from the San Carlo, is the only new tenor; but to the basses are added a certain Signor Benedetto Mazzetti, a certain Signor Gasperoni, and Signor Marcello Junca (formerly plain M. Junca, at the Theatre Lyrique Paris), from the Teatro Regio, Turin, and—it might have been added—the United States of North America. There are two fresh comers, among the principal dansesuses of the Ballet (Ballet-master, Signor Simondi), viz., Mdle. Aranyvary, from Milan; and Mdle. Caterina Beretta, from the San Carlo at Naples and the Regio at Turin. There is also a Signor Alessandri, who will make his first appearance. A new ballet, entitled Gli Amori di Bacco, in which Mdle. Aranyvary will make her debut, is promised early in the season; and another called Emma, in the course of the season, for the first appearance of Mdle. Caterina Beretta. M. Petit guards his post as Regisseur of the Ballet. The chorus, strengthened by important additions, is now almost entirely composed of singers from the Teatro Regio and the Liceo, Turin—Signor Chiaromonte, Chorus-master. The Stage Manager is M. Reinhardt, from Berlin and Vienna. Mr. Telbin is appointed principal scenic artist, assisted by Mr. Henry Telbin (his son). The military band will be that of the Grenadier Guards, (under the direction of M. D. Godfrey (second son of the late Charles Godfrey). The orchestra has been "numerically reinforced," and the direction again confided to Signor Arditi—two "articles" which cannot fail to give satisfaction. To conclude, Subscribers will be glad to learn that the private boxes have been "enlarged and improved"—to say nothing of a new organ being in process of erection by "the eminent firm of Gray and Davison." The theatre opens on Saturday, April 9th, with Rigoletto—Mdle. Guisepina Vitali (her first appearance) being Gilda, Mdle. Grossi (her first appearance) Maddelena, and Signor Giuglini (first time) the Duke of Mantua.—Mus. World.

Germany.

WEIMAR.—The fourth and last Subscription Concert of the Grand-Ducal Private Band presented the following programmes: "Les Préludes," Franz Liszt; "Auf den Lagunen," words by Theophile Gautier, translated by P. Cornelius, music by Hector Berlioz (Herr von Milde); "Méditation über Consolation," Franz Liszt, amplified and scored by Herr Carl Stör; and Beethoven's Symphony in C minor. The concert was under the direction of Herr Carl Stör. (What a treat must have been the Symphony of Beethoven!)

HANOVER.—From Jan. 1 to Dec. 31, 1863 (the theatre being closed from July 1 to Aug. 27) there were 86 operatic performances at the Theatre Royal. The number of operas represented was 40. The novelties were Gluck's Orpheus und Eurydice, and Ferdinand Hillers's Katakomben; the revivals Fidelio, Norma, Jessonda, Zampa, Die Entführung aus dem Serail and La Sennambula.

KONIGSBERG.—The Musikalische Academie lately gave a performance of Schumann's Das Paradies und die Peri, under the direction of Herr Landien.

BERLIN.—The programme of the Seventh Sinfonie Soirée of the King's Private Band was composed of the overture to the Räuberbraut, by Ferdinand Ries; the Symphony in E flat major, by Mozart;

"Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt," by Mendelssohn; and Beethoven's Symphony in C minor. 'Die Räuberbraut' was produced at the Royal Op. House here, in 1831, under the personal superintendence of the composer, and with Mad. Schröder-Devrient as the heroine. The music was much admired, but the opera could not maintain itself in the repertory on account of the badness of the libretto.—At the Fifth concert of Carlberg's Orchestral Union, one of the pieces selected for performance was Rbt. Schumann's Symphony in D minor, which is now seldom heard, and is the composer's fourth and last. It was pretty well received, but created no enthusiasm.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, APRIL 2, 1864.

Music in Boston.

The past fortnight has not contributed much to the enriching of one's musical experience, except as there may have been some in every audience who were just beginning to make acquaintance with musical works with which most of us have long been familiar. There have been Organ Concerts, as usual, very mixed in character; there has been an Oratorio, time-honored "Messiah," which everybody knows; a couple of Afternoon Orchestral Concerts, with Great Organ for variety and for gratification of the curiosity of new comers;—and that is about all in the way of concerts. Indeed the Concert season seems to be drawing to an untimely close. The Orchestral Union will persevere in the good work for some time yet—as long, no doubt, as they shall meet encouragement. Nor can there be any lack of opportunities, all Summer long, for hearing the Great Organ, which only needs wind and an organist (has it not already raised up a goodly number of skilful ones?);—the only question is, how much of real organ music may one hope to hear in all the entertaining exhibitions. For the next fortnight, however, the Music Hall and its Organ will be in the service of the Roman Catholics (a Fair in aid of one of their churches), and music for the musical world as such must for that length of time seek other theatres or remain mute. But we have one good thing in prospect, awaiting its re-opening. Mr. B. J. LANG, as we have already announced, is preparing for a performance with orchestra and chorus of two fine works of Mendelssohn; one the "Walpurgis Night," which he brought out here for the first time with such signal success two years ago; the other the entire music, orchestral and vocal, to the "Midsummer Night's Dream." The time, we believe, is not precisely fixed; Walpurgis Night is the night before the first of May, and suggests Saturday evening, April 30th, for the fit time; on the other hand, the great tricentennial anniversary of Shakespeare's birth falls on the preceding Saturday, (the 23d), and a performance of the "Midsummer Night's Dream" music would be one of the pleasantest among the various celebrations of the day. The engagements of the Music Hall will probably decide the question.

We have had the end of another brief season of Italian Opera, Maretzek's company, offering the same things as before, with the single exception of Donizetti's tedious Poliuto (or I Martiri), and the debut, in Lucia, of a very petite and very young soprano, Miss HARRIS, from New York, who has displayed a good deal of flexible, bird-like vocal agility in ornamental bravura passages for a high voice without much substance in the middle and lower tones where one looks for expression and dramatic quality. It is one of the recently so common cases, apparently, of an ambition for a lyrical career based on no other capital than a facile voice; but time may develop more. "Faust" has still drawn its crowds, and the poetic truth and beauty of Miss KELLOGG's Margaret does not lose its charm. We hear nothing further of the promised visit of the German Opera troupe of Carl Anschütz; it would be a positive artistic gain to us, could we hear Fidelio, Oberon, La Dame Blanche, the Wasserträger by Cherubini, &c., even passably well performed; well enough, at least, to give us some acquaintance with such sterling operas, of which we have remained ignorant, while ceasing to learn aught from endless repetition of the old round of Verdi and Donizetti pieces.

But for a brief review of the two weeks:

The HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY had a very large audience for their Easter performance of "The Messiah," and they performed it on the whole effectively. Many of the choruses were so reinforced as to double their volume, weight and grandeur, by the Great Organ, which was managed with remarkable ability and tact by Mr. LANG; its contribution was the more marked and glorious because it was sometimes sparingly used. The profound feeling of "Surely He hath borne our griefs," and the following: "And with His stripes," was particularly well brought out. These are perhaps the least appreciated choruses, but none will more reward attention, none go deeper down into the soul. The orchestra did fairly for the most part, but some of the wind instruments gave distressingly uncertain sounds now and then in "O thou that tellest." The average excellence of the solo singing was another distinguishing feature of the performance. Miss HOUSTON for the first time undertook the entire soprano work and achieved this formidable task in a manner that should give her great encouragement in her very earnest efforts, as it gave pleasure to her audience. A certain nervous anxiety—for evidently she strives before all things to be a pure and noble singer, a worthy interpreter of divine music—is still her chief drawback; but she has rarely mastered it so well. Her delivery of the first recitatives: "There were Shepherds," &c., was beautiful and inspiring; save that too intense and too prolonged a light was thrown upon the word "saying." "Rejoice greatly" was not sung with the force or volume of voice which really the song requires; she chose to execute its florid passages in a subdued, fine mezza voce tone, perhaps distrusting herself for such an effort with full voice; but that it was gracefully, evenly, as well as fervently done, no one can deny. "I know that my Redeemer," and the other great strains of the latter part of the Oratorio, were very impressively and indeed artistically rendered. Mrs. CARY's sympathetic, rich and pure contralto was used with good style and expression in the airs that fall to the share of that voice; sometimes, however, its melody was obscured by overpowering accompaniment and only faintly heard. Mr. WHEELER never has exerted his sweet but not very powerful tenor to such good advantage in that Hall. He sang with spirit, and clear ringing tone, as well as with pure method and expression, as he always does. Mr. RUDOLPHSEN, too, made the bass songs very telling, especially: "Why do the Heathen rage?"

The ORCHESTRAL UNION have had two very stormy Wednesdays; but, on the last occasion at least, one was reminded of Handel's "Vell, never moind, de moosick vill sound de petter!" Week before last the programme had for overture and symphony a repetition of the fine Mendelssohnian Concert Overture by Rietz and "Les Preludes" by Liszt; for Organ entremets, the "Trumpet" chorus from "Samson" and a Battiste Offertoire, with Vox Humana, played by W. EUGENE THAYER; for popular afterpieces (orchestral), Beethoven's "Turkish March" and the first finale of Don Giovanni.—Last Wednesday's was about the best programme and best concert of the season, peculiarly enjoyed by the handfull of not fair-weather visitors.

1. Overture to "Der Heimkehr aus der Fremde" (Return from abroad). Mendelssohn
2. Organ Solo—"Let their celestial concerts all unite," Chorus from "Samson." Handel
3. Pastoral Symphony, No. 6. Beethoven
4. Selections from "The Hymn of Praise." Mendelssohn Transcribed for Organ. B. J. Lang.
5. Invitation à la Valse. Weber
6. Instrumented by Hector Berlioz.
7. Finale from "Tannhäuser." Wagner

All these fine pieces the little orchestra played uncommonly well, and people listened as to newly felt revelations of the genius of the masters and the beauty of instrumental combinations. Mr. LANG, too, was especially happy in the treatment of his organ pieces; the great instrument has never been made more expressive for such subjects. His choice of stops in the Mendelssohn selections came closer to the idea than ever. He prefaced the grand final chorus of "Samson" with the Minuet from the overture, charmingly rendered with soft stops.

The next two Concerts (on account of the Fair at the Music Hall) will be given at the Boston Theatre, at half price for all parts of the house.

It remains only to record the last two Saturday Afternoon Great Organ Concerts. Dr. S. P. TUCKERMAN made a very acceptable Concert, displaying the powers of the instrument with his usual taste and skill in the following pieces:

1. Grand Offertoire in C. Wey
2. "Gratias Agimus." Haydn
3. Andantino. Schumann
4. "Et Incarnatus." Schreider
5. Prelude, in C minor. Heese
6. Dead March, from "Saul." Handel
7. Pastorale. (A distinguished Organist of Rome, A. D. 1709). Zepel
8. Kyrie And Sanctus. Palestrina
9. Andante Maestoso. Spohr
10. { A. Aria Cantabile, for the Vox } Mozart
11. { B. Aria Soprano, Humana Stop } Mendelssohn
12. Fugue, in E major. Bach

Last Saturday Mr. HENRY CARTER occupied the hour with this selection:

1. Toccata, in F. Bach
2. Andante from Symphony in D. Beethoven
3. Introduction, 3rd part Creation. Haydn
4. March, from "Zauberflöte." With Contrapuntal Variations. Mozart
5. Air. Paradies
6. Wedding March. Mendelssohn

We thought him more successful in the rendering of the Toccata (though his pedaling has by no means the firmness and clearness of Mr. Paine's), than in the Beethoven Andante. The latter dragged behind continually in time, while the even flow and symmetry of its ideas was disturbed by the startling irruption of huge heavy stops sometimes in the very middle of a musical sentence; the choice of stops was frequently too ponderous and clumsy for this serene and spiritual Andante. Mr. Carter was more happy in the following pieces, though unsteadiness in time too often mars his playing. The air by Paradies was not the least interesting feature of the programme. Was it by the blind female composer (German) of the last century, of whom a sketch is given in an earlier part of this paper, or by the Venetian pupil of Porpora, Dom Pietro Paradies, who wrote operas and harpsichord sonatas only a few years earlier?

The Improvisatori.

Mr. Story's "Roba di Roma," which has been so long in finding its way to this country, having been published first in England, and which undoubtedly contains the most life-like picture of Roman life and manners to be found in any book, has given us a pleasant surprise by the following description of a charming little adventure, of which we may vouch for the truthfulness, having been one of the party. Only we, being neither artist nor poet, did not "understand their language" so well as our fellows. We wish our readers may enjoy the description half as much as we do the recollection.

"It is not uncommon for those who like to study Roman manners and humors, and eat truly Roman dishes, to make up a little party and dine at the Palombella, or some other osteria con cucina in the Trastevere. There, however, if you would get a taste of the real spirit of the Romans, you should go incognito and take your place at the tables in the common room, and pass if you can for one of them, or at least not for a looker-on or a listener. One other thing also is essential, and that is, that you should understand their language well; and then, if you are lucky, you will be rewarded for your pains by hearing capital songs and improvisations.

One lucky night, I shall never forget, when we made a little party of artists and poets and dined together in a little osteria not far from the Piazza Barberini. Peppo, the Neapolitan cook, gave us an excellent dinner, wonderful macaroni and capital wine, and while we ate and drank a guitar and mandoline in the adjoining room made a low accompaniment to our talk. We went in our worst coats and most crumpled hats, tried to attract as little attention as possible, and sat at a table in the corner. The rest of the company was composed solely of working-men, several of whom were carters, who came in after their hard day's work to take a temperate supper in their shirt-sleeves. Yet even in "best society" you will not find simpler or better manners, at once removed from servility and defiance. They soon saw that we were not one of their class, but their behavior to us was perfect—all the staring was done by us. They accepted courteously our offers to drink with them, and offered us of their wine in return. Then they talked and jested and played at Passatello with inimitable good humor, while old Zia Nica, the padrona of the establishment, sat in the middle of the shabby old pot-house, looking with sharp wild eyes out from under a gray fell of tumbled hair—now shrieking out her orders, now exchanging with the new comers keen jokes that flashed like knives, and were received by tumultuous applause. As our dinner drew to a close we had in the mandoline and guitar, and all the opera tunes were played with great cleverness. Was there ever a better mandoline? how it tingled and quivered as it nervously rang out the air, with its stinging vibrations and tense silvery shakes, while the soft woolly throb of the guitar kept up a constant accompaniment below! The old cobwebs on the dusky, soiled, and smoky beams of the ceiling, where the colors of old frescoes were still to be seen, shook to the music, and the flame of the little onion-shaped light before the coarsely-painted engraving of the Madonna seemed to wink in sympathy. Old Zia Nica herself grew excited when a spirited Tarantella was played. She had danced it when young in Naples.—"Che bella cosa! and I could dance it now," she cried. "Brava, Zia Nica!—give us a Tarantella," was the cry all around. "Eh! Perché no?" and up she stood and shook her long fell of hair, and laughed a wild laugh, and showed her yellow teeth, and up and down the old osteria she shuffled and tramped, flinging up her hands and snapping her fingers, and panting and screaming, till at last with a whoop she fell down into her chair, planted her two hands akimbo on her knees, glared at the company and cried out, "Old Zia Nica's not dead yet. No Signori! The old woman is not so old but that she can dance a Tarantella still—grazie a Dio—no, Signori-i-i."

Scarcely was this performance finished when the glass door jingled at the entrance of a little middle-aged fellow who had come across the street for a fiasco of wine. He was received with a shout of welcome. "Give us a toast in rhyme," cried one. "Bravo! give us a toast in rhyme," echoed all; and spinning round on his feet with a quick, eager face, and flinging out his hands with nervous gesticulation, he suddenly, in a high voice, poured out a volley of humorous rhymes upon one after another of his friends, then launched a brindisi at us, and—hey presto change!—was out of the door in a minute, the sharp bell jingling as he closed it, and a peal of laughter pursuing him. So being in the humor, we called for some improvisation, and the mandoline and guitar began an air and accompaniment in ottava rima. After a minute or two, one of the men at the head of the table opposite broke out in a loud voice, and sang, or rather chanted a strophe; and scarcely had the instruments finished the little ritornello, when another answered him in a second strophe; to this he responded, and so alternately for some time the improvisation went on without a break. Then suddenly rose from the opposite end a third person, a carter, who poured out two or three strophes without stopping; and after him still another carter broke in. So that we had four persons improvising in alternation. This lasted a full half hour, and during the whole time there was not a pause or hesitation. The language used was uncommonly good, and the ideas were of a character you would little have anticipated from such a company. The theme was art, and love, and poetry, and music, and some of the recitation was original and spirited. Out of Italy could anything like this be seen? But the sound of music and song had reached the eafs of the police, and those of their white-barred figures and chapeaux appeared at the door, and despite all our prayers they stopped the improvisation. This broke up the fun, and it was then proposed that we should go to the Colosseum in two carriages with the music. No sooner said than done. Off ran Antonio for the carriages, and in a few minutes we were on our way, through the Corso and down through the forum, the mandoline and guitar playing all the time."

DR. FRANZ LISZT, by last accounts, was still in Rome, where, after finishing his two oratorios, St. Elizabeth, and Christus, he was working upon a third, the subject of which is taken from the Legends of St. Francis of Assisi. Failing to set the world on fire by his huge Symphonies, will he succeed better with his Oratorios? What sort of a monster might a Lisztian oratorio be?—He has also been writing several compositions for the piano forte and organ, and it is said that he will visit Germany in June.

MR. CHORLEY's English libretto of Gounod's "Faust" was found so unsingable by Sims Reeves, Santley, and other principal singers, that they were obliged to procure and sing an entirely new translation of their parts, Faust, Mephistopheles, &c., whereat the Athenaeum, Chorley's nearest friend, is very wroth.

Beethoven's "Mount of Olives" is to be produced at Rome.

During the present opera season at Naples, Rossini's "William Tell," which, under the Bourbon rule, had hitherto been proscribed, will be produced, with Mirate and Steffanone in the cast. Taglioni is the chief ballet dancer at San Carlo.

Parodies and travesties seem now to be the order of the day abroad. The "Postillon de Lonjumeau," a burlesque, is the rage in Paris; and Duprez, the singer, has started a theatre, called De Guignol, in which the actors and actresses, or rather male and female singers, represented bodily by marionettes, are in reality some of the best singers of the day hidden behind the curtain. Duprez and his celebrated wife (Heuvel Duprez), Marimon, Maria Brunetti, &c., are among the number. The principal pieces travestied by them are the "Huguenots," "Giselda," and the "Favorita." and the high circles in and about the Tuileries flock nightly to this novel entertainment.

NEW YORK.—The fourth PHILHARMONIC Concert took place on the 7th of March at the Academy of Music. Orchestral pieces: Symphony No. 3, in E flat, Haydn; "Hymn of Praise," Mendelssohn; Violin Concerto, Beethoven. Vocalists: Mme. Rother, soprano; Mr. Quint, tenor; and the German Liederkrans. Violin soloist, Mr. Mollenhauer. Conductor, Mr. Eisfeld.

The programme of Messrs. MASON and THOMAS's fifth Soirée included the string Quartet in G (op. 18, No. 2) by Beethoven; Sonata in F minor, for violin and piano, by J. S. Bach; piano Sonata in C minor, op. 111, Beethoven; and Quartet in G, op. 161, by Schubert.—Their sixth and last Soirée offered a string Quartet (C major, No. 6) by Mozart; Sonata, for violin and piano (D minor, op. 121), Schumann; Quartet (A minor, op. 132), Beethoven.

Mr. J. N. PATTISON, the pianist, who returned during the year past from Germany, has given another concert, and with more success than before. He played a Prelude and Fugue by Bach; and a Concerto in F minor, with orchestra, by Henselt, of which the Evening Post says:

A work which is a great favorite of Liszt's. In his performance of this elaborate work Mr. Pattison has gone a great way towards the very first rank as a pianist, and may be heartily congratulated on his eminent success. In execution and sentiment this pianoforte performance was in every way admirable, and quite eclipsed the lighter composition—the fantasia from "Martha"—also on the programme.

The testimonial concert to Mr. HARRISON, the proprietor of Irving Hall, was successful and contained interesting matter. Mr. Mills played two movements of Chopin's Concerto in E minor, Bergmann conducting the orchestra, as he did also in the "Tell" overture. The orchestra also played the Introduction to La Bourgeoise Gentilhomme and Mendelssohn's Ruy Blas overture, Theodore Thomas conducting. Mr. Bruno Wollenhaupt played a violin solo by Ernst; and Medori, Mazzoleni, and members of the Liederkrans, Arion, &c., sang.

An Association called "The Musical Mutual Protective Union" has been formed in New York, for "the cultivation of the art of music in all its branches and the promotion of good feeling and friendly intercourse among the members of the profession, and the relief of such of their members as shall be unfortunate, so far as their means will permit." It is also their intention to erect a Concert Hall worthy of the metropolis, and an act of incorporation giving them the privilege of holding real estate to the value of $300,000, is now before the New York Legislature. The incorporators are Henry D. Beissenhart, David L. Downing, John G. Schneider, Francis Xavier Diller, Kenry Gortelmeyer, Jacob Rebhun, George Schneider, Claudio S. Grafulla, David Graham, Ernst Crill, John Senia, George Gipner, Henry Wannemacher, David Schaad, Harvey B. Dodworth, Carl Bergmann, Carl Anschütz, George H. Wallace, Theodore Eisfeld, Emil Musio, Thomas Baker, J. P. Cooke, Edward Mollenhauer and Louis Schreiber.

CHICAGO.—A very successful concert was given on the 4th of last month by Miss FREDERICA MAGNUSSON, of which the Tribune of that city says:

In this concert, Mr. Lyman W. Wheeler, and Mr. A. C. Ryder, both gentlemen from Boston, made their first appearance before a Chicago audience. Mr. Wheeler is a tenor whom we are ready to pronounce equal to any that has ever appeared in this city. His voice is one of exquisite sweetness and purity, clear, sympathetic, mellow, and managed with excellent judgment and artistic skill. He at once won the warmest admiration of the audience and received a rapturous encore, in each of the parts in which he appeared. Mr. Ryder is a basso of wonderful power. His voice is really ponderous, while at the same time it has a range not less than that of Formes. It is remarkably great in its upper tones, at the same time clear and vibrating in the very lowest. The same evidences of satisfaction which greeted Mr. Wheeler, were bestowed upon Mr. Ryder. Miss Magnusson astonished even her own friends, in the remarkable artistic powers which she displayed. Her execution is almost faultless, while her voice possesses a magnetism that captured the good will and hearty applause of the audience from the start.

Manager Grau produced "Faust" at Cincinnati, a few weeks since, with this cast: Faust, Tamaro; Margherita, Vera-Lorini; Siebel, Mme. Patti-Strakosch; Mephistopheles, Morelli; Valentine, Barilli; Wagner, Coletti; Martha, Mme. Fischer.

Mme. Whiting-Lorini has joined Grau's company, having recently returned to New York from Havana, together with Guerrabella, Adelaide Phillipps, Susini and other distinguished artists.

PHILADELPHIA.—The last Germania Rehearsal was of a religious character, in consideration of its being Holy Week. This was the programme:

1. Overture—Joseph Mehul.
2. Female Chorus from Second Act Lohengrin R. Wagner.
3. Air from Stabat Mater. Rossini.
4. Marche Funebre Beethoven.
5. First Part of the Hymn of Praise Mendelssohn.

THE WORCESTER ORGAN. The Spy says:

The committee on subscriptions have met more than one instance where subscribers to the organ fund have asked the privilege of paying more than they promised. We do not hear that the favor has been refused. Nor should it be. So great an instrument will involve expenses beyond what the most careful foresight can anticipate, while the known charges are yet all provided for. One instance of public spirit we cannot pass in silence. It is well known here, although never mentioned publicly, that Hon Stephen Salisbury subscribed one thousand dollars originally. The friends of the movement considered its success certain from that moment. He has, however, now doubled it, and has paid the generous sum of two THOUSAND DOLLARS. All thanks to such a public benefactor! His name henceforth must be one of those indissolubly associated with this grand work which he has done so much to secure for this community.

One of the dodges by which London music-publishers manufacture a market for their new songs is this: they pay distinguished singers for singing them wherever they appear in concerts, and fill the advertising columns of the newspapers with such announcements as these:

"Madame Eether Meckenoff will sing Herr Gander's popular song, 'Low, cowie, low,' at Newtown-limavally, on the 26th instant, at Knickbollageen on the 27th, and at Gimmonche Town near Belfast, on the 28th."

"Miss Claretta Boone will sing the new song, written expressly for her by Mr. Alexander Scott Presbyter, called 'Wille o' the weep,' at Aberdeen on Monday, at Wick on Tuesday, at Thurso on Wednesday, at Stromness (the Orkneys) on Thursday, and, weather permitting her journey southwards, at the Glasgow Salt Market Festival on Saturday."

"Madame Smiles Dribble begs to announce that she is engaged to sing Mr. Murray's highly popular and invariably encored ballad, 'She moves among the poultry,' at Basingstoke on the 11th, at Winchester on the 13th at Southampton on the 15th, and at the Music Hall, Store Street, London, on the 29th."

"Signor Beccafico will sing Herr Sloman's Canzonetta, 'Sulla Forca,' at the first concert of the Pembroke Choral Society, on Monday week."

The London Musical World declares that English organ builders have such a mania for under-bidding each other that cheapness is now the main quality demanded in an organ; and consequently English organs are now very big and very bad, and constantly deteriorating.

The London Musical World says of Mr. Stephen C. Foster: "His loss will be equally lamented in England, where his songs were more successful than those of any composer during the last ten years."

Otto Lindblad, the Swedish composer, whose songs were frequently sung by Jenny Lind, has lately died in his forty-fourth year.

The Faculty of Philosophy of the University of Jena have conferred upon Hans von Bülow, the pianist, (Liszt's son-in-law), the diploma of Doctor honoris causa—an honor which had been previously conferred upon Meyerbeer and Schumann.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

The Oriole. (Petit Oiseau). Jules Deneffe. 25

A superlatively neat little French song, which in the original would fit prettily to the lips of Mademoiselle, and is now furnished with English as well as the other words, and addressed to the flashing Oriole.

Keep one kind thought for me. F. Hoffmann. 25

It may be objected to songs like this, that there is nothing in them out of the common style of well constructed vocal compositions. But those who try it will find that it is no easy thing to make a good song in the common style. This is emphatically a good song.

Vermont Volunteers. Quartet. Rev. Wm. Ford. 25

A vigorous poem, set to appropriate music, in praise of our brave Green Mountain Boys, who are so gallantly winning name and fame on the nation's battle fields.

Dublin Bay. Ballad. Geo. Barker. 25

A pretty song, with an unusually sweet melody, and instinct with Irish poetic feeling.

We shall be known above. J. G. Clark. 25

A kind of chrysalis like song, describing how our spirits "moon and groan," and the "river of life" flows "under the ice," but one will be freed by the warm spring sun, and the others rise where "we shall be known above." Original and pleasing.

I live for those who love me. J. G. Clark. 30

In good style and pleasing.

Maraquita! while those glances. (Maraquita, de tus ojos). Song or Duet. Laborde Bussoni. 35

A very taking little gem of a song, and easy. Both Spanish and English words are given. The duet part is very pretty.

Mount, boys mount. Song and Chorus. C. T. Hammond. 25

A stirring cavalry song, by a member of the corps. It has the merry ring of the bugle in it, and will please the boys who intend to give Uncle Abe a fine residence in Richmond, and "a yacht in Charleston harbor."

Instrumental Music.

Offertoire No. 4, op. 35. Lefebvre Wely. 1.00

One of the great organ pieces. It is quite popular, and has a lithographic view of the mammoth instrument on the title page.

Potpourri from Faust. 4 hands. H. Cramer. 1.00

A very brilliant compilation, and complete, containing ten airs from the opera, with connecting music. A grand piece for seminary exhibitions.

Warblings at Noon. Romance. B. Richards. 40

A fine composition, in the same general style as the Warblings at "Eve," "Morn," and "Dawn."

Drummer Boy's March. S. Winner. 25

A pretty, useful piece, which has the recommendation of being very easy, and good for learners.

Books.

OSSIAN'S HARP. By O. E. Dodge. 25

This book contains the songs brought out in the concerts of the great funny man, among them the super-lughaible "Thanksgiving" song.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 661.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, APRIL 16, 1864.

VOL. XXIV. No. 2.

The Blithe La

BY FREDERICK TENNYSON.

How the blithe lark runs up the golden stair
That leads through cloudy gates from heaven to earth,
And all alone in the empyreal air,
Fills it with jubilant sweet sounds of mirth!
How far he seems, how far,
With the light upon his wings—
Is it a bird or star
That shines and sings?

What matter if the days be dark and frore?
This sunbeam tells of other days to be,
And singing in the light that floods him o'er,
In joy he overtakes futurity;
Under cloud-arches vast
He peeps, and sees behind
Great summer coming fast
Adown the wind!

And now he dives into a rainbow's rivers,
In streams of gold and purple he is drowned,
Shrilly the arrows of his song he shivers,
As though the stormy drops were turned to sound;
And now he issues through,
He scales a cloudy tower,
Faintly, like fallen dew,
His fast notes shower.

Let every wind be hushed, that I may hear
The wondrous things he tells the world below;
Things that we dream of he is watching near;
Hopes that we never dreamed he would bestow.
Alas! the storm hath rolled
Back the gold gates again,
Or surely he hath told
All heaven to men!

So the victorious poet sings alone,
And fills with light his solitary home,
And through that glory sees new worlds foreshown.
And hears high songs and triumphs yet to come;
He woos the air of time
With thrills of golden chords,
And makes the world to climb
On linked words.

What if his hairs be gray, his eyes be dim,
If wealth forsakes him, and if friends be cold?
Wonder unbars the thousand gates to him;
Truth never fails, nor beauty waxeth old;
More than he tells, his eyes
Behold, his spirit hears—
Of grief and joy, and sighs
Twixt joy and tears.

Blest is the man who with the sound of song
Can charm away the heart-ache, and forget
The frost of penury and the sting of wrong
And drown the fatal whisper of regret!
Darker are the abodes
Of kings, though his be poor,
While fancies, like the gods,
Pass through his door.

Singing, thou scalest heaven upon thy wings,
Then liftest a glad heart into the skies;
He maketh his own sunrise while he sings,
And turns the dusky earth to paradise.
I see thee sail along,
Far up the sunny streams;
Unseen, I hear his song,
I see his dreams.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Half a dozen of Beethoven's Contemporaries.

II. ANTONIO SALIERI.

[Continued from Vol. xxiii, page 210.]

Mosel says this firstling of Salieri has nowhere traces of a beginner's uncertain hand; but on the contrary shows the value of his previous profound and indefatigable study, as well as proves his native capacity. None but such as have, like him, really prepared themselves for their art and possess an inborn talent, can thus begin their career. The work is in the old Italian style, but throughout dramatic in form, except the part of Artemia, which is devoted to bravura for the sake of Clementina Baglioni, who sang it and who was a concert singer with a high soprano voice; but even her part is not wanting in beautiful and expressive melody.* Modulations are more numerous than were then common, but in every case, says Mosel, used because called for by the dramatic situation. The airs are of the form of that day, and only on this account can the work be said to be antiquated. The accompaniment is simple, the instruments employed are few, especially in the excellent comic music of both finales, that the text might be easily followed. "The opinion prevailed in those days," says Mosel, "that in the musical drama the words were of some importance; indeed, some composers of that time, and among them Salieri, pushed this error so far, as to affirm, that the poem of an opera is the main thing, and the music is added only to increase its effect and lend it that fascination, which can alone arise when a melody has a real union with words. Not until our day was the brilliant discovery made, that an operatic text has no other object, than that of yielding a composer syllables for a stream of senseless tones, which is again swallowed up by a still mightier flood from the orchestra."

[A little cynical, Herr Mosel, for you are evidently speaking ironically; it is clear that you are an "old fogey;" for, across the Atlantic, the people will not go to the opera unless it is in an unknown tongue—and the Americans must be right, you know.]

The tenor, Caribaldi, was one of those magnificent singers, common in the last century, if not now, from Italy, who, with splendid voice and no other instruction than what they gained simply by listening to good singers, unable to distinguish one written note from another, and consequently obliged to learn every part by having it sung or played to them until it was fixed in their memories, sang with a truth, spirit and beauty that made them more than welcome on the best stages of Europe. Caribaldi was a servant in a shop in Rome in his youth, first appeared on the stage when 24 years old, and came to Vienna when near 30. The year before he had sung an air with great applause in several theatres, which happened to be in E flat, and thence he had drawn the conclusion that that key was specially favorable to his voice. It so happened, too, that the first opera in which he sang in Vienna was Gassmann's "L'Amore Artigiano," and that an air in E flat therein had gained him immense applause, and thus his notion had become a sort of fixed idea. Unluckily in Salieri's new opera there was no air in that key, and the young composer was in doubt what to do. At first he took to Caribaldi only an air in the second act, which leads into a terzet, and left him to think that the air in the first act was not written. "Which you will surely write in E flat?" said the singer. "Of course," replied the other—though it was long since finished in B flat—and there was now no time to change it. Salieri went to Poggi, another singer of the company—a good musician and friend of Caribaldi—whom he called Signor E-la-fa* on account of his E flat whim—and asked what he should do.

* So Mozart wrote the part of the Queen of Night just to show off his sister-in-law Hofer's bravura powers, which were a great card at Schikaneder's theatre, and the manager would of course have it so.

Poggi looked the air through, saw it was good, and told him to tell the copyist to set three flats at the beginning of Caribaldi's vocal copy, for as he could not read music, if he only saw the three flats that would be sufficient. Poggi also promised to help carry on the deception, and hoped that here was an opportunity to cure his friend of his nonsense. Two days before the performance Salieri took the air to the singer, whose eye, as the composer saw, turned immediately to the signature, which was quite in order. Salieri sang the music, Caribaldi was much pleased with it, and on that day committed it to memory. Luckily for the joke, the air was one of the pieces which received the most applause. On the second evening, when the orchestra and singers assembled on the stage before the commencement of the performance, Trani, leader of the orchestra, addressed Caribaldi with: "Well now, friend, you will no longer fancy that the key of E flat is the only good one for you, now that you have gained such roars of applause with an air in B flat."

"You are joking," replied the singer. "In my part three flats stand at the beginning; hence the air is in E flat."

"Ha, ha! three flats for the key of B flat!" returned Trani.

Caribaldi turned to Poggi and asked, if the air really was in B flat?

Poggi, to carry on the joke, gravely replied by asking: "Are not three flats at the beginning?"

"Most certainly,"

"Well, if that is the case, and the air is in the major, then it must be in E flat."

"It is in B flat," here interposed Caratoli, another great singer belonging to the company.

"No, in E flat," persisted Poggi.

Meantime Trani had brought the score from the orchestra, and showed Caribaldi his air with two flats, who at last began to see through the trick. At this moment Salieri, ignorant of all this, entered. Caribaldi snatched the wig from his (own) head, and threatening in pretended wrath to hurl it at the young man, cried: "Ha! thou rascally masterkin!" Salieri, guessing instantly the state of the case, fell upon one knee before him, and imitating an air Caribaldi had recently sung in another opera both in song and action, began:

* See Bianca's Gamut in "Taming the Shrew."

Eccomi a' piedi tuoi.
Mira, bell' idol mio,
Un reo d' inanzi a te.

A general laugh—the singer put on his wig again and laughed with the rest, and from that moment, as Poggi had hoped, was cured of his E flat whim.

Salieri in this connection gives another instance of the power which these uncultivated singers gained in committing music to memory. The story is of the celebrated Banti, many years prima donna in the London Italian opera, toward the close of the last century. The last time she was in Vienna—which seems to have been about 1785—she came to Salieri and requested him to compose a Hallelujah for her to sing at some great church festival or other to which she was invited. He complied, and brought the composition to her and asked her to sing it, that he might see whether it suited her voice before he wrote out the parts for the instruments.

"Dear master," said she, "I blush to own that I hardly know the names of the notes; but as I am gifted with a good memory and some natural talents for singing, I retain very well anything which I have heard two or three times, and perform my tasks not without applause."

"You might well say," remarked Salieri, "with the greatest applause."

He then sang the Hallelujah. She found it splendidly adapted to her voice, and besought him to repeat it a second and a third time; the fourth time she sang it herself, not mistaking a single note. The piece was 132 bars long! Salieri could not refrain from saying:

"Madame, if I had not composed this piece yesterday, myself, I should take what I have just heard for a dream." Two days afterwards she sang the piece in the church and ravished all hearers. She was the daughter of a Venetian gondolier, and began life there as the street songstress Georgi. Burney has much to say about her.

When Gassmann, some weeks later in Lent, returned from Rome, the theatre being shut, Joseph took his young favorite's opera for one of his after-dinner concerts, that the master might hear his pupil's work, and was greatly pleased to find that Gassmann not only found no important fault against the elementary rules of composition, but was clearly very much gratified with the general tone of the single numbers, with the musical ideas, with the character of the music in general, and especially with the fitness of the musical thought to the character of the drama.

Not long after, (1770) Boccherini gave Salieri the text to a pastoral opera, "L'amore innocente," which he composed and which had great success; and the same year, a very poor text upon Don Quixote (Don Chisciotte), an opera in one act, with a great many dances interspersed, which was not at all to the taste of either Salieri or the public, and which failed very decidedly. Still there are some fine melodies. The music of the pastoral was afterwards used in a ballet, and no doubt the good pieces of the Don Quixote were not lost; for Salieri was as economical in the use of good ideas as Handel himself,—if out of place or lost in one work, they were introduced into others.

One of those operatic subjects, which has been treated by a legion of poets and composers, both under the same and under different titles, is the story of Rinaldo and Armida in Tasso's "Jerusalem delivered." Salieri's fourth work for the Imperial stage was a grand opera with choruses and dances, on this subject, text by Luigi Coltellini; composed in 1771. It was a custom of Salieri, when he had a text drawn from any historical or poetical work, as in this case, to make such work, while engaged in composing his text, his exclusive reading. So now the passages of Tasso, which had furnished the text of "Armida," were read and studied to the exclusion of all else, and led him, with the daring of youthful genius—he had not yet completed his 21st year—to write a sort of pantomime, or, as we should now-a-days say, programme music, for an overture. As there was of course to be no scenic representation of the idea, a few words at the beginning of the text book gave the clue to the composer's idea, and the overture was a great success. The programme was substantially this—Ubaldo's landing on Armida's Enchanted Isle being the subject:

A thick fog envelopes the island; Ubaldo forces his way through; the monsters set as guards attack him; he puts them to flight, climbs with vast labor the cliffs, and crossing the table land reaches at length the delicious valley, which is seen when the curtain rises, at the close of this overture. Mosel speaks of the principal numbers with great warmth of praise, and in relation to the closing piece, a recitative and air of Armida, he quotes Salieri himself, who says: "It is of hellish effect, of course ad locum, and a proper finale to an opera which is almost entirely of the diabolical sort."

Whether the young man had direct aid from the counsels of Gluck is not known; but "So much is certain," says Mosel, "that the treatment of his text, especially in the instrumented recitative, the sort of accompaniment, and the thoroughly scenic construction of the whole, are completely in Gluck's style; and, had he not been compelled to introduce bravura passages here and there, this "Armida," for beauty and flow of melody, would actually deserve a higher place than that of Gluck."

Young as he was, he composed in 1772 three operas; "La fiera di Venezia," comic opera with choruses, text by Boccherini, which had a splendid success; "Il Barone di rocca antica," text by Petrosellini of Rome, performed May 12, and given 18 times that season; and "La secchia rapita," text by Boccherini, Oct. 21, and given 10 times. Of these the third had least success and deserved it least—the text was bad and did not fire the composer; the second belonged in the class of the really successful pieces of the day; but the first, for its excellence and for its firm hold upon the favor of the public, was the talk of old people in Vienna more than fifty years later—during which half century Mozart, Beethoven, Cherubini, Rossini had risen upon the stage.

Salieri was now known, and so widely as to receive an invitation to the court theatre in Stockholm for three years, which he rejected through the influence of Joseph.

In 1773 he composed the comic opera, "La Locandiera," text by Dominik Poggi, after one of Goldoni's comedies—another success—the music being purposely kept subordinate to the drama nowhere covering up the text and in the finales being almost entirely set parlando. This was the last of his brilliant pupil's works, which Gassmann lived to hear and enjoy. He died January 22, 1774, his wife and children finding in the grateful Salieri, so long as he lived, a fond and active protector and helper.

(To be Continued.)

Carl Maria Von Weber.

A LIFE PICTURE.

(Continued from page 211.)

"As we intimated above, from the fact of his being a theatrical manager, the nature of Franz Anton had probably gained in energy and quickness, but not in solidity of thought or strictness of sentiment. The airiness of his manners, once very becoming in the young ensign, had now contracted a certain amount of unpleasing disregard for morality: his cavalier-like tendency to domineer was changed into a somewhat rough lust to command, expressed in a tolerably bouncible tone; while, above all, on his constantly praiseworthy endeavor to put himself forward and create a brilliant impression, there had fallen a reflection of property-gold and stage magic, so that persons not exactly well-inclined towards him, without more ado, designated his demeanor as boastful and full of braggadocio.

"It was the influences already mentioned which preserved the more modest and greater intelligence of the son from at all reflecting in such a way as to strike people, these qualities, and so far diverted his aesthetic taste from following his father's tendencies, that, subsequently, he often revolted openly against the assertions of the old man, whom, notwithstanding, he loved so dearly, especially when they assumed the form of exaggerated praise of his (Carl Maria's) own talent.

"One of the few obscure traits in C. M. Von Weber's life and acts, otherwise so transparent and pure, is the circumstance of his always subsequently avoiding, with the utmost care, all mention of his father's having been a theatrical manager, and of the members of his father's family having been employed in his theatre. Even in his short autobiography (which, as a specimen of his mode of treating subjects of this kind, we give in the third volume of this work). C. M. Von Weber passes over in silence every detail connected with the first fourteen years of his life, and, with more child-like love than historical truth, envelopes Franz Anton's course of action, in so far as it relates to the first principles of education imparted to the son, in a halo of carefulness, quiet domesticity, and repose which encircled Franz Anton's unquiet head rather in the recollection of the son than in reality.

"One thing is certain; Franz Anton left no path untrod to awake in his younger son eminent talent, endeavoring to take him about the temples of all the fine arts, in the hope that the boy would feel at home and become a high priest in one of them. When music did not strike sparks from the boy's soul with the rapidity and brilliancy Franz Anton desired, masters of drawing, painting, and even copperplate engraving, were engaged for the child, as could easily be done in Nuremberg, because there were always a considerable number of artists of repute residing in this gem among the old art-cities of Germany. It is now no longer possible to discover who these masters were, but it is evident, from small works dating from this period, and in the possession of the family, that Carl Maria was not without aptitude for the technical details of the plastic arts, though he did not attain in any of them an amount of actual skill sufficiently considerable to warrant any one in decisively assigning the existence of real talent in him.

"There is, however, scarcely any doubt that, subjected to the sole influence of the form of instruction which Carl Maria enjoyed under the a pices of Franz Anton and of his elder brother, Fridolin, all his natural gifts, even the most important, would have assumed the character of a plant, anxiously made to blossom in a hothouse and that the entire artistic development of the man would always have retained something dilettante-like and hurried about it, since, in Franz Anton, the violent propensity for perceiving manifestations of genius in his pupil, as well as an erroneous and amateurish idea of the special expedients of talent, caused him to think rather lightly with regard to the sterling worth of the implement which he had to give the disciple in order to form the latter's ideas. The mechanical exercise of art; the process of obtaining mere dry manual skill, of mind and body; the task of learning the alphabet of art; the increase of capability, until the latter is exerted unconsciously; the fact of doing something everyday in art-production, which resembles the walking, standing, eating and drinking of life, and without which even the greatest talent is unable to formulate its conceptions, and which can be attained only under the permanent and serious pressure of the roof of the schoolroom, by the sweat of one's brow, under the earnest supervision of inexorable masters, and to the hardly won possession of which the greatest lights of art and science have frequently attached greater weight than to their own talent, and the unconditional necessity of which is so grandly made a matter of doubt by the new tendency in music, appeared to Franz Anton, who was himself a selftaught man, very far from being of sufficient importance for him to regulate his plan of education in conformity with it. The boy, while still spelling out the theory of harmony, was expected to compose; he painted in oil and water color, and sketched on copper, before he was able, without fuss and with certainty, to use his pencil upon paper.

"Though a kind fate introduced in sufficient time into his life men of more earnest mind and of greater consciousness to teach him, Carl Maria had to contend against his father's educational tendencies up to a period of his existence when only so strong a will as his own could have succeeded in once more ploughing up, and sowing with what had been neglected to be sown in his boyish mind, his own youthful soul, which was swelling with fruit, and already promised to bring forth a harvest."

Rossini's Mass.

(From L' Illustration, translated in the London Musical World).

A great musical event has occurred. Rossini has composed a solemn mass, for four vocal parts, with solos or soli; and it has just been performed, for the first time, in the grand and magnificent mansion that the Count Pillet-Will has had constructed in the Rue Moncey. I should fill a volume were I to attempt a description of this dwelling, which is fit for a king. But what are marble, gold, velvet, and brocade, compared to the glorious éclat which distinguished its inauguration, and to the unexpected manifestation of a genius, transformed, and revealed to us under a fresh aspect, when we thought it was long since silent for ever?

On the 29th of February, just past, Rossini was seventy-two years of age, and yet it was in the course of last summer that he quietly wrote, without the slightest effort, the admirable work I was fortunate enough to hear a few days ago. You feel, at the very first bars, the mighty inspiration which animated this great artist thirty years since, when he took it into his head to stop short suddenly, at the culminating point in his glorious career. The author of Guillaume Tell rises before you to his full height, and you perceive, with astonishment, that neither time nor inaction has caused his wonderfully gifted intelligence to lose aught of its power. There is the old facility of invention; the old abundance of melody; the old nobleness and elegance of style; the old novel turns; the old richness of harmony; the old audacity and the old success in modulation; the old vigour of conception and of expression; the old skill in the arrangement and employment of the voices; and the old masterly and sovereign art in the general plan of the work and in the particular plan of each separate number.

Those miserable musical hacks who think they know everything, because they have written, somehow or other, a certain number of four-part fugues, at the same time that they acknowledged in Rossini that genius which it would have been difficult to contest, indemnified themselves by accusing him of a want of science. They forgot what Grétry remarked, and which, in my opinion, ought to have been sufficient to settle the question: "He who possesses genius without science possesses everything, but does not know what to do with it." In his dramatic music, Rossini did not make use of scholastic formulas, because they would have been out of place. But was it possible that anyone could imagine Rossini had attained such firmness of touch, and such perfection of form, without having gone through all the studies marked out by the great masters of art in their programme; without having travelled over the entire circle of musical rhetoric? The religious style admits, nay, even demands, what the theatrical style rejects, and, therefore, in his Messa Rossini has given to the fugue, the fugued style, and the concerted style, that place which is their due. His Christe Eleison is written with that learned art of which Palestrina has furnished such fine models. It would be difficult to find a finer and more delicate web of canonic imitations. The Credo terminates in a fugued piece, worthy of the greatest masters, and which Cherubini himself would not disown.

Lastly, the Gloria in Excelsis has for its conclusion a fugue which is immense in its development, grandiose in its effects, and unequalled in its interest. Every well educated composer can arrange a subject and a counter-subject; he can take them, either entire, or in fragments, through the relative tones; and he can end by condensing them in a stretto, brought about more or less skillfully. But to impart to the result of this almost mathematical labor character, expression, and color; to imbue it with variety, nice gradations and contrasts; to satisfy the most experienced ears, and at the same time, to entertain those among the audience who are utterly strangers to such combinations, requires something which Heaven, for centuries, has deigned to accord to only a small number of privileged individuals, such as Handel, Haydn, Cherubini, and Mozart. Equally inspired with any one (!) of these mighty artists, Rossini has produced a fugue which is even more a work of genius than of science; a picture dazzling the imagination; a hymn seizing on, touching, and inflaming the heart. The commencement of the "Gloria," which appears after the fugue displays incomparable ardor and majesty.

Following this fine introduction came, successively, a trio for contralto, tenor, and bass; an air for the tenor; an air for the bass; and a duet for soprano and contralto. All these numbers very in rhythm, color, and expression, according to the sense of the words and the sentiments to be expressed. The duet for soprano and contralto: Qui tollis peccata Mundi, miserere nobis, is distinguished by indescribable tenderness, melancholy, and grace. In the Credo, Rossini has followed the example set by Cherubini, in his Coronation Mass. He makes the chorus repeat Credo! after the enunciation of each article of belief. But the imitation ends here, and Rossini exhibits treasures of melody to which Cherubini never possessed the key. The Crucifixus has served as the text of a soprano air. The words passus et sepultus est in it are rendered with an unapproachable depth of expression. The chorus comes in again at the words: Et resurrexit tertia die. It is a triumphal song of extraordinary dash and brilliancy.

The "Offertory" is an organ-piece worthy, as far as its composition goes, of S. Bach; but it is pervaded by a melancholy and dreamy charm, of which even Bach himself (!) rarely knew the secret. The brilliant and majestic commencement of the Sanctus is followed by a Benedictus, for two voices, a marvel of grace and elegance. Lastly, the Agnus Dei, a phrase of infinite tenderness, commenced ed by the contralto, and terminated by the chorus on the words: miserere nobis—dona nobis Pacem, fills the soul, at one and the same time, with sadness and with hope.

This masterly work still awaits an orchestral accompaniment not yet written. At the first performance there were only two pianos and a harmonium to support the voices. Still, the feebleness of these executive resources did not destroy the effect, except in a few passages where the vigour, the brilliancy, and the marked accent of the violins were required. But such cases were rare, for M. Georges Mathias presided at the principal piano. The two Sisters Marchisio sang the solos with MM. Gardoni and Agnesi. The highly fashionable audience redemanded the "Cum Sancto," the "Sanctus," and the "Agnus Dei." The most enthusiastic applause broke forth after each of the principal numbers in this masterly production.

G. HEQUET.

A New Mass by Rossini.

To the Editor of the London Musical World.

The great event of the week, as you may fancy, is the mass, entitled "Petite Messe Solennelle," by Rossini. The rehearsal took place on Sunday, and the performance on Monday night, in the newly built hotel of the well known banker, Count Pillet Will. At the rehearsal were present about 150 people, mostly great celebrities, and friends of the illustrious master; at the performance the "Haute Finance" and friends of Count Pillet Will—about 500 persons.

The mass is written for soprano, alto, tenor, and bass solo, with chorus, and, for the present, a grand pianoforte, supported occasionally by a cotta and an harmonium. The whole bulk of the orchestral accompaniment (to be scored this summer in Passy, where Rossini is soon going) was played by M. Mathias, professor of the Conservatoire, one of the most admirable performers I ever heard. Though the chorus pretended to be under the direction of M. Cohen, the real leader sat at the pianoforte, and all M. Cohen could do was to follow M. Mathias, who, besides this accompaniment—a most fatiguing one—had a long and not very amusing prelude to play, in which Rossini has tried to imitate the old style of piece called Ricercare. This piece was composed years before the mass, and—entitled Prelude Fuguassé—was only inserted on the occasion. Precisely at the appointed hour the old master arrived, and took his seat next to the grand Erard, by the side of M. Mathias, with whom he conversed during the whole of the performance. The two sisters Marchisio, Gardoni and Agnesi, sitting just behind him, took the solo parts; a comparatively very small chorus of about twenty voices was contributed by the Conservatoire; and the audience—including Meyerbeer, Auber, Carafa, Mario, Duprez, and numbers of the most illustrious composers and artists—were in trembling expectation, everything in this enjoyment-making town creating excitement. The sign was given, and the short introduction being played, the "Kyrie" began.

Now let me tell you at once that the mass contains three pieces of a very unsacred character.

Let me admit, at the same time, that more than once words have to submit to the scansion, "Filius" or "Glöräm," though in the same piece you hear often enough "Filius" and "Glöräm." But having made these concessions to fair truth, it must be said that on the whole the mass is a grand work, worthy the great old master, full of simple dignified melody, written by a thorough musician. The fugue in the finale of the first part—"Cum sancto spiritu"—is a large, masterly work and imposing piece; the "Kyrie" is charming and full of genial modulations; the "Gloria," strikingly majestic; the "Crucifixion," one of the most attractive and edifying of solos. The "Sanctus" contains a chorus without accompaniment; and the contralto solo has a wonderfully mysterious and new effect, through the chorus entering and interrupting the solo.

Gardoni and Carlotta Marchisio, who sang marvellously, were covered with applause; so were Barbara Marchisio and Agnesi; but the on piece encored, without any possibility of resistance, was the fugue, "Cum Sancto spiritu." You know what a Paris public is. I leave it to you to explain the fact.

The composer—who was not present at the performance, but only at the rehearsal—was nearly crushed by congratulations; ladies pressing round him, kissing him, chattering away and crying. Meyerbeer called him "Jupiter," and Auber said—Il a des dispositions, si cela pouvait le faire travailler. M. Bagier, director of the Italian Opera, offered Rossini £12,000 for a new opera; but all this seemed to make a very superficial impression on the old spoiled child of Paris society, Rossini. He knew the sensation he would create, and, though no human being could be indifferent to such an ovation, the impression soon passed away, and when I saw him a few hours afterwards, at his house, he showed me a bag just arrived, and said: You see of what use is La Gloire. This is real, this is something. Would you know what it was? A bag full of vegetables, sent him from Palermo by an admirer of his operas—as very often the best possible things to eat and drink are sent to him, who appreciates them mightily. Yours,

Paris, March 16.

L. ENGEL.

Auber.—The Secret of Long Life.

"Spiridon," in a recent letter from Paris, says:

The great secret of the long life people attain in Europe is the constant practice of the maxim, Festina lente. They make haste slowly by frequent resting on the wayside for repose or for nourishment. They eat frequently in the course of the day, but never a great deal at a time. They eat to prevent the body from consuming its vital juices—never for surfeit. Look at Mons. Auber, for instance, who, in his eighty-second year has given us a new opera comique. He has attained his long life solely by care. He is one of the most methodical men in Paris. He is an early riser and he goes to bed late, but he sleeps in the middle of the day, and his late hours are passed away with pretty music and beautiful women, that is in society which raises gentle emotions, but kindle none of those fierce passions which consume men. He spends his afternoons in his comfortable carriage, gaily whirling along the Avenue des Champs Elysées, or over the smooth roads of the Bois de Boulogne, constantly in a lively and animated scene, which prevents the animal spirits from stagnating. This is the condition of health and life, a gentle current, neither too swift nor too slow, but rather the former than stagnation. Besides, he makes it a point of duty to go to every military review, to all the races, to the first performance of every new piece, to all the sights to be seen in Paris, from a new dancing girl in one of the public halls and a new songstress in one of the cafés chantants to the reception at court of the Annamite ambassadors. Although he has been for sixty-six years an attentive spectator of every sight in Paris, he has not become tired of sight-seeing. I must repeat to you a story about him and his housekeeper.

He lives as coisly as a bachelor can live, in the Rue St. Georges, where he not only has sumptuous apartments, but has stables, (where he passes two hours every morning talking to his horses) scarcely surpassed by those of the Emperor. He never sells an old horse that has served him, but keeps him comfortable in his familiar stall until he dies. All of his domestics are gray, and have been with him for years. His housekeeper is past seventy, and has lived with him these thirty years gone. She is a great grumbler, and was recently complaining before Mons. Auber of her hard fate in being obliged to work at her age. You are to know that her work is merely nominal; an active under-housekeeper really does the work, and the former is simply a superannuated servant, who is still allowed to hold the key-basket to save her from the humiliation of conscious retirement. The other day she was unusually peevish. Mons. Auber, to quiet her, said: "But see here, my child, it certainly is a hard thing to have to work, yet you know I have to work as well as you." She replied: "There is a great deal of difference, nevertheless, between our work, for you do all your sitting." Musical composers enjoy no more immunity than heroes from the contemptuous eyes of their servants.

A Poet in a Pet.

Since the "Mouse's Petition," dear to good little boys and girls, Mr. Punch has seen nothing more piteous than a Poet's Plaint, which has just appeared in the Athenæum. It is indeed a sort of Singing-

Mouse's Petition. The sorrows of the unhappy bard must be deep indeed to cause him to emit so lamentable a wail, and we should like to wipe his eyes and comfort him, if we can.

Prosaisically stated, his case is. He, Mr. Henry F. Chorley, being by profession a Poet, was employed to write English words, or words which he might suppose to be English, as a "hook" for the opera called Faust. Mr. Punch had the joy and delight of reading these words in his stall at Covent Garden, and he recollects thinking that though they were not worse than Mr. Fitzball's lyrics, they were not so melodious as that other Poet's remarkable strains. But as Faust was not sung in the Chorleian dialect, but in Italian, this did not matter. But when it was decided that Faust should be performed, in English, at Her Majesty's Theatre, and Mr. Sims Reeves was to be the victim of the Personage whom Lord Westbury "has dismissed with costs," the unsingable character of the Poet Chorley's divine verses became a serious fact, and in short the great English tenor was obliged, after vain attempts to sing them, to stipulate that he should be furnished with language adapted to the music, and to the expression of the various passions of Dr. Faustus. Such words were obtained (there must be another great poet in existence, in addition to Fitzball and Chorley, and who shall say that this is not England's Augustan age?) and Mr. Sims Reeves made a grand success. The words were printed in the theatre-books as "Alterations," the honor and glory of them remained to Poet the Second. He has borne the laurels vicariously, for some time, but now they seem too heavy for his pensive brow, and he has disclaimed them in that part of our esteemed contemporary, the Athenæum, wherein Mr. Chorley usually disports himself with quaint intimations that some Lady whom the town admires is not altogether so bad an artist as she would be if she were worse, or in similar acridities. He complains, with a sweet and touching sadness, that Mr. Reeves, without leave from or "warning to" him, the Poet, discarded his effusions and sang those of the other Poet. And as he appeals to the public, it would be rude, as well as unkind, not to notice his hard case.

We have been thinking how best to comfort him, but there are some woes which refuse assuagement and which time only can cure. Shall we scold Mr. Sims Reeves? It certainly was very hard-hearted in him to refuse to spoil a great part, in the fate of which his own reputation and the interests of the theatre were at stake. He should have felt for the Poet, and struggled through his unsingable lines. If the result had been failure, and the singer had damaged his fame and the opera had not drawn, and the manager had lost his money, and the company had been disbanded; never mind, there would have been balm in Gilead, and also in Columbia, for the Poet Chorley's inspirations would have been sung. But Mr. Sims Reeves would have artistic words, and the Poet wails. Poor dear Poet! Will he dry his eyes and be pleased if Mr. Punch looks into the book, and takes out one of the dear little songs which the Poet Chorley has written? Let us try:

"Who needs bidding to dare
By a trumpet blown?
Who lacks pity to spare
When the field is won?
Who would fly from foe
Tho' alone and last?
Or boast he was true,
As coward might do,
When peril is past?"

There now. Is not that pretty and musical, and is not "blown" a neat rhyme to "won," and is not the first question lucidly put, and is it not sweetly true that a coward might boast when peril is past, and when a foe is alone and last, would it not be absurd to fly from him? Come, Poet dear, out of an opera full of gems like this you can afford to let a few be sacrificed to the absolute necessity of having the opera properly sung. That's well—we are calmer now!

What? A fresh outbreak! What's the matter now? Rest, rest, perturbed poet. What is it? "Mr. Santley (the admirable Valentine) found that he could not make the Poet's words in the dying scene effective, and got others." Nay, this is piling up the poetical agony. Pelion upon Ossa. Punch feels unequal to do more in the comforting line. Here are the two leading artists of the English stage uniting to protest that Mr. Chorley is not a lyric poet. We give up. All we can say is, that he had better take the opera-house, and come out, himself, as Faust, singing his own divine poetry, and afterwards he can give his candid opinion of himself in the Athenæum.—Punch, March 12.

Miss Kellogg as "Margaret."

To the Editors of the Evening Post:

The opera is crowded, every inch, on the "Faust" nights, but our people do not seem to know what a great thing is done there. Clara Louise Kellogg, a daughter of our own land, repeats at every representation of "Margaret" a greater dramatic triumph than any achieved on our boards since Matilda Heron took the city one evening, some ten years ago, and awoke in the morning to find it at her feet. But there is a difference, for while that great actress was scarcely known before, and got her fame in a single night, Miss Kellogg has been growing under our eyes from year to year. We have enjoyed her singing—its clearness, purity, freedom from tremolo and clasp—trap—with that unconscious pleasure which precision without formality, and an art so perfect as to have no trace left of its schooling, is able to give.

With all the merit of Miss Heron there is a degree of stage exaggeration, and a shade, not to say of coarseness, but a something that reminds us of the absence of the highest delicacy. It is not the privilege only, but the vocation of Art, even in depicting the homeliest or coarsest phases of life, to invest its subject with an atmosphere through which, without distortion or exaggeration, a suggestion is made of something higher. In this way Art, by whatever means it works, be it painting, poetry or drama, connects the temporal with the eternal, and suggests the reality of which all earthly and sensible objects are shadows or outgrowths. So the inner truth is reached through the outer fact. In this very thing we see the difference between genius and what is less than genius. The "Margaret" of Goethe is a rustic maiden—"cin armes junges Blut," as she describes herself:

"Bin weder Fräulein, weder schön;"

but the poet, without violating the sphere appropriate to his subject, makes the girl a heroine—bringing out, as genius only can, the poetry and beauty that lie, by divine right, in the humblest being. Miss Kellogg takes the character in sympathy, and gives the lowly "Margaret" transfused by a true lady's intuitions. The hand that "ist so garstig, ist so rauh," loses nothing of its homeliness; but is, nevertheless, softened to the spiritual sphere into which the life-tale is translated for us. The odds, in this respect, between Miss Kellogg's "Margaret" and Miss Heron's "Camille" needs no pointing. It detracts not from the appropriate merit of the latter to say that the former is superior in kind.

A minute showing of the excellent points in the "Margaret" now before the public is not here intended. It ought to be described and set down in the records of dramatic art, by a competent pen, for reference and encouragement hereafter—as the triumphs of a Siddons stand for us now. In the estimate, the help and hindrance which the artist meets in the combination of singing with acting should by no means be overlooked. Music gives to the genius that can use it (to no other) a mighty scope and freedom, and this is Miss Kellogg's advantage. She is not confined to the comparatively barren range of colloquialism, but expatiates in the bird-like flight (yet limited to earth's atmosphere, as the bird's flight is) of song. It is difficult, therefore, to separate, in her case, the actress's from the vocalist's part—they are necessarily so interwoven, and harmonize so perfectly. Miss Kellogg's acting is like her singing. It has the same naturalness, simplicity, and charm—the result of a cultivation so high as to have surpassed meretricious tricks—and we are beguiled into the same forgetfulness of the machinery and material appliances of her art. This judgment is confirmed by every repetition of the opera. There is scarcely a pose that is not graceful, scarcely a gesture that is not appropriate. And there is such a breadth of power displayed, too, from the artlessness of the girl, who, after refusing Faust's hand, turns on her step to look after him, and from the glee and prettiness with which she prattles over the splendors of the jewel-case; to the womanliness of her love confession in the garden, the depth of her sorrow on the cathedral steps, and the sublimity of her renunciation, when the "holy hosts" come, at her prayer, to save her. Among so much that is to be praised, and in such variety, one can hardly select a single example, but there is, perhaps, nothing finer than the angular start of sharp anguish when, in the writhing prostration of her sorrow, "Margaret" hears the accusing voice of the evil spirit taunting her.

Gounod's music is favorable to the purity of Miss Kellogg's impersonation, being severe and classic—almost bare, sometimes, in its simplicity. This kind of music, however, is the most difficult to render; as young ladies will find who attempt to sing the ballad of Thule—(wretchedly, unpardonably butchered—out of all likeness to the charming original it is, too, in the opera)—to sing it to appreciative ears that have heard Miss Kellogg's cadences. C. B. C.

Music Abroad.

BERLIN. From the humorous correspondent of the Musical World (London), we take the following paragraphs.

From Jan. 1st, to Dec. 31st, 1863, there were 527 performances at the Theatres Royal of this capital. Of these, 276 were dramatic; 162, operatic; 65, balletic; 23, mixed, or "permiscuous;" and 1 concertatic. 270 performances were given in the Opera House, while 257 took place in the Theatre Royal or "Schauspielhaus." There was, also, in commemoration of the Battle of Leipzig, an entertainment given in the Opera House, and consisted of the second act of Meyerbeer's Feldlager in Schlesien, together with a number of tableaux vivants. There were 39 different operas and 17 ballets produced. Two operas were novelties: M. Gounod's Margarethe, otherwise Faust, and Herr G. Schmidt's La Reine. The new ballet was entitled Der Markt, and proceeded from the head, or—perhaps, more correctly speaking—the heels of M. Petipa. The sole operatic revival was that of Le Domino Noir. Margarethe was played 48 times; La Muette, 9 times; Der Freyschütz, 7 times; Don Juan, Fidelio, Le Lac des Fées, and Il Trovatore, 6 times each; La Macon, 4 times; Les Deux Journées, 4 times; Marie, 6 times; Armida, 4 times; Bon Soir Sig. Pantalón, 5 times; Czar und Zimmermann, 5 times; Les Huguenots, 5 times; Le Nozze di Figaro, 4 times; Die Zauberflöte, 4 times; Die lustigen Weiber von Windsor, 5 times; La Reine, 5 times; and Oberon, 5 times.

Since my last letter the operas performed have been Margarethe, Robert le Diable, Le Domino Noir, Il Barbiere, Ernani, Die Zauberflöte, and La Figlia del Reggimento. To these must be added Michael Boer's drama of Struensee, with Meyerbeer's music, which has been performed and repeated, the public filling the house in every portion of the nights of its representation. The public and the critics are, by the way, diametrically opposed in opinion to each other on the subject of this piece.

The eighth Sinfonie Soirée of the King's Private Band possessed a more than ordinary interest, in consequence of its being the two hundredth concert given by the Band, since the members took into their own hands, in the year 1842, the direction of the concerts, and devoted the proceeds of the fund or their Widows and Orphans. The reputation of these concerts is European, and Herr Taubert may fairly boast of having done much towards establishing it. He has been the sole conductor since 1844, succeeding Herr Henning, who retired in 1842, and Mendelssohn, who left Berlin in 1843. The programme on the present occasion was made up exclusively of works by the great masters, Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven, in the following manner:—Haydn's Symphony in D major; Mozart's Concerto for the Piano-forte; and Beethoven's Symphony in A major. These grand compositions were played in a manner worthy of such works. Especial praise, moreover, is due for the splendid mode in which Herr Taubert, who executed the Piano-forte Concerto, was accompanied.

Dr. Hans von Bülow, as I must henceforth style him—since the Jena University, as I duly informed you, have granted him a doctor's degree, honoris causa—Dr. Hans von Bülow has been considerably to the fore lately. He made a great splash, for instance, with his third Soirée, when he played Beethoven's Sonatas, Op. 106, 101, 51a. (Adieux, Absence, et Retour), and the Variations in f. He came out, too, in considerable force, as conductor at the fourth and last Subscription Concert of the Gesellschaft der Musik-Freunde, or Society of the Lovers of Music, which took place at the Singacademie. Of course, the works of beau-papa Liszt were not forgotten, the concert commencing with that composer's "Prelude and Choruses" to Herder's Entfesselter Prometheus. These pieces, though never before heard in Berlin, were written as far back as 1850, for the inauguration of the "Herder" Monument at Weimar. The other night, when Dr. Franz Liszt's music was executed vocally by the members Stern's Gesang Verein, and instrumentally by Liebig's band, expressly strengthened by several extra hands, everybody was of course highly delighted. The music was "reizend" n "wunder schön," "gütlich." All this it may be; but there is one thing it will not be, according to my conviction: popular. The music of a Party does not become the music of a People as easy as the fanatic supporters of the School of the Future imagine. There is one reason why I feel very thankful that I have heard Dr. Liszt's music to the Entfesselter Prometheus, and that is: the probabilities are, I shall not hear it again in a hurry, for there are so many of the ex-Weimar Capellmeister's vocal and instrumental effusions, such, for instance, as the "Gran Mass," the oratorio of Die heilige Elizabeth, and a host of others, still unknown here, that Dr. Hans von Bülow will be some time in getting through the list, and coming round again to our friend Prometheus, "Solutus or Vinetus;" "Gefesselt or Entfesselt;" "Unbound or Bound." A horse of quite a different color, by which I would imply a work having, thank goodness, nothing in common with the above music of Dr. Liszt—I allude to Beethoven's Eighth Symphony—followed. Even the disciples of the Future, who constituted nine-tenths, I should say, of the audience, were compelled to admit and absolutely forced to enjoy its countless beauties, which, had they been less great, or less perceptible, would have suffered severely by the dragging tempo which the conductor Dr. Hans von Bülow, thought fit, especially in the Menuetto, to adopt. Another "last" concert was that given, on the 4th inst., by Carlberg's Orchester-verein. The entire series consisted of six concerts, which may fairly be pronounced to have proved successful. The place of honor in the first five was assigned to works by the great classical composers from Haydn down to Mendelssohn, though compositions by Schubert, Schumann, Gade, Cherubini, and others were not wanting. Among the most modern pieces executed, I may mention the overture to Vine-ta, by Würlst; the overture to Blauhart by Taubert; the "Polonaise" from Struensee, by Meyerbeer; and Symphonies by Ulrich and Goltzsch. The great attractions in the programme of the sixth concert, were Cherubini's overture to Anacronis; Mendelssohn's Overture to A Midsummer Night's Dream, and a Symphony (No. 2), by Beethoven.

LEIPZIG.—Riedel's Verein lately gave a performance of sacred music, when the subjoined pieces were performed: "Da Profundis," by Clari; "Magnificat," by Seb. Bach; "Christnacht," by Bronsart, and "Heilig," by Em. Bach. The solos were sung by Mesdames Reclam, Julie Flinsch-Orwil, Mad. L. Lessiak, Herren Schild and Weiss (the former gentleman from Solothurn, and the latter from Dresden). The whole performance went off extremely well and reflected great credit upon the members of the association. At the nineteenth Gwandhaus Concert, the programme contained the Overture to Fidelio, Beethoven; Violin-Concerto, Beethoven (executed by Herr Joachim); Cherubini's Overture to Moder, and Mozart's Sinfonie Concertante (performed by Herren Joachim and David). The second part of the concert consisted of Franz Schubert's Piano-forte Duet, op. 140, transformed by the instrumentation of Herr Joachim into a symphony.

The receipts of the preceding Concert were devoted to the orchestral pension fund. The pieces constituting the programme, were: Spohr's "Nocturne," Op. 34; the "Prelude" to Lohengrin; Spohr's D minor Concerto (No. 9); and "Le trille du Diable," by Tartini, the last two pieces being performed by Herr Joachim, in his very best style. Madame Flinsch sang an air from Handel's Rosolinde: "Deh vieni non tardar," from Le Nozze; Mozart's song, "Das Veilchen," and Beethoven's "Neue Liebe neues Leben."

PARIS. The fifth concert at the Conservatoire (Société des Concerts) began with Beethoven's 8th Symphony, of which the allegretto was biséc, as it always is here in Boston. Mlle. Dorus sang the romance of Benjamin, from Mehul's Joseph, and in a trio from the same, with MM. Bussine and Warot. The latter gentleman declaimed and sang the sublime air from the Abencerrages, by Cherubini, with fine effect, says the Revue Musicale. Mme. Massart, the pianist, made a sensation with the Concert-stück of Weber; and Mozart's G minor Symphony ended the concert. M. Georges Hainl must have been satisfied with the orchestra, which has placed him at its head," says the authority just quoted. — The following concert offered a Haydn Symphony; a Psalm by Mendelssohn; fragments of Beethoven's music to the ballet of Prometheus; chorus of elves from Oberon; Beethoven's B flat Symphony; and a chorus from Handel's Judas Maccabæus.

Passing from the little theatre of the select, at the Conservatoire, to the vast circles of the Cirque Napoleon, we find M. Pasdeloup still busy with his "Concerts populaires de musique Classique," revealing symphonic splendors to the thousands, at small price. The sixth concert of the season had for programme: Symphony in D, Mozart; adagio from fourth Symphony, Beethoven; Overture to Ruy

Blas, Mendelssohn; Andante, Haydn; 7th Symphony, Beethoven. — At the preceding concert a work of a living composer, Franz Lachner, of Munich, excited a good deal of interest. It was not exactly a symphony, but in form somewhat analogous, an orchestral "Suite," composed of four pieces: Prelude, Minuet, Variations, and March.

The Academic Society of Sacred Music, at a recent concert, performed selections from the oratorios Elijah and Samson, Jomelli's Miserere, Pergolesi's Dixit Dominus, pieces by Carissimi, Palestrina, &c.

Schulhoff, the pianist, gave a concert last month, in which he astonished people by his transcription of the Oberon overture, "pushing to its last limits the art of adapting great instrumental compositions to the piano." Considering Schulhoff simply as a composer, the critic of the Revue "does not fear to repeat that his works bring him near to Chopin!"

One of the newspaper correspondents says of Gounod's new opera:

"The new opera of 'Mireille,' by the composer of 'Faust,' has been produced in Paris with success. The subject is taken from a Provençal poem, M. Michael Carré preparing the libretto. The music is mostly of the idyllic order, and is noted for the abundance of melody—the first two acts being, in fact, crammed with delicious tunes. The third has much mysterious supernatural music, but the fourth reverts to the flow of melody. In the fifth act there is a church scene, with an organ playing as in 'Faust.' M. Scudo, the celebrated musical critic, does not consider 'Mireille' equal to 'Faust,' but other critics say it is superior."

M. Gounod has also had a Symphony (in E flat) brought out at the Cirque Napoleon, of which a correspondent of the London Musical World says:

"M. Gounod's Symphony is the most wearisome affair it is possible to hear. It is divided into four parts: Allegro, Adagio, Scherzo, and Finale, not one of which episodes contains a striking motive to guide the ear in the midst of a mass of chords of incidental modulations, and of little effects of coloring, which fleet by so rapidly that you are soon tired of them. It is evident that M. Gounod was not created and sent into the world to compose absolute music, and, at the very most, the author of Faust has in him only just sufficient stuff to write an overture which shall pass the limits of a simple introduction. One thing is certain, namely: that the Symphony of M. Gounod is a pale imitation of the manner of Mendelssohn, without the tenderness, the immense talent, and the sweet dreamy spirit which distinguish the works of the German composer. M. Gounod is to Mendelssohn what a clever mechanic is to a great musician, who has touched everything, and left a work which Posterity will not forget."

VIENNA.—There is some talk here of erecting a new and commodious hall for concerts and other performances. Herr Johann Strauss is the principal mover in the enterprise. The official programme of the Italian Opera season is published. Among the novelties promised is Verdi's Ballo in Maschera. Puccini's Saffo, and Donizetti's Parisina will be revived. Among the stock-operas will be Otello, Maire, Il Barbiere, Norma, I Puritani, La Figlia del Requinto, Don Pasquale, Lucrezia Borgia, Maria di Rohan, Lucia di Lammermoor, La Traviata, Il Trovatore, Ernani, Rigoletto, and Fiorina. The artists will be Mesdames Barlot, Lotti-Della Santa, Volpini, Arlot; Signori Mongini, Graziani, Pardini, Giuditti, Bartolini, Everardi, Pandolfini, Sacconani, Angelini, Cornago, and Zucchini. The subscription is guaranteed for 48 performances.

There is little doing in the way of concerts. Schumann's overture to Julius Caesar was performed at the last Philharmonic Concert but one. It did not produce any deep impression. Berlioz's "Carnival of Rome" was more successful. A very interesting Historical concert has been given by Herr L. A. Zellner, who selected the following works for performance on the occasion: 1. Madrigal, by Thomas Tallis, Madrigal, by John Dowland, Dance Song, by Thomas Morley, alla capella (16th century); 2. Partita (overture)—Largo, Fugato, Allemande, Contralto, Aria, Menuetto, Finale by Théophile Muffat (17th century), for the harmonium; 3. Three "chansons" (Nos. 4, 5, 6.), by Thibaut, King of Navarra (Troubadour, 13th century); 4. a. Fantasia by Henri le Jeune, b. "Canzon und Fughette," by Joh. Willh. Furchheim, for 5 stringed instruments (17th century); 5. Two duets for two sopranos, by the Abbe Clari (17th century); 6. Sonata (Allegretto, Andante, Cantabile), by C. Philip Emanuel Bach (18th century), for the harmonium; 7. aria from Fratello, by Nicolo Jomelli (17th century); 8. Sonata for the Pianoforte (Allegro, Maestoso, Vivace), by Nicodemus (17th century); 9. a. Song: "Du bist die Ruh," by Franz Schubert; b. Andante from the Fifth Organ Sonata, by Felix Mendelssohn, c. "Persian Song," by Anton Rubinstein (19th century); and 10. "Busslied," for bass solo, six-part chorus, and harmonium, by Meyerbeer.

COLOGNE.—The following compositions were performed at the eighth Gesellschafts-Concert, under the direction of Herr Ferdinand Hiller: Part I.—Symphony in C major, with the final fugue, by Mozart; Overture and scenes from Iphigenie in Aulis, Gluck (Agamemnon, Herr Julius Stockhausen); Violin Concerto, No. 7. Spohr (Herr Leopold Auer). Part II.—Cantata, "Liebster Gott, wann werd ich sterben?" for bass solo, chorus, orchestra, and organ, J. S. Bach (solo, Herr Stockhausen); Romance for Violin, Beethoven, and "Perpetuum mobile," Paganini (Herr L. Auer); Scotch Song, with pianoforte accompaniment, Beethoven, (Herr Stockhausen); Overture, Op. 124, Beethoven. Mozart's splendid Symphony was exceedingly well played, and each movement greeted with the most hearty applause. Herr Stockhausen was eminently successful in the music of Agamemnon. Herr Auer, also, created a most favorable impression by his execution of the pieces assigned to him, and altogether the concert went off with great éclat.—Mülle. Leopoldine Tucek has been engaged at the Stadttheater for a limited number of nights. The first part in which she appeared was that of Susanne in Le Nozze di Figaro.

STUTTGART.—At the last concert of the Association for Classical Sacred Music the programme contained: Prelude and Fugue (D major), for the organ, by J. S. Bach; "De Profundis" (Psalm 130) by Giovanni Carlo Maria Clari (horn, in 1669, at Pisa; died, in 1750, at Pistoja); Quintet from the oratorio of Die Pilgrime, by Johann Adolph Hasse (horn, in 1690, at Bergeford, near Hamburg; died, in 1783, at Venice); "Heilig," by Carl Philip Emanuel Bach (1779); Psalm 128, for two solo voices, by Maximilian Stadler, (born, in 1748, at Melk, in Lower Austria; died, 1833, at Vienna); "Offertorium" by Mozart; Trio, "Ave, verum, Corpus," by Luigi Cherubini (horn, in 1760, at Florence; died, in 1842, at Paris); Organ Sonata (No. 5, D major), by Mendelssohn; "Benedictus" by Ferdinand Hiller; and Psalm 113, by Ludwig Stark.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, APRIL 16, 1864.

The Term "Classical" in Music.

There is great vagueness in the ordinary talk about "Classical music." The term has a variety of meanings and is made to cover things unlike and heterogeneous. On the other hand, in its most limited application, it becomes pedantic. But what is now the pedantic is undoubtedly the literal, formal, soulless copy of what was originally the true and generous use of the term. For it implies a setting up of models, it appeals to examples held in reverence, which to imitate appears a safer and a wiser course than to start off ignorantly upon one's own vagaries and open paths which lead no one knows whither. Pedantry is only the outward, mechanical, Chinese copy of a once genuine and living recognition of the truly excellent.

Of course the term "classical" in Art bears some analogy to the same term in literature, and in the same manner appeals to certain well-established and enduring models as the ground-work of all true study. It is a matter of classes and of text-books. There is a course to go through.

In literature, it is the great Greek and Latin authors, whose authorship was so genuine in power and spirit, so complete in form, so clear and pure in style, as to become an authority and pattern for others after them. They represent a period when the literary faculty, the literary side (so to speak) of humanity enjoyed one of its most complete and vigorous developments. Not to know them and their works, not to be imbued with their spirit and moulded to their manner, is to ignore what in a certain representative sense is the most experienced and truly cultivated part of ourselves; it is to fling away the staging of the past and begin like savages anew. Possibly we may be inspired to do something unique and excellent ourselves in our own way; but why not enter the paths which men like ourselves have happily opened and proved practicable? If we have any original force in us, will it not abide with us even to the end of such paths?

In Music the "classics," the cherished models and text-books of the classes, are of comparatively modern date. Yet music, like literature, has its classics, its established models of form and method in the art of composition. It finds them in those brave, inspired old geniuses, in whose hands the rude music of nature gradually grew into the wonderful forms of the music of Art: the men, whose musical creations were a practical unfolding of the germs of music, according to their innate divine laws of proportion, combination, harmony, into full and perfect forms of Art. In them natural music, became scientific, learned; that is, in their works we find the principles, the eternal laws of music, best illustrated. It is no longer a vague, wild, æolian harp-like phenomenon, floating about the world in mysterious snatches of melody; but its principle of order has been found and logically developed: and now a piece of music is a connected discourse, in which a melodic theme is unfolded, treated, brought into relation with kindred themes, and woven as a motive or primitive fibre into a complex organic texture. Those who first did this (working of course in an ascending series of greater and greater successes, from Orlando Lasso, through Palestrina, through Bach and Handel, up to Mozart and Beethoven) of course wrought earnestly. They had got hold of the genuine thing. Mere fashions, weak aspirations after novelties and specious effects, had no part, or at least a very small part in their labors. Hence they could always be appealed to as genuine. Das ist das Wahre! (that is the true thing!) said Beethoven of Handel. And all the more modern music, however various in form and spirit, however antic and fantastic in its attempts at novelty, even to the Liszts and Wagners, rests on this classic ground-work of culture. To make musicians, the works of the great contrapuntists must be studied. Counterpoint—Punctum contra punctum, point against point,—is the derivation, of the word. It describes a composition in several parts or voices, note answering to note, each part having its distinct individual movement, yet all together intertwined into a beautiful, complex, harmonious whole. Canon and Fugue followed by the logical necessity of things; for this very logic of nature is itself a fugue; and the fugue principle, variously modified and more or less distinct, runs through all nature and all Art. Fugue is the form of free, harmonious motion, type of the infinite everywhere in the finite. Set water in motion, and you have wave chasing wave, which is a fugue. These old masters got hold of this principle of nature and wrought it out gloriously into their works, their fugues and choruses, their masses and oratorios, their sonatas and symphonies.

Those of them who adhered most strictly to the principle, and were least drawn off by tempting fashions and popularities of the day, naturally became the classic models for musical students. Palestrina, Bach and Handel especially so.

Now some are narrow and pedantic enough to limit the term classical to these, and to think nothing sound which wanders far from them. They forget that genuine Art must have two attributes: one is learning, but the other is inspiration, genius; one may be acquired, the other cannot. Bach and Handel, and the later names whom we call classical, were all men of genius; if they have all met in certain common principles of Art, because all so profoundly true to nature, which is one in all its infinite variety, still they have each wrought from a decided individuality of genius. Mere imitation of their form and manner cannot make one classical; for what makes the models themselves classical is, that they imitated no one, but sought the real laws of art, whether in the labors of their predecessors and masters, or in new experiments of their own. They made nature, art, the soul, God, their master.

This element of genius admitted, together with the perpetual change of circumstances, local and historical, and we see that the term "classical," to preserve any good and worthy meaning, must constantly extend its arms and take in wider and wider varieties. It is absurd to limit it to a certain number of old masters, and to later copyists of them. Thus we approximate by a negative process to a clear and sensible use of the term.

Concerts.

The past fortnight with us has not been musically rich; the Music Hall being occupied by a Catholic Fair, and the Mephistophelian chill of the east wind milder the very heart strings of all musical and genial feeling. There has been less than usual to hear, and less of the right mood for hearing. Yet we have some things to record.

Only one Organ Concert, owing to the Fair aforesaid. This was on Saturday afternoon, April 2, and Mr. W. EUGENE THAYER was the organist, and this was his programme:

- |   |               |
|---|---------------|
| 1. Grand Marche Heroique,                   | Schubert.     |
| 2. Sonata in D. No. 6,                      | Mendelssohn.  |
| 3. Offertoire for Vox humana.               | W. E. Thayer. |
| 4. Prelude and Fugue, in E Minor,           | Bach.         |
| 5. Marche Offertoire.                       | Battiste.     |
| 6. Romanza, from 8th Symphony.              | Haydn.        |
| 7. Concert Variations Star Spangled Banner, | W. E. Thayer. |

The Bach Prelude and Fugue were of the right kind, what there was of them. But the notable feature of this programme was the sixth Organ Sonata of Mendelssohn, played for the first time on this organ. All the six are interesting and will reward frequent hearing, although they are not great as compared with Bach. Since the Great Organ was opened, our organists between them have made the constant portion of the audiences somewhat familiar with the set. They have now all been played to us, with the exception of the fifth. Mr. Lang has identified himself with No. 3, playing it repeatedly; Mr. Paine with No. 4, in B flat; Mr. Parker with No. 2, in C minor; Mr. Morgan gave us No. 1, in F minor. Not the least interesting, and indeed one of the fullest of matter and most Bach-like in some points of style and treatment, is this elaborate and difficult one in D minor (ending in D major), which Mr. Thayer interpreted to us quite clearly and successfully. It opens with the plain Choral: Vater unser ("Our Father who art in Heaven"), given in full harmony, and this forms the subject of a series of variations. The first (Andante Sostenuto, with soft stops) reminds one of the "Trio Sonatas" of Bach, by the interweaving of three distinct melodic parts, one of which, in sixteenths, winds like a murmuring streamlet in and out. In the second variation the Pedal has a figured bass in triplets, while the hands play the Choral in full harmony. In the third the Tenor takes the melody, between a duet-like succession of broken phrases in sixths and thirds in the upper part and a short, fragmentary sort of accompaniment in the Pedal. The next is very rapid, Allegro molto, the canto fermo being executed for a while on the Pedal, and then divided among the several upper voices, accompanied all the while by a flying arpeggio figure, which becomes a little monotonous by so long continuance, and brought to a stand-still at last by a plain statement in full harmony of the first and last lines of the Choral. The Fugue is made out of the Choral, changing its even 4-4 time to 3-4; its lively rhythm, and its dignified and simple keeping, make it truly edifying. Here the listener fancies the Sonata ended; but not yet; there follows a Mendelssohnian peculiarity, an Andante in the major, full of childlike piety, but perhaps too modern in its coloring for the antique Chorale of Luther. In the third Sonata, likewise, he has placed that sweet little Andante tranquillo at the end; thus departing from the usual and the natural Sonata form, as if he had felt, while seated at the organ, that prayer and peace ought to exhale with the last breathings of the pipes.

On Sunday evening, April 3d, Mr. WILLCOX, with the singers of the Church of the Immaculate Conception, and with the Great Organ, gave a concert in aid of the Fair. He had valuable assistance, also, from other artists, as the following programme shows:

- |   |             |
|---|-------------|
| 1. Organ. Fugue on B. A. C. H.                          | Rink        |
| 2. Motette "Splendens Tu Deus,"                         | Mozart      |
| 3. Religious Meditation. For Violin and Organ,          | Eichberg    |
| 4. Bass Song. "Pro Peccatis."                           | Rossini     |
| 5. Andante. From Symphony in C Minor.                   | Gade        |
| (Arranged for Two Performers at the Organ.)             |             |
| 6. Song. "The day is done."                             | Balfé       |
| 7. Andante Religioso, and Finale. Faum Trio in D minor. | Mendelssohn |
| 8. Soprano Solo and Chorus. "Alma Virgo."               | Hummell     |
| 9. Organ. Ave Maria, (introducing the Vox Humana)       | Cherubini   |
| 10. Tenor Song: "Cujus animam."                         | Rossini     |
| 11. Song. "God everywhere," with Cello obligato,        | Lachner     |
| 12. Chorus. "Hæc Dies"                                  | Gratiola    |

If all Fugues were, as the non-classicists in music think, products of mere learned ingenuity, or "mathematics" (to use a term which we have heard even skilful and popular organists apply to them), then might this Fugue, in which Rink was not the first to try his hand upon the whimsical subject of Bach's name, be reckoned just as good as if old Bach himself had written it. No doubt Rink's Fugue is learned and ingenious, and somewhat interesting, at least to the one that plays it. But does it not lack precisely what Bach had, and what makes his Fugues, and all his music, cherished as immortal classics, namely: genius? Not mathematical but musical genius; the imaginative, inspired, poetic faculty—"the vision and the faculty divine," which in his outworking took the form of fugue as naturally as in Shakespeare it became Hamlet or Midsummer Night's Dream. This fugue of Rink's is uninspiring, because uninspired: it is a laborious school exercise, although in form and style he is always clear and elegant. The slow introduction (Grave), with its much unison, sounds as empty as it does grave. The simple statement of the subject three times over seems to call attention like a schoolmaster, or Mr. Speaker's mallet. The first development is sombre and lugubrious, without real edifying tenderness and depth of feeling. And when the time quickens, and an accompanying figurative subject is brought in, for much of the way it seems empty and artificial. Dry, in short. Only an unbeliever in all fugued or contrapuntal music ever says this after hearing the great works of Bach. This fugue by Rink has been in England and elsewhere, we believe, one of the test pieces of organ playing, and Mr. Willcox was equal to the test.

The Motet by Mozart, apparently one of his earlier and less church-like pieces, was well sung and gave scope for that sort of florid organ accompaniment which tickles the ears of so many. The Andante by Gade was a pleasing reminiscence of that first Symphony of the young Dane, which Mendelssohn praised so much. The movements from Mendelssohn's Trio were, of course, played with piano-forte; why introduced on such an occasion we know not, unless to avail still further of the presence of Mr. Eichberg's violin in music of "high refinement;" but good as music, and good in the rendering. The solo singing was excellent, except that the sweet but undeveloped, untrained tenor voice of Mr. BARRELL could not cope with "Cujus animam." We wonder if anybody thought Longfellow's beautiful Psalm any the sweeter for being done up in the Balfian music.

The ORCHESTRAL UNION, ousted from the Music Hall, has flown to the Boston Theatre, where on the last two Wednesdays it has been giving, not Afternoon Concerts, but "Gala Matinées;" what the mysterious rites so named consisted of how should we know, since we forgot to be invited! On the first occasion, however, we chance to know that there were lots of children present, who were very happy. One little maiden tells us that she liked the Fifth Symphony the best of all, and that the overture to "Semiramide" was splendid too; that crowds of people clapped their hands when Miss RYAN sang "O my son," and a German ballad; that the waltz by Lumbye and the "Faust" potpourri were pretty, but not so wonderful as the Symphony—we fear the little maiden was in the minority—at least among the minors; and that "Gala Matinée," after all, means nothing but a very nice concert, with hosts of people, in a great theatre; with a gorgeous scene (a ducal audience chamber) behind the orchestra and the star-spangled banner in colossal folds for "a brave o'erhanging firmament."

Of this week's Gala What's-its-name we only know the programme. The orchestra were to play the Pastoral Symphony (in spite of the east wind), Lindpaintner's "Battle Overture," Weber's "Invitation to the Waltz," and accompany Mr. B. J. LANG and his pupil, ALICE DUTTON, a child of 12 years (her first public appearance) in a Grand Duo Concertante for two pianos, on the Gypsy March in "Preciosa," arranged by Mendelssohn and Moscheles. Miss RYAN was to sing "Che farò from "Orpheus" and a ballad by Kücken. By next Wednesday we trust that galas and gales will be well over, and that with westerly Spring breezes the music will fly back to its old perch in front of the big Organ. We hear nothing, but even while we write the wind has changed (at last) into a hopeful quarter.

ON THE HORIZON.—Two good things at least heave in sight.

1. Next Saturday, the 23d of April, is the great Tricentennial, or Ter-centenary (as they call it in London—either name is awkward enough and well enough) anniversary of the birth of SHAKESPEARE (great type of all that there is genial in human life); and Mr. B. J. LANG announces a musical celebration thereof, to consist of the music to the "Mid-summer Night's Dream," to be followed by "The first Walpurgis Night," both by Mendelssohn. It will be given in the Music Hall, with the combined force of the whole Philharmonic Orchestra, a chorus made up of the best quartet choirs hereabouts, and for principal singers: Miss HOUSTON Mrs. J. S. CARY, Miss A. L. CARY, probably Mr. Wm. SCHRAUBSTAEDTER (just returned from California) for tenor, SCHRAUBSTAEDTER frère, baritone, and Mr. RYDER, basso. Mr. Lang is bestowing careful pains on the rehearsals, and all musical lovers of Shakspeare and of Mendelssohn will look out in season to secure the privilege of listening.

2. The HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY are getting ready a performance of "Elijah" for the last oratorio of the season.

The usual Saturday afternoon Organ Concert will take place at the Music Hall next Saturday.

OUR ORGANISTS.—Several changes and new appointments have recently been made. The West Church (Dr. Bartol's) will sadly feel the loss of Mr. JOHN K. PAINE; but Harvard University, at which he has been for two years musical instructor, has long been eager to secure more of his services, especially as organist and choir director on Sundays, and Alma Mater's arguments have been persuasive. Mr. JAMES C. D. PARKER has succeeded to Mr. HAYTER at Trinity Church, leaving his place at the Church in Arlington Street (Dr. Gannett's) to be filled by Mr. W. EUGENE THAYER, late of Worcester.

SALEM, MASS. Mr. FENOLLOSA has given two concerts in aid of the loyal sufferers in East Tennessee, resulting in the substantial addition of $650. to the contributions of our State.

WORCESTER, MASS. The Mozart Society, for its annual Fast evening concert, in Mechanics Hall, performed Romberg's "Song of the Bell." "Stella" writes:

The choruses were sung with correctness—no small compliment to the Society that it was so, two or three with unusual expression, and, what is generally lacking in such societies, animation. The solos, quartets, &c. were for the most part, well given. The work is of unequal interest and merit, and does not rank with the highest musical compositions; still, as it is well known—from its popularity in Germany, and contains some fine passages, and on the whole, even in English dress, gives a pretty good illustration of Schiller's noble poem, it is well that the Society has sung it. The accompaniments by the Mendelssohn Quintette Club were fine—of course, and Mrs. Hammond's piano-playing, good, as usual. After the performance of the cantata, a miscellaneous programme was given. The Club played popular selections from Faust—pleasing now, while new, but will they last? and Wulf Fries held the great audience almost breathless with one of his dreamy solos. Miss Houston sang, like the true artist that she is, "In Verure Clad," and the little German song "Impatience." Her tones, ringing clearly and with singular purity, were very effective; a proud rebuke to the tremolo, ague-chill style of singing which has crept over the musical world, from the opera-house and oratorio concert to the psalm-singers and school-children. Miss Perkins sang Che Faro well. She is the promising pupil of Mrs. Long. There were other selections—too many, in fact—of which we should be glad to make mention. The concert, which kept the undivided attention of the audience for two hours and a half, closed with "The Heavens are Telling." Under the conductorship of Mr. B. D. Allen, the Society is capable of producing the best oratorios and similar works in a manner rarely equalled out of the large cities—not always there.

NEW YORK.—The Italian Opera (Maretzek's) keeps on in its usual course—Faust and Ione, relieved occasionally by some of the old stock pieces. Robert le Diable has been given several times of late, with Medori as Alice, Miss Harris as the Princess, Brignoli as Robert, and Herr Hermanns as Bertram.

The Philharmonic Society gave an extra concert in aid of the Sanitary commission, with a very small audience and the following queer programme:

Part I.—Symphony No. 5, in C minor, Op. 67, Beethoven. Romanza from the Opera "Euryanthe," Weber. Mr. W. Lotti.—Cavatina, Barbière di Siviglia. Rossini. Madame Elena d'Angri.

Part II.—Overture to "Columbus," (1st time), G. F. Bristow.—Aria from the Opera "Prophet," "Ah! mon fils!" Meyerbeer. Mme. d'Angri.—Song without words (1st time), L. Schreiber, Cornet Solo with orchestra accompaniment, Mr. Louis Schreiber.—Aria from "Martha," Flotow. Mr. W. Lotti.—Overture to "Hail Columbia," (1st time), Hohnstock. Dedicated to the Philharmonic Society of New York. Conductor, Mr. Theodore Eisfeld.

Mr. Wm. H. Fry has written a new opera, "Esmeralda," which is to be performed in Philadelphia on the 2nd of May, by Mme. Borchardt, Messrs. Castle and J. R. Thomas; with Mr. Theodore Thomas as conductor.

PHILADELPHIA. Our correspondent "S" writes us under date of April 10th.

"GOTTSCALK has been with us. A pleasing change from his old course was the introduction of a Beethoven Quartet in one of his concerts. Young Rice, Wolfsohn's pupil, gave his third concert a few days ago and showed great improvement in power, execution and musical appreciation.

"I enclose the programme of WOLFSOHN's fourth soirée.

Sonata, Op. 47, Piano and Violin.	Beethoven.
Messrs. Wolfsohn and Thomas.
Piano Solo.—"Faust," Transcription of Concert,	Wolfsohn
Carl Wolfsohn.
Violin Solo.—"Tarantella."	Schubert.
Theodore Thomas.
Quintet, F flat major, Op. 44, Piano and String	Schumann Instruments.
Wolfsohn, Thomas, Roggenburger, Kammerer and Abrend.

"Unfortunately, I was unable to reach the Academy in time to enjoy the whole performance, which was rendered additionally attractive by the presence of Mr. THEODORE THOMAS of New York. The Schumann Quintet was excellently played. Mr. T. seemed to have infused new energy into the other artists, so that all did their best, and the result was that pleasing, exhilarating sense of perfect sympathy between the different performers, without which concerted music interests neither player nor audience. Mr. T.'s playing has so often been referred to in these columns that an extended analysis is unnecessary. His style is bold, yet chaste, and a little cold withal. His intonation is almost faultless; his manner, graceful.

"Might a 'country correspondent' (New York journalists call us provincials) inquire whether the chapter on "Musical Journalism," quoted from the "New Nation," was intended as a gentle rap on the fingers of some of your suburban letter writers? The castigation is very severe to those who feel that they deserve it. But a word as to castigators in general. Did it never occur to you that the grumblers go but a short way toward correcting the evils which furnish the staple of their chief amusement, viz., grumbling? It is so much easier to be querulous than to be correct, so convenient to point out the path, and then claim as much credit for having done this as though one had led the way.

"To me it seems that those who are anxious to improve the world, and who really succeed in smoothing over, where they cannot adjust, the incongruities and ruggedness that annoy them, go to work in a different manner. They attack near-lying evils and, by their own example, teach those they would have follow them. My experience with such new brooms has always been that their zeal subsided with a rapidity that betokened exhaustion. Has the Round Table, whose recent ex cathedra lectures on critics in general, and the Bohemians in particular, excited so much interest, furnished examples in its own columns of dramatic or musical criticism of a very high order? Or has the New Nation done any thing remarkable in that line? I do not question the justice of the complaints of the new organs. What I ask, and what others desire, is that, instead of employing their talents in fault-finding, they shall give us examples to follow, which, though they may be so far above the imitative power of "country correspondents" as to discourage emulation, may yet serve to furnish them with an ideal upon which to feast the eyes of their hungry souls.

"And now to another topic—the Sanitary Fair. To chronicle a tithe of the musical entertainments, school exhibitions, &c., given for the benefit of that enterprise, would involve too great an inroad upon my time and your columns. Suffice it to say that all who can sing, play, or recite, buy tickets or sell tickets, seem to have devoted their services to this noble work. More ambitious than the rest, the amateurs who assisted Habelmann, design giving opera. In the way of oratorio music, we are to have the Judas Maccabeus and the Creation.

"On the evening of the 8th, Messrs. Cross and Jarvis gave their third soirée. The programme was very full and contained enough matter for two concerts. The first part consisted of a Grand Duo, for two pianos, by Kalkbrenner, and a Quartet for piano and wind instruments, by Mozart. The second part was sustained by Messrs. Jarvis and Gaertner. The Rondo Piacerevole, by Bennett, as played by the former, was a pleasant revival of a wholesome favorite. Why do the graceful, thoughtful compositions of Sterndale Bennett meet with so little favor at the hands of American pianists? Those musical sketches of his, over which Robert Schumann grew so eloquent, are, as yet, unknown to many of our best performers. They would certainly prove more interesting than much of the pyrotechnic music of the day, and would well repay study.

That there are show pieces, in which the pianist may find full scope for the display of great technical skill, refined taste and thorough musicianship, is a remark that must sound trite to him who knows anything of the works of Hummel. In the Concerto (op. 89), two movements of which were played by Mr. Jarvis, the pleasing flow of melody and the brilliant finger passages were delightfully rendered.

"The Adagio of the De Beriot Concerto (op. 44) in E Minor was finely played by Mr. Gaertner. In the Finale vivace, occasional incertitude with the double stops was observable; altogether this was the best public performance I have yet heard at the hands of Mr. Gaertner. The last movement seemed very trivial, the pretty nothings of the Adagio awakened memories of something else. Mr. G.'s large, bold style would do justice to some of the better violin music rarely heard in these days. If violinists eschew the classical and cultivate the popular, we need not wonder that the compositions of De Beriot receive the honors while those of Tartini, Viotti, Rode and Spohr lie buried in dust on the shelves of the curious. Why cannot Mr. Gaertner or Mr. Thomas favor us occasionally with a movement or two from the works of those masters?

"A fitting conclusion to this soirée was the trio of trios—the op. 97 of Beethoven."

ST. LOUIS.—The fifth concert of the Philharmonic Society, (Mr. E. Sobolewski, conductor), took place March 17th, with the following programme:

1. Overture.—"Barber of Seville" Rossini.
2. Quartetto and Chorus.—from "The Requiem," Mozart.
  - a. Chorus.—"Dies Irae."
  - b. Quartetto.—"Tuba Mirum."
  - c. Chorus.—"Rex Tremendae."
3. Violin Solo.—Souvenir de Mozart—"Fantasia op. 21." D. Alard.
4. Symphony—No. 1 in E♭. Haydn.
  1. Part-Songs. Mendelssohn Bartholdy.
    - a. In the Country.
    - b. Early Spring.
5. Overture.—"Le Chant du jeune Henri" Mehul.
6. Song.—"The Dream Messengers," Graben-Hoffman.
7. Introduction and Bridal Chorus.—from "Lohengrin." R. Wagner.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

The Sword that my brave boy wore. Song.

J. G. Clark. 30

A touching tribute to the memory of a son, whose sword, blood stained at Antietam, was, after his death, sent home, as a memento, by his surviving comrades.

Sorrow. (The Beatitudes, No. 1.) Stephen Glover. 25

The first of a series of sacred songs, which promise to be valuable additions to the too scanty stock of that kind of music. The present one has for its text, "Blessed are they that mourn, for they shall be comforted."

The Sailor's Wife. (I've a letter from thy sire, baby mine.) Song.

F. Boott. 25

A charming ballad, all full of sunshine, as the heart of the sailor's wife was, when she heard from her husband.

Maggie's secret. Song.

Claribel. 25

Maggie, whose "heart is over the sea," rejects, very civilly the attentions of her admirers in the hay-field. The poem is pretty, and music appropriate.

The dark girl dressed in blue. Song.

Harry Clifton. 30

I'd chose to be a baby. Song.

F. Buckley. 30

Two comic songs, the last one a burlesque of "I'd choose to be a daisy." Melodies very pretty.

Keep one kind thought for me. Frederick Hoffman. 25

A thoroughly satisfying song, both in words and music.

Instrumental Music.

The Fountain. (Fontaine.) Georg. Regnald. 30

The first of a series of pieces called "Tone Pictures," (Bilder in Tönen), by the above composer. It is very graceful, and fits easily to the fingers. Good for learners.

Caprice Militaire. Op. 118. Eugene Ketterer 50

A brilliant and most fascinating piece, in martial style. Of medium difficulty.

Repertoire, "Faust."

F. Beyer. 35

Contains the airs of the opera, with modulations, &c. Of medium difficulty.

Tone Pictures.

Georg. Regnald.

This set of pretty pieces contains, in addition to No. 1 mentioned above:

- |                         |    |
|-------------------------|----|
| No. 2. Young Zephyrs.   | 30 |
| " 3. Pearls of Dew.     | 30 |
| " 4. May flowers.       | 30 |
| " 5. The Strange Story. | 30 |

Books.

THE SHILLING SONG BOOK. No. 3. 12 cts.

This new number contains the words of a large number of new and popular songs. For a York shilling, you could not well get more for your money. This and the other two volumes contain a large catalogue of popular vocal music, and are very "handy" to have in the pocket when going to sleigh-rides, picnics, parties, boat rides, and everywhere else, where a number of persons wish to sing easy and popular music together.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 602.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, APRIL 30, 1864.

VOL. XXIV. No. 3.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Half a dozen of Beethoven's Contemporaries.

II. ANTONIO SALIERI.

(Continued from page 218.)

The loss of Gassmann was a severe blow also to the young Emperor; and it was, perhaps, partly from affection to him that his favor to the Kapellmeister's pupil—almost adopted son—rose so high. He immediately offered Salieri the now vacant place of imperial royal chamber composer—which the appointed had been too modest to apply for—accompanied by a decree securing to him a salary of 100 ducats and a free lodging. He was also appointed Kapellmeister to the Italian opera with a salary of 300 ducats—the now aged and feeble Bono taking the place of imperial royal Court kapellmeister.

Salieri works this year (1774) were the comic opera with choruses, "La calamità de' cori," text by Goldoni—successful, and two cantatas of not great merit, for soli and chorus, composed for the benefit concerts of the Musicians' Widows and Orphans' Institute.

In 1775 he set a comic opera by von Gamara, but the third act was feeble, and the work had little success.

The composer's love story comes in here, and I agree with old Mosel that it is worth the reading—and tell it.

Not that it is much of a story; but one of those old men's reminiscences, which carry the hearer or reader back with them into long past days—in which we rather like the innocent vanity running like a colored thread through the web, and which give us oftentimes (in the memoirs of old artists) such queer glimpses into their real characters, with their great want of religious principle, but superabundant religious faith in a providence specially provided for them. Now hear Salieri and see how lovingly he dwells upon that youthful love.

"In the course of this year I became acquainted with that angel, whom God had appointed for my wife. In the year 1775, I gave music lessons to a young Countess, who was receiving her education in the nunnery of St. Lawrence, and whom I had instructed, before she went thither, at her father's house. In the same cloister other girls, mostly motherless, were boarded. My hour was from 11 to 12 A. M., and before it was finished, these girls accompanied by their guardians [dragons, duennas, Aufseherinnen] usually passed through the music-room to the dining hall. On the very first day of my lessons, one of these girls, of slender figure, somewhat taller than the others, about 18 years old, and dressed in rose-colored taffeta, made a mighty impression upon me. Twice I saw her pass through the room, but the third and fourth time I sought her in vain among her companions, and knew not why she was absent, which greatly discomposed me. The fifth time came the others again without her; my restlessness increased, but she came later and alone following her companions. The unexpected joy which filled me, so mastered me, that, as I bowed to her, of course with respect, it was in such a manner, as to show her clearly, that I had been pained not to see her the preceding days; and I believed I could see in her face just as plainly, that it was not displeasing to her. From that moment her picture was firmly fixed in my head and heart; but the delicious feeling which accompanied the picture, was modified by many a bitter thought. 'What folly,' said I to myself, 'to give way to such a sudden passion for a girl, whom thou hast seen but three times, who has probably seen thee for the first time here in the cloister, to whom thou hast never spoken, and probably never will speak! Moreover, who told you that she passed through the room the last time alone, on your account? And suppose she has guessed the reason of your delight, are you certain that she shares in your feelings, and has not already bestowed her inclinations upon some worthier object?' But all such wise thoughts did not prevent the longing to see her again from increasing, and on those days (days of torment for me!) when I had no call to the nunnery, I could not refrain from walking up and down under the windows of the room, in which I supposed she was lodged.

"In this condition I lived, when on the second Sunday after my first meeting with the fascinating unknown, chance (or rather God's dispensation) gave me the opportunity to speak with her for the first time. I had been in the habit of attending, whenever I could, the Sunday afternoon service in the Cathedral. This time, it was in February, I came in rather late and found all the pews occupied; I placed myself therefore at the end of one where an old woman was kneeling, who made a little space for me as well as she could. After finishing her devotions, the friendly old woman rose to go away; I stepped aside to let her pass, and a young girl, who had knelt beside her, left the pew with her. Whom did I recognize in her? The young lady of the nunnery! What a heavenly surprise for me! I bowed to her with all respect, but without speaking; she with much grace returned the bow. It was impossible for me to remain one minute—I must follow. I left the church, saw that she took the way to the nunnery with her companion, and hastened through other streets to get before her and to meet her. I wished to approach, but dared not. At length, the fear of letting so good an opportunity slip roused my courage, and taking it for granted that she understood French, I besought her in that language to forgive my boldness, and allow me to accompany her to the cloister. She answered me also in French, but with the voice and manner of an angel, that it would give her pleasure.

"I should essay in vain to express the heartfelt delight, with which these words and the perception, that she was not displeased with the encounter, filled me. With a voice trembling for very joy I continued the conversation; I prayed her to tell me her dear name. 'Therese von Helfersdorfer,' was the answer. I asked her how it came that I should have the happiness of meeting her at this hour [it was now about 6 P. M. and quite dark] out of the cloister, and why I had twice failed of seeing her pass through the music room? With amiable haste to satisfy my curiosity, she said that on those two occasions she had gone into the dining hall early, before my hour: and that, since she had had the misfortune of losing her mother, she went every Sunday to visit her father and two younger brothers, and always returned to the nunnery at this hour accompanied by the old servant. Meantime we had reached the cloister. I had not the courage to say more than that my habit was to attend service in the Cathedral every Sunday afternoon, and that if she allowed, I could always offer her my protection on the way back; to which with the same grace she answered, that my company would give her pleasure, and added that she had already known my name, even before she saw me in the cloister, and had often heard the young Countess (my pupil) speak of me in terms of praise. So now I understood why she at the first had met me in so friendly a manner. Intoxicated with joy at what I had heard, I wished her good night, and discussing with myself the singular meeting with her, I turned my steps—whither?—Back into the Cathedral, to that spot where the beloved one had knelt, there to thank Heaven for its happy guidance, and to pray for continued blessings upon my honorable intentions; for a secret voice whispered me, Therese was destined to make the happiness of my life.

"I longingly awaited the coming day to hurry to my lesson with the Countess in the cloister; but, just as I was on the point of leaving my room, came a servant to inform me that the Countess was ill, and I should not trouble myself again until further notice. What a thunderclap for me! All the joy of yesterday was suddenly banished; wrath in a thousand forms filled my breast, and, as during the whole week I was not called to my pupil, I may say I spent it in the jaws of purgatory. However, I embraced the opportunity of making inquiries in relation to the father of my beloved. He was an official, honored and respected, dwelling in his own house not far from St. Stephen's. The next Sunday hardly had it struck four o'clock, when I hurried to the church and placed myself near the door through which, coming from her father's house, she must enter. With strained attention, watching all who entered, how often did I say to myself when one at all resembled her: 'That is she—no!—now, at last—no, just as little as the other;' and this lasted three never-ending quarters of an hour. I was beginning to fear that she would not come at all, or that she had entered by another door; yes, still more painful doubts made me anxious; the Countess, it occurred to me, may not have been ill at all; the Abbess perhaps had charged her to keep me away, after learning from Therese's servant . . . ; and so I martyred myself, until at last about five o'clock I saw the angel and her companion enter. The prisoner condemned to death, who unexpectedly sees his innocence proved, feels not such bliss as in that moment streamed me through. After our devotions were over I followed her, as before, and found for all the pangs I had endured sweet comfort in the assurance she gave me, that it gave her pleasure to see me again.

Non sa che sia diletto
Chi non provò del petto
Un' innocente amor.

(Metastasio.)

"I asked my dear if the Countess really had been ill, which she, to the no small allaying of my recent doubts, answered in the affirmative, adding that she would begin her lessons again the next day. A thousand other thoughts criss-crossed through my brain; I did not know where to begin, and the few moments at my disposal were almost-passed, when I roused up courage to tell her I had a secret to impart, which concerned the peace of my whole life, but besought her to promise me a decisive answer to what I should say. She promised it, and encouraged me with such grace and with a sort of tender curiosity to speak, that I finally had the boldness to say that I passionately loved her, and wished to learn if I could venture to hope for some, if but little affection in return? 'For a like inclination,' she replied, half loud. 'For a like inclination!' cried I in transport as I seized her hand and covered it with kisses. 'The same,' she repeated, lightly and modestly pressing my hand. Beside myself for joy, I declared to her that this assurance made me blessed, and asked when I might present myself to her father, in case she allowed me this step. 'A week from to-day,' she said. 'I will prepare him for your visit, and you shall be well received, for my father already knows you, by reputation.' In fact I had already at that time gained a name through my successful operas, as 'Armida,' 'La fiera di Venezia,' and 'La Secchia rapita,' and the gracious inclination of the Emperor toward me was also well known. However, it was not destined that I should seek my beloved at the hands of her father; that very week God suddenly called from this world the worthy old gentleman, and beloved by everybody, who had for some time been ailing. At the same time the young Countess left Vienna for Hungary, and thus I was deprived of every opportunity of seeing Therese, except now and then at the house of the parents of one of her companions.

"Herr von Helfersdorfer had appointed an excellent and rather wealthy man to be guardian of his daughter and two sons, who, a widower of middle age and ignorant of what had passed between his beautiful ward and me, had formed the plan of marrying her and soon after the father's death disclosed it her. Of course there was nothing for Therese to do but declare the state of her feelings and the object of them. As soon as this came to my knowledge, I hastened to the guardian, accompanied by a man of high respectability, and made formal application for the hand of my charmer. He received me politely and declared with seeming equanimity, that since his ward was satisfied, he also consented to my demand; only he must be able to satisfy himself, that I possessed sufficient means to support in respectability a wife, who belonged to a family of rank, and who possessed a not insignificant fortune. I replied that I had 300 ducats as Kapellmeister of the Italian opera, a hundred ducats as imperial chamber composer, and the hope of becoming some time Court Kapellmeister; that moreover, my compositions and music lessons brought me in annually another 300 ducats, so that I could well reckon my income at 700 ducats. The guardian answered: 'That would be more than sufficient if it was only certain; but, of all this, you can only reckon on the hundred ducats with certainty, which you receive from Court; and I must therefore pray you to wait until your position improves in some positive manner, before I, as guardian, can give my consent to this marriage.'

"Now in fact the honest man did no more than his duty—that I had to admit. I therefore only besought him to keep the matter for the present secret, which (to my good luck) he did not do.

"Two days afterward I went, as the duty of my office was, at 3 o'clock P. M. to the Emperor's chamber music. When I entered the anteroom, I saw the monarch standing by the fireplace with his back toward me, alone and sunk in thought. He turned a little to see who came, and returned my respectful bow with his usual kindness. On the other side of the room stood the footman of the Emperor and two persons, one of whom, who had an appointment in the court library, and was much liked by the Sovereign, was counted among my most intimate acquaintances. I joined them in silence, and my friend, smiling, made me the sign of the long nose. [The same as the Masonic sign described in one of Marryatt's sea novels; and as my cousin Georgie's Japanese fan.] At that moment the Emperor turned again, noticed the jest, and came towards me asking what that meant? I pretended not to know, although in fact I understood the joke but too well! The librarian, however, in confusion stammered out that I had tried to marry a beautiful orphan, but had found a rival in her guardian. The monarch, at first somewhat surprised, but also smiling, asked me if this was true? I found myself now obliged to tell the whole history of my love, which seemed to amuse the Emperor much, and closed with the prayer that his majesty would forgive me for having kept the matter hitherto a secret; this I had done because the result was so uncertain. When I spoke of the reasons why the guardian refused his consent, I noticed a sudden but passing expression of seriousness; and when I finished, as he left me he said, as if half in thought to himself: 'Well then, you must have patience.' Meantime the other musicians had arrived, and the concert began in its usual manner, without a word more being said about my love affair.

"Next morning the Intendant of the Court music sent for me. I hastened to him, and he greeted me with: 'Receive my congratulations, Herr Kapellmeister; the Emperor has raised your salary from one to three hundred ducats, with the single proviso, that you shall lighten the burden of the excellent, but now very old and often sick, Kapellmeister Bono, and direct the Italian opera also, should his majesty take it into his own hands.*' Most joyfully surprised I thanked his Excellency for this unexpected communication, and was already on my way to Therese's guardian, when I thought of something better and turned my steps to the imperial palace. The monarch had hardly heard that I was in the anteroom, when he called for me. Sitting at his writing table, he called to me as I entered: 'Well, have you been already to the guardian?' I replied: 'Your Majesty, my duty leads me first of all to your all-highest feet'—'Go,' interrupted me the kindly prince, 'Go to the guardian, and this afternoon let me know his answer.'

* See Ante, that the Italian opera then was a private enterprise.

"That I now flew to the guardian, that he could no longer refuse his consent, that the gracious Monarch heard this with pleasure, and what thereupon followed, every one can easily imagine; but never will my grateful heart forget a goodness, which gave me a happiness that I have now for many years enjoyed, and now share with eight children, who are the images of their beloved mother, who even now sometimes hears again the history of our loves with hearty enjoyment."

Does not that read like a chapter of Defoe?

(To be Continued.)

Beethoven and the Editions of his Works.*

A notice by Otto Jahn on the various editions of all Beethoven's works, with special reference to the latest complete edition published by Breitkopf and Härtel, in Leipzig, has been extracted from the Grenzboten (F. L. Herbig, Leipzig, 1864), and printed in a separate form. It most justly deserves to be everywhere known, not only for the account it gives, from authentic sources, of the way in which Herr Breitkopf and Härtel's great undertaking will be carried out, as well as of its present stage and progress, but because it also contains a number of admirable remarks upon musical literature generally, and particularly upon the question of critically settling the text of works of deceased masters, especially of those of Beethoven.

The introductory observations upon the music-publishing trade, and its relations to the public, deal in the first place with the peculiar evils resulting from the omission of the date of publication upon the title-page of works, and from the high retail price charged for them. The defence of the latter by existing circumstances strikes us as worth nothing; when it is notorious that the publisher makes a profit, after allowing a discount of fifty per cent., this per centage constitutes a most disproportionate tax upon the buying public, solely for the benefit of the middle-man, the necessity or even use of whom in circulating the publications we do not at all see. O. Jahn looks upon this, it is true, only as an abuse which cannot well be abolished. We, however, believe that the sale of musical publications would be immensely augmented by a frank statement of the original price.

After a retrospective historical glance at former attempts to publish the entire works of various authors, such, for instance, as Mozart and Haydn, by Breitkopf and Härtel, and the present efforts of the Bach and Societies, the author lays great stress in his notice on the wide difference between this new project of publishing all Beethoven's works and the editions of which we have alluded of Bach and Handel, for the project is ushered into the world without any extraordinary support, despite tremendous competition, and the actual circulation, exceeding everything hitherto known, of Beethoven's works.

"Let the reader only recollect that Beethoven's works are in the hands of the public—those still unprinted would not weigh much in the scale—that numerous editions of those compositions which appeal to the masses are everywhere to be had, satisfying both reasonable and unreasonable demands; and that now there appears a complete edition, including everything, large works and small, popular and forgotten, grateful and ungrateful, edited so as to fulfil the strictest requirements of scientific criticism, and splendidly got up, on conditions that presuppose and render possible a most extensive sale. One fact is established by this, namely, that Beethoven at present excites far more than any other composer the interest of the whole musical public, and, therefore, sways the musical market. It may be difficult to obtain accurate and trustworthy statistical information concerning the sale and circulation of musical productions; but it is proved beyond a doubt that no composer, either classical or fashionable, can be compared in the slightest degree with Beethoven, as far as relates to the continuous and largely increasing sale of his works. Nay, we have been assured that if the entire collection of Beethoven's works, which, by means of the music publishers, have been distributed in the course of a year among the public, were placed in one scale, and all other music published during the same year put in the other, the balance might tremble, but Beethoven would nevertheless weigh as much as all the rest. As will easily be understood, the compositions and arrangements for piano are what turn the scale; of these incredibly large numbers are sold. That this sovereign power over the musical public of all grades and of all creeds is not, however, a transient and fashionable caprice of dilettantism, but a gratifying proof how deep and universal a feeling and interest for genuine and high art has spread among us, is demonstrated by this new and complete edition of Beethoven's works. It is certainly a remarkable and unusually satisfactory circumstance that a great artist should enjoy such universal respect; that his works should exercise so immediate and lively an influence; and that a complete collection of them, undertaken with judgment and seriousness, and thoroughly and worthily carried out in all respects, should be gladly welcomed and patronized by the public. The difficulties of all kinds which beset an enterprise of this description are so great and varied that only universal and continuous patronage on the part of the public can give the publisher courage and strength to overcome those difficulties and complete the work."

* Translated from the Niederheinische Musik-Zeitung, for the London Musical World, by J. V. BRIDGEMAN.

What O. Jahn says relative to the hopes and fears which would have been excited had Beethoven himself, as he frequently thought of doing, really had a complete edition of his works published, perfectly agrees with the convictions to which we ourselves long since came on this head, though so many persons—including even Schindler—have regretted that by the non-fulfilment of his intention we have lost the answer to so many riddles in the so-called "Purport" of the master's music. We will not forego the pleasure of here quoting in full the author's observations, which, shortly and concisely, though clearly and strikingly, as is always the case with Jahn, express the only correct view on such hints, and we cannot help congratulating ourselves on seeing principles which we have invariably advocated in these pages corroborated by such a pen.

"Beethoven," says the author, at page 14, "had another project in connection with the complete edition, and an inclination has been manifested to regret the failure of that project. He proposed, in fact, as Schindler also informs us, to mark by inscriptions and short notices the 'poetical idea' of several of his compositions, in order to facilitate their correct comprehension and execution. When questioned as to the sense and import of expressive compositions, he spoke in terms of regret of the fact that the time when he wrote most of his sonatas was more poetical than a later period, probably, because people simply gave themselves up to the music, satisfied with the musical impression it produced; allowing the sensations excited by it to die away in their mind; and feeling no necessity to inquire after thoughts and ideas, which should specify the subject of interest in anything but a musical light. 'Every one,' he complained, 'felt, on hearing the Largo of the Sonata D major (Op. 10), the state of soul, portrayed in it, of a melancholy man with all the gradations of light and shade in the picture of melancholy.' This every musician of feeling will certainly hear in it in future, as well as at present; but the questioners were not satisfied with this; their indiscreet curiosity made them want to know further what was the specific and personal cause of such a state of mind, even, if possible, in the composer himself, whom people are far too fond of identifying with the work of art. And if the composer actually answers these questions, will that be an advantage? One day, when Beethoven was in good humor, Schindler asked him for the key to the Sonatas in D minor (Op. 31, 2), and F minor (Op. 57), and he replied:—'Just read Shakespeare's Tempest.' Schindler was evidently somewhat disappointed, for he goes on to remark:—'It is to be found there, then; but in what passage? Questioner, read, guess, and decide.' The questioner will, probably, gain from his perusal the conviction that Shakespeare's Tempest produces upon him a different impression to what it produced upon Beethoven, and that it will inspire him with no Sonatas in D minor and F minor. That it was this drama especially which could work up Beethoven in such compositions, is, certainly, a fact not uninteresting to learn; but to attempt to find in Shakespeare the explanation of them, would only be showing the insufficiency of one's powers of musical comprehension. Even when Beethoven is more precise in what he says, the fact of understanding what he wrote is not facilitated. His intimate friend Amerla informs us, Beethoven told him that, when writing the Adagio in the F major quartet, he had the grave scene in Romeo and Juliet before his mind; now, if any one were to read this scene attentively in his Shakespeare, and then seek to picture it to himself, while he listened to the Adagio, would he increase or destroy his genuine enjoyment of this piece of music? According to Czerny's account, corroborated by others, Beethoven said he conceived the first idea of the Adagio in the E minor quartet (Op. 51, 2), on seeing the starlight sky; people assert that, after he had been sitting a long time in the dark out of doors, the fact of lights sparkling up all around him furnished the motive of the Scherzo in the D minor Symphony; that a horseman galloping past suggested the theme for the last movement of the Sonata in D minor (Op. 31, 2); and that the impatient knocking, late at night, of a person craving admittance into a house furnished the motive for the first movement of the violin Concerto. It is possible that a pregnant material impression at a favorable moment called forth, lightning-like, a characteristic motive; it is possible, also, that the impression clung to the memory of the artist; but with the artistic development of this germ, with the creative organization of the work of art, this unusual exciting cause has nothing more to do; the artist's faculties are employed in quite another sphere of action, and whoever believes that the work of art can be constructed out of the accidental and outward motive has no idea of artistic creation; should for instance any one take it into his head to deduce the first movement of the Violin Concerto, in its psychological development and outward conformation, from the fact of the person knocking in the night, and endeavor to explain it by this: in Heaven's name let him knock; the door leading to the right understanding of the composition will never be opened to him.

"Inscriptions and notices, even if authentic, and emanating from Beethoven himself, would not materially have assisted us in penetrating the sense and import of a work of art by him, for we may assert thus much without attacking too strongly the interest such inscriptions and notices would have possessed on account of many of the personal explanations; it is on the contrary to be feared that, like those Beethoven did publish, they would have occasioned misconception and mistakes. As we all know, the beautiful Sonata in E flat major (Op. 81) has inscribed upon it, the words: Les Adieux: l'Absence: le Retour; and is therefore interpreted with confidence as an undoubted specimen of programme music. That they are moments in the life of a loving pair, we at once presuppose—says Marx, who leaves it undecided whether the lovers are married or not—but the composition furnishes also the proof. 'The lovers open their arms as birds of passage open their wings,' says Lenz, speaking of the conclusion of the Sonata. Now upon the original of the first part Beethoven wrote:—

"Farewell, on the departure of His Imperial Highness, the Arch-duke Rudolf, the 5th May, 1809; and on the title page of the second:—

"The Arrival of His Imperial Highness, the Arch-duke Rudolf, the 30th January, 1810."

"We can understand that, in publishing these outpourings of an essentially personal feeling, he desired to preserve the memory of its cause, without naming his imperial friend. But how would he have protested at being made to play the wing-flapping, 'in the dalliance of blessed rapture,' to the Arch-Duke? As we perceive, the motion and the situation are here given by Beethoven himself, but a mistake in the tone must have been committed by him—or by his interpreters.

"As we are aware, Beethoven complained frequently and bitterly of those who explained what he wrote, and he had good cause for so doing. He would certainly have agreed completely with Mendelssohn, when the latter wrote to Souhlay: 'That which music I like conveys to me does not consist of thoughts too indefinite, but of thoughts too definite to be expressed in words. If you ask me what I pictured to myself on the occasion, I answer: precisely the song, as it now exists. If, in this or that instance, I had a definite word, or indefinite words in my mind, I would not pronounce them to any one, because a word has not the same value for one person which it has for another; because a song alone is capable of saying the same thing and awakening the same feeling in one individual as in others—a feeling which, however, cannot be expressed by the same words in different cases.' We may therefore, be thankful that Beethoven, also, did not utter his words, for they would have led only too many persons into the error of believing that he who understood the inscription understood the work of art as well. His music says all that Beethoven desired to say; it is and always will be the pure, clear spring, from which every one susceptible of feeling can draw."

The pamphlet then proceeds to discuss at length the necessity for, and the completeness of the new edition (260 numbers in 24 series); the proportion of the still unpublished compositions by Beethoven to those already published; the Arrangements, in some of which the composer himself was concerned; and, lastly, in the fullest manner, the criticism which guarantees the genuineness of the musical text. All this is well worthy of a perusal; it gives us a clear insight into the difficulty attendant on, and the value of, the undertaking, and cannot fail not only to gain for the latter the appreciation it deserves, but to benefit it materially by securing numerous additional purchasers.

Especially admirable is what is said upon the duty of criticism generally; and, also, in especial relation to the works of Beethoven. This duty has been undertaken by Julius Rietz, for the grand instrumental and vocal compositions; by David for the chamber music; by Reinecke for the pianoforte works; by Richter, Bagge, and Franz Espagne, for the songs. That (p. 32) in the Scherzo of the fifth Symphony the two superfluous bars are omitted in the new edition of the score was something it was high time should at last be done. As far back as the year 1847, at Mendelssohn's request, and in order to give greater publicity to his discovery of the truth, we directed attention to these bars in the Kölnische Zeitung; and, furthermore, at page 777 of the second year's series of the Rheinische Musik-Zeitung, we investigated the matter at length, examining and refuting the so-called reasons for retaining the said bars; yet, despite of this, they are far from having everywhere disappeared, and are played with the rest of the composition by the orchestra of the Paris Conservatory up to the present day! It is incredible what strange communications we received from musicians at the time. Among others, even Schindler wrote: "That you should insist so emphatically upon the unguineness of the two bars, is something of which I cannot approve," and even in the third edition of his Biography of Beethoven, though it did not appear until 1860, he could not refrain from again laying lance in rest for the "mull," as Beethoven himself designated his error. At present, the very orchestral parts, from which the Symphony was performed under Beethoven's own direction, have corroborated the fact of the "mull," since, as we learn at page 32 of Jahn's pamphlet, the two bars are not contained in them. But all this goes for nothing, because "Beethoven subsequently took a liking to the mull!"

How it stands with the rejection of the bar-rest in the first Allegro of the same Fifth Symphony (another point on which we insisted in the second annual series, p. 780, of the Rheinische Musik-Zeitung) in the new edition, we do not know, not having yet seen the score.

Jahn further informs us (at p. 32) that the music to Goethe's Egmont is now at length published free from the disfiguring additions, the concluding appendages. These additions, also, as far back as the year 1834, at a festival performance for the inauguration of a patriotic monument in Wesel, I denounced as unworthy of and not emanating from Beethoven, and, in the first year's series of this paper, as long since as 1853, page 4 et seq., I showed, in a separate notice, how the interlude, according to the original (without the above named additions), could be joined on at the end and the beginning of the respective acts, so as to be listened to, while the curtain is up, with more attention than is usual in the ordinary way of performance. In the concert-room, the connecting poem must, with its continuation, join on immediately to the bars, at which Beethoven breaks off his music, according to the plan followed at repeated performances here in Cologne, with a text written expressly for the purpose.

Of the fact that Beethoven's revision of the proof-sheets was a revision of his compositions as well, a remarkable proof is given by Jahn, in the following words, when treating of the Violin Concerto, Op. 61:—

"Beethoven wrote this concerto for the clever violinist, Clement, as is proved by the jocular title of the manuscript: 'Concerto per clemenza pour Clement primo violino a Direttore al teatro a Vienna dal L. V. Beethoven, 1806.' Clement played the concerto for the first time at his benefit concert on the 23d December 1806. Now, the autographic score displays a three-fold version of the solo-part. In the proper place in the score, it is written down as Beethoven conceived it. He was so far acquainted with the mechanical requirements of stringed instruments as to be able to judge of practicability and effect in certain cases; but an accomplished virtuoso has a standard of judgment, obtained by varied practical experience, with regard to the employment of a special means for a special object, and, when his own playing is concerned, he has also scruples and wishes arising from his own particular professional position. It is evident that, previously to its performance, Beethoven subjected the concerto to a strict revision, discussing it with Clement. The latter communicated his views as to what struck him as unthankful generally, or simply in reference to his own playing, together with suggestions for alterations. In conformity with these suggestions, the solo part is written in a separate line, and in a new form, under the score. This new form exhibits throughout consideration for the practical violinist, desirous of producing the greatest effects with all the certainty possible, that is to say: by the most convenient practical means, best adapted to the nature of the instrument and his own style of play. That Beethoven gave way so far to Clement is a fresh proof that he thought highly of him, and, as thus changed, the concerto was, probably performed. When, however, he was about to publish it, Beethoven hesitated accepting as good all Clement's new readings; and, therefore, wrote another line over the score, a third version, reproducing in part the original ideas; making use, in part, of the second version, and introducing quite fresh alterations. We might certainly have our doubts as to which is really the proper version; but since we possess the edition—printed under Beethoven's own supervision, and corrected by himself, and as this edition follows the last version mentioned—it is no longer doubtful that this is the form finally adopted by him—and that the other versions can only lay claim to an historical interest."

The energy with which the new edition is pushed forward is unexampled in the case of so voluminous a work. Of the 264 numbers constituting the whole, 212 have appeared within two years. Among them we have for orchestra the first eight Symphonies, the "Battle of Victoria" and the Egmont music, the eleven overtures complete, the Violin-Concerto; the Violin Quintets, Quartets and Trios; the Pianoforte Concertos with Orchestra (with Beethoven's cadences subjoined); the Music for the Piano with accompaniment, and for the Piano alone—all complete. Christus am Oelberge and the opera of Fidelio have also appeared. We have never before known an instance of such rapidity in publishing. It is, in conjunction with the admirable getting-up, of itself a great recommendation of the new edition, which, if, moreover, we take into consideration its internal superiority, will indisputably rank above all other editions ever issued.

A Plea for Sensational Writing.

SHAKESPEARE FROM THE ANTI-SENSATIONAL CRITIC'S POINT OF VIEW.

Contemporary criticism has recently been deformed by a species of cant, which, originating as cant generally does, in a sincere feeling on the part of a few, has been echoed by the many simply because it is an effective cry. If any one writes a novel, a play, or a poem, which relates anything out of the ordinary experience of the most ordinary people—some tragedy of love or revenge, some strange (though, not impossible) combination of events, or some romance of guilt and misery—he is straightway met with a loud exclamation of "Sensational!" This foolish word has become the orthodox stone for flinging at any heretic author who is bold enough to think that life has its tremendous passes of anguish and crime, as well as its little joys and little sorrows—its strange adventures and vicissitudes, as well as its daily progress from Brixton to the Bank, and from the Bank back again to Brixton; and who holds that the more vividly-colored part of the grouping is as legitimate a subject for artistic treatment as the more drab-hued section.

But the anti-sensational critic will tell you that, if you would write a novel or a play that is to be read by any one with taste superior to those of a butcher-boy, you must confine yourself strictly to the common events of common lives, have nothing whatever to say to any of the extremes of passion or of action, leave murder to the penny papers, be ignorant of suicide, have no idea that there are dark shadows in the world, and shun a mystery as you would the measles. In short, let Brixton be your standard, the Alps being among Nature's "spasms," and therefore very improper subjects for respectable authors.

Moreover, in relating the even tenor of Brixtonian existence, be careful that you are never betrayed into any emotion of style—any throb or pulse of passion in your language, any glow of description or rapid development of action—on pain of being taken to task for having shown "hectic" and "feverish" symptoms. When you have fulfilled all the conditions, then will the organs of Brixtonian criticism smile on you, and declare that you have composed "a very sweet, natural, unaffected and thoroughly healthy tale, inexpressibly refreshing in these days of exaggerated sentiment and spasmodic plot."

The writer supposes an opponent to what is called sensational fiction to be criticizing a work by Shakespeare supposed to be just published. And he puts the following in the mouth of the anti-sensational critic:—

Macbeth. A Tragedy. By William Shakespeare. Mr. Shakespeare is really becoming an intolerable nuisance, which it behooves all critics who have at heart the dignity, or even the decency, of letters, to abate by the exercise of a wholesome severity. He has no idea of tragedy, apart from the merest horrors of melo-drama.

In his "Orhella," a blackamoosmothers his wife on the stage, under a preposterous delusion of jealousy encouraged by a gentlemanly "Memphistophiles" of his acquaintance, and then stabs himself with a hectoring speech when he finds out his mistake. In King Lear, the accumulation of frightful and revolting atrocities is something almost beyond belief. "Lear" is supposed to have occupied the throne of Britain in some remote epoch beyond the dawn of authentic history. On account of a very natural and becoming answer made him by one of his daughters, he disowns her, and afterward, for some insufficient reason, pronounces a curse upon another daughter, expressed in such frightful language that we must forbear from making any further allusion to the subject. Then he goes on to a death in a storm, and curses things in general, his Bedlamite ravings being varied (such are Mr. Shakespeare's notions of good taste) by the ribald jokes of a court fool, whose inanities are evidently addressed to the gallery. Another character assumes to be an idiot, and with hideous jibbering makes up a pretty trio. Finally, the old king finds out that his disowned daughter is a very good girl after all, and when she has met her death by some unlucky circumstance (as improbable and horrible as other incidents of the play), he brings the corpse on to the stage in his arms, 'howls' over it, like a mourner at an Irish wake—literally 'howls,' in good, downright fashion—and presently gives up the ghost, to the great relief of the reader. Besides these agreeable incidents, there is a good deal of slaughtering, and one nobleman tears out another nobleman's eyes (at the instigation of two princesses), and 'sots his foot' on one of them!—Hamlet—which a toadying clique whom Mr. Shakespeare had gathered about him effort to regard as a work of profound philosophy and superhuman wisdom—is equally full of absurd and shocking incidents.

We have the ghost of a murdered king; his murderous brother who succeeds him on the throne; a queen who marries her brother-in-law; a crack-brained young prince (whose state of mind would make him a fitting subject for a commission de lunatico inquirendo); a manning old gentleman whom "Hamlet" stabs as he listens behind the arras (one of the few reasonable things he does in the whole five acts); and a young lady who goes mad, and after doddling about with straw in her hair, singing songs that are not over delicate, drowns herself by accident in a horse pond.

In the last scene of this hideous burlesque of nature and probability, the "Queen" ("Hamlet's" mother) dies by a poisoned cup of wine; the king is stabbed, and "Hamlet" and an enemy of his kill each other with a poisoned foil while they are fencing. As only one of the foils is poisoned, and it is necessary to the climax that both should die at once, the two combatants contrive by some sleight-of-hand which is quite beyond our comprehension, to exchange the weapon without meaning it. But a writer who forever aims at startling effects must, of necessity, pile up the agonies in his concluding scene; and this agglomeration of fantastic crimes will the less astonish the reader, when he learns that in one scene "Hamlet" reviles his own mother in the most dreadful manner, and in another utters profane jokes in a churchyard while his sweetheart's grave is being dug, and tosses skulls about the stage! So fond is Mr. Shakespeare of death in its most revolting forms, that even his love-story of Romeo and Juliet is full of slaughtering and poisoning; while his very comedies have generally some smack of the gallows in them.

We do not wish to be unfair on Mr. Shakespeare. He is not devoid of a certain ability, which might be turned to a very reputable account if he only understood his own powers better. He has a good deal of native humor—exaggerated, indeed, to the pitch of burlesque, but undoubtedly amusing; and he possesses some knowledge of the superficial parts of character, though, being evidently no scholar, he is often ridiculously vulgar in his would-be representations of gentlemen. He would do well as a writer of farces and show-pieces; but his injudicious friends have flattered him into the belief that he is a great tragic poet; and hence the gory nonsense of this new drama, Macbeth, of which we now proceed to give some account.

The scene is laid in Scotland, during the reign of one "Duncan," of whom English readers know little and care less. The play opens in good melo-dramatic (or rather pantomimic) fashion, with a dark scene, thunder rolling and lightning flashing, and three witches talking gibberish in rhyme. Were this last monstrosity of Mr. Shakespeare's fancy ever to be played at any theatre (which however, is quite impossible), we can easily imagine the low, tremulous murmuring of fiddles to which the curtain would rise. Scene I. however, does not last above a minute, as it only consists of eight short lines. The second scene introduces us to the old king, "Duncan," to whom a "bleeding soldier" relates the progress of an insurrection which has just been quelled by the valor of "Macbeth."

In scene III. we return to thunder, witches, and gibberish. One of the old women compares herself to "a rat without a tail" and threatens to drain a certain mariner as "dry as hay," which induces us to suppose that she must be a skittle-sharper in disguise, since the draining of sailors is generally effected by those ingenious practitioners. Presently "Macbeth" comes in from the wars, and the witches hail him as Thane of Glamis, Thane of Cawdor, and future King of Scotland. Thane of Glamis he is already, but to be Thane of Cawdor and King of Scotland seems to this worthy gentleman beyond the reach of thought.

However, somebody comes in shortly afterward, and tells "Macbeth" that, the Thane of Cawdor being a traitor, the title has been transferred to the putter-down of traitors. This sets "Macbeth" plotting how he may become a traitor on his own account, and secure the crown for himself. He has a bold, bad woman for his wife—a strong-minded woman, who gives us to understand that she will stick at nothing to satisfy her ambition. In very plain language, she invokes all the devils of the neiter regions to take possession of her soul, which we dare say they were not slow in doing.

We have too much respect for our readers to reproduce the dreadful things uttered by this she dragon, perhaps, the most unnatural character that even Mr. Shakespeare's lurid and unhealthy imagination has ever conceived. Suffice it to say that she eggs on her husband to murder "Duncan," which, after a good deal of hesitation (proceeding rather from cowardice than conscience), and some idiotic ravings about an "air drawn dagger," which he then describes as being "spotted with gout of blood," he accomplishes in the dead of night, and lays the blame on the king's sleeping attendants. Afterward he kills these attendants to conceal his own guilt, and in the next act we find him king.

But "Macbeth," fearing that the crown will in time come to one "Banquo" and his son "Fleance," commissions "two murderers" to make away with those individuals. There is something so homicidal and Newgate-Calendarish about Mr. Shakespeare's mind, that he seems actually to have persuaded himself that there was at one time in Scotland a set of men who followed murder as a trade or profession, and to whom people applied in the ordinary course of business whenever they wished to get rid of an inconvenient rival, while feeling too squeamish or too dignified to do the work for themselves. The men in question have no names, but are simply described as "First Murderer" and "Second Murderer." Our Scottish brethren are never slow to resist an insult to their country, and we therefore confidently leave in their hands the chastisement of Mr. Shakespeare's ignorant impertinence. Well, the murderers despatch "Banquo," but manage to let "Fleance" escape; and in a subsequent scene we have "Macbeth," his queen, and their courtiers, seated at a banquet, at which the ghost of "Banquo" makes his appearance with "gory locks," and sits down to table, as if he had designs upon the meat and drink. This unlooked-for visitor greatly alarms the tyrant, who "makes faces" at the spectre, fumes at him, and remarks that, inasmuch as he can "nod" (which seems a strange occupation for a phantom), he may as well "speak too." The "Ghost" prudently declines to give tongue (in this respect more merciful than the "Ghost" of "Hamlet's" father, who is cruelly verbose); and "Macbeth" laments his liability to such visitations in this graceful and feeling manner:—

The times have been
That when the brains were out, the man would die,
And there an end; but now they rise again,
With twenty mortal murders on their crowns,
And push us from our stools.

We have no wish to invade the sanctities of private life; but we have heard that Mr. Shakespeare's father was a butcher, and we can certainly very readily believe that the son was brought up in a slaughter-house, and thus acquired a practical knowledge of what commonly results after "the brains are out," as well as a tendency to delight in sanguinary subjects.

In Act IV. we discover the three witches in a gloomy cavern, preparing a "hell broth" in a large cauldron. The filthy and disgusting ingredients of this broth are inflicted on the reader with abominable minuteness; for nothing is too nasty for Mr. Shakespeare's Muse.

However, it does not appear that the broth, or "gruel"—for it is described by both words—is intended for consumption, but only for conjuration. Macbeth having entered to consult the witches, "an armed head," "a bloody child," and "a child, crowned with a tree in his hand" (query, a Christmas tree?) rise out of the cauldron, as birds, bouquets, and bonbons emerge from the magic hat of M. Robin or Herr Frikell. These apparitions address "Macbeth" in some highly ambiguous language, and then follows a vision of eight kings, "the last with a glass in his hand," which is unpleasantly suggestive of the Cider Cellars at four o'clock in the morning. After this cavernous scene we are transported to the castle of "Lady Macduff," where the murderers come in again, stab a son of her ladyship, and pursue the mother, who makes her exit, crying "Murder!", and we are afterward given to understand that she and all her young ones and servants are slaughtered.

Then comes a little breathing space between Acts IV. and V.; but no sooner is the drop scene up for the last division, than we are introduced to "Lady Macbeth" walking in her sleep, muttering about the murder of "Duncan," (which by this time has been almost borne out of her remembrance by the flood of later catastrophes,) feigning to wash her hands, informing us that "hell is murky," and remarking that no one would have "thought the old man to have had so much blood in him!"

The catastrophe now fast approaches, and we may hurry on to it with little ceremony. The queen dies (off the stage, we are happy to say), and, an insurrection being got up against the usurper, "Macbeth" is slain, after a terrific combat with "Macduff," who cuts off his head (behind the scenes), and brings it in "on a pole!" Mutual congratulation, flourish, and curtain falls.

And this stuff is called a tragedy! Why, it is a rank melo-drama, of the old Cobourg fashion. Mr. Shakespeare is behind his time. Twenty years ago, in the days of Hicks and "Winsunt," he would have been a powerful rival to the authors who supplied the late Mr. Osbaldistone with the dramas of the New Cut. But even the most uneducated audiences have not outgrown such vulgar horrors. Does Mr. Shakespeare imagine for one moment that any theatre in London or the provinces would produce such a play as this Macbeth?

It would be hissed off the boards before the end of the first act. And even should it obtain a temporary success, would not posterity explode with laughter at such a specimen of the literature of the epoch?—if, indeed, posterity cared to trouble itself at all about Mr. Shakespeare and his writings. The best advice we can give this gentleman is to turn a deaf ear to his flatterers, and endeavor, if possible, to compose something quieter, simple and natural. Though it is forbidden the genius of our nation and our language to produce an Æschylus, we may at least emulate his good taste in removing murder from the stage; and though we may never be able to scale the heights of moral grandeur familiar to the intellect of Sophocles, we can at any rate refrain from outraging decency and sense. We say to Mr. Shakespeare in plain language:—"This will not do. You may think it very fine, and fools may be found to tell you so; but however rough our speech, we are your true friends, and we repeat that it won't do!"

The Modern Orchestra.

In the earlier part of the eighteenth century, FRANCIS BLUDA, of Berlin, and other composers, added to the stringed quartet then in use parts for oboes and horns; thereby forming the rudiments of the Modern Orchestra. They probably but little anticipated that the wind instruments so modestly introduced by them here and there as a support to the "strings" in unison, would in course of time, augmented in numbers, and fortified by improvements in their mechanism, usurp the "place of power," and become masters of the situation. By increasing the number of parts, and by the employment of additional instruments, HAYDN and MOZART developed the rudimentary band into that elaborate whole, still recognized as the natural means of exposition for the highest plans of ideas. To the present day it is to be found but little change in its composition, and only such variations of proportion as may be induced by the amount of resources at command, or some speciality in the music to be performed. Among the obvious results of the improvements effected by these distinguished musicians, may be mentioned:—variety of tone: effects of contrast; a great augmentation of the power of producing light and shade; increased sonority; and a means for the simultaneous reduplication of concords at various degrees of the scale.

In this gradual introduction of available new instruments it does not seem to have been intended so much to improve the orchestral ensemble as to benefit by the scope and diversity they offered for passage writing. The number of each class of instruments adopted was decided by the most effective manner of employing them, and they were grouped in pairs, in threes, and in fours, as the case might be, apparently without any special reference to the strict proportion they bore to the rest of the band. Widely differing in sonority, power of penetration, and volume of tone, it follows that in their combination in "tutti" passages, certain of them must be much more prominent than others, unless good taste and judicious reticence are exhibited by the performers on the louder instruments. No one supposes the trumpet to be as important an instrument in the orchestra as the hautboy, and yet, whilst the tone of the trumpet is tenfold more potent than that of the hautboy, they are used in equal proportions. Again, the power of the three trombones is infinitely greater than that of the four horns, notwithstanding that the latter are almost indispensable to a grand composition, whilst the former may very well be omitted.

It would seem to follow then, that in this very expansion of orchestral organization, which rendered possible the existence of symphony, the grand opera and the sinfonia-cantata—in a word, the works of the great masters—was to be found a source of danger to legitimate musical effect. On the part of the performers was rendered possible a distortion of true proportion, by giving undue prominence to parts which should be heard but as components of a blended whole. To the composer was opened the temptation to hide incompetence by noise; to substitute meretricious clamor for novelty of invention, and grandeur of effect. To greatly augment the number of "strings" was the first step found necessary towards the preservation of the balance of power; and it may be said that the most efficient orchestra, ceteris paribus, is that which contains the largest number of violins. Among the wood wind instruments are to be found certain peculiarities of sound, which save them, to some extent, from being readily overpowered by the more potential "brass": such as power of penetration, richness of tone, acuteness of pitch, and a disposition to stand out in a sort of isolation from the general mass of sound. Notwithstanding this augmentation of the strings and other modifying influences alluded to, the auditor of the Modern Orchestra is compelled to admit that the "tutti" are but too generally converted into a series of solos for certain powerful instruments accompanied subalternately by a full band. The intelligible and coherent whole is broken up into a chaos by the terrible blasts of trumpets and trombones, aided by unparrying flagellation of the instruments of percussion, to the destruction of all legitimate effect. Unimportant details are forced upon the auditory as substitutes for the primary musical ideas, lost and swamped in the melée.

It is not pretended that this is a new source of complaint, but it is one every day calling more loudly for reformation, and one for which there is daily less excuse. The letter is not yet forgotten which MENDELSSOHN addressed to a musical journal, on the subject of trombone playing, in which he deprecated loudness, and advocated the development of the beautiful, smooth tone of the instrument. This composer, following the example of BEETHOVEN, in justice to his music wrote very sparingly for these instruments, except on especial occasions, and often omitted them altogether. In the scores of BEETHOVEN are to be found passages, given to the third and fourth horns, which he feared to entrust to the tender mercies of the trombones.

It is in our opera houses that the want of delicacy in the use of wind instruments, and the overpowering weight of the brass, are most felt, and are most objectionable. Whole vocal passages are at times altogether inaudible, while delicacy of vocalization and purity of intonation are lost or perilled in the almost hopeless endeavors of the singers to make themselves heard. Time was when England could produce but one first-class orchestra, and it was urged in defence of this reprehensible state of things, that, so independent were the performers composing it—conscious that their services could hardly be dispensed with—that no conductor could venture to animadvert freely upon want of delicacy and errors of excess on the part of his band. It is not so now. There is in this kingdom an abundant supply of first-class instrumentalists, and it is time that conductors who aim at any thing like excellence should impress upon their orchestral players the fact that they are but component parts of the whole, to which they should consider their individual performance strictly subordinate; further, that any attempt at prominence as flautists, oboists, cornetists, or what-not, to the detriment of the general effect, is a reflection upon themselves as artists; a slight not only to the understanding of the audience, but to the beautiful art which they follow.

For the rectification of the faults complained of several partial remedies suggest themselves—the first and most obvious, greater moderation on the part of performers; on the part of composers—greater discretion in scoring for powerful brass instruments—the substitution for trombones of other suitable brass instruments; last, and most desirable, although least practicable, further augmentation of the "strings." This proposition is a project difficult of realization, as involving considerations of the means and amount of space at disposal, and, with matters of a similar character, must be left for future exposition on a future occasion. Some years ago, a small orchestra, organized by a Hungarian violinist, visited England, and although this small band had neither flutes, oboes, bassoons, French horns, nor trumpets in its composition, yet was its performance of overtures, etc., listened to with delight by connoisseurs. Six flügel horns here represented the family of brass instruments so worthily as to leave but little cause for regret at the absence of those more familiar. At the worst, then, if no other means offer, trombones and trumpets, excellent as they are when judiciously used, may be superseded.

—Orchestra.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, APRIL 30, 1864

"Sensation" Works.—Truth—Genius.—Shakspeare.

We have transferred to our columns an article from some English paper, which we have found copied elsewhere, entitled "A Plea for Sensational Writing," which undertakes to expose the fallacy and cant of "anti-sensational criticism" by imagining it applied to Macbeth and the other terrible tragedies of Shakspeare. Such a plea may "create a sensation," momentarily, in foolish minds, but it will plant no conviction in the deeper soil of sound thought and artistic feeling. The question is one of the vital ones in every sphere of Art, and is as unavoidable in Music and in Painting as it is in the Drama and other literary works of fiction. "Sensation" in the bloody melo-drama and the yellow covered novel answers to what in musical criticism is called "effect." It is the resort to ad captandum artifices, where "the vision and the faculty divine," where Art, is wanting. A man like Mendelssohn or Schumann must, by the very law of his own moral and artistic being, bring this charge against the popular "sensation" art of Meyerbeer or Verdi, withholding recognition as jealously as a sovereign free people must withhold it from a robber Emperor in Mexico. It is the serious conscience of the artist or the divinely smitten votary of Art protesting in the name of truth. So when the Great Fair in New York brings together the most imposing famous pictures of a number of our American painters, and there comes at last a critic to whom truth, told in however "sad sincerity," is even sweeter than the personal delight of praising, and who, while gladly recognizing all their skill, their wonderful effects, their clever imitations, their peculiar charm, yet feels the want of truth and loyalty to Nature, and declares that this is not highest Art, that it is only "sensational," it is no wonder that personal feelings and partialities are wounded, that the motives of the critic are suspected and called "venomous;" yet it is possible that the critic may be in the right, and if he stands in a minority of one, it is no more than a Michel Angelo or a Mendelssohn have done, than the true seer often must do, in the face of many an outward success and fashion of his art and time.

Now we quote this "Plea" and this mock criticism of Shakespeare partly as a convenient text for pointing out certain important distinctions too often confounded in discussions about literature and art, and partly to show how signally it tells against itself. What have you done, O smart sensationist? You have taken one of Shakespeare's genial creations and paraphrased it into a sensation story after your own vulgar, unimaginative method. You could do that, undoubtedly; you are at home in blood and thunder; but do not say he did it, never shake your gory locks at him! You and the like of you can find the materials for a dozen of your sensation plays in Macbeth; but the question is: Did Shakespeare make a sensation play of it, or was he capable of a mere "sensation" work in the offensive sense in which the word has hitherto with too much reason been applied? The collective judgment of the thinking world has long since answered No. Your mistake is in supposing that the sensational materials of "Macbeth" contain the secret of its power, when you should seek it in the genius and the great humanity of Shakespeare. And now for our distinctions.

1. We do not condemn a novel, a play, or a poem as "sensational" because it may relate to something "out of the ordinary experience," because it deals with thrilling incidents of crime or murder—"most foul and unnatural," or with passions swift and terrible as lightning, or with supernatural imaginings. With all these it may deal, and so deal as to escape the charge entirely; witness Shakespeare. The term never was suggested by the simple use of such materials, but by the use of them in the wrong time and manner and by the wrong person, that is without the warrant of genius, of the imaginative power which can divine and set forth (or embody) their essential humanity, and set the seal and charm of nature upon the seemingly unnatural. That is a "sensation" work, which would mask the want of genius under a startling subject; make harrowing plot and incidents, cheap effects of scenery and costume, &c., supply the place of poetry and subtle development of character. The man who can treat these harrowing subjects well, is he whose genius does not need them, who can find poetry in common life and nature anywhere. So in the art of tones, that is true music which springs from any fine essential musical feeling and idea, whose charm is in its inspiration, which finds its motive rather in itself than in its audience, and was honestly and sincerely born with no anxiety about the largest and the most immediate audience; which does not resort to clap-trap emphasis, or clothe itself in borrowed pomp of instrumentation and all sorts of ambitious accessories, which add nothing to its essential meaning, not being originally prompted and developed from within. "Sensation" music scores itself out with ringing complement of brass, or hides its poverty in dazzling pyrotechnic variations, or affects intensity of passion by all the approved operatic bursts and intensities of accent, "roaring like any nightingale," simply because, stripped of such lion's skin, reduced to its musical substance, it would sing so lamentably small. These means, which genius uses by divine right so well, the uninspired and would-be popular composer borrows and uses them without the genius.

2. It is not the want of subject, but the want of genial treatment, that exposes a "thrilling story" or play to the charge of being "sensational." And we like to use the word genial in the German sense, as derived from genius. A genial poet is simply one whose poetry is poetry, and not mean prose, such as no plot however "out of the common," no startling images, no tricks of rhyme or swelling diction can redeem. If a writer or an artist always resorts to startling subjects, as Signor Verdi does, confessing his muse powerless to charm or produce "effect" within the bounds of Nature, or to find any poetry or music in what is near and common, he is of the sensation school in the worst sense. But a Shakespeare or a Mozart, able to interest with gentler themes and fond of them, can also handle tales of blood and passion, with such art as to make them not only sublime and terribly fascinating, but sweet and genial, and full of the sunshine and fruitfulness and charm of nature at the same time. True art, true genius never leaves out nature; deeds "foul and most unnatural" it still treats naturally; your "sensationist" can treat nothing naturally, and therefore takes to unnatural subjects; he is nothing if he is not monstrous.

3. The objection to "sensation" literature or art, therefore, is not that it makes a sensation in the world, or in its own little theatre, but that it contents itself with this, does not approve itself to the solitary thought of the best minds, does not sink into the deeper consciousness and culture of the age, cannot afford to wait to be understood and appreciated. It astonishes but does not edify. It adds nothing to our knowledge of the human soul; its lurid fireworks hide the heavens and the stars. It lacks the sincerity, the humanity, the simplicity as well as the subtlety of genius. Its tragedy is arbitrary, far-fetched, superfluous, its arts meretricious, its effect for the moment only and upon the surface, and its appeal is to a green or vulgar audience.

4. The motive of "sensation" art is mean and mercenary. It is principally self-advertisement.

It is the art of Autolycus, the peddler. Not only does it advertise its own wares, it is itself nothing but advertisement. It serves the vulgar god of trade, even though it trade upon its own account. The art of advertising, in newspapers, pamphlets, show bills, and so forth, is one of the great features of this trade phase of civilization. What clever pens are occupied in it! But it does not end with puffs and advertisements which appear as such; how much of the literature of the day, of the novel and play writing, nay even the lecturing and sermonizing, is, stripped of its disguises, merely advertisement! The same must be confessed of much of the painting and sculpture, of the popular music, of a hundred and one fashionable operas, of the sensation style of singing, &c., &c. Shakespeare wrote for poetry and truth, wrote as the inspiration came, and not to advertise William Shakespeare into notice. So Bach, Mozart, Beethoven wrought; so Titian and Leonardo. Think you, if Verdi were the Shakespeare of musicians and were destined to world-wide recognition as the greatest three hundred years hence, he would now be fashionable? There is plenty of art which has a main eye to business, and which therefore as Art is damnable and vulgar. It makes a sensation for the time being, but all this weighs nothing against one wise man's verdict, nothing while "some dozen men of sense" (as Robert Browning's Bishop Blougram has it):

Withhold their voices though (you) look their way:
Like Verdi when, at his worst opera's end
(The thing they gave at Florence,—what's its name?)
While the mad houseful's plaudits near out-bang
His orchestra of salt-box, tongue and bones,
He looks through all the roaring and the wreaths
Where sits Rossini patient in his stall.

We lack room to connect all this, as we intended, with the remarks we made last week on the meaning of the word "classical" in music. But especially do we mourn our inability to close these hints with fit "improvement" of the anniversary of the past week, the Tercentenary commemoration of SHAKESPEARE, the one example in whom the whole world owns the power of genius, the supremacy of Imagination over all the mental faculties: the infinite worth of that which is poetry and art for all time, compared with every cheap "sensation" of the day;—Shakespeare, in whom all thinking minds may read the shortest and the fullest definition of what constitutes true Art, to-wit: Genius true to itself.

Shakespeare's Day.—Festival Concert.

It was fit that music should bear a part in the honors paid to Shakespeare in the world-wide observance of the three hundredth anniversary of his birthday. The best way would have been the union of genial music with an unusually perfect performance of one of his great plays on the stage. But the times were unfavorable with us his countrymen across the ocean; and it was only by a variety of hasty, fragmentary tributes in our various cities—some of the best in private circles—that this distracted country claimed credit for the will that was better than the deed. An oration here, a dinner there; a Shakespeare play upon the bills of many of the theatres; the laying of the first stone of a monument in the New York Central Park; a German celebration, with Liederkrantz, and Bandmann's "Hamlet," and Nicolai's "Merry Wives" and tableaux by the painters, in Philadelphia;—this was about all, besides the noble concert given in our Boston Music Hall by Mr. B. J. LANG.

Music, it must be owned, has not contributed very richly to the illustration of Shakespeare; nor (one may add) did Shakespeare need it. In England Matthew Locke's "Macbeth" and "Tempest" music—dry and common-place enough—with such little things as a host of glee and song writers have set, at the best only cleverly, without genius, is all. Beethoven composed one masterly overture (to Coriolanus), but has not done for Shakespeare what he did for Goethe's Egmont. He left that to Mendelssohn, whose musical interludes and accompanying phrases to the "Mid-summer Night's Dream" are as entirely unique as they are true in art, forming (as Schumann said) "a bridge between Bottom and Oberon, without which the passage into Fairy Land is almost impossible." Schubert, who turned poets of all times and countries into song, composed "Hark, the Lark," with exquisite genius. For the rest we have only a beggarly account of third and tenth rate operas, which borrow plots and characters (names) from Shakespeare, but have nothing in their music in the least akin to him. Verdi's Macbeth, heaven save the mark!; a better opera called Macbeth, but of the effective, showy order, by Taubert of Berlin; Nicolai's "Merry Wives of Windsor," sparkling, pretty music, but the absurdity of Falstaff singing!—Rossini's Otello, which of course does not lack Rossini's genius; and finally "Much Ado about Nothing" operated by Berlioz. We have also heard a "Hamlet" overture by Gade, which by any other name would sound as sweet, and a noisy one called "Lear" by Berlioz. What could we expect? Music is its own world; the Bachs and Beethovens and Mozarts had their own work to do, their own inspirations to follow, as well as Shakespeare, and some day one or more of these will be confessed as widely.

Mr. LANG made the best choice possible in his selection of music. First, the "Midsummer Night's Dream" music entire—all but the little snatches that go with the action—including the Overture; the Scherzo, introducing Act II. and the fairies; the "Lullaby" Duet: "Ye Spotted Snakes" and fairy chorus; the Intermezzo, in which Hermia seems to pursue her lover through the tangled wood; the lovely Nocturne; the "Wedding March," and the Finale, song and chorus of fairies blessing the house. The solos were beautifully given by Miss HOUSTON and Mrs. CARY; the choruses were sung by a large choir of the freshest and best voices in the city, and the Orchestra, under CARL ZERRAHN, played with more than usual delicacy and spirit, to the credit of themselves and of Mr. LANG's conductorship.

Beethoven's Coriolanus Overture, in which a proud and fiery spirit storms itself away so grandly, is one of his best, and quite in the vein of the play. But the feast was more of Mendelssohn than of Shakespeare, and was, indeed, originally intended for the first of May, the revival of the Cantata composed to Goethe's "First Walpurgis Night," so admirably brought out by Mr. LANG two years ago, being a main feature. This formed the second part, and was given (we are told) not quite so successfully as before, at least in one or two of the solo parts, although in general it is much praised. The audience was immense, and the enthusiasm great, and Mr. LANG's good services will be remembered.

Concerts.

We have room only to recall some features of the music of the past two or three weeks. Perhaps the pleasantest thing that rises in the memory is the little Concert, twice given to an invited audience, by the Amateur Singing Club, under the direction of Mr. J. C. D. PARKER, at Chickering's rooms. Rare is the charm of choice choruses and part-songs sung by twenty or thirty fresh, refined young voices. The ensemble of tone, as well as the execution, was admirable. We had the entire 95th Psalm ("O come let us worship"), by Mendelssohn, a noble work, interspersed with interesting solos, in one of which a new tenor, Mr. MERRILL, made his mark, as he has since done still more effectually in the "Walpurgis Night." There were also half a dozen four-part songs, by Schumann, Mendelssohn, Hauptmann, Gade, and one fresh and charming one by Mr. Parker, which were keenly relished. Nor can we forget the truly womanlike and exquisite singing by Mrs. HARWOOD of a couple of songs: "Supplication" by Frauz, and "Faded Flowers" by Schubert.—Some of the noblest and least familiar choruses from Elijah followed, with tenor air: "Then shall the righteous shine," given with fine taste and fervor by Mr. LANGMAID. Finally, a notable rarity, Beethoven's splendid choruses to Goethe's little poem:—"Becalmed at sea and happy voyage" ("Meeresstille," etc.), which was printed in this journal some years since, and ought ere this to have found its way into singing club and concert rooms.

The same place was the scene of the first performance of Bennett's "May Queen" Cantata, by a choir of singers, with piano accompaniment, under the direction of Mr. HENRY CARTER, preceded by a miscellaneous first part. The whole seemed a basket of green fruit. At least the chorus singing was unripe, voices harsh and out of tune, especially in the opening part-song. A chant-like simple song of Mr. CARTER's, "Rose's Bride," in which two lugubrious lines of solo: "O dig a grave and dig it deep," are echoed in each stanza by a quartet in harmony, was quite impressive, if not cheerful. The "May Queen" has some fine music in it, and is always refined, though sometimes tedious and faint in its impression. The solos were generally well sung by Mrs. R. M. SMITH as the May Queen, Miss A. L. CARY as the Queen, Mr. L. H. WHITNEY, tenor, as the lover, and Mr. J. KIMBALL, basso, as Robin Hood. For a fair chance of effect we think this music needs an orchestra, and we understand there is a prospect that it will so be given in one of the Wednesday Afternoon Concerts. Mrs. Smith, a new singer to us, commended herself by the purity and beauty of her soprano voice, and her chaste style of singing. Still more so in the last "Gala Matinee" of the Orchestral Union, in the Boston Theatre, where she sang, "Hear ye Israel," with orchestra, with such truth of intonation and of feeling as we do not very often hear. That Concert was also notable by the revival of Beethoven's wonderful Overture (No. 3) to "Leonora." Liszt's "Preludes," and the Semiramide overture also came up again.

Last Wednesday the concert was again in the Music Hall, and of uncommon interest from the higher point of view, since, besides the Leonora overture, it offered us for the first time in many years Schumann's remarkable first Symphony, in B flat. It did not go so smoothly as it will the next time, and we will say no more of it to day except to advise every lover of great orchestral music to hear it. There are very few things indeed which come so near to Beethoven. There were Strauss waltz and Gounod Potpourri, by force of habit; and Mr. THAYER played on the Great Organ, with much pedal execution, some concert Variations by Hesse, and his own Offertoire, for Vox Humana, which is cleverly enough contrived, the end being to gratify curiosity about that "fancy" stop.

The aforesaid Vox Humana Offertoire also figured in two Organ Concerts given by Mr. Thayer last Saturday afternoon and Sunday evening. The very miscellaneous programme of the former was saved by the great Toccata in D minor by Bach and the third Sonata of Mendelssohn. And the latter, one of the concerts called "Sacred," had other things well enough in their way, but nothing interesting in comparison with the Toccata in F by Bach. We are glad that Mr. Thayer exercises his power on such noble organ works as these, and so successfully; since Mr. Paine, we have not heard them so well rendered. The March of Priests from Athalie, and the great March Finale of the Fifth Symphony, which the organist brought out very powerfully, began and closed the concert. The "Cantabile, L'arco et Prière" by Wely, is one of the most expressive pieces we have heard of the French organ music. What else? Concert Variations on "the American (!) National Hymn" (God save the King) were particularly "sacred." (De la musique sacrée? or De la sacrée musique? as Rossini wittily expressed his modest doubt about his own new Mass). There was some good solo singing. Schubert's "Serenade" was not sung; it is a love song to be sure, and not strictly "sacred," but much more so than the flat and sentimental ditty, to pious words, which Mr. WHEELER substituted for it, and which the pious audience found so edifying that they insisted on its repetition. But then, too, Beethoven's Contralto Aria Per pietà, so finely sung by Mrs. Cary, is also a love song, conceived in the Italian operatic style, and that was sung! Far worthier of the time, the place and Mr. Wheeler was the tenor song from Elijah: "Then shall the righteous." There was also a duet by Spohr, and an Ave Maria (contralto) by Bassini. All the songs were with piano-forte accompaniment by Mr. Hamann.

The BOSTON MOZART CLUB (amateur orchestra) had their fourth and last social entertainment of the season last Monday evening, and treated their friends to a remarkably good programme, including: The first Symphony of Beethoven; Mendelssohn's overture "Return from Atrid"; a piano-forte Concerto, with orchestra, in D minor, by Mozart, played by "an honorary lady member of the Club" (Miss Mary Fay); transcription of Schubert's "Serenade," and the overture to Don Giovanni. These amateurs set their standard high and make earnest efforts to reach it. They play together more and more like artists.

WHAT NEXT? This Afternoon, the usual Organ Concert in the Music Hall.

This evening, same place, a concert by that true singer, one of the world's best contraltos, and great favorite here, Miss ADELAIDE PHILLIPS. The first in four years; will it not be pleasant to hear her! She will have distinguished assistance too. Mme. GUERRABELLA, who has been singing in Havana with her; her own sister, Miss M. PHILLIPS, a pupil of Sig. Bendelari; Mr. LANG, who will play the D minor Concerto of Mendelssohn; and Mr. ZERRAHN with his Orchestra.

Tomorrow evening, a "Sacred," that is to say a Sunday Concert in the Music Hall by that excellent musician, JULIUS EICHBERG, who has composed for the occasion several pieces for Violin, Violoncello, Piano and Organ. Two Organ pieces will be played by Mr. LANG; two soprano songs will be sung by Miss HOUSTON, and two baritone songs by Mr. SCHRAUBSTAEDTER.

Next Wednesday Afternoon, the ORCHESTRAL UNION will repeat the Schumann Symphony, and Mr. JOHN K. PAINE will play two pieces on the Organ.

Next Sunday Evening, the last Oratorio of the season, and one of the best, "Elijah," which the HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY always set about with zeal and which always is inspiring to the audience. Chorus, Orchestra and Great Organ will combine in the grand ensembles, and the array of solo singers is uncommonly rich. ADELAIDE PHILLIPS will sing the contralto airs; Miss HOUSTON and Mrs. SMITH the soprano parts; Mr. WHEELER the tenor, Mr. RUDOLPHSEN the bass. CARL ZERRAHN will conduct.

ST. LOUIS, MO. The Philharmonic Society gave its sixth concert on the 21st. The overture to Semiramide, the entire "Spring" from Haydn's "Seasons," and a flute solo formed the first part; the second included Beethoven's first Symphony; an aria for contralto, "The Whippoorwill," by E. Karst; a Polonaise from Meyerbeer's Struensee, and the everlasting March and Soldiers' Chorus from Gounod's "Faust," which one hopes the hand-organs will grind up this summer until there is nothing left of it.

HARTFORD, CONN. On the sixth inst. the Mendelssohn Quintette Club (of Boston) gave a concert at the Female Seminary, under the auspices of Messrs. Buck and Wilson, the well known organists of the place. They played a Quintet by Beethoven, with selections from Haydn and Mendelssohn, popular arrangements from Rossini, Meyerbeer, &c. ending with the Soldiers' Chorus from "Faust."

NEW YORK.—Among the manifold contributions of the musical art to the great Fair, which has given a million dollars to the Sanitary Commission, was a performance of Handel's oratorio "Judas Maccabæus." No musical work could be more timely during this war; it has the true ring of heroic patriotism. It was given at the Metropolitan Fair building, in Union Square, under the direction of Mr. Franz Ritter, with Miss Brainard as principal soprano, Mrs. Motte contralto, Mr. Geary tenor, and Mr. J. R. Thomas bass. Mr. Bristow "presided at the piano;" hence we infer that there was no orchestra, Otto Dresel's "Army Hymn" (words by Dr. Holmes, music not, as some of the N.Y. papers had it, "by O. Dresel"), was performed at the inauguration of the Fair in grand style, by a picked chorus of 200 voices and the famous 7th Regiment Band, for which it had been instrumented by Carl Bergmann. The opening ceremonies of the Union Square department, later, also included a concert by the "German Liederkranz." The programme was as follows:

- |  |                  |
|--|------------------|
| 1. Overture—"Der Freyschütz."              | C. M. Von Weber. |
| 2. "Der Frohe Wandersmann."                | Mendelssohn.     |
| 3. Grand Duet on one Violin.               | Paganini.        |
| 4. "Hymne an die Musik."                   | Mendelssohn.     |
| 5. Overture—"The Merry Wives of Windsor."  | Niccolai.        |
| 6. "Fratres Ego," a Capella, for 8 voices. | Palestrina.      |
| 7. Potpourri by the Orchestra.             | R. Wagner.       |
| 8. March, from "Tannhäuser."               |                  |

The season of Italian opera at the Academy of Music closed last week with three more performances of "Faust," and La Traviata for the benefit of Mme. Ortolani Brignoli. On Saturday, Shakespeare's birthday was made the occasion for "a grand gala matinée," when selections from Rossini's Otello were given, besides the entire opera La Sonnambula; the latter suddenly substituted for Nicolai's "Merry Wives of Windsor" on account of the illness of Herr Hermanns. Where was Signor Verdi's Macbeth? Marefzek commences a supplementary season next Monday with the "Huguenots."

PHILADELPHIA. Mr. Carl Gaertner, the violinist, gave a classical soirée on the 16th, assisted by Messrs. Jarvis, Cross, Ruggerburger and Schmitz, and a double quartet of singers. The pieces performed were: Quintet (strings), op. 18, by Mendelssohn; Vocal Quartets by Abt and Möhring, Grand Duo for two pianos by Kalkbrenner; Quintet (strings), op. 29, Beethoven.

"Judas Maccabæus" was performed at the third and last concert of the season, on Wednesday evening, by the Handel and Haydn Society, assisted by the Germania Orchestra.

The Anschütz troupe have given another short season of German Opera, beginning April 18th, at Glover's Chestnut St. Theatre. The pieces have been "Martha," the "Barber of Seville," Gounod's "Faust," "Der Freyschütz," "Merry Wives," &c.,—the last in honor of Shakespeare. The Bulletin says:

The Music Committee of the Great Central Fair are making preparations for a series of operatic and other performances on a grander and more extensive scale than anything ever before attempted in this country. Among the novelties will be a grand new opera by William H. Fry, called Notre Dame, founded on Victor Hugo's novel of that name. The rehearsals and other preparations are going on briskly and with every promise of splendid success. The first performance will take place early in May.

Miss Teresa Carreno, the wonderful little pianist, has given a concert at the Musical Fund Hall, assisted by Mrs. Kempton, the contralto singer.—The petite prima donna, Miss Laura Harris, has had a concert, assisted by Brignoli, Sig. Dragoni (baritone, from Covent Garden Opera), Mr. Pattison, the pianist, and Mollenhauer, violoncellist.

The Shakespeare celebration here was taken in hand by the Germans, this being the programme:

On Friday, April 22d, Schlegel and Tieck's translation of Hamlet will be produced at the Academy of Music by the Anglo-German tragedian, Daniel Bandmann, Esq., assisted by Mme. Methua Scheller and other distinguished German actors of this city and different portions of the country, the Germania Orchestra, under Carl Schütz's leadership, furnishing the music. On Saturday evening, April 23d, the proper anniversary of Shakespeare's birth, the exercises will be especially interesting to Americans, as James E. Murdoch, Esq., will deliver an ode and recite the speeches of Brutus and Marc Antony over the dead body of Caesar. Daniel Bandmann will deliver an original oration in German on Shakespeare, the Germania Orchestra playing selections from Mendelssohn, and the Junge Männerchor singing choruses from Fidelio and Rienzi, the whole exercises interspersed with representations from the life and works of Shakespeare by the German Artists' Club.

All this was realized, except the part to have been taken by Mr. Murdoch, who was ill. The net proceeds go to the Sanitary Commission.

WORCESTER, MASS. The Spy speaks of a choice and classical entertainment given last week at Mr. Sumner's music rooms, under the auspices of Mr. B. D. Allen.

A symphony in B flat by Haydn, and sonata in C by Clementi, piano duos in which Mr. Allen was assisted by two of his talented pupils; and one of Beethoven's sonatas, with solos from the works of Chopin and Heller, performed by Mr. Allen, and that, too, with ability such as few artists can surpass, comprised the instrumental portion. Add to this several charming songs by such composers as Mendelssohn, Glinka, Franz, and Schubert, rendered with superior taste and expression by a lady of high musical culture, and the result was a perfect success.

The new Mass by Mr. C. C. Stearns was to be brought on out Thursday evening. If it deserves half the good things said of it in the Spy and the Palladium, and by writers who commonly have reasons for what they say, its production is as great an event for "the heart of the Commonwealth," as Rossini's new Mass was for Paris.

A little paper, called The Grumbler, in Toronto, Canada, grumbles in this wise about a new "Oratorio" of "Convention"—a psalm-singer Yankee manufacture:

"Eather, the beautiful Queen," an Oratorio—a Yankee Oratorio! Is it possible? Is there no limit to the impertinence of those people? Is there nothing that is high, nothing that is sublime, safe from their degrading influence, from their desecrating finger? Oh! honored shades of Handel, Beethoven, Haydn, and Mendelssohn, is it to be permitted that this insult be offered to an artistic form which has been sanctified by your pens, over which your sublime genius has shed its lustre? Is it to go by unnoticed and unpunished, when such a fabrication is called an Oratorio? Oh! that we could dip our pens into the scornful ink of Swift, that ours were the cutting satire of Thackeray, to lash, with deserved severity, productions of this kind! If Mr. Bradbury, the noble compiler of "Shawms," of "Jubilees," and who knows what else, if he had called this, his miserable attempt, a "Medley," we could have passed it over silently with becoming contempt. A medley it is; and, Oh, ye Muses! what a medley! Let us see. "Come, come away;" "Oft in the still night;" "Fest March;" "Camptown Races;" "Fisherman's glee;" "The Bay of Biscay, O!"; recitatives reminding the listener of the horrible story of "Blue Beard," as told by Sam Cowell; and all these mixed with stirring waltz and quadrille melodies and contorted pifferings from Operas, and explained by readings which remind of the poor limner, who, after finishing his tavern sign and doubtful of its likeness to nature, thought best to write over it, "This is a horse."

Nay, in the name of charity, do not, Oh, ye good people! punish us with such performances! Do not, in pity, lend your voices to such desecrations! If you have a worthy object in view, like the one for which this "pseudo-Oratorio" was performed, give us something, if not good, at least hearable. Your efforts are unworthily bestowed. Turn away from such puerilities.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

For thee, and only thee. (Marietta mine.)

Fred Buckley. 25

A sweet song, in praise of "Marietta."

Little blue-eyed boy. Song. F. Buckley. 30

A nice little home ballad.

The Reaper and the Flowers. Balfe. 50

The words are the well known ones of Longfellow, but acquire a new beauty, when united to the well elaborated music of the talented composer.

Joe Fillet: or Beef, Pork and Mutton.

J. Williams. 35

The market men, and the sturdy butchers, a hitherto musically neglected class, have, at length, something to sing. Joe Fillet, who "led in all" the cries of "Leadenhall" market, has adventures, in his love to charming "Sue, it" seems, which re-veal less than a hundred puns in their narration. Good melody.

How do you like it, Jefferson D? Amos Patten. 30

A capital patriotic comic song, containing a number of queries addressed to the notorious Jeff, the finishing one in each verse being, "How do you like it, as far as you've got?"

Tony Pastor's medley, or the "Cottage by the sea."

30

Tony, who is one of the queerest of geniuses, here makes some curious combinations of song titles, during which "Isabella with the gingham umbrella" and a number of others, find themselves in the "cottage."

Do they pray for me at home? Song and Chorus.

W. O. Fish. 25

Another fine "home" song.

Instrumental Music.

Faust. Fantasie elegante. J. Leybach. 60

Nearly all of the approved composers are having a dash at the great opera. Leybach does as well as the rest, and his fantasie has considerable originality in its arrangement.

Chanson à boire. (Drinking Song). J. Leybach. 50

Somewhat difficult to play gracefully, but when thoroughly learned is quite brilliant.

Faust. Potpourri. G. W. Marks. 1.00

Mark's potpourris from the various operas are famous, and extensively used. This one has some thing quite different from other arrangements, and is very brilliant.

La Perle du Soir. (Pearl of evening). Fantasie mazurka. E. Ketterer. 60

An admirable piece, worthy of being companion to the Pluie de Perles, and others of the same high order. Very graceful and musical. Of medium difficulty.

Books.

CZERNY'S GRAND FINISHING STUDIES. Books 4, 5, and 6. C. Czerny, each $1.00

These studies are not "finishing," in the sense that they are extremely difficult. They are, perhaps, no harder than the Studies of Velocity, by the same author. They contain exercises, very ingeniously combined into pleasing airs, on trills, turns, runs, arpeggios, melodies with accompaniments;—in short, include all kinds of things which are needed to give a person a "finished" touch and execution, in all sorts of passages which are likely to occur in piano pieces.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 603.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MAY 14, 1864.

VOL. XXIV. No. 4.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Half a dozen of Beethoven's Contemporaries.

II. ANTONIO SALIERI.

[Continued from page 226.]

Though Joseph's taste was so decidedly for the Italian Opera Buffa, yet occasionally a serious opera was put upon the stage, and sung by the buffa artists. [I do not see why Holmes (Mozart, p. 50, Amer. Ed.) should use this language, in speaking of events in the winter of 1767-8: "There were no other singers at that time in Vienna; and will it be believed that with such a set they even attempted Gluck's Alceste?" Shall a person of wit and humor never be serious? Should Gluck's Alceste go unsung, because the singers so rarely performed in Opera Seria?] Herr von Gamera had prepared a serious text, "Delmita e Daliso," with choruses and dances, which, only after repeated entreaties, Salieri at last consented to compose. He had little hope that it would succeed; and, though it was his only opera in the year 1776, and therefore not hastily written, his presentiment as to its fate was correct. And yet there were so many good things in it, that Mosel is of opinion its fate was determined by the ridiculous accidents, which occurred during the first performance.

The first scene is a rural amphitheatre, in which a crowd of peasants has assembled to see a wrestling match of shepherds. After the final rehearsal was over, the scene painter had the happy idea of painting into the turf terraces and among the trees a great number of figures, which added greatly to the scenic effect. After the games were over and the victors crowned, the crowd was to disperse leaving the head of the commune—whatever his title, Alcalde, Burgo-master, Mayor, first Selectman or 'Squire—with his two daughters alone. The great man has a secret to impart to them, and begins:

"Or che slam soli, o figlie." (Now we are alone, daughters.)

As he recited these words, and the audience saw the crowd of faces looking out from tree and bush, a laugh began, which increased finally to a roar, as the singers looked in all directions in vain to make out the joke, they being too near the scenery to make out the figures. In the second act Daliso, Delmita's lover, comes upon the stage armed, with the visor of his helmet down, to fight the monster to whom she is to be sacrificed, by the laws of the land. As she affrighted flees, he exclaims: "Non fuggir, non temer, son' io Daliso" (Fly not, fear not, I am Daliso), and has at the same moment to raise the visor, and show her his face. But "the fates, the sisters three, and such odd branches of learning," were in a merry mood that evening, and determined that the helmet should not open. So the more Daliso tried to raise the visor, the faster it seemed to hang, and the louder the audience laughed. This was the joke of Act II.

Daliso kills the monster, and the final scene shows Athens in the distance illuminated.

The audience heard one of the singers recite:

"Vedete como allo splendor di mille faci e mille festeggia Atene." (See how with the splendor of thousands and thousands of torches Athens rejoices)—but all was dark. The signal had been given too late to the workmen, and not until the scene was ended and the curtain was descending did Athens blaze out amid the light of the "mille faci" and the uproarious laughter of the audience. In short there seems to have been no such lamentable comedy and tragical mirth at Athens, since the days of Quince, Snug and Bottom. Gamera and Salieri's opera seria had proved an opera buffa, and at the close the composer laughed as heartily as the audience.

The first attempt by Joseph to build up the German stage, and its failure, has been before mentioned; a new attempt under the influence of Sonnenfels, in 1770, had succeeded, and at the period to which we have now arrived, 1776, the Court theatre in Vienna surpassed all others in Germany, in the excellence of its performances of German spoken dramas, as it had at one time surpassed the world in its Italian operas.

Fond as the Emperor was of his opera buffa, he now formed the magnanimous project of building up a real German opera. One management after another had broken down; the French company was dismissed; in 1774, Noverre, the ballet master, had to give place to the cheaper Angiolini; the receipts sank, and at the end of 1775, or early in 1776, the two court theatres came upon the hands of the Emperor. Hence, none of those "vested rights," which hinder progress in England in all directions, stood now in Joseph's way. The lower Austrian provincial government gave all the world notice that the Kärnthnerthor Theatre was made free to any foreign troop which would undertake it at its own risk; and by an imperial order of February 17, 1776, the Burg theatre was given up to the Germans, and received the title "Hof und National Theater"—Court and National theatre.

Let a correspondent of the Leipziger Allg. Mus.-Zeitung (Vol. xxiv. 253) add what is necessary to an understanding of the theatrical revolution headed by the Emperor of Germany, at the time the lawyer Adams, the printer Franklin, the merchant Hancock, the physician Warren, the farmer Putnam, the planter Washington, the shoemaker Sherman, and their compatriots and fellow lawyers, merchants, &c., were heading, across the water, a revolution of quite another sort.

"Joseph now had the German drama performed four times a week; the prices were fixed at 3 gulden for the first and second boxes; first parterre 1 gulden; 2d parterre 20 Kreuzers; third row 30 Kr. and for the fourth row, 7 Kr. [It is near enough the exact rate if we reckon the gulden at half a dollar, with 60 Kr. to the gulden; the new kreuzers are 100 to the gulden, 48 cents.] At first, the new stage—like every thing which Joseph projected—found much opposition; but the daily presence and active sympathy of the Emperor by degrees filled the house;

the success which was achieved was owing, also, certainly in part, to the fact that all the German pieces were good and generally excellent. The permission to use the Kärnthnerthor house, [which had been recently rebuilt, after taking fire at a performance of Gluck's Ballet Don Juan, and burning down,] was, after a failure or two by others, availed of by an Italian opera troop, formed in part of the members of that which had just been dismissed. This troop played at its own risk, was good and diligent, and therefore soon gained the privilege of playing on the off days, also, in the Burg theatre. This company had 7 men and 6 women, solo singers; among the latter Mlle. Cavalieri. In the Kärnthnerthor house, alternately with the Italian opera, Wäser's large troop, from Prussia, tried its powers in the German drama and opera and in ballet; but the company was about equally bad in all three and soon fell to pieces.

"As in every thing else, so also in theatrical matters, it was the favorite idea of Joseph at that time—much as he personally enjoyed the Italian opera, to show himself a German Emperor,—to favor in a special manner everything that was German—to have, as far as it was in any way possible, all in the German language and in German style. [If England could have had English kings after the revolution of 1688, with taste enough to encourage Purcell and his school, what might not have grown up out of the wonderful English, Scotch, Irish and Welsh schools of melody—the most beautiful to my taste in the world!]

"This idea of Joseph's, his wide and varied knowledge, his great and quick activity, and his passion for the theatre and music (for both, it is well known, he possessed uncommon talents, insight and skill) very soon effected much, which in one way and another proved of beneficial influence, and might have been more so, had his will been always so obeyed as it certainly ought to have been. For instance, in 1777, at his command and with his personal assistance, a plan was wrought out for the foundation of a school for the theatre and for the establishment and selection of a dramatic library; and both, soon and to a certain extent, actually put in operation. It was advertised that every poet, who contributed a piece, which could be and really should be acted, should receive the entire proceeds of the third night as his due. Joseph soon after had a formal code of laws for the members of theatrical companies drawn up, which had been utterly wanting hitherto, and to which the Parisian royal theatrical code served as a model.

"Towards the end of the year (1777) the Emperor at last made the experiment of founding an original German Opera, for which the pieces should neither be translations nor adaptations of of the music. He himself chose for the first trial a little work by Umlauf [viola player in the orchestra]—which had but four vocal parts [rôles] and a chorus—called "Die Bergknappen." The entire company [in its present infancy] consisted but of Mlle. Cavalleri, Madame Stierle, Hr. Ruprecht and Hr. Fuchs—the two men having until now never trod the stage. Umlauf was made music director and Henry Müller, a man of fine taste and tact, manager. Joseph amused himself with the preparations and rehearsals; and the new and modest enterprise—which was at first made a topic of jest and ridicule, and which gave its first public performance on Feb. 17, 1778*—gained great and soon general applause. Joseph thereupon increased the company with three new solo singers, two men and one woman, and the result was, that during this year thirteen new pieces of greater or less extent were produced and the German opera established."

The "revolution" of course relieved Salieri from most if not all his operatic labors, at least for the time. After the failure of "Delmita e Dario," he composed an oratorio, "La Passione di Gesù Christo," text by Metastasio, for a Pension Institution of the Vienna Musicians, which gained him great credit with the musically cultivated, and which, the poet once said in presence of the Emperor, was the most expressive music ever set to his poem. The overture was intended by the composer (ipse dixit) to express the repentance and despair of Peter, and is one of Salieri's best.

(To be Continued.)

* In Forkel's Musikalische-Kritische Bibliothek, Vol. II. 392, this first performance is thus reported:—

Vienna, February, 1778. Finally on the 17th inst., the first German operetta, Die Bergkneppen—so impatiently expected—was produced. It surpassed the expectations of the public. The music and decorations were truly excellent. Mlle. Cavalleri, who formerly sang in the Italian opera buffa there, distinguished herself in singing several difficult and highly ornamented airs, and also by her much improved acting. Madame Stierle also received great applause. After the piece was ended and the curtain down, the audience demanded again the appearance of the performers. Thereupon all four came forward, and Mlle. Cavalleri delivered a very beautiful little speech of thanks to the spectators. His Majesty the Emperor is trying all means to bring these operettas into the mode and has the best subjects sought out. At present, all the solo parts are doubly filled, so that there shall be no interruption caused by the indisposition of this or that singer. Our famous actor, Hr. Müller, has the duty of instructing in action; Hr. Umlauf in singing, &c., &c.

Concert Etiquette.

One of the tribulations of our life is to go to concerts and endure the ill manners and unmusical demonstrations of the people whom we meet there. A concert for the purely musical is a very rare thing—in fact, we are inclined to doubt if the majority of those who attend any but classical chamber concerts, are musical people at all. Let us look at the various kinds of city concerts given.

First, in all respects, should come those given by the Philharmonic Society, which have become as fashionable as the Italian opera, and probably for the same reason, namely, because the performances are wholly or in a great measure entirely unintelligible to a mixed audience. We mean by this, that most people find it quite as difficult to understand a German symphony as they do an Italian libretto; consequently, the necessity of occupying one's body, the mind being bored and annoyed, becomes apparent. To be sure, such people have no right to appear at concerts, but since their money is as good as any one else's and they do attend, we will see how they behave.

It is not unfrequent for old gentlemen to pull out a newspaper, taking care always to crinkle it during the most pianissimo portions of the music. The dowagers of fashion of course talk scandal or fall into a doze; we will not go quite so far as to say that they add to the music by snoring. At the Brooklyn Philharmonic we have often noticed ladies with their knitting, a custom which, after all, rather pleases our fancy than otherwise, or rather would do so were it not for the distressing provincial look of the thing. Think of Beethoven or Mendelssohn composing in order to make knitting the less tiresome to old women! Yet so far as these poetic ladies are concerned, it must be a pleasanter place than any other to knit in. Longfellow says in Hyperion: "He did not dance, but thought to music." So with these provincial neighbors of ours, knitting to music must be pleasanter than knitting to household noises; besides, we have been assured that this species of knitting is always for the soldiers.

But old gentlemen and old ladies read newspapers, talk scandal, and go to sleep, how do the young people offend? Need any one ask who has attended city concerts? Who was it that first made the suggestion that the name of the Philharmonic Society be changed to "Flirt-Harmonic?"

Flirting is so very extensive an accomplishment and possesses such numerous ramifications in the broad extent of its artistic perfection, that it would take up a great deal too much of our space should a complete analysis of its offences against concert etiquette be attempted here. So we shall content ourselves with merely mentioning a few details of it, as generally practised to our torture at the Philharmonic—or "Philharmonics," as boarding-school young ladies have dubbed these concerts.

These are talking, laughing, fan-gyrating, and lobbying—that is, performing the part of wall flowers staring, etc.,—programme crumpling, and chair-shuffling. We might almost add long-netting, although most people do consider it very good manners to stare people out of countenance with a double-barrelled opera-glass at concerts, forgetful of the fact that theatres and operatic performances are the only proper places for them, and that they do not quicken one's acoustic faculties.

We hold most tenaciously to the opinion that all demeanor of concert-audiences which appears as if they only came there to meet friends or to see their neighbors, lowers the Art reflectively, and plainly gives the performers to understand that they are only the apology for their coming to spend a frivolous hour in the hall, just as they would do at any other lounging-place.

Some people do not seem to know whether to keep their hats on or off at a concert; at least before the beginning of the music. We have frequently seen them on until the gas was turned up, which certainly can hardly be defended by any person who has been accustomed to associate with ladies. Also in leaving the hall, the majority of an ordinary city audience invariably clap their hats on again the instant the music ceases, even before they stand up, and it appears to us that, excepting in Romish and Episcopal churches (where the ceremony of consecration prohibits such a thing,) they would be just as excusable in acting likewise at the conclusion of the benediction.

Regarding applause, perhaps a few words may not now be out of place.

To applaud at a concert is considered vulgar by all the truly refined, yet it is a possible thing in our estimation to do a vulgar thing in a gentlemanly manner. For instance, since a noise of approbation is all that seems to be required, if one carries a rattle, quite a racket can be made by switching the back of a bench or other flat surface, and although some may consider this rather outré, we assuredly think it more excusable than the clodhopper habit of stamping the heels and striking one's palms together, thus often annoying the occupant of the next seat with one's elbows, besides getting into a decidedly provincial perspiration from such violent exercise, to say nothing about splitting one's kids, which to bachelors (who don't know how to sew) especially, at the present prices of the gloves, is no small item for consideration.

Then again, regarding the what, when, and whom to applaud, the stupidity and want of tact manifested by some people always provokes us. Surely everybody ought to know that when a great artist gives a concert in his or her own name, it is the grossest affront to such a virtuoso, to endeavor to encore the "assistants." Yet what do we often observe? Some fledgling singer or other frequently is recalled merely through the fondness of the public for a simple popular ditty she may have sung, no matter how badly, as long as it is a favorite. Then when she returns to the stage so self-satisfied, and so complacently appropriating the applause which the audience intended for the composer, it always forces from us a sigh for the stolidity of the public and transparent vanity of many artists.

As an illustration of these remarks, we would ask the metropolitan reader how many times a season he ordinarily hears the "Star Spangled Banner" and the ballad "Kathleen Mavourneen"? We hope our patriotism may not be challenged by the mention of the former. It happened to occur uppermost, that was all; but is it fair for any singer to select that song for the sake of being encored, when she or he knows that even the most uneducated of audiences must applaud the words from a sense of duty? Then again, is it not most ludicrous to behold a long courtesying, bowing, smiling, and smirking performance before its repetition, just as if both poet and composer were concentrated in the insignificant person of the third or fourth-rate singer on the stage? Such exhibitions must always disgust the truly refined lover of art, and thus we often find the finest amateurs in music almost never attend concerts.

But we would not have our readers imagine that bad manners at concerts are by any means confined to the listeners. There seems to be no school for artists yet started in this country by which to enlighten them a little on certain points not altogether unworthy of their notice, in order to increase the comfort of their intelligent audiences.

We will take for example some charitable concert at which all the artists are on a supposed equal footing before the public; that is, they all volunteer their services, and no special prominence is given (at least in printing-ink) to any one in particular. Now, in case of encores at such a performance, how foolish it is for an artist to respond and reappear on the faintest apology for a recall. Yet they often do; nor is it merely to bow acknowledgments, but oftentimes to sing or play again.

Artists may take it for granted when they are recalled, that nine times out of ten it is done by a few friends, and not by the majority of the audience; therefore, they stand a better chance of favoritism with the public by merely bowing, than they would by repeating their performance, lengthening out the programme and obtaining the ill-will of their fellow-artists.

Then again, when a real earnest, hearty, unanimous encore is insisted upon by the audience, it sometimes becomes a nice question to decide what to do. With piano duets or vocal concerted pieces, it usually is the best taste to repeat the last movement alone, while with soloists, either vocal or instrumental, custom has seemed of late to give very respectable sanction to performing an entirely different composition, which we must say is an unsafe plan, however, for three reasons: first, because, if new to the audience, it is not half as likely to fasten their attention as the piece just presented; second, the audience, by the recall, have proven that they admire the first piece, and perhaps they may not be equally pleased with another; and thirdly, an entirely different composition is very apt to be twice as long as the first, and is likely to cause fatigue to the listeners, an injury few can forgive in an artist or a preacher. The worst thing, however, which an artist can do, we apprehend, is to sing or play the entire cavatina or fantasia over again from the very beginning, or if it be a ballad, to repeat every blessed verse, let there be four or five of them. We have witnessed such distressing instances of ill-breeding over and over again, and it has always seemed a wonder how any musician could possibly possess so little consideration for their fellow-beings.

It is quite beyond the limits allotted to us to speak of all the detailed annoyances inflicted upon the public at concerts, such as blunderbuss-accompanists, and those who feel so much above their duties as to constantly make pitiful attempts at obligato embellishments in the worst possible taste, singers who are too lazy to commit their parts to memory and who bring the music on to the stage—which always suggests an actor doing likewise—violinists who seem to consider the flourish of the fiddle-bow of much more importance than the correct intonation of the semitones, double-stoppings, etc., etc., but “verbum sat sapienti,” and we dismiss the subject, with a devout hope for improvement in some of the above particulars, ere long, in those entertainments professing to be first-class metropolitan concerts.—New Nation.

Musical Festival in Philadelphia.

MR. FRY'S NEW OPERA, "NOTRE DAME OF PARIS."
From the Tribune's Special Correspondent.

PHILADELPHIA, May 5, 1864.

The musical festival in aid of the Sanitary Commission was on Wednesday evening inaugurated by the production of Mr. William H. Fry's new opera, "Notre Dame of Paris." It is a remarkable fact that the greatest public interest and expectation in regard to this event were exhibited not here in Philadelphia, but in other and distant cities. In New York and elsewhere it had for many days been a prominent popular topic, the importance of which was recognized by the most generous announcements that journalism could bestow. The occasion was more-over distinguished by the special pilgrimage hither of numerous representatives of metropolitan art and literature—a circumstance by no means insignificant, when the physical and spiritual agonies of a railway passage through New Jersey are considered. Why Philadelphia should have remained comparatively indifferent to an event of such peculiar import to itself, it is difficult to understand. Twenty years ago, when the first of American operas, by the same author, was produced at the Chestnut-street Theatre, there was no limit to the eagerness with which its performances were welcomed, and the brilliant success of the young composer was met by the proud congratulations of the entire community. Does the new generation account itself superior to the consideration of musical advancement and development? It was certainly a serious disappointment for visitors to discover so little domestic concern upon a matter which everywhere else was held in high anticipation. The fact probably is that Philadelphians are not generally aware of the artistic importance which belongs to the production of a work like "Notre Dame of Paris." Operas requiring equal magnitude of preparation are rarely attempted, even in Europe. Excepting Meyerbeer, no composer of the present day has power to procure the execution of similar works. The ordinary resources of the best foreign theatres would be inadequate to its representation, according to the composer's intentions. And this, I have cause to believe, is the principal reason why "Notre Dame" has not before now been produced in London or in Paris. Miss Adeline Patti, I know, was ready to undertake the principal role. Mr. Strakosch urged its acceptance by the managers of opera-houses in London, Paris, and Madrid. But when the exhausting conditions of its proper representation were understood, these gentlemen were unwilling to consider the subject further. The inevitable pro-pert of heavy expenses destroyed its chances. I remember, indeed, that Mr. Bagier of the "Italians" went so far as to say that if Rossini himself were to write a new opera, involving large outlays for scenic, orchestral and choral preparation, he would not venture to produce it. Excepting at the Imperial Academy, there could have been no opportunity for an opera like this of Mr. Fry; and the doors of the Academy are double-locked and barricaded against all composers whose universal fame does not guaranty the sure success of their works.

That "Notre Dame" should, then, be undertaken in an American city, and undertaken in a spirit of liberal enterprise wholly consistent with its vast requirements, is a circumstance which ought to have engaged the utmost public attention and the heartiest public support. I even set aside consideration of the patriotic purpose of its performance, and of the personal claim which the composer may be supposed to have upon the citizens of Philadelphia. The production of the opera was, of itself, an event worthy to be celebrated. For the first time in America, an orchestra equal in numbers to the most massive of European opera-houses contributed its effect. [The orchestra of the Imperial Academy is not larger, and that of Covent Garden not so large]. The chorus was unquestionably superior to the average of the best foreign theatres. The mise-en-scène would not have been surpassed in Paris or Berlin. These are very striking facts. On the other hand, there were certain defects, such as would not be likely to occur abroad, but these were of minor importance, and due to the hurried condition of the first performance. The general character of the preparations was certainly unprecedented in America. Mr. Ullman's best achievements have not approached it. And it will probably be many years before another lyric production will be adventured on so magnificent a scale.

The representation on Wednesday evening at the Academy of Music was witnessed by a large, though not an overflowing audience. The success of the opera was complete. I shall not assume to speak analytically of its qualities for many reasons—chiefly because I should feel ill at ease in offering critical views upon the work of a composer who has himself created [!!] American musical criticism in the very columns in which I am writing. Applause was constant, and the call for Mr. Fry, after the fall of the curtain, was enthusiastic and unanimous. The performance presented many valuable characteristics. I have mentioned the amplitude of the orchestra and chorus. Their execution, under the excellent direction of Mr. Theodore Thomas, was almost free from blemish. The natural irregularities of a first night were the worst faults. The different roles were conscientiously interpreted by Mrs. Borchard, Mrs. Kempton, Mr. Castle, Mr. Campbell and Mr. Seguin. [Mr. Seguin's father was one of the principal artists concerned in the production of Mr. Fry's "Leonora" in Philadelphia, some twenty years ago.] The exquisite scenic effects, the wealth of stage decoration and the vivid costumes of the multitude that represented alternately soldiers, courtiers, and peasants, lightened throughout the impressiveness of the representation.

Mr. Fry's musical reputation will be greatly augmented by this work. Many of its attributes are of an order which the most famous composers are glad to be credited with. The instrumentation is rich and sonorous to a degree which few have surpassed. The operas of Bellini and Donizetti do not generally show such closely studied orchestral writing. It is replete with resonant choral effects, and in the construction of the concerted pieces imagination and skill are alike demonstrated. No one could deny that "Notre Dame" stands well in all these respects beside the acknowledged works of modern writers of repute. And it is impossible not to deeply regret that Mr. Fry's opportunities for public testing of his capabilities have been so limited. The stride from his "Leonora" to his "Notre Dame" is prodigious. In another country, where all men's hands and hearts are not against the progress of art, that stride might have been made a score of years ago; and we need have very little hesitation in believing that Mr. Fry's name would now be an honored one far and near, wherever the art he has studied, and loved, and protected is held in esteem.

E. H. H.

Gounod's New Opera.

A stranger experience is not on our record than that of Monday last, when "Mireille" was performed for the fourth time; not one more difficult to convey to the public without exaggeration. The impression may be briefly stated as under: two acts of perfect enjoyment, then one of wondering disapprobation, and, afterwards, two of admiration, with large exceptions. Let us enter into details which will explain what has been said, and explain, too, what we distinctly state that this chequered pleasure in M. Gounod's new work does not, in the smallest possible degree, shake our opinion of him as a composer.

It may be remembered that, in the New Year's number of this journal, an outline was offered of M. Mistral's lovely Provençal poem, indicating not merely the treasure of simple and impassioned tenderness casketed in it, but also the vivid and truthful coloring of its scenery. How such a clever man as M. Carre could have missed both, in some most important passages, in arranging the tale, retaining the whole certain passages and features ineligible for stage presentation,—how a man of poetic genius like M. Gounod could have consented (under the seduction of indiscriminating admiration of the poem) to work on the canons thus furnished,—are among the vexatious mysteries of the musical drama—vexatious, because the story ever so simply beautiful, and the composer ever so thoroughly imbued with its beauty, his inspiration must fail when the scene does not warrant it; his feet instinctively refuse to bear him over the bridge when its planks are rotten.

"Mireille" opens with a pastoral overture, well sustained, and wrought up to an excellent climax. The first act is among the mulberry-trees of Provence, where the girls are gathering leaves for the silk-worms. A more delicious and fresh chorus for female voices (not forgetting that in Beethoven's "King Stephen") does not exist. The burden is irresistible, and the entrance of Taven, the wise woman (Madame Faure-Lefebvre), and of Mireille (Madame Miolan-Carvalho) among the girls who are talking of their lovers, could not be better devised. Exquisite, too, is the duet between the heroine, daughter of a rich farmer, Ramon (M. Petit), and the poor basket maker, Vincent (M. Morini), on whom she has bestowed her love, to the great scorn of her ambitious companions. One phrase alone, "O c' Vincent, comme il saut gentiment tout dire," would suffice to stamp its writer as a man of delicate and individual genius, were there not hundreds of the kind from his hand. The act—or rather call it prelude—closes with a resumption of the first chorus dying away behind the scenes.

Act the Second opens with a Farandole (or Provençal dance) and chorus, including a two part ballad, with chorus, sung by Mireille and Vincent. Here, again, M. Gounod is in his happiest vein. The dance has a rustic brilliancy and animation; the ballad telling how a certain Magali treated her lovers, a characteristic and quaint tenderness not to be surpassed. Their value, whether in point of musical fancy or local coloring will be felt, if they be compared with the best pages of Halévy's "Val d'Andorre" or M. Meyerbeer's "Pardon." Music fuller of open-air sunshine was never written. The ballad of Magali is peculiar as an example of rhythm, written in bars of 9 8 and 6 8 tempo alternately, yet without any apparent halt or dislocation. Next comes a song for Taven, which is no less excellent; then an air of parade for Mireille, which, effective though it be, we like the least of anything in the act. Being out of place, its writer has fallen out of style, and written the usual opera caratina. Now enters Ouvrias, the brutal bull-fighter (M. Ismael), and woos the reluctant Mireille in a sufficiently rough song. When, after her lively indifference, her explicit avowal makes it clear to him that she will have none of his vows, her heart having been already given away, he calls in Ramon, her father, to maintain his cause, and simultaneously appear Vincent, Vincentette, his sister (Madame Reboux), and Ambroise (M. Wartel), his father, the basket-maker, who comes to ask the hand of Mireille for her lover. The former is outraged at such presumption, and, deaf to Mireille's prayers and appeal to the memory of her dead mother, drives her from him, to seek, if it so please her, beggary and disgrace. This is the stuff of the finale, which is conducted with admirable vigour and character. Nothing can be at once more truly pathetic and forcible than the sestet led by Mireille, "A vos pieds, hélas! me voila," opening with one of those clear and distinguished phrases of which M. Gounod possesses the secret. The stretto, with chorus, which closes the act is more according to the ordinary pattern.

Up to this point the music of "Mireille" sustains at least the reputation of the writer of "Faust," if it do not add to it, by exhibiting him as a perfect master of scenic color. The sun of the South of France, we repeat, is in it. With Act the Third—or the Fantastic Act—we arrive at the rotten bridge spoken of. This no magic could enable our musician to cross. It opens with a weird and elvish scene, where M. Gounod has fallen into a remembrance of, or coincidence with Mendelssohn's well-known presto scherzando in F sharp minor. This is followed by a chorus of the sympathizing friends of the rejected Ouvrias, and this by a duet betwixt the bull-fighter and his successful rival, not without passages of vigor. For a reason to be given presently, this, the best number in the act, was omitted in the first representations; thus leaving the audience in doubt as to the reason of the remorse of Ouvrias when he returns to the stage, after having, he believes, killed his man. Then Taven, the wise woman, reappears, who is to restore Vincent to life; but it would seem as if here again stage difficulty presented itself; since this incident, too, has been removed, thereby rendering subsequent scenes all but impossible to understand. We are now beside the Rhone, with its phantoms of drowned lovers wandering in the moon-light, searing the conscious-stricken Ouvrias, who attempts to cross the river in a supernatural boat, which always sinks when there is a murderer on board, and is drowned accordingly. Nothing can be more picturesque and weird than this scene in M. Mistral's poem—few things can be more wearisome and preposterous than as it is seen and heard in the opera. For spectres (always dangerous dramatis personæ) we have Ondines; and in the music, M. Gounod's sense of the supernatural, so awfully displayed in his "Nonne Sanglante," is here exchanged for that which is far-fetched and sickly; which tires in place of exciting the slightest thrill of terror. As this act stands, it dooms "Mireille."

Act the Fourth is better as a whole. It opens with a stout, if not a very new, chorus of reapers, followed by the duet betwixt Mireille and her lover's sister, in which the latter acquaints Mireille with Vincent's peril, and the heroine declares that she will repair to the shrine of the Three Maries to pray for his deliverance. This is done in another of those sublime phrases which mark their writer as a man of elevated genius beyond caviller's power to question. The scene changes to the burning wilderness of the Crau; across which the pilgrim of love must pass, stricken down in her passage by a sunstroke. This, again, as originally arranged for the stage, is tedious. It contains, however, a lovely herd-boy's song, with a pastoral symphony, and a good romance for the heroine ere she wends on her weary way.

The last act is before the chapel of the Three Maries, at which she arrives to die in the arms of her lover, who has followed her (and whose living re-appearance is so inexplicable as to be all but absurd), and of her father who has forgiven her, and consents when too late to save her. Here we have religious procession, march and chorus, with the true French color in it, a scene for the tenor, omitted in representation, and a final trial and apotheosis, than which those closing "Fanst" were better because the first.

Such is "Mireille," and the above remarks give one reason for conceiving that unless the last three acts be remodelled, with large suppression (as in the fantastic scene), condensation, and it may be the introduction of new action and incident, to make the story clearer, the opera may fail to keep the stage, in spite of many beauties which have been specified, in spite of M. Gounod having shown in it advance, if that could be, in his treatment of the orchestra. It is worth every one's while to see that this is thoroughly and unflinchingly done. It would be vexatious; indeed, for the sake of all concerned, were so much genius, labor, time, and cost to prove thrown away.

The performance of "Mireille" is excellent, with one important drawback, the part of the lover. Tenors are difficult folks to handle, all the world over. There are those who compromise operas by the exactions and caprices of their vanity—there are those who are yet more seriously damaging, by their utter incompetence. The Vincent of the Théâtre Lyrique belongs to the latter company. The other artists already named are all thoroughly sufficient—save Madame Miolan Carvalho, who deserves another epithet. To praise her too highly would be impossible. Her voice, on Monday in perfect tune, was equal to every demand made by the poet for power, pathos, and passion—her execution is as finished and boundless as ever—her accent is such as has not been heard since Madame Persiani left the stage—her declamation is as fine and delicate as if she were a comedian who had better words than opera platitudes to deliver. But even such consummate art and feeling as hers may fail to save "Mireille," unless a thorough reform and compression of three fifths of the opera be undertaken and carried out.—Paris letter, March 28.

From the Evening Post.

Organists and Singers in New York.

THE LATEST CHOIR GOSSIP. THE CHANGES FOR MAY.

Every spring season sees a number of changes in the musical department of our different churches: and organists and singers, in contradistinction to leopards, change their spots very often—for, as the venerable joke of the negro minstrels hath it, they leave one spot and go to another.

This year, however, the changes are more numerous among singers than among organists; the leading players remain in their old situations. Thus, our stylish friends of Grace Church will still listen to the splendid pedal playing of George W. Morgan, the soprano of Mrs. Bodstein, and the graceful and polished salutations of the courtly and suave Brown. Trinity Church will still, though with some changes in the personnel, under the direction of Henry S. Cutler, emulate successfully the cathedral music of England, while the choir will be enriched by some fresh boy and men voices; and while speaking of Trinity, it may be worth while to state that the entire choir of this church intend soon making a trip to Reading, Pennsylvania, where a new organ is to be opened, and where Rev. Dr. Vinton is to do his part by preaching a sermon upon music.

At St. John's Chapel, where George F. Bristow has been organist of late, there is talk of introducing the system of boy choirs. [At St. Paul's, where there is a good double quartet, there will be no change,

Mr. Michael Erben continuing to have charge of the music. At St. George's, Stuyvesant Square (Rev. Dr. Tyng's), the system of a double quartet for antiphonal chanting (with a chorus), having been tried experimentally for the past few months, will hereafter be permanently adopted, and it is intended that the music shall adhere to the strict ecclesiastical style.

At St. Mark's, where J. N. Pattison, the pianist, is organist, the system of a single quartet, so generally popular, will be maintained, and the music will continue, as hitherto, to elicit the admiration of strangers and others visiting the church.

At Dr. Chapin's church, on Broadway, the old system of congregational singing, so long in vogue there under the skilful precentorship of Mr. Henry Molten and other, will be abandoned, the quartet and organist previously officiating at St. Ann's in Eighteenth street, having been engaged for the Broadway church. At St. Ann's it is intended to give congregational singing, to be led by a choir of boys under the superintendence of Mr. Martin, so indentified with the Sunday school of the church. The deaf-mutes who form the afternoon congregation at St. Ann's are serenely indifferent to all musical changes, acting in their ordinary social life on the principle that fingers were made before tongues, if not before forks.

Nor should this St. Ann's, Protestant Episcopal in Eighteenth street, be confused with St. Ann's Roman Catholic, in Eighth street and Astor Place.

For the latter church Errani, the accomplished Italian tenor, is engaged.

At the Church of St. Francis Xavier Mr. William Berge will continue to give the best music of the kind in the city, with Mrs. Cooper as prima donna.

The music at the Twenty-eighth Street Roman Catholic Church (Rev. Dr. Cummings), will pass under the direction of Robert Heller, the magician, who has been appointed organist to the church.

In the meantime Mr. Morra, the late organist of St. Stephens, has gone to Zion Church (Bishop Southgate's), with Centemeri as basso, or rather baritone. This importation of an Italian and Roman Catholic element into a Protestant Episcopal church, as well as the very large salaries to be paid, is exciting considerable comment in choir circles; and it is expected that Zion Church will have about as "stylish" music as any in the city.

At Dr. Adams's church, in Madison avenue, Mrs. Jenny Kempton has been added to the already accomplished force, and we believe at the largest salary yet paid to any contralto in any New York choir.

At Dr. Osgood's church, the choir, which has been for the past year giving this church a first-class musical reputation, will be retained, and thus Miss Flint, Miss Rushby, Mr. Geary and Mr. J. R. Thomas will continue, with the skilful organist and graceful composer Mr. Hows, to delight both the regular congregation and strangers who may visit the Church of the Messiah.

At Dr. Bellows's church (All Souls) one star sets to be replaced by another. Henry C. Timm, the previous organist, has resigned, and William A. King (from Dr. Houghton's church of the Transfiguration) has been engaged in his place, as we are informed, at the highest salary paid to any organist in the city.

At Christ Church, the entire choir, including the accomplished prima donna Isadora Clark, has left, Miss Sconcia taking the place of the leading soprano. Charles Wells is retained as organist, and a contract has been made with Erben for a large first-class organ, worthy of this prosperous church and congregation. The present instrument is suitable for a mission school in Dakota territory rather than for a rich city church.

A new choir has been formed at Dr. Montgomery's Church of the Incarnation, Mr. William Beames remaining as organist. The new choir includes some voices of unusual merit. At St. Bartholomew's Miss Brainerd remains as leading soprano, and Clara W. Beames as organist.

At the Madison Avenue Baptist Church, where there has been heard a great deal of good music, the choir has experienced some changes in its personnel, but will remain under the charge of Mr. S. T. Gordon the organist.

At the Broadway (and Thirty-fourth street) Tabernacle Church, Mrs. Jamison has been appointed leading soprano in place of Mrs. Stone, who has resigned the position after holding it most satisfactorily for several years. The loss of the late Mr. Seymour is still felt in this church, and in the scarcity of good tenor voices he is doubly missed.

A WORD ABOUT BROOKLYN.

Brooklyn is responsible for many of the changes in our choirs; for it is a peculiarity of this suburban town, that it ever entertains an irrepressible yearning for singers who live in the up-town wards of New York city. It engages them at heavy salaries, and seems to especially delight in those who reside in the vicinity of Fortieth street. This is good for the Sixth and Eighth avenue railroad lines, as well as for the Union Ferry company.

Brooklyn is, indeed, the El Dorado of New York vocalists, who always demand and get about twenty-five per cent. added to their salaries, because they have to come "away from New York;" and having secured this, they frequently move over to Brooklyn, thus involving the Sixth and Eighth avenue railroad and the Union Ferry Companies in heavy losses by the withdrawal of their patronage.

HUNTING A SITUATION.

It is curious to note the telegraphic sympathy by which choir folks become informed of choir changes. Let the music committee of any prominent up-town church decide to change the singers, and the news is mysteriously conveyed through the whole fraternity. Latent talent suddenly arises from Jersey City; unknown prima donnas take the first morning boat from Staten Island, while every ward of the city gives its quota of aspiring sopranos, altos, basses or tenors. Brooklyn also comes out strong on these occasions; for it is a singular fact that, while Brooklyn yearns ever for singers in New York, it does not care a fig for those reposing in its own bosom; and consequently there is an international vocal exchange constantly going on between the two cities.

All these singers pounce upon the music Committee or Chairman, who has the disposal of the vacant situation. They visit him at his office, they invade the sanctity of his home, they spot him on his way to the reception of the "droppings of the sanctuary," and apply for the situation.

The application results in a "trial," which is a very distressing thing for all concerned. A dozen sopranos of all styles and abilities are "tried," one after the other, each of the eleven, who are not singing, bitterly criticizing the one who is. The successful candidate has thenceforth eleven "friends" who ever after detest her style and voice, and who attribute her success to a mysterious power behind the throne, which is termed by choir folk "influence in the church."

CONGREGATIONAL APPRECIATION.

The singers, unless of such undeniable merit and reputation as to demand instant recognition, generally have to go through a great deal that is unpleasant to secure a situation, and when they get it, they fully earn their salaries. They are expected, even when paid but a hundred dollars a year, to be punctual at all the Sunday services, and at the weekly rehearsal. They are bitterly criticized by the entire congregation, and may sing in a church year after year without forming a single acquaintance, or receiving even one passing courtesy from those whom they lead Sunday after Sunday in so important a part of Divine service. When they get the bronchitis or asthma they are civilly dismissed; nor do the annals of choirs record a single instance where a congregation, however rich, has offered an organist or singer a "trip to Europe," or even to Saratoga or Long Branch. These perquisites are the prerogatives of the clergy alone, along with new silk gowns. We venture to say, however, that a new silk gown is generally vastly more needed by the singer in the choir than by the minister in the pulpit; but then the lady, by devoting only half a year's salary to the purpose, can buy a gown for herself.

HOW THE CLERGY ACT.

The establishment of a "College of Organists" in London, by the way—we may mention, while gossiping of organs and organists—has given the London Musical World an opportunity to launch out an invective against the clergy, which shows a delightful state of mutual admiration existing between the pulpit and the organ-loft; but, of course, it can be only of English Churches that the London paper thus speaks:

"The clergy being for some inscrutable reason for the most part a distinctly unmusical race, they are not likely to pay much homage to abstract professional merit. Being also for the most part of all men the most conservative of caste distinctions, they need not be expected to concede an atom of social position that cannot be enforced. Thus prepared, they come in contact with a class of men called organists, who—while much and varied accomplishment is required of them, and while they are entrusted with a duty which they may, according to the light of their culture, make into either a solemnity or a farce—are, under the ordinary rules of church management, treated with not a jot more ceremony than the beadles, pew-openers and the like. The result of the introduction, under such circumstances, cannot well be doubtful. A crop of dissension is sown betwixt the representatives of music and theology, of which nothing save a rare combination of qualities on both sides can avert the fruit. The organist thinks—and often justly—that, for one that could be found to do all that he does at his end of the church, fifty might easily pass muster at the other. The parson does not trouble himself to think about the matter. He is quite content with his clerical supremacy; and is only surprised that any one else should deem it worth while to have an opinion."

HOW THE SINGERS ACT.

At the same time, it must be said that if organists and choir singers are not always respected, it is too often their own fault. In their view, too frequently, a clergyman is useful as keeping open a church for them to sing in; but he is, perhaps, a little unreasonable in insisting on preaching a sermon, for which the choir would prefer to substitute an anthem. The prayers of the church, however solemn, are intermissions in which to look over tune-books and talk gossip. And as to irreverence—if not irreligion—it nestles securely behind the curtains of the organ-loft, in a way that few in the body of the church are aware of. We now refer to American, and not to English choirs—though it is about the same there.

DEMAND FOR TENORS.

To change the subject, we would remark that the demand for tenors this season is very great, as that article is scarce, and their salaries vie with first-class sopranos. There are always plenty of basses; and contralto voices seem, of late, to be increasing in number and improving in quality.

THE CHOIR INTERESTS.

Lest the unmusical reader should suppose that all this talk about choirs can interest but a limited number of people, let him or her just remember that there are some four hundred churches in New York and Brooklyn; that allowing but four singers and an organist to each, there are two thousand performers to begin with; that each performer has on an average three relatives with whom the choir affairs are discussed over the breakfast table, and we have six thousand folks interested in the subject. Ministers, music committees and those church-goers who pay attention to the subject of church music make, with all previously alluded to, at least ten thousand; so it will be seen that the choir interests of New York are large enough. As to art, we can unhesitatingly say that our church choirs embody a vast proportion of the vocal talent existing among us; and not till that talent shall be organized into some successful combination, will the general public have any idea of the number of good singers and good voices in New York and Brooklyn.

Beethoven's Seventh Symphony.

It commences with one of those effects of instrumentation of which Beethoven is incontestably the creator; the full orchestra strikes a strong and sharp chord, leaving suspended, during the silence that succeeds, a single hautboy that has entered, unperceived, in the preceding crash, and which goes on to develop a sustained melody. It is impossible to conceive a commencement more original. Repetitions of the sharp chords ensue, again and again; after each of which the legato theme grows, by added parts, till it attains a full harmony, when it gives place to a new feature, namely: a series of staccato scale passages, for the stringed band, accompanied or interspersed with fragments of the melody first heard.

The Allegro has a rhythm strongly marked, which, passing afterwards into the harmony, is reproduced under a multitude of aspects, scarcely ceasing its measured march until the end—a determined employment of rhythmical form which has never been attempted on such an extensive scale elsewhere; although in minor pieces—as, for example, in Schubert's songs—the idea frequently appears. This allegro, of which the extensive developments run constantly upon the same idea, is treated with such incredible skill—the changes of key are so frequent and so ingenious—the harmonic and other technical features so novel and often so bold—that the movement finishes before the attention and lively emotion which it excites in the audience have all abated.

The symphony is peculiarly celebrated for its Andante. The principal cause of the profound sensations excited by this extraordinary movement, lies also in the rhythm—a rhythm as simple as that of the Allegro, but of a form perfectly different. It consists merely of a dactyl followed by a spondee, and repeated incessantly; sometimes in several parts, sometimes in one only; sometimes serving as an accompaniment, sometimes concentrating the attention on itself, and sometimes forming the subject of a fugue. It appears first, after two bars of sustained harmony, on the low strings of the viola, violoncellos, and double basses, nuanced by a piano and pianissimo, full of melancholy; thence it passes to the second violins, while the violoncellos and violas sing a pathetic lamentation of an inexpressibly touching character. The rhythmic phrase, ascending continually from one octave to another, arrives at the first violins, which pass it by a crescendo, to the full force of the wind instruments of the orchestra, while the plaintive theme still accompanying it, but now given out with extreme energy, assumes the character of a convulsive, heart-rending wail. To this succeeds an ethereal melody, pure, simple, sweet and resigned.

The basses alone continue their inexorable rhythm under this melodious bow in the clouds; it is, to borrow a citation from the poet,

"One fatal remembrance, one sorrow that throws
Its black shade alike o'er our joys and our woes."

It is not improbable that this wonderful pathetic movement may have been intended by Beethoven to portray his own feelings under the terrible calamity that afflicted him; the only part of this symphony that its unfortunate composer ever heard was the roll of the drums.

The trio is one of the most remarkable and original morceaux which ever proceeded from Beethoven's pen. At the close of the Scherzo, on a unison passage, an A, occurring quite naturally, and without any appearance of design, is suddenly held by the whole band; transfixed, congealed, as it were, like the sleeping beauty; and is retained through the whole of the following movement. After four bars of the single note, a lovely melody creeps in, the time being considerably slackened to give the change more effect; this is repeated with a slight reinforcement, after which a second part is introduced leading to a repetition of the first part fortissimo. Meanwhile the other parts make a crescendo by a series of bold chords, and the original melody bursts out with the full band—the never-ceasing A being now thrown with startling effect upon the trumpets and drums. This extraordinary feature never fails to command the astonishment and delight of the audience. The theme of the trio, simple as it is, furnishes the striking example of a melody whose character may be entirely changed by the manner in which it is taken. When first played, smoothly and softly, it is sweet, beautiful, pastoral; when repeated by the full orchestra, it is grand, majestic, sublime.

The finale is not less rich than the preceding movements in novel features, in piquant modulations or in charming fancies. The commencement, a sharp chord, struck by the strings, answered instantaneously by the wind instruments, and followed by a dead pause, appears to be designed to call attention to the unusual form of the principal subject, commencing on the same chord. The rhythm here again is peculiar, consisting of an accentuation of the second beat of the bar, so frequently as to form the rule, instead of, as commonly, the exception. The greatest marvel is the coda. After the first or preliminary cadence, a few chords prepare the way for a most elaborate working of the first phrase of the theme, repeated many times and accompanied by combinations of the most striking originality. All the while the violins keep up an increasing reiteration of the subject in various keys, accompanied in corresponding harmonies by the wind band, and gradually rising semper più forte on the grand pedal point. Half way through this point, the violins throw off impatiently the trammels of the figure that had so long bound them, and burst off into a series of the most brilliant passages; the basses still keep steadily for some time to their E, but at last can no longer resist sharing in the jubiles of the rest of the orchestra; and the whole comes to a conclusion with an overpowering crescendo—an ending worthy of such a masterpiece of genius, imagination, feeling and technical skill.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, MAY 14, 1864.

German Opera.

During the past fortnight we have had here what we had almost despaired of having for some years to come, a really good German Opera. Indeed the whole experience of Boston hitherto in German Opera has been limited to a single performance, we might call it a travesty, about seven years ago, of Fidelio, by a trumped up company that ran on here from New York, and did the thing so badly that the Italian fanatics were only strengthened in their partiality, and could not perceive that Beethoven's music was half so good as Verdi's. Italian Opera, and no other, has been fashionable in all our cities, and it has not been common to believe in German singers, or that there can be any first-rate voices, any true, high art of singing, but the Italian, (or the Italianized-American), notwithstanding the fact, so pointedly set forth in manager Grover's announcement last week, that most of the Italian companies of late, both here and in France and England, have depended almost entirely upon Germans for their orchestra and chorus, while the names of many of their best principal singers, their "stars," have been German, with or without Italian terminations. But these have been chiefly engaged in executing the Italian music, or at least the Italian repertoire, which takes in Meyerbeer, Flotow, and such other German and French composers as have come half way to meet it, paying also a certain deference to Mozart. So, on the other hand, the German repertoire, still more cosmopolitan, as becomes the nation that knows Shakespeare so well, has adopted works of Cherubini, Boieldieu, Rossini, &c., looking more to art and genius than to mere nationality, though strong in that.

All our opera troupes and seasons, therefore, in spite of German elements in the performance, and in spite of Mozart, Meyerbeer and Gounod (what a conjunction of names!), have been Italian. A real German opera with German means, illustrating the German repertoire, we have not had an opportunity to know,—at least in Boston. We have heard of it, perchance have come upon it, some of us, in visits to New York and Philadelphia, these last years, as a sort of flitting nebular phenomenon, having but a half existence, only realized and relished within the Teutonic cloud realm of Gambrinus, attracting now and then a little notice in the Academies or minor theatres, decidedly not fashionable, no godsend to the importers of white kids. The amount of it is, that until now the German opera troupes in this country have been poor and fragmentary attempts, with some good elements, but by no means furnished for a fair presentation of the master works of Mozart, Beethoven and Weber. It is due to the enterprising spirit of CARL ANSCHÜTZ, that so complete a company was organized last Fall, and due to his thorough musicianship, his mastery as a conductor, that a most refreshing degree of unity, animation and artistic feeling has been realized in their performances. He found it uphill work, however, through the winter. In Philadelphia there was more recognition than in New York; but generally the newspaper criticisms, which for the most part are reflexes of the fashions and "sensations" of the day in all matters of art and taste, praised very cautiously, and relapsed into convenient silence. What does not pay the manager, it does not pay to write about, seems to be tacitly adopted as the theory of newspaperdom. Then again, so fond are newspapers of praising everything in a certain perfunctory way, and so apt to praise most that which is least in Art, that earnest music-lovers here were habitually sceptical about what they read, as we are about the sensation bulletins of war news. We waited till we might hear with our own ears. And our hopes have been repeatedly raised during the winter, only to be disappointed, by the report that Anschütz was to bring his company to the Boston Theatre. Meanwhile we have gained by the postponements. Within a few months Mr. Anschütz has added to his force several new singers from Germany, some of his brightest stars, such as Mme. Frederici-Himmer, the two admirable tenors, Habelmann and Himmer, and other names, which certainly are not the ones we used to read of in the New York papers early in the winter. Moreover, reaping no material harvest at all commensurate with so satisfactory an artistic result, and finding it too much for one man to be both musical and business head of such an enterprise, it was his good luck to meet in Mr. GROVER, the proprietor of theatres in Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, a manager with insight to perceive the value and the capabilities of the thing, a man with means and will to assume the responsibility of it and place it once for all upon a sound material basis. Under his auspices the German Opera, thus set upon its feet again, has for some weeks past been triumphantly successful both in Philadelphia and Washington, almost eclipsing the Italian rival, and promising at all events to put an end to its monopoly from this time forth.

Boston may be quite as subject to "sensations" and the rule of fashion as the larger cities, and quite as strongly wedded to Italian Opera, if we judge by crowded houses; but Boston has a name for its love and cultivation of classical and German music, which naturally turns a German Opera this way. This reputation is not altogether unfounded, inasmuch as we have a large class among our music-lovers whom the frequent hearing of Beethoven's symphonies, Handel's and Mendelssohn's oratorios, &c., has educated into a very warm and tolerably appreciative admiration and continued demand for music of that deeply satisfying order; and it is true, to a great degree, of our city that here the intellectual and moral element, the highest taste and culture, are not only proudly recognized, but do in the long run compel the deference of fashion; nothing can long be fashionable which leaves them out. The opinion of this minority is always worth conciliating; it carries weight and sanction through the land. Mr. Grover, therefore, could well afford to risk the loss of a few thousands simply to make his Opera known in Boston, to show us what it is, and to have it, if not patronized by crowds, at least so pronounced upon as he had intelligent conviction that it must be. Hence this sudden appearance at this late hour in the season, with so much to distract men's minds; hence this quiet resting of the thing upon its unheralded artistic excellence, content for a time with winning the recognition of a few who know good music and good acting when they see and hear it.

All this we should have said in anticipation of their coming, if they had not come upon us by surprise. With only two or three days notice Anschütz and his company were with us. The first real advertisement was the manner in which they performed Flotow's Martha on Monday evening, May 4th, before an audience which made up by its musical intelligence and by its enthusiasm for its exceeding paucity of numbers. It was felt by all present that that single hearing by those few had established the right of the German company to succeed in Boston. A little more time to talk it about, to allow people to shape their engagements, and a few more performances and they must win the day. And so it went on with increase of interest and of audience from night to night. The season was to be very brief, positively only a fortnight, with a different opera every evening, and no repetitions. We were to be impressed indeed, not only with the unity, the versatility, the excellence of their performance, but with the extent, variety and richness of their repertoire both in things familiar and things new to us. Here was the programme: for the first week, Martha, La Dame Blanche, Faust, Der Freyschütz, Merry Wives of Windsor and Alessandro Stradella; second week, Don Juan and Fidelio, sure, and perhaps the Zauberflöte, Tannhäuser, Robert and Das Nachtlager in Grenada. The first half has been carried out to the letter.

Now Martha was not just the opera we should have chosen for the opening night. For these reasons. It has become almost too familiar, almost hacknied; every Italian company has played it, and shall not this short first taste of German opera consist of things we do not get from everybody else? Then Martha is not distinctively a German opera, although a German wrote it; many a German writes Italian music; this is as much Italian and French as it is German; in no sense is it a representative German work, like Fidelio and the operas of Mozart and of Weber. Thirdly, it is not a great work, not even a second or third rate work, not a work of genius; it is only clever, graceful, pretty, lively, popular, &c. We confess we have seldom been able to sit through the whole of Martha; after the two sparkling first acts, after the fun is mainly over, and the lover is in his limes, and the sentimental "Last rose of summer" business begins, we have found it something stale and tedious. The more the triumph, therefore, of these Germans, that we did sit it out that evening, and were so carried away, all of us, by the uncommon vivacity and genial excellence of the whole performance, that we did so in spite of ourselves most willingly. All agreed that Martha never was so well performed in Boston; and as the object was to strike a positive blow at the outset and show what this company was, we became convinced that they had made the right selection; only let us hope that it will not be all or mainly of this kind, that the study of popularity will not balk us of our desire of hearing in this country the true, the highest German opera, the great works which may rank with Don Giovanni, that higher German opera which we have a right to regard it as the mission of such a well-appointed company as this to illustrate in this country. But now of the performers.

Mme. JOHANNSEN, the only member of the troupe not new to us, sang and acted "mi-Lady" like an accomplished artist. Although her voice, in the highest tones, is somewhat worn and hard, yet it always true and telling, sometimes sweet; and in execution she has vastly improved since she last sang here. Indeed there was much exquisite vocalization. She has her inspirations, always rising to the height of the impassioned moments. Mme. FREDERICI was a charming Nancy. With a voice of singular purity and freshness, rich and reedy in the contralto and middle tones, vibrating like a canary in its extensive upward register; subdued, soulful, sweet with native refinement, but finding power for every earnest utterance; with a faultless charm of style, so easy that it seems spontaneous nature; singing always with expression, never overdoing, never falling short; and with the perpetual play of expression, whether singing or listening, on her face, and in every gesture and movement of her comely person, she makes a most harmonious impression, quite disarming criticism. She is very young, not positively handsome, but her good honest German face lights up with inspirations and grows beautiful at times, as did the homelier features of the Lind. This time she had all the pretty archness and vivacity of Nancy, singing delightfully, but always modestly within her character as second. The courting scene, between her and Plunkett, was worthy of the days of Phillips and Carl Formes. The sturdy, jolly farmer's part was well filled by Herr STEINECKE, who acts well and sings well, with a good baritone, only a little husky. The tenor, Herr HIMMER, was a tenore robusto indeed, refreshing to hear. None of the Brignoli sort of indifference or good-for-nothing sentimentality; a fine manly person and fine actor, with no nonsense, and a voice large, rich, firm and even in all its tones, still in its fresh prime, with a pure and noble style in the use of it, indulging little in ornament, but giving out the music honestly and largely, which the ear drinks in with more and more delight. For a very high note he resorts to the falsetto, but with good effect. On the whole, all felt that it was a long time since we had had so noble a tenor.

The part of the foolish old lover, Sir Tristram, found a suitable representative in Herr GRAFF, who is not the strongest basso of the troupe, but a useful one. The chorus, male and female, was a little larger than we have been used to, and far more effective, as well as better looking and acting, with musical, fresh, telling voices, singing with spirit and ensemble. The orchestra, of not quite 40 instruments, is remarkably good, especially in the reeds, and the brass do not bray out mere noise. The admirable unity with which all work together with a hearty will, as if to bring out the opera rather than to distinguish themselves, verifies what we have always heard, and what some of us who have been in Germany have known, of this peculiar merit of the German stage, whether in opera or drama. If they have not as many great singers or fine voices as the Italians, they always seek to realize a good artistic whole. All parts harmonize, and the subordinate parts are good, the minor details are cared for, so that the total impression is pleasant; unlike the slovenly manner in which most Italian operas are produced, with a few parts notable, and the rest lifeless or ridiculous.

Tuesday, May 5th, the charming old opera of Boieldieu, La Dame Blanche (Die weisse Dame). Audience considerably larger. This opera was written in 1825, and there has scarcely been a greater favorite on the French, the German, or the English stage. It was indifferently given in this city some 25 or 30 years ago, by an English and a French troupe, and much of the music is familiar, floating about in the general air, especially the beautiful overture. But the opera as such was new to us here and now. The work of a Frenchman, it is one of the operas which have become German by adoption and affinity. It is thoroughly genial music, Mozart-ish in spirit, and after the German heart. And it is one of the most graceful, beautiful and natural of all light romantic operas. Full of bewitching melodies, of the kind that never can become vulgar, it also continually surprises and delights the ear by fine traits of harmony and modulation and nice contrapuntal interweaving of voices. There is no vulgar commonplace, no claptrap, nothing of the maudling sentimental about it; full of tenderness, this music is all sound and wholesome. And the rendering was most happy. The part of George Brown presented another admirable tenor of the troupe, a tenore di grazia, Herr HABELMANN, in a most favorable light. Too much has not been said in Philadelphia of the beauty of his voice, nor of his pure, expressive style of singing, seconded by natural and graceful action. Certainly his singing of the old Scotch air "Robin Adair" in the last act was one of the most refined and exquisite specimens of ballad singing to be heard anywhere. Habelmann established himself at once in the hearty favor of his audience. When have we had a company with two such tenors!

Mme. JOHANNSEN was again the artist in the part of the White Lady. Mme. FREDERICI was all the more artist by consenting, with a true German spirit, to take the small part of the old servant Margaret, looking sweetly in her matron's cap and singing the little ballad touchingly. Fräulein CANISSA, a sprightly, rosy little black-eyed Jewish looking maiden, with one of those bright, hard-enamelled, clear and cutting little soprano voices, so like her eyes and face, has a good deal of vocal execution, acts lively and naturally, and made a nice Jenny, the coquettish little wife of farmer Dickson. The latter part was well filled by Herr CROMFELD, tenor, who looks, acts and sings like an old stager, perfectly at home in German opera, and happy in helping out the whole. One of the most important rôles is that of the crafty guardian and steward Galveston, which was splendidly done by Herr HERMANN, a magnificent basso, colossal in voice and person, dignified in action, and delivering his grand profondo tones or his rich ringing higher ones with equal clearness, truth and telling effect. We have had no such basso since the better days of Formes; and he has resources yet to be found out in other characters. In the spoken dialogue, which replaces the Italian purlando in most German operas—not advantageously, to our taste—Herr Hermanns is particularly clear and of chaste accent. Everybody went away delighted with Die Weisse Dame, and hoping it would be repeated.

Wednesday, Third Night. Gounod's "Faust" is another of those operas which we would willingly have left to the Italians, at least until we have secured some half a score of those distinctively best German works, with which our people are so unacquainted. Were it not better that a German troupe at first should stand on its peculiarity, doing what others cannot or do not do, and showing its catholicity later? But "Faust" is now the fashion; many there be and loud that call for it, and what more sure to fill the house? Besides there is curiosity to compare the German with the Italian rendering. The house was indeed much more nearly full. The verdict we think must be for the German presentment. There was much more life and spirit in it as a whole. The choruses, especially those of the "Kirmesse," made a livelier sensation. Herr HIMMER's voice and action were very fine in Faust, and the Mephistopheles of HERMANN was marvellously effective in its way, that of the popular tradition clown devil, and not the polished Iago-like gentleman, the 19th century devil, of Goethe. The Gretchen of FREDERICI was perfectly charming, more exquisite even than Miss Kellogg's, in that it seemed less like a study; she looked the type of modest, pious, lovely German maidenhood; her rich, soulful, sympathetic voice, and the seemingly unobtrusive truth of action, made it "a thing of beauty and of joy forever." The Church scene was omitted (many encores had made it late); but of the last scene, in the prison, much more was made than we have seen before. In no part would we have exchanged with the Italians, except for Bellini's Valentine, in which Herr STERNCKE was by no means bad. It was so artistic, too, to put JOHANNSEN in the pretty little part of Siebel, which she did exquisitely!

Thursday. A crowded house for Weber's Frey-schütz. Boston is alive to the fact of German Opera at last! The charm of the wonderful music is infallible, and the hope of hearing it for the first time well rendered made it the gala night of the week. Indeed it was an admirable performance. It was rare delight to listen to that orchestra and that wonderful instrumentation, the human and the mysterious expression of the high and low clarionet tones, the bassoons, the sylvan horns, etc., even were that all. Then the chorus, picturesque in appearance, sang so finely. HABELMANN, though struggling with a cold, gave the trying music of Max, its alternations of despair and hope, with true power of expression. GRAFF has not weight of voice, nor life enough, for Caspar; it should have been Hermanns for that is a great part. HRONFELD tossed off the vain Kilian's gay, triumphant song as well as his voice would let him, always true to the humor of the thing, as Nym has it.

But the memorable thing of all was the Agathe of FREDERICI. It was too beautiful to speak of; something almost holy in the truth and purity of feeling, the harmony of voice, song, look and action, which made it as near to Weber's ideal of the part as anything probably has ever come since Jenny Lind. The scene: "Wie nahte mir der Schlummer," with the prayer "Leise, leise," entranced the audience. All that we have said of her Gretchen was more than confirmed here. We have had greater executive vocalists, but, with the exception of Lind and Bosio, when so true a singer in the soul's sense of the word? Little CANISSA's voice is too outleaping and demonstrative at times, not so sympathetic and blending as we could wish, but she entered right heartily and prettily into the part of the merry and good little friend and cousin Aennchen, and sang its florid melody in a way that won with further hearing.

The diablerie of the Wolf's Glen scene was sufficiently elaborate; taken as a joke by the audience, of course, as it is in Germany, for such superstitions have long since lost their hold on the imagination; but one had only to listen to the orchestra to find it mystical and grand. The Bridesmaids' Chorus was as good as new, and so the Hunter's Chorus. The only pity is that the music in the last act of the Frey-schütz is so much weaker than the rest of the opera; there the inspiration seems to have run low; charming melodies are forced in, but nothing worked up to a culminating glory of ensemble.

The week closed with a couple of light operas, new to Boston, with only moderate audiences.

On Friday, Nicolai's "Merry Wives of Windsor," full of sparkling, graceful music, of which the overture had given us a foretaste, extremely comical, and having the advantage of a cleverly constructed libretto, as close as an opera could be to Shakespeare. HERMANN, by his capital impersonation, both in make-up, acting, song and spoken dialogue, quite dispelled our fears of the absurdity of Falstaff set to music. Hackett's Fat Knight is not more enjoyable, and here the music lifts it out of coarseness, without any loss of humor. He was as courtly and gallant, as he was droll and merry. The drinking song (drinking for a wager) was inimitable, and nothing could exceed the drollery of the solemn march and chorus with which the "dead men" were borne out. JOHANNSEN and FREDERICI, as Mrs. Ford and Mrs. Page, acted to the life, and had a good deal of sparkling, sometimes bravura, music to sing, especially the former, who did all with fine art and tact. HABELMANN again showed the beauty of his voice and style as Fenton, with CANISSA for his "sweet Anne Page." KRONFELD's Dr. Caius and HAIMER's Slender were comical enough.

For a Matinée on Saturday, Flotow's Stradella, which to our surprise we found more enjoyable than Martha. As music it has generally the same traits. The more serious and sentimental parts are the weakest, but there are some fine comic bits; and there is an unaccompanied trio, quite in the old Italian vein, that was singularly beautiful. A capital subject for an opera is the romantic story of the old composer, which the libretto wisely does not follow out to its tragical conclusion, but stops with the rescue of the lovers through the power of Stradella's music, melting the hearts of the assassins in Rome. The carnival and serenade (begun in had tune) in Venice, with the flight of the maestro and his pupil Leonora (another Abelard and Eloise), from the jealous guardian, made a picturesque first act of moonlight and tender music. The pursuit to Stradella's home near Rome, the simple wedding festival, and the quaint Italian humor of the two assassins, HABELMANN and STERNCKE, increase the interest in the second act, and a more picturesque, naive rogue than Habelmann was, could hardly be conceived. In the third act, the arrival of the guardian (Venetian lover in the history), the attempt of the assassins to creep up and stab Stradella while he rehearses his hymn for the Madonna Festival (the story says an Oratorio in the Lateran church), their repentance, and the happy union of the lovers, though, with the exception of the trio, less original as music, still leave the impression of a unique and pleasing whole. HIMMER was Stradella, and sung his music quite as well as it deserved. Both the fine tenors were in the cast! We have no room to say much of this opera. We enjoyed it much; only we could wish that the triumph of Music in the last act, where it melts the hearts of friend Malvolio and friend Barberino, and moves stones to repentance, were more signal, that is to say greater music.

Here we must pause for the present. This second week has offered after all but two new things, Don Juan (strange to say, the worst of their performances) and Fidelio, while Faust, Frey-schütz and Martha have been repeated, and Faust will be again repeated this afternoon, bringing the short, rich season to a close.

CONCERTS. We trust our readers will bear in mind the concert in the Music Hall, to-morrow evening, of Mr. PECK, the faithful and obliging superintendent of the Hall. He has Miss LOUISE KELLOGG for a prime attraction, and a varied programme in which a host of our best singers, organists, &c., will take part. The ORCHESTRAL UNION close their afternoon concerts next Wednesday with Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. A very nice synopsis of it will be found on another page, which we saved up from a Chicago Philharmonic programme. Mrs. FROHOCK will play the organ.

The past fortnight has been rich in Concerts, which we must review next time. Now we have scarcely room to mention the capital performance of "Elijah" (with Miss PHILLIPS as contralto); the charming concert, and enthusiastic reception, of Miss PHILLIPS, and of Mme. GUERRABELLA with her; Mr. Eichberg's Sacred Concert; the fine Organ Concerts of Mr. WHITING (a new hand at our Great Organ, and an adept) and of Mrs. FROHOCK; and two of the richest afternoon programmes of this rich season of the Orchestral Union.

NEW YORK. The fifth and last Philharmonic Concert (April 23) had for its main feature the great Symphony in C by Schubert. Carl Bergmann conducted the noble orchestra of seventy-five. The other selections were Schumann's Overture to "Genoveva;" Aria from Mozart's "Magic Flute;" Piano-forte Concerto in A minor, op. 85, by Hummel, played by Richard Hoffman; Romanza from Weber's "Euryanthe;" Concert Overture in A, by J. Rietz. The aria and Romanza were sung by Sig. Lotti, the German tenor of Maretzek's Italian Opera. The Philharmonic Society have an excellent rule whereby encores "cannot be permitted."

The Oratorio "Judas Maccabæus," a performance of which was mentioned in our last, was accompanied by an orchestra, and we are assured an efficient one. We gathered our first intelligence of the performance from a New York paper, which only mentioned a piano accompaniment. The Conductor's name, too, is Frederic Louis Ritter, and not Franz Ritter.

WORCESTER, MASS. "Stella" in the Palladium of last week thus chronicles Mr. C. C. Stearns's concert and the first performance of his new Mass.

It took place on Thursday evening, filled Washburn Hall to its full extent, and was pronounced one of the best concerts ever given in Worcester. It opened with a "Tantum Ergo," composed by Mr. Stearns, and well sung by the club under his leadership, with assistance of an efficient little orchestra of seven pieces. The work was well received, especially the second movement, which was brilliant and telling. Mrs. A. S. Allen sang "Jerusalem! thou that killest the Prophets!" with excellent expression; and a quartet choir sang Owen's "Ave Maria." The second part of the programme was occupied by Mr. Stearns's original Mass in A, a work noticed at length in our columns last week, and which, on the occasion of its first public performance, revealed new beauties to those who heard it in rehearsal, and won from the large audience only high encomiums of praise. Rarely does it happen that a young composer succeeds so well in bringing out his first work, in summoning such efficient aid—choral and instrumental, and in more than meeting public expectation. A more enthusiastic audience is rarely found in our concert-rooms; and yet it was not demonstrative, did not even demand an encore; but there was that unmistakable air of cordial appreciation, more valued doubtless by composer and performers than the loudest applause. The choruses were well sung; so, too, the majority of the solos, quartets, &c. The strong points of the work came out with new force, and the unity of the whole was even more apparent than before. The "Et Incarnatus," the "Agnus Dei"—with the Misere breathed out, rather than sung; and the "Dona Nobis," were especially admired. The orchestral parts were the subject of general remark for their originality, richness, and the sound musical knowledge shown in their composition. It is the general desire that the performance of the Mass should be repeated. We hope to hear it in Mechanics Hall, with a larger orchestra and an organ. Why not at the dedication of the fine instrument to be held here during the coming fall?

We should be glad to copy "Stella's" analytic description of the Mass, but its length renders that impossible just now. For the present, let an opinion, which we find in the Worcester Spy, suffice. The initials "E. H." denote one entitled to express an opinion:

The ear is not wearied with dull and frivolous commonplace, nor is a pure taste offended with the cheap surprises which too often form the staple of modern composition. There is that consistency of design and unity of effect combined with ingenuity of detail and, in many passages, elegance of finish, which belong to the higher class of composition. The aim of the author has been high, and he has reached his mark with much more success than commonly attends a first essay in the grand style. There are passages of great beauty in the course of the work, while there is not a single weak strain. It is not an imitation at all, but on the contrary quite an original production. The "Et incarnatus" is singularly fine, while the "Agnus Dei" and the "Dona nobis" have very striking merit. A careful criticism may detect here and there the traces of the youthful hand, particularly in the occasional redundancy of the harmony and the tendency to what is technically termed "imitation," that is, the repetition of the same melodic figure on too many degrees of the staff. The disposition towards "sequences" both in playing and in composition is characteristic of young performers and writers. It shows itself rarely however in this work. Upon the whole this production must be pronounced a decided achievement in a right direction, with fewer drawbacks than usual.

PHILADELPHIA. A grand Musical Festival, inaugurating the Great Central Fair (for the Sanitary Commission), opened on the 4th inst., at the Academy of Music, to last a fortnight. The entertainments consist of operas in the English language, Oratorios and miscellaneous concerts. The Oratorios announced are "The Creation" and "Judas Maccabæus." The operas are the "Bohemian Girl," by Balfe, "Maritana," by Wallace, and Mr. Wm. Henry Fry's new opera, "Notre Dame of Paris," the subject taken from Victor Hugo's romance. The committee state that "they deem the opportunity a favorable one to essay the illustration of music, in all its most popular forms, upon a scale hitherto unattempted in this country, and which will do justice to various compositions, as they are interpreted only in the chief capitals of Europe." To this end, the committee say:

They have made a contract with Mr. L. E. Harrison (now of New York, and formerly of this city), Manager of the American Opera Company. The artists and auxiliaries engaged by Mr. Harrison, far exceed in number and aggregate merit any force ever employed upon the Lyrical stage of this continent. The following are the names—the principal vocalists of the list having performed of late with great success in New York.

Musical Director—Mr. Theodore Thomas, of New York. Conductors of Oratorios—Dr. Leopold Meignen and Carl Sentz, of Philadelphia. Leaders in Miscellaneous Concerts—Dr. W. P. Cunningham and Messrs. C. C. Koppitz and Charles Dodworth, of Philadelphia. Leader of Military Band—Mr. Adolph Birgfeldt, of Philadelphia. Pianist—Mr. J. N. Pattison, of New York. Organist—Mr. Arthur H. Messiter, of Philadelphia. Harpist—Mr. Alfred F. Toulman, of New York. Operatic Stage Manager—Mr. B. A. Baker, of New York. Operatic Prompter—Mr. Leopold Engelke, of Philadelphia. First Soprano—Mrs. Comte Borchard. First Contralto—Mrs. Jenny Kempson. Second Contralto—Miss Louisa Myers. First Tenor—Mr. Walter Birch. First Barytone—Mr. S. C. Campbell. Second Barytone—Mr. William Skantz. Bass—Mr. Edward Seguin.

The Opera Chorus consists of one hundred selected singers, with a corps of accomplished amateur volunteers.

The Oratorio Chorus includes members of the Handel and Haydn Society, of the Harmonia Society, and of eleven German Choral Societies of this city, and of the Mozart Musical Union, of Reading, forming an aggregate of many hundreds of voices.

The orchestra and military band for operas, and all other divisions of the Festival, are composed of 95 of the most distinguished instrumentalists of Philadelphia and New York.

In the dramatic department of the operas are a Corps de Ballet, and other assistants, numbering one hundred and fifty.

The chief of these "hitherto unattempted" magnificencies is Fry's Opera, the production of which, we are told, costs the Fair some $12,000. For our poor soldiers' sake may it put as large a sum upon the profit side! Besides the array of singers, orchestra, and hundreds of people, ballet dancers, &c., on the stage, there is a church organ on the stage, and "a peal of full-sized church bells," while the scenery and stage appointments are "all elaborately illustrative of Paris in the fifteenth century." Three or four performances have thus far been given, and of course the newspaper critics all blaze out in full glorification of the new opera, if only because it is brought out on such a Jullienesque and magnitudinous scale, and is by an American. Some of the New York dailies, it seems, despatched their critics to Philadelphia expressly to report of it. (One would think it might have been heard as far as New York in a still hour.) One of those reports, that of the Tribune's "special," which we have copied on another page, gives the impression of an ardent believer in Fry's musical authority and genius, an advocate (in our own columns before now) of Fry's criticism, Fry's creatorship, and all Fry's eccentricities. Most of the local and the New York reporters are equally ready and wholesale with their praise. The only exception reaches us too late to copy it, a much more temperate, well considered article in the Press of May 9, which, evidently not withholding praise where praise is due, has such sentences as these: "Of course, it is very fulsome praise to rank 'Notre Dame' with the works of Bellini, Donizetti and Verdi—works of which it is not free from imitation. An inspiration of one melody, equal to the least of Bellini's, upon whom Mr. F. has modelled his sentimental music, would have given him a popular fame long ago." "Why yearn after the Italian mock Eden? Why attempt to rival Bellini's sweetness or Verdi's sonority?" "The man who translates a noble song into noble music will do his art and his nation a service, which imperfect operators, with all the drowning sensations of the stage, will not readily equal. Mr. Fry would gratefully acknowledge that one song of Schubert's, written in a quarter of an hour at a country tavern, is worth the whole of his laborious opera."

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE

LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

I'm a young man from the country. Comic song.

Harry Clifton. 30

The young man that nobody could "come it over," although he was from the "country." Fine melody.

'Twas evening, at the window. (Erinnerung.) Song.

Graben Hoffman. 30

Of much merit, A "forget-me-not" song, full of pensive thought.

Tenting on the old camp ground. W. Kittredge.

(As sung by the Hutchinson family.) 30

Another excellent war song, simple and clear in style, like other melodies sung by "the tribe of Ass."

Kyrie Eleison. (The sky is calm and cloudless.)

F. Boett. 30

One of Longfellow's solemn hymns, set to Mendelssohn-like music, by the Florence composer. The idea of the anthem, begun by the sounding surf in rocky caverns, responded to by the resounding lines of breakers, listened to by the stars, is well represented in the harmony.

Tragedy in the Tenth Avenue. Comic song.

C. W. Hunt. 30

Isabella with the gingham umbrella. Comic song.

H. Clifton. 30

Two funny songs, not very refined, but good enough as provocatives of mirth.

Sweet and low, wind of the western sea.

F. S. Davenport. 30

A charming lullaby, with sweet and chaste music.

Union and liberty forever. Song and Chorus.

W. O. Perkins. 30

A stirring chorus, suitable for war times.

Song of all songs. Combination song.

S. C. Foster. 30

One of the curious medley songs for which many people, just now, are so pleased.

Instrumental Music.

Young Zephyrs. (Tone Pictures, No. 6.)

Georg Reynald. 30

A graceful and effective piece, and good for pupils.

Carroll & Queen's double clog dance. Nos. 1 & 2.

G. L. G. 30

A couple of bright dancing tunes, familiar no doubt, to those who have attended, (and laughed,) at Morris' Pell and Trowbridge's entertainments. Has a colored title.

The echoes of Killarney. Brinley Richards.

One of Richard's sweetest pieces. Contains the melody of "The meeting of the waters." Not difficult.

Faust march. Soldier's chorus. For Brass Band. 1.00

This celebrated march is now ready for the bands around the country. Send in orders in time to bring it out on the fourth of July.

Ariel. Caprice a la valse. B. Richards. 50

Books.

Henning's Practical Violin School.

$2.50

This is an instruction book, with a great deal of plain, homely common sense in its directions to teachers and pupils, and is evidently the work of an instructor who loves "his trade" and his instrument. With German and English words.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 604.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MAY 28, 1864.

VOL. XXIV. No. 5.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Half a dozen of Beethoven's Contemporaries.

II. ANTONIO SALIERI.

[Continued from page 224.]

There is no account of any composition by Salieri in the year 1777; and after the success of Umlauf's operetta the Emperor, being full of the matter, gave his Kapellmeister leave to visit Italy, where his growing fame had now brought him three invitations to come and compose so many operas. In Milan a new opera house was to be opened—no less a one than the now famous Scala—and all the old and well known composers of the Italian cities were passed over, to call their young countryman—now about 27 years of age—from Vienna to write the opening piece. This was "Europa riconosciuta," text by Verazi, in two acts, with choruses and an analogous ballet in the middle of each act. The piece had great success spite of a miserable text, and long kept its place on the stage, though Mosel thinks it one of Salieri's poorer compositions.

From Milan the composer went to Venice to compose "La scuola de' Gelosi," an opera buffa, text by Mazzola, which was brought out early in 1779 and had extraordinary success. Salieri had with him on this tour a young German, now for the first time in Italy, who lodged with him in Venice, and accompanied him everywhere. The day succeeding the opening of the theatres after Christmas is, or rather was (while Venice was), a day for the assembling of all, who cared for music and the drama, in the coffeehouses, about St. Mark's place, to discuss or inquire about the new pieces, with which the various houses had opened. It is the custom in that city to name the theatres from the nearest church, but in talking about them to call them by the name of the saint only,—instead, for instance, of saying "the theatre near the church of St. Samuel," or "Teatro Sant' Angiolo," to say merely "San Samuele," or "Sant' Angiolo." On this morning Salieri with his companion took his coffee in one of the largest houses on the square, where the theatrical news was of course the main topic of conversation.

"Saint Benedict was hissed off," said one. "The Angel was pretty successful, but Saint Samuel went to the devil," said another, and so on. On leaving the house, the young German, astounded and indignant, remarked to Salieri: "How disrespectfully they do talk here of the saints!"

From Venice the composer journeyed to Rome to compose the opera buffa, "La partenza inaspettata," text by Petrosellini, which, with its beautiful, flowing melodies, corresponding exquisitely to the text, and its fine but simple accompaniment, in some of the vocal pieces consisting only of the quartet of bowed instruments, was another complete triumph.

These successes led to offers of new engagements, which with Joseph's permission he accepted, and therefore in the spring of 1779, he returned to Milan to compose "Il Talismano," text by Goldoni, for the opening of another new theatre—Alla Cannobiana. This was also an opera buffa with choruses, in two acts.

Passing through Florence on his way north, he found the manager of the principal house just ready to bring out his "Fiera di Venezia," and that functionary besought him, at least, be present at the general rehearsal, to which he consented. The rehearsal was set for the evening, and at the hour soloists and orchestra were ready, but not a chorus singer. "Why are they solate?" asked Salieri. "Because the shops are not shut," was the answer. The explanation of which was, that most of the Italian choruses then were made up of shopkeepers or their assistants, who, knowing not one note from another, learned their parts by rote, and never made a mistake,—but they had only Italian choruses to sing.

The directors of the new Cannobiana theatre, three noblemen of Milan, had arranged to open the house with three works: Salieri's "Fiera di Venezia," "Il Talismano," and finally, an opera to be set by a composer named Russ. While the vocalists were studying the first, Salieri set himself to work upon the second, of which Goldoni had sent the first act and the plan of the whole. The second act was delayed by the sickness of Goldoni. Then the theatre was not ready in time, and, as the singers were only engaged up to a certain date, it became impossible to produce the third of the proposed operas, and poor Russ saw himself deprived of the opportunity of proving his talents, and must perforce content himself with the present made by the directors and the written invitation or engagement for the next season. Salieri pitied the man in his bitter disappointment, and, satisfied with having one of his operas performed, he proposed to the directors, that they give the second act of "Il Talismano," which had now arrived, to Russ. They did this; Russ composed it, and the work was a complete success.

A change in the management of the theatre in Venice, the old manager having died, and the want of sufficient security that his time and labor would be adequately rewarded, led Salieri to give up the composition of "L'isola capricciosa," which the poet Mazzola had already sent him, and of which he had already several numbers finished. He therefore remained some time longer in Milan, and then returned to Rome to compose another opera text by Petrosellini, "La dama pastorella," for the Carneval of 1780, a work which he himself says "neither pleased nor displeased."

In Rome he received an invitation to Naples, where Joseph's disreputable sister Caroline was queen, to compose a serious opera for San Carlo, to be brought out in May, 1780, and to prepare his "Scuola de' gelosi" for production upon the so-called Florentine Theatre. A third leave of absence was therefore necessary. The composer was long in doubt whether he could with propriety apply again for an extension of his leave; but as it was for only three months, and as he had received the invitation through the Austrian Ambassador, Count v. Lamberg, and with the approbation of the King of Naples—Joseph's brother-in-law—he took courage and sent on his application to Count Rosenberg, chief chamberlain, and head of the court theatre at Vienna—him, who had the previous year obtained the prolongation of his leave of absence—and went on to Naples to begin his work and await the reply. His petition was written in the most respectful terms, and his reasons displayed in the clearest light, and there is no doubt that, had Joseph read it, the three months would have been granted him at once. But Rosenberg, as he afterwards confessed, placed the petition in his cabinet and forgot it, and made Salieri's desire known to Joseph in few words and with no explanation of the circumstances under which the petition was written and which certainly justified it. The result was that the composer received the following answer:

"In reply to the petition addressed to his Majesty for leave to remain still longer in Italy, All-highest—the same makes it my duty to write you, that you are your own master to remain so long there as you please or think for your good; yes, that you, if you find yourself better off there than here, may remain there forever. I am pained to be unable to make you any pleasanter reply and remain, &c., &c."

It was a very unlucky mistake of Salieri's not to have sent word to Rosenberg with his petition, that, in the hope of receiving the desired leave, he was going on to Naples in order to save all the time possible. The ungracious reply was sent to Rome and thence forwarded by a friend to him in Naples. Meantime Salieri had waited upon Count Lamberg and had been presented at court, where the king and queen had received him with great favor. He had also begun the composition of his opera, "La Semiramide."

The surprise and fright with which Rosenberg's letter filled him were overwhelming. He hastened to Lamberg to ask his advice, who sought to calm him, by persuading him that if the queen should apply to her brother in his behalf the matter would have no serious consequences. Salieri therefore determined to apply at once to the queen, but as he returned to his lodgings, and thought it over, it presented itself in a very different light. He remembered that Joseph, friendly as he was, invariably, towards every man and especially to those constantly about him, did not like to be forced to say yes, where he had once said, no. Filled with anxiety lest the mere refusal of his petition might not be all, but that a loss of his master's favor might follow, he returned to Count Lamberg and, most urgently entreating him to find a way of cancelling his engagement with the Neapolitan court, departed on the instant for Vienna. Before entering his carriage he wrote to Count Rosenberg, entreating forgiveness for his too great freedom, and announcing his immediate departure from Naples.

At noon, April 8, 1780, he joined his delighted family—that is on the second anniversary of the day on which he began his Italian journey. His first call was upon Rosenberg; but not finding him at home, he went to the palace and, as a mark of his submission to the will of the Emperor, instead of proceeding into Joseph's apartment, as his right was and as he had always done, remained without in the corridor, where petitioners awaited their monarch, who came thither every afternoon at three o'clock to hear them and receive their papers. There, a little apart from some twenty persons, mostly country people, who awaited the Emperor, Salieri took his place, not a little afraid of a cool reception.

At the hour Joseph returned from a ride, came as usual through the corridor, listened to the petitioners, talked with them more like a father than a monarch, and suddenly caught sight of the Kapellmeister. Hastening to him he exclaimed:

"See, here is Salieri! I did not expect you so soon; have you had a pleasant journey?"

"An excellent one, your majesty," he answered timidly, "notwithstanding, in order to repair my fault, for which I humbly pray forgiveness, I felt bound to travel day and night, that I might so much the sooner resume my duties here at court."

"It was not necessary to hurry so," said Joseph, kindly, "still, it is a pleasure to me to see you again. Now go up stairs, we will try some pieces out of your new operas, which have been sent to me from Italy."

These good words so calmed and encouraged the musician that he forgot all the troubles which his hurried journey had caused him. On entering the ante-chamber he found some of the older members of the Court Chapel, who rejoiced all the more to see him, as a report had obtained currency, that he had fallen under the Emperor's displeasure. Half an hour later came Joseph, put the petitions and documents, which he had received, into his cabinet, seated himself in the music-room to his dinner, and had Salieri called in to talk with him during his solitary meal of fifteen minutes duration. "Had he found his family all well?" he asked, and put various questions in relation to his tour, to his compositions while away, and the like. Salieri told his story, and of course came at last to the Neapolitan business. As in some confusion, he confessed, that he had left home for Naples without waiting for permission to do so, in full faith that this permission would follow him, Joseph, with a sudden turn of his head—one of his peculiarities—fixed his eyes upon him with an expression of surprise. Salieri ceased and there was a moment's pause; during which he (Salieri) thought his master, who had not known that the matter had gone so far, was sorry not to have granted his petition; still he said nothing, and gave the conversation a new turn by the question: "Where did you find the best orchestra?" Salieri saw that nothing more was to be said on the Naples affair and bore himself accordingly.

After his meal the other musicians were called in, and Joseph devoted his usual concert hour to pieces from "Europa riconosciuta," and "La Scuola de' Gelosi." The concert over, Salieri was told to visit in the evening the new "National (Sing-spiel) Sing-drama," for so Joseph called his German opera. "You must then tell me," added the Emperor, "if the company and the establishment have made progress during your absence." At the next private concert, Joseph asked as soon as he saw Salieri. "How, do you find our national Sing-drama?" The composer, really pleased with what he had seen and heard, replied, that he had found it in all respects wonderfully perfect. "Now you shall compose a German opera," said Joseph. Salieri proposed the translation of one of his fine operas, composed in Italy. "No translation," returned the other, smiling, "an original sing-drama." "Your majesty, I do not know how to set about the work of an opera in the German language, I speak it so badly." "Very well," said Joseph, still smiling, "the labor will answer for an exercise in the language. I will to-morrow morning give Rosenberg the order to have a German operatic poem prepared for you."

This, which was proposed in joke, Salieri had to carry out in full earnest—for which, however, he had plenty of leisure, as Maria Theresa happened to die soon after (Nov. 29, 1780), and the court theatres were of course for some weeks shut up.

(To be Continued.)

Giacomo Meyerbeer.

Giacomo Meyerbeer, or Jacques Meyer-Liebman Beer, was born at Berlin, on the 5th of September, 1794—according to most of his biographers. The eighth edition of the Dictionnaire de la Conversation of Leipsic, however, places the date of his birth three years earlier, in 1791—the year before Rossini was born—and this fact has crept into many historical dictionaries. The father, Jacques Beer, was a wealthy Jewish banker, and the name has made itself famous in the arts and sciences. Giacomo had two brothers, both of whom became celebrated. Guillaume, accounted among the best astronomers of Germany, obtained the astronomical prize from the Academy of Sciences, of Berlin, for a map of the moon, and died in 1850. Michel, who died in 1833, at the early age of 34, was one of the most promising dramatic poets in Germany, which is attested by his tragedies of the Paria and Struensée, for the latter of which, some years later, Giacomo composed an overture and incidental music.

All the biographers of Meyerbeer point to the premature indications of his genius. Some assert that even as early as his fourth year he exhibited undoubted manifestations of musical intelligence. This we can readily believe; but that he should at that period transfer the tunes he heard played in the streets on barrel-organs with the right hand to the pianoforte, and make out correct harmonies with his left, is asking us to believe too much. The parents, enraptured with the boy, entrusted his musical education to Lauska, a pianist, pupil of Clementi, a good player and teacher. Meyerbeer made astonishing progress under his new master, and at six years of age had become a little lion-pianist in the salons of Berlin. The father and mother never contemplated educating their young prodigy for a public career; but they thought such extraordinary talents should not be wasted, and provided the best instruction in their power. When only nine years old Giacomo was considered one of the first pianists in Berlin. On the occasion of two benefit concerts, at the theatre—on the 17th of November, 1803, and the 2nd of January, 1804—he was heard for the first time, by the public, and achieved an immense success. The Abbé Vogler, who at that time enjoyed celebrity in Germany, as organist and rhetorician, heard him at these concerts, and pronounced that he would one day be a great musician. Some time afterwards Clementi, hearing the youthful pianist, was so much charmed, that, in spite of an increasing dislike to teaching, he gave Giacomo lessons during the whole time of his stay in the Prussian capital.

While yet in his tenth year, and before he had received instructions in harmony, Meyerbeer had composed many pieces for pianoforte and voice, without any other guide than his own particular instinct. A master was, nevertheless, provided for him in Bernard Anselm Weber, pupil of the Abbé Vogler, and chef d'orchestre of the Opera at Berlin, with whom he studied for some years. In 1809, the Abbé Vogler sent for Meyerbeer to Darmstadt; at the cathedral of which place the Abbé was organist. Meyerbeer there found among his fellow students Carl Maria von Weber, Carl's brother, and Gaensbacher, subsequently chapel-master at the Church of St. Stephen, in Vienna. Devoting himself heart and soul to the study of harmony, and particularly directing his attention to Church music, in a very short time he wrote his first sacred work—an oratorio, called God and Nature, which had a great success, and which induced the Grand Duke, after having heard it, to appoint him composer to the Court. The year following Meyerbeer produced his first opera—entitled Jephthah's Vow—at Munich. The story was ill-suited for dramatic purposes, and the music betrayed too great a leaning to the severe style of composition, and too little inclination towards attractive melody. Meyerbeer obtained extraordinary success, however, as a pianist at this time, and betook himself to Vienna, the city of Pianists, as it was called, with the intention of performing in public. It was, nevertheless, many months before he ventured to confront a Viennese audience, being somewhat scared at the great success of Hummel, then in the very zenith of his talent. When Meyerbeer did play he had a triumphant reception, which induced the director of the Court Theatre to entrust him with the composition of an Opera, entitled, Abimelech; or, The two Caliphs. This work had little success, Italian music alone being in favor with Prince Metternich and the nobles attached to the Court. Salieri, who was at that period in Vienna, advised Meyerbeer to go to Italy and study the Italian models. The young German musician, though he had no belief in Italian composers and little faith in Italian art, was quite open to conviction, and the counsels of the composer of The Danaids and Tarare had their weight. Meyerbeer arrived in Italy at the moment when the Tancredi furor was raging at its highest. Becoming a convert to the fascination of the Rossini style he wrote his first Italian Opera, called Romilda e Costanza, which was produced at Padua, in 1818—Pisaroni sustaining the principal character. The following year he composed Semiramide Riconosciuta, which was played at Turin; and the year after Emma di Resburgo, represented at Vienna with enthusiastic applause. Returning to Berlin in 1821, Meyerbeer composed for the theatre there an Opera after the Italian style, called The Gate of Brandenburg, which, though accepted, was not brought out. He then returned to Italy, having been engaged to compose Margaret of Anjou for the Scala, at Milan, which was brought out at Milan in 1822. To Margaret of Anjou succeeded, in 1823, L'Esule di Granata—Pisaroni and Lablache sustaining the chief parts. Atmanzor was written for Rome, but not produced on account of the illness of the prima donna. In 1825, Il Crociato in Egitto was performed at Venice with a success which made the worshippers of Rossini tremble for the supremacy of their idol. This Crociato was welcomed all over Europe with acclamations, and sealed the reputation of Meyerbeer as a composer of real genius. Its first representation in London was memorable for the introduction of Malibran on the operatic stage.

From 1825 to 1831 Meyerbeer's operatic muse was silent. He married in 1827, and two children, the only issue, died soon after birth. He was not idle, however, during this period, but composed many sacred pieces. Robert le Diable, written expressly for the Grand Opera, of Paris, was, after repeated delays, brought out on the 21st of November, 1831. The singers were Mlle. Falcon, Madame Dorus-Gras, MM. Nourrit and Levasseur. It was said that Robert le Diable marked a new epoch in the lyric art. Certainly Meyerbeer flashed upon the world with unexpected effulgence. Few recognized the captivating, half Italian style of the Crociato, in the weird-like, original, and powerfully dramatic music of Robert, with its brightly-colored orchestration and marvellous fitness to its supernatural theme. A new composer was acknowledged, and Meyerbeer was criticized as though he had not previously existed. Between the production of Robert, and that of the Huguenots nearly five years elapsed. The Huguenots was considered an advance on Robert in dramatic interest, if not in beauty and variety of melody, and, the story being more interesting, it became most popular, as it is indeed the veritable master-work of its composer. The interval between the Huguenots and the Prophète—the third production of Meyerbeer at the Grand Opera—was nearly three times that between the Huguenots and Robert. The Prophète was brought out in 1849; but the Camp of Silesia, the Marche aux Flambeaux, and some minor works had been composed meanwhile. In 1857 the Etoile du Nord was produced at the Opéra-Comique, and, in 1859, the Pardon de Ploërmel at the same theatre. Of the Africaine, which Meyerbeer treasured up with so much care and held back from the public with such strange tenacity, we only know that it has been long finished, and that the composer was only delaying its production till he could meet with a fit representative for the part of the heroine. We may, however, hope that this long looked-for offspring of the great musician's genius will be speedily brought to light. It is a legacy bequeathed by Meyerbeer to the world, which the world is prepared to accept with gratitude and delight.

American Opera—Mr. Fry's "Notre Dame."

(From the Philadelphia Press.)

The third performance of the new opera of "Notre Dame" has been a success quite as general as its first and second, and upon this fortunate fact we congratulate the composer and the public for which he has labored. The cordial hearing Mr. Fry's work has received is a promise, we trust, of much more extended favor. We again express our admiration of the splendid and spirited first scene of the opera, which, in point of stage effect, has never, doubtless, been excelled in America. Produced under direction of an American composer, with American artists and an American chorus, and an orchestra of the largest and best character, it deserves all praise. The grand chorus which is one of the chief attractions of the opera has been heard with great applause, and the improved energy and confidence of the principal artists is gratifying, as this part of the production has been the least satisfactory.

To our former notice of the opera we must add the more emphatic expression of greater praise of the study, care, and wide industry and vigor (especially remarkable in a composer of our own) which Mr. Fry has shown in his chorus and orchestra, and in the mass and body of his work. That it is so generally sustained, and at the same time so broad an effort, is the most important and encouraging fact which we glean from a judgment of its merits. Mr. Fry has been attentive to particulars which better known composers have perhaps neglected. Of course, it is very fulsome praise to rank "Notre Dame" with the works of Bellini, Donizetti, and Verdi—works of which it is not free of imitation, and with which it doubtfully compares in elaboration. An inspiration of one melody, equal to the least of Bellini's, upon whom Mr. Fry has modelled his sentimental music, would have given him a popular fame long ago. We could name many passages in "Notre Dame" which do credit to the study and fine taste of its able composer; a few, also, which breathe real strength, or very nearly so, in an atmosphere of imperfection; but we shall not do him the injustice of ranking him with his masters.

We again take occasion to praise the admirable light music which gives so much spirit and charm to the ballet scene, and can only regret that this scene is unnecessary to the work as a whole. Quasimodo's soliloquy in the belfry is among the best-modelled and strongest passages, but is spoiled in the rendering of Mr. Seguin, and weakened by the concluding Bell song, which is comparatively trivial, though excellent in subject. The fine song of the Royal Scotch Guard, which belongs to the hale and simple, but not uncommonplace English school, is well worked up, admirably sung, and will continue, we think, to receive the greatest share of the popular applause. "I know that I love him" is an ingenious and pretty piece of musical broiery; "Vision of Love" is excellent, if we ignore that it is an imitation of Spirto Gentil—and other clever and equally attractive things might be instanced with similar qualifications, but all would show, we think, meritorious imperfection, rather than, in the least instance, anything discreditable to the high reputation which Mr. Fry enjoys. We should, perhaps, except one instance, which occurs in the belfry, and in these lines,

—"So up and down they go,
The low now high, the high now low."

The last line is measured off into music, (should we call it music?) the "low" very low, the "high" very high, and, as a piece of construction, is worthy of a carpenter. Mr. Fry may have celebrated precedents to fall back upon, but such work is only journeywork, nevertheless. Here the question is suggested, whether, if Mr. Fry had grown in a community more critical, he would have made such fripperies of musical diction. It vexes us to think that, with so much industry and ability, he has shown so little tendency to absolute creation. From the nature of the case, it is very difficult or impossible for a foreign composer to surrender his musical allegiance to the young Italy of Bellini and Donizetti, and preserve the color of originality. This garden of art, if as charming as Italy itself, is limited and ephemeral. Wiser composers than Mr. Fry are content to abide in their own fields, nature having gifted the mind of all lands and the experience of every nation with something that is their own. Such a gift is not to be despised, and is wisely bestowed—if it is only a rock in Scotland, a lawn in Ireland, a grove in England, a forest in Germany, and a wilderness in America. Besides, we must regard the different life and enterprise and sentiment of different civilizations, all of which should affect a composer and a man of art. Genius is representative. Why yearn after the Italian mock Eden? Why attempt to rival Bellini's sweetness or Verdi's sonority? It would be ridiculous for an American to think of writing melo-dramas of intrigue against Alexander Dumas, and it would be just as absurd for him to attempt to follow Verdi. Our composer must think for himself, and not be carried away like a waif in the deluge of another's sensation. If it is right to compare our music with our literature, how would Mr. Fry stand by the side of Mr. Bryant? Our poet is a literary patriot, and as he breathes the great moral of the Wilderness in Thanatopsis, is a more loyal American than even Fennimore Cooper. But Mr. Fry is neither patriot nor cosmopolitan. Imitation is not the characteristic of the two most prominent English composers, and yet Wallace has given us some melodies, if not as broad, yet almost as profoundly sweet as Bellini, and Balfe has written choruses and ballads perhaps not unworthy of Auber. Both Wallace and Balfe are more or less cosmopolitan, for both are Irishmen and Irishmen are wanderers; but they have done much, unquestionably, to make an English opera out of Irish genius, and if they have gone to the continent for their stories, their music is chiefly from themselves. Our American composer has not received his naturalization.

Let us, however, be as patient as Mr. Fry has been. In his time and circumstances it has been an especially difficult matter to write an opera—much more difficult to produce one. Comparatively speaking, the composer has been without critics and without friends. We give him that sincere acknowledgment which we should give to an indomitable man, and heartily trust that his health will be spared for deeper and higher efforts. More than this, we hope that his excellent example will, in good time, lead many others to surpass him. Even if "Notre Dame" does not prove a permanent work, Mr. Fry has achieved a considerable success, which, everything considered, is honorable to himself and the musical cause in America. We trust that he has truly become the father of American opera, and higher recognition than this he need not wish. His brave efforts for his own music and ours deserve the praise and thanks of the public; and, not least in his favor, "Notre Dame" merits criticism. Of course he has not equalled Bellini or Donizetti—it would be enough could he compare with Wallace. But he has done well, and the public may justly admire what he has done, as something much superior in artistic respects to operas which have gained foreign attention.

In this connection, we recall that upon its first performance we gave the necessarily hasty opinion that "Notre Dame" was at least equal in spirit and purpose to the lyricized version of Bulwer's "Last Days of Pompeii," recently brought out by the Italians, here and in New York, with some "sensation." So much has the former improved upon our judgment that we are fortunately able to regard it as even preferable to the Italian work, which audiences, here and in New York, applauded greatly, and which the criticism of our neighbor city flattered, as it generally flatters every thing sensational. "Ione" is an instance of Verdian fanaticism, without the soul of Verdi—melo-dramatic music with plenty of energy, but utterly wanting genius or originality—fierce trash, flash success, but only fit for rabid catgut and extreme lungs. But if "Ione" prove a triumph in Naples, not to mention New York, we have no hesitation in saying that Mr. Fry's opera deserves far more, in comparison, of the public of America. If the American composer is not mad with genius, he is not insane for want of it. Measured by the highest standards, there is much in "Notre Dame" that might be condemned in the same spirit with which we censure "Ione;" but we accept it as rather an excellent home article, and not a pretentious and worthless import. It is to be regretted, however, that in our domestic production of opera we must sometimes take Verdi and Donizetti, smuggled in at second-hand; and it is a compliment to Mr. Fry's sincere efforts to say that he is not well adapted to the business, and that Signor Petrella makes more characteristic Italian music.

The libretto in the drama of "Notre Dame" has been thought worthy of special remarks, and we shall, therefore, pay it attention. As it is written by a brother of the composer (Mr. J. Reese Fry, of this city,) we may suppose that there has been a fair understanding between the musician and his dramatist, who has furnished him doubtless with the opportunities he desired. The composer might have had a higher ambition and desired more; for if there is a marked falling off and want of balance in the last act of the opera, it is especially the fault of the dramatist, whose want of equal tact gives the composer his only excuse for inserting the meritorious but irrelevant ballet scene.

The libretto is tolerably versified, and will compare favorably with the average of libretto-writing, which, as custom goes, is a business, rather than an art, as it should be. The bell-song, in the second-act—we do the librettist justice to say—is better worded than composed, for, although in most respects only a common-place piece of writing, it contains one or two felicitous suggestions of poetry, the only instances, we think, in the whole libretto, which the composer has altogether neglected. Poetry seems to Mr. Fry's muse untranslatable—and poetry we must regard as the test of the genius and thought of the composer—as, on the other hand, (we think it worth while to say) the musical element and feeling is only a less general test, perhaps, of poetry. The two arts, poetry and music, are by nature wedded as man to wife, though they have too often had merely a fashionable understanding—a conventional mutuality. Edgar Poe (and who understood the subject more finely?) suggested everything when he said that music was needed to complete the perfect poem, and the subtle musical quality of his own poems is proof of his theory. That so many fine songs are sung to barren words only shows that the composer is often a poet when his versifier is only prosaic. Beethoven, Weber, Schubert, Schumann, Mendelssohn, have given equal music to the songs of Goethe and Schiller, Körner, Heine, Müller, Salis, Tieck, and many more, besides even hard Klopstock, (sparing a thought of what they have lavished, out of the wonderful magnanimity of the German genius, on the literature of other lands), till German poetry is almost one great song, and German music one grand poem. Not to know the music of Germany is almost not to know its poetry. Again we say, with what application we can make of it to opera, that the test of the music is poetry; but opera, as it is popularly understood, is not the best work to employ the developing art of our country. The man who translates a noble song into noble music will do his art and his nation a service which imperfect operatists, with all the drowning sensations of the stage, will not readily equal. Mr. Fry would gratefully acknowledge that one song of Schubert's, written in a quarter of an hour at a country tavern, is worth the whole of his laborious opera. Here we, perhaps unfairly, oppose genius to talent; but Mr. Fry has shown great talent. In giving him praise, we chiefly pay tribute to the musical science displayed in a singular instance upon the largest popular scale. Yet, we ask the considerate question—Can we have any decidedly American opera before we possess something like American song, making allowance for the English influence in music which, small as it is, is even greater than our own? Will our music rise to the level of poetry, and shall we have creation instead of scholarship? Something will be wanted to give our music feet and our poetry wings—to make song a home-dweller in our own groves and by our own households. Fortunately, the Germans have come among us, to show us how to celebrate Shakespeare, to explain Beethoven, and, if they cannot instruct us in social freedom, to teach us at least the glorious liberty of art. We may overrate the element which we admire, but no one will question that America owes it much indeed. Though this may seem a vulgar fact to the thin and debonnaire dilettantism which is so easy a patron of Italian opera, it is, nevertheless, a wholesome and every-day truth.

We return to the new version of "Notre Dame," which the libretto has so narrowly escaped making an oratorio instead of an opera. In a dramatic respect, what he has done is as easy as the block-building. With so much fine material at hand, ready-made, it is surprising that he has constructed so poor a work. The popular drama, as presented at the theatres, and originally prepared for the French stage, we think, by Victor Hugo, or his son, furnishes a frame for music incomparably stronger than the present bald version. It is Mr. J. R. Fry's "Notre Dame," not Hugo's, and if presented in Paris, where the composer originally endeavored to bring it out, might have entailed upon the music an irredeemable fiasco. Passing the well-managed and striking first act, character and story are alike deficient—the ordinary stage stock dressed from Hugo's wardrobe. There is hardly a moral reason why Quasimodo should wear a hump or ring a bell—and this is the more apparent, since the music also lacks the character which the drama does not supply. Why does not Gudule sing from her miserable cloister, according to literary truth, instead of ambulating her grief like a genteel widow? Surely an enterprising composer would not have missed so good an effect, and even a man of talent might have made much of it. The scene where Esmeralda flies to the church for sanctuary, and is carried in by the Hunchback, is also ignored by our librettist. Effects like these, if not larger, strike deeper than carnival scenes and great processions, and operatists and librettists must rest their claim to theatrical success upon these simpler merits of purpose and action rather than adjuncts of scene. We object to the bad taste of calling Captain Phœbus (as he is characteristically known the world over) Captain de Chateaupers; but all may be summed up in our general objection to the whole perversion of "Notre Dame," which shows as little art as possible. The story of the opera is not as good as even that of "Il Trovatore;" obviously it should be better. We do not expect the librettist to have the dignity of the dramatist—all that we ask from him is the common sense and tact of a play-wright. Mr. Fry's "Notre Dame," badly constructed as the play is, has still action enough, we hope, to hang success upon. The first scene, and doubtless the first act, are ably managed, and what with the magnitude of the chorus and scenery in its presentation at our noble Academy, its splendid effect is unquestionable. The composer's general sustenance of action is, as we have already said, greatly to his credit, and induces us to think that with a better libretto he might have made a better work of music. With all its defects, "Notre Dame" has sufficient attraction, from the great prestige of Hugo's immortal work, the prodigious magnificence of its production, and the merits of its composer, to draw all to its hearing who are disposed to appreciate a liberal stage, and to favor the cause of our own patriotism and art.

Beethoven's "Fidelio."

Beethoven's Opera, "Fidelio," was produced in November, 1805, at the Imperial House at Vienna, under the title of Leonora. In 1814, it was revised throughout, and put upon the stage, under its present title; since which time, no work has been a greater favorite upon the German stage. The plot is simple: Florestan, a Spanish nobleman, and intimate friend of the Prime Minister, has, in some manner fallen into the power of his arch enemy, Pizarro, Governor of one of the castles of the kingdom, used as a prison, who has thrust him into one of the lowest dungeons, and is reducing his portion of bread and water daily, to destroy him with all the horrors of slow starvation. Leonora, the wife of Florestan, seeking her husband in all directions, at length has her suspicions aroused that he is in this prison, assumes male attire, and enters the service of Rocco, the head jailer.

In the opening scene, we have some by-play between Jacquino, another servant, and Marcellina, daughter of Rocco, in which the girl breaks off her engagement of marriage with Jacquino, in favor of the elegant and cultivated Fidelio. The latter comes in from the city with chains purchased for Rocco, and with letters for Pizarro. Marcellina announces her desire to marry Fidelio; old Rocco consents and blesses the union. Pizarro enters; Rocco requests him to appoint the future son-in-law his assistant, which is granted. Among the letters is one sent by a friend to the Governor, informing him that the Minister is secretly on his way to examine the prison and that he must prepare to meet him that day. Pizarro sees that his only means of escape is in the death of the prisoner, and tempts Rocco to murder him. He refuses utterly. He then orders him to clear out an old cistern in the dungeon for a grave, and will commit the deed himself. After he retires, Fidelio persuades Rocco to allow the prisoners to come out of their dungeons into the court of the castle to inhale the fresh air, and enjoy the sunshine. They appear and she scrutinizes their faces, in hopes of finding Florestan, in vain. Pizarro, appearing again, is enraged to find the prisoners out of their cells, and Rocco excuses it as a custom upon the King's birthday, and reminds him that one is dying in the deep vault beneath the castle.

In Act Second, we follow Rocco and his new assistant into the vault, whither they come to dig the grave. Florestan, chained to his hard couch, is seen lying in the dim obscurity of the dungeon. The grave is dug; Fidelio, trying in vain to catch a sight of the prisoner's features. She persuades Rocco to give the dying man the piece of bread and the pitcher of water they have brought with them for their refreshment. When all is ready, Pizarro is called. In the first act, the Governor has ordered a watch in the tower of the castle, to give a signal upon a trumpet, the moment the Minister appears. Now the monster approaches the prisoner, ordering Fidelio to retire. She has at length seen the features of her husband, and in an agony of suspense, hides herself behind a neighboring pillar. Ordering Florestan to be loosed from his confinement, he addresses him in an aria expressive of hate, satiated vengeance, and infernal triumph—an aria, in the mouth of a competent singer, and before an audience whose knowledge of the German language enables them to feel its truthfulness, which is a masterpiece of unbridled rage and passion. He raises his dagger, and Fidelio rushes between them. "Slay first his wife!" she cries. Throwing her violently aside he raises the weapon, but she again springs before him and points a pistol to his breast. At this instant the trumpet comes faintly sounding down from the ramparts, and Florestan is saved. Pizarro baffled retires, and leaves the husband and wife to the joy, too great for words, which can only find vent in the sweetest sounds of music.

Here was a subject after Beethoven's own heart. No dramatic story could better embody the sentiment that burns in all his music. The struggle of the soul with destiny, of light with darkness; Joy ("Choral Symphony"), Freedom, Truth, Humanity, bright ideals, natural rights and objects of the soul, postponed by human wrong and error; darkness, confinement and long suffering for the present, but glorious delivery at last by heavenly, all-conquering, human Love. The deliverance of the prisoner, made so because he "dared to utter Truth," through the high faith and persevering heroism of a devoted wife. The moral sublimity of this inspired him to his task. The fortune of his effort was alike characteristic. The first production was a failure. Vienna then, (in 1805), was occupied by the French army; the theatres were deserted; an audience of unmusical French soldiers, with but a sprinkling of friends of the true sort, found it tedious. He had written more for Art, than for the convenience of singers, and these important personages murmured at the difficulty of the music; he had enemies besides; the German libretto, adapted by Sonnleithner from an earlier one in French, was not altogether well managed; it was badly divided in three acts; the composer had not studied popular effect sufficiently, and was persuaded into endless bother of altering and re-altering. Peace restored in 1814, it was again brought out in Vienna, wisely compressed into two acts, and with many parts omitted or re-written; and in this form we have it now.

Beethoven wrote for his opera four overtures. The first did not satisfy. The third, known in our concerts as the "Leonora" overture, in C, is a different treatment of ideas found in No. 2. This is by far the finest of the four, as well as by far the fittest introduction to the opera, since it is a résumé of its leading themes and incidents, and conceived in the lofty tone and spirit of the whole. Beethoven much preferred the overture in C; but many thought it too long and too great a work for the commencement, and hence he substituted the lighter and brighter overture in E, now commonly played before Fidelio. This borrows nothing from the opera itself; has on the contrary a lively and Don Juan-like expression, and only connects itself as a natural prelude to the lighter and half-comic situations with which the play commences. There is only this advantage about it, that it conforms to the remarkable crescendo of the entire music, beginning with the lightest and least exciting, and grows more and more intensely tragical and grand until the climax where the prisoner is saved. The composition consists of sixteen numbers.

No. 1 is a gay and charming, half-comically serious duet, (in A), between Marcellina and Jacquino, who presses her to name the happy day; but she, poor simpleton, is all in love with the supposed youth Fidelio. The music is Mozartian, clear and sparkling. Knocks at the door keep interrupting the luckless lover just as he thinks he is getting on so famously in his suit.

No. 2, in C minor, commencing Andante, is a sentimental Aria by Marcellina, in which she sighs and dreams of union with Fidelio, and then as the richly sombre instrumentation, "growing to a point," dashes down a scale of triplets and quickens to a livelier movement, she gives utterance to the inspirations of hope. Mozartian still, beautifully and truly so, except in the Beethoven climax and change just mentioned.

No. 3 is unmistakably Beethoven; a few bars of his mystical and deeply shaded introduction leading into the Quartet in G, (Andante): Mir ist so wunderbar, between Marcellina, Leonora, Jacquino and Rocco. This Canon is so exquisite, the characters so set apart in their answering and imitative phrases, (Marcellina longing and hoping for Fidelio; Leonora painfully conscious of it, yet countenancing the illusion, intent on her great purpose and its dangers; Rocco, too noticing it and liking the idea well; Jacquino, his "hair on end" at sight of his poor prospects), that it is always greatly relished and encored.

No. 4. Rocco's song in praise of money;—the least important number in a musical point of view, though it might pay the best.

The music waxes in warmth and inspiration, and in richness of ideas, in No. 5, a Trio, full of life and movement, in which Rocco applauds Fidelio's courageous determination to enter the prison service, tells him (her) he will succeed by perseverance, that the heart gets hardened by familiarity with horrors; she trusts in God and her heart's pure purpose; Marcellina hints that love, too, is a motive worth consideration.

Nos. 6 and 7. A quick march heralds the entrance of Pizarro, who sings an Aria, (D minor), with chorus, a terrific outburst of vengeful rage and hatred, in which he gloats with fiendish delight upon the thought that he shall soon have the heart's blood of Florestan, his fallen enemy and prisoner. The orchestra is lashed into a tempest, and we have the Beethoven energy under its most fearful aspect. The effect is marvellously enhanced, where, as the song thunders along in D major, a low whispered chorus of the guards in B flat comes in: "He talks of death, &c."

No. 8. Duet of hasses, in which Pizarro proposes to Rocco to make way with the prisoner, but, he refusing, declares his intention to do the dark deed himself; so his revenge will taste the sweeter; but Rocco must prepare a grave by the old cistern in the cell. The contrasted feelings of the two men are powerfully and wonderfully depicted in the music, which, with Beethoven's dark and mysterious modulations, is singularly suggestive and exciting.

No. 9 is the great recitative and Aria of Leonora, who has overheard the plot: Abgeschlicher! wo elst du hin? (Monster! to what art thou hastening?) It is a piece constructed like the scene in the Frey-schütz: first a recitative, in which the orchestra, (Allegro agitato), depicts her horror and alarm at the thought of his cruel "tiger sense," but yielding to the rainbow of hope which rises in her mind at the thought that she may save her husband; then a heavenly Adagio, (in E), with prelude and accompaniment of mellow horn and bassoon tones; "Come Hope, let not the last star of the weary pale; however distant the goal, Love will reach it," &c.; then an Allegro of immense fire and energy: "I follow the inward impulse!" with rapid running accompaniments of horn and reeds in full chords, exceedingly effective and inspiring. For orchestra and singer it is the most difficult, as well as perhaps the grandest scene of the kind in any opera.

No. 10. Finale of the first act, Chorus of the prisoners, who are let out to greet the light. A wonderfully beautiful piece of music, pervaded by an orchestral figure which indicates the light and buoyant sense of "breathing the free air;" the strain alternates with dark allusions to the prison cells; it is full of answering phrases of the voices; and one, a tenor, sings a strain of gratitude and trust in God; then all unite again in a thrilling climax upon the word Freiheit, (freedom)! Then come whispered cautions: we are watched; then voice after voice again, as at first, fall into the original strain: "O what delight, in the free air, &c." As the prisoners withdraw, there is a dialogue between Fidelio and Rocco. Her desire to go down into the cells with him is granted. This in spoken dialogue, followed by recitative; then in an Allegro molto movement he informs her of their first task, to dig that grave, alludes to the poor half-starved prisoner, &c. She hopes to see her husband, and so does not shrink. Then the duet assumes a flowing Andante movement in six-eight rhythm, in which the ear is charmed, but your soul shudders:

"We must straight to work." "I follow, were it to my death." &c. Then Marcellina and Jacquino rush in and give the alarm: Pizarro comes in a great rage that the prisoners are out. The jailor's excuses are quite touching: "The coming in of Spring—the cheerful warm sunlight—and then (a touch of patriotism) it is the king's Namens-fest." The poor prisoners are ordered back, and their exquisitely pathetic chorus: "Farewell, thou warm sunlight," with expressive orchestral accompaniment, and with the quintet of principal characters, (each characteristic: Marcellina and Jacquino commiserating, Fidelio full of his purpose, Pizarro urging on the jailor, the latter lamenting his cruel duty), brings the act to a grand musical and dramatic conclusion. Nothing could be finer than this Finale, which is thoroughly original and Beethovenesque.

We proceed briefly to describe the contents of the second Act.

No. 11. It opens with a remarkable instrumental introduction of some thirty measures, very slow, (Grave), in F minor, and sublime in its suggestion of a high soul languishing in chains, in dreary solitude and darkness. The loud, long bursts of the wind instruments in full chords answering to the low monotone of the strings; the plaintive exclamations of the 'celli, echoed by violins and oboes; the symphonic accompaniment of the drums (in minor fifths) to the wild diminished seventh chords, &c., lend a singular impressiveness to this prelude to the gloom of Florestan's cell, and to the prisoner's touching recitative: "God, what darkness! O heavy trial!" and with a change of key, (to E major): "I murmur not, God's will is just." A beautiful modulation to A flat introduces the exquisite tenor melody, (Adagio cantabile), which forms a leading feature in the "Leonora" overture, (No. 3). In this song all the tenderness and sweetness of Beethoven's heart flow out. The words are:

In the Spring-time of my life
I dared to boldly speak the truth,
And chains are my reward.
Willingly I suffer every pain,
And an ignominious end.
With the sweet consolation in my heart,
That I have done my duty.

The music quickens to an Allegro, (in F), as in a sort of "tranquil inspiration bordering on delirium," the prisoner thinks he feels a softer air about him, and sees as it were an angel of deliverance, in the form of Leonora! Such a scene demands the very best of tenors.

No. 12 opens with a piece of "Melodrama." Short, expressive bits of instrumentation preluding to the brief sentences of spoken dialogue between Rocco and his new assistant, Fidelio, (Leonora), who have come down into the cell to dig the grave. Leonora: "How cold it is here in this subterranean vault!" Rocco, (pointing to the prisoner): "There he is!" L. "God stand by me, if it is he!" &c. Then follows the marvellous duet, in A minor, Andante con moto, in which they proceed to dig, she watching the prisoner, as Rocco's back is bent, during the prelude. The orchestral part, in dull, ponderous triplets, is descriptive of their work, and the contrast of their voices, (the old jailor exhorting to fresh efforts, Fidelio brave, but almost fainting), is wonderfully expressive. At length, with a struggling, upward roulade of the double basses, a great stone is heaved up, and on goes the work again to the same movement, she more and more overcome by fatigue and terror, but still anxiously scrutinizing the poor prisoner. This duet, not difficult for orchestra or singers, is such as only Beethoven's imagination could have invented, and cannot but be heard with thrilling interest. Indeed how the spell of this tragic music deepens and grows upon you with more and more intensity, as the dark drama proceeds! Musically and dramatically, nothing in the whole range of opera is more exciting than this whole Act.

No. 13. A most lovely Terzetto, between Florestan, Leonora and Rocco; a sweet, flowing Allegro, in A major, smooth and melodious enough for Mozart, and yet the tenderness and depth are Beethoven's. The prisoner asks heaven's blessing on the youth who shows such humane interest; Leonora, now persuaded that it is her husband, is agitated by heavenliest hopes, and fears; she has a bit of bread which she would give him; the jailor is touched, but hints that it is forbidden. Wonderful is the modulation just here, as Fidelio coaxingly suggests: It can do no harm, it is soon all over with him! The bread is given, and the Trio kindles to a brighter blaze of feeling. This Trio would be exquisite without the action, sung as a concert piece, if well accompanied; but with true, fervent, natural action, it is as pure a fusion of situation, character and music, as purely lyrical a moment, as any in Don Juan.

No. 14. Quartet, Allegro con brio, in D. Pizarro steals in, throws off his dark mantle and reveals himself to the prisoner: "Pizarro, whom thou wouldst have overthrown, Pizarro, the avenger, stands before thee!" The agitated music yields for a moment to a heroic, measured strain of horns and trumpets, as Florestan with composure replies: "A murderer stands before me." He lifts the dagger, when Leonora throws herself before her husband. He flings the rash youth back; she covers him again: Tödt' erst sein Weib! (kill first his wife!) she screams upon a high note—the climax of the opera. "His wife!" "My wife!" exclaim Pizarro, Rocco, Florestan; the swift quartet proceeds, until Pizarro seeks to kill them both, when she presents a pistol to his breast, and just then, in a changed key (B flat), resounds faintly from behind the scenes the trumpet announcing the arrival (so dreaded by Pizarro) of the Minister. It is the well-known trumpet passage of the "Leonora" overture. A few wonderfully expressive bars, in which the wild delight of Leonora and Florestan. "Thou art (I am) saved!" the mortification and curses of Pizarro, and the joyful astonishment of the old jailor find utterance, and again the trumpet strain rings nearer and louder. The quartet closes with a breathless Allegro, like clouds flying before the wind, that sweeps the dull skies clear,—the only piece of music that ever reminded us at all of the quick part of the Sextet in Don Juan.

No. 15. Duet between Leonora and Florestan, expressing the joy of meeting after such a separation: O namen—namenlose Freude! (O joy beyond expression!) It is a rapturous Allegro vivace movement of indescribable beauty, and the true Beethoven inspiration. Its animated rhythm, its alternate mingling and separation of voices, (which, now by short ecstatic responses, and now flowing together, seem literally to rush into each other's arms, and then to hold each other off as if to realize the union with distinct assurance), the directness, simplicity and earnestness of the main melody, and then the delicious strangeness of the modulation with each new flash of thought or new shade of emotion; all is full of joy and love, and gratitude and wonder, of sense of trial past and heavenly reward, a whole eternity in one miraculous and glorious moment.

No. 16. Finale. Scene the court yard of the prison. A quick and buoyant march, (in C), accompanies the entrance of the Minister and his train. The stage fills with men and women. Pizarro, as governor of the prison, accompanies the Minister; on the other side the prisoners come forth, with Marcellina and Jacquino. The march becomes accompaniment to a grand burst of full chorus: "Hail to the day, the much longed for, yet unexpected, when Justice and mercy appear before the door of our prison grave!" Fernando, the Minister, (basso), announces the royal mercy and deliverance to the prisoners, (they are supposed to be political prisoners). Again a snatch of chorus: "Hail to the day!" Old Rocco comes in, leading Leonora and Florestan. The Minister, astounded, recognizes his dear, his noble friend, whom he had supposed dead. Rocco relates the plot and the deliverance; Pizarro is denounced. "And Leonora," adds old Rocco. "Leonora?" "Yes, the ornament of womanhood I lend before you!" Pizarro would interpose "two words," but is silenced. The prisoner's chains are taken off; it is the wife's privilege to do it. In all this hurried recitative, the orchestra keeps up a continuous movement, full of life and complex beauty; and finally the key gets back to the broad sunlight of C major, (the key of the Leonora overture which Beethoven intended to commence the work), and the whole concludes with a grand ensemble of chorus, with quintet of principals, in praise of Leonora and of Woman's high devotion, borrowing the first lines from Schiller's "Hymn to Joy":

"Who a gentle wife has won,
Join he in our jubilee! &c."

Liszt in Rome.

From "Sights, sermons, and sounds in Rome," dated Passion Week, 1864, and contributed to the Christian Inquirer, we clip the following.

Very mysteriously an envelope was left upon my table containing a mysterious Italian ticket. Could the clerk explain it? Yes; a friend of mine had told him that I wished for it, and he had sent it into my room and put two scudi in my bill for it. But would he translate it? Certainly. "A sacred Accademia, in honor of the Cross for an oblation of St. Peter, which His Holiness the Pope designed to accept, the profits destined for the School of the Poor." Were all the tickets two scudi? Ah, no. They pay what they please, and some pay large sums; but two scudi is the least. And what is to be done? Liszt is to play the piano; so it is expected, though the public do not know it. It is then a concert? No, it is an academy. Well, I will go; and so I did at two P. M. The affair came off at an Imperial place, "Pretorian Camp, near the Baths of Diocletian," and also near the railway terminus in the suburbs. At the gate, soldiers stopped the carriages to know if they had tickets. Rome has no good public concert-hall, so this performance took place in a half-finished building. Soldiers on duty everywhere. The hall was damp, for it was on the ground floor, and the low-vaulted brick arches were barely covered with gray plaster, and the guard's designation of a place where over-garments could be left had a decidedly chilly sound. Imagine a hall shaped thus, ♯, a Christ in plaster at one end, and a Virgin at the other; the cheerless walls and columns rendered less barren by flags and festoons, wreaths of roses, crosses, clusters of flowers, the latter stuck into patches of clay, which held them firmly against the walls, kept their stems moist, and did not show. At the upper end of the hall were a pulpit and piano. Of course, people rushed for seats in the semi-circle at the left of the rostrum, and the unfortunate tardy filled the chairs in the stem of the "paragaph." I was in time for a good seat, though not far enough round to see the pianist's fingers. There was no large platform, and the grand piano stood with its fore-legs upon one small stand, and its hind legs upon another. When the place was crowded, a brass band at the entrance, the lower end, played operatic airs. Next, the choir of male voices under the plaster east of the Virgin backed with red, a choir belonging to the Chapel Giulia, chanted a motetto, "We adore thee, O Christ!"—Palestrina's music, written three centuries ago, harmonious, but not to my fancy. Around the piano were seated various red and violet robed cardinals. One of them now seated himself at the desk, too lazy to stand up, and read a sermon in Italian from enormous sheets, on "The Church Teaching by the Cross," clear and well divided, though not very intelligible to me.

Then Liszt, the world-renowned, seated himself at the piano. When I took music-lessons in a little street at the west end of Boston, a picture of Liszt hung over the teacher's piano. It was the common picture, Liszt surrounded with distinguished musicians, enrapt in the melody which he plays, his head thrown back, hair flowing, and hands arched. He still resembles that picture. His long, gray, unperturbed hair, brushed straight back, swings about his smooth shaven face as he bends to the piano before him, like a heavy silk fringe. His face is sharp and steadfast, lighted up "e'en at the sounds himself has made," but not too full of amiable beauty. And his playing! Add an exquisite touch, refinement of modulation, rapidity of execution, to the playing of the best pianist America ever heard, and you begin to appreciate Liszt. Such diminuendos, such melody! May I criticize? He lifts his hand unnecessarily high in the air. He bows too often in a catch-courtesy way on taking his seat and when he is rising. He has too much the air of a man playing before "the highest nobility," and depending upon their smile. These are but parts of him, and do not affect the great whole. The first piece, "Armonia Religiosa," was only admirable for the rapid succession of its chords. After it, a second church dignitary sat and read in a feeble way a sermon, "The Church Combatting by the Cross," in French. Applauded, as were all the sermons, a grand old custom, another of Palestrina's motetti, "O Bone Jesus!" Then Liszt executed two pieces, "Ave Maria," which made you hear the tinkling of vesper bells, and "Cujus animam gementem," from "Stabat Mater." Il Signor Avvocato Paolo Tarnasi recited a tedious Italian poem, "Hail, O Cross! our only hope," in a florid style. After more brass music came the third discourse, in English this time, read by Dr. Manning, the famous apostate described in our last, "Doing Good by the Cross," very long. He dwelt largely upon the religious orders in the Catholic Church, and their self-sacrificing goodness, "reversing, by a sweet refinement of charity, the very words of Jesus, and making the blind leader of the blind." Truly, the Roman Church casts up a beautiful record in this respect, but does it exceed the record of Nightingale, Dix, and our noble army of nurses? This was followed by a hymn of Potoni, "O Crux Ave, Spes Unica." Then the German sermon, "The Church Triumphant by the Cross," and a valedictory thanksgiving, Ringraziamento, in Italian, very like a college Latin salutatory. Liszt worthily closed the programme with a religious melody, "Charity"—not the "meek and lowly," played by every Yankee girl, but an air even better.

Four sermons in four languages in one afternoon, is quite enough for any man, to say nothing of Liszt, last but not least.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, MAY 28, 1864.

Death of Meyerbeer.

The Musical Gazette of Paris comes to us dressed in mourning, and full of one theme, as are most of the musical journals of Europe; for the author of the Huguenots is no more! He died in Paris on Monday, the 2nd inst. For several years he had not visited that city of his triumphs, but had lived for the most part in Berlin, his native city, in the palatial building in the corner by the Brandenburg gate, where the stately avenue Unter den Linden ends in an aristocratic square. There we can imagine him in the quiet exercise of his duties as kapellmeister to the King of Prussia, a position mainly honorary, arranging now and then a court concert in the Schloss, composing music for royal and public occasions, lending the light of his countenance to operas and concerts in the Royal Theatre, the Singakademie, &c., far more fond of appearing in such places than Rossini seems to be in Paris, and at the same time far more fond of labor, and ambitious to renew his laurels, still planning, elaborating, ever revising, correcting, finishing new works to prolong the shining series of Robert, the Huguenots, the Prophète, L'Étoile du Nord and the Pardon de Ploermel. The London Musical World says:

The great musician was taken away in the midst of plans fast ripening into maturity. His Africaine was not his only care. He had another opera completed. This was Judith—on a biblical subject, as the name implies. His mind, too, was intent upon a sacred cantata for the Birmingham Festival; and with this in view, the Bible was of late his more than ever inseparable companion. He entertained also the project of a secular oratorio. A sacred oratorio he never at any time contemplated. "What"—he would ask—"can I be expected to do after Mendelssohn's Elijah?" He may have under-estimated his powers in this direction; for his partiality to the sacred style of composition (witness many published works) was notorious; but his resolution was not the less fixed and unalterable. Another cherished scheme was a grand historical opera, on some English subject. In 1855—when superintending the production of his Étoile du Nord at Covent Garden (for the revival of which opera, this season, at the same theatre, he had half made up his mind to pay London another visit)—he happened to attend the Princess's Theatre. There he witnessed the gorgeous representations of Shakespeare's Henry VIII., which has immortalized the management of Mr. Charles Kean. Enchanted with what he saw on that occasion, and particularly struck with one or two of the old English melodies which Mr. J. L. Hatton had introduced in the music, his active mind there and then conceived the idea of an English Historical opera on the plan and dimensions of the Huguenots. The book was to be prepared by one of our most eminent men of letters, with whom Meyerbeer had several consultations on the subject.

But these, and many more schemes, which kept that busy head incessantly employed, were never destined to be realized. The mainspring of intelligence snapped asunder and the curious clockwork of the brain ceased to perform its functions.

A series of articles on the life and works of Meyerbeer, from the pen of M. Fétis, was already in course of publication in the Revue et Gazette Musicale, when his death intervened. From these we learn that his long expected L'Africaine occupied his mind as long ago as Le Prophète. His last visit to Paris was purely for the purpose of at last bringing out the Africaine, the score of which was completed in 1860, but its production kept back for want of a soprano singer answering to his ideal of the leading part. He arrived in Paris early in September, and, in spite of his fatigue, went that very evening to the opera to hear Mlle. Tietjens in the Huguenots. "From that moment not a day passed in which the Africaine was not in question. But the pains he took in the choice of artists, in the distribution of the rôles, in the details of the mise en scène, did not suffice for the activity of this indefatigable organization, and he incessantly complained of having nothing to compose. He was eager to find a libretto for a comic opera, and he declared that it would be a recreation for him to write the music of one. For him repose only existed in variety of labor!

"According to his habit, he had wished to have the score copied at his own lodgings, and the copyists were installed in his apartment in the rue Montaigne. Time was pressing. All the grand rôles were copied, as well as most of the smaller rôles of the first act. . . . When the Huguenots was last taken up again at the Opera, Meyerbeer attended several rehearsals and directed the studies of Mlle. Marie Sax, whom he had finally chosen and designated for the principal female part in L'Africaine.

"Nothing showed the slightest alteration in the health of the great artist. On Friday, April 22, he had dined at home alone, and his repast was frugal. Feeling indisposed the next day, he sent for his physician, who remarked no alarming symptom; nothing but great weakness, which, added to his age, might render an energetic medical treatment dangerous. He continued none the less to occupy himself with "L'Africaine." He talked of it to his visitors, and to one of them he said: 'At first I had written only an introduction, but they advised me to substitute an overture. It is done, entirely done; I have it there, and it only remains for me to finish the orchestration: how unlucky that this indisposition prevents me!'

"The weakness sensibly increased, and yet he was uneasy at the non-arrival of one of the copyists. When Dr. Rayer complimented him on his works, he said: 'You are too indulgent; but I have here (putting his fingers to his forehead) many ideas and many things which I should like to do!'—You will do them, and many more besides, said the doctor: 'Do you believe so? Ah well, so much the better!'

"On Sunday (May 1), towards noon, the intestinal obstruction appeared to yield, but at the expense of his general strength. Since the morning two of his daughters had arrived from Baden, in time to be present in his last moments, as well as M. Jules Beer, his nephew, and M. Brandus (music publisher). As he did not wish to alarm his family, Mme. Meyerbeer, more lately warned, did not arrive till Monday, accompanied by her oldest daughter and her son-in-law, baron von Korf. On Sunday evening about 8 o'clock, when all hope was lost, he turned as usual to the persons around his bed and bade them, with a smile, good night, then turned away, and they pretended to withdraw. On Monday, at 5 1-2 in the morning, the pulse and respiration had become almost insensible, and at 20 minutes before 6, a sigh, which was the last, announced that life was extinct!

"A few hours afterward, Rossini, arriving from Passy, where he had heard of the master's illness, presented himself in the rue Montaigne to inquire the news of him. When the concierge in a brusque way informed him of the sad event, he was obliged to sit down and shed copious tears.

He embraced Mme. Meyerbeer, who had come down to receive him."

We are further informed by the same journal that the deceased left written instructions about his burial, enjoining particular precautions against being buried alive; and that there were found, among his papers, "several prayers, in a style eminently religious and touching, composed by him and for his own private use." No other express declaration of his will was found. It is only known how persistently eager he was to hasten the production of L'Africaine, a work which he seems to have cherished with a lively affection. It is said too, that in seeking a libretto for a comic opera, he employed his leisure in arranging a text which should connect the different parts of the music to Struensee.

We have not room for the details of the funeral ovation in Paris; the procession, which accompanied his remains to the railway station for Berlin, was as when one of the powers of the earth are buried. It was escorted by national guard with bands and drum corps of the gendarmerie, followed by most distinguished musical and public personages, representatives of the Conservatoire, the theatres, the musical societies, &c.; the walls of the railway station were draped in mourning; an organ and a magnificent cenotaph erected; the bands played the "Schiller march," the march from the Prophète and that from the Pardon de Ploermel; the singers and orchestra of the Opera performed the grand church chorus and march in the Prophète; those of the Opera Comique a chorus from Le Pardon; discourses were pronounced by MM. Beulé, Saint-Georges, Baron Taylor, Emile Perrin, Camille Doucet, Ullmann, (grand Rabbi of France) and others; and thus twice in the space of two years has Paris paid these solemn honors to a musical composer. Halévy was the earlier instance.

A brief sketch of Meyerbeer's career will be found on another page. This is not the time to attempt an estimate of his genius and productions. Our impressions of the peculiar power and the short-comings of his music are scattered throughout the volumes of this journal, with critical analyses of his operas, accounts of their performance and of their effects, and also the opinions of such critics as Scudo, Richard Wagner, Henri Heine, &c., those of the two last not unmingled with severity. While owning the great impressiveness and ingenuity of his operas, the carefully studied effects, the minute elaboration, the individualization of character, the wealth and wierd charm of instrumentation, we have never been able to sympathize with his unbounded admirers, or to feel that he was great save in an external and material sense. We are of those who feel in him the power of will and talent rather than of genius. The gift of spontaneous melody was not peculiarly his; elaborately planned effects instead of inspiration. If we feel the latter anywhere, it is in some parts of Robert, particularly in the melody of the part of Alice, which is unique and fresh, and has the charm of nature. But even Robert is as a whole heavy, and much of it forced and strange. And this we have felt still more in the Huguenots, the Prophète, &c. After sitting through one of these great operas, we have not felt inspired, inwardly edified and strengthened; have not gone away with lighter hearts and nobler hopes and aspirations, but have felt wearied and oppressed. How different the feeling after such works as Fidelio, or the Ninth Symphony, or Elijah!

In short, the works of Meyerbeer have had their place assigned them by many of the most earnest musicians and music-lovers, and as we think justly, in the category of "music of effect." Outward eclat enters too largely into their motive. Wonderful elaborations they are, not creations. Beautiful in many a detail, not living wholes quickened with one breath of genius. Just so we feel before one of Kaulbach's vast and crowded frescoes, or on laying down a romance of Sue or Bulwer; not the Raphael or Shakespeare feeling. We may be wrong; but it is significant that this criticism has come mostly from those most deeply, fondly and sincerely versed in the music and the genius of the Mozarts, Beethovens, Mendelssohns, Schuberts, Rossinis and their peers. The strongest expressions of it are on record from the mouths of men like Mendelssohn and Schumann. What are all the bravos of fashionable Italian opera publics, all the pompous Parisian homage, all the wide reclame of which Meyerbeer in person was so indefatigable an organizer, compared to opinions like these? There are kinds as well as degrees of greatness. Meyerbeer is great, perhaps the greatest, among his proper peers, such notables as Berlioz, Halévy, Wagner, Gounod, Verdi: but it remains to see whether the enthusiasm is not hasty and superficial which would place his statue in the august company of Gluck and Mozart, Beethoven and Mendelssohn and Weber.

The German Opera.

The second week and second half of the short visit, or specimen season, of Mr. Grover's admirable company was still attended with increase of recognition and enthusiasm. All but two of the performances were repetitions, contrary to the original programme, but they were clearly called for. Faust was twice repeated; it began and closed the week; we should have accounted three nights more profitably spent upon Fidelio or La Dame Blanche; but everybody wished to see, and see repeatedly, the incomparable Margaret of FREDERICI and the Mephistopheles of HERRMANN. Martha had been so surprisingly well done, Frederici was such a charming Nancy, both the ladies sang and played with such a genial vivacity and grace together, HIMMER's manly tenor voice and action were so truly refreshing, and the whole thing was so quickened in the rendering even when the music staled, that those who had long since heard enough of Martha enjoyed it that night in the beaming faces of fresh listeners. Then Weber's Freyschütz, the most perfect of their productions, so wonderful in its intrinsic charm of music and romance, and with the very ideal of an Agathe in Frederici, only increased desire "with what it fed upon." The only want was of a more telling bass voice and of more vitality in the important part of Caspar, and perhaps too, a sweeter quality of voice in the clever Aennchen of CANISSA. One word of reproof for a portion of the audience. The untimely moment seized upon for the throwing of bouquets and insisting on an encore, right in the middle of the holiest passage, the prayer "Leise, leise," instead of waiting for the return of the melody already provided in the construction of the scena, and to the end of the triumphant finale thereof, the true place for applause to break out, showed at least a very unmusical sort of impatience and betrayed strange ignorance of so classical and popular work.

The pieces given for the first time (this season and by this troupe) were Don Juan and Fidelio. In the former we might have expected to find a strong and earnest German company especially at home, and that it would be their success par excellence. Strange to say, it proved the contrary. It was the least creditable of their performances. There were some good parts, to be sure. The Leporello (HERRMANN) was uncommonly good, nay admirable; the Elvira (FREDERICI) far more refined than most of the Elviras; the Don Ottavio (HABELMANN) ditto, only an unlucky cold nearly thwarted his best intentions in Il mio tesoro; and Mme. JOHANNSEN, though her voice sounds harsh and hard in emphatic high notes, showed fine conception and dramatic energy in Donna Anna. But there was wanting a Don Juan; STEINECKE has not the voice; the Zerlina of CANISSA, with all its pretty rusticity and brightness, was only tolerable after such ideals of the part as we have known here; the Commendatore was weak, and the Masetto weaker; and the general manner in which Mozart's masterpiece was put upon the stage, the slovenly rags and loopholes in the story, lack of consistency and life, showed want of care and earnestness. One could take refuge to be sure in the orchestra, which CARL ANSCHUTZ always keeps so well in hand, and which is uncommonly good in its composition; it is a luxury to single out and listen to its first oboe and bassoon, and Mozart is partial to their service.

But the event of the week, and of this musical year in Boston, was the production of Fidelio, Beethoven's one opera, than which there is no greater. We will not attempt to point out here in what its greatness consists. Once, in a slight and sketchy way, we did that, at the time when (seven years ago) the opera was murdered at the Boston Theatre, and never since attempted; that analysis we reprint on another page to-day, merely for convenience of reference, and to save making more words. We have now to do only with the new performance as an event. Nothing in our musical world, for a long time, has given us so pure a satisfaction, or has so encouraged our best hope and effort for the promotion of a sound musical taste and feeling in this community, as the effect of that production of Fidelio on Thursday evening, May 12.

The recollection of that abortive presentation seven years ago kept some away; the fear of a thing too good for common opera-goers' food kept more; but it did not prevent a very large audience, in weight of character and culture not inferior to any ever seen within those walls. The whole audience were profoundly impressed. Such excitement, such intensity of interest, keeping pace with the crescendo of the musical inspiration, has not manifested itself on any other night. All felt how rich, how beautiful, how noble, how irresistible in the superb logic of its most natural unfolding, how full of the god-like element in man, how inspired out of the very depths of a great soul, all thrilling with imaginative sense and faculty, the whole music-is. It suited, too, the earnest temper of the times. All went home full of it, bringing away a strange joy that will last and live on in the mind, and help to tone our lives to finer issues. The excitement was a wholesome one, not dissipating and exhausting, but edifying, tranquillizing, strengthening. We know we speak the feeling of very many who were present; we heard it from their lips and read it in their faces.

Of course such a result implies no mean degree of merit in the performance. And indeed we were agreeably surprised that this company, most of the time exercised in lighter works, could do it on the whole so well. Not that there were not crudities and imperfections, plenty of them. But a general artistic earnestness and fervor pervaded the effort; they entered into the spirit of it. Leonora (Fidelio) is Mme. JOHANNSEN's great part; her acting, especially in the prison scene, and at the great climax, was thrillingly true and powerful; she threw her whole soul into it, and, making all allowance for her voice, there are not many who could render the great scene "Abscheulicher!" &c., more satisfactorily. HIMMER was equally good as Florestan and has the voice for it. HERRMANN made a capital Rocco; and with CANISSA as Marcellina, HABELMANN in the small but not unimportant part of Jacquino, STEINECKE as the vengeful Pizarro (a most difficult part, needing a better voice), and GRAFF as the Minister, it certainly was not badly cast. The enthusiasm could not keep in after the clean-cut Canon of the first quartet, which had to be repeated. It was the intrinsic charm of the composition; for the performance was not as precise as its peculiar structure requires; there were hitches in tempo, blurring the outline; the orchestra, efficient on the whole, betrayed want of sufficient rehearsal; how could it be otherwise with a thing so improvised for a single night! The Trio that followed was cheered still more warmly. The chorus of prisoners let out to feel the air and sunshine gave exquisite delight; and so, through all the thrilling gloom and raptures of the prison scene. Even those who did not notice, felt the grandeur of the orchestral part there; Beethoven takes hold with a great hand, and yet a delicate, and far down, though you be not thinking of him, but only of the drama going on before your eyes. A certain anti-climax would have been avoided, by not cutting off the jubilant ensemble of the denouement as a separate third act. Beethoven makes only two acts. Do you remember the little march with which the Governor and guard enter? How slight and unpretending, yet how good! This is making just enough of a small incident, not magnifying accident into substance, as Gounod does in Faust, suspending the busyness of that intensely moving drama half an hour, in order to make much of an insignificant and noisy march with brass band and manoeuvres on the stage, a mere trap for the applause of the vulgar, intended for an encore. The one is art, the other clap-trap. The latter well illustrates Richard Wagner's definition of "effect" music, viz., "result without a motive," i.e., without a motive from within the play itself, without an artistic motive.

When Mr. Grover brings his German opera here again (and we are told we may expect it in September) he will not feel timid about venturing Fidelio. He will produce it early and leave room for several repetitions. We have more yet to say in acquittance of our debt to him and conductor Anschütz and their artists, and in the general way of summing up, with inference and suggestion for the future. Here are at least "ten talents," and they ought to be improved, increased.

NOTES ON A MONTH'S CONCERTS.—The most important was "Elijah," the rendering of which great work was creditable to the H. and H. Society, though we have heard some of its choruses sung more clearly by them. The great Organ (Mr. LANG), besides the Orchestra, deepened and broadened the great sea of harmony sublimely. The contralto solos were signally effective in the rich, large, cultivated voice and style of ADELAIDE PHILLIPS. Miss HOUSTON sang her best in some of the soprano pieces, always earnest, full of the feeling of the music, although sometimes nervous; and the other soprano, Mrs. SMITH, pleased by her purity of voice and honest style. Mr. WHEELER's tenor, though it carries no great weight, seconded his true intentions unusually well. Faulty pronunciation marred Mr. RUDOLPHSEN's rendering of the Prophet's part, which otherwise was not without considerable merit. The Angel Trio, by the three ladies above named, has rarely sounded so well; we only wished for more of a pianissimo in the chorus that completes it. ZERRAHN, faithful and earnest always, was the conductor.

Next in importance we recall the last three of the 18 Afternoon Concerts of the ORCHESTRAL UNION, which have given us a long list of the best Symphonies and Overtures this winter. Especially rich the last but two (May 4), when they not only repeated Schumann's noble Symphony in B flat (and played it better than before, although few works suffer more from the want of many violins, &c.), but gave the overture to Oberon, and Auber's to Le Serment; while Mr. PAINE played on the Organ a beautiful Pastorale of Bach, a chorus of Handel, and his own fine Fantasia and Fugue in E minor. Organ treats abound; the rarest (in both senses) is to hear Paine.

Beethoven's 7th Symphony was reserved for the crowning glory of the last concert (May 18), when were also played the pretty Zanetta overture and the Finale of the 2d act of Robert le Diable (the news of Meyerbeer's death had just come); Mrs. FRODOCK played an Offertoire of Wely and a Pedal Tocatta by Schellenberg, very effectively, upon the Organ. A benefit concert of CARL ZERRAHN was the attraction of last Wednesday, when 150 young ladies, his pupils of the Girl's High and Normal schools, assisted him by singing "Night," a song in three parts; the chorus in Giuramento, and the Angel Trio from Elijah as a part-song. The two most popular of orchestra pieces, and none better, 5th Symphony and Freyschütz overture, opened and closed the concert, and the "Procession of Bridesmaids" from Lohengrin returned in a manner the compliment of the 150 maidens.

JOHANN GOTTLIEB SCHNEIDER, court organist at Dresden, and perhaps the most distinguished of all contemporary organists, died there on the 13th of April, in his seventy-fifth year. He excelled in improvisation, but his compositions are not remarkable. It is but a few months since we read of the death of HESSE, of Breslau, an organist almost equally renowned.

Another distinguished organist—Mynheer Tours, of Rotterdam, has also died lately. He was one of the first musicians of Holland, and for thirty years the director of the "Eruditio Musical Society."

We see mention of two young Bostonians in the German musical journals. In Berlin Mr. ADAMS has made a successful debut at the Royal Opera as Manrico in Il Trovatore, with the famous Mlle. Lucca in the part of the heroine. At the annual examination of the pupils at the Leipzig Conservatorium, the piano playing of Mr. Carlisle PETERSILEA is again highly commended both in the Signale and the Neue Zeitschrift. The latter says: "He showed in the Adagio and Finale of Chopin's Concerto, that, besides eminent and brilliant technik, he is also master of the most various nuances of touch (especially admirable was the almost breath-like delicacy of some passages), and that he has quite a good, if also a somewhat material conception of the intentions of one of the most difficult of composers in this regard."

ADELINA PATTI left Paris on the 2nd for London, where she was to make her re-appearance at Covent Garden as Rosina in Il Barbiere. She was fêted on all hands before her departure, and Mme. de Rothschild gave a great dinner in honor of her. Besides opera, she had sung in two charity concerts in Paris, and had distributed 1,000 francs among the chorus singers at the theatre Italian. On coming of age recently, Patti settled an annuity of 6,000 francs on each of her parents. She too has been assuming the rôle of Margaret in Faust. A black-eyed Italian Gretchen!

The Musical Festival of the Lower Rhine at Whitsuntide, was to take place this year at Aix-la-Chapelle, under the direction of kapellmeister Rietz, of Dresden. The works to be performed on the first day were: Handel's "Belshazzar," and Lachner's second Suite for orchestra; second day: Magnificat, by J. S. Bach; scenes from Gluck's Iphigenia in Tauris; 114th Psalm by Mendelssohn; and Beethoven's 9th Symphony. Joachim, the great violinist, was expected to take part.

PARIS. From the correspondence of the Orchestra we learn the following:

At the Italiens the chief point of interest has been the revival of the "Italiana in Algeri," for the special purpose of giving M<sup>me</sup>. de Méric-Lablache the opportunity of a premier rôle in the part of Isabella. This lady has hitherto sung in minor parts only, but it was considered due to her talent to give her a début in a rôle of importance—even although that selected had been notably filled by such a great artist as Alboni. It was not anticipated that M<sup>me</sup>. de Méric-Lablache would excel, if indeed she could hope to equal, her great predecessor as a vocalist—but Alboni could be surpassed as an actress, and here it was expected that the De Méric-Lablache would gain ground. The result, however, did not justify the expectation. The lady created no effect even in her acting. This was at least surprising, for in serious opera M<sup>me</sup>. de Méric-Lablache exhibits rare qualities of gesture, by-play, and facial control. These qualities, however, appeared to have failed her in Comic Opera—hence her non-success. The sisters Marchisio good-naturedly played in the cast with the new Isabella, having only to put in an appearance in the celebrated Septuor in the second act. Agnesi played Mustafa, Scallée Taddeo. Bettini, the tenor, was not in particularly good voice, but played and sang, as he always does, apertamente.

On Sunday last "Polinto" was given for the benefit of the maestri, Alary, with the Marchisios, Giraltoni, Fraschini. At the Lyrique M. Ismaël has resumed his famous part in the "Rigoletto." The next news of interest from this theatre will be the production of Félicien David's "La Captive," in which a débütante is announced to appear, M<sup>lle</sup>. Sannier.

Two deaths are given in the necrology of our French musical contemporaries: one, M. Regnier Canaux, publisher of music; the other, M<sup>lle</sup>. Esther Halévy, daughter of the composer, a talented and promising girl, who died at the early age of some twenty years.

"Mireille," in spite of its being more a succès d'estime than a real one, continues to attract the Parisians to the Théâtre Lyrique. It has been much curtailed, and the last acts contain now but half the music originally composed for them. With this the lengths are avoided, but the absurdity of the libretto, if possible, increased; and "Mireille," in spite of the many beauties contained in the first two acts, will never gain the position "Faust" occupies now on all stages; on the contrary, if poet and composer do not resolve to completely rewrite the last acts, "Mireille" may possibly never go beyond the precincts of the Théâtre Lyrique. The performance of it is also not what might be desired. M<sup>me</sup>. Miolan-Carvalho, with her mania ever to represent a Sonnambula, cannot succeed in interesting the audience in the heroine she so indifferently represents. Added to that, she sings so out of tune, that sometimes it is a perfect infliction to listen to her. M<sup>me</sup>. Faure-Lefèvre, on the contrary, is every thing that is charming; her intelligence and acting, the grace with which she sings the interesting and pleasing music allotted to her, win all the audience in her favor, and she certainly carries away the lion's share of the applause. Ismaël, whom critique and claques have tried, and try, to push, is a most indifferent actor. A rough, limited, and totally uncultivated voice, generally out of tune, and bad acting, are the qualities which distinguish him. On the other side, M. Petit is a young artist full of the best promise; with a pleasant, full baritone voice, already well cultivated, and refined acting—attributes which will most likely lead him to a prominent position in his profession.

BERLIN. A great celebration of "Israel in Egypt," as an allusionary suggestion of Allemannia in Denmark, has been originated in Berlin for the benefit of the Crown Prince Fund for needy Hinterbliebene in Danish dominions. May 1st saw a grand alliance cemented between the Oberst-Kämmerer or High Chamberlain Count von Redern and the principals of the singing associations, for the purpose of doing full justice to Händel and the "left behind" of sacred Prussian memory. Accordingly, the Academy of Song, the Stern and Jahn Singing Association, the Royal Domchor, the organist Haupt, and the Royal Chapel combined with Fräulein de Ahna, Pressler, Frau Harriers-Wippert, Herren Betz, Krause and Wowsorsky, and Kapellmeister Taubert. Great as was the object, greater was the attendance in the Garrison Church, and the enthusiasm, awakened in behalf of the "left behind," stirred up by the patronage of H. K. H. the Crown Prince and Princess, and augmented by the talent of the Royal Opera House, filled the Church and applauded Händel to many encores. Shakespeare has naturally received his due in Berlin, and has been commemorated in a peculiar manner—the festivity having been confined to music, so far as his celebration by the "Society for the study of new languages" is concerned. The concert-room of the Royal Theatre was crowded with Prussia's intellect and Berlin's beauty. The "budding woman-world," according to the German journals, surrounded the bust of the commemorated bard, and a most elegant audience bent before him in devotion to his genius. Then the orchestras celebrated Shakespeare musically; by overture to "Hamlet," overture to "Coriolanus," overture to "Romeo and Juliet," chorus from "Midsummer Night's Dream," song from "Henry VIII." and Taubert's "Tempest." Dr. Leo "addressed" the audience, and (a circumstance that would fill a Linnaeus Banks with amazement and awe) confined himself to a few quiet unobtrusive words on the subject of Shakespeare's greatness, and was so simple and short, that the audience were twice as deeply impressed as if a Phelps had harangued them with dramatic heavings of the chest. The conditions of the two prizes were then declared, which are to be given (of the value of 500 and 200 thalers respectively) in connection with the Shakespeare festivity. The first is for the best essay "On Shakespeare's influence on the English language, treated in four points;" and the second, "History of Shakespearean criticism in Germany." The time allowed for the delivery of the essays is to the 1st July, eighteen hundred and sixty-five! Truly long enough to allow a mass of German research and German knowledge to be expended on the elaboration of a treatise!

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- L' Eliotrope. (The Heliotrope.) Enrico Panofka. 30
A very sweet Italian song, almost fragrant with its memories of the flower whose name it bears. Has Italian and English words.
- Gentle Alice. Song and Chorus. G. Howland. 30
A simple and graceful thing, which ought to be popular.
- Kiss my mother dear for me. L. L. Parr. 30
One of the affectionate songs that it does one good to sing. It is always a pleasure to record the addition of one to the list.
- Mother, when the war is over. Song and Cho. J. W. Turner. 30
The title well describes the song. Another of the melodies it is good for one to sing.
- Lord Bateman was a noble lord. From "Rosedale." 30
A quaint old English song, toned down and modernized a little. Melody extremely sweet.
- For thee and only thee. F. Buckley. 30
A song of classic merit, showing the hand of a popular composer.
- O that I had wings. Quartet. F. S. Davenport. 30
Excellent for quartet choirs.

Instrumental Music.

- Salve, dimora cratta e pura. G. A. Osborne. 40
One of the best songs in "Faust," elegantly arranged and varied. Of medium difficulty.
- Scenes from childhood. "See-saw." T. Oesten. 30
Easy and pretty, and good for little fingers.
- Tone pictures. (Pearls of dew.) T. Oesten. 40
A little rippling, sparkling thing, as indicated by the title. Not difficult.
- The bells of Aberdovey. (Clychan Aberdyfi.) B. Richards. 60
Richards catches some echoes from the wild Welsh mountains, and rings his chimes merrily thereon. The melody is peculiar. Not difficult.
- Caprice Hongroise. Etude de Concert en octaves. E. Ketterer. 60
Quite difficult, but a capital lesson for those who wish to practice springs and runs in octaves. Well played it is brilliant and striking.

Books.

- First Studies for the Piano. Köhler. 1.75
There is a period in the progress of every pupil, when he or she is not sufficiently advanced to play regular studies, like those of Czerny and Bertini, but yet some simple thing of the kind, more varied than scales and exercises, is felt, by the teacher, to be needed. Köhler, feeling this want, has composed these easy studies, which fit the case exactly. A pupil of six weeks to three months experience on the piano may undertake them, and they can hardly fail to be of great use.
- School of Velocity. Op. 123. In two books, each L. Köhler. 1.75.
These are about on a level with Czerny's studies of velocity, and may be alternated with them, or substituted for them, according to the taste and convenience of teachers, who will find that Köhler has a thorough appreciation of their needs and difficulties.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 605.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JUNE 11, 1864.

VOL. XXIV. No. 6.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Half a dozen of Beethoven's Contemporaries.

II. ANTONIO SALIERI.

(Continued from page 242.)

The next year (1781) appeared from his pen a ballad opera in German, entitled the "Rauchfangkehrer" (Chimney-sweeper). The author of the text was unknown to Mosel—it being one which a friend had given Salieri that he might, while waiting for a text from the directors of the theatre, practise himself in setting German words to music. Still, it was put upon the stage, and, in spite of the critics, was a success, not only in Vienna, but in other cities—for instance, in Bonn where the boy Ludwig van Beethoven had the opportunity of hearing it. Mosel says, that the sharp criticisms of the work can only have related to the text, which, he adds, was beneath criticism both in its style and versification, while the music deserves special commendation. Salieri's success in setting what to him was still a strange language, he says, was surprising, and the modulations in the music—the entire accompaniments—were very beautiful. As a joke, a burlesque, in a tenor air of this work, Salieri introduced a passage which was sung in falsetto; nobody in those days dreaming that that thin, expressionless, unmanly kind of tone could ever come to be employed by composers except to create a laugh.

Leopold Mozart, in 1783, wrote to his son in Vienna for a copy of this work for Salzburg, and on Dec. 10, received the following reply. "I only write you in greatest haste that I have bought the 'Chimney-sweeper' for 6 ducats and have it already at home. Judging from your letter you take it to be an Italian opera. No, it is in German, and moreover a miserable original piece, which has Dr. Auernbrugger, here in Vienna, for its author. You will remember that I told you about Herr Fischer's having publicly satirized it on the stage."

In 1782, Salieri received an order to compose an opera seria for the court stage in Munich. He gladly undertook this, the more so, because he was allowed to take Metastasio's Semiramis for his text, of which he had composed several numbers in Naples. This proved also a success.

The next year, Joseph having re-established his Italian opera, with a company selected from a list of singers made by Salieri in Italy, the season opened with Salieri's "La Scuola de' Gelosi," enriched with several new numbers, which was a new triumph for the composer.

It will be remembered that one of the persons, who in 1770 tried over Salieri's youthful production "Le Donne Liriate," and encouraged its production, was Gluck. The accumulating proofs of the young man's talents, his lively disposition, and especially his taste and views in music and composition, had won the warm affection of the veteran composer, and his fullest confidence. Of this he now gave a striking proof. At the end of 1783, as he was no longer able to undertake an opera, in consequence of a previous stroke of apoplexy, he was called upon by the directors of the French Academy of Music, to designate some other composer, able to produce a French opera on the principles of that philosophy in Art, which he had taught both by precept and example, and which alone could give birth to a truly dramatic music. Gluck proposed Salieri, now in his 33d year.

It was twenty years since the first performance of the "Orpheus and Eurydice" in Vienna (1764). The "Alceste" and "Paris and Helene" followed in course of time, and, having gained that success which makes them mark an era in operatic history, the contest between his and the old Italian and French styles was renewed in the French language at Paris. "At last," says Poisot, "on the 19th April, 1774, the "Iphigenie in Aulide" of chevalier Gluck made its first appearance in the Nouvelle Salle du Palais Royal, opened, January 26, 1770, by a reproduction of Rameau's Zoroastre."

Here is the list of Gluck's operas in Paris.

1774, April 19. Iphigenie en Aulide. 3 Acts. Text by Racine, arranged for the opera by du Rollet.

1774, August 2. Orphée et Eurydice. 3 Acts. Text Celsabigi, translated and adapted in French by Moline.

1776, April 23. 3 Acts. Text by Celsabigi, translated by du Rollet.

1777, Sept. 53. Armide. 5 a. Text by Quinault.

1779, May 18. Iphigenie en Tauride. 4 a. Text by Guillard.

1779, Sept. 24. Echo et Narcisse. 3 a. Text by de Tschudy.

The order now received from Paris was for an opera in the style of these, and the text selected was "Les Danaïdes," by du Rollet and de Tschudy. Gluck's recommendation was of course sufficient, and to Salieri the composition was entrusted. It was his first attempt to compose a French text, his first attempt also to leave the regular Italian forms, which alone his protector Joseph really found to his taste. Salieri has himself honestly recorded the fact that he composed the work under the guidance of Gluck. When it was finished he took it to Gluck and they went through it together at the piano-forte. In one of the airs was a passage with which the composer was dissatisfied, but was unable to discover in what the fault consisted. He pointed it out in the score to Gluck, who examined it and then called upon Salieri to sing it. He listened attentively, and then said: "You are right, dear friend, the air as a whole is good, but the passage with which you are dissatisfied, displeases me also. Still I cannot at the moment discover the reason. Sing the air again." Salieri did so. "And now again." When the other reached the passage now for the third time, Gluck interrupted him, and suddenly exclaimed: "Now I have it—the passage smells of music!" and upon examination they found that the musical idea here did not spring from any necessity of the situation or sentiment of the text, but was introduced simply on artistic grounds.

"This remark of the great man," says Salieri,

"is as original as it is full of meaning, and in the highest degree instructive for every artist in every art."

Salieri himself took his score to Paris not only with the consent but to the great pleasure of Joseph. "Les Danaïdes" was put upon the stage with immense splendor, and first publicly performed on the 26th April, 1784, in the Theatre de la Porte St. Martin, the Palais Royal theatre having been burned a few years before. The success of the work was such as to gain him an order for two new operas. Rauquit-Lieutand wrote him that every composer, who produced three successful works at the Academy, received for each of the first twenty performances 200 francs, for each of the ten following 150 f., for each of the next (the fourth) ten 100 f., and all beyond forty 60 f.

Cramer, in his Magazin der Musik (II. 417 et seq.), gives a long article made up out of various numbers of the Mercure de France upon "Les Danaïdes." The article, of course, with its account of Danaus, Hypermnestra, the children of Danaus, of Linceus and his brethren, and the story of the five act drama, I pass over; but the introductory notice by Cramer himself is of too much interest to leave untranslated. Here it is.

"If the German public, and especially those who have formed a better acquaintance with Salieri, through the piano-forte arrangement of the Armida, which I have published, are as curious as I am to learn something of his new work, since, to all appearance he has followed in it still more closely the footsteps of Gluck and the path of Nature, they will thank me for giving them here a detailed and very intelligent criticism of it, both text and music, drawn from the Mercure de France, a work far too little known in Germany. True, I should have much preferred to have first seen the score of the opera, which as I hear with great satisfaction is soon to appear in Paris, in order to add to the news which these articles give my own more detailed opinion of it; but it may well be some time before we shall receive the score. Still I will introduce some notes of my own, which perhaps the thoughtful critic may not look upon as quite superfluous.

"That at first Les Danaïdes was to pass in Paris under the name of Gluck, to save it from the ill-natured remarks which so many, who judge a work of genius by the name of its author and not after its own merits, would be ready to make, as well as to smooth its way to the stage, I knew long since through letters, received before Salieri left Vienna for Paris. Very soon after his arrival in Paris, I received from Vienna the following account of its success. 'Les Danaïdes thus far is having all possible luck. People have again come upon the idea, that the entire opera is by Gluck, and thus the composer is saved from a thousand plagues and torments in bringing it out, which would be far from the case in respect to a new master making his first appearance. The queen has had him come to Versailles three times to rehearse the work there; and each time has herself sung with the professori. He is to conduct once more there in presence of the king, Count d'Artois and several high personages of the court of both sexes. He will have cause for full satisfaction if the piece finds the same success with the public in Paris that it has enjoyed at court.'

"In another letter, which he himself wrote to the secretary of the chamber of finance in Vienna, Herr Paradies; father of the famous blind pianiste, he says among other things:—'Ritter Gluck spoke but the truth, when he asserted, that if the composer demands twenty livres for writing an opera, he ought to have twenty thousand for the trouble in bringing it out.'

"Finally, after his return from Paris, Salieri wrote me in relation to the success of his work, with all the noble modesty and frank ingenuousness, which give such increased value to his talents, as follows:

Vienna, July 20, 1784.

"... 'And so I am at length back again from Paris. As to the news in relation to Les Danaïdes, which you ask of me, I could do nothing more than repeat what you have no doubt already read in the Journal de Paris and the Mercure de France. In the former you have doubtless noted the indecision of the Parisian public, as to the value or want of it of the work, and the praise together with the censure in detail (in No. 21), as well as, in the latter, the declaration, as to the real author of the music, of Ritter Gluck. What people think of the opera since, I have not yet heard. During my stay there it was given thirteen times.

"I only succeeded on the first two evenings in hearing the performance well, and then through special favor; the other times I had no desire to go early and wait two hours to secure a good place, and hence could neither see nor hear well. Some people have said all that is good, others all that is bad of it; some would have it that the music was mine; others not; and this in spite of the public declaration of Ritter Gluck and my reply to it. What was there farther to be done?

"The direction of the Paris opera have, since that declaration of Ritter Gluck, ordered the composition by me of two new dramatic poems; the one entitled Atar (Tarare) King of Ormus, the other Les Horaces et Curiaces. This last will probably be the one which I shall first complete. This is the advice of Gluck; and the other requires too much time on account of the peculiar manner in which the subject is treated. The public as a rule enjoys and seeks the truth in music; I therefore, who without this truth should hate the art, feel myself inclined, in the highest degree inclined, to exert all my powers, to make myself worthy its applause, and therefore hope and believe that I shall hardly be forced to write Italian operas again.'

"The 'declaration of Ritter Gluck' here mentioned was a letter printed in the Journal de Paris, in which the veteran declared the music of Les Danaïdes to be wholly by Salieri, and that he himself had no share in its production beyond the advice which he had given the composer."

(To be Continued.)

Nicolai's "Merry Wives of Windsor," at Her Majesty's Theatre.

It is singular that an opera of such lively pretensions as Die lustigen Weiber von Windsor should have been so long in making its way to England, especially when we take into account the fact that its libretto is derived from one of the most popular of Shakespeare's plays. For fifteen years this work of the late Prussian Kuppelmeister has been more or less famous. Played repeatedly in the chief towns of Germany, it has even found favor with Italy, France, and Belgium.

That Falstaff has hit the public taste is unquestionable. There are many reasons to account for this. Perhaps half the success of M. Gounod's Faust, despite the beauty of the music, was owing, both here and elsewhere, to the simplicity of the plot and the familiarity of the subject. But if the incidents and personages in Goethe's celebrated poem were familiar to us all in England, how much more intimately are we acquainted with the incidents and personages of Shakespeare's admirable comedy? If we knew Faust and Mephistopheles and Margaret well, we know the Fords, the Pages, and "fat Sir John" still better. Thus a difficulty is at once got over, always in some degree an impediment to the immediate appreciation and enjoyment of a new opera. Moreover, Herr Mosenthal's libretto is very skillfully contrived. The first act of The Merry Wives of Windsor is altogether discarded. It possesses no feature to stand out effectively in an operatic framework, and would therefore have been simply an incumbrance. The other four acts are, with like judgment, compressed into three. The dramatis personee, too, are numerically reduced—an equally necessary step; for, though something might have been made of Sir Hugh, the Welsh parson, and something more, perhaps, of "Mine Host of the Garter," it was just as well to shut out Mrs. Quickly. Shallow would have been a mere nonentity; Pistol, with his bombastic jargon, in a musical sense, an impracticability; and the retention of Bardolph, Nym, the other followers of Sir John (to say nothing of Simple and the rest), an overcrowding of the score to little or no purpose. As the book exists the opera is very properly entitled Falstaff. In each of the three acts Falstaff is the conspicuous figure; and each includes one of those well-known misadventures, the result of his secret visits to the mischief-loving wives of Masters Ford and Page (translated by the German librettist into Fluth and Reich). Naming the buck-basket, the old woman of Brentford, and Herne the Hunter, is enough, without a word of comment or description, to bring the whole to the mind of every one who has seen or read the play of Shakespeare. He who has done neither should make amends without loss of time; it were cruel to forestall his pleasure. The other scenes comprise the meeting between Sir John and the supposititious Brook (Bach); the loves of Anne Page and Fenton; the rivalry of Dr. Caius and Slender (Junker Spärlich), rejected suitors; the jealous ebullitions of Master Ford; and the plottings of the merry wives for the discomfiture of their stout and unctuous Giovanni. A new scene, by Herr Mosenthal, invented for the sake of giving Falstaff a Bacchanalian song, precedes his first interview with Brook; and, legitimately enough, the last of all—in Windsor Forest, where, under the shadow of Herne's Oak, the amorous Knight is duped and tormented by imaginary imps and fairies—is used as an occasion for the introduction of the ballet element.

The music of Falstaff is, above all, remarkable for spirit and fluency. It nowhere flags; and if it fails to exhibit a vein of striking and original melody, it is gracefully tuneful from beginning to end, containing scarcely a single example either of direct plagiarism or unintentional resemblance. A certain freshness distinguishes piece after piece; and this is further enhanced by orchestral accompaniments which, besides being written with musician-like ingenuity, are set off by varied, clear, and sonorous instrumentation. The overture, a showy composition of the French school, contains, among other good points, a cantabile phrase, which seizes and captivates the ear the moment it is heard, and is, indeed, the most genuine melody in the opera. The two most important finales—the first, embodying the incident of Falstaff's being conveyed away in the basket of foul linen, the second that of his escape as the old woman of Brentford, under the cudgel of the exasperated Ford—are skillfully constructed and full of animation. The smaller concerted pieces, the duets, and the solo airs, are all, in a greater or lesser degree, attractive—some few being really beautiful. In the forest scene—with Herne's oak and the moonlight gambols of the mock fairies—although Nicolai may here be said to invade the province of Mendelssohn himself, the King of Fairy music, he passes the ordeal triumphantly, disdaining to pilfer and avoiding to parody the thoughts of that gifted and inspired master. The fairy music in Falstaff is rhythmical, pretty, often sparkling, replete with gaiety, and never once far-fetched. Of high fancy and subtle poetry it reveals no trace; but, in the absence of these, it pleases all the same; and the sprites and fairies not being genuine, it is, perhaps, just as dramatically appropriate. To cut short, however, this almost unqualified, but assuredly well merited panegyric, the music of Otto Nicolai is of that agreeable sort which catches prolixity, extravagance and hyper-sentimentality. If it never rises very high, it never descends to platitude; if almost invariably light, it is very seldom trivial, never insipid; and, best of all, if nowhere deep, it is also nowhere dull; so that, while we are rarely—to use a commonly accepted expression—"carried away," it never creates in us an impulse—in no less homely phrase—to "take ourselves off."

The performance of Falstaff is in many respects first-rate, in some—the overture, the concerted music and orchestral accompaniments, for instance—beyond criticism. The cast of the dramatis personee is remarkably efficient. To allude at once to the feeble point—and that only feeble by comparison: the Falstaff of Signor Marcello Junca is destitute of humor; and so we have the body without the soul of that most corpulent knight. Signor Junca—himself a gentleman of unusually substantial dimensions—both dresses and looks the character well; but the spirit of it eludes him altogether; and—to quote Nym—"that's the humor of it." Nor is Signor Junca's voice by any means as imposing as his physique; and unfortunately the music which Nicolai has put into the mouth of Sir John—all, even to the Bacchanalian,

"Quand' era ancora in quell' età Che nulla sa di male e ben."

characteristic enough—goes for little or nothing, or at any rate produces no effect. The most that can be said of Signor Junca's performance, is that it is painstaking. With a strong French accent and a weak French voice, he combines none of the Italian method so desirable in Italian opera. He does his best, however, and must be taken, we suppose, cum grano salis; but, with all his sub-tance he is not even the shadow of Falstaff. The other gentlemen are unexceptionably good. Mr. Santley's perfect execution of the music allotted to Ford surprised no one; but his intelligent and forcible dramatic impersonation of that suspicious husband surprised all, except those who have been accustomed to watch with interest the gradual progress which this admirable singer is making as an actor. Ford's music contains not a single solo air; and Mr. Santley has the good taste to refrain from introducing one. Signor Cassier effects all that can possibly be effected with the operatically unimportant character of Master Page, his careful embodiment of which is not the only proof he has afforded of what a true artist can do to raise a small part into significance. In Fenton, Signor Giuglini has simply to put on a love-lorn look, and to sing well. He does both in a perfect manner; and one of the hits of the opera is his exquisite delivery of the soliloquy, "Nel boschetto e l'aignuolo"—a charming air in which it is difficult to know whether most to admire the expressive grace of the melody or the ingenuity of the accompaniments. The "merry wives" are jewels both. One might imagine that Mademoiselle Tietjens had got Shakespeare by heart (nothing strange, by the way, in a German), so thoroughly does she fill up the personage of the buxom Mistress Ford. Her acting—both in the scenes with her jealous mate and in those with the amorous Sir John—is in the highest spirit of comedy; while her singing is everywhere admirable. It is rare to find one eminently suited to fulfil the duties of a "Tragedy Queen" so thoroughly at home and so thoroughly natural as Mademoiselle Tietjens in the purely comic character of Mistress Ford. Mademoiselle Bettelheim has risen another step in public estimation by her impersonation of that other "merry wife"—the serene and happy Mistress Page. In a dramatic and a musical sense it is equally to be praised. Not to enter into further detail, we may point to the last interview of the two married ladies with Sir John Falstaff—just before the arrival of the imps, sprites and fairies to torment him—as to a masterpiece of singing and acting on the part both of Mademoiselles Tietjens and Bettelheim. Their united delivery of the melodious and insinuating mock profession of love, "Piu di me stesso io t'amo,—Ah! Sir John," is absolute perfection. Mlle. Vitali sings the music of Anne Page very prettily, shining most in the charming duet with her lover, Fenton (Signor Giuglini)—"Sempre in dubbio, senza fede." This, by the way, is enriched by a graceful accompaniment for solo violin, which is executed by Mr. Carrodus in a manner so thoroughly finished that it fairly shares with the singers on the stage the attention and applause of the audience. The minor parts of Slender and Doctor Caius are tolerably sustained by Signors Manfredi and Mazzetti.—London Times, May 5.

Another distinguished organist—Mynheer Tours, of Rotterdam, has also died lately. He was one of the first musicians of Holland, and for thirty years the director of the "Eruditio Musical Society."

Handel and Haydn Society.—Forty-ninth Annual Meeting.

ADDRESS BY THE PRESIDENT, DR. J. D. UPHAM.

Gentlemen: Members of the Handel and Haydn Society.

I propose, with your permission, so far to depart from previous usage on these occasions, as to offer you a few brief considerations, thoughts and suggestions, having a bearing upon the interests of the Society, which may pass, perhaps, for a sort of official report.

The origin, principles and objects of our Association, and the prominent incidents in its early history, are too well known—to you, its immediate members—to require comment at my hands. Much that is interesting on these points has been given to you, from time to time, in the instructive reports of our worthy Secretary, on past occasions of this nature.

I cannot forbear, however, to call to your minds the fact that in this, the 49th year of our existence, we have on our roll of active membership the names of an honored few, who ministered at the formative stages of the Society,—who took part in its first public performances, and shared the heat and burden of its early struggles. It is the glory and should be the boast of this Society, as is the experience of most associations, self-supporting and of equal age, that it has not arrived at its present stability and prosperity, except through some times of anxious solicitude and unremitting exertion, if not of doubt and almost desperation,—and that we owe our existence now to the fortitude and persevering efforts of many, whom the infirmities of age may at length have incapacitated from efficient duty in the ranks. No word of mine, I am sure, is needed to remind you of the respect and reverence with which these tried associates should be always held in your hearts.

On a future day, perhaps, a fitting occasion may offer, when it will be interesting and profitable to pass in review the first half century of our existence as a Society, and note the vast strides which have been made, during that period, in the Art to which we stand pledged, and what we may justly claim to have ourselves accomplished. Be it our duty now, to confine our attention more particularly to the operations of the Society for the year that has just closed, with such comments and criticisms as may seem to be called forth,—to consider our condition and prospects at this present, and make suggestions and provision for the immediate future.

I shall have occasion, in the course of these remarks, to allude to some points that have previously been brought before you in the Secretary's records, of which I have spoken, and to repeat in substance, it may be, the arguments which have already been faithfully presented.

In the first place, allow me to congratulate you that financially, as you have learned from the Treasurer's Report, the past has been a year of success to the Society. From the abstract of the Records just read by the Secretary, you perceive, also, that at least an average number of rehearsals and public performances have been given, and, if we take the experience of the past for our standard, with a fair attendance on the part of the members; while the actual working force of the Society has received a numerical increase.

The meetings for private practice have been devoted, almost exclusively, to the rehearsal of such works as have formed our repertoire for the public concerts during the season in the Music Hall. These have comprised, as you are well aware, the "Messiah" and "Ode on St. Cecilia's day," by Handel, the "Elijah" and Lobgesang of Mendelssohn, Costa's "Eli," and the arrangement for orchestra and chorus of Luther's "Ein feste Burg," &c., by Nicolai.

The marked and novel feature in these public performances of the past season has been the employment of the Great Organ, in what is perhaps its legiti-mate and grandest sphere, as an accompaniment in oratorio and sacred song. Under no other circumstances have the powers of this noble instrument been more effectively displayed, than while thus joining together, and upholding as with an adamantine wall, the voices and instruments in the sublime choruses of Handel and Mendelssohn. Three of the works which have been enumerated—the Ode to St. Cecilia, the Hymn of Praise and the adaptation by Nicolai—formed the programme on the occasion of the Choral Inauguration of the Organ, the entire nett proceeds of which were generously voted by the government toward the increase of the fund for the extinguishment of the organ debt—an act for which the Directors of the Music Hall Association desire publicly to express to this Society, through its Board of Trustees, their most grateful thanks.

It does not become me here to speak of the merits of these performances in detail. As a whole, it seems to me, they will, at least, compare favorably with the best efforts of the Society in former years. Were I to particularize, I should point to the "Elijah"—the closing concert of the season—as, in all respects, the best. There have been shortcomings enough—and glaring faults; faults which have reference to the Society as a body—faults (the more frequent and inexcusable,) which are referable to a few, who by their inattention and carelessness have sadly marred the well-directed efforts of all the rest,—and faults, too, of that still more limited class, who are yet to be found in all Associations of this nature—termed not inappropriately the individual vociferators,—whose zeal, out of all proportion to their knowledge, spoils both the temper and the tone of their immediate neighbors, and is, at the same time, sadly damaging to the general effect.

And here let me caution the Society against the idea, too often indulged in by associations of amateurs, who have acquired a standing and reputation for the good things they have achieved, that perfection in their performances has been attained. This, if cherished, will prove a fatal mistake. Non progredi est regredi (not to progress is to retrograde), should be the motto of us all. Nor should we be disappointed and restive under the more stringent animadversions upon our best efforts, to which the Society has in later years been subjected. Bear in mind, what has been well said, that just in proportion as an Association for the promotion of Art—a musical Association in particular—has been successful in advancing the taste and judgment of the public who make up its audiences, in the same proportion it must expect less indulgence in its defects, and a severer criticism of its most faithful performances, than formerly. And this, indeed, it can well afford to bear, for the strictest criticism presupposes an acknowledged capacity for excellence.

Now for a few plain facts and hints of a practical cast.

The first and most important in the category of complaints, which my two or three years' observation with you leads me to make, has reference to the ordinary operations of the Society. It is the want of regularity and punctuality, on the part of the members, in their attendance upon the stated meetings for practice and rehearsal. This is an evil which has long been felt, and oftentimes brought to your notice. From the abstract of the records for the past year, just given, we learn that it is still in full force. Indeed absenteeism seems almost to be the rule rather than the rare exception. Now, it needs no argument to prove that, without an honest and conscientious observance, on the part of all, of their duties, in this respect, the Society, constituted as it is, can never hope for progress and improvement, much less to arrive at anywhere near the confines of perfection. But, perhaps, there may be some to whom the requirement of a weekly rehearsal, during the seven or eight months that make up the season, appears inordinate and unreasonable. To such we would refer the rules and regulations of similar Associations in London and elsewhere, where not unfrequently, in addition to the meetings for weekly practice throughout the whole year, as many as fifteen or twenty special occasions are made, at all of which the members are bound, under penalty of forfeiture of membership, except for the most ample and sufficient reasons, to be present. In the London Sacred Harmonic Society, the candidates for admission are now pledged beforehand to a rigid observance of its rules and regulations, among the most stringent of which are those requiring punctual and regular attendance on all meetings for practice. It would be well if a similar rule were adopted and enforced in our own Society.

Another practice of a portion of our members, which grows out of the laxity of our rules and which deserves to be strongly reprehended, is that of frequenting only those rehearsals which immediately precede a public performance, and with such superficial preparation, occupying their accustomed seats in the chorus on the evening of the Concert. In this way, as has been intimated, many an otherwise creditable performance, for which careful rehearsal by a conscientious few has been made, is marred and ruined. As a remedy for this evil, I would respectfully suggest that some means be adopted, by registration or otherwise, to mark the attendance of individuals at such rehearsals as may be given in preparation for a public performance, the presence and participation in three or more of which should be required of all who take part in the Concert. If such system of elimination should result in reducing the chorus on such public occasions to one-half, its usual numerical force, the accuracy and efficiency of the residue would be the better appreciated and felt.

Among the radical faults of singers, in our own country especially, to which this Society forms no exception, is the almost universal inattention that prevails as to the proper position of the body, whether standing or sitting. I deem this subject of sufficient importance to dwell upon it emphatically, and urge it upon your careful consideration. I believe that if every Association of this nature had its competent instructor in physical training, as it is understood at the present day,—especially if to this were added some knowledge of the art of correct vocalization and the proper management of the voice, the effect of the chorus, in respect of volume and power of tone alone, could be at least doubled. But without such special instruction, a simple observance of an erect position of the body, and the proper disposition of the organs immediately concerned in vocalization, would do much towards the production of a purer intonation, greater ease, precision and fluency of delivery; every thing, indeed, that is improving to the singing voice.

Again, a positive element of loss which too often prevails in an extensive choral organization, is the neglect or refusal of a considerable percentage of those who are abundantly competent to sustain themselves creditably, to join in all their allotted parts at a concert. Some of the finest effects of the "Messiah," as given by this Society at the last Christmas season, were, as I believe, inadequately produced from this cause alone. It may be by reason of physical fatigue, on the part of some, but it is more frequently from indifference or the feeling, perhaps, that, among the great mass, these single efforts may not be missed. To this argument, however specious it may appear in a single individual case, it is only necessary to apply the reductio ad absurdum; for what would become of a great chorus if all should be possessed with the impulse to remain silent at one and the same moment? It is only necessary to allude to this point, and I leave it to the reflection and good sense of those who may have been accustomed so to transgress.

As an aid in bringing about and maintaining an improvement in some of the points to which I have alluded, as well as otherwise to increase the efficiency of the Society, and assist its practical operations, I would recommend the establishment of a Staff of Superintendents—as they might be called—to consist of, at least, eight persons, one-half to be taken from the Board of Trustees, the others to be chosen annually from the Society at large. They should be selected for their intelligence and ability, and for their devotion to the interests of the Society, and conscientiousness in the discharge of its required duties. It should consequently be regarded as a post of honor, as it would be one of responsibility and labor. They could, with advantage, be apportioned equally among the several departments of the chorus—thus giving two to each part—the Librarian to retain as now his general supervision of the orchestra, and be included among the staff. It would be the duty of these gentlemen to attend to the proper seating and arrangement of their respective departments, both at rehearsals and concerts—to see that all are properly supplied with music—to take note of the attendance of members, and report the same regularly at each meeting to the Secretary or the President of the Board, and generally to provide for everything that pertains to the comfort and adds to the efficiency of the corps under their immediate charge—to do this with firmness and energy, and, at the same time, with discretion and courtesy. This, of course, would take the place of the present seating Committee, whose duties are merged in those of the staff of Superintendents. The number could, if required, be enlarged on occasions of extra duty and emergency. The four thus chosen from the Society at large, together with the Librarian, might, with propriety, be ex officio members of the Board of Trustees, but without the privilege of a vote at its meetings.

I am certain that, if such organization be established, it would do much to regulate and systematize the Society's operations, and bring about that unity of purpose and action so much needed in every Association of this kind.

A word here as to the proper numerical force of our chorus department, and the better balancing of the parts. Taking into account the accommodations and acoustic capacity of the building we are likely to occupy for all public entertainments for some time to come, there is demanded, to give proper effect to such works as we are accustomed to undertake on our ordinary occasions, a chorus of full 400 vocalists. By this I mean that number of really competent, co-operating and well-trained voices. This, with the unrivalled organ we have at our command, and an orchestra of sixty instruments, (the command of which, I am sorry to say, at present we have not,) would leave little to be desired.

As regards the best apportionment of the voices among the four departments of the chorus, I am inclined from my own observation, as well as from the recorded experience of those who have given the subject their special attention, to coincide in the plan now adopted by the great Choral Societies in England viz.: that of distributing an equal number to each part. To effect this, as we are now constituted, the ranks of the tenor and alto departments must, if possible, be increased; or else the present preponderance of basses and sopranos diminished. The attention of the examining committee is respectfully called to this point, in the future consideration of candidates for admission.

The standard, too, of qualification for admission to the Society, I would suggest, might with propriety be raised. The requirements of the Society are largely increased, and the draft upon the musical capacities of its members is greater by far, since the introduction into our regular repertoire for practice, of the inviolated and chromatic productions of Mendelssohn and Spohr, and others of the modern school, and which the taste of the present day demands in equal amount with the easier oratorios of Handel and of Haydn.

And to the end that the qualifications of future candidates may be the more thoroughly tested, I would recommend that they be required to attend and take part in at least two of the Society's rehearsals or meetings for practice, before they are accepted by the Board. In this way, by a judicious observation, either of the committee themselves, or the superintendents in their respective departments, or of others specially delegated for the purpose, the abilities of the candidates can be more fully ascertained than is possible by a private examination only.

Nor do these remarks apply to such candidates and the newly admitted to our fellowship alone. With still greater force are they applicable, in many instances, to the older members of this Society. Surely, if we would keep pace with the advancing tendencies of the present day in music as in other branches of education, there is need of conscientious study and effort on the part of us all, lest, in these respects, the child become the father of the man.

But it is not altogether knowledge and artistic excellence, or capability of talents or acquirements, as we have seen, that makes the desirable member of an Association like this. Other attributes come in to fill up the complement of qualifications. "Many virtues," saith a quaint critic, "go to the making of a good chorister. He must have the secret applause of a good conscience towards the music, and the feeling that he contributes something to the grand and general result. The praise that he gets comes to him only through the composer, and is divided among so many hundreds that he can scarcely be said to taste it. He must, therefore, be not only a sincere lover of music; he must be humble and persevering. For without these qualities, that give diligence and a readiness in adopting the suggestions that must direct the whole, there is no possibility of bringing the art of choral singing to any perfection."

If the plan, now before the School Board of this city, should become a law, viz., the introduction of a system of thorough instruction in vocal music into the Primary Schools, under the supervision of an able teacher—as it is already taught by a special corps of teachers in the higher classes of the Grammar schools, we shall not be at a loss for material wherewith to recruit our ranks, or to raise our complement of active members to any number at which we may deem it expedient to limit ourselves; for the result of such plan must be, in a few years, to increase immeasurably a knowledge of the principles and practice of choral music throughout the whole community. Indeed, we ought even now, under the partial operation of the present system of musical education in our public schools, to find among those who annually graduate from the grammar department, an abundant supply of material for this purpose; and it only needs, as I believe, some systematic mode of registering the best pupils in the advanced classes in music, to render the scheme a practical one.

I have a few considerations in regard to the duties of the year upon which we are about to enter, the termination of which will mark the close of the first half-century of our life as a Society. It is fitting that so memorable an epoch in our history should be celebrated with more than usual circumstance and ceremony; and, while I would not counsel a departure from the ordinary rehearsals, and a rigid preparation for the Concert season, I would propose that a proper time be set apart as a festival week, in which this Society, with picked orchestra and chorus, enlarged to the utmost limits the capacity of our Hall will allow, and aided by the most renowned virtuoso talent this continent, if not the world, can supply, shall interpret in succession the sublime works of the Great Masters of Symphony and Oratorio.

It would be out of place, perhaps, for me to indicate, now and here, the details of a grand programme for such an occasion. This will require much thought and consideration on the part of many, and the careful exercise of discretion and good judgment. But it should be early marked out and determined upon, in all its features, and the preparation for it set about in earnest by all who are to take part. A year is none too much time wherein to make ready for the work. I would advise, therefore, that this matter be committed into the proper hands at once, with instructions to spare no pains nor expense, within reasonable bounds, to make the occasion significant of the grand epoch it is to mark in our annals, and worthy the great names, the performance of whose noblest works will be linked with its observance.

What they say of Meyerbeer.

THE GENIUS OF ELABORATION.—That Meyerbeer had genius no one will attempt to gainsay; but it was not a quick-creative, lightning genius, similar to that of Handel, Mozart, Mendelssohn, or Rossini, which could create "things of light and might" on the spur of the moment, making instinct, as it were, supply the place of thought and meditation; but a calm, surveying, penetrating, comprehensive, and calculating genius, which allowed nothing to elude its all-absorbing influence, and considered its labor under many aspects before it put the final seal to its accomplishment. It may indeed be very much doubted whether such works as Robert le Diable, the Huguenots, and the Prophète would have existed if Meyerbeer had had to write for his daily bread, like Rossini; as, indeed, it is doubtful whether the Barbiere, Semiramide, and Otello would have seen the light, had Rossini been placed above necessity. For these reasons we may accept it as a wise ordination that the two composers were differently organized and differently circumstanced. Had Meyerbeer been poor and Rossini rich, there is just a possibility that neither of them would have composed operas at all. It must not, however, be supposed, because Meyerbeer was so extremely slow in completing his operas, that he lacked facility in composition. On the contrary, he had a very fluent pen, and, when it pleased him to do so, could produce with great rapidity—witness the grand overture, written for the Opening of the International Exhibition in 1862, which was, we are informed, almost improvised at a sitting. But Meyerbeer—remarkably sensitive—was by no means strong in constitution; and a failure befalling one of his works at the latter end of his career, would, in all probability, have proved fatal to him. Knowing this, he carefully provided against contingencies. He not only prepared himself for the composition of his operas—at least, those operas written with a view to the French Academy—by a previous course of study and contemplation in the composition itself, as we were, elaborating every bar, but kept the work, when finished, beside him for years, perusing it continually, placing the various parts under different aspects with a view to new experiment, altering, adding, or subtracting from hour to hour, as if hoping in every change to approach more nearly to perfection. This was the way in which Meyerbeer's genius went to work; and, if it be doubtful whether such a way leads to the most successful issue, who can blame him for thus following the course he deemed most conducive to render his work worthy of his art? Meyerbeer, indeed, was the most scrupulously conscientious of musicians. He would have thrown an opera into the fire rather than have it produced before it had undergone his most earnest consideration, and before he had attentively examined it throughout, to discover whether any part was capable of amelioration. But Meyerbeer's care for his opera was not ended when, even to his own thinking, it had been completed. The singers, the chorus and the band, the dancers, the scenery, the dresses, the mise-en-scène, all occupied his most serious thoughts and made him anxious. He superintended the rehearsals, lent the aid of his counsels to the conductor and stage-manager, and would frequently strike out a new idea for painter or machinist, whereby some scene or incident might be vastly benefited. The result of all this care and foresight was that every opera which Meyerbeer brought out in Paris was a prodigious success—from Robert le Diable, in 1831, to the Pardon de Pörmel, in 1859.—London Musical World.

MEYERBEER IN PRIVATE.—As a man, Meyerbeer only failed in society because he expressed no opinions, no dislikes, no objections, and thus no predilections. The self-engrossment which seems to have been a part of his character, and was an ingredient in his talent, may have stood betwixt himself and sincerity as regards the music of his predecessors or his contemporaries, and somewhat, also, in social intercourse. Withal, he was a man who had travelled, and seen, and heard; he was pleasant at repartee, and fine (to the very extremest fineness) in his appreciation of humor.

So far as can be learnt, his strict self-occupation did not desert him to the last. He knew that he was dying; and was able, we hear, for himself to arrange every detail of the sad ceremonies which belong to the clay when the soul has fled from it.—Athenæum.

NOT SPONTANEOUS.—In the music shop windows you may see two caricatures in plaster by Danton the younger. One represents Rossini lolling easily, contentedly, the very picture of indolence, in a huge platter of macaroni. The other exhibits Meyerbeer with note-book and pencil in hand, his face contorted, like the phreniased Sybil's, wrestling with thought to force a blessing from it. This touches the weak point of Meyerbeer's genius; it is the imperfection of all precocity. When the first glow of the premature morning is past, all the subsequent light is obtained by painful effort. Inspiration ceases; whatever comes is wrenched by dint of will. The instrument is not the Æolian Harp struck with superhuman wildness and wantonness by Nature's own self; it is the organ, noble and majestic and soul stirring, but whose loftiest strains are blurred by the wheezing of the bellows or the creak of the lever in the hands of the sinewy blower who stands behind the fabric. The blower is not unfrequently heard in Meyerbeer's organ.—Spiridon's Letters.

THE PUPIL IN COUNTERPOINT.—One day Meyerbeer composed a fugue which he showed to Weber, who was delighted with it, called it a master-piece and vowed nothing would do but it must be sent to the Abbé Vogler, that the latter might know he was not the only music master in Germany who could form excellent pupils. The fugue was sent to Darmstadt. No answer, not even a simple acknowledgment of receipt, came. Weber attributed this silence to jealousy. "Oh ho!" said he, "the Abbé knows that none of his pupils could do so much and his pride is hurt; he is irritated with us and won't reply." At the end of the third month a voluminous packet all at once came from Darmstadt. Weber was delighted, for he felt sure it was complimentary—but to his astonishment he discovered a complete Treatise on Fugues written from beginning to end in the hand of Abbé Vogler. The Treatise was divided into three parts: the first gave a general and succinct exposition of the rules of fugue; the second was a critical analysis of Meyerbeer's fugue, an examination of it in every particular, and a demonstration in form of its gross violations of all the canons; the third was a fugue written by the Abbé on the thema which Meyerbeer had selected, and the reason for each note and each measure was given serialim with irresistible logic. Weber was deeply mortified. Not so was Meyerbeer; he took the Treatise, studied it thoroughly, and after he had mastered it, he composed a fugue in eight parts, and sent it directly to the Abbé Vogler, who instantly replied: "Come here. I will receive you in my house like a son, and I will show you where to draw from the fountain head of science." To Darmstadt Meyerbeer went, although the Abbé was not only a Romish priest, but the organist of the Darmstadt cathedral. His family had the good sense to see that no evil, if his principles were firm, could come of this commerce. The Abbé had three pupils when Meyerbeer joined them, and it certainly tells eloquently in favor of his mastery over his art that two of his pupils should be such eminent composers as Carl von Weber (the author of Der Freyschütz, Oberon, etc.) and Meyerbeer. These three pupils were, besides the one just mentioned, Gumbascher, who afterwards became the chapel master of the Austrian Court, and Godfrey von Weber. The day would begin with a Mass celebrated by Abbé Vogler, and served by Carl von Weber; they would then set to work; the Abbé would give to each the thema on which he was to compose; this one would have a Kyrie, that a Sanctus, the third a Credo, the fourth a Gloria in Excelsis. The Abbé, too, would work, and by night-fall they had among them composed scores enough to furnish all the parishes in the neighborhood. Every Sunday the school would go to the Cathedral, where there were two organs. The Abbé would sit at one, the pupils would sit at the other, and would either echo the thema of the master, or would embroider it with variations. Great as was the emulation which existed between these fellow-students, their friendship never was clouded by any mean passion. When Carl von Weber died, his family found among his papers the manuscript of a cantata which bore this title: "A Cantata written by Weber for Vogler's birthday, and set to music by Meyerbeer and Gumbascher." It was dated 10th June, 1810. Meyerbeer wrote the choruses and a trio; Gumbascher wrote the solo. By the time Meyerbeer was seventeen he had written several excellent pieces of religious music; among them was "God and Nature," which commanded great applause at the Court of Hesse Darmstadt, and led the Grand Duke to appoint him his composer in ordinary.—Ibid.

The Musical Season in London.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—The Covent Garden season opened March 27th, with Norma, in which Mlle. Lagrue, a singer of continental fame, rather past her prime, secured a succès d'estime in the part of the priestess. The Times congratulates the lyric stage on the acquisition of a singer, "who, in a dramatic sense almost perfectly, and in a musical sense with more than average felicity, can be said to present the ideal Druidess of Romani and Bellini." . . . "The partial deterioration of physical force has been accompanied by a nearer and nearer approach to perfect art." The Adalgisa of Mlle. Battu, the Pollio of Naudin and the Oroveso of Atry, are commended. Norma ran three nights.

The first week in April offered Masaniello, Il Trovatore and La Favorita. Mario was Masaniello, and all spoke with admiration, still, in spite of his impaired voice, of his consummate art, his picturesque appearance, his perfect acting, his wonderful pianissimo singing, etc. Graziani, as Pietro, Mlle. Marie Battu and Sig. Neri-Beraldi, as Duchess and Duke, and Polonini as Borella, all made a good impression, apparently, while the danses, Mlle. Salvioni, "danced and mimed the part of Fenella to absolute perfection," says the Orchestra. Band and chorus, under Costa, superb. Herr Wachtel, the German tenor, (not new to England), in the part of Manrico, "leapt at one bound to the pinnacle of popularity." The Times credits him with "a powerful voice, a striking personal appearance, youth, vigor, imperturbable self-possession, and a high-chest C, ready at an instant's warning; a sonorous note, admitting of no denial." Mlle. Frizzi (Leonora) is thought to have improved, and Mlle. Destin (Azuena), from the Imperial Opera at Vienna, promises to be useful. Graziani and Tagliafico took the parts of Count Luna and Ferrando. In the Favorita the opinion of Mlle. Lagrue as "a thorough artist" was confirmed. Mario was not at his best as Ferrando. The other parts were by Graziani, Atry, etc.

The next was a week of repetitions. First, Trovatore, which made some of the admiring critics "reflect" and begin to think that the triumph of Wachtel was rather "sensational," and that he is far from being a great artist, even violates the very grammar of his art, etc. Then Favorita, Mario this time in magnificent voice. Then, in honor of Garibaldi's visit, Norma and a part of Masaniello, which seem to have delighted the hero much. The only novelty was the successful debut of Herr Schmid as Oroveso.

The largest audience of the season was drawn by the first performance of Rossini's master-piece, William Tell; Graziani as Tell, Dr. Schmid as Walter, and Wachtel as Arnold. The Musical Standard warns the latter, that "the youthful energy which now enables him to lavish three Cs in alto on one aria, cannot last, and should in due time be supported by acquirements more likely to endure." Verdi's Ballo in Maschera was given several times, with Lagrue, Mario, Mlle. Battu, Graziani, Capponi and Tagliafico, in the principal parts, with a new contralto, Mlle. Tati as Ulrica, the sorceress.

Then came repetitions of Tell and Favorita, and then (April 30) Le Prophète, with Wachtel as Jean de Leyden, who was very hoarse. The new Fides, Mlle. Destin, is apologized for on the ground of extreme youth (23 years), the music being "beyond her capabilities, whether physical or artistic." Mme. Rudersdorff was the "earnest, intelligent and painstaking" Bertha; and the three black crows, who drone out the chant: Ad nos, ad salutarem undam, were Neri-Beraldi, Polonini and Capponi.

Monday, May 2, Tell again. Tuesday, Un Ballo again. For Thursday Mlle. Lucca was announced in the Huguenots, but the Trovatore was substituted on account of an illness. On Saturday, Adelina Patti's rentrée as Rosina in Il Barbiere, with Mario as Almaviva, Ronconi as Figaro, Ciampi as Bartolo, Tagliafico as Basilio, etc. Of Patti, it is said:—"Her voice is fuller, more developed, sounder than before, whilst she has not lost a whit of her almost childish vivacity and smiling coquetry in acting such a part." For the music-lesson she sang "Bel Raggio" magnificently.

The next week's performances were mainly in memory of Meyerbeer, who died May 2. The Prophète (second time), the Huguenots and Robert le Diable. It does indeed speak well for the resources of a theatre, that could bring out three such works in one week, and in superb style. We copy from the Times, May 16.

Herr Schmid was so gravely indisposed that the part of Marcel was, at the eleventh hour, assigned to Sig. Atry; while for Mlle. Pauline Lucca—who, though also suffering, was still both able and willing to avert another disappointment—a printed apology was circulated. About the general execution of the Huguenots it is enough to say that unusual spirit appeared to animate every one engaged, even to the new Valentine, who, notwithstanding her indisposition, the reality of which no effort could succeed in wholly concealing, sang with such energy and acted with such good will that the brilliant impression she had created near the end of last season was vividly renewed. The clear and penetrating tones of a soprano voice remarkable alike for vigor, strength and freshness, could not fail to make their effect, and at times carried everything before them. The zealous endeavors of Mlle. Lucca were the more to her credit, remembering what sincere interest the composer of the Huguenots took in her artistic career; how he watched her progress in Berlin, how he aided her by his invaluable counsels; for Meyerbeer, it should be generally known, was a most kind and sympathetic friend to young and rising talent, and Mlle. Lucca was one of those in whose promise he had faith and whose fortunes he materially aided. She was lucky, too, in her Raoul de Nangis. Those who are the warmest partisans of Signor Mario, those who can recall his ancient triumphs in the Huguenots, are invariably most anxious for him when he is announced to undertake this difficult, exacting, and fatiguing part. But on the present occasion he began well, warmed to his task as he went on, and gave full point and meaning to every passage of significance, whether vocal or dramatic.

Another incident in this performance was the first appearance of M. Faure (also a protégé of Meyerbeer), whose St. Bris, so often praised, showed him worthy the master's good opinion; and yet another, the re-appearance of Madame Nantier Didié, an especial favorite with Mr. Gye's supporters, whose impersonation of Urbain, the page, was as sprightly as her execution of the two melodious airs ("Nobil Signor, salute" and "No, no, no") allotted to that character, was expressive. Mlle. Battu gave the florid music of Marguerite de Valois with her accustomed fluency; Signor Tagliafico was, as usual, a gallant Nevers; and Signor Atry's Marcel, though deficient in weight, was, on the whole, so good that the absence of Herr Schmid was the less to be regretted.

Robert le Diable, which attracted a crowded house on Saturday, brought forward Mlle. Lagrue in the interesting part of Alice, which she sustained with eminent ability. That some of the music overtaxes her voice, may be stated at once; but her general conception of the character is highly poetical, and her singing for the most part as highly artistic. Here and there her expression is overdrawn—as in the recital to Robert, "Vanne disse, al figlio mio;" nor can we approve of the ornaments with which she strives to embellish the second couplet of that simple and melodious romance, "Nel lasciar la Normandin," which, like all the things of true beauty, when undressed is adorned the most. In other respects, however, Madeirosella Lagrue's performance may claim almost unqualified praise. Signor Naudin's Robert does not realize the chivalric portraiture to which we have so long been accustomed by Signor Tambrlik; nor is his vocal declamation marked by the breadth which imparted such dignity to that of his contemporary; nor does he look the character by any means so nobly. Nevertheless, Signor Naudin has qualities which stand him in excellent stead; his voice, naturally strong, and, when he does not force it, telling, is in the vigor of its prime, every note being under the easy control of the possessor; he de-claims with energy if not always with well balanced emphasis; and he has an abundance of expression at command, which, not infrequently,—after the French rather than the Italian manner—he lavishes, instead of husbanding. The ideal Robert Signor Naudin is not; but a "Roberto robusto," full of intentions, earnest, lung-proof, and at times really impassioned, he unquestionably is. He produced no extraordinary impression on Saturday night in any part of his performance, but honorably achieved what is termed "a success of esteem." Bertram was represented by Signor Atti, who made even a more respectable figure than he had already done in Marcel. This gentleman is a sterling artist and most valuable acquisition.

The idea of producing Nicolai's "Merry Wives of Windsor" at this Theatre, this season, has been abandoned, and Flotow's Stradella is promised instead.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE, under the management of Mr. Mapleson, opened on Saturday evening, April 9, with Rigoletto. Three of the singers were new to London, viz: Mlle. Vitali, Mlle. Bettelheim, and Signor Varese. The Orchestra, of May 16, reviews the first week thus.

Signor Varese, considering his great age, is a wonderfully good representative of the hunchback. We scarcely notice, in entering into his Robsonian humor and pathos, that his voice has been fresher and rounder. He sings with infinite feeling, and won throughout the evening hearty bursts of commendation. Of Madlle. Vitali we hope much. She is still young, and her organ will, we doubt not, acquire much of that fullness and sonority that are at present lacking. Her style is unaffected and careful and as an actress we can commend her general interpretation of the character of Gilda. Signor Giuglini's piuissimo singing in the scene with Gilda and subsequently in the last act, met with the usual "bravi." Fraulein Bettelheim is an exceedingly handsome girl, and as such made a success in her small part of Maddalena. She sung her part of the quartet very well, but we cannot speak specially of her abilities till we see and hear her in another part. The Montreone of Signor Bossi, and the Sparafucile of Gasperoni, were worthy of the applause they received. The opera was well mounted, and the orchestra under Signor Arditi, as usual, most careful and effective. The chorus, we confess, we could wish to see improved. During the course of the evening, Madlle. Titiens appeared in the "National Anthem," and received a rapturous ovation. On Tuesday, "Rigoletto" was repeated to rather a thin house. On Thursday, Flotow's "Marta" was performed with the subjoined cast:—Lionello, Giuglini; Lord Tristano, Muzzotti, (his first appearance); Plumketto, Mr. Santley, (his first appearance in that character) Nancy, Madlle. Bettelheim; and Marta, Madlle. Vitali.

The orchestra and chorus were effective; but the putting on of the opera, so far as scenery is concerned, was most miserable. The house was thin. To-night (Saturday) Titiens appears in "Norma," and on Tuesday Garibaldi will visit the theatre, when Rossini's "Tell" will be appositely given.

There were also one or two performances of Trout and Lucrezia Borgia about this time, and Madlle. Bettelheim, both as Azucena and as Orsini, is much lauded by the Times.

The week ending May 7th, was occupied with Nicolai's "Die lustigen Weiber von Windsor," Italianized under the title of "Falstaff," by Sig. Maggioni. In this version the fat knight is called Sir Giovanni Falstaff! A description of the opera and performance will be found in another column. Falstaff kept its hold on the public for a couple of weeks longer; during the latter part of that time in alternation with Gounod's Faust, which was reproduced with the same cast as last year, with the exception of Mlle. Bettelheim in place of Mlle. Trebelli as Sichel.

The rest of the cast was as before. There was the pensive, dreamy, yet womanly and impassioned Margaret of Madlle. Titiens—the most German, the most Goethean, and therefore the most poetically correct embodiment of that beautiful creation hitherto witnessed; there was the Faust of Signor Giuglini, remarkable for many reasons, but most of all for the refined and exquisite delivery of the soliloquy in the garden ("Salve dimora"), which, like "Parlatele d'amore," was encored; there was the Valentine of

Mr. Santley, whose masterly portrayal of the death-scene of Margaret's brave and gallant, but unrelenting brother would alone stamp the performance as one of uncommon excellence; and there was the bluff—somewhat too bluff, perhaps—and insinuating Mephistopheles of Signor Gassier, for whom, being indisposed, an apology was spoken between the second and third acts.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JUNE 11, 1864.

Concert for the Benefit of the East Tennesseans.

This concert, which took place last Saturday evening in the Music Hall, had been most quietly prepared,—we presume, under private auspices—and seems to have received hardly a word of notice in the public prints since its occurrence. Yet artistically, as well as in view of its philanthropic and patriotic object, it was one of the most interesting, perhaps the very best, of the larger concerts of the season of 1863-4. Coming so near midsummer, and after the concert season proper, and with short notice, it did not crowd the hall, as both the music and the purpose naturally should have done, although the tickets were put down to par, the good old half-dollar price, and although it was understood that our city's guests, the officers of the Russian fleet, would grace the occasion with their presence. Yet the audience was large. The selection of artists and of pieces for performance was, with the exception of one or two vocal pieces, of the highest order. We do not remember a programme of the same materials, —Orchestra, Great Organ, Piano-forte and Voice—during the past year, that could be called quite equal to it. It was as follows:

- |  |              |
|--|--------------|
| 1. Prelude and Fugue in A minor, for Organ.          | J. S. Bach.  |
| Mr. J. K. Paine.                                     |              |
| 2. Symphony. (No 7, A major)                         | Beethoven.   |
| 3. Romance, from 1st Concerto for Piano.             | Chopin.      |
| Mr. Otto Dreese.                                     |              |
| 4. Air, from La Sonnambula . "Ah non credes." | Bellini.     |
| Miss Adelaide Phillips.                              |              |
| 5. Trio Sonata for Organ, (E flat).                  | J. S. Bach.  |
| Mr. J. K. Paine.                                     |              |
| 6. Concerto for Piano. (G minor)                     | Mendelssohn. |
| Mr. Otto Dreese.                                     |              |
| 7. Viva the Laugh.                                   | Bendelari.   |
| Miss Adelaide Phillips.                              |              |
| 8. Overture to "William Tell."                       | Rossini.     |

Mr. PAINE had the manliness in opening the two parts, to choose Bach pieces only. And he played them as he only in this country can play them. The sublime Prelude and Fugue in A minor, especially, taxed the fullest resources of the Organ and the organist. We doubt whether the capacity of the great instrument's "lungs" has ever been so largely tested and at such length. Vast waves of glorious harmonies were rolled up from its deepest depths with an unflagging energy and grandeur. So intricate and yet so clear and beautiful in the interplay of parts, so wonderful in the evolution of rhythmic form out of the pregnant germs or themes! Well, this may be said of all Bach's art, and it is useless to attempt to describe such a Fugue. There were many restless, wondering, puzzled listeners or non-listeners no doubt; but there were many also on whom it made a deep and grand impression, creating a craving for more such hereafter; nor is a technical understanding of the composition necessary to such impression and enjoyment, any more than understanding is to such true enjoyment and feeling of the beauty and infinite suggestion of the ocean rolling up the beach.

The Trio Sonata in E flat is one which Mr. P.

has often played before in public. Its beauty is of so quiet a character, its art so perfect and so unpretentious, that with those accustomed to things more highly spiced, to the cheaper appeals of sentimentality or "effect," it might pass unnoticed. This music reflects a serene, cheerful, genial, self-possessed and pious spirit, whose depth of feeling and wealth of fancy grow upon you slowly, it may be, but are sure to reveal themselves to you at the right moment when you are really ready to receive. In Art one must put himself in the way of such opportunities, even if he have to wait some time and take not a little upon trust. Know that you are dealing with a great and earnest mind, with a great genius: is it for you to turn away at once because you do not feel the force and meaning of his words! The Sonata, however, excited a good deal of quite warm applause; it was played on a nice selection of softer stops, and with the utmost clearness and purity of outline.

Mr. OTTO DRESEL has become one of the "seld shown flamens," lately, outside of the more private temples of the Art. He has scarcely played in public before for more than a year past, and it was a rare treat to hear two such noble piano compositions rendered in his masterly and inimitable style. Have we ever listened to more perfect piano playing than that was?—allowing of course for the disadvantage of the finest possible piano in so large a hall. The Chopin Romance is exquisite as a piano piece alone, as Mr. D. has so often played it—and who is there that interprets Chopin with so interior a sympathy and so fine a grace?—but the orchestral accompaniments are equally unique and exquisite. The instruments are so delicately chosen and blended, the coloring so fine and spiritual, the sympathy of part with part so perfect, that you are transported to an element much more heavenly than Fairyland. The G minor Concerto of Mendelssohn has been more played, here and everywhere, by every pianist of any pretension, than any other Concerto. It would have been a greater rarity to hear a Concerto of Beethoven, for instance; but there was no chance for orchestral rehearsal, and so he wisely chose the safer alternative. The composition is one which cannot wear out, and it is not every day that we can hear it so interpreted. There were long calls for repetition of the Chopin piece, which were properly declined.

Mr. ZERRAEN's orchestra did its work faithfully and with spirit; but unfortunately it was even more slender in the number of strings than at the ordinary Afternoon Concerts; three first violins, two violas, &c., was a meagre complement for that great Symphony. Nevertheless it gave great pleasure to those who listened truly. Many, we are sorry to say, were disturbed, throughout the concert, by the peculiarly restless and unmusical character of a portion of the audience liberally sprinkled through the house.

We are sorry also to make another exception to the perfect whole of the entertainment. The pieces selected by our excellent singer, Miss PHILLIPS, were not particularly in place, not worthy of her own artistic character. To the Bellini aria, to be sure, the only objection could be, that it did not seem to harmonize, either by contrast or affinity, with the rest of the programme. Still less her encore piece, the waltz "Il Bacio," which is nothing but a graceful show-piece. But the "laughing" piece was not even clever nonsense; flat, senseless, and to earnest music-lovers positively disgusting—that very word was frequently heard among the audience coming out. Of course there are always a plenty to applaud and to encore such things. To our Russian visitors—and educated Russians have long been noted for their interest in classical music—it must have looked as if a standard in art were wanting here with all our love of it. We can more than pardon much to the hearty, generous and riant nature of our rich-voiced contralto; let her laugh as much as she will—in the right place; such a concert was not the right place. She sang finely of course; yet may we be pardoned the frankness of suggesting, with all friendliness, that the habit of singing in Italian operas, to West Indian Spanish publics, does not seem to have increased the refinement either of her singing or her stage deportment. Something too much of the free and easy way, the jolly, independent overfamiliarity with art and audience, the nodding to acquaintances, &c. This lady has too much sense and character to let applause mislead her long, or to sing only to the loudest audience.

SCHOOL FESTIVAL.—Our Russian guests have received no more beautiful and touching tribute, during this week of entertainments in their honor, than the Concert provided in the Music Hall on Wednesday afternoon, when 1200 girls and boys of our free schools sang to them in chorus, under the direction of their devoted teacher, CARL ZERRAHN, and with the support of Orchestra and the Great Organ. The scene itself was of course one of the most beautiful that could be imagined; so many fresh young faces, such a flower garden of lily white, and all gay colors, rising in terraces amphitheatrically around the organ; such perfect order in their fling in from all directions to their places; such beaming looks and perfect unity in voice and action, was charming to witness. We have described it more than once before, but this time it was better than ever; and so was the singing. After a good fugue and free voluntary on the Organ by Mr. LANG, the singing opened with the Russian national hymn, to these original words:

Sea birds of Muscovy, rest in our waters.
Fold your white wings by our rock-girdled shore;
While with glad voices its sons and its daughters,
Welcome the friends ye have wafted us o'er.

Sea-kings of Neva, our hearts throb your greeting!
Deep as the anchors your frigates let fall,
Down to the fount where our life-pulse is beating,
Sink the kind accents you bear to us all.

Fires of the North, in eternal communion,
Blend your broad flashes with evening's bright star!
God bless the empire that loves the great Union;
Strength to her people! Long life to the Czar!

All their fresh voices blended most effectively in this, and the welcome was accompanied by a sudden eruption and flutter of 1200 little Russian and American flags, which as instantly disappeared. This noble, thrilling air was followed by "Hail Columbia," which sounded rather meanly after it, and which in spite of somebody's best skill in bridging over to it by an orchestral modulation, seemed to have no musical affinity with the other. Alas! that we have not a national hymn!

The Angel Trio from Elijah was then sung, in three-part chorus, by the girls of the two higher schools, with beautiful effect. Then a chorale by Mendelssohn: "Let all men praise the Lord," by the whole. In the pause which followed, the musical babblement of all those voices, talking and laughing together, was not the least interesting phenomenon of the pleasant hour.

The rest consisted of skilful Organ selections by Mr. Lang; the prayer from Freyschütz, sung, or hummed, with muted voices (and encored); the Gloria from "Mozart's 12th Mass," and "Old Hundred." Admiral Lissosky and his officers appeared much delighted with this unique and charming welcome; so were all who were so happy as to have invitations.

ORGAN CONCERTS.—These still continue every Saturday afternoon, and we see no reason why they should not all the year round, although the audiences have been small of late. In Anniversary Week there were concerts both on Friday and Saturday, at noon; the former by Mr. THAYER, who besides a fugue of Bach (2nd in G minor), played the finale of Beethoven's 5th Symphony, offertories, variations, &c.; the latter by Mr. WILLCOX, from Handel's "Samson," Haydn's Mass No. 2, Mozart's Quartet in D minor, Wely, Kozeluch, and an improvisation.

Mr. GEO. E. WHITING played last Saturday, showing remarkable command of the instrument and such skill in the combination of stops as one might expect from an earnest pupil of Best. His programme included:

- |   |              |
|---|--------------|
| 1. { Fantasia in E b—Op. 88. }                  | W. T. Best.  |
| 2. Pastorale in G major.                        | J. S. Bach.  |
| 3. Prelude and Fugue in F minor                 | Mendelssohn. |
| 4. Improvisation on an Air by                   | G. Whiting.  |
| 5. Concert Fantasia in E minor,                 | Haydn.       |
| 6. Romance from Symphony "La Reine de France"   | Mendelssohn. |
| 7. Chorus from Elijah . "Be not afraid." |              |

To-day, at noon, Mr. THAYER will play—Bach's Toccata in F among other things. We hope he will soon play again two pieces which we lost in one of his former concerts (May 21), viz., the great Prelude in B minor by Bach, and the 5th Sonata of Mendelssohn (both for the first time).

Our brief "Notes" on many other concerts, in our last, were cut short in the middle by the printer's procrustean column rules, and what could not get in has strayed away past recovery. We did wish, at least, to thank Mr. RYAN for another hearing of the "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, with Mr. Lang's choir of female voices, and orchestra, and for the overture by Rietz and other good things.

HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY. The Annual Meeting took place May 30th, when the old board of officers were re-elected. By the Treasurer's report it appeared that the receipts for the year ending May 27, 1864, were $2254.32, and the expenditure $1538.97, leaving the Society entirely out of debt and with a balance of over $700 in the treasury. The Librarian reported the addition of 869 vocal parts, and seven scores to the library during the year. The secretary (Mr. L. B. Barnes) reported a successful year; there had been six concerts, five of which were for the joint interest of the Music Hall Association and the Handel and Haydn Society; and one, the first, a voluntary offering to the Organ fund: there had been thirty rehearsals, with a fair attendance, the average on pleasant evenings being one hundred and ninety-seven members; the highest number present at any rehearsal, two hundred and ninety-one. There had been thirty admissions of new members, and two expulsions. The secretary did not discuss the affairs of the Society with his usual fulness, but gave place to the excellent address of Dr. Upham, the President, which will be found in another part of to-day's paper.

BOSTON MUSIC HALL. The annual meeting of the stockholders of the Boston Music Hall was held at the hall this forenoon. The Treasurer's report showed that the receipts for the year ending June 1st, 1864, have been $34,051.44, and the expenses $16,704.61, leaving a balance of $17,346.83, which has been used for repairing and permanent improvement of the hall and towards payment of the cost of the great organ.

The President, J. B. Upham, Esq., in a verbal report, stated that the organ had so far withstood the vicissitudes of temperature and climate, without the least apparent injury; and on a careful survey, recently made, it was found to be in perfect order throughout. The old Board of Directors was re-elected, as follows: J. Baxter Upham, Robert E. Apthorp, E. D. Brigham, Ebenezer Dale, John M. Fessenden, H. W. Pickering, and J. P. Putnam.—Transcript, June 8.

OUR STUDENTS AT LEIPZIG.—A friend writes us: "Young ERNST PERABO has lately taken the second prize at the Conservatory Pruefung (examination), consisting of the score to Don Giovanni, and the new edition of Beethoven's piano works. This was as high as he could aspire, as he did not yet compete this year in composition."

Many of our readers here in Boston will remember Master Perabo, who resided here, with his parents, some seven years ago, and who, at that time, being not twelve years old, used to play (by heart) a score or two of Bach's fugues, sonatas of Beethoven, etc. Once we heard him play a prelude and fugue by Mendelssohn at sight. A subscription was raised among musical persons in New York and Boston, Mr. Scharfenberg taking the lead, to send the boy to Germany for his education, and he has now been gone nearly six years, the greater part of which time has been wisely spent in laying the foundations of his general education, which had been neglected too much in favor of music. He has only been a couple of years at Leipzig. The Perabo family have lately lived at Sandusky, Ohio, one of the papers of which city says: "The best musical talent at the conservatory was said to be American, among whom are Perabo of Sandusky, Petersilea of Boston, and Jacobi of New York city."

MME. RISTORI, in a letter to a friend mentions, among other plans, one of a visit to Paris, at no distant period, in order to play the part of Antigone of Sophocles, with the choruses of Mendelssohn.

NEW HAVEN, CONN. Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" was performed here on the 2nd inst., by the Mendelssohn Society, and an orchestra of 23 performers, mostly from the Philharmonic Society of New York, under the direction of Mr. G. J. Stoekel. We regret that we could not accept the invitation of the Society to be present. We have received a letter criticizing the performance rather sharply, although praising orchestra, chorus and some of the solo singers; but as it is anonymous, we cannot print it.

Musical Correspondence.

BERLIN, APRIL 29.—As it may not be uninteresting to you to hear of the success which attended the debut of Mr. CHAS. R. ADAMS (the Tenorist, and a native of your city, I believe,) at the Royal Opera here on Tuesday evening, April 19, I enclose to you the opinions of several of the first critics here, which I have clipped from the columns of their respective papers. Mr. A., has, since his third appearance (as Arnold in "Tell"), entered into a three years engagement with the Intendant of the Royal Opera, assuming the position which Theodor Formes has been obliged (his once beautiful voice being a complete wreck) to vacate. L. P. W.

First comes a critique over the name of one of the most promising among the younger composers of Berlin, the author of several charming romantic overtures, Richard Wuerst:

"ROYAL OPERA. In Mr. Adams, from the German theatre at Pech, we have made the acquaintance of a singer richly gifted by nature, whose fresh and sonorous organ still needs sufficient schooling to be sure, but in whom we may already clearly recognize a great tenor. The throat tone, which he often produces, is perhaps partly a consequence of his nationality. He is a North American, and so the English idiom explains the guttural coloring of many tones, which again in others disappears entirely. All the sustained song, in which Mr. A. can form the tone slowly and con amore, allows the voice to resound with infinitely more significance, than the rapidly spoken recitatives, the fiery Allegro, or the swift dialogue of the ensemble pieces. Here somehow the singer is not prompt enough in the formation of his tones, and the full control of the organ must depend on further studies. The intonation is as pure as gold, and the enunciation very distinct for a foreigner, frequently even to faulty vocalization. His Manrico had a decided success, as the frequent applause of the full house showed.

"Fräulein de Ahna counts Azucena among her best parts and showed herself this evening on her best side. Herr Betz has for some time past ripened into one of the most famous baritones. His Luna may in many respects be called a masterly performance; only he must guard against too much of the modern Italian rabbia. We can pardon more exaggeration of that sort in an Italian, than we can in a German. Our prima donna, Fräulein Lucca, in the part of Leonora, took her leave for the season of the public here, which covered her with honors of all sorts," &c.

The Vossische Zeitung says, among other things:

"In spite of many faults in enunciation, and lack of distinctness and facility in rapid tempo, Mr. Adams is essentially the best tenor who has appeared on our stage as 'guest' for a long time, and seems well adapted to fill the vacancy that exists. . . . But so far he is an Adagio singer; in Allegro he succeeds but seldom in bringing his voice to the right tones, the dramatic fervor is wanting, the enunciation not clear. Equally helpless is he in recitative. . . . But these are peculiarities which he can mend, with his evident talent and the good foundation he has gained for the cantabile proper, if he remains for some time attached to our stage, and seeks to assimilate himself with the good forces that surround him."

The National Zeitung has a criticism by Gumprecht:

"The tenor question, which has troubled the direction of our theatre for some time has become critical. As no means have been found to overcome the disinclination of Herr (Theodore) Formes to Raoul, Manrico, Lohengrin and the whole tribe of such, and his name during the last month has commonly only enriched the sick list on our bills, this singer on the first of May will dissolve forever his connection with our stage. Through the whole season the voice of Herr Woworski has borne the burden of the heroic rôles, the most wearing and exacting of all. To a second such campaign it would inevitably succumb, and the first thing is therefore to place an efficient colleague by his side. If all signs do not deceive us, such a colleague is already found in the person of Herr Adams. . . . His voice, although not of eminently athletic build, yet seems by volume, compass, as well as by its bright, penetrating quality, well qualified for the heroic career. It still possesses the full freshness and elasticity of youth, and one may expect for it a gratifying future in the artistically educative atmosphere of a first-class theatre. The intonation is good; the enunciation, however, needs to be made clearer. Particularly in the treatment of the vowels, some foreign sounds mingle themselves. He feels most at home in the sustained melody, which gives him time for the full development of the tone. In the recitative one misses the right routine, and in the ensemble pieces he is too much in the background. But further practice and experience will correct these faults, and give freedom and boldness in the whole and in detail."

Another, while confirming all the above, says further:

"We have here to do with a lyric tenor, and a singer, who only wants more fire, more interest in the ensemble (in that he is almost indolent), to make him an agreeable acquisition for any stage. Depth he has not; at least it is not fine, and consequently a part like 'Max' is not adapted to him. We hear Herr Adams is to sing in 'Tell'; we recommend 'Tamino, Ottavio and the like.'"

PHILADELPHIA, MAY 29.—Our musical season is at an end. The trees have donned the garb of summer, the warm days tend to make city life intolerable, and hundreds who, during the past winter, frequented the halls of music and the haunts of art, will soon turn their backs upon the scenes of past enjoyment. There has been no lack of musical performances of a high character. The second series of Messrs. Cross and Jarvis's soirées was even more encouraging than their first. A series of parlor concerts afforded us classical music in an acceptable dress, and the six concerts of Carl Wolfsohn were as worthy of their projector as those of former years.

All of these were well attended, and proved that the good taste of the few has given tone to the many who would be thought possessed of taste and yet have it not. Far be it from me to maintain that none but musicians can enjoy the musical pabulum offered on such occasions. Among these are so many different degrees of cultivation, that it were difficult to know where to draw the line. In many instances, too, there is that knowledge without sympathy, and that mastery of facts without feeling, of which pedantry consists. If none but the cultivated few were admitted to the pleasures derivable from this source, classical music would not deserve the universal appreciation coveted for it by many of its votaries. Nor will it, in our days, at least, become popular. As soon would I believe that Scott or Thackeray are as much read as Miss Braddon or Mrs. Henry Wood. In art, the great is for those who understand, and for those who aspire to the appreciation of it. A limited number truly, and one which might be greatly increased by proper instructors. There are but few, however, who meet the higher requirements of their professional position. Barring their number, one might ask: who will teach the teachers?

With this, you will receive the programme of Mr. Wolfsohn's sixth and last concert.* Mr. Kreissmann's appearance was a long looked for event. When Mr. Wolfsohn, in his prospectus, promised us a chance to hear the singer of whom Boston is so proud, we humbly thanked him and longed for the stranger's arrival, for two reasons. Firstly, that we might enjoy Mr. Kreissmann's singing. Secondly, that we might compare your idea of one of your favorites with our impressions. The result is, we are very sorry that you will ever have him back again: Sorry, indeed, that the meeting of four such artists as Kreissmann, Thomas, Wolfsohn and Ahrend was but for a brief hour of a pleasant summer day.

His voice, under almost perfect control, his true conception of the poet's meaning, his noble and impassioned delivery of the bolder passages, and his exquisite rendering of the tender or the playful, stamped his performance as one from which the student might draw inspiration. To some it must have come as a new revelation of the beauty and the depth of German poetry, thus to hear such

"airs

"Married to immortal verse."

What can be truer to the spirit of Heine's sad "Ich grolle nicht" than Schumann's version of it? With such songs we need nothing more than a singer possessing Kreissmann's pleasant voice and intelligent appreciation of every varying phase of poet's and musician's mood. It is well that such creations repel the unappreciative. May they never become fashionable!

Nor did the German songs form the only attractive portion of this glorious matinée. Besides the Scherzo of Chopin, the songs of Schubert, Schumann and Franz, the Schumann quartet and the Schubert duet, all of which works represent composers of this and the last generation, there was a solo for the violin, by Giuseppe Tartini, that carried one back a century and a half. Boldly did it contrast with those later works. Comparing the old with the new, the beauties of both stood out in great relief. The quain figures of the quick movements might seem old-fashioned, but the grateful harmonies, the charming melodies, and the scientific composition of the whole, make it a most interesting solo, and cause one to regret that the perfection of the mechanism of the piano has almost thrust aside the violin as a solo instrument.

* Part I. Duo (piano and violin) in A, op. 162, Schubert, by Messrs. Wolfsohn and Thomas.

Part II. "Dichterliebe," Schumann, sung by A. Kreissmann.—2. Scherzo in B flat minor, Chopin, C. Wolfsohn.—3. "Der Erlkönig," Schubert. A. Kreissmann.—4. Violin solo, Tartini, Theo. Thomas.—5. (a) "Widmung," (b) "Frühlingsgedränge," (c) "Willkommen im Wald," R. Franz, A. Kreissmann.

Part III. Quartet in E flat, op. 47, Schumann, Messrs. Wolfsohn, Thomas, Kammerer and Ahrend.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Sleep, sleep my darling child. Song. E. Bruce. 30
A simple lullaby, with pleasing words and music.

Whack, row de dow! or The Untameable Shrew. Song. W. Walker. 30

A most astonishing and lively production, showing how the lady, whose temper was "rather unstable," shook her husband "as long as" she "was able."

Let my care be no man's sorrow. Ballad. Wrighton. 30

Of high character. A good classical song.

There is no one like a mother. Song. S. Winner. 30
For guitar. Of sterling merit.

The Knight's vigil. W. H. Weiss. 35

The good Knight watches his arms through the night, according to ancient custom, previous to formally assuming them, and commencing the career of chivalric daring, to which Sir Cecil intends to devote himself. The ballad goes on to inform us how he fought, bled, and died, for love and glory.

General Scott and Corporal Johnson. D. A. Warden. 35

The old corporal, who fought in 1812, comes forward to offer his services to his old commander. A very "good hearted," affecting song.

De United States Hotel. Song. M. C. Bisbee. 30

An excellent contraband song, illustrating the joy of the blacks on becoming "boarflahs" at "Uncle Sam's tavern," with money enough on hand to pay the bills.

Instrumental Music.

Der Abendstern. Romance for piano. C. Mayer. 50
An excellent composition, of medium difficulty.

Arditi's "Kiss" waltz. Easy arrangement. E. Everest. 30

The regular "Kiss" waltz contains many octave passages and is, therefore, somewhat difficult for small hands. The present is a useful piece for teachers.

Toujours gai. Valse. T. Bauer. 35
A bright, cheerful, "always gay" waltz, of medium difficulty.

Brooklet's lullaby. (Böcklein's wiegenlied). Oesten. 30

A very pretty piece for child learners, simple, and very graceful.

Fantasia brillante. Sonnambula. F. Leybach. 75
A difficult piece of a high order, on portions of the airs from the opera.

Books.

HAYDN'S MASS IN G. (No. 7.) Cloth. $1.00
" " " " Paper. .75

Haydn's Masses, which have already been announced, merit each a particular description. The present one in G, (that so, mostly in the key of G,—varying occasionally to D and G minor,) has a general character of brilliancy and cheerfulness, and, with the exception of a few passages, is not difficult, and is not beyond the reach of a common choir; each member of a choir is benefitted by the practice of such music far beyond the amount expended for a book.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 606.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JUNE 25, 1864.

VOL. XXIV. No. 7.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Half a dozen of Beethoven's Contemporaries.

II. ANTONIO SALIERI.

[Continued from page 260.]

In the mean time Salieri's Armida (composed 1771) was making its way throughout Germany and even beyond. In Copenhagen it was given in Italian and Danish, and C. F. Cramer, the editor of the Musical Magazine, at Altona, had prepared a German version, with which it was given at Bonn, Mainz and Frankfort am Main. A letter of Cramer to Salieri is valuable for its clear annunciation of the duty of a translator, in preparing versions of texts to musical compositions.

"I venture to affirm," says he, "that it is less difficult for a poet—supposing him to have some creative talent—to compose three original operatic poems, than to translate one to an opera already set to music. There are airs in the Armida, which have cost me weeks; airs, which day and night, I have had to turn over in mind a thousand times, in order at last to find the right word, the suitable syllable, the proper vowel sound, which this or that passage of the melody demands. Still I do not flatter myself to have achieved a perfect success, which is all the more difficult, because of the various inflexions and repetitions of a music in the highest degree exact and characteristic in its expression, and from the character of my native language, which, though strong, expressive and better suited than yours to reflect the most difficult versifications and rhythms of the Greek, is still at times not agreeable to the ear, nay even rough, and in this regard stands far beneath the tongue of Hesperia, which Melody herself would seem to have created expressly for music."

In the preface to Kunzen's piano-forte arrangement of the Armida with the above named German text, Cramer says of Salieri:—

"Following in the footsteps of Gluck, the conqueror of hearts, he has like him turned away from the old conventional paths; treating with contempt the old useless ritornels and da capos, the sing-song of expressionless passages, the glitter of mere musical effects which only destroy the illusion of the scene: he has introduced more fitting proportions in his airs, a judicious shortening of the numerous choruses, not seldom more labor than is common in his recitative, the most imposing picturesqueness in his overtures, and great variety in his instrumentation; song and the dance are joined; everything is calculated for the general effect, and he has succeeded everywhere in expressing the passions of the text with such heart-felt, melting, soul-touching song, that the entire opera from beginning to end seems to be nothing but such a pezzo di prima intenzione, as it rejoices one to find even one or two examples of in the works of the better masters; while beyond that there is opportunity enough, in the rest of the airs, for the hearer to cool the fire kindled in his heart." Quite in-ceivable is it, adds Mosel, that a man, who could so appreciate this work and could so well translate the text, should introduce three airs of other composers (Leo, Hasse and Sacchini) instead of certain recitatives, which seemed to him too long—at which Salieri, justly, was very angry.

The Armida not only delighted the public everywhere where it was put upon the stage, but found no dissenting voice among the critics. Scheida, a learned musician and thoroughly grounded in the theory, a valued writer on the science, a man whom Sebastian Bach called doctor and teacher, heard it in Copenhagen and blessed the good fortune "which had caused him in his old age to hear an opera, that embodied his ideas of what an opera should be, since it banished all the conventional ornamentation, and depended for its success alone upon nature and the heart."

Soon after Salieri's return to Vienna, Pierre Louis Moline, Parliamentary Advocate in Paris, wrote him that his opera-text "La foire de Venise," a French version of Salieri's "Fiera di Venezia," had been read in the committee of the Royal Academy, and had greatly pleased; he therefore prayed the master to finish what remained to be done in the adaptation, as soon as possible, and this the more urgently because Maria Antoinette wished to have the "Comedie-Ballet," as Moline now called it in its new form, produced at Fontainebleau. A few months later Moline wrote to Gluck to have him hasten Salieri with his work, but it does not appear that the work was brought out in Paris. Almost simultaneously came a letter from Raoult Lieutaud informing him that the changes in his new text, "Mahomet II"; which the Committee of the Academy had demanded, had been made, that the work was accepted and he only awaited a hint from Salieri to send it at once to him for composition. True, nothing came of this, but these letters indicate the position which Les Danaïdes had given the composer at Paris.

When Lorenzo da Ponte came from Dresden to Vienna, in 1782 or '83,—the old fellow is very sparing of dates in his memoirs—he brought the following note of introduction.

"Friend Salieri:—My dearest friend! Da Ponte will bring you these few lines. Do everything for him that you would do for myself. His heart and his talents deserve it all, and besides this he is Pars animae, dimidiumque meae.

Thy Mazzolla."

"Salieri was at that time," says old Lorenzo (writing some forty years afterwards in New York) "a favorite of the Emperor, the most intimate friend of Mazzolla, very learned and accomplished, both as kapellmeister and as a man of high consideration among scholars. This billet, which I did not neglect to deliver immediately upon my arrival in Vienna, in process of time brought me the noblest fruits and was the original cause of the favor bestowed upon me by Joseph II." Omitting Da Ponte's account of his poverty for the months that followed, come we to his tale of Salieri's kindness to him.

"I happened to learn that the Emperor had determined again to establish an Italian opera in Vienna, and this recalled to mind the hints I had had from Mazzolla, and so the idea entered my head of becoming poet at the court of the Emperor. [Metastasio had died, April 12, 1782.] I had always cherished for this ruler a feeling of the truest reverence, as for one of whom numberless proofs of humanity, magnanimity, and goodness of heart were told. This feeling gave me courage and strengthened my hopes. I went to Salieri, who not only encouraged me to apply for the place, but also promised me to speak not only with the general director of the theatre, but with the Emperor himself on the subject. He knew so well how to move in the matter, that my first appearance before the Emperor, was not to petition, but to thank him for the appointment."

"Il ricco d'un giorno," the man rich for a day, was Da Ponte's first text written for Salieri, by whom the subject had been selected out of many which the young poet had proposed. When finished, however, it was so far from reaching his ideal, that he handed it to the composer too much humbled to speak a word. Salieri read it through immediately, and then said: "It is well written, but it must first be seen on the stage, before one can form a correct judgment upon it. It contains several very good airs and entire scenes which please me much; still you will have to undertake some small changes for me, more however on the ground of the musical effect than anything else."

"Wherein consisted these slight changes," says Da Ponte. "In the shortening or lengthening the greater part of the scenes; in [the introduction of new duets, terzets, quartets, &c.; in changing the metre of some half of the airs; in weaving in choruses, which had to be sung by Germans; in shortening all the recitatives, and consequently changing the entire plan, connection, and interest of the opera—if it had had any; the changes were in a word so great, that when the opera came upon the stage, not more than a hundred verses of my original remained. The music was finished and the work was to be soon performed, when Abbate Casti, an ecclesiastical poet, then celebrated through all Europe—not only for his other poems but for his "Galante Novellen," tales in verse of a character immoral almost to obscenity, appeared. At the same time came Paisiello, the composer, and the "Man rich for a day" was put aside for "King Theodore of Venice," text Casti, music Paisiello. This opera had an enormous success and soon found its way, in Italian or in German, all through central Europe—it was one of the favorite Bonn operas when Beethoven was a youth.

All this had happened in 1783, and Salieri, wisely giving King Theodore time to become an old story, laid his Rich Man aside and went off to Paris with his "Danaïdes," as before related. In the Autumn of 1784 the "Rich Man" was produced. It was unsuccessful, Mosel thinks undeservedly so—and Da Ponte gives a long and not uninteresting history of the reasons of its fall. Among them was the illness of Nancy Storace, the London songstress, who at that time was a favorite prima donna in Vienna, and whose part had to be sung by a person "who was just as fitted for it as a dove to take the rôle of an eagle." And what was worse, some Italians, who wished for the place to which Da Ponte had just been appointed, wrote a satire upon the libretto, and circulated it in the theatre on the evening of its production. Nothing saved the young poet but Joseph's liking for him, and justice in determining that he should have another trial. This second trial was the "Il Barbero di buon core," set to music by Martin, (the Spaniard, afterwards composer of "Una cosa rara") and the success was such that Joseph said to Da Ponte: "We have conquered!" And again, when Da Ponte called at the palace, the Emperor received him with "Bravo, Da Ponte, it pleases me, both music and text." "Sacred Majesty," replied the poet, "the Director of the theatre is quite of another opinion." "Neither the Director nor Casti is speaking now," returned Joseph, "but this is your triumph, you have made them weep. Go home, get up courage, and write us another opera with music by Martin. One must weld the iron while it is hot."

After the production of "Ercito e Democrito," operetta in 2 acts, of which I find no account, Salieri turned to Abbate Casti for a text, and received "La grotta di Trifonio," which he composed in 1785. "This music," says Salieri, "in a style unusual as the poem demands, gained remarkable applause and was the first opera buffa, which was engraved in score."

Mosel remarks: "This is all that the modest composer says of a work, which has its place not only among his very best, but among the very best of its class, and deserves the title of classic; it is but right to add that none could remember any opera up to that time, which had been received with such tumultuous, universal and lasting applause as this, and that all lovers of dramatic music still (1826) remember with delight the enjoyment it then afforded them. The most judicious and flowing melodies, invariably suited in perfection to the text and character represented; an expressive and graceful accompaniment, in which the wind instruments are more frequently (but not too often) and elegantly introduced than in any of his previous operas; and that talent, already noted in several of these works, for making his music really dramatic, through its vivid support, often indeed its actual indication, of the proper action, placed this work in the high position of a lasting model of high-comic, scenic music."

The date of the first performance of this work, which soon found its way in the Italian or in German translation, into all the principal theatres of Germany, was May 12, 1785. On the 7th of February, 1786, Joseph gave an entertainment to Catherine II. of Russia, and her son Paul, at Schönbrunn, at which two short occasional pieces, one in German, "Der Schauspieldirektor" (the Theatrical Manager) by Stephanie the younger, and "Prima la Musica, poi le parole," (first the music then the text) by Abbate Casti, were performed. In the composition of the music, Mozart and Salieri were pitted against each other. Neither, however, produced anything of great value. Mozart's music is, however, with another text, still given in Germany; Salieri's long since was forgotten. The performances of the festivity were repeated (Salieri's operetta in German translation?) in the Kärnthnertheater, on Feb. 11, 18, and 25th, and then both were laid aside until 1791, when Goethe caused Cimarosa's "L'impresario in angoscia" to be prepared for performance at Weimar, and in this the entire music of Mozart's "Manager" was incorporated! This was given Oct. 24, 1791, and thence made its way to other theatres. Recently Mozart's music has been taken again, pure and simple, and, a few of his own compositions being added, a score extensive enough has been created to fit a new text in which Schickaneder and Mozart himself are made to appear—Mozart abominably caricatured! But this is foreign to Salieri's life.

(To be Continued.)

Fashion versus Music.

No art is more completely subject to the despotism of fashion than music. From the fact of its being so extensively cultivated, an immense facility is given for the popularizing of anything which happens to be "the rage." Passing over those who sincerely love the art for its own sake, and have intuitively the power of recognizing and appreciating the beautiful in music, we approach another very numerous section of the community—a section which, more or less, regard music as a vehicle for show, or for creating effects according to the custom, and in deference to the demands, of modern society. To play brilliantly is accounted "the thing;" and perhaps it is from this cause we so seldom hear in society the slightest expression, but so often are compelled to listen to the most painful attempts at display. The majority of drawing-room efforts on the pianoforte convey the idea that the executant's innate feeling for the art is very limited; that the use of music as a means of expressing sympathy and tenderness is unknown,—and that perfection in the art has much more to do with the fingers than the feelings. Display is the watchword; and with a young lady who has had the usual school routine of practice, and the usual so-called finishing lessons, a certain amount of executive facility is often looked upon by the fond parents as so much capital to help the dear child to a good settlement. Deeper than this, in search of pure love for the art which proceeds only from nature, ordaining music to be a means of expressing feeling—we must not go in modern society. Real, pure, and humbly devout worship at the European shrine is seldom found beyond the pale of artist coteries, or those charmed domestic circles, in which a homely spirit exists with an utter contempt for all the false polish of society. The class of pianoforte compositions described by the word "brilliant," which has surely attained its lowest form in the present day, has done more to vitiate real taste than anything else. It is next to impossible that a devotee of the brilliant persuasion, even though he have originally possessed musical taste, can retain it by being constantly familiarized with works of the brilliant class. Naturally enough, in the crowded state of professions, all demands are met with a most bountiful supply. This is a universal dispensation, and so composers or arrangers are found in plenty, who gain popularity and a very excellent living by answering the general requirement for things "brilliant but not difficult." We must not speculate whether a representative of this school has a genuine respect for the art; and we must consider that the sun shines but a certain time on ephemeral manias, in music as well as in everything else. Truth is imperishable; and popular caprice, though it may take a degraded form, will shake off the fetters of bad taste and breathe again, sooner or later. In place of dignifying such and such a person as a composer, we are often bound by the simplest obligation of doing justice to more unknown talent, to speak of a highly popular musician as one possessing only a knack of arranging, which faculty answers the purposes of himself, his publisher, and his pupils or admirers, to a remarkable degree.

Take a certain number of works from the most prolific and best arrangers, and what is to be found but the most abject poverty of invention; a dull, dreary routine of arpeggio passages; modulations on one model; endless reproductions of very weak points; with a commonplace and vulgar treatment of the unfortunate themes dressed up for the expectant public? Young ladies find everything necessary in these effusions. They abound in showy passages of no originality whatever; but they possess the infinite charm of being easy to play; and, above all, furnish opportunity for making an impression with a very little trouble. One thing must certainly be said. If popular arrangers can do better they do not dare. If they do, they must bid farewell to the "brilliant but not difficult" notoriety which their works have secured. Beyond this, they must relinquish the pecuniary benefits of their position; and human nature is not yet resolute enough to reject competence for the sake of a clear conscience in matters of art, the exercise of which may entail comparative poverty. Any man who slides into the groove of commonplace, and, by so doing, secures popularity with the public, and orders from the publishers, cannot return to, or adopt, a better style. If he has any spontaneous originality, he must conceal it; or, at least, hamper the thoughts with the restrictions of his admirers. He works with the phantom of brilliancy always before him; and the moment his ideas are becoming unwontedly free, the contingency attached to "the brilliant but not difficult" forces him back to the track of conventional mediocrity.

A good living is the end and aim of those who are obliged to earn a living at all, and a man mostly thinks, "Will this pay?" before it strikes him. "Is this likely to proclaim me a conscientious artist?" The pianoforte arrangements which attain widely-spread celebrity, are often uncommonly like the tin cups a prestidigitator will go on producing ad infinitum. He who accepts the position of a popular arranger has, at least, three circumstances upon which to congratulate himself, namely, material prosperity,—the envy of his fellows, and the admiration of a large section of the public. Against these advantages there is to be taken into account the probable contempt of the few whose deficiencies. However, until radical changes take place in human nature, the force of that wise saw, "Let those laugh who lose, they're sure to laugh who win," must be acknowledged in this particular as in all others; and most men prefer admiration from the unqualified many, to commendation from a minority whose good opinion leads but to little pecuniary result.—Orchestra.

Dr. Schneider.

Instrumental music has sustained a heavy loss in the death of the greatest German organ-player, which took place at Dresden on the 13th of April. Dr. Johann Gottlob Schneider, the son of a school-master, was born on the 28th of October, 1789, at Altgersdorf, near Zittau, in the Oberlausitz, a district of Saxony. His first instructor in music was his father. In 1801 he entered the Zittau gymnasium to prepare himself for the University. He studied in Leipzig, but kept up his music also, to which he soon devoted himself entirely, and succeeded his brother Friedrich Schneider (composer of "The Last Judgment") as organist of the University Church. In 1812 he removed to Görlitz, and there founded a large singing school. He had already become celebrated as a great organ-player. In 1825, he was invited to play the organ at a musical festival in Magdeburg, where his brother's Oratorio, "Paradise Lost," was to be produced. On his way thither he passed through Dresden, where, as it happened, the situation of organist at the Protestant Court Church of St. Sophia was vacant.—After playing there only once, he was elected in preference to thirty other candidates. On the 21st of August, 1861, he celebrated his organ-jubilee,—in honour of which an endowment was given to the Saxon Pestalozzi-Verein, to be called the Johann Schneider Stiftung, the interest to be applied to the education of sons of poor school-masters, preference being given to those who desire to devote themselves to music, especially to the organ. Thus much from foreign sources. A more consummate artist never commanded instrument than Schneider, and his was the king of instruments. His rendering of the music of Sebastian Bach was a revelation. Whereas the generality of organists struggle, he played with it. His instrument in the Sophien Kirche, a Silbermann organ, though sweet in tone, is limited in its scale as compared with the Leviathans to be found elsewhere, and of course has not the appliances for lightening the performer's toil which we owe to modern science; but Schneider's hands on it were as light and dextrous in all the instantaneous changes of stop and register necessary to work up a climax, as those of a harpsichord-player. As much might be said of his feet on the pedal board, which nothing puzzled, nothing distanced. The admirable quietness of his behaviour added to the effect of calm grandeur he produced on all those who watched as well as listened. And many were the tourists who went up to his loft at early morning service, in the hope of luring him, after the rite was over, to unlock the drawer where his treasury of old brown music-books lay, and to indulge them with some fugue or varied corale, or other noble work by the great Leipzig Cantor. In improvisation he was ingenuous and learned, with less fire in his fancies than Mendelssohn (who looked up to him as an organ oracle), but possessing a solidity of resource and power that rendered his improvisation displays of the highest interest. As a man, Schneider was punctual, honorable, genial and obliging in no common degree; one of the few great professors left, with whom Art was the first and money the second consideration. He lived rich in the esteem of the worthiest of his countrymen, and died honored and beloved.—Athenæum, April 23.

Caroline Bettelheim.

Fraulein Caroline Bettelheim, Prima-Donna at the Imperial Theatre, Vienna, now recognized as one of the first contralto singers in all Germany, was born in Pesh, on the 1st of June, 1845, and educated in Vienna as a pianist. On the pianoforte she attained, under the direction of the well-known professor Carl Goldmark, such proficiency, that, at one of his concerts in the year 1861, she created a perfect furor. At the same time she made great progress in singing, and obtained, in the same year, an engagement at the Imperial Theatre, Vienna, where she is now accepted as one of the most accomplished artists of the day. In a short time she not only became a great favorite with the public, but was sought for in the highest circles of the aristocracy, and invited to all the concerts at court. In fact there was no concert, no oratorio, without Fraulein Bettelheim. Her success was so immense, that invitations one after the other followed from all parts of the country. In the beginning of December, 1863, she went to Leipzig and Bremen as singer and pianist, and created such excitement, that the critic, quite puzzled, hardly knew whether her vocal or instrumental performance was to be preferred. Fraulein Bettelheim is not only largely indebted to nature, but has received a first-rate education. Her singing is noble and full of expression, and her acting lively and animated. Her voice is a powerful and pleasing contralto of great compass, comprising nearly three octaves, from the deep D to the high C. Her appearance is extremely prepossessing. She has a very intelligent physiognomy, large black eyes full of fire, and a most graceful figure. Fraulein Bettelheim has a great future before her, not only on the stage, where she appears in the parts of Azucena, Maffio Orsini, Nancy, Gonty, Pierotto, Bertha von Simiane, Fr. Reich, Maddelena, etc.—but also in the concert-room, sacred and secular. Her beautiful, deep and sonorous voice exercises great power over the mind and heart of every hearer. As a sign of Middle Bettelheim's uncommon talent it may be mentioned, that although she had never put a foot on the stage before, she was entrusted, after scarcely a twelvemonth's engagement, with the whole of the principal contralto repertory.—Vienna Presse.

Music in Leipzig.

The last week of our musical season have offered comparatively little novelty. The most important production in the Gewandhaus has been Herr Joachim's instrumentation of Schubert's Pianoforte Duett, Op. 140 which is thus transformed into a splendid symphony. Hearing it in this form, it is difficult to imagine that it could ever have been only a pianoforte piece, so symphonic is it in its cast.—Herr Joachim's work is not only mastery in itself, but is also most remarkable for the way in which he seems to have adopted Schubert's nature. The symphony was first performed in Leipzig about seven years ago; it is to be hoped that so long an interval will not be allowed to elapse before it is heard again. It is much to be regretted that the want of energy of a Viennese publisher, in whose portfolio the score has, it is said, been reposing for some years, makes it difficult to become more widely acquainted with this interesting work. A Notturmo, by Spohr, for wind instruments, and Janitscharenmusik, Op. 34, has been revived. It is a work worthy of an occasional hearing, but, to do it justice, it requires a locality where brazen tones can be more modified than is the case in the Gewandhaus Saal, the acoustic virtues of which are sometimes too good; and it must be confessed that the wind instruments (especially the brass) are not the strong points of the Gewandhaus orchestra. Handel's 'Ode for St. Cecilia's Day' has been performed "for the first time." As is generally the case with choral works, especially with Handel's,—the performance was unsatisfactory. The Minuet was cut out of the overture. Such curtailment seems to be the rule in Germany, the graceful Minuet in the overture to 'Samson' being also omitted when that oratorio is performed here. The singers were Frau von Milde, of Weimar, and Herr Schild, of Solothurn; pleasant as it is to listen to them in other parts which suit them better, neither had sufficient voice or energy for the Ode; the great unaccompanied passages in the last chorus fell very flat; the 'Organ Air,' instead of being the climax in the triumph of music, was made utterly ridiculous by the asthmatic snorts of a miserable harmonium, which was substituted for the king of instruments. No new soloist has been heard in the Gewandhaus since my last report; but I cannot pass over the reappearance of Herr Joachim, who showed that, great as he was when we last heard him, there was a something still greater to which he has attained; his reception was a literal triumph. In closing my report of the Gewandhaus Concerts for the late season, I am glad to be able to say that the performances have shown a marked improvement this winter. The commander and his forces seem to understand one another better than they did.

In the Euterpe, Liszt's 'Faust' Symphony has been repeated. I cannot say that a second hearing has revealed new beauties; on the contrary, I found it even more ungenial and repulsive than at the first hearing. The Euterpe has introduced to us a young pianist, Fraulein Alidee Topp, of Stralsund, who promises well; she has already acquired great certainty and brilliancy of execution, and has a good style; it was a pity that she chose so thankless a piece as Liszt's Concerto in E flat.

In the Chamber Music Concerts of the Gewandhaus, a Sonata for Pianoforte and Violoncello (Op. 42), by Herr Reinecke, was new to me. Although not one of its composer's greater works, there is a gracefulness and sterling merit in it which make it deserve to be better known.

Herr Kiedel's Choral Society gave an interesting concert on the Bussag. A 'De Profundis,' by Clari, is a good specimen of the Bolognese school. Sebastian Bach's 'Magnificat' is one of those works which no ordinary ears can comprehend at one hearing. It is written for solo voices, a five-part chorus, and an orchestra comprising the string quartett, two oboes, two flutes, three trumpets, drums and organ. The complication is increased by the strings, the wood wind instruments, and the trumpets and drums, forming three almost independent groups. As in almost Bach's works, the greatest immediate effect is made by the choruses. The second verse is very remarkable; the words "Quia respexit humilitatem ancillae suae; ecce enim ex hoc beatam me dicent" being given to the soprano solo, with only an oboe and organ accompaniment, and conveying an expression almost of fear and melancholy in the last words, "omnes generationes;" the chorus and orchestra break in with a Titanic grandeur, and with such a lavish display of contrapuntal and harmonic contrivances as only Bach has at his command. In the 12th verse ("Suscepit Israel," &c.), the ancient traditional melody of the 'Magnificat,' dating, it is said from the seventh century, is given as a cantus firmus to the oboes; three female voices sing the words, weaving the most elaborate contrapuntal accompaniments round that venerable chant. It must be confessed that the inexorable progressions of the voices sometimes bring them into harsh collisions. The 'Gloria Patri' is another chorus, full of grand thoughts. A strange contrast to the wonderful strictness of Bach's work, in which nothing is sacrificed to prettiness, is Herr von Bronsart's composition of Platen's 'Christnacht,' a poor sickly poem, which has already been treated by Hiller and Gade. In one respect the work is an advance upon Herr von Bronsart's Symphony, of painful memory, for it shows that he can sometimes write melodious themes; but the style is utterly unsuited to so solemn a theme as the Angels' appearance to the shepherds; far more closely allied is it to the lascivious stage-atmosphere of Wagner's Frau Venus and her nymphs. Indeed, both in its few prettinesses and in its much harshness and unquiet, the whole work is closely related to Wagner's compositions; but the latter, unhealthy and positively ugly as they are in great proportion, are yet the work of a man of genius, and the aberrations of such a one will ever be preferable to those of a man of none. A Sanctus, for double chorus, by C. P. Emmanuel Bach is interesting, although cast in a mould of much less grandeur than his father was wont to use.—Corr. Athenæum, April 30.

Music Abroad.

The Musical Season in London

II. THE MUSICAL SOCIETIES.

We have already seen what was going on at the two opera houses, down to the middle of May. Leaving them for the present, let us look at some of the bewildering multitude of London Concerts.

ORATORIOS. Since the beginning of March, the SACRED HARMONIO SOCIETY have prepared Judas Maccabæus (principal singers, Mme. Rudersdorff, Miss Banks, Miss Elton, Messrs. Sims Reeves, Cummings, and Santley,—Costa conducting); the Messiah in Passion Week (Mme. Rudersdorff, Mme. Sinton-Dolby, Messrs. Weiss, Patey and Reeves); St. Paul (Mme. Parepa, Dolby, Messrs. Cummings and Weiss); Elijah (Mme. Rudersdorff, Sinton-Dolby, Mrs. Lucas, Miss Elton, Messrs. Carter, Henry, Reeves, and Weiss.—Organist, Mr. Brown-smith); Israel in Egypt, (Mmes. Parepa, Banks, Sinton-Dolby, Messrs. Reeves, Weiss and Santley); and, closing the season, May 27th, Samson, with Mme. Lemmens-Sherrington, Mme. Sinton-Dolby, Messrs. Reeves, Santley, and Patey.) Reeves, of course "was truly magnificent—matchless singing and matchless style." But what has become of the fine contralto, Miss Palmer?

"THE HULLAH" CHORAL SOCIETY performed the Creation last month, with Mlle. Florence Lancia, Mr. Patey and Mr. Evans in the principal parts.

There has been one new Oratorio brought out this season, by the NATIONAL CHORAL SOCIETY, conducted by Mr. G. W. Martin. It is called "Ahab," and was composed by George B. Arnold, Mus. Doc. New College, Oxford. The words are entirely from the Bible. The work had been published beforehand and studied by the critics. The Athenæum (April 16) dismisses it "as a work of some promise." The Orchestra (April 9) says:

From a deliberate rejection of all fixed style, one would expect either the unique work of a great original genius, or the unsuccessful attempt of one unequal to the task he had undertaken; from a deliberate mixture of various prestyles, one would expect, as the almost inevitable consequence, a medley on which the ear of no musician could rest with satisfaction. Such, we think, is the result found in "Ahab." The ear is called upon to fly almost instantaneously over as long spaces of tone as between Handel and Mendelssohn; to make rapid journeys between countries as distant as Germany and England; if it is pleased with one form of music for half-a-dozen bars, it has to put up with another form for the half-a-dozen ensuing.

Apart from this question of form, there is a fault running through the whole of the work which is generally limited to the compositions of amateurs, and which one does not expect to find in the writings of so clever a musician as Doctor Arnold evidently shows himself to be. Doctor Arnold has, in fact, a singular taste for batos. He conceives many happy ideas and pleasing phrases of melody, and then more often than not abruptly terminates them by introducing somewhat feeble and unmeaning, and unworthy of a sound musical judgment.

Turning from this general view of the music to the smaller details, where a less high standard can be taken, we find, as might be expected, much more to admire and much less to offend us. For instance, Dr. Arnold has a great facility for sagual writing, all the passages of this sort in his oratorio being effective, and most of them remarkably clever. His final chorus is a very well worked eight-part double fugue. The exposition of the leading subject, which begins with the ascending octave, is given to one of two choirs, and the exposition of the countersubject, which is less interesting, to the other; the two subjects are worked well, and lead up to a close stretto in all the parts on the first subject. The effect of this chorus is very fine. The recitatives are fresh and pleasing, except where marked by the singular use of anti-climax before mentioned. The air, it must be confessed, are a failure, and are only good where they assume the form of accompanied recitatives. We may except a soprano solo No. 24, where Jezabel incites Ahab to war, as containing a spirited subject and a consistent treatment of it. The remainder of the airs, duets, &c., are, if not absolutely weak and meaningless, at any rate badly put together, and wanting in the great feature of an oratorio solo movement—a prominent and melodious subject. This want is not in our opinion atoned for by any other excellence, so that they fall dead on the ear as being neither connected nor melodious.

The choruses, where scientific, are, as has been said before, good; where they are intended to be dramatic they by comparison fail. However, they are infinitely superior to the solo pieces. Two chorales without accompaniment, Nos. 33 and 35, are really beautiful. It is a pity that the setting which surrounds them on either side is not better. We are sorry to have to express our disapproval of this work, both generally and in detail, since it is evidently the writing of a clever musician. It is impossible, however, to praise that which violates so many of our ideas of what is good and consistent. Of the performance on Wednesday the less we say the better. England has to thank Mr. Martin for bringing out a new oratorio by a native composer; but, beyond this, neither country nor author owe much to the executors at Exeter Hall.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY. The old Symphony society, still under the baton of Prof. Wm. Sterndale Bennett, began its 52nd season, at the Hanover Square rooms, on the 29th of February, which happened to be the anniversary of Rossini's birth. Accordingly his music figured largely in the programme: overtures to Semiramide and "Siege of Corinth," arias and duets from Zelmira, Gazza Ladra, Tell, &c.; besides which a MS. Symphony by Cherubini (written for the Philharmonic and never played but once before), Mozart's piano Concerto in D minor, played by Arabella Goddard, and Beethoven's second Symphony.—The 2nd concert (March 14) had for Symphonies, Mozart in D, No. 4, and Beethoven in F, No. 8; Concerto for piano, No. 1, in D minor by Sterndale Bennett, (pianist Mr. Harold Thomas); De Beriot's Violin Concerto in B minor, played by Vieuxtemps; overture to Fernand Cortez, by Sponcini; and part songs by the Orpheus Glee Union.

The third concert (April 18) was made tributary to the grand flood of Shakespeare Tercentenary celebration. With the exception of Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, most of the music was in some way suggestive of, or suggested by Shakespeare's works; as the "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, selections from Nicolai's Falstaff, songs and duets by English composers, &c.—Of the 4th concert (May 2) the Musical World says:

The directors of these classical entertainments have been rummaging their library-shelves of late to excellent purpose. The revival of Cherubini's symphony—written expressly for the Philharmonic Society—was a boon to subscribers; and on Monday, at the fourth concert, another most interesting work was brought to light, in the shape of a symphony by the dramatic composer, Méhul. One of the shining lights of the French school, an ardent emulator of Gluck, a contemporary and a rival of Cherubini, Méhul—standing midway between Grétry and Boieldieu, had more real genius, and far more earnest ambition than either. He was, besides, a prolific producer, and looked at his art from that serious point of view which is inseparable from true distinction. We are aware that the symphony in G minor—the last of six in the composition of which Méhul artistically employed his leisure hours—had already been presented at the Crystal Palace Concerts; but we should like to know what has escaped the eclectic scrutiny of Herr Auguste Manns! With an orchestra on a large scale, like that so well and zealously conducted by Professor Sterndale Bennett, and in a "locale" so admirably adapted for sound as the Hanover Square Rooms, the symphony of Méhul had a better chance of being appreciated, and created a proportionately more sensible impression. A work of unequal merit, it is, nevertheless, one which shows a high aspiration, contains many genuine beauties, and proclaims indisputably the hand of a master.

There was only one overture; but that was an overture which every musician in the room must have been glad to welcome, after its many years of silence. Mr. Cipriani Potter—late principal of the Royal Academy of Music, where some of our most eminent composers and professors enjoyed the advantage of his counsels and instructions—wrote an overture to Shakespeare's Cymbeline about a quarter of a century ago. It was played, if we are not mistaken, at one of his own benefit concerts at a time when a benefit concert without an orchestra was reckoned of little or no account. A work of fancy and ingenious construction, it was admired and applauded then just as it was admired and applauded on the present occasion; and the renewed appreciation it has met with would warrant the revival of a certain overture to Antony and Cleopatra, from the same industrious pen.

The other selections were Beethoven's C minor Symphony; Mendelssohn's D minor Concerto, pianist Mr. W. G. Cousins; Spohr's "Dramatic Concerto" (Scena Cantante) for violin, played by Herr Lauterbach, Concert-meister to the King of Saxony, who made the impression of a master; Beethoven's Egmont march; and vocal solos from Mozart's Idomeneo, Meyerbeer's Dinorah, Handel's Rinaldo and Paer's Agnes, by Mme. Sherrington and Mr. Weiss.—In the 5th concert the orchestra played a Symphony in G by Haydn and Mendelssohn's in A (Italian), Beethoven's Leonora overture (No. 3), and Auher's Great Exhibition March; Mme. Arabella Goddard played Weber's Concerti-Stück and a Prelude and Fugue alla Tarantella by Bach; and the vocal diversissements were by Mlle. Bettelheim and Herr Mayerhofer, who sang from Mozart, Donizetti and Rossini.

The 6th concert (May 30) was remarkable on several accounts. First, as bringing together a Symphony of Schumann's (No. 6, in C) and that of Beethoven in A, which gives the Musical World occasion to prove that Schumann is no Beethoven, and to pooh-pooh at Schumann generally, after the usual London fashion; for example:

When it is allowed that Schumann was a thoughtful, earnest man, ever striving to soar upward, but lacking strength of wing, the plain truth has been told; and as much might he said of a good many other thoughtful, earnest, upward-striving Teutons. The symphony in C is a capital specimen of what Schumann could and what he could not effect. It is seldom wholly uninteresting, but it is rarely pure, more rarely bright, at no time convincing. Perpetually aiming at some mark which it as perpetually fails to hit, it represents a series of reverses to the composer and of disappointments to the hearer.

This concert was also distinguished by the return of the great violinist Joachim, of whom the London critics are always saying: "he outdid himself;" this time in Beethoven's Concerto in D, including a couple of "masterly" cadenzas by himself. It was this same Concerto which won him his first laurels in England, when, as a mere boy, in 1844, he played it at the Philharmonic. Joachim also played an Andante by Spohr and a Prelude by Bach. Bennett's "Fantasia Overture," Paradise and the Peri, composed for the Philharmonic Jubilee in 1862, was played, and takes rank among the best works of England's first musician. The song pieces were by Miss Fanny Armytage—Sig. Schira's cleverest pupil in the Royal Academy—who made a successful debut in the scene from Der Freyschütz; Herr Gunz, first tenor from the opera at Hanover, who created a sensation in an air from La Dame Blanche; and Sig. Delle Sedie, the baritone, who sung from Un Ballo and L'Elisir d'Amore. Beethoven's "Turkish March" ended the concert.

So much for the old Philharmonic, to the end of May: now let us glance at its younger rival, the

NEW PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY. This is now in its thirteenth season, and is still, as from the first, under the direction of Prof. Wyld, Mus. Doc. Its locality is St. James's Hall. Like the New York Philharmonic, its present season consists of five concerts and five public rehearsals. The first programme (April 13) contained: Faust overture, by Spohr; air from Mozart's Così fan tutte, by Sig. Naudin, tenor; Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, by Sivori; Recit. and song, "Sweet Bird," from Handel's L'Allegro, sung by Mme. Lemmens Sherrington; Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony. Part II. Overture, Semiramide; Aria, "Slumber Song" in Mosca-riello, Sig. Naudin; Violin Concerto by Paganini; Air and variations from Le Serment, Mme. Sherrington; Overture, Abou Hassan, Weber.

The 2nd concert, April 27, offered Schubert's Symphony in C; three overtures: Der Alchymist, by Spohr, Tell, Rossini, and Ruy Blas, Mendelssohn; Beethoven's piano concerto in G, played by Mr. G. Burnett, a young and rising pianist of the Leipzig school; airs from Don Giovanni, Lucrezia Borgia, &c., by Mlle. Fricci and Sig. Neri-Baraldi.—The 3d concert began with the overture to Struensee, as a mark of respect to the memory of Meyerbeer. Two Concertos were played; one for violin (Viotti) by the young Bohemian, Isidor Lotto; the other for piano, by Molique, and executed by the composer's daughter, Miss Anna Molique, who seems "destined to take rank among piano players of the highest class." The "Pastoral Symphony," Nicolai's overture to the "Merry Wives," and vocal solos and duet from Freyshütz, Cenerentola, Oberon and Matrimonio Segreto, by Mlle. Laguna and Dentinn, and Sig. Ronconi and Ciampi, made out the rest of the bill.

The 4th concert gave Mendelssohn's Scotch Symphony, Spohr's Concert Overture "Im ernsten Styl," the Oberon overture, and Meyerbeer's Struensee polonaise, for orchestral pieces. But the extraordinary attractions, which crowded the hall to suffocation, were the soloists, to-wit: Alfred Jaell, as pianist, who played Beethoven's C minor Concerto; and for vocalists, Mlle. Carlotta Patti, who sang "Ah non credea," and the German tenor, Herr Wachtel, who sang from the Zauberflöte and Troentore. Mme. Didié, too, sang a couple of Rossini pieces, from L'Italiana and Il Barbiere. Of Herr Wachtel, we may append here what the Athenæum says of him after his first appearances this season at the Royal Italian Opera. First, in "the tawdry Troentore:"

The event of the evening, however, was the re-appearance of Herr Wachtel; and this—though upborne and encouraged, by so much enthusiasm as to make some of us ask, with André, "Is it a true thing?"—was a real event. Certainly, few tenors have ever possessed "the ninety-nine requisites" in fuller perfection than this young German voice;—we cannot, as yet, call Herr Wachtel "an artist." A more glorious organ we have never heard; it is clear, too, of that throaty tone which habitually spoils our pleasure in the tenors of this country, and which call on us "to forgive and forget" even in the case of men so renowned as Herren Wille, Hainzinger, Tichatschek, and (the other day) Ander. Herr Wachtel has much to learn in the way of polish, style, and especially foreign pronunciation. Not all the naturally excellent qualities which Herr Formes possessed could reconcile us to the wonderful words and vowels he sang, whenever he fancied himself Italian or (even worse) English. But Herr Wachtel is young, obviously energetic in no common degree, without being objectionably bombastic, and, with such superb natural gifts as he possesses, should be satisfied with nothing short of perfect accomplishment.

Then again in William Tell:

Such a voice has not been heard in the part of Arnoldo as Herr Wachtel's, but if it have the strength of a giant's, it is used (to adopt the known quotation) somewhat tyrannically. He riots in his immense and resonant upper chest-notes, flinging out the c in alt, which M. Duprez and Signor Tamberlik were used to reserve for great occasions, again and again, as prodigally as if it was the common work-a-day c, which used to be the limit of an average English tenor's voice, and this is a time when the diapason was lower than now. Neither Braham nor Mr. Sims Reeves got, or gets, beyond A; and the latter has to make his point in "Sound an alarm" and in the "War Song," of Signor Costa's 'Eli,' by artful preparation and management. Herr Wachtel will do wisely, not merely for the future, but for the present, to husband his resources of astonishment. Though for the moment "the many rend the skies" on each reiterated manifestation of his amazing power, the few who recollect how much reserve, as distinguished from rant, counts, must feel that some of the fatigue of over-familiarity already mingles with their wonder. This impression may spread until those who are "nothing if not excited" may come to demand of Herr Wachtel what he cannot give them, even should Signor Verdi be lured to write for him an opera in which the lover's part is expressly laid out for a tenor trombone. These hints are offered in good will to one who in many essential respects deserves to be rated highly. Doctors disagree respecting voices, as about every other commodity of nature and art; and this superb organ of Herr Wachtel's has been disparaged as "hard" by those unable to deny its penetrating qualities. We are disposed to credit it with an amount of tunefulness and geniality unexampled in any German tenor voice we have ever heard.

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS. This excellent institution is still flourishing, concerts being given nearly every Monday evening, at St. James's Hall, at moderate prices, whereby a great variety of the best classical compositions, in the form of Sonata, Trio, Quartet of strings, &c., together with choice vocal selections, are made accessible to all musical people in London throughout a large part of the year. These works are rendered by the most distinguished artists, Mr. Benedict acting as conductor and accompanist. The concerts have been established barely five years, and we have now before us the programme of the 154th concert, for June 6, in which we have the names of two of the greatest violinists in all Europe, Joachim and Wieniawski; the best of classical cellists, Piatti—Ries and Webb completing the quartet—the great pianist Hallé, and others. The Quartets, opening each part, are by Haydn and by Ernst, the latter (a MS. work in A) led by Joachim, the former by Wieniawski. Joachim was to play also the "Elegy" by Ernst; Wieniawski, a solo on Schubert's "Erl-King" by Ernst; Piatti, an Andante by Romberg, and (with Hallé) "Pensées fugitives" by Ernst; Hallé, piano solos by Heller and Ernst; Reeves was to sing Beethoven's Liederkreis and "The Fisher" by Ernst, —for indeed it seems to have been a festival in honor of poor Ernst, long time a helpless invalid. Besides all this, Mme. Dustmann was to sing Mozart's Non mi dir, and Mme. Leschetizky songs by Gounod, Schubert and Schumann.

The preceding ten programmes offer many points of interest. As the aim is to familiarize the public with the chamber compositions of the greatest masters, of course the old familiar names occur the oftenest. Thus of BACH, we find the Suite in E minor (French set), and Partita in G, No. 5, played by Hallé; a Prelude and Fugue for violin, by Joachim; and the Chaconne, by Wieniawski. Of HAYDN: Trio in G; a quartet, led by Sivioli; another in F, led by Joachim. MOZART: Divertimento in B flat, for 2 violins, viola, 2 horns and cello, led by Vieuxtemps; Quartet in D minor (Sivioli); Do in G and in D, (Wieniawski). BEETHOVEN: Piano Sonatas, in G, op. 14, and "Les Adieux," and op. 111, all by Hallé; in G, op. 29 in E flat. (Mme. Goddard); with violin, the "Kreutzer" (Goddard and Vieuxtemps), in A minor, op. 23, (Hallé and Sivioli), in G, op. 30, (Goddard and Sivioli), in C minor (Hallé and Wieniawski); Trio in E flat op. 1, (Hallé, Vieuxtemps and Paque); Quartets, in C, op. 59 (led once by Vieuxtemps, and once by Joachim), in G, op. 18 (Vieuxtemps). MENDELSSOHN: Octet led by Vieuxtemps; Quintet in A, No. 1 (Do); Quartet in B minor, piano and strings (Goddard, Sivioli, &c.); Quartet in D, op. 44 (Wieniawski, Piatti, &c.); Trio in C minor (Goddard, Vieuxtemps, &c.); Sonata, piano and cello (Goddard and Piatti). CHOPIN: Scherzo in B minor, and Waltz in A flat, played by Alfred Jaell. SCHUMANN: Quintet in E flat (Jaell, Wieniawski, &c.) Mendelssohn alone of the writers after Beethoven appears to occupy much space here; Schubert figures not once in instrumental music; but his songs occur often.

CHARLES HALLÉ'S PIANO-FORTE RECITALS are among the notable and choice things of a London musical summer. For two or three years they were devoted exclusively to Beethoven's Sonatas, playing the whole 32 of them through in course. This time he interprets a variety of authors, himself the sole performer. This was the fourth programme, May 27th.

Part I—Sonata, in E flat, Op. 17, No. 1 (first time) Haydn. "Harpisichord Lessons" in G, D, and A major (repeated by desire)—Scarlatti. Variations and Finale Alla Fuga, in E flat, Op. 25 (first time)—Beethoven. Part II—Grand Sonata, in A minor, Op. 42—Schubert. "Kinderesenen," Op. 18—Schumann. Prelude and Fugue in E minor, Op. 35, No. 1—Mendelssohn. Studies, Op. 9, No. 14, in E flat minor, and No. 16, in D flat. "La Chasse" study in E flat (first time)—Heller.

Mr. Hallé's three previous recitals were as follows. From Beethoven: Sonata in D, op. 10; Fantasia in B, op. 77; Thirty-two variations on original air in C minor, op. 36; Sonata, in G, op. 29. From Bach: Partita in G; Suite Anglaise, in G minor. From Weber: Sonata in D minor, op. 49; Momento Capriccioso, B flat, op. 12. Mendelssohn: Prelude and Fugue in F minor, op. 35; Caprice in F sharp minor, op. 5. Chopin: Etudes in C sharp minor, A flat and F minor, op. 25; Nocturne in D flat, op. 27; Tarantella, in A flat; Polonaise in A flat, op. 53. Heller: Tarantella, A flat, op. 85; "Nuits Blanches," op. 82, Nos. 15 and 18; "Wanderstunden," op. 80, Nos. 3, 4 and 6. Mozart: Sonata in F. Scarlatti: Harpisichord Lessons in G, D and A. Schubert: Sonata in D, op. 53. Clementi: Sonata in D. Henselt: Cradle Song in G flat.—Nearly all these pieces were presented for the first time.

MUSICAL UNION. This Society has a mysterious number of god-fathers and subscribers, but, according to common talk among musicians in London, "l'Union c'est Ella," Mr. Ella, the Secretary, is the all in all: corresponds with all the artists in Europe; engages many of them; has others offering their services: prophecies of rising genius, and accompanies the Matinées, at St. James's Hall, each season with "Analytical Programmes" of the most unique description; one of them, for instance, closes with the following interesting intelligence: "The President and two members of the Committee prefer their seats in the balcony, which is decidedly the best situation to hear concerted music." The first Matinée this season took place April 5th, at St. James's Hall. Programme: Quartet in F, No. 82, Haydn; Sonata, D minor, Weber; Spohr's Nonetto, and three Etudes of Chopin. Charles Hallé was the pianist, and the Nonetto was played by Sainton (first violin), Ries, Webb, Pratten, &c. Execution "above criticism," attendance fashionable.—The second programme (May 3) offered: Quartet, No. 1, Beethoven; Adagio and Etude in double notes (MS.), violoncello solo, by M. Jacquard; Andante and variations for two pianos, op. 46, Schumann, played by Mlle. Zimmermann and Herr Pauer; Prume's Melancolie, violin solo by Sivioli; Beethoven's Quintet in E flat, op. 16, for piano, oboe, clarinet, bassoon and horn. The Orchestra likes M. Jacquard's school, but thinks his playing too forte for ears accustomed to Piatti.—On the next occasion, Wieniawski led in two Quartets: Beethoven in E flat, No. 10, and Haydn in G, No. 81; Alfred Jaell played in Schubert's B flat Trio (op. 99) besides smaller solos; and Herr Reichardt sang a couple of chamber vocal pieces by Meyerbeer.—The fourth (May 31) was made brilliant by Joachim, Davidoff, the Russian violoncellist (formerly of Leipzig), Jaell again, and Mme. Dustmann, vocalist, from Vienna. The pieces were: Quintet by Mozart (in D): Sonata by Schumann, for piano and violin (A minor, op. 105); Lieder by Schubert and Schumann; Quartet by Beethoven (No. 2, in G); Polonaise by Chopin (C sharp minor) and La Sylphide by Jaell. Joachim "surpassed himself," as he always does according to these London critics.

HENRY LESLIE'S CHOIR, which gives half a dozen concerts every Spring in St. James's Hall, is distinguished by its fine part-singing, and by the large admixture in its programmes of part-songs, glees and madrigals, both new and old and rare, with larger sacred works from great masters, relieved by classical instrumental pieces. In one of them we find a Fugue: "Tu es Sacerdos," by Leonardo Leo (1694—1742): Mozart's Ave Verum; unaccompanied anthems for 8 voices by Mendelssohn; parts of a Mass for male voices by Gounod; Hauptmann's Salve Regina; airs, quartets, &c., from Jeptluth, Samson and Elijah; an Organ Concerto by Handel, and Piano pieces by Beethoven, played by Ernst Pauer. Let the Mus. World's report of the last of these concerts (May 26) show the character of them all:

The selections on Thursday comprised Mendelssohn's part-song, "The first day of spring;" Pennsall's madrigals, "Sing we and chaunt it," and "Light of my soul arise;" "Sanctus," and "O salutaris," from M. Gounod's Mass for Male voices; Hauptmann's "Salve Regina;" J. Bernby's part-song, "Sweet and low;" Webbe's glee for male voices, "The mighty conqueror;" national part-song, "Ye mariners of England;" J. G. Calcott's part-song, "The first twitter of spring;" J. L. Hatton's part-song, "When evening's twilight," Edwards's madrigal, "In going to my lonely bed;" and "Rule Britannia," arranged by Mr. Henry Leslie. "Sweet and low," and "The first twitter of spring" (the feeblest of the part-songs) were encored; but the singing was even more to be commended in Mendelssohn's, "The first day of spring," Webbe's glee, and Edwards's madrigal. The pieces from M. Gounod's mass created no effect, even though the pianissimo singing of the men in the "O Salutaris hostia," was most remarkable. The instrumental performances were as interesting as the vocal. Mr. Charles Hallé and Herr Joachim played Beethoven's "Kreutzer" sonata, and, as a matter of course, raised the enthusiasm of the audience. Herr Joachim selected for his solo, Bach's superb Chaconne in D minor, which he executed marvellously, and in which he created the greatest sensation of the evening. Mr. Charles Hallé's solo performances included three of Mendelssohn's Lieder ohne Worte played in his accustomed style. Mr. Sims Reeves was the solo singer, and his songs were the air from Faust, "Salve dimora," and Mr. Henry Leslie's "Annabelle Lee." In the song from Faust, Mr. Reeves was accompanied by Mr. Charles Hallé on the pianoforte, Herr Joachim playing the violin obligato, and the performance altogether, as may be imagined, was incomparable. Mr. Reeves was encored in "Annabelle Lee," so loudly and persistently that he was fain to comply. Mr. Leslie has wound up his season with ecclt.

BERLIN. The London Musical World correspondent (May 28) writes:

Like Archimedes, on the celebrated occasion when he rushed out of his bath, Herr von Hülsen exclaimed, no doubt: "Eureka! Eureka!" or in plain English: "I have found my long-sought tenor at last" after the debut, as Manrico in Il Trovatore, of Herr, or rather, Mr. Adams, from the Pesth Theatre. Mr. Adams is, it is said, an American, which will account for his pronunciation of the German language, which is anything but perfect. He is a pupil of Herr Richard Mulder, and has turned that gentleman's teaching to good account; but whether he is quite up to the mark for the position he aims at occupying here, is a matter of grave doubt, and, if Herr von Hülsen did indulge in the Archimedean exclamation, or any sentiment at all approaching the sentiment conveyed in it, he may have been premature in his self-congratulation. As Manrico, Herr Adams produced a good impression and was much applauded. He appeared to possess a fine voice, well trained, as I hinted a little above. The weakest part of his performance was the acting, in which every one agreed he had much to learn. Still, recollecting how many debutants had lately tried their hands, or rather voices, as first tenors, and failed ignominiously, the audience were very kind to Herr Adams, and applauded him very warmly. His second appearance was as Ottavio in Don Juan. On this occasion, also, he gave satisfaction. His singing was correct and pleasing, and again the audience testified their approbation in the usual manner. But now we come to the reverse of the medal. The third character assumed by Herr Adams was that of Arnold in Guillaume Tell. Herr Adams was very successful in the duet with Tell in the first act: the high C. in the passage "O Mathilde!" given with energy and apparent ease, took the audience by surprise, and they manifested their appreciation of the phenomenal note by loud applause. He tried the same high C once more in his duet with Mathilde, but it was strained, and evidently too much for the wanting powers of the singer, who gave the rest of the part in a very feeble and unsatisfactory manner. I am afraid that Herr von Hülsen has not found in Herr Adams the vocal treasure he fancied he had, after such long seeking, discovered.

Another aspirant for lyrical honors is Madlle. Maria Schmidt, from the Court Theatre in Meiningen. She made a tolerably successful début as Margarethe, in M. Gounod's Faust, although the part is not one particularly well adapted to her. It would seem that she has not been on the stage very long. The second part selected by her was that of Donna Anna in Don Juan, a part for which her natural vocal powers are far too limited. Leonore in Fidèle was the third part essayed by her, and, though she got through it in a highly creditable manner, and was liberally applauded, her voice was decidedly unequal to the task she had undertaken.

As Tannhäuser in the opera of the same name, Herr Richard, from the Mannheim Theatre, made his first bow before a Berlin audience, afterwards singing, or trying to sing, the music of Masaniello and Eliazar, in La Muette and La Juive, respectively. With the mere remark that I do not think much of this gentleman, and that there is not a great chance of his becoming a member of the company at the Royal Opera-house, I will proceed to chronicle the appearance of Aspirant No. 4 for public favor. His name is Herr Schiller; he comes from the theatre at Königsberg, and it was as Tannhäuser in Die Zauberflöte that he essayed to obtain the suffrages of a Berlin audience. There is great promise about him. He possesses an agreeable, though not a strong voice, and his "school" is good.

Spontini's Olympia has been revived, and, under the energetic and intelligent guidance of Herr Dorn, went off admirably. Mad. Harriers-Wipperm made a pleasing Olympia. Madlle. de Ahna was, in my opinion, though not in that of the majority of the local critics, fully equal to Mad. Jachmann, better known as Johanna Wagner, who sustained the character when the opera was revived some years ago with entirely new scenery, dresses and decorations, and when Mad. Köster played Olympia. There was a very crowded house the other evening, but the opera was not the sole attraction. A great number of people attended not so much to witness the performance as to have a good stare at the Prussian "heroes" who had brought the Danish cannon and other trophies to Berlin, and who were admitted free. The backs of the benches they occupied were decorated with laurels and other evergreens.

The concert-season may be said to have closed. Among the last concerts given there was one at which Cherubini's Mass, No. 2, in D minor, was executed, under the direction of Professor Stern, in the hall of the Singacademie. It was fourteen years since the work had been heard in Berlin. The solos were most satisfactorily sung by Madlle. Malvine Strahl, soprano, Mlle. Johann Pressler, contralto, Herr Geyer, tenor, and Herr Krause, bass. The choruses went admirably, and Liebig's band played with a degree of fire and spirit fully worthy of the reputation it enjoys. Another unusual performance here was that of Handel's Israel in Egypt, by the members of the Singacademie, Stern's Verein, and Jä'n's Verein, in the Garrison Kirche. It was a decided and great success, despite the shortcomings, here and there, of the solo-singers. Herren Krause, Wowerky-Betz, Mad. Harriers-Wipperm, Madlle. de Ahna and Pressler, who are not quite at home in Handel's works, on account of the comparative neglect with which the latter are treated over here. Dr. Hans von Bülow has returned from St. Petersburg.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JUNE 25, 1864.

Music a Universal Language.

Music is a universal language, subtly penetrating all the walls of time and space. It is no more local than the Mathematics, which are its impersonal reason, just as sound is its body, and feeling, sentiment or passion is its soul. The passions of the human heart are radically alike, and answer to the same tones everywhere and always, except as they may be undeveloped. And music even has a power to develop them, like an experience of life; it can convey a foretaste of moods and states of feeling yet in reserve for the soul, of loves which never yet have met the object formed to call them out. A musical composition is the best expression of its author's inmost life. No persons in all history are so intimately known and felt to those that live away from them or after them, as are Bach, Handel, Mozart, Beethoven, Weber, Schubert, Mendelssohn, Bellini, to those who enter into the spirit of their musical works. For these have each bequeathed the very wine of his peculiar life in this form, sparkling still the same as often as it is opened to the air. The sounds may effervesce in each performance, but they may be woke to life again at any time; so it is with the passions and emotions which first dictated the melodious creations. Hence it is that most great composers have almost no biography except their music. Theirs is a life of deep interior sentiment, of ever active passion and affection, of far-reaching aspiration, rather than of ideas or of events; theirs is the wisdom of love; their belief is faith, the felt creed of the heart; and they dwell in the peculiar element of that, in the wondrous tone-world, communicating all the strongest, swiftest, and most delicate pulsations of their feeling to the ready vibrations of wood or metal or string, which propagate themselves through the equally ready vibrations of the air and of every other medium, till they reach the chambers of the ear, and set in motion chords more sensitive, that vibrate on the nervous boundary between matter and the soul, and there what was vibration becomes sound, and the hearer has caught the spirit of the composer.

The whole soul of a Beethoven thrills through your soul when you have truly heard one of those great Symphonies! There is no other communion of so intimate a nature possible as that which operates through music. Intimate and yet most mystical; intimacy not profaned by outward contact of familiarity; but a meeting and communing of the ideal one with another, which never grows familiar. Why is it, but because in sentiment the tendency always is to unity, while thought forever separates and differentiates? Feeling communicates by sympathy or fellow-feeling, the world over. And music is its common language, which admits no dialects, and means the same in Europe and America. Light corresponds to thought, and light is changed and colored by every medium through which it shoots, by every surface which reflects it. Sound, or which is the same thing measured motion or vibration corresponds to feeling; and its vibrations are passed on through every medium unchanged, except as they grow fainter. Light is volatile, but sound is constant; so it is when you compare thought with feeling, which last comes more from the centre where all souls are one.

Music, therefore, is religious and prophetic. She is the real Sybil, chanting evermore of unity. Over wild waste oceans of discord floats her silvery voice, the harbinger of love and hope. Every genuine strain of music is a serene prayer, or bold inspired demand to be united with all at the heart of all things.

Review of the Season in Boston.

Midsummer's Day is past, and we shall have no more concerts until the cold months come. The long Summer siesta, however, will not be unrefreshed by Organ music; fortunately the Great Organ of the Music Hall is there and must be played upon; its concerts will continue at least once a week, and we trust much oftener. Why might it not be played upon for one hour every day, and at a low price of admission? Then one might take it as his daily spiritual bath in the cooling, tranquillizing and invigorating stream of music—these qualities of course depending on the proportion of solid organ music to mere trash in the programmes. Let us be thankful for the Organ. This for the serious, and, for the gay, Promenade Concerts (Gilmore's at the Boston Theatre, and the Germania at the Music Hall), will be about all the music we shall have this summer.

Let us look back now over the season that has past—say from some time in last November till the first week in June—and sum up the opportunities which it has offered to the music-lover. It would be idle to enumerate all the lighter miscellaneous concerts and their programmes. The real worth of a musical season may be measured by the amount of really valuable compositions, works of true masters, classical works, great works, or at least genial works, which have been brought to performance, taking into account at the same time the manner and conditions of performance.

I. ORCHESTRAL MUSIC

We begin with a confession of poverty. What we have had has been suggestive, rather than positive; and yet of great value to the musical culture; not to be dispensed with. A pretty formidable list of the best works has been given, many of them frequently, but not with so large an orchestra as we could wish for their interpreter. Unfortunately our city, with all its love of music, does not contain the materials for a good Symphony Orchestra of more than 40 or 45 instruments. This of late years has been the complement in Mr. Zerrahn's "Philharmonic Concerts." But this year we have had no Philharmonic Concerts. When that Great Organ loomed so formidably behind the bronze Beethoven, filling the stage end of the Music Hall, absorbing all attention in itself, demanding to be paid for, and therefore preoccupied and almost monopolizing the earlier half of the musical winter, it seemed useless to attempt grand Symphony concerts in that place—and that of course is the place. Beethoven stood there banished from his own music, and we who longed for it were tantalized to look at him. There is no ground of complaint in this, but only of regret. Had the grand orchestra, the orchestra of eighty, worthy of the Hall, and equal to the Organ, been forthcoming, doubtless the concerts would have taken place; but as it was, the absorbing grandeur of that new temple of harmonies seemed to shame a little orchestra out of sight, and dwarf the sounds thereof to a discouraging teebleness. The formidable Instrument lent no encouragement to little things—though very little things, we grieve to say, have been continually borrowers of its breath. It was not easy with a small orchestra to compete with that grand presence; there was nothing for it but to wait till the prestige of the new wonder should lose somewhat of its freshness. The result has been, that we have had no grand Symphony concerts proper, but in due time there came along the Afternoon ("Rehearsal") Concerts of the Orchestral Union, to the number of eighteen, always offering one good Symphony and Overture, besides lighter divertissements for amusement seekers. But even these concerts were in partnership with the Organ, a couple of pieces thereon being interpolated into every programme. The same orchestra—rarely exceeding 25 instruments—has also taken part in three or four benefit concerts. Then there have been four "Social Orchestral Entertainments" given by the Mozart Club (amateurs) to their friends, also under CARL ZERRAEN. To which add two "Orchestral Soirées in a small room, with a still smaller orchestra arranged and conducted by JULIUS EICHBERG,—experimental with a view to demonstrate the practicability of something choice in that way. But if the means of interpretation have been so restricted, the list of good things interpreted—though for the most part old and familiar, has been by no means meagre.

1. The SYMPHONIES have been as follows:—

☞ Those not otherwise marked were played by the Orchestral Union (ZERRAEN).

HAYDN: In E flat (Eichberg's Soirées); in D, No. 19, (Mozart Club).

MOZART: In D, and G minor (Mozart Club); in C ("Jupiter"), the Minuet and Finale only, (Eichberg).

BEETHOVEN: No. 1, in C, three times (Orchestral Union, Eichberg, Mozart Club); No. 2, in D; No. 4, in B flat; No. 5, C minor (three times); No. 6, "Pastoral" (twice); No. 7, in A, (twice,—also the Allegretto by the Mozart Club); No. 8, in F, (Eichberg).

MENDELSSOHN: No. 4 "Italian," in A, (twice,—also the Andante by the Mozart Club).

SCHUMANN: No. 1, in B flat, (twice).

GADE: No. 6, in B flat, (three times).

LIBET: (if his "Symphonic Poems" may be counted as Symphonies), "Les Preludes" (3 times).

2. Of Concertos, and the like, with Orchestra, these:—

MOZART: In D minor, for Pianoforte (Miss Mary Fay and Mozart Club).

HUMMEL: Introduction and Rondo in B flat, Op. 98, (B. J. Lang, pianist).

MENDELSSOHN: Concerto in G minor, for piano (twice: O. Dresel, and Henry Carter); in D minor (Mr. Lang, twice).

CHOPIN: Romanza from 1st Concerto (Mr. Dresel).

MENDELSSOHN AND MOSCHELES: Duo Concertante for two pianos, on March in "Preciosa" (Mr. Lang and pupil).

3. OVERTURES, the following:—

MOZART: Zauberflöte (twice,—once by Mozart Cl.), Idomeneo (Mozart Club); Clemenza di Tito; Così fan tutte (Eichberg); Don Juan (Mozart Club).

BEETHOVEN: Leonora, No. 3 (twice); Fidelio, No. 4, in E, (Mozart Club); Coriolanus (Lang's Shakespeare Concert).

MENDELSSOHN: "Midsummer Night's Dream," (twice); "Return from Abroad," (3 times,—once by Mozart Club).

WEBER: Freyshülts (twice); Oberon (twice); Preciosa (Eichberg).

ROSSINI: L'Italiana in Algeri (Mozart Club); Semiramide (3 times); William Tell.

AUBER: Le Serment (twice); Zanetta.

DONIZETTI: Anna Bolena (Mozart Club).

NICOLAI: "Ein feste Burg," with Organ.

RIETZ: Concert Overture in A.

LINDPAINTNER: Battle Overture.

BENNETT: "The Naiades."

Thus we have had seven out of the nine Beethoven symphonies, which is as well as we commonly fare. Of course, the "Choral Symphony" is out of the question without more instruments and for the same reason it was wise not to undertake the "Eroica." Blessed be he who will bring to us, or entice to us, a great Orchestra—with a plenty of violins, etc., not forgetting fagotti! The man was raised up to give us the great Organ; who will be the man of the great Orchestra? We do not want it to be too great. The only important novelty in the Symphony line was the revival of Schumann's noble one in B flat. There are others of his remaining to be heard, and it is a long time that we have missed the great one in C by Schubert with its "heavenly length."

The only additions to our old stock of Overtures have been the two by Nicolai and Rietz both valuable. Important reminders of good things too long forgotten were Beethoven's Overture to Coriolanus (not Shakespeare's, but a German tragedy by Collin,—yet the musician's feeling of the subject is akin to Shakespeare's) and Mozart's Idomeneo and Così fan tutte. There is room for much more variety and interest under this head. We come now to

II. ORATORIOS and large choral works, secular and sacred. The advent of the great Organ for a magnificent background and supporter to the voices, with the Orchestra, has prompted one or two new and interesting adventures on these mighty deeps. And yet our old Handel and Haydn Society, to whom we owe all that is not otherwise credited in the following list, are still shy of attacking several of the noblest and fittest, tasks of all great choral societies—tasks without which such societies in England and in Germany would soon lose their prestige. "Israel in Egypt" still remains a terror, to say nothing of the Passion music and the Cantatas of Sebastian Bach, a richer than Californian field for exploration in the Old World, now and for many years to come. Indeed it is long since we have even heard Judas Macabæus, Jephthah, and the other good old things of Handel, which have had their successes here; and Mendelssohn's other oratorio, St. Paul, is still as good as unknown among us. But the amount of what has been vouchsafed to us is not inconsiderable, to-wit:

HANDEL: The Messiah (twice); "Ode for Saint Cecilia's Day" (Dryden's), twice.

MENDELSSOHN: "Hymn of Praise" (twice); Elijah; 95th Psalm (Mr. Parker's Club, piano accompaniment, twice); Alhala (Do, twice); "Walpurgis-Night" Cantata (Mr. Lang's Shakespeare Concert); music to "Midsummer Night's Dream" (Do, and again at Mr. Ryan's Concert).

COSTA: Oratorio "Eli."

NICOLAI: Choral Overture, with Organ, on Luther's "Ein feste Burg" (twice).

BENNETT: Cantata, "The May Queen" (Mr. Carter, with piano accompaniment).

BEETHOVEN: Chorus to Goethe's "Becalmed at sea and Happy Voyage" (Mr. Parker's Club, twice).

This exhausts the list of larger performances, if we except various fragments from Masses, Motets, etc., which belong to the account of Organ Concerts. These, together with the Concerts of Classical Chamber Music, we reserve to a concluding article.

The Minor Mode. Why is it so sad?

[We have received the following from a pupil of the "Mendelssohn Musical Institute" (under the charge of Mr. E. B. Oliver). Although we cannot agree that the Minor mode is always mournful, and must submit that much of the melancholy strain in which the piece is written is somewhat juvenile, the theory suggested is at least ingenious.]

That it is sad, no person who can appreciate music in the slightest degree will deny: for all must have felt its mystic power to bring before the mind images that are fraught with melancholy: trains of thought that leave us sadder, perhaps better than we were before, and when a minor clause occurs in cheerful music, it startles us almost like a funeral train among a company of revellers.

Why is this? Why should a minor key awaken in our hearts memories that long have slumbered there—fond memories of a happy past—cherished and tender?

The sunny days of childhood, the joyous dreams of youth, beloved friends—those who yet bear the pilgrim staff, upon a thorny life path, as well as those who have gone forth forever from our homes and fire-sides into the shadowy land; all these come forth like living pictures upon the tablets of memory. Visions of the future, too, come over us; not such as through our bright day dreams nor such as steal upon us in a twilight reverie. The scene is reversed, we think of a future—far away, we hope—when we shall be old, and wrinkled, and worn; when the bright scenes that charm us now, will have faded; when friends that smile upon us now, will have been taken from us either by the hand of death or by one still more cruel estrangement; when we shall live on, forsaken or forgotten by all that breathe. Sometimes, trusting all the future in the Father's loving care, the soul aspires heavenward, and we long to burst the fetters that confine us here, and soar onward and upward ever more until we reach the fountain of all light and life.

I had wondered many times why this is so, and tried to find out a reason, yet always in vain. A few days since my teacher mentioned the subject to me, and explained it in a manner so lucid and beautiful, that I will try to repeat to you what he told me. Hoping that it will interest you as it did me. In the first place you must know that a piece of music is a microcosm, a little world, or firmament rather, wherein all the tones revolve or gravitate around one central tone, called the Tonic, as planets revolve around the sun. Like planets too some are near, and some remote, some primary, and some secondary. Chief among the primary, or less dependent tones are the fifth, called the Dominant, and the fourth or Subdominant. Now the second of the scale just starts forth from the Tonic one degree, and rests there calm and firm, because so near its home. The major third, removed one more degree, has no the tonic to rest upon, but is sustained in the world of sound by the fourth or subdominant, the primary sound which it revolves, as the moon revolves around the earth: so that it too, has a firm support and a resting place. But the minor third, too far from the tonic to rest on that, too far from the subdominant to be led by that, goes wandering on alone finding no place in which to rest, no friend with whom to journey.

So it goes on; waiting ever for the home it cannot find, striving for the rest it cannot gain.

A beautiful story is told of a knight in the days of chivalry, who as he went forth to war, wore a chain—light indeed at first, and easy to be borne; but as he went on farther and farther from his lady love, the chain grew continually heavier, until he could support its weight no longer. So this minor third, far from its home, bears still the lengthening chain that binds it there. Like the heaven-born spirit here on earth it is too pure and bright to rest contented with mere earthly joys, too far removed from heaven to hold communion with its kindred there. Therefore it wanders on through earth, seeking abiding rest but finding none.

L. E. C.

BEETHOVEN'S SONATAS. There have always been variations of the text, not few nor unimportant, in the different editions. In the new editions of all Beethoven's works, now in course of publication by Breitkopf and Hartel in Leipzig, the text of the Sonatas has been carefully and critically edited from the original manuscripts. Many students of Beethoven on this side of the Atlantic will be glad to learn that Ditson's edition of the Sonatas has lately been carefully compared with the new Leipzig edition, by so sure and critical an eye as Mr. Dresel, and the plates conformed thereto in every instance. This makes it the most valuable edition that can be had—at least while gold costs more than double.

Musical Correspondence.

CHICAGO JUNE 4.—The event of the season has been the rendering of the "Czar and Carpenter," by our Musical Union. This Society was established by Mr. Cady, and has seen many changes since its birthday. Last year, Mr. Hans Balatka, the present Director, and also Conductor of the Philharmonic Society, conceived the idea of translating Lortzing's "Czar und Zimmermann" into English. He went to work, made the necessary copies and induced the government of the Union to have this opera practised. Many lady members did not wish to appear in opera dress upon the stage, and stayed away. The ranks were filled by outsiders. For several months the few regularly attending members went through a tedious drill till all was declared "ready." But, notwithstanding the favorable notices of papers, liberal invitations sent to clergymen and the admission of many "dead heads," the people would not come. The opera was given five times, the last two nights almost without any fault, by an excellent and full orchestra, a chorus of nearly sixty voices, and very efficient solo singers. The cause of this failure is even to-day a mystery. The Musical Union must have lost several hundred dollars, and the courage to undertake a similar task again.

An improved edition of Grau's opera troop, which appeared soon after, met with a somewhat better reception. The number of genuine lovers of art seems to be thus far very small. The great majority of those who attend operas and concerts seem to be idolators, worshipping the god of mammon by daytime on Lake and Water streets, and kneeling before the goddess of fashion in Mc. Vicker's, or Bryan Hall during the evening. We understand that the indomitable energy of the President of the Musical Union has caused the re-rehearsing of Mendelssohn's "Elijah," which oratorio is to be given in about a fortnight.

It is a great pity that the parent Singing Society of Chicago should only number about sixty singers. This Union has done much for music. And even to-day, while the public repays with ingratitude the best efforts of the Union, this society pays $500 a year for having music taught in the public schools and secures good instruction to a preparatory class.

Messrs. Ansorge and Baumbach, (formerly of your city), who have come here during the year, are doing very well. The former is organist and leader at St. Paul's Church (Universalist), and the latter at the New England Church (Orthodox.) A host of other music teachers have come here, so that at present the supply is at least equal to the demand.

A BLOWER AND A BLOW.—In Chambers, Encyclopedia, article "Orlando Gibbons," we find the following:

Orlando Gibbons' son, Dr. Christopher Gibbons, at the Restoration, was appointed principal organist to the king and to Westminster Abbey. And by a commendatory letter from Charles II. was created doctor in music by the University of Oxford. Celebrated for his organ blowing, he is said to have been the instructor on that instrument of Dr. John Blow.

The Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung, of April 20th, in speaking of the annual examination of the pupils at the Leipzig Conservatorium, says—

"Mr. Peterwile was the best among the piano players. His brilliancy of execution and his technical skill are worthy of note, and we doubt not that he will make a name for himself; but before he can be counted among eminent pianists, he must develop more completely his musical feeling, without which even the bravour of a Liszt would make no enduring impression."

MS. WORKS OF MEYERBEER.—The following is from the Art correspondence of the New Nation, dated May 30.

No one, of the public at least, is yet acquainted with the musical legacy of Meyerbeer. All leads us to hope, however, that the famous African Girl will be given at the Grand Opera under the title of Vasco de Gama.

Almanzor, The Gate of Brandebourg, and the African Girl, unrepresented operas; chorus and orchestral interludes for the Eumenides, the tragedy by Æschylus—interludes (in ré major) for two violins, alto, flutes, hautboys, clarionets, bassoons, horns, and bass violas—a magnificent piece, it is said, of scientific construction, founded on a theme of three notes, are some of the works left by Meyerbeer. The autograph manuscript of the last-mentioned morceau is the property of Doctor Lichtenthal, a learned musician. Twenty melodies, for the songs belonging to the novel, Schwarzschützendorf Geschichten, (a village story of the Black Forest,) Auerbach. Eighteen canzonette of Metastasio. Various Lieder, written in Berlin for a piece by Madame Birch Pfeiffer. Twelve psalms with two choruses, without accompaniment, a Stabat Mater, a Te Deum, and a Miserere. Also variations for the piano on an original theme, a concerted symphony for the piano and violin, with an orchestral accompaniment.

A SUGGESTION. The following may be worthy the attention of some man of musical statistics and of some music publisher:

"MR. EDITOR:—Allow me to suggest through your columns the desirableness of a complete Musical Directory. Such a work would be exceedingly useful, especially if containing a full and accurate list of all the teachers in the city, with the branch (or branches) of the art, which they make their speciality; the Organ, Piano-Forte, Reed, and other instrument makers; the Organists of the different churches, with the class of Choir, (Chorus or Quartet, and, perhaps, the names of those composing the last) and their leaders; the different Musical Societies and their officers; the Orchestras, their numbers and leaders; the Bands with their leaders and offices; the Musical Journals, with editors and publishers; the different Concert Halls; and last, but not least, a description of the Great Organ, and of such others as may seem desirable.

"Many persons, spending the Sabbath in the city, often desire to hear some particular organist or singer, but are often unable to obtain the desired information, which such a work would contain. It would also furnish an excellent medium for advertising.

"Are there not sufficient inducements, and prospect of success, for some enterprising publisher to prepare and issue such a book?"

ENGLEFORD.

GOTTSCHALK'S BEST COMPOSITION. We find it in a letter from the fashionable pianist to the Homes Journal, wherein he says:

"I delight to think that, beyond the tomb, concerts will exist only in memory, like the confused recollections we have in the morning of a nightmare which has disturbed our sleep. The Orientals people their paradise with marvellous horrors; the red man fills his with verdant prairies and forests of game, where the chase is eternal; for my part, I like to imagine myself in a paradise where piano concerts are prohibited, and 'the Carnival of Venice,' with variations, a crime. On the other hand, I picture the Styx only as a grand depot of all kinds of pianos—upright, square, oblique, and what not—a kind of Botany Bay for hardened pianists, where a never satisfied public insist upon hearing the 'Carnival of Venice,' with variations, forever!"

DEATH OF M. FIORENTINO.—The death of M. Fiorentino, the celebrated literary, musical, and dramatic critic is announced. His talents were of the very highest order. His greatest achievement in a literary way was a translation of Dante's great poem, which is as good as the peculiarities of the French language will admit of. This was published, with illustrations, by Gustave Doré, and to some of our readers the book is doubtless well known.—London Mus. World.

Bach's "Passion Music" was recently produced for the first time in Hamburg, at the fine old Petri-kirche, by the Bach Choral Society. The solo tenor was a Herr Carl Schneider of Rotterdam, and the basso a certain Adolphe Schulze, a pupil of Garcia. The soprano was Mad'le Strahl, from Berlin, and the contralto Mad'le Steinfeld, a member of the society.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE

LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- The dark man dressed in blue. Comic song. W. Williams. 30
An amusing ballad about the person who was "such a nice man," but, unfortunately, something of a thief.
- I'm leaving thee, my mother dear. Ballad. Geo. Barker. 30
The adieu of a bride to her mother. Good melody and pleasing throughout.
- Snow white blossoms. Ballad. Geo. Barker. 30
A pleasing tale of May morning wanderings, with good music, including a chorus.
- The woodland flower. Song. C. White. 25
An agreeable composition, with a forest flavor.
- Sleep and the past. Canzonet. J. P. Knight. 30
A fine classical composition.
- The Picket's last watch. D. A. Warden. 35
The last moonlight walk of a Picket on the banks of the Potomac.
- Meekness. Sacred song. S. Glover. 35
A beautiful song. One of the set called "The Benedictions." "Blessed are the meek."
- O Salutaris hostia. C. E. Stearns. 30
A sacred song for Alto or Baritone voice. It is of high character, and has Latin and English words. Suitable for a solo in any church.
- Cradle millie fealthe. T. M. Browne. 30
A hearty Irish welcome to the returning heroes of the 9th Mass. regiment. The names of the officers who went, but did not return with the others, are all mentioned. The title means, "A hundred thousand welcomes."

Instrumental Music.

- Tone pictures, No. 4. May flowers. G. Reynold, Op. 6.
Very delicate and sweet. Good for learners.
- Tone pictures, No. 5. The strange story. G. Reynold, Op. 6.
A good instructive piece, with smooth flowing runs, and a melody which adapts itself easily to the fingers.
- Eight easy operatic fantasias for piano and violin. No. 5, La Norma. D. Alard. 75
These fantasias are well adapted to the wants of those who have made some progress in violin playing, but yet cannot attack very difficult music with hope of success.
- Northern Pearl. Nocturne. Clay. 30
Soothing and dreamy. Of medium difficulty.

Books.

- MOZART'S 1st MASS, IN C. Cloth $1.00; ps. 75
HAYDN'S 1st MASS, IN B FLAT. " 1.25; " 1.00
These two masses are, perhaps good types of all the others. Mozart's is smooth, elegant, flowing, extremely graceful in its arrangement. Haydn's is bright, cheerful, good throughout, like the cheerful composer.
- Mozart's first will be to most persons, the easiest of his masses, and is, on that account, the best one to begin with, in learning a series.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 607.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JULY 9, 1864.

VOL. XXIV. No. 8.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Half a dozen of Beethoven's Contemporaries.

II. ANTONIO SALIERI.

(Continued from page 258.)

The relations which existed between Mozart and Salieri have been a fruitful topic for three-fourths of a century. As we have now reached the period of the composition of "Figaro's Marriage," this is the proper place to treat of a by no means easy subject. Holmes's remark that the "Figaro" was undertaken at the suggestion of Emperor Joseph, is a mistake (see Holmes, Life of Mozart, p. 199. Am. Ed.). Da Ponte, finding it necessary to write something which should justify Joseph in retaining him as Court Poet, and conquer Abbate Casti and his party, and knowing but two composers whom he, at the time, was willing to write for, "set himself," as he says, "earnestly at work to think out a pair of dramas for his dear friends, Mozart and Martin." "As to the first, I saw easily that his boundless genius demanded a broad, many-sided, and noble subject. As I talked with him one day on this topic, he asked me whether I could, without too much trouble, form a text out of the comedy of Beaumarchais, entitled, "The Marriage of Figaro."

Thus the idea was originated by Mozart himself, and this was in the Autumn of 1785; for, on November 2, he writes to his father, and excuses the shortness of the letter on the ground that he is excessively occupied with "Le Nozze di Figaro." Da Ponte asserts positively that the opera, text and music, was finished in six weeks. This may be so, for Mozart's entry in his own catalogue may refer to the completion of the Overture, which had, of course, not been needed until the work came to rehearsal,—and the first stage rehearsal had taken place the day before (28),—and thus Holmes is again corrected, who believed that the work was entirely written in that month of April!

(1786) "29 April, Le Nozze di Figaro,"

Again; Holmes says (281): "Salieri and Righini, being at this time ready with operas, were both competitors with Mozart for preference." His authority is, of course, Kelly, who says that three operas were now ready: Il Demogorgone, by Righini, Figaro, and the Grotto di Trophonio, by Salieri. But we have already seen that Salieri's opera was given on the 12th of October of the preceding year, and we shall see, when the thread of the narrative is again resumed, that he was at this time too busy with his two operas for Paris to have any time or inclination to stand in the way of Mozart. We shall see, moreover, that he left Vienna in the spring of 1786, and did not return until October, 1787. When Mozart's father, therefore, writes to his daughter in April, 1786: "Salieri and all his tribe will move heaven and earth to put it (Figaro) down," whatever may have been the Italian's desire in the premises, he was not in Vienna at the critical time; nor could he have been the cause, that after Martin's "Cosa rara" came upon the stage, November 17, 1786, Mozart's work was laid aside. The fact is Joseph's taste was not yet cultivated up to Mozart's magnificent instrumentation. From what we have already seen of him and his taste in music, how could it be?

One more passage from Holmes is worth quoting, to show the danger of trusting the fancy in writing history: "Few have been the instances in dramatic annals in which men of such renown as Haydn, Mozart, Gluck, Paesello, Storace, Salieri, Righini, Anfossi, etc., have been collected under one roof to witness the first performance of an opera, as it is no improbable surmise that they were on this occasion," viz: the production of Figaro on the first evening of May, 1786. The "surmise" is, on the other hand, very improbable. The strong probability is that Haydn was not in Vienna at all; but in Esterhaz or Eisenstadt; Salieri left for Paris in the spring of this year (Frühjahr) says Mosel; Anfossi brought out in this same year an oratorio at Castel Nuovo, and an opera at Padua, and I can find no proof whatever that he had recently been in Vienna.

"When on the 17th of November Martin's 'Cosa rara' obtained an incredible success, which, both with the public and with the Emperor, threw Figaro into the shade, it became possible to lay it (Figaro) quite aside," says Jahn. Few who have read the history of Mozart have escaped the impression that Martin's opera was adopted by "Salieri and his tribe" as a means of banishing Figaro from the stage. To this, be it but remarked again that Salieri had been for months in Paris, and that Da Ponte says:—"Hardly were the parts (of the Cosa rara) distributed, when all hell seemed to be let loose." Not knowing that the text was by him, the singers, while doing all in their power to put down Martin, praised the libretto to its author as one, which showed him how an opera should be written! Only the express command of the Emperor caused the work to be produced. The cabal had, if possible, been worse than that against Mozart, and in it Salieri could by no possibility have borne a part.

Is it necessary then to believe that Salieri's intrigues kept Figaro from the stage? It should not be forgotten that the opposition to Figaro was also in a great measure led by Abbate Casti, and against Da Ponte, not against the composer; and that in less than three months after the success of "Una cosa rara" Nancy Storace, the Susanna of Figaro, and O'Kelly, the Basilio, left Vienna, which may well have prevented for the time a reproduction of the opera, without charging it upon a man then living in Paris.

When Leopold Mozart brought his children to Vienna the second time, September, 1767, they were forced to take refuge in Olmutz, on account of the ravages of the small pox, and not until January, 1768, could they establish themselves in Vienna. In that month Wolfgang Mozart completed his twelfth year; Antonio Salieri entered the second half of his eighteenth. The former excited the admiration and astonishment of the Empress Maria Theresa and the musical circles of Vienna by his wonderfully precocious powers as pianist and instrumental composer, and the enemy and hatred of the routine musicians of the city, young as he was; the other was still the pupil of Gassmann, already a favorite of Joseph, and just beginning to hear compositions of his own introduced into the popular operas.

Mozart had the composition of "La finta semplice" entrusted to him, but Affligio in the end never allowed it to come to performance, nor could the Emperor command it, for at that time Affligio was the lessee of the Court stage, and Joseph had no power in the premises. Intrigue and cabal conquered, and the youth Salieri had no opportunity of hearing an opera from the boy Mozart.

When the Archbishop of Salzburg brought his Chapel-master to Vienna, in March 1781, and treated him with such indignity and cruelty as to force him to leave his service and settle in Vienna, he was in his twenty-sixth year and was already the author of some half a dozen Italian operas, which had proved successes and which, though not given in Vienna, must have been known to the Vienna musicians. Salieri in the meantime had produced fifteen operas, mostly for the Vienna stage, and many of them with splendid success.

It is not at all improbable that the triumph of Mozart's German opera, Belmont and Constanza, (12 July, 1782) may have opened his eyes to the surpassing genius of the young Salzburger; but it is difficult to see how any argument to prove the supposed envy and jealousy on the part of Salieri toward him can be based upon unsuccessful rivalry in the field of German opera, the Italian's only essay in that direction having been the "Chimney-sweeper," which was only composed as a study—which was wretched in its text—which was produced more than a year before Mozart's work, and which, in spite of the critics, was not without success.

In what was held to be his own department, Mozart was with one voice pronounced unrivalled. Who played the pianoforte with such astonishing power, sweetness, execution! Who composed Concertos, or indeed any form of Chamber-music, which could stand the comparison with his, save indeed Prince Esterhazy's Chapelmaster in Symphony and string Quartet, a man who to great and undoubted genius added the experience gained in a life at this time (1781-2) double his own? It is perfectly natural that under the circumstances things should have moved on as they did. It is to us certainly a misfortune that Mozart had not two or three texts a year to compose for the stage; but his and his father's complaints, natural and well founded in one point of view as they are, should not be taken as giving us the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth.

The facts as they seem to me are these: The Italian school had so long supplied the theatrical music of the court, that it felt itself in the position of a possessor of a prescriptive right to furnish opera in such quantity as was desired; and where their daily bread was at stake, one cannot be surprised that the leaders of the school should exert themselves to keep out intruders. Again, after the spasmodic effort to establish German opera, during which the Italians were dismissed, Joseph returned to his first love—his only real love—and Italian opera buffa again became his evening recreation, performed by the splendid company collected by Salieri, of which Nancy Storace and the Irishman O'Kelly were members. For this company, in its third year, Mozart wrote Figaro. Joseph gave it a chance; but the music was no more to his taste than that of Gluck in his greater works—it did not amuse like the thin Italian scores—nor did he ever acquire a taste for so high an order of Art. Figaro was caviare to the generality, as were those splendid quartets, which Mozart dedicated to Haydn, and, in his musical taste, the Emperor belonged to the generality. Still he gave Mozart a chance, and, a year or two later, when Don Giovanni succeeded at Prague, he had it given also in Vienna.

Dittersdorf had an interview with Joseph at this time, and here is part of the conversation as he reports it.

J.—What do you say to Mozart's composition?

D.—He is unquestionably one of the greatest original geniuses, and thus far I have known no composer, who possesses so astonishing a richness of ideas. I could wish he was not so prodigal of them. He does not allow the auditor to take breath; for hardly will one reflect upon a beautiful thought, when another still finer is there, which crowds out the former, and so it goes on and on until at last a man remembers not one of all these beauties.

J.—In his theatrical pieces he has the single fault, that, as the singers have very often complained, he covers them up by his accompaniments.

D.—That would surprise me. It is very possible to introduce harmony and accompaniment, without spoiling the cantilena.

J.—This talent you possess masterly. I have noticed it in your two oratorios Esther and Job. What do you say to Haydn's compositions?

D.—Of his operatic pieces I have heard nothing.

J.—You lose nothing thereby; for he is just like Mozart.

Mozart's operatic music not being to the Emperor's taste, how was it to be expected that men whose music he did enjoy should in his own theatre be displaced to make way for him, or that a new and unnecessary chapelmastership should be established, simply for the sake of giving a permanent situation to a young man under 30? A man whom the Emperor knew as the Thalberg or Liszt of his day in his pianism, as an operatic composer, who persisted in covering his scores with "too many notes?"

Again; if I have been able to read the musical history of Vienna rightly, there was not at that time a public for such works as Figaro. True, Kelly tells us of the enthusiasm at the first performance; and so does Mozart in his letters to his father (See Holmes 282); but on the whole it was not a work which filled the treasury of the theatre. It stood as small a chance then in Vienna, when opposed to Martin's, Dittersdorf's and Salieri's works, as it does now in New York when opposed to Donizetti, Bellini and Verdi. Long years after Mozart's death, when a musical public had been educated by his works to a full appreciation of his almost superhuman abilities, when his works had reformed public taste and their influence was felt in all the operatic compositions of the age—it was, and is, a very easy and cheap way of accounting for their want of instant success, for the biographer and pseudo-musical historian to save himself the trouble of research and study and heap abuse upon the scapegoat—the imperial chapelmaster Salieri—finding in his envy, enmity and intrigues, a facile explanation of all the phenomena in the case.

The opinions of Prof. Jahn upon any point connected with Mozart are of more importance and value than those of any other writer; and the page or two in his great work concerning the relations between him and Salieri must find place here. It is with very great diffidence that I confess myself not satisfied with the final impression which these pages leave upon the mind of the reader; it is too much like that which Holmes labors to convey—though in all respects softened.

"Salieri," says Jahn (III. 61.), "had no reason to oppose the direction of the Emperor's taste, it being that which he himself followed. With skill and talent he sought to avail himself of the acquisitions made in various directions by modern music, and to enable the Italian opera to meet the just demands of a refined taste. With the exception of the operas which he composed for Paris, and in which he purposely adopted the style of Gluck, he in his works remained true to the traditions of the Italian opera; he introduced no substantially new element into it, and his artistic individuality was not strong and important enough to impress upon the opera a new character. But just this measure of talent, skill and taste had gained him the favor of his imperial master and the public; he must have possessed an uncommon moral and artistic greatness of character, and independence, to have enabled him to acknowledge the newly rising genius as greater than himself, to have bowed before him and retired into the shade—and this he did not possess. (?)

"Salieri is described as a good-natured, kindly man, blameless and amiable in private life, and justly honored with a reputation for noble and benevolent acts; but these good qualities could not stand the trial, when they came into conflict with jealousy for his fame and his position as an artist. (?) In the year 1780 he returned to Vienna from a long journey into Italy, where he had gained new honor and fame, and his hold upon the Emperor's favor was thereby only the more firmly fixed. Now he found in Mozart a rival, dangerous already through the splendor of his powers as a virtuoso, which most quickly gains the loud applause of the multitude; who had by his "Belmont and Constanza" [Abduction from the Seraglio] cast Salieri's "Chimney-sweep" into the shade; who by his "Idomeneo" proclaimed himself a dangerous competitor in his own special field, and soon enough entered the lists with him in the Italian opera. Salieri, who would rather instinctively feel the superior strength of Mozart, than clearly recognize it, could not remain entirely easy and indifferent. No misunderstanding, however, occurred in their personal relations; Mozart in his intercourse with his compeers in art was friendly, good-humored and mild in judgment, 'also in respect to Salieri, who did not like him,' as Frau Sophia Haibl, his wife's sister, records; and he (Salieri) 'had too much policy' to allow his dislike to Mozart to attract attention. That this dislike really existed, that Salieri sought secretly to hinder his rival's advancement, was considered by Mozart's friends and by others in Vienna, as an established fact; and he sought to injure him, not only by disparaging criticisms in the proper quarter, but by many a little intrigue, of which unequivocal traces will hereafter meet us (i.e. in Jahn's volumes). Under these circumstances, it is clear, that Salieri and Strack were allies in the music-room of the Emperor, when it was for their interest to keep off foreign elements, which must necessarily have undermined their long confirmed influence, in case another direction should be given to the Emperor's taste. If, therefore, Joseph did animate Mozart with kind words, which gave him courage, the more so as 'great people do not like to say such things, because they must always be ready for a butcher's thrust' [an expression of Mozart's which I do not understand]—still he had to overcome obstacles in the surroundings of the Emperor, clearly more powerful than the favorable disposition of the monarch, which Mozart was ever re-awakening by new exhibitions of his talents. Moreover the economy of the Emperor came into the account, who could not make up his mind to add another salary to those of the various chapelmasters whom he already had in his employ."

The exact weight which should be granted to Sophia Haibl's words, written many years after Mozart's death, and when the idea that the young man had been the object of the bitter but concealed enmity of Salieri, had become general, is not easy to determine. Nor need it be attempted here.

But to one point attention must be called and that is this: It seems to have occurred to none who have had occasion to write on the relations between the two great composers, that Salieri may have been sincerely honest in his opinions of Mozart's music. Jahn says (III. 63, note): "I have heard from trustworthy witnesses in Vienna, that Salieri in his old age, when he thought himself in confidential circles, expressed with a passionate emphasis painful to his hearers, the most unjust judgments upon Mozart's compositions." Mr. Joseph Hüttenbrenner, has related the same thing, out of his own experience, to the present writer. But does that necessarily imply the personal enmity which is everywhere charged upon him? Abbé Stadler used to leave the quartet concerts in Vienna after the works of Mozart, Haydn, &c., were finished, and Beethoven's came up; but there was no personal enmity. Was Sarti's notorious attack upon Mozart's six quartets dedicated to Haydn the offspring of any other feeling than zeal for what he thought the only good music? Were the French dramatic "philosophers" actuated by any base motive, when they proved, to their own satisfaction, that Shakespeare could not write a good play? Haydn's musical painting in the "Creation" was a topic for Beethoven's jocose and sarcastic remarks. John Peter Salomon declared in 1813 that Beethoven's Fifth Symphony was rubbish; he was perfectly honest in his opinion, just as he was three years later when, in presence of the Philharmonic Society, he expressed his regret for having thus spoken, and pronounced ed the work what the musical world now knows it to be.

Thirty years after the time of which we are now speaking, Anselm Hüttenbrenner, a very fine musician, brother of the Joseph H. mentioned above, he who supported the dying Beethoven's head, became the pupil of Salieri. His reminiscences of him may be read in the Leipzig Musik Zeitung of Nov. 30, 1825. A portion of this article is here introduced, because it is in part directly to the purpose, and in part indirectly, as showing how fixed the musical views and opinions in which he was educated remained in his mind.

"Through the recommendation of Count Moritz von Fries—an in all respects magnanimous promoter of the arts—I was received in the year 1815 as a pupil in composition by the imperial royal Chapelmaster Salieri. The first examination to which I was subjected consisted in this: that I must sing with him a rather difficult two-part Canon, then play a Sonata of Beethoven, which he placed before me, and finally extemporize. To the question what clefs I was most familiar with, I replied that all were reasonably in my power; upon which he began to speak of the barytone and half soprano clefs, my ignorance of which I had blushing to acknowledge. In his instructions in composition Salieri employed no text book. He gave no directions to his pupils what they should write; each had free choice according to his taste. What was placed before him for correction, he examined with severity. Consecutive fifths and octaves he simply pointed out and warned against; but a minor seventh accord in upward motion was a thorn in his eye; and so too were all progressions difficult for the singer and the so-called relations non harmonicae, the bad effect of which he made us feel very sensibly by vigorously striking them on the piano-forte. Most rigorous was he in the matter of modulation; he labored with all zeal against the constant and glaring changes of key, so common of late years, and likened certain modern composers to people who jump out of the window in order to get into the street. When vocal compositions were brought to him, he first read the words through with great attention; then he examined the music to see whether it was written in the spirit of the text; if this was not the case, whatever good and original passages it might possess, the work had no sort of value in his eyes. On such occasions his zeal would grow particularly ardent, and he would cite many passages out of the works of famous masters, who had fallen into this sort of mistake.

"In compositions for the church he would have the spirit of devotion and humility rule throughout; a pompous Kyrie or a jolly Dona nobis he hated. In opera (of which he himself composed fifty-two) the principal thing was to see what character was to sing this or that number. He complained of those composers, who have their squires sing in the same lofty style as their knights, and in whose music the mentor quavers and trills precisely like the pupil. He thought it also opposed to common sense to give a rich instrumental accompaniment to scenes of little passion; and needlessly to agonize the ear with barbarous accords (so he called them) at the best could only suit a chorus of demons. According to him the operatic composer should not be a miniature painter, and employ his strength in the careful working out of particular figures and in other displays of contrapuntal skill. He demanded, for the sake of the effect, strokes large and bold, analogous to the dash of the scene painter.

"He held Gluck to be the greatest operatic composer; he alone, in his view, had best known how to express character in music, and to produce the grandest effects with few notes; while of late years the auditor, owing to the lavish use of them, remained unmoved by the mightiest masses of tones. Of Mozart he always spoke with marked respect, [ausnehmender—extraordinary—Hochachtung.] He, the Unsurpassable, came often to Salieri with the words: 'Dear papa, hand me some of the old scores out of the court library; I will look them through here by you,' and several times when thus employed he missed his dinner. One day I asked Salieri to show me the house in which Mozart died, upon which he took me into the Rauhensteingasse and pointed it out. It is, if my memory serves, distinguished by a picture of the Virgin.* Salieri visited him on the last day but one of his life and was one of the few who attended his funeral."

The "marked respect" with which Salieri always spoke of Mozart in the presence of Anselm Hüttenbrenner, as a man of highest genius, talent and musical learning, no doubt—is perfectly compatible with his more private explosions in relation to the operatic music of that master. Think how Salieri's canons of criticism were invaded by Mozart! And yet in his old age Salieri could hear no new opera, which had not the Mozart style for its basis, and which not unfrequently sought success by an exaggeration of what in the old man's eyes were Mozart's worst faults, even to caricature. In his view the whole direction of opera seria was wrong and this tendency had been given it by Mozart's example. One can admire the greatness of "nutshell" Carlyle's genius, the extent of his acquirements, the profundity of his thoughts, and yet honestly detest his abominable use, or rather misuse of the "King's English"—as bad as Falstaff's misuse of the King's press—and despise his incapacity to perceive the truth in the cases of his heroes, or in cases where a people, and not a single individual, is heroic.

Let us for once forget all the prejudgments, which we have made when reading the lamentations of Holmes, and indeed of all Mozart literature, over the success of Salieri's personal enmity and the intrigues which sprang out of it, in crushing Mozart, and look at the matter from a simple common-sense point of view, leaving romance to Polkos and soft-hearted young women—to such as really suppose, that the heavens above, or the earth beneath, or the waters under the earth, can furnish, in the nineteenth century, a real original of the inane, namby-pamby Seraphiel of "Charles Auchester."

Mozart's friends claim—and justly too, as the future proved—that, when he, the young man of twenty-five, settled in Vienna, he needed but the opportunity, and he would utterly cast all others composers in Vienna into the shade; would prove indisputably the overwhelming superiority of his powers; and place himself on a height beyond rivalry. Suppose Salieri perceived this—he the Imperial Royal Chapelmaster—still a young man also, and with a long career before him—he who certainly stood first as Italian operatic composer, who enjoyed the special favor of the Emperor and the Vienna public—whose works were known throughout Europe—save possibly in England—can you blame him for not at once saying: "Here, Mozart take my sceptre—true, you have not yet written any grand opera except the Idomeneo, but I see you are a far greater genius than I am, and as you are supreme at the piano-forte and instrumental composition, so make your crown triple, by adding that of Italian opera to it."

* A new house called the 'Mozarthof,' occupies the spot now, the front ornamented with busts of several composers, and within a colossal bust of Mozart.

The idea becomes thus an absurdity.

Upon the whole, the charges against Salieri—in part disproved by incorrigible and unbending dates—if not resulting in the verdict "not guilty," may at least be dismissed with the Scotch verdict "not proven." I ask for Salieri only justice—nothing more.

The "Wiener Theaterkalender" for 1787 contains a list of all the performances in the Imp. Roy. Court Theatre from Oct. 1, 1785 to Sept. 31, 1786. The theatre was open 318 evenings, 157 of which were for opera, a single work, with but very few exceptions, comprising an evening's performance. For some nine months of the year opera as a rule occupied three evenings in the week; but through July and half of August opera alone was given. Salieri's Grotto di Trofonio—first performance Oct. 12, 1785—had seven representations during the first four months, three during the next five, and during the entire theatrical year 17. During this year his "Fiera di Venezia" was given five times, and his Scuola de' Gelosi twice. Mozart's Figaro—first performance, May 1—had six representations during the first four months, in September, October and November, one each, when it was dropped, until revived under Salieri in 1789. His "Abduction from the Seraglio" was also given May 10 and July 21.

Paisiello was perhaps the most popular composer that year; his "King Theodor" was given eleven times, his "Barber of Seville" ten, and at least seven evenings were occupied by other works from his pen. The new operas of that theatrical year were eleven in number, in a period of ten and a half months of actual performances. One of these was the celebrated "Doctor and Apothecary" of Dittersdorf, broadly farcical, at which the theatre shook with laughing, Joseph setting the example, and which had nine representations from 11 July to Aug. 6. Another was Cimarosa's "La Villanella rapita," performed eight times from Nov. 25, 1785 to Feb. 17, '86, while his "L'Italiana in Londra," revived May 17, '86, had six representations before the close of September. The remaining 78 evenings were divided among some eighteen operas, old and new, which had from one to eight performances, and which were without exception of the buffo order. This review of the year certainly gives little encouragement to the idea, that after the ninth performance of Figaro in November, 1786, it was banished from the stage through cabal and intrigue—certainly not through an intrigue led by, or for the advantage of, the absent Salieri. Except the "Grotto of Trophonius," a work which had a very remarkable success, and was performed 17 times in eleven months, there was no opera but the "Doctor and Apothecary" which ran as many times in that year as Mozart's "Figaro" from May to November.

(To be Continued.)

Musical Culture and Tendencies in Leipzig.

THE CONSERVATORIUM.—SEVENTIETH BIRTHDAY OF PROF. MOSCHELES.

The following forms the principal portion of the Leipzig Correspondence (for June 4) of the London Orchestra. The writer is clearly an Englishman.

The "Public Examinations" of the pupils of the Leipzig Conservatorium (writes our correspondent), which have been held during the last few weeks, suggest the question, what has that institution done for the progress of art? I do not propose to enter into a detailed criticism of the performances of the pupils, for it is not a public examination alone, where the pieces are specially prepared for the occasion, which can test the value of the teaching. Suffice it to say, that two of our countryfolk were among the best players—Miss Georgiana Well (a niece of Mr. Macfarren) in Mendelssohn's D minor concerto, and Mr. Horton C. Allison in the same composer's G minor concerto. The performances included pianoforte, violin, and violoncello solo and ensemble playing; solo and choral singing; organ-playing; and compositions of orchestra, chamber, and vocal music. The bias of the pupils to the modern school was strongly marked. The piano compositions selected were confined to those of Weber, Moscheles, Mendelssohn, Schumann, and Chopin; the violin to Spohr, De Bériot, Mendelssohn, and David. Either the masters seem to exert too little influence upon their pupils in directing their choice, or the pupils are too self-willed to obey. Seductive enough is the Romantic school, but its followers require to be strengthened by the more invigorating productions of the classical age. I am not denying the many and great merits of the Romantics, but a too exclusive bias in their direction brings with it enervation and vagueness, just as exclusive classicality tends to dryness and retrogression. To judge from the character of the majority of the pupil's compositions, it might be supposed that the masters of the Conservatorium belonged to the Zukunft party, or, as it prefers to be called, the "New German School." But the names of Reinecke, Hauptmann, and Richter are a sufficient guarantee that this is not the case. These professors must, however, have felt very much like a hen which has hatched a brood of ducks. I believe several of the compositions were rather considerably "tamed" before they were submitted to the public, but much was still left which ought not to have been stamped with the seal of the Conservatorium. Perhaps there is something in the air which seizes upon the present generation, just as our fathers went through a course of Byronism; but as the latter settled down into most respectable fathers of families, so there is still hope that when our young friends have sown their musical oats, the extravagance and the impatience of law under which they now suffer (and make others suffer) will give way to sounder views, and that the present fermentation will end in wine, new, perhaps in taste, but sound in body. A pianoforte fugue, by Herr Radetzki, of Riga, and a "dance" from "Music to the Wino's Tale," by Herr Flitner, of Dachwig, must be excepted from the general censure. Earnestness and effort on the part of the other young composers cannot be denied, however much opinions as to their taste may differ. It is unfortunate that the Professor of the Æsthetics and History of Music belongs to the new school; so far as I am aware, its only representative in the Conservatorium. This chair, which of all others has so much influence for good or evil, ought to be otherwise filled, if the Directors had moral courage enough to do justice to themselves and to their pupils.

The cursus of theoretical construction, as conducted by Dr. Hauptmann, Herr Richter, and Dr. Papperitz, is admirable and thorough. That happy medium is inculcated which is equally removed from the anxious timidity of the old school, and from the lawless audacity of the new. The piano was well represented. The system introduced by Herr Plaids, the principal master for the technicalities of the instrument, gives a certainty and command that remove all apprehension of slips and stumbles. There may, perhaps, be some danger of the touch becoming hard, and the style mechanical, but the safeguard against this is musical feeling, without which no technical skill will make a player. All that relates to the style of playing, and the true conception of music of the classical school, is taught by Professor Moscheles as few others could teach it. But the professor has himself repeatedly said he does not pretend to teach the more modern music of Chopin and Schumann and the Romantics, with which he has less sympathy. This music must be taught, and it were much to be wished that a master should be appointed who could do it justice. At present, as is generally the case among young people, the virtuoso element is unduly esteemed by the pupils; brilliancy of execution being looked upon as the end, instead of the means.

The organ has not that consideration bestowed upon it which its importance deserves. There may be many reasons for this. There is but little demand and less employment for first-class organists in Germany. In the church services the organ is only required to accompany the chorales; if any more elaborate music be performed, an orchestra is employed. For a long time there has been a prejudice against using the organ in combination with the orchestra in oratorios, &c., which is but now beginning to die away. These are general unfavorable influences, but there are others peculiar to the Leipzig Conservatorium. The instrument upon which the pupils have to practise is the most miserable imaginable; asthmatic and rickety, ivories worn away from the keys, some of the stops slow in speaking, he must indeed be a devoted lover of the organ who can find anything but disgust in his hour's practice. Add to this, that the organ is in a church, and that the Leipzig authorities seem to think frigid mortification (by deputy) is meritorious, and therefore the churches are not heated, and some idea can be formed of the pleasantness of a sojourn in such a locality during a German winter, when the thermometer is often for days together down to zero, and even lower. Under such circumstances nothing more than tolerable mechanical correctness can be expected from the pupils; and that some attained more than this speaks highly for their perseverance under difficulties. As for any idea of the charms of light and shade, and of the expression of which organ playing is capable, from a judicious combination and variation of stops, no one seems now to have it. This, and the use of the swell (in the few instances where this mechanism exists), are looked down upon as sentimental frivolities. Schneider was of a different opinion, but he is dead. Another very necessary branch also seems to be too much neglected, viz., instruction in playing from a figured bass, and in accompaniment. Of the other branches of instruction, and of the general educational influence of the Leipzig musical life, I must speak in my next.

The Conservatorium Soirée in honor of Professor Moscheles' seventieth birthday passed off brilliantly. The railings of the orchestra and the Professor's chair were decorated with spring garlands. The music was entirely selected from the Master's compositions. The first piece, Graud Septuor in D, Op. 88, for piano, violin, tenor, clarinet, horn, violoncello and contrabass, was played by the Herren Kapellmeister Reinecke, Concertmeister David, F. Hermann, B. Landgraf, A. Luidner, L. Lübeck, and O. Bachaus, and was most warmly received; it deserves to be better known. The other pieces ("Les Contrastes," for two pianos, eight hands, Op. 115, and Concerto Fantastique, Op. 96, as well as some vocal compositions) were entrusted to pupils, who seemed delighted thus to show their respect to their master. A choral song, "Dies ist der Tag des Herrn," from Op. 117, was sung really well—a most rare event in the Conservatorium. When the performance was over, the Professor ascended the orchestra, and with perceptible emotion spoke to the following effect:—"First of all I must express my gratitude to the Almighty, who has preserved me to this day in such complete health and strength; and then I must thank the Directors, my colleagues, and the pupils, for the affection they have shown me to-day. As long as my mental and physical energy are preserved, (and, thank God, they are as strong as ever), I hope to devote them to the well-being of the Conservatorium, and to the progress of art; and when the time comes that they begin to wane, be as lenient to me I pray you, as you are affectionate now." It was evident that these simple words came from the heart, and when they were spoken, "hoch!" after "hoch!" was shouted, and among them some English "hurrahs!" were audible.

LEIPZIG, 13th June, 1864.

Last week I wrote to you about the theoretical, piano, and organ teaching in the Leipzig Conservatorium. I now come to the violin, of which Herr Concertmeister David is the principal professor. It would be difficult to find another who combines in himself in so high a degree all the essentials of a consummate teacher; of this his "Violin School," recently published by Breitkopf and Härtel, is a convincing proof. He understands how to excite the emulation of the most indolent pupils, and is himself so thorough a musician that there is no danger of one-sidedness in his tuition. It is not his fault if any of his pupils turn out mere virtuosi. Herr David is ably supported by the Herren Concertmeister Raimund Dreychock, Röntgen, and Hermann; the last named gentleman devotes himself especially to the tenor. The teaching of the violoncello is in the hands of Herr Lübeck, who, although not quite equal to his immediate predecessors, the Herren Grützmaier and Davidoff, is a performer of no ordinary ability, but is, perhaps, a little too much inclined to overvalue execution; a longer residence in Leipzig will give him the best chance of correcting this bias. Wind instruments form no part of the regular cursus of instruction; they can be taught for an extra fee, but, so far as I am aware, no pupil has availed himself of the opportunity. This is much to be regretted, for it is just this branch of the orchestra which so needs to be filled by persons of musical, as distinguished from mere technical, education. It would also be a great advantage to the Conservatorium had it a small orchestra of its own at its disposal. Composers would thus have an opportunity of learning practically some of those secrets of instrumentation which theoretical instruction alone will never impart. The "ensemble" and "orchestra" lessons are very valuable to those who attend them in a right spirit. It is a pity that the great number of the pupils makes it difficult for them to avail themselves more frequently of the opportunity of taking part in the ensemble playing under a master's direction; it takes the "selfishness" out of those who like to shine alone, without thinking of their play-fellows, or of the musical effect. In the "orchestra" lessons, a symphony, overture, or other orchestral piece is played. The stringed quartet is fully represented. The "wind" and contrabass are played from the score on the piano; this affords excellent practice. The pupils have also the opportunity of familiarizing themselves with the use of the baton. Another excellent arrangement is the Abendunterhaltung, held every Friday, at which chamber compositions, concertos, vocal and instrumental solos, are performed by the pupils, in the presence of their masters and fellow-scholars, and of a few persons who are favored with permission to attend. It is very interesting to watch the progress of the various pupils, who thus become acquainted with works which are unsuitable for a larger and more mixed audience, and who also gain confidence against the time when they must make a more public appearance.

Singing, as well solo as choral, is, and I am told has always been, the weak point of the Conservatorium. During a period of some years I have not heard a single pupil who had the least idea of the proper formation, command or use of the voice; unless, indeed, one or two be excepted who had already mastered the elements of the vocal school before they came to Leipzig. The Professor of singing complains of want of support from the Direction; the latter of want of energy on the part of the Professor. Where the fault is, I cannot say—I simply record the lamentable fact. The choral singing is most slovenly. The pupils seem to think it beneath them to attend the chorus classes; a stricter discipline on this point is much to be desired; the advantage is manifold: it renders the ear more certain, often a weak point with pianists; it teaches composers what the voice can and cannot do; and it educates the taste in a high degree. The apathy with which the "mixed chorus" is regarded is one of the many evil results of the Männergesang movement—a movement which cannot be too severely reprobated by every one who is concerned for the welfare of the art of music.

But high as is the character of the instruction in the Conservatorium (excepting in singing) it is not that which gives musical education here its special value. First-rate masters may be found in London in abundance. It is the musical atmosphere which works so invigoratingly; for to those who have ears to hear, what is learned beyond the walls of the Conservatorium is of as much, if not greater, importance as what is learned within them. The Gewandhaus (in whose orchestra the more advanced pupils are allowed to play) and other concerts, the Church, the various musical societies, the opera, spread before the hearer a mass of music of which you can have no idea in London, where year after year the same compositions are repeated ad nauseam. And what concert societies in London could afford to open their doors gratuitously to musical students? How many students could afford to pay London prices for admission to operas and concerts? And when a gentleman has acquired a general musical education, what career is at present open to him in England unless he have devoted himself to composition (and then he must have private means) or to the piano, or organ, or unless he be a brilliant solo player? I do not wish to be misunderstood by the word gentleman; I do not limit it to one of so-called gentle birth; I mean by it any man who has educated his mind, and who by his good conduct and good manners has a right to admission into respectable society. Are there four regular orchestras in the whole of Her Majesty's dominions in which such a gentleman would feel he could play without losing caste? How different is it in Germany! Here, there are at least ten first-class orchestras to which it is an honor for any one to belong. Then of those of the second class, membership in which is looked upon as thoroughly respectable, I cannot undertake to give the numbers. Every little capital and court has one—(one of the few still existing benefits of the multitudes of petty states.) Indeed, if you take a German Gazetteer, and mark off each town of 20,000 inhabitants, (excluding the easternmost border district), you have a catalogue of permanent, respectable orchestras. Nor are the smaller towns without music; almost every market town has its "town-band," and although the execution may not be up to Gewandhaus mark, the repertoire they perform is almost always good. Many a man is there, too, who will attach himself for a very small salary to an orchestra simply for the sake of being able "to make good music." Small and unfortunate indeed must be the town or even the village, which cannot get up a string quartet, to which a piano can in most cases be added.

Johannes Brahms.

To the Editor of the London Musical World.

SIR,—Of all the young composers of Germany, there is, probably, not one about whom a greater diversity of opinion exists than about Johannes Brahms. Your contemporary, the Niederrheinische Musik-Zeitung, published lately a very interesting article concerning him. From it we learn that Brahms is the son of a musician at Hamburg, and a pupil of Eduard Marxsen. He was, in the autumn of 1853, when nineteen years old, introduced by Robert Schumann to the musical world in an unusually brilliant fashion. The Neue Zeitschrift für Musik, in its number of the 28th October, 1853, contains the following article, headed "New Paths," from the pen of the above composer: "Years have elapsed—nearly as many as I devoted to the earlier editing of this paper, namely ten—without my having once been heard on this ground, so rich in reminiscences. Frequently, though I was actively and laboriously engaged in the task of production, I felt a wish to speak; many new and talented men had appeared; a new strength seemed to be manifested in music, as is proved by numerous high-soaring artists very recently, though their productions are known perhaps only to a somewhat narrow circle. I here allude to Joseph Joachim, Ernst Naumann, Ludwig Normann, Woldemar Bargiel, Theodor Kirchner, Julius Schäffer, and Albert Dietrich, together with C. F. Wilsing, the profound composer, who has devoted himself to sacred music, and whom I must not forget. Niels W. Gade, C. F. Mangold, Robert Franz, and St. Heller, also, must be mentioned as their valiantly advancing precursors. Following with the greatest interest the paths pursued by these elected ones, I thought that, after such a state of things, there would and must suddenly appear one destined to give expression in an ideal manner to the deepest feelings of the age; one who would present us with the qualities of a master, not developed gradually, but like Minerva, springing completely armed from the head of Jupiter. He has now come: a youth, at whose cradle graces and heroes kept guard. His name is Johannes Brahms; he came from Hamburg, where he created in dark stillness, after being educated, by an admirable and enthusiastic teacher, in the most difficult laws of his art. He had, too, been recommended to me a short time previously by an honored and well-known master. Even in his outward appearance he showed all those signs which announce to us: this is one of the elect. Sitting at the piano he began to disclose wonderful regions. We were attracted within circles more and more magical. To this must be added a genial power of execution changing the piano into an orchestra of sorrowfully sounding and loudly jubilant voices. There were sonnets, or rather veiled symphonies—songs, the poetry of which would be understood without words, though a deep and songful melody pervades them all—detached pianoforte pieces, partly of a demoniacal nature, most graceful in their form, then sonatas for the violin and pianoforte, quartets for stringed instruments—and all so different from one another that each one appeared to flow from a separate source. Then again he seemed, like some onward foaming flood, to unite them all as though in a waterfall, bearing on the surface of its waves, as they dashed down below, the peaceful rainbow, and surrounded on the bank by butterflies and nightingales' voices. When he sinks his magic wand to where the powers of the masses in the orchestra and chorus lend him their strength, we shall find still more wonderful glances into the secrets of the spirit-world in store for us. May the highest genius strengthen him, as there is a prospect that it will, since there dwells within him another kind of genius, that, namely, of modesty.

His associates greet him on his first passage through the world, where, perhaps, wounds, but, also, laurels and palms await him; we welcome him as a strong champion. At every period there exists a secret league of kindred spirits. Link yourselves together in a closer circle, ye that belong to each other, so that the truth of art may shine more and more brightly, spreading everywhere joy and blessings."

This introduction, says the Niederrheinische, was as dangerous as it was brilliant. Schumann's disciples felt inclined to greet with shouts of joy one thus recommended, while the master's adversaries were ready to cry the whole thing down as a humbug. Schumann could do no more for his protégé than induce the firms of Breitkopf and Senff to print the young man's first compositions; his mind was shortly afterwards enveloped in the night of madness. Brahms, therefore, entered alone on his way, and at first received, after playing publicly on the 17th December, 1853, in Leipzig, almost more wounds than laurels. Attacks and haughtily unfavorable opinions were more frequent than acknowledgments of his talent and encouragement; the composer, like the pianist, was sharply criticized, and his career did not answer Schumann's predictions. It was slower and more thorny than the patrons of the clever young man imagined. The damage inflicted by imprudence, in a moment, had to be made good in a long course of years; that which Brahms could not achieve in his first attack, he had to attain by gradual exertion and labor.

Compositions by Brahms appeared in nine parts, at short intervals, after Schumann's recommendation. There were three Pianoforte Sonatas, three books of Songs, a Pianoforte Trio, and a Scherzo and Variations for the same instrument. Opinion, at first obscured by party-zeal, has probably now settled down into the conviction that the Sonatas, of which that in F minor is the most important, are the work of a clever composer, possessing a lively imagination, but who, in the zealous exuberance of youth, is not yet acquainted with the laws of style and form-beauty, which he saucily and wilfully oversteps. His most successful efforts were the Songs, which remind one of Schubert and Schumann, some of which—especially those set to Eichendorff's words—are genuinely poetical. They contain, as do also the songs subsequently published, the qualities which are peculiarly characteristic of Brahms, gentle, fervent, dreamy romanticism and refined poetic feeling. A very good notion of his kind of disposition is afforded also by the Variations on a theme of Schumann's (Op. 9). It has somewhere been correctly observed that Brahms is not a Schumannite, but can only be said to possess a disposition related to that of Schumann, which began by roaring and foam, and must now grow clear.

After his first efforts had not quite come up to the expectations excited, he devoted himself, in Hanover, Düsseldorf, and Hamburg, to serious study, making now and then professional tours. During these he appeared in the capacity of a pianist, and, besides his own productions, played more especially works of Bach, Beethoven and Schumann. But here again he had to contend with fresh difficulties; his playing and taste gave signs of an intellectual disposition; the masses, however, wanted strong impressions, and treated him somewhat coldly. Like his creative faculty, his piano-forte playing appears to have subsequently gained in depth. It is now praised for being soft and delicate, without wanting strength where strength is requisite; it clings with intellectual and warm feeling to the composition performed, and, with artistic dignity, holds itself aloof from all virtuoso-like tinsel.

Since the end of the autumn of 1862, Brahms has resided in Vienna, where, a few months ago, he was appointed, on Stegmayer's death, chorus-master of the Sing-Akademie. For the last few years (about four), he has energetically devoted himself to two of the most important departments of his art—namely, chamber music and orchestral composition; thus proving that it is his ambition to shine in the highest class of composition. He has written a Serenade for grand orchestra, in D major (Op. 11), and another for a small orchestra, viols, basses and wind (Op. 16); for chorus, "Marienlieder," Songs with harp and horns, a Funeral Song, and an "Ave Maria." Among his recent pianoforte productions, some Variations on a theme by Handel are distinguished by rich, smooth, and artistic work.

Some critics are disposed to expect from him something great in the way of chamber music. Two Quartets for pianoforte, violin, viol, and violoncello (G minor and A major, Op. 25 and 26), as well as the Sestet, published somewhat previously, for two violins, two viols, and two violoncellos, are mentioned as those of his compositions which are best worked out. A Viennese critic says of Brahms: "Artistic worth, and deep, though at the same time unpretentious, earnestness, such are the qualities which cause him to tower above the ordinary standard. For him is art still a sacred mission: may it ever remain so!"

The compositions of Brahms already published (according to the Niederrheinische Musik-Zeitung) are:

Op. 1. Sonata for Pianoforte (C). 2. Sonata for Pianoforte (F sharp minor). 3. Songs. 4. Scherzo for Piano (E flat minor). 5. Sonata (F minor). 6 and 7. Songs. 8. Trio. 9. Variations for Pianoforte on a Theme by Schumann. 10. Ballads. 11. Serenade for grand orchestra. 12. "Ave Maria," for female chorus. 13. Funeral Song for mixed chorus. 14. Songs. 15. Concerto for Piano. 16. Serenade for small orchestra. 17. Songs for female chorus, with a harp and horns. 18. Sestet for stringed instruments. 19. Songs. 20. Duets. 21. Variations for Pianoforte. 22. "Marienlieder" for chorus. 23. Four-handed Variations for Piano. 24. Variations and Fugue for Pianoforte after Handel. 25 and 26. Pianoforte Quartets (G minor and A major.)

Music Abroad.

Germany.

LEIPZIG. A recent number of the Signale sums up the performances for the past season of the famous subscription concerts at the Gewandhaus—of which there are given twenty every year. As we have just been making the same sort of summary of our orchestral doings here in Boston, it may be interesting to compare our humbler opportunities with those of the famous seat of Mendelssohn's immediate influence. We translate as follows.

"In the past season of Gewandhaus concerts, including those for the benefit of the Orchestra-pension fund, the following works were brought to hearing:

"a) Symphonies: Seven by Beethoven (Nos. 2, 3, 4, 5, 7, 8 and 9). Two by Haydn (D and B flat). Two by Mendelssohn (A major and A minor). Two by Schumann (B flat major and D minor). Two by Schubert (C major, and another in C orchestrated by Joachim from his Duo, op. 140). One each by C. P. E. Bach (D major), Gade (D), Jägersohn (A), Reinecke (A), Spohr (C minor), Volkmann (D minor).

"b) Overtures: Three by Beethoven (Leonore No. 3, Fidelio and Op. 124). Three by Cherubini (Anacreon, Les Abencerrages, and Medea). Two by Weber (Euryanthe and Oberon). Two by Schumann (Genoveva and Manfred). Two by Mendelssohn (Hebrides, and Meeresstille, &c.). One each by Gluck (Iphigenie), Méhul (La Chasse du jeune Henri), Rietz (A major), Reinecke (Dame Kobold), Wagner (Lohengrin), Burgmüller (Dionys).

"c) Other forms of orchestral composition: Concerto for string instruments (G major) by J. S. Bach. Suite (No. 2) by F. Lachner. Overture, Scherzo and Finale by Schumann. Notturmo for brass and Janissary music, by Spohr.

"d) Larger works. Music to Egmont, by Beethoven. Kampf und Sieg (Battle and Victory), by Weber. Lorelei, by Hiller. Cantata "Freue dich, erlöste Schaar," by Bach. "Ode to St. Cecilia," by Handel. "New Year's Song," by Schumann. Psalm, by Bargiel.

"e) Smaller chorus pieces: "The Tempest," by Haydn. "Die Nixe," by Rubinstein. "Song of Heloise and nuns at the grave of Abelard," by Hiller. "Zigeunerleben" (Gipsy life), by Schumann.

"f) Airs: Four by Mozart. Four by Handel. Two by Haydn. One each by Lulli, Gluck, Weber, Rossi, Benedict, Auber, Boieldieu, Beethoven, Spohr, Rossini, Bellini, Mendelssohn, Meyerbeer, Graun.

"g) Instrumental solo pieces: for Piano, for Violin, for Violoncello, for Flute, for Harp, some with, some without accompaniment, by Bach, Beethoven, Mozart, Mendelssohn, Chopin, Schumann, Weber, Ernst, Viotti, Vieuxtemps, Tartini, Molique, Lübeck, Servais, Brassin, Parish-Alvars, Paganini, Demersseman and Reinecke.

"As Instrumental Solo-ists there have appeared Piano-forte: Frau von Bronsart, Frau Dr. Clara Schumann, Fräulein A. von Weisz, Fräulein Böhme, and Messrs. Brassin, and Capellmeisters Reinecke and Treiber.—Violin: Herren Concertmeisters David and Dreyse, Heermann, Auer, Wilhelmi, Lauterbach and Joachim.—Violoncello: Herr Lübeck.—Flute: M. de Broje.—Harp: Frl. Heermann.

"The following appeared as solo-vocalists: Frau Flinsch (née Orvil), Mme. Viardot-Garcia, Frau von Milde, and Mlle. Parepa, Decker, Orgeni, Metz-dorff, Klein, Bettelheim, Lessiak and Narz; and Herren Wiedemann, Weckwitz, Stockhausen, Dr. Gunz, Rudolph, Schild and Sabbath.

"The composers were represented as follows: Beethoven 15 times; Schumann 10 times; Mozart 8 times; Mendelssohn 7 times; Spohr 6 times; Haydn, Weber, Handel and Bach, each 5 times; Chopin and Schubert each 4 times; Cherubini, Brassin and Reinecke, each 3 times; Hiller, Vieuxtemps and Gluck, each twice; and the following once each, viz: C. P. E. Bach, Viotti, Benedict, Lübeck, Auber, Servais, Catel, Parish-Alvars, Volkmann, Jadasohn, Boieldieu, Paganini, Wüllner, Bargiel, Gade, Molique, Lachner, Raff, Rossini, Rietz, Mehul, Joachim, Bellini, Ernst, R. Kreutzer, Meyerbeer, Lauterbach, Norbert Burgmüller, Lulli, Wagner, Tartini, Rubinstein, Demersseman, Graun and Rossi.

"Twenty-four of the above-named works were new to the Gewandhaus public."

AIX-LA-CHAPELLE.—The 41st Niederrheinisch Musical Festival at Aix-la-Chapelle, at Whitsuntide, seems to have been a great success. Dr. Rietz, of Dresden, conducted, and Herr Pfund, of Leipsic, presided at the drums. With such consummate masters at each end, the orchestra could not fail to go well. Lachner's second suite was warmly applauded, as it well deserved. Handel's Belshazzar, Bach's Magnificat, Mendelssohn's Psalms CXIV., extracts from Gluck's "Iphigenia," and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, formed the other great pieces. Joachim was solo violin, and of course carried away his honors. Frau Dustmann and Dr. Gunz shared the vocal honors. The choral singing was much praised. The chorus and band, some 580 strong, were reinforced from Holland and Belgium. I wonder whether Charlemagne, if he were to walk out of his grave in the Dom, would again say that "the German instrumentalists were superb, but that their singers were harsh and coarse." On the Rhine I believe it is better, but in North Germany the verdict still applies.—Orchestra.

BERLIN.—Meyerbeer's funeral must have been a more impressive, if not a more pompous, spectacle here than that which accompanied the departure of his remains from Paris. The Musical World (London) furnishes a description, chiefly from a Berlin paper.

The body arrived here on Saturday, the 7th May, about eight o'clock in the morning. It was received by a small number of relatives and intimate friends, and conveyed to Meyerbeer's former residence, No. 6, Pariser Platz. The burial took place on Monday at twelve o'clock. A large number of the most distinguished and eminent individuals in Berlin assembled at an early hour in the house of mourning, while a countless multitude stationed themselves in the square outside.

In the middle of a large room hung round with black, and lighted by innumerable wax tapers, the coffin reposed upon a catafalco encircled with plants of every description. It was decorated, moreover, with wreaths and flowers presented by Her Majesty the Queen of Prussia, and the Princesses of the Royal Family. At the foot was a laurel wreath on a white cushion, a tribute from the members of the Royal Orchestra at Dresden.

At twelve o'clock, Dr. Joël, the Rabbi of Breslau, made his appearance. The relatives of the deceased Master stood around the coffin, the three daughters and the son-in-law on one side; the two nephews and the remaining branches of the family upon the other. The funeral ceremony commenced with a chorus originally written by Meyerbeer for male and female voices, but now arranged by Herr Radecke as a four-part chorus for male voices alone. Dr. Joël then addressed the assembly.

The speech produced a profound impression. A short song or hymn brought the ceremony to a termination. The coffin was carried down stairs, and the procession formed in the following order: first came Herr Wieprecht, Bandmaster-general of the Prussian armies, with the Bandmasters at the head of all the artillery and cavalry bands in Berlin. The Bandmasters had crape-covered bâtons, and the musicians crape-covered instruments. In the absence of Herr von Hülsen, Intendant-General of the Theatres Royal, who was unavoidably prevented, by his official duties, from being in Berlin on the day of the funeral, Herr Taubert, one of the Capellmeisters of the Royal Orchestra, followed with the laurel wreath upon a cushion. Then came Herr Heuser, chancery-councillor ("Kanzleirath"); Herr Düringer; Herr Dorn, Capellmeister; Herr Radecke, musical-director; and Herr Ries, the well-known leader, with Meyerbeer's orders. The hearse was decorated with palms, while the twelve youngest members of the Royal Orchestra, bearing palm-branches in their hands, walked beside it. Immediately behind it came the mourners: the Baron von Korf; Herren Georges and Jules Meyerbeer, followed by the members of the Royal Orchestra; the Deputations from the theatres; the managers of the theatres not supported by the State, as well as of theatres in the Prussian provinces, and other countries of Germany. Among them was M. Emile Perrin, manager of the Grand Opera in Paris. Then came a deputation from the Ton-künstlerverein, and a great number of the friends and admirers of the deceased, who entertain a no less profound respect for his talent, though they may not be publicly known as members of the aristocratic or the professional world. The procession was closed by a long string of carriages, at the head of which were the state-carriages of the King, the Queen, and all the members of the Royal Family. The bands were divided into two parties, performing, in turn, Beethoven's Funeral March, from the A flat major sonata: Herr Wieprecht's "Trauerparade," and a chorale. The procession moved along, accompanied by a countless multitude, under the Linden—the Boulevards of Berlin, as they may be called. Just before it reached the Operahouse, an immense black flag was displayed from the roof of that edifice, and, at the same moment, the male chorus-singers belonging to the establishment, and stationed under the portico, commenced singing the chorale "Was Gott thut, das ist wohlgethan!" ("That which the Lord does is well done!") I was stationed close to the Operahouse at this part of the proceedings, and can assure you that the effect produced by the solemn strains of the chorale, wafted on the warm, joyous air of spring, from the theatre for which Meyerbeer had done so much, was one which will not easily be forgotten by any person present on the occasion. It was one of those moments which make their mark in a man's life. As the procession passed, the singers joined it, and accompanied it by the way of the Kastanienwald, the Friedrichsbrücke, the New Promenade, the Rosenthaler Strasse, and the Schönhauser Strasse to the Jewish cemetery before the Schönhauser Gate. The entrance to the cemetery was hung with black, as was also the small chapel into which the body was borne. The chorus singers of the Opera sang B. A. Weber's "Rasch tritt der Tod den Menschen an." Dr. Joël offered up a prayer, and the coffin was lowered into the family vault, and laid beside the coffin of Meyerbeer's mother, who had been buried there several years previously.

The famous tenor of Hanover, Niemann, has been singing in Berlin. One of the correspondents says of him:

Ten years ago Albert Niemann, Royal Hanoverian Chamber-singer, otherwise and presently successful tenor at the Court opera of Berlin, began his career at the same point on which he now stands. About ten years ago he sang in "Norma." There, however, the resemblance between the Niemann of 1854 and 1864 ends; for in an artistic sense there is no similarity at all. At that time his voice was harsh and unbending, and his dramatic ability at zero; at this time he has achieved one of the most decided successes of late years. The tenorial blossom of little promise developed in Stettin into rich fruit, and Hanover engaged Niemann for a spell. At the Hanoverian Court he made rapid progress, and now he stands proudly in Berlin, and "looks across the roaring and the wreaths," while the curtain falls on "Tannhäuser" and "Cortez." As these two rôles have shown us the star in his capacity as a dramatic singer, as true heroic tenor, his next part—that of Joseph in Mehul's opera—will declare how far Herr Niemann can please as lyrical singer, in those passages where strong effects are wanting, and whether he can handle the equable, broad cantilena with equal ability as the recitative.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JULY 9, 1864.

Review of the Season in Boston.

We have already shown what good things we have had in the way of Orchestral music and of Oratorios, Cantatas and the like. Look now at the concerts of

III. CHAMBER MUSIC. Our opportunities in this kind have been due entirely to two sets of artists. The Mendelssohn Quintette Club (their fifteenth season), in five concerts, not quite so many as usual, have furnished all the quartet and quintet playing we have had; while both their concerts and those of Messrs. Kreissmann, Leonhard and Eichberg, four in number, have been rich, particularly the latter, with Trios, Sonatas, and choice song selections. Mr. Dresel's piano-forte feasts, of Beethoven, Chopin, Schumann, Bach, &c., have been sadly missed; nor have there been any piano concerts, that we can remember, except those of Gottschalk, which do not come under the head of either classical or chamber music. The works performed, as nearly as we can recollect them, have been these:

a) QUINTETS (strings): Mozart, No. 1, in C minor.—Spohr, op. 69.—Onslow, in C, No. 19.—Gade, in E minor, op. 8.

b) QUARTETS (strings): Beethoven, in F, op. 59, No. 1; in E flat, No. 12.—Schubert, in D minor (variations).—Mendelssohn, in E minor, op. 44; in B minor (with piano, Mr. Lang).—Schumann, in F, op. 41, No. 1.—A much shorter list than usual.

c) TRIOS (piano, violin and 'cello): Beethoven, op. 11, with variations on an Italian air, (Leonhard, Eichberg and Mollenhauer).—Schubert, in E flat, op. 100 (Leonhard, Eichberg and Fries); in B flat, op. 99 (Leonhard, Eichberg and Mollenhauer).—Schumann, in F, op. 80 (Mr. Daum and M. Quintette Club).—Also Mozart, for piano, clarinet and viola (Daum, Ryan and —).

d) SONATAS: Beethoven, in G, op. 30, piano and violin (Leonhard and Eichberg); in G, op. 96 (the same); op. 30, No. 1 (the same); in A, op. 69, piano and 'cello (J. C. D. Parker and W. Fries).—Mendelssohn, in B flat, piano and 'cello, (Carl Mayer and Fries).—Dussek, "Retour à Paris," piano, (Parker).—Schumann, piano and violin, op. 105, (Leonhard and Eichberg); op. 121, (the same).—Corelli, violin, No. 6 in A, op. 5 (Eichberg).—Tartini, Siciliano from No. 7 (Eichberg).

e) MISCELLANEOUS. Beethoven; parts of Septet (M. Quintet Cl.); Romanza in F, violin (Eichberg).—Bach: Siciliano in G minor, violin and piano, (Eichberg and Leonhard); Chaconne (Eichberg).—Schumann: Novelle, piano, (Leonhard).—Chopin: Nocturne, op. 62, No. 1, (Do.); Scherzo, C sharp minor, op. 39 (Do.).—Molique: Fandango, violin (Schultze).—Henselt: Liebeslied, piano, (Daum).—Mendelssohn: Lieder ohne Worte (Do); Capriccio, op. 33, No. 2, (Leonhard); Andante from Violin Concerto, (Meisel and Quintet Club).—Reissiger; clarinet Adagio (Ryan).—Schulhoff: Agitato in A minor, op. 15, piano, (Lang).—Stephen Heller: "Slumber Song," D flat, op. 8 (Lang); Carl Mayer: Tema con Variazioni, piano, (C. Mayer).

Thus we have less than the usual variety and quantity of instrumental chamber music; and yet the inventory is rich enough to tantalize some readers in larger, but musically less favored cities of this wide land. What we have listened to has been in the main so good, that we forgot to miss what we had not. Let us not forget, too, that one of those sets of concerts has been streaked with most poetic veins of song,—many of the choicest Lieder of Robert Franz, Schubert, Schumann, and one at least of the noble, sacred arias of Bach, with a better artist than we know how to describe to our distant readers for an interpreter.

And now we come to

IV. ORGAN MUSIC. We have to limit our account to the performances on the Great Organ of the Boston Music Hall. The Organ was opened on the 2nd of November last, and in the eight months from that date to the end of June it has scarcely been silent; not a week has passed without from one to three or four public performances, either organ concerts, or concerts in which the Organ has borne a part. It has been played at various times by Messrs. John K. Paine, B. J. Lang, W. Eugene Thayer, S. P. Tuckerman, J. H. Willcox, J. C. D. Parker, G. E. Whiting, and Mrs. Frohock, of this city, Mr. G. W. Morgan, of New York, and the three brothers Carter, from Canada. Several of the above have been drawn by the Great Organ to this city as their residence; and the stimulus which the magnificent opportunity of such an instrument, unsurpassed in the world, has given to our organists, young men most of them, appears not only in their technical mastery of its resources, their activity in the imitating or thinking out of all sorts of effects, combinations of stops, &c., but most of all in the following list of pieces that have been performed:

a) Organ Compositions proper:

BACH: Toccata in F (8 times—Paine 4, Thayer 2, H. Carter and Mrs. Frohock, 1 each).
Toccata and Fugue in D minor (Thayer 2, Paine 1).
Passacaglia, C minor, (4 times, Paine).
Prelude and Fugue, A minor, (Paine 2).
Fugue G minor (Thayer, Mrs. Frohock, H. Carter 3).
Smaller Fugue, G minor (Thayer 3).
Prel. & Fugue, G (Paine).
" " " E minor, (Thayer, Whiting).
" " " F minor, (Whiting).
Fugue in D, (Morgan 2).
" " " "St. Ann's," (Morgan 2, Tuckerman),
Prelude in B minor, (Thayer 2).
Fugue, G major, (Mrs. Frohock).
Prel. and Fugue, C, (Lang 4).
Trio Sonata, E flat, (Paine 2).
" " " "G. Vivace from, (Paine 2).
Choral Vorspiel: "Christ unser Herr" (Paine 2).
" " " "Am Wasserflüssen Babylons" (Do.)
" " " "Schmücke dich" (Do).
" " " "For 2 manuals and 2 pedals (Do).
Fantasia in G, grave, (Lang 2).
Pastorale (Paine).
Concerto No. 1, G, (Lang 3).
MENDELSSOHN: Sonata, No. 3, A, (Lang 4, Thayer).
Sonata, No. 4, B flat (Paine 2, G. Carter 1).
" No. 2, C, (Parker 2, Whiting).
" No. 1, F minor, (Mrs. Frohock, Whiting, Morgan).
" No. 5, D, (Thayer).
" No. 6, (Do. 2).
Pastorale and Fugue, op. 37 (Do.)
THIEL: Fantasia, A minor (Paine).
Concert-piece, C minor (Do. 2).

HESS: Introd. and Fugue, D, (Morgan).
Prelude, C minor, (Tuckerman 2).
Concert Variations (Lang 2).
RINK: FUGUE on "B, A, C, H," (Willcox), Flute Concerto (Lang 6, Mrs. Frohock 2).
SCHUMANN: Fugue on "B, A, C, H," (Lang 3).
KULLAK: Pastorale (Morgan, Willcox 2).
FREYER: Concert Fantasia (Mrs. Frohock 2).
SCHELLENBERG: Pedal Toccata, A minor (Do. 2).
WELT: Offertoire, G, (Willcox 5, Mrs. Frohock, Tuckerman, G. Carter).
" C, (Willcox, Tuckerman 2).
" F, (Bancroft, Tuckerman 2).
" Op. 39 (Tuckerman 2).
" G minor (Thayer 2).
Marche Guerrière (Do. 3).
Cantabile, Largo et Prière (Do.)
Andante for Vox Humana (Whiting 2)
BATTISTE: Offertoire, dedicated to G. W. Morgan, (Morgan).
" for Christmas (Thayer).
" for Vox Humana (Do. 3)
" March, (Do. 3).
" —? (Do. 3).
" for Corno Bassetto (Do. 3).
" (Parker 2).
" "St. Cecile" (Mrs. Frohock 2).
" "St. Jour de Paques, (Do.)
" B minor (Willcox).
" D minor (Do.)
" C minor (Do.)
" for soft Organ (Do.)

Fantasia, A flat, (Do.)
"Storm" Fantasia (Thayer).
Andante and March (Parker).
BEST: Fantasia, E flat, op. 38 (Whiting).
Pastorale in G, (Do.)
SECHTER: Prelude (Tuckerman).
J. K. PAINE: Fantasia Sonata, D minor (Paine 2).
Fantasia and Fugue, E minor.
Offertoire.
Fantasia on "Portuguese Hymn."
Reverie: "Song of the silent land" (twice).
Variations on "Old Hundred."
" " " "Austrian Hymn."
" (with fugue) on "Star-spangled banner."
W. E. THAYER: Marche Triomphale (twice).
Offertoire for Vox Humana (7 times).
" for Bassoon.
Variations: "Star-spangled Banner" (5 times).
" " " "God save the Queen."
Canzonetta from 2nd Sonata.
Turkish March, from Do.
G. WHITING: Postludium.
Concert Fantasia, E minor.

b) ARRANGEMENTS FROM ORATORIOS, &c.
HANDEL: Trumpet Chorus, Samson (7 times).
Minnet and Chorus, Saul.
"Sing unto God," Samson.
Chor. "How excellent," Saul.
Coronation Anthem.
Chor. "See the conquering hero comes."
" " " "Let none despair," Hercules.
" " " "He sent a thick darkness," Israel in Egypt.
" " " "He led them forth," Do.
" " " "He led them thro' the deep."
" " " "But the waters overwhelmed," Do.
" " " "Hallelujah," Messiah (3 times).
" " " "Unto him a child is born," &c., Do.
Pastoral Symphony, Do, (7).
Dead March, Saul, (7).
Overture, Samson, (4).
Airs from Messiah, Acis and Galatea, &c.
BACH: Chorale: "Jesus, king of glory."
HAYDN: Gloria, 15th Mass.
Gratias, do.
Incarnatus and Et Vitam, do.
Bacchanal chorus from "Seasons."
Introduction to Creation.
Chor: "Heavens are telling," Do.
MOZART: Gloria, 2nd Mass.
Benedictus and Gloria, 12th Mass, (2).
"Exaudi nos."

BEETHOVEN: Hallelujah Chorus (3).
PALESTRINA: Lamentatio in Parascève.
Kyrie and Sanctus (2).
PURCELL: From Anthem, "O give thanks."
MENDELSSOHN: Chor. "Be not afraid," Elijah.
Angel Trio, (Do.)
Rain chorus, (Do.)
NEUKOMM: Introd. to David.
First Two "Commandments."
GRAUN: Chorus from Tot Jesu.
WEBER: Benedictus, Mass in G.
DR. CROFT: Chorus: "Cry aloud."
ROSSINI: Parts of Stabat Mater.
Prayer from "Moses in Egypt."

c) ARRANGEMENTS FROM ORCHESTRAL WORKS:
Overture to Ernani (Lang 4).
" " Freyshutz (Do. 5, Morgan).
" " "Midsummer Night's Dream," (Lang. 3).
" " Mendelssohn's in C for Military band, (H. Carter).
" " William Tell, (Morgan 3).
" " Zauberflöte (Do.)
" " "Men of Prometheus," (Do).
" " Oberon (Do).
" " Le Serment (Thayer).
Larghetto, Beethoven's 2nd Symphony (Morgan 2, Carter 2, Thayer).
Andante, 5th. (Morgan, Thayer, 2, Whiting).
March, 5th Symph. (Thayer 2).
Romanza from Haydn's Symp. "La reine de France."
Symphony from "Hymn of Praise."
Mendelssohn. (Lang, 6).

To this add an indefinite list of airs from Mozart, Gluck, Mendelssohn, &c.; transcriptions of piano pieces, songs without words, movements from string quartets, marches, bits from operas, even Trovatore and Tannhäuser (1), improvisations in the "free style," very free, &c. But we have enumerated enough to show that, if, on the one hand, the selections have been more miscellaneous and "popular" than befits the dignity of a grand Organ, still this Organ has already been the means of making our ears and our souls familiar with more of the great organ works of Sebastian Bach than were ever heard before during the whole history of music in Boston,—more indeed than we had any reason to hope to hear for many years to come. It has given us, too, all the Organ Sonatas of Mendelssohn. These, especially the Bach works, have not been the most "popular" of the selections, but their audience has steadily increased, and their beauty and sublimity and mystery have sunk deep into many musical souls. Not a few hearers have already outlived their preference for pretty things on fancy stops; and the ear, getting gradually accustomed to the great voluminous harmony of the full organ, learns to feel that it is not noise, not mere monotony, but to glory in it and to crave it more and more; and this was the chief obstacle at first to the enjoyment and appreciation of the great Fugues, Toccatas, Passacaglia, &c., of Bach.

What we may now reasonably ask is that some of the semi-weekly concerts, which bid fair to last through the summer, may be strictly Organ-like and classical, consisting wholly or mainly of the works of Bach. We have plenty of the so-called popular or mixed kind. The audiences are generally small, as they naturally would be without some special excitement, and at this season of the year. Is it not probable that quite or nearly as many people would resort to the Music Hall now and then, who have an especial desire to learn more of Bach, if they could be assured of a programme made for them? Now, all the programmes are for the other class; nor is the shining bait snapped at by so many fishes, that there would be much risk in an occasional experiment with another kind. It is noticeable that Mr. Paine, the disciple par excellence of Bach among us, has for some months been called to the Organ far more seldom than any of the others, for some time indeed not at all. Whether the indisposition be on his part or on that of the Directors we cannot say; but is not such an Organ naturally the sphere for such an organist?

FARMINGTON, CONN.—Mr. Carl Klauser (in Miss S. Porter's school for young ladies) continues his zealous efforts to make his pupils understand and love the highest kind of music, and with good success. The annual summer visit of William Mason and his Quartet party (Messrs. Thomas, Mosenthal, Matzka and Bergner), of New York, delighted them last week, and gave them them the rare privilege of listening to a purely classical programme of chamber music, treasures new and old, to wit: Trio (piano) in C minor, op. 1, Beethoven; Adagio from string Quartet in E, op. 43, Spohr; Scherzo from string Quartet in E flat, Cherubini; Piano Sonata (post-humous) in C minor, Schubert; string Quartet in A, op. 41, Schumann.—Part II. Trio (piano) in B flat, op. 99, Schubert; Andante, quasi Variazioni, from Quartet in F, op. 41, Schumann; Piano Sonata in C minor, op. 111, (the last of the Sonatas), Beethoven; string Quartet in E flat, op. 12, Mendelssohn. A programme this for the innermost circles of artists and their friends; we do not often hear one so choice even at "the hub," and it will be a long time, we fear, before our friends of the Mendelssohn Quintette Club will venture to announce such in their visits to the "sub-hubs."

NEW YORK. Of the musical drouth, the plans of opera managers, &c., the Pioneer condenses the reports and on this as follows:

The month of June in the metropolis has been almost totally devoid of musical demonstrations. Only two concerts of any importance have been given—one at the Academy of Music on the evening of the 14th, and another at Niblo's Saloon on the following night. At the former, the united choirs of the Methodist Episcopal churches, comprising nearly three hundred vocal and instrumental performers, gave a number of choruses from the leading oratorios, interspersed with solos and duets, all for the benefit of a Sunday-school Union; and at the latter, tendered as a benefit to the widow of Lieutenant Boudinot, killed during the battles of the Wilderness, Madame de Lussan, Morensi the contralto, Morelli the baritone, and other artists volunteered their services. Lieutenant Boudinot was before the war a musician, and connected with the Academy of Music in this city.

An opera company has been formed by Max Strakosch, to give operas like "Don Pasquale" and "Il Barbiere"—works which do not necessitate a chorus—in the Northern States and Canadas. The troupe has an American prima donna in Adelaide Phillips, while Brignoli is the tenor, Susini the basso, and Mancusi the baritone. The company began operations at Portland, but were not successful there, the people of that city apparently preferring negro minstrelsy. Thence they went to Quebec and Montreal.

Max Maretzek is about to try his fortunes with the Emperor Maximilian in Mexico, for which city he has engaged in Europe an entirely new company of singers, and intends giving opera with them under imperial patronage. He will return to New York during next winter. In the meantime, Mazzoleni, Biachi, and Sulzer will leave for Mexico.

Grau's troupe has disbanded, and the fragmentary singers are in New York and vicinity awaiting engagements.

Maretzek is to produce next season, in the place of Miss Sulzer, a new contralto, a resident of New York who has never yet appeared on the stage. She is singing at present in the choir of a Roman Catholic church in this city, and will make her operatic debut as the Gipsy in "Trovatore."

The organist of Trinity Church, New York—Mr. Henry S. Cutler—intends in October next to hold at Trinity Church a musical festival, not unlike those held at the principal cathedrals of England. The singers will be all men and boys, and will include all the boy choirs of New York and vicinity, the choir of the Church of the Advent in Boston coming from that city to participate. These choirs will give specimens of the best choral music, and, in addition, Mr. Simpson, Mr. J. R. Thomas, and other leading professional vocalists will be engaged to sing solos.

PHILADELPHIA. Our correspondent (June 30) sends a couple of jottings:

"Mr. Leyboldt has published the second volume of MENDELSSOHN'S LETTERS, as translated by Lady Wallace. The reprint is in the same dress as the first volume published two years ago, and is without the portrait of Mendelssohn that accompanies the London edition. Mr. L. seems determined to furnish the American public with many of the recent valuable contributions to the literature of music, and has thus far exercised good judgment in his selections. The first series of Mendelssohn's letters has already passed through numerous editions, and, as the second series is even more interesting, in a musical sense, than the first, I have no doubt that Mr. Leyboldt's enterprise will meet its just reward.

"In a recent letter in which I referred to the singing of Mr. KREISSMANN, while in our midst, I omitted to mention a delightful matinee given by Mr. K. and Mr. Wolfsohn at the rooms of Messrs. Blasius. Mr. Kreissmann also assisted at a concert given in aid of the Sanitary Commission, and contributed a few of his songs at one of Professor Roese's interesting entertainments."

Who has forgotten MISKA HAUSER, the violinist, who gave concerts here with Jaell in the "Germania" days? He has had travelling adventures and has written a book, of which a German correspondent of the Orchestra makes note as follows:

Miska Hauser, eminent violinist, whose success was marked when he recently gave a series of twenty-three concerts in Kroll's Theatre, Berlin, is celebrated not only as violinist, but as traveller. Herr Hauser has been round the world, and either took ten years to do it, or else kept on going round and round the world for ten years: it is immaterial which. Suffice it, a two-volume book of travels, and the Neue Berliner Musikzeitung spares us the universal Weberisch or Mendelssohnisch biographical paper for one week, and devotes a feuilleton to Hauser. From which it appears he was born in '22 at Pressburg, Hungary; studied in Vienna; played at 13 in a Hofconcert before a K.K. audience—audience being the Kaiserin herself; went on an eight years' journey through Europe, even to the confines of Siberia, which appears to be a more musical country than people imagine. Next, coming back to Vienna in eighteen-forty-eight, found that city in an eighteen-forty-eightish condition generally, and K.K. notabilities at a discount. Whereupon, fearing that Orpheus, though he moved rocks and stones with his violin, might not be able to quiet rocks and stones when they were being pitched about by other people who hated Cosmos, the young musician came to England, where Kaisers and revolutions were not. Thereupon Ullmann seized him (the star called Carlotta being then merely nebulous), and introduced him to the New World. Here Miska Hauser catches the fever, and the Berliner Neue Musikzeitung gets on stilts. "Malicious fevers, which there, among forests full of buds and odours, like spiteful demons waylay the stranger, shorten his stay on that wonder-island," wonder-island being Havanna, whence Hauser left for New York, came out with Jenny Lind, awakened a sensation, and became the rage. History then mentions many names of places which he visited, and is full of San Francisco (where he had a row on account of Lola Montes), Lima (where passionate Creoles languished for him), Santiago (where a nice set of fanatics excited the mob against him, on the charge that his violin was charmed by the devil), Valparaiso, shipwreck, and Otaheite. Here he stayed, and composed several pieces for Queen Pomare. The Neue Musikzeitung has an amusing account of him at the tattooed court. He is commanded to play, and commences with a "prelude." Otaheite looks coldly on. Barefooted royalty is not to be touched with art, and tattooed nobility is indifferent even to fifths. So Hauser breaks out—with the fear of fiasco strongly before his eyes—in the "Carneval," and this works: all Otaheite is ravished, which may account for the present immortality of that everlasting air. From Otaheite Miska Hauser went to Australia, was presented with the freedom of Sydney, and received a vote of thanks from Parliament for his playing—that is to say, to charitable ends. Thence we have mention of Cairo, Alexandria, Turkey, the Sultan (the Lord of Men beat time while the Giaour played), Trieste, Milan, Turin, France, Germany, trills, staccatos, and immortal renown; all of which, in fuller detail than it can be given here, is it not written in the chronicles of the Neue Musikzeitung of Berlin?

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

The Stripes and Stars. A. B. Hutchinson. 30

Very Hutchinson-y, clear, sharp and spirited, with good patriotic words.

Impatience. (Ungeduld). Op. 3. Fr. Curshman. 30

Most singers would place this among the prettiest of the German ballads. The frequently recurring words, "Thine is my heart" are brought in, in connection with many well imagined poetical figures. Those hearing it once, will have "impatience," to hear it the second time.

Ye murmuring winds that o'er the woodland stray.

J. C. Johnson. 30

The melody is that of a beautiful French song. The words attempt to interpret the language of the summer winds, that "whisper" through the soft leaved pines, "rush" past those of stiffer foliage, and "roar" through the knarled oaks. The subject is novel, and the music of a high order.

Evergreen mountains of life. Song.

Dr. Lighthill. 30

A sweet, pure religious song, breathing the fresh air of the mountains of life. A valuable addition to the list of sacred songs.

Author Lloyd's medley, or Song of many Songs. 30

A new stringing together of song titles in amusing combinations. While the wit in these medleys is not very deep, they are good things to sing to entertain a merry company.

Crackman's song in "Rosedale." E. D. M. 30

Interesting to those who have heard the play, which has had, and perhaps is still having a "great run."

Instrumental Music.

The Captain. Transcribed for the piano.

J. W. Turner. 60

Agreeable variations of the popular air. They are of easy, medium difficulty, and excellent for learners.

Faust Polka. F. Wallerstein. 75

In Wallerstein's brilliant style.

Lauterbach waltz. H. Kleber. 30

Sultan's grand march. J. Petri. 30

Two good compositions, not difficult, and of the very useful class so much needed by teachers of music for their young pupils.

Dreams of the forest. Song without words.

Sidney Smith. 50

Of medium difficulty, and fine for practice.

Religious meditation for the Piano and Violin, (or Organ).

J. Eichberg. 30

This, being for two instruments, cannot be perfectly described before hearing it. But the composer's well known ability and taste, assure us of a piece of sterling merit.

Addio, (adieu). Nocturne. Robt. Sipp. 40

Shadowy and soothing in character.

Books.

HAYDN'S 8th MASS. IN B FLAT. Cloth, 80 cts.

Paper, 60 cts.

This is one of the shortest of the Masses, and of the same general character as the others. The Benedictus is in the form of a Treble solo, and with its graceful melody contrasts well with the harmonic effects of the choruses. The Mass will be found to be rather easy, and not at all beyond the reach of choirs.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 608.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JULY 23, 1864.

VOL. XXIV. No. 9.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Half a dozen of Beethoven's Contemporaries.

II. ANTONIO SALIERI.

(Continued from page 206.)

While enjoying the success of his "Grotto of Trofonius," Salieri had another cause of high satisfaction in the reception which the printed score of "Les Danaïdes" met with from the musical world, and its renewed success in Paris. C. F. Cramer wrote him, from Kiel, that "he recognized throughout the score the harmonious and feeling composer of the Enchantress Armida, but at the same time one who was able with as rapid as unflinching a flight to rise above his own peculiar style and follow the path of Gluck, as the true and worthy heir of his mantle." Bailli du-Roullet wrote him from Paris, that the Danaïdes had again been put upon the stage, was listened to with delight, and applauded to the echo; that the splendid success of its first course was nothing to the present, and one heard but a universal cry of "What a magnificent Opera!" and, at the same time he besought Salieri to inform Gluck that his "Alceste" roused a higher enthusiasm with each repetition.

When Salieri returned from his first Parisian visit he brought with him, as we have seen, two texts which the Academy of Music had entrusted to him for composition: "Tarare," by Beaumarchais, and "Les Horaces" after Corneille, by Guillard. The former, after careful examination, he sent back to its author, with remarks and request for certain changes. Bailli du-Roullet, in a letter to Salieri at this time, says: "Yesterday I called on Beaumarchais; he has received your two letters, is captivated with them, finds them full of sense and genius, and is fully determined to meet your wishes. He told me that these letters had greatly increased the respect which he feels for you, and strengthened the opinion even, which he already held of your genius and merits." Beaumarchais, having revised his text, sent it back, and Salieri devoted to it and "Les Horaces" the hours, which his duties as first Chapelmaster of the Italian Opera left him free, as he says, in his own notes:

"Con grandissimo piacere, perchè il genere ragionato (il solo veramente rispettabile) a Parigi viene, generalmente parlando, sempre meglio eseguito e più gustato che altrove." ("With the greatest pleasure, because the rational form of music (the only one really respectable), generally speaking, is always better executed and more thoroughly enjoyed in Paris than anywhere else").

Joseph in Vienna enjoyed the light Opera Buffa, and it was cheap. Maria Antoinette enjoyed the grand-spectacle, and her husband spent immense sums upon it. Joseph was economical, Louis profuse. Joseph died amid the universal tears of his people. Louis and his wife lost their heads amidst the universal curses of theirs. At all events that lavishness of expense gave Salieri the opportunity of exerting his talents and genius in a higher field, than Vienna opened to him since the death of Maria Theresa.

"In the spring of 1786," says Mosel, and no means is at hand for determining the date more exactly (which one would be glad to have precisely fixed, because of its bearing upon the "Mozart and Figaro question"), Salieri was invited to bring these two operas as soon as possible to Paris. Obtaining leave of absence from Joseph, he made his preparations for the journey at once. Before his departure he took a tender leave of Gluck, to whom he was mainly indebted for the fame and profit to which he was going; for with all his talents it is very doubtful if, without Gluck's recommendation, he would ever have reached the honors which had already crowned him and were awaiting him in France. Gluck, whose mother tongue was "Czech," or Bohemian, expressed himself with some difficulty in German, and still more so in Italian and French; and this was increased in his last years by the effects of his partial paralytic condition. He was apt to mix the three languages together in his conversation, and his parting words to his favorite protégé ran as follows:

"Ainsi—mon cher ami—lei parte domani per Parigi—Je vous souhaite—di cuore un bon voyage—Sie gehen in eine Stadt, wo man schätzt—die fremden Künstler—e lei si farà onore—ich zweifle nicht," and, embracing him, he added: "ci scriva, mais bien souvent."

(But, my dear friend, you are going away to Paris to-morrow, I wish you—pleasant journey from my heart—you are going to a city where they value—foreign artists—and you will do yourself honor—I have no doubt;" and, embracing him, added: "write to me, and very often.")

Noteworthy is it, adds Mosel, that Salieri has recorded these words,—he who was himself in the habit in conversation of mixing the same three languages in like manner.

The first produced of his two works in Paris was "Les Horaces," which was most favorably received by singers and orchestra at the rehearsal, and at the performance was—damned! As the score (according to Mosel, I know nothing about it) shows so many beauties as to place the work among the finest of its class, for melody, novelty of forms, beauty of the accompaniment, and adaptation to the sentiments of the text, the fall of "Les Horaces et les Curiaces" must have been owing to extraneous circumstances; and a concatenation of odd and unlucky accidents did actually occur sufficient to produce the effect, with the volatile, jest loving Parisian audience. Salieri was advised to entrust the important part of the high priest to a young man of noble person, and a powerful resonant voice, but who had hitherto only sung minor parts. As a preventive against singing false he was in the habit of practising his parts at home at a pianoforte tuned half a tone above the orchestra.

* Whether anything on this point is contained in the Grimm correspondence or in that of Beaumarchais, I have not time to go to the library to examine.

At the rehearsals he had sung exceedingly well; but at the performance, on reaching the recitative, "Le Senat rassemble sous ces voûtes sacrées," which closes the first act, notwithstanding the preceding ritornel of the orchestra, he struck in half a tone too high, as he had used himself to do at home. The act thus far had been a success, but this musical effect had been too much for the audience, and a burst of laughter greeted the singer from all parts of the house. The poor fellow, lost his self-command, and, though he found his pitch, sang the long scene through with an uncertain voice, the result being that the curtain fell upon a cold audience. The effect upon Salieri, who sat with certain friends in a box, (the composer not being allowed in this theatre to conduct his own work) may be imagined. They hoped, however, that the other two acts would be listened to more attentively, and that the opera might end with the applause with which it had in fact begun. During the progress of the second act the parterre became stiller and more attentive. Salieri was again of good courage. The scene of the finale is the field in which the Horatii and the Curiatii are to meet in mortal combat: and upon their appearance, the people, who knew of the friendly relations between the families, in their surprise at seeing them thus opposed to each other, were to shout, "Les Horaces! Les Curiaces!" Salieri had thought it best to have these words delivered without accompaniment and ad libitum. But at the moment one of the chorus singers, whether by mistake or for the sake of the joke, who knows? dwelt upon the syllable "Cu" (queue) in such a manner as to raise a laugh, destroy the illusion, and cause the curtain to fall upon an unsympathizing audience.

The third act passed off without gaining upon the feelings of the audience, and the exhibition of the historical fact of the murder of his sister by the only survivor of the three Horaces, brought out strong marks of disapproval.

Of course all was corrected for the next performance—the high priest sang in tune, the chorist shortened his "Cu," and the sister committed suicide,—but the opera was discredited, and after three or four performances was withdrawn.

"The result of a theatrical performance," says Salieri, commenting upon his ill success in this case, "notwithstanding all the merit, a work may possess, is never to be known beforehand; but, still, it cannot be a matter of indifference to an author, unless he be a presumptuous fool."

Besides the misfortunes, which had attended the first performance of this work, various imperfections in the text had doubtless their effect upon its success; to Salieri and his music it would be unjust to attribute its failure.

Salieri was soon comforted for this piece of ill fortune; and he soon forgot it, except when the Curiaces came to mind as a curious and laughable jest played by chance at his expense. He was more than comforted, he was triumphant, for Beaumarchais' "Tarare," with his music, was an almost unexampled success. I have not been able, out of the authorities at hand, to fix the date of the unsuccessful work; but "Tarare" "was given," says Mosel, "soon after its fall," and the first production of this was on June 8, 1787. This is Poiset's date, as well as that given in Beaumarchais' works. Mosel gives June 7.

That the two works were given with but a very short interval between, is the idea conveyed by Mosel here, but can hardly be reconciled to what has previously been said of the composer's departure from Vienna in the spring of the preceding year. It is a point of little importance except in its bearing upon the discussion of the relations between Salieri and Mozart previously given. Gerber dates "Les Horaces et les Curiaces," 1786. Poiset does not mention it; but his work is only a sketch of Parisian musical history, and his list of operas contains only the successful ones. In this list he gives the following dates of works performed at this time in the Grand Opera:—

1786. August 29. La Toison d'or, text, Desriau; music, Vogel.

1787. February 1. Oedipe à Colone, text, Guillard; music, Sacchini.

1787. June 8. Tarare, text, Beaumarchais; music, Salieri.

There seems to be no room for doubt that Mosel's "soon after" must be taken cum grano, and that "Les Horaces" was produced in the autumn of 1786; else where could the performers have found time for its study and rehearsal? Or may it possibly have even preceded the "Toison d'or?"

"An analysis of the beauties of Tarare," says Mosel, "would fill a book; in general it must be said that the judgment, genius, fire, the never-failing support of the action through the music, the interludes so perfectly depicting every various sentiment of the recitatives, the perfect characterization of the persons of the drama, the truth of expression in all the vocal music, and the joining all these parts into one perfect whole, raises this opera to an enduring model of its class." "Should it strike any one as strange, that in the French opera the number of cavatinas is so large, while that of the airs is so small, let him understand," continues Mosel, "that the French (at least on the grand stage of their National Opera) demand, not a 'concert of which the drama is a pretext,' as the Abbé Amand so happily says, but a musical drama; hence no more music than serves to increase the beauty of the poem, enhance the effect of the acting, and strengthen the impression of the whole; grand airs are permitted only where their introduction will not retard the rapid progress of the action, nor jar with the feeling of the moment, but rather intensify it. Hence they require no vocal virtuosos for the performance of these works, but actors skilled in declamatory song; and mark the difference between the French and Italian opera singers by calling the former Acteurs chantants, the latter Chanteurs."

It must not be forgotten that Mosel wrote forty years ago, and that his remarks would hardly apply to the Grand Opera of Paris since that period.

At the close of the triumphant first performance of Tarare, both poet and composer were called for by the audience. Beaumarchais excused himself on the ground that he was but a dilettant in poetry; but two of the leading singers led Salieri forward to receive the most gratifying proofs of the general satisfaction.

This splendid result determined the directors to revive "Les Horaces," it being the opinion of the best judges that its fall was owing to non-essential and accidental circumstances, which might easily be avoided; and Guillard and Salieri discussed and fixed upon the necessary alterations to be made in the text. But the political state of Paris, as the composer learned it in the coffee-houses and wherever he had opportunity to learn the condition of public opinion, rendered him anxious to be again in the peaceful circle at home; and this desire was stronger than his craving for fame and profit, which a successful reproduction of the unlucky work would certainly have brought him.

He took leave of Paris, therefore, promising the Directors to compose at home and forward to them the new music made necessary by the alterations decided upon. But the Revolution broke out, and this plan broke down. So there was an end to "Les Horaces."

Shortly before leaving Paris, Salieri went out one afternoon from his lodgings in Beaumarchais' house to make some calls, intending to spend the evening in a private concert. The latter being put off, instead of accepting the invitation of a friend to pass the evening with him in some other place, an inexplicable feeling led him to return to his lodgings, where he found his servant on the floor at the point of death, suffocated by the fumes of charcoal. The man's life was thus by merest accident saved. Had not the gentleman who was to have given the concert been taken ill, Henry would have died.

The Duke of Aremburg invited Salieri to visit him at Brussels; whether this invitation was accepted Mosel cannot determine; but that he left Paris before the middle of September is clear from his having received a letter from Beaumarchais, dated the 18th of that month; and other circumstances seem to prove that he was back in Vienna as early as July.

His first work there was the composition of "Le jugement dernier," a cantata, text by Chevalier Roger, for the Société d'Apollon at Paris, which had applied to him for something expressly composed for its concerts. Count d'Ogny—probably the president of the Society—to whom Salieri dedicated the work, caused the story to be circulated before the performance, that it was a joint production of Gluck and Salieri. The object was to stop the mouth of certain critics, who swore by Gluck, and who thus were led to declare sublime, much that they otherwise would have found at the best mediocre. After a distinguished success had crowned the work, the Count published the following "correction" in the Parisian journals:

"A public statement, based upon erroneous information, has been made that the music of the Cantata, Le jugement dernier, is by Gluck and Salieri. It is by Salieri alone. It is no more than just to secure to this skilful composer the fame and merit of having created a work, so beautiful and so judiciously conceived in all its parts. In the subject of this Cantata great difficulties had to be overcome; the greatest was, doubtless, that of introducing the Divine Lawgiver as actually speaking. M. Salieri, however, solved this problem to the extraordinary satisfaction of every auditor. The moment, in which the presence of God in all his majesty was announced, excited a feeling of awe; the music of the righteous and of the damned produced the highest effect; in a word, this work, as original as it is splendid, raises the fame of Salieri to a still higher degree." Then follow praises of Riget, the conductor, of the vocalists and the orchestra.

De Gouve, whether with more politeness or truth, who can now decide? wrote from Paris that this Cantata, in spite of the Italians, who decried it, "had turned the heads of all the world;" that Riget, who conducted, had been so excited by it as to become ill; and that Gossec could not get over his astonishment at the successful manner in which Salieri had made the Saviour speak!

Count d'Ogny wrote in a similar strain and accompanied his warmest thanks with the information, that the Cantata had been twice given in the Concert Olympique and twice in the Concert Spirituelle, each time with the same splendid result; and that he had intended to send him a golden snuff-box, but owing to the trouble of forwarding such presents into foreign lands, he was now on the point of sending him, instead, 600 francs.

Roger, author of the text, wrote him in relation to the production of the work in the Concert Spirituel:

"A subject so imposing as that of the Last Judgment, and a fame like that of the composer of Tarare and the Danaises, awakened in the mind of the public the idea of something astounding and beyond the reach, so to speak, of art. Where the expectations are raised so high it is seldom that the greatest work can satisfy them; nor did you receive the full meed of that applause which you merited. The work was listened to with the closest attention. The introduction, which seemed to me in the Concert Olympique rather tame, left on this occasion nothing to be desired, as the effect was heightened by a moderate use of the great drum. The choruses are finely grouped together, and reflect the sense of the words perfectly. I had intended an occasional interruption of them by short recitatives, but now feel that these recitatives gain breadth and effect by being chorally treated. Your accompaniment to the strophe 'Prends pitié de notre misère' is something entirely new. As I wrote: I supposed I was giving you a subject similar to that of 'Avec les decrets,' etc., in Tarare. You have shown me, however, that to genius new founts are ever opening and that it never repeats itself. The chorus 'Revi! funeste' seems to me to be of perfect beauty. The passage 'O montagnes, écrasez-vous!' during which thunder announces the coming of the Saviour, produced a great effect, an effect truly appalling. You have given the sentences of the Supreme Judge with an indescribably enchanting effect, one which is felt equally by the skilled and the unskilled in music. The first question of Gossec, when he heard that the 'Last Judgment' was to be performed, was: 'Is Christ introduced as speaking?' Yes. 'Then,' replied he, 'it is impossible that the work can succeed. I have refused to compose that subject, because I felt the impossibility of giving the Son of God any adequate language.' Since hearing your work, Gossec's opinion has changed completely, and what before seemed to him an unavoidable rock of offence, has become the principal subject of his admiration in your work. I come now to the double chorus, which closes the Cantata. It is beyond my comprehension, why it is less prominent than it should be; the contrast is well managed, the different emotions correctly expressed: perhaps the continuous effect of the two preceding numbers weakens that of this, which in fact leaves the auditor too cold at the point where he should be excited with delight by the song of the blessed, and awe at that of the damned. A musician, of well-known talents, was of opinion that the choruses are too soon interwoven in one; he would have preferred to hear the contrasting themes first given separately. You better than any one else can judge of the value of this remark. I must here also confess something to you which is too generally felt to be passed over in silence. The signal at which all created beings start again into life seemed by no means imposing enough; it is not in sufficient contrast to the general tone of the rest of the composition. Be it that the orchestra too soon covers the trumpet blasts with its accords, or that the related key of D minor follows that of F too naturally, instead of this passage having a bold, unexpected modulation, as if independent of all rules, the only surprise in it was to hear the words sung, "Quel signal effrayant!" ('What a frightful signal!'), when in fact no one was at all frightened. This, sir, is the only fault in your Oratorio, which, except in this, I hold to be a master-piece; a fault, which would at once have been mended, had you been present at the performance."

Mosel adds: "Although the too sharply expressed criticism upon the finale of this Cantata is not entirely without foundation, still, as a whole, it belongs to the very best works of Salieri, and would never fail of producing its intended effect, when performed in the true spirit of the composition. To give a greater chance of usefulness, before the close of the composer's life, the text was carefully translated into German, and Salieri himself adapted it to the music."

I find no record of its performance since.

While engaged in the composition of this work, to be precise, on the 11th November, 1787, Salieri called one day upon Gluck, to discuss with him the question how he should introduce Christ as speaking. He asked the old master, if he could approve his plan of writing the part in high tenor, on the ground that the work was for Paris, where that voice, with the clef and under the name of contralto, was in common use, while it, moreover, was more penetrating than any other. Gluck justified his intention, and added, half in jest and half in earnest: "I shall in a short time be able to inform you with certainty from the other world in what clef the Saviour speaks." On the 15th, four days afterward, another attack of apoplexy closed Gluck's life.

The distress of Salieri at the loss of Gluck was to some extent assuaged by the reports of his own increasing fame which reached him from Paris.

Blumendorf, a member of the Austrian Legation in that city, wrote him, December 1787, that Tarare had already been given twenty-four times with the same applause, and would be kept on the stage until Easter.

Rauquit-Lieutard informed him that fans and snuff-boxes "a la Tarare" were for sale in the shops, and that 4,500 livres, his share in the profits of the opera, were already on deposit for him.

(To be Continued.)

The Forty-First Musical Festival of the Lower Rhine.*

On the 15th, 16th, and 17th of May, the Sunday, Monday, and Tuesday of Whitsun week, was celebrated, favored by the most magnificent weather, the forty-first Musical Festival of the Lower Rhine, in the New Cursaal, at Aix-la-Chapelle, and in the gardens belonging to it, gardens admirably adapted for social gatherings. Aix-la-Chapelle, within whose walls the Festival was held for the twelfth time, always enjoyed a very excellent reputation in musical matters, but it has now placed these on a better footing than ever; for instance, thanks to the energy of the musical director, Herr Franz Wüllner, it has always had, during the winter, a series of concerts, among the best in the Rhenish provinces. It thus possesses in the Town-Orchestra, and the various Associations for mixed and male chorus singing, an excellent stock of materials as a foundation for the Festivals of the Lower Rhine.

Strengthened by the addition of singers, male and female, from the neighboring towns, and of first-rate instrumentalists, the chorus numbered, on this occasion, 122 sopranos; 96 contraltos (of which 13 were boys' voices); 98 tenors, and 135 basses, making a total of 292 voices. The orchestra consisted of 52 violins; 18 tenors; 17 violoncellos; 12 double-basses; 29 wind instruments; 1 kettle drummer, and 1 organist—making in all 130 performers. If to these numbers we add the six soloists, and the two conductors, there were 589 persons engaged in the proceedings. The vocal solos were entrusted to Mad. Louise Dustmann, from Vienna (first soprano); Mlle. Philippine von Edelsberg, from Munich (second soprano); Mlle. Francisca Schreck, from Bonn (contralto); Dr. Gunz, from Hanover (tenor); and Herr Carl Hill, from Frankfort-on-the-Maine (bass). Herr Joseph Joachim, from Hanover, greatly increased the attractions of the third evening's amusements by his solo performances on the violin. The conductors were Herr Julius Rietz, Royal Capellmeister, from Dresden, and Herr Franz Wüllner, Musik-Director of the town of Aix-la-Chapelle. The organ—from the manufactory of Ibach Brothers, Barmen—was played by Herr Ferdinand Breuning, of Cologne. There were some most distinguished musicians in the orchestra.

On the first day, Herr Franz Lachner's Suite, No. 2, for orchestra, and Handel's oratorio of Belshazzar were performed.

The above symphonic work by F. Lachner consists of five movements; a kind of prelude in slow time, with an appended fugue, an Andante, Menuetto, Intermezzo, and Gigue.

When the old forms of instrumental music are filled with such pithy matter, so rich in fancy, as Lachner has written for his first Suite in D, and for this second one in E minor, we have no objection to their revival, which is, under the circumstances, a genuine instance of revivification. This cannot be asserted of every re-introduction of old art forms.—The Suite offers one advantage to the composer: there are many forms of modern music, in its present more advanced state, which the Suite does not exclude from its separate movements. This, for instance, is true of the Adagio, Menuetto, Scherzo, and Variations. The composer may likewise allow himself great freedom in their arrangement, for the Suite requires only a series of pieces connected in an agreeably varied manner, while the Sonata-form of the Symphony is more exacting in its demands for the connection and uniform character of a work as a whole. The Suite, which was developed in the 17th century, originally consisted of nothing more than a series of characteristic dances, differing in rhythm and time, and written in one and the same key. Between these dances, an air (aria or romance, as Andante) might be interpolated, and a prelude—a fantasia or kind of overture—might precede them. The Suite may have exercised some influence upon the conformation of the Symphony. At any rate, there is a probability that it was the Suite which suggested to Joseph Haydn, the creator of the Symphony, the introduction of the Menuetto into the latter, while he developed the rest of the form out of the Sinfonia which the Italians used to place before their Operas. Dilettanti may make themselves acquainted with the form of the Suite from the Suiten für Clavier, by Johann Sebastian and Ern. Bach, of which there are several editions now accessible to them.

In the form of the Suite, as expanded by him in conformity with the present state of music, Franz Lachner has, it appears to us, found his peculiar vocation as an instrumental composer. Not only do we place his two works of this kind unconditionally higher than his Symphonies, but we consider them much more important, and possessed of far greater vitality than many orchestral works of modern composers. While, in the first and last movement of No. 2., he once more displays, in the most brilliant fashion, his great contrapuntal skill; in the Andante he develops a beautifully melodious song; in the trio of the Menuetto, a new and wonderfully fine effect with the shakes on the violins, and, in the Intermezzo, a pleasingly humorous charm; in short, the Suite fixes the attention of the audience from beginning to end. It was most admirably executed, and received with rapturous applause after each movement.

* From the Niederrheinische Musik-Zeitung, as translated in the London Musical World.

The performance of Handel's Belshazzar at Aix-la-Chapelle will most certainly mark an epoch in the history of the adoption of Handel's music in Germany, for it brought out, in a most surprising manner, the beauties of the work, while, by enthusiastic outbursts of unanimous applause, the whole audience surrounded it with a halo of glory which will not soon grow dim. The Committee deserve the warmest thanks of all Handel's admirers, for having selected this oratorio for the Festival, and for having it performed according to the original score, to which Herr F. Wüllner added a supplementary organ part, filled up with artistic skill.

We must, therefore, attribute the success of the performance at Aix-la-Chapelle only partially to the restoration of the original score, and consider it due principally to the effect of the genuine Handelian inward power, and to the beauty of the musical composition, which was, perhaps, on this occasion, first esteemed at its real value by the public in Germany.

The subject of the oratorio is the destruction of the Babylonian empire and its last sovereign, Belshazzar, through the conquest of Babylon by Cyrus and the Persians. Very skilfully interwoven with the story is the account of the mysterious writing on the wall of the luxurious king's banqueting-hall, together with the interpretation of that writing by the Prophet Daniel, and the delivery of the Jews from the Babylonian captivity. Besides Belshazzar (tenor) and Cyrus (contralto), we have in the drama Gobrias (bass), whose son the king has killed, and who has fled to Cyrus, in the Persian camp; the Prophet Daniel (contralto); and Nitocris (soprano), Belshazzar's mother. The choruses are sung by Persians, Babylonians and Israelites.

Handel composed this oratorio in London, after the summer season of 1744, during which he had given twelve concerts and produced Semele and Joseph for the first time. He then undertook to give a course of sixteen winter concerts; he had intended to give four-and-twenty, but, from want of sufficient attendance, was unable to carry out his purpose, because, as Schelcher informs us, "the ladies of the aristocracy were against him," and "injured him by balls and tea parties which they gave on the days of the concerts." During these sixteen concerts, Belshazzar was first executed on the 27th March, 1745, and twice repeated; at the other concerts, Handel gave Deborah, Semele, Hercules, Samson, Joseph and The Messiah twice each, and Saul once. The composition of the work dates, consequently, from the master's best oratorio period.

Here, as in every other instance, it is the strongly-marked character and grandeur of the choruses which touch and carry us away more than aught else. They are so popularly intelligible that none of them fail to produce an instantaneous and deep impression, even the fugues which conclude two of them (we would refer the reader only to the chromatically descending theme of the fugue of the final chorus in Part I.: "Whichever way he turns, on his devoted head swift falls the thunderbolt"), with all the originality and power of their motives, being so clear as immediately to produce a striking effect. Other numbers, less polyphonic, inspire us partly by their freshness and unusual coloring, as is the case with the festive choruses of the Babylonians, including more particularly the madly boisterous hymn of the revellers to the god Sesach, partly by their religious fervor and intensity of feeling, as is the case with the chorus of the Israelites: "Zurück, O Fürst, nimm dies Geth!" and then, again, by a wonderful and magnificent fullness of tone, as in the final chorus of the Second Part.

As already remarked, Herr Wüllner's task of instrumental arrangement was confined chiefly to the organ part, though, in many of the choruses, clarinets, bassoons, and, where Handel had joined trumpets to them, horns were added. Moreover, Belshazzar's three airs, and the wild drinking Sesach chorus of the Babylonians, were newly and fully scored, the organ being, properly, as we think, left out. According to the feelings of the present day, we cannot consider the organ appropriate to the purport of such words. In the final chorus, too, from the "Anthem," the organ was strengthened by the full band, with trumpets and kettle-drums, as Handel originally added only two violins and an oboe.

That this arrangement must have produced a far different, and far more imposing effect than the mutilated version of Mosel will be at once evident to every one.

All the choruses were sung with precision, vigor, and spirit, while the introduction of the organ frequently produced that wonderfully dashing combined tone, in which it is scarcely possible to distinguish the chorus, orchestra, or organ, because they are all blended with each other. Every chorus, without exception, evoked loud applause, the more brilliant ones calling forth a perfect storm of it, certainly an indisputable proof of the impression produced upon the mass of the hearers. Among the musicians present there was only one opinion as to the value of the oratorio, with which most of them were previously unacquainted.

There are, also, many admirable pieces among the vocal solo parts. The contralto part of Cyrus is that most richly endowed; the account of the dream, and the two airs are fine, and were given by Mlle. von Edelsberg in a magnificent mezzo-soprano. Full of genius and most admirable is the treatment of the scene where Daniel reads and explains the mysterious writing, especially when rendered so movingly as Mlle. Shreck rendered it; the same is true of her air: "O heil'ger Wahrheit Quell' und Grund!" In the brightest contrast to these are Bolshazzar's recitative and air, sung by Herr Gunz with great finish of execution, and dashing exuberance, while Herr Hill's sonorous bass voice and fine style did full justice to the two airs of Gobrias, and the recitative of the Messenger, who, in the Third Part, brings the Queen the news of the taking of the city. The soprano part (the Queen) is not so brilliant as similar parts in other oratorios by Handel; the best number in it is the grand recitative and the following air in E minor, which begins the work. It was, however, omitted by Mosel, as well as by Gervinus in his translation of the text, but restored by Herr Wüllner for this performance. Mad. Dustmann sang it very beautifully, but, despite her great talent and splendid organ, was unable to make very much of the part as a whole, for it is one of the weakest in the work. Seconded by Gluck, Beethoven, and Weber, she brilliantly compensated herself for this, however, on the second and third day.

(To be concluded.)

Meyerbeer.

(Extracts from "Spiridon's" letters to the Evening Gazette.)

THE "ACCURSED DESIRE OF SUCCESS."

I do not know whether I succeeded in exhibiting clearly before Meyerbeer's ardent ambition to attain great musical fame. He thought of nothing else. He lived for nothing else. Although he was the master of an estate which yielded $120,000 annual income, he lived like a man who was dependent upon his daily labor for his daily bread. He had the paternal mansion at Berlin, but the honors were paid by his wife and daughters. He lived in a little chamber in the garret with no furniture but a piano, scores, a table, an inkstand and music paper. He studied music to the very last day of his life, that he might wrest even from the most unsuccessful work a light to warn him from shoals, if no flower, whose color and perfume might increase the charms of his next work. He went to hear Mona. Berlioz's Les Troyens night after night for five nights, to discover some beauties or to learn some new method of commanding instruments or massing voices. He studied Mlle. Adeline Patti attentively; he said: "I shall have something for her one of these days." When he obtained a new idea (and the opera must be wretched indeed which does not suggest some thought to a man of reflection) he would return home and labor on it till he had polished it into a sterling coin. "Meyerbeer daily mires himself more, unfortunately, in his wretched routine. What a magnificent flower he has withered! What did we not hope of him! O accursed desire of success! I am now studying his opera Margherita d'Anjou. He writes the third opera of the Carnival of Venice, and promises to come to Berlin in April. I don't believe him. He is ashamed of himself in our company." I quote this letter of Carl Von Weber for the phrase which I have italicized. It exhibits the fever which heated Meyerbeer's blood all his life. To command success he lived aloof from his family (although he tenderly loved them,) he deserted his comfortable mansion for the hardships of life in furnished lodgings; he knew no recreation but labor. Do not construe these words into reproaches. I applaud him for his constancy to ambition and to that "longing after immortality" which is quite unknown in these days when nobody has longing for anything but the treasures of gold and silver. I honor him for his disregard of comfort, which would prompt him to travel from one end of Europe to the other to hear a new opera or a new singer.

OTHER INFIRMITIES.

Meyerbeer was excessively sensitive about his age. He would resent any hint that he was among the old men of Europe, as a gentleman would resent an imputation on his honor. This was no new weakness. He seems to have felt ashamed that, while Auber had written his sparkling works before a beard was on his chin, and Rossini had won immortality ere he reached manhood, and Bellini had died not yet thirty, Germany's great composer should be forty-one years old before the world acknowledged him a maestro. Numerous have been the biographies of Meyerbeer which have appeared; some of them were written under his very eye, upon notes furnished by himself, and were corrected by him,—all these biographies assert that he was born in 1794. When he died it became necessary to look into his papers; among them his certificate of birth was found, which showed him to have been born in 1790. Four years is a sensible slice of life.

Another weakness of Meyerbeer was that he could not bear the sight of a musk-melon; he fainted when one came near him. Scribe ordered an artist to decorate his dining-room; the unlucky painter placed a musk-melon among the fruit which adorned the room. Scribe was out of town; upon his return he discovered the melon and ordered its immediate removal, solely because he never could get Meyerbeer to dine with him if that fruit was visible.

Meyerbeer had more decorations of orders of nobility than any man, not of royal blood, living. He had at least thirty. Mons. Alex. Dumas is said to have been rather jealous of him, because he, the former, had only nine, and on one occasion he exclaimed when he saw Meyerbeer enter a drawing-room: "Ah! there comes the Maestro with his cavalry."

Mons. Offenbach tells this anecdote of Meyerbeer and his decorations:—"I never saw Meyerbeer covered with all his decorations except on one occasion. It was at Berlin. The Queen of Prussia having desired that I should be presented to her, Meyerbeer was good enough to carry me to Court. When he called for me, he was so dazzling that I pretended for some minutes not to see him, concealed as he was under a profusion of grands, cordons, crachats and colliers. One of Meyerbeer's friends, perhaps one of his family (for they are very ambitious people), prompted him, about the time the King of Prussia conferred letters patent of nobility upon Alex. von Humboldt, to sue for the same honor. Meyerbeer at once consented, but the King declined granting the prayer as something out of his power, the Prussian law formally interdicting nobility to Jews."

HOW HE BOUGHT UP THE PARISIAN CRITICS.

One of the most striking—let me say most painful—instances of Meyerbeer's morbid sensibility to criticism is to be found in his bearing to the musical critics of the Paris newspapers. It ought to humiliate them to the earth; but this relation is so common here, I do not believe that anybody among the Paris press writers consider it objectionable. Before Meyerbeer brings out a new opera or revives an opera which has been for some months off the play-bills, he invites the leading musical critics to dine with him at the Trois Frères, where he gives them the most sumptuous entertainment the head cook can imagine. How can a fellow of decent feeling write harshly of a man who has been pouring the choicest vintages of France and the most delicate titbits of sea, air, forest, orchard and garden down one's throat? Try it. You will find the thing impossible. Parker and his brethren are your only real pease-makers! This custom is deplorable, for it sensibly militates against the independence and truth of the Press. But this was not the worst act of Meyerbeer. There were few musical critics in Paris, who were not in receipt of annual pensions from Meyerbeer. These pensions were no trifling gratuities, but solid pensions of several hundred dollars, and in one or two instances they exceeded a thousand dollars annually. There were critics here who had been in receipt of large pensions from him since 1831. Meyerbeer did not content himself with paying them pensions and good dinners, he also made it a point of duty to give them costly presents on their name-days and on New Year's Day. Meyerbeer used to defend this custom, by saying that he did not lay these gentlemen under obligations, he was the person obliged, and he could not see any objections to his giving evidence of his gratitude to them for the substantial service they had rendered him. The habit was unpardonable, and was solely due to what Carl Von Weber called the "accursed desire of success." Meyerbeer was guilty, too, of carrying politeness to obsequiousness. However, this was absolutely necessary in this city. What a book could be written on the meanness of life in Paris! The theme, perhaps, is too delicate to be handled. Meyerbeer knew them all, and he stood in fear even of an empty ink-horn.

HIS DAILY ROUTINE IN PARIS.

Meyerbeer lived and died in furnished lodgings at No. 2 Rue Montaigne. He rose at five or six o'clock, labored until half-past nine, when he would go to breakfast. He would return at half-past ten and work until two, when he would take a hack and drive to the Boulevard des Italiens, which he would leisurely walk down until he reached the Rue Richelieu, down which he would turn and go to Brandus's music shop, which is two or three doors from the Boulevard. Here he would go into the back room, where there was a sofa, on which he would stretch him and sleep until half-past three. Brandus's servant had positive orders to wake him at half-past three. Then Meyerbeer would receive people. He received everybody who wanted to see him on business at Brandus's after half-past three. He never received anybody at his house. This indeed is the rule here. People who are obliged to receive persons have an appointed reception evening once a week or twice a month; the labors of the day are over, and as the infliction comes only once a week, an ordinary dose of resignation will enable most men to bear it quite patiently. Those who escape this periodical pillory reckon upon official receptions for meeting their acquaintances, and as these are held three or four times a week, there is no necessity for supplementing them with visits. Indeed there is no such thing as visiting in Paris among the people who work. They meet at dinners and at receptions, and in this way manage to save a great deal of time. If you are an eminent surgeon, with letters of introduction to some surgeon here, he receives you at his hospital and does you the honors of his amphitheatre. If you are an eminent literary man, with letters to some person of distinction in the same station of life, he will send you his card by a servant and get somebody to invite you to a reception. If you are a painter, you will be invited to the Paris painter's studio, where you will find the artist surrounded by his pictures and his friends and generally a half dozen ladies. People here never receive chez eux, (I can't apply home to these French abodes); few of them invite strangers to dinner. They assemble on petty Rialtos just as trades-people were wont to do at Venice. At five or six o'clock he would dine at his restaurant or dine out, and after he put on evening dress he was a man of the world, ready to chat with anybody, not averse from figuring at any reception, and prone to spend the evening at the Grand Opera (his favorite place was a black hole above the chandelier! he always said this was the very best place in the house to hear music. Poor old William Rufus Blake's favorite story of his trip to Paris was his night at the opera, when the house was so full, there was't room left anywhere but—poor old Blake how horrified he used to look when he got to this "but!"), or the Italian Opera or the Theatre Lyrique. He rarely went to the Opera Comique; he liked port wine, not claret.

HIS DELICATE REGARD FOR POORER ARTISTS.

Mons. Meyerbeer was upon one occasion rather upbraided for the simplicity of his life here. He replied: "I am less a rich man than an artist, and it is one of my satisfactions to be able to say that I might have supported myself by my music from the time I was seven years old. I have at Berlin an establishment suited with my circumstances of fortune. I am averse from throwing my brethren of Paris into the shade by living like a rich amateur of music. I ask no premium for my works, and if I receive the author's copyright accorded by law, I do so to avoid the reproach of working underprice out of disdain for profits flowing from the stage."

Music Abroad.

London.

ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA.—The Meyerbeer operas occupied the middle of May, and then Gounod's Faust came up again, with Mario as Faust, and a new Gretchen, Mlle. Pauline Lucca, from Berlin, Mme. Nantier-Didié as Siebel, M. Faure as Méphistophélès, and Graziani as Valentine. Quite a French cast of Faust! Of the new Gretchen the Times says:—

At Berlin it is notorious that Mlle. Pauline Lucca's "Gretchen" is prized the most; which considering that, with one exception among those we have seen, it bears the faintest resemblance to the idea that unanimously obtains of Goethe's fascinating heroine, would seem to warrant investigation. But to fathom the German mind requires an unrestricted extent of line. The mere fact of the popularity of M. Gounod's work, so subversive in many respects of the real intentions of the great poetical epic of Germany is sufficiently unaccountable. Let us not, therefore, feel surprised that the frantic worship of the French Faust which prevails in the capital of the Hohenzollern should be accompanied by an equally frantic worship of the most French of possible Margarets. That Mlle. Lucca's impersonation of Margaret is thoroughly French must be clear to every observer familiar with the histrionic characteristics of our pleasant and nearest neighbors. It is not merely that she discards the physical head-dress which traditionally points to Margaret as a flaxen-haired beauty; she discards alike what may be termed the moral head-dress, and bears the front of Margaret erect and fearless, instead of down-cast and timid as we have been wont to recognize it. Her boldness, the result no doubt of intimate conviction, has been the secret of her triumph; and certainly her general delineation of the character is piquant and attractive no less than original. We are aware that, as the late illustrious Meyerbeer, with the Prussian connoisseurs in a body, preferred the impetuous Margaret of Mlle. Lucca, so M. Gounod, composer of the opera of Faust, preferred the sonnambulist Margaret of Madame Carvalho, which is no more like the true German ideal than the other; while the "juste milieu," to employ an admissible commonplace, is among ourselves allowed to have been realized by Mlle. Tietjens, who avoids both the morbid French sentiment of the latter and the extreme French sprightliness (uncommon in a German (pur sang) of the former. With regard to Mlle. Lucca's performance generally we must at present be content to say, that it is adorned with beauties as it is spotted by defects, the latter in a great measure traceable to the inconvenience of singing a trying and difficult part in a language to which she is comparatively a stranger, and partly to a very natural anxiety about the issue of so arduous an undertaking.

Another performance of William Tell, with Herr Schmidt as Walter; another resumption of Les Huguenots, Mlle. Fricci taking the place of Lucca indisposed; another charming sonnambulation of "Amina" Patti; and a repetition of Lucca's Margaret, filled a week; and the month of May closed with "the immortal Barber," (Patti, Mario, Ronconi, and a new Bartolo, Signor Scalese, much admired, followed by a divertissement called L'île Enchantée, to which pretty music had been written by young Arthur Sullivan, the Leipsic graduate, whose music to the "Tempest" excited so much interest; Salvini was the danseuse.

Of course Don Giovanni had to take its turn; no London season is complete without it. Donna Anna, Mlle. Fricci; Zerlina, Patti; Elvira, Mdme. Raderdorff; Don Juan, Faure; Leporello, Scalese; Masetto, Ronconi; Commendatore, Herr Schmidt. A novelty of the season was Flotow's Stradella (which had, however, been produced at Drury Lane in 1846, in English). This time, in Italian, it does not seem to have made a great impression. The Times thinks it inferior, musically, to Martha, "better suited to the atmosphere of the Bouffes Parisiens than to that of the Royal Italian Opera," and never except in one passage, rising above the level of "the suburban." It was the German tenor Wachtel's last appearance. Mlle. Battu was the Leonora; and the two tenors were "wonderfully well" represented by Ciampi and Ronconi.

The sudden return of Mlle. Lucca to the Continent, on account of her health, obliged manager -ye, still playing on the popular Faust string, to bring forward a new Margaret in the person of "little Patti." The Times, the Star, and all the journals, exhaust the superlatives of admiration, all shouting: "We have found the ideal Gretchen of Goethe at last!" But they have not exhausted all the Gretchens quite; we have a couple over here, Kellogg and Frederici, yet in reserve for Mr. Bull; but he must first behave more decently and cease making friends with pirates!

On Saturday, June 11, Rossini's Otello was revived, with Tamberlik as the Moor, a rôle always identified with him in London Opera. Graziani played Iago, and Mlle. Lagrua, Desdemona. Tamberlik revived the old furor by his "C sharp" in the duet with Iago. Faust, Otello, Un Ballo in Maschera, and Don Giovanni, took their turns again, and then came the agreeable surprise of Mlle. Desirée Artot in La Figlia del Reggimento, to make up for the disappearance of Lucca. She is a great bravura singer. Musically her Maria (says the Times) is "remarkable for dash and brilliancy—though in the expressive parts, such as the leave-taking of the regiment, she rather inclines to the over-elaborately pathetic."—Another round of Faust ("Oh that Gretchen!" "Oh that Adelina!" "Oh that Mario!"), and La Figlia and Il Barbiere and Don Giovanni (Didié replacing overworked Patti in the last two), brings us through June at Covent Garden.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—The events of the last week of May were the rentrée of Mme. Trebelli, and Signor Gardoni, the appearance of Signor Frizzi, and the performance of Lucia, Il Barbiere and the Huguenots. In the last, Tietjens was Valentine; Trebelli, Urban; Mlle. Liebhart, Margaret; Junca, Marcel; Giuglini, Raoul; Santley, Nevers. The rich voice and fluent execution of Trebelli were heard again with delight in Una voce and the rest of the sparkling music of Rossini. June opened with Faust (Tietjens Margaret), Falstaff, Faust, Trovatore, Huguenots, and nothing new. The programme of the next week only varied the order of the first; and then came something new (to the Londoners), and again it came from Germany,—whence the Italian Opera seems to draw most of its principal singers of late—in the person of one of the favorite prime donne of the Royal Opera of Berlin, Mme. Harriers-Wippem, who made her debut in the part of Alice in Robert-le-Diable. Did we not ourselves hear her repeatedly in Berlin, a few years since, not only in Opera, but in the beautiful part of Schumann's "Peri," and can we not easily credit what we now read in the Musical World?

Madame Wippem is young, and blessed with a really splendid voice. In her first air—"Vanne, disce al figlio!"—the freshness of her tone, her firm delivery of the notes, her extreme earnestness, and her unquestionable feeling, at once produced an impression so favorable that her success may be said to have been decided from that moment. This impression grew stronger and stronger as the opera went on. In the third act (nearly the whole of the second was omitted) her execution of the delicious romance, "nel lasciarsi la Normandia," created a positive "furor." And no wonder; the voice had a "ring" in it which spoke of youth and unabused resources; the expression was frank and unaffected; while a certain cadenza—beginning on a high note, and terminated by a descending scale, neatly and freshly "lanced" (launched?)—took the audience by surprise, and the result was a rapturous encore. The air was repeated, with the high note and the descending scale; the audience were again enchanted, and the singer again applauded. In the picturesque and splendidly dramatic duet with Bertram (M. Junca), which immediately follows, Madame Harriers-Wippem shone not only as a singer, but as an actress into the bargain. The rush to the cross for refuge, when surprised at the apparition of the most incomprehensible of fiends, was forcible and natural at the same time, and the semblance of terror throughout extremely well put on. This duet (in which Junca's acting as Bertram was very good) won another success for Madame Wippem; and yet another was the impressive trio "Lo sguardo immobile" (unaccompanied), when the sudden appearance of Robert, her foster brother, relieves Alice of all mere physical anxiety. Here the strong, fresh, and resonant high notes of the new soprano told with wonderful effect. The trio was altogether well done, Signor Gardoni being thoroughly at home in the music of Robert, which used to be one of his best parts, and Signor Junca being more than ever careful and correct. From this point Alice has nothing to do until the last act, the culminating point of which is the magnificent trio where the designs of Bertram are foiled, Robert saved, and Alice, the zealous and loving instrument of his preservation, triumphant. That Madame Harriers-Wippem is an acquisition, and a valuable acquisition, to Mr. Mapleson's company is undoubted.

Next followed a benefit of Arditi, the conductor, when (in the words of the Orchestra) "an operatic hot-pot was served up, the dishes consisting of cuts from Trovatore, Lucia, Favorita, etc., etc. Another new name is Mlle. Grossi, a contralto, with a voice (according to the Times) "almost without parallel since Alboni first enchanted London in 1847," and good promise as an artist. She presented herself as Nancy, with Mlle. Volpini as Martha,—she also with much praise.

But the event of the season, with which our latest files are ringing, was the appearance of Mlle. Tietjens for the first time in Fidelio. The Times says:

The new Fidelio seemed inspired, and fairly electrified her audience. On the whole we cannot remember a more striking exhibition. The success of Mlle. Tietjens was by far the most brilliant she has achieved in England, and one of the most genuine ever achieved on the operatic boards. At the end of the magnificent quartet, when the devoted Leonora, physically exhausted by her almost superhuman efforts, clings, as though for protection, to him whose guardian angel she has been, and gives utterance to the fulness of her love in rapturous accents—the finest piece of dramatic music in existence—the house rang with cheers as loud and prolonged as they were thoroughly spontaneous; and at the termination of the scene, as the curtain fell, Mlle. Tietjens was thrice summoned before the lamps, the applause each time being more vociferous, till, when she stepped forward the last time, unaccompanied, it was positively deafening. Never was a crowd in a theatre more excited.

Mlle. Liebhart, as might be expected from a German and a practised musician to boot, is a really excellent Marcellina, alike valuable in the charming little air allotted to the Jailor's daughter (Act. 1), and in the concerted music, to which—no less than Signor Bettini, a careful Jacquino—she is an important auxiliary. Junca acts the character of the rough though kindly Jailor extremely well; Signor Gassier is, without any exception that we can call to mind, the very best representative of the arduous and not over-grateful part of Pizarro since the famous Staudigl; Dr. Gunz (from Hanover) has the genuine traditions of the state-prisoner, Florestan, Leonora's husband, and Pizarro's victim; and last, not least, Mr. Santley merits unqualified praise, both for his artistic feeling in accepting the small part of the Minister and for the admirable manner in which he sings the music. His orchestra is pretty nearly irreplaceable, from the overture to the end; and his chorus gives every promise of the same excellence.

MUSICAL SOCIETIES.—The seventh Philharmonic Concert had for programme the Overtures to Eury-anthe and Nozze di Figaro; Beethoven's Heroic Symphony; Beethoven's Piano Concerto in G, played by Pauer; Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, by Wieniawski; and singing by Trebelli. The eight and last Concert was the most brilliant of all, and offered a new Concerto by Joachim, and a new Symphony by Sterndale Bennett. The following account of it is from the Telegraph:

The violin concerto exhibits a welcome advance on all Herr Joachim's former compositions. It is much more free, spontaneous, and genial than the so-called "Hungarian" concerto, and indeed than anything which has yet fallen from the pen. The slow movement, for instance, the impressive moving theme of which is for the lowest notes of the instrument, is, from beginning to end, a clear unbroken stream of melody; the subjects again of the opening movement are charmingly fresh, while the final allegro is full of fire and spirit. The conduct of each movement is masterly in the extreme, and the orchestration, never obtrusive, well serves its appointed purpose of imparting additional meaning and intensity to the thoughts which inspired the composer's brain. Of the manner in which Herr Joachim interpreted his own composition it would seem superfluous to speak, but the splendid richness and fulness of the tone which he produced from the "fourth string," in the andante, and the wonderful ease with which he triumphed over all the difficulties of the concluding movement, are specially worthy of remark. Herr Joachim was covered with the heartiest applause at the conclusion of each movement, and the concerto, which, for the want of any title, we must specify by the key in which it opens, as that in G major, will always be welcome when it can be adequately rendered. The second novelty was no less successful than the first. Professor Sterndale Bennett's "symphony," or "orchestral piece," as it has been indifferently styled, consists of three movements only. The opening allegro is a long and elaborately developed composition; the various subjects, all uniformly graceful in themselves, being worked up with extraordinary skill, and the movement is invested with more grandeur than we can call to mind in any of Dr. Bennett's former works. The minuet, if we are not mistaken, has already been heard in the Cambridge Installation Ode, but its delicate and piquant playfulness, set off as it is by exquisite instrumentation, and admirably contrasted with the highly original trio entirely for brass instruments, must instantly commend itself to every listener. The rondo allegro that concludes the symphony, if perhaps less original than the preceding movements, exhibits as thorough a mastery over all the resources of the musician's art. We trust that the symphony will be soon repeated; and if Dr. Bennett thinks fit to add to it a slow movement, amateurs will be all the more gratified. In any case, they must hail with delight the reawakening of the bright inventive genius which for so many years was suffered to lie dormant. A. M. Hartvigson, a Danish pianist, made his début, and played Mendelssohn's serenade and rondo, "Gioioso," with considerable delicacy. Miss Louisa Pyne sang with her never-failing taste and skill, "Lascia ch'io piango" from "Rinaldo," and the principal air from "The Crown Diamonds." Dr. Gunz introduced a noble air, "Misero! O sogno," written by Mozart for the celebrated tenor Adamberger, in 1783, and very little known. The concert was opened by Beethoven's symphony in C, the first of the mighty series; while the Jubilee Overture brought the fifty-second season of the old-established society to a glorious conclusion.

The "New Philharmonic" has also closed its 13th season. The instrumental pieces of the 5th and last concert were Beethoven's C minor Symphony; Weber's Concert-Stück, played by Mme. Arabella Goddard; Spohr's Dramatic Concerto, played by Lauterbach; Overtures to Athalie, and Siege of Corinth.

The "Musical Society of London," Alfred Mellon conductor, opened its fourth and last concert with an original Symphony, in A minor, by a young Englishman, John Francis Barnet, of which the Orchestra speaks in the highest terms (as well as of a Quintet and parts of an Oratorio by the same composer). Beethoven's Eroica opened the second part. Joachim played Spohr's Dramatic Concerto; Mme. Dustmann sang the great scena from Fidelio; and there were two overtures: Mendelssohn's Meeresstille, &c., and Mozart's Zauberflöte.—This Society, at a previous concert, had brought out a new Symphony by Mr. Silas, which was warmly commended.

Of Oratorio performances during the past month we notice only one of Mendelssohn's Lobgesang and Rossini's Stabat Mater by the National Choral Society. But there have been some great juvenile choral exhibitions; for instance:

The annual gathering of 4,000 Charity Children from the different metropolitan schools, took place on the 9th ult., under the dome of St. Paul's. The appearance of the children, with their banners symmetrically arranged, is one of the prettiest sights of the season; and on this occasion the area was completely filled with a fashionable audience. The musical arrangements, under the direction of Mr. Goss, the organist of the cathedral, assisted by Mr. George Cooper (of St. Sepulchre's and Christ Church), were more than usually satisfactory. The extraordinary effect created by the sounds, albeit somewhat untutored issuing from 4,000 little throats, in such well-known compositions as the "Old Hundredth" and the "Hallelujah," is one which has already struck with wonder many distinguished visitors whom curiosity has led to this annual festival; and we are now glad to find, for the sake of musical progress, that some innovation is likely to be made upon the time-honored selection usually performed. Mendelssohn's sublime Chorale, "Sleepers wake," is now substituted for the 113th Psalm, "Ye saints and servants of the Lord;" and we see no reason why music especially written for this occasion should not replace some, which good as it is of its kind, may be said, without irreverence to any of the old church writers, to have had its day. We have men now living who can write—the respected organist of the cathedral himself, for example—and how could their talent be better employed than in showing that Dr. William Boyce and Dr. Crotch have no right to hold an exclusive and perpetual patent in "Te Deums" and "Jubilates?" Noello's Times.

The Annual Choral Festival of the Metropolitan schools came off on Wednesday, under the direction of Mr. G. W. Martin, when, although the price of admission was raised to half a crown, nearly 20,000 were present. After deducting season tickets and the friends of the children who had free access, some 12,000 visitors may be supposed to have paid. The children numbered about 5,000, and, if all these had sung, the effect must have been extraordinary. In two or three instances only, "Rule, Britannia," and "God save the Queen," for examples, the volume of sound was singular. The programme was divided into two parts, one devoted to sacred, the other to secular music. The choir sang better in the last, their powers being occasionally overtaken by the sacred pieces, especially Luther's "Great God! what do I hear and see," and the chorale from Mendelssohn's Lobgesang "We praise thy name, O Lord!" They were, however, encoined in the Russian hymn, "Hark, the vesper hymn is stealing," and the chorus, "Hosanna! Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord." Encores were also awarded to Mr. Martin's part-song, "Softly shines the pleasant morn," and the "Echo Chorus," from Locke's music to Macbeth, both of which were very effectively rendered. The echoes in the Macbeth chorus were from the Shakespeare House, directly fronting the Handel orchestra.—Mus. World.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JULY 23, 1864.

Mendelssohn's Organ Sonatas.

These six Sonatas have been so often played on our great Organ during the year past, and are so likely to recur repeatedly, that we shall, perhaps, do a service to the habitués of the Organ Concerts by reproducing here the brief characterizations of them by a distinguished German organist, A. G. Ritter, which we translated several years ago. Such reading comes more timely now, since the great Organ has prepared the reader. Any intelligent analysis, however brief and sketchy, of such compositions, aids the listener to identify and keep in mind the leading points, the themes, and follow out the entire development of each piece with more interest. Mendelssohn, as all his music shows to the initiated, and as almost every page of the last volume of his remarkable "Letters" shows to every one, was deeply smitten with the love of Bach, and penetrated with the spirit of that greatest master, not only of the Organ, but of all sacred music. In his Oratorios and Psalms, his "St. Paul" especially, he builds much after the model of Bach's Passion music. Even his peculiarly fantastic vein, his Fairy music, bears an obvious affinity to certain delicate and playful fancies in some of the lighter works of Bach, his Suites, Partitas, Preludes, etc., for the piano or Clavier.

It was of course an inward necessity, as well as a consequence of such culture, that Mendelssohn, with all his other musical gifts, should be an organist,—doubtless one of the most remarkable since Bach,—standing by no means at so serene, sublime, impersonal a height,—as far from him perhaps, as the best of modern architecture from those marvellous old Gothic cathedrals, that seem not made with hands, thrilling with life as you look at them, and conversing always of the Infinite,—with quite as much of the romantic as of the religious in his genius, and plenty of the self-conscious mood of the nineteenth century in all he does,—yet deriving most of his science and much of his inspiration from the old master. In communion with the Organ and with Bach, whether in playing him directly, or in improvisations after drinking at that fountain, the young

Felix seems to have spent many of his happiest hours. Read those fresh, delightful letters from Switzerland; how inevitably in his rambles he gets at the village organs, striking to them by as strong an instinct as the duck to the water. What a treat it must have been to hear him improvise! doubtless one of the very few who have had the real poetic gift of improvising since Bach and Handel. Think of that last time in his life, in his last visit to Switzerland, weary and sick now, as he was fresh and buoyant when he wrote the "Letters,"—that time, described by Mr. Chorley, when he stumbled upon a solitary village on the Lake of Brienz, finding the church door open, and the organ open, and "nobody to prevent him."

A peasant boy was presently found willing, for a few batzen, to blow the bellows as long as Mendelssohn liked; and he sat down, I have since learned, for the last time that he ever sat down to an organ, for the pleasure of his three auditors. It seems to me now as if he never could have played more nobly. After one or two movements by Sebastian Bach, he began an improvisation in C minor, which took the canonical form of a prelude and fugue; his fancy kindling as he went on, and his face lit up by that serene and elevated smile, the highest and most beautiful of its many expressions, which all who knew him must remember, while he drew forth those long and rich chains of sound which "bring all heaven before the eyes," as old Milton sang.

I feel, when I think of this organ playing, as if I had taken leave of the greatest music forever; since, in that exercise of his art, the amount of science he would bring was animated by a radiant fancy, often dispensed with on like occasions; the want of which is supposed to be disguised by the glory of the sound, and the skilful intertexture of the parts. More perfectly, every genial sympathy, every sense of calm practical approval, could not be gratified. There was the true, gracious, gifted man, old in experience, but young in the quickness of his sensibilities, to be heard; that day, it seems to me, more remarkably than ever. He was giving and receiving pleasure without parade; and from a store which had never been fuller of the highest thoughts and the richest fancies. Such things must come to an end: but they are never to be forgotten.

Mendelssohn's published Organ compositions were not numerous. Three Preludes and Fugues, op. 37, and these six Sonatas, op. 65, are all. The Sonatas are not after the type of the piano-forte Sonata, nor do they follow the set form of Bach's "Trio Sonatas," which carry through three parts for two manuals and pedals as distinctly as if a violin, viola and violoncello were conversing together. They resemble Bach in the frequent introduction of Chorale tunes, with fanciful (not in a bad sense) variation and accompaniment, in the tendency to fugue, and the polyphonic spirit generally,—at times more like Bach's "Choral Vorspiele," than like his Sonatas. They resemble the modern Piano Sonata in their variety of mood and movement, their impassioned and dramatic episodes, their fiery impatience, fragments of recitative, romantic character; only their form is far more free, more like improvisation by one a master of the contrapuntal art, who has absorbed into his own culture, and assimilated, all the genial music that has been produced from Bach's time down to him. And now for Herr Ritter's analyses.

"Sonata No. 1 (Allegro moderato e serioso, F minor, common time,) begins with full, strong chords, of a general and introductory character, which lead in the eleventh measure into a principal thought, which bears such an expressive stamp of character as to justify the epithet speaking. It is the sad complaint of a soul oppressed, sounding out in tones ever louder and more anxious, as the dreaded fate draws near.

Then, after a close in C minor, there resounds a chorale-like sentence, borne on angel voices. It brings comfort from the heavenly heights. To be sure, it is interrupted, now for a shorter, now for a longer time, by the more and more warmly wrought leading theme; to be sure, there is a tone of complaint even in itself; but soon the song of consolation rings out at a victorious height, far above all earthly sorrow. In soft chords, and then borne on by the mighty stream of the full organ tone, it closes the first part. Still it is no jubilant song of triumph. The minor third reminds us of the painful conflict just endured. It is only in the following Adagio (A flat major, 3-8 time,) and in the Recitative, which forms the transition to the last movement, that the heart finds rest. Complaint is silent. In tones as glad as mortal breast can feel, exults the redeemed (Allegro assai vivace.) Flashing, fiery chords resound in animated motion, borne on the roaring flood of bass. And as the heart, filled with lofty joy, strives in vain in its first enthusiasm after definite expression, and only finds the right words when it is more calm; so the chords at first sweep vaguely to and fro, but gradually gain in connection and in grouping, till they finally compass the jubilant melody, which now sounds on and on, below, above, and leads at last into the full, luminous F major chord with the Third above. Here is the proper conclusion of the whole. The arpeggi which now follow, filling four measures and not entirely suited to the organ, are to be considered an appendix.

"The second Sonata opens with an introduction in C minor, (Grave, 4-4,) which leads, through a long organ-point upon the Dominant, into an Adagio, also in C minor. Here the thoughtful player has an opportunity to employ the different Manuals to advantage. The Adagio, with a characteristic and discriminating treatment of the several key-boards, (including the Pedal,) forms an orchestra-like movement. The melody, played by the right hand on the second Manual, is delivered by the wind instruments; the violins, accompanying in flowing, song-like passages, are represented on the first Manual by the left hand; finally, the basses—the Pedal—indicate the ground-tones pizzicato. * * * To an Allegro maestoso e vivace, (3-4 time) which, with all its musical beauty, to our feeling borders somewhat on the secular, succeeds a dignified, simple, and yet artistically developed Fugue, which brings the piece back to the true ground.

"The third Sonata, next to the first our favorite, and bearing in its poetic tendency a certain resemblance to the first, raises itself, supported by an interwoven chorale as if by a verbal text, to a truly dramatic expression; but for this very reason it presents the greatest technical difficulties, since, of necessity, just where the idea of the creative artist is so clear and definite, admitting of no shade of modification, the interpreting artist must hit exactly the right point if he would seize the true intention. In bright chords, a full and swelling movement opens the Sonata, expressive of calm and joyful trust. A short solo passage of the same import is answered by the full choir in the still brighter and more flashing F sharp major, till the whole leads back through the Dominant into the prevailing key, and closes the brief movement. This is immediately followed by a movement in A minor, marked Un poco meno forte. This truly Mendelssohnian theme:

maintains, by the twice recurring superfluous Fourth, just the right hostile, soul-disturbing expression, to be set against the Chorale afterwards delivered by the Pedal: Aus tiefer Noth schrei ich zu dir. ("In deep distress I cry to Thee"). Whether the leading character of the theme above noticed, being more suited for stringed instruments, can also find its fitting representation on our present organs, is a question which the player has to solve in view of the mechanical structure of said organs. With the direction: Da questa parte fino a Maggiore poco a poco più animato e più forte, there enters an accompaniment to the Chorale in sixteenths instead of in quavers, as before. Finally, to the ever-increasing movement the Pedal too is added, after it has held out for a long time the concluding tone of the Canto fermo in an organ-point. While the Manuals repeat the main progression of the theme in full chords and in the highest registers, it burrows down in wild and thundering passages into the depths, to rise again from the ground-tone of E, through the tones, F, G sharp, B, d, f, g sharp, b, to the high d. Gentler and gentler it sinks gradually down from there and leads back again to the first movement, in A major, which, except some few but very effective and significant changes, (for example, in the fifth and sixth measures,) is repeated almost literally. The Andante tranquillo which now follows, also and with propriety in A major, closes the whole like a silent, deep-felt prayer of gratitude."

This third Sonata is the one which was played by Mr. Lang at the inauguration of the Great Organ, and several times since. Only, for the sake of more contrast as the piece goes on, and a somewhat more Sonata-like character, Mr. Lang has commonly played the Andante tranquillo between the opening movement and the impassioned one beginning with the theme above quoted.—We reserve the last three Sonatas to our next number.

ORGAN CONCERTS.—The Great Organ makes the only music of these hot and dry midsummer days. And what do we want better? What can be more grateful and refreshing, more tranquillizing to the weary spirit, than to retreat to the cool shade of the Music Hall, at mid-day, on a Wednesday or a Saturday, leaving the city's turmoil behind you, and letting the grand aspect and the grander music of the great instrument fill you with heavenly peace, conjuring away for at least one hour the ever-haunting, heavy consciousness of war? These delightful "noonings," cheered not by the slender reed of Tityrus or Meliboeus, but by the melodies of swains far more inspired, like Bach and Handel, Mendelssohn and Beethoven,—are they not a city privilege which one might almost leave seashore and mountains to enjoy?

For the last month there have been two Concerts every week, and this will be the rule throughout the summer. Mr. THAYER has officiated the most frequently, with very varied programmes. Last Wednesday he played Bach's great G minor Fugue again. On another occasion, one of Bach's Choral Vorspiele: "Christ unser Herr," and a Pastoral and Fugue in G (one of the three Preludes and Fugues) by Mendelssohn. Also the Andante of the Pastoral Symphony (Beethoven), which did not seem the right thing for the Organ, the flowing accompaniment not getting just the right accent and shading.—Mr. WILCOX played July 9. Overture to Samson, with fine contrast of stops; Andante by Hummel; Wely's brilliant Offertoire in G again,—which seemed to take such possession of him this time, that you traced it through the first part of his pleasant improvisation afterwards; Kullak's Pastoral,—a pretty play of high flute and reed stops; and Hallelujah from Handel's Saul.

An excellent Concert was that of Mrs. FRODOCK (Wednesday, 13th). She opened with Bach's Pasacaglia, which no one but Mr. Paine had before attempted, and she brought its sustained breadth and grandeur steadily and firmly. Also the entire first Sonata of Mendelssohn (see preceding article), which never impressed us as so grand before. Mrs. F. also "improvised" in free style quite as successfully as any of our organists. Other pieces, to show the stops and humor the audience, were an Offertoire in D by Batiste, and the march from Tannhäuser in stirring trumpet tones.

Mr. LANG took his turn last Saturday, playing once more that deep, full, inexhaustible Fantasia by Bach in G; transcriptions of the Egmont overture, the Nocturne from "Midsummer Night's Dream," the Gloria from Mozart's third Mass (with a rather striking extempore prelude), and Beethoven's Hallelujah chorus. The last sounded better than we have before heard it on the organ; and yet that trumpet-like theme does not come out with clearness. Mr. L. also improvised acceptably; and altogether his concert seemed to give great pleasure.

We go to press too early to notice now the concert of Mr. G. W. MORGAN, of New York, on Thursday evening. Mr. Morgan also will preside at to-day's "nooning."

Next Saturday, July 30th, there will be a rare opportunity of hearing Mr. PAINE. His selection will be of the choicest. Four pieces by Bach (new ones all), viz: two more of the Choral Vorspiele (one in six-part harmony), Trio Sonata in C minor, and Prelude in E flat; also another composition by Thiele, a new Offertoire by the organist himself, &c.

COMMENCEMENT AT HARVARD.—Two of the young men on Wednesday had musical subjects for their "parts." Mr. Marshall Monroe Cutter, of Cambridge, delivered an essay on "Musical Form;" and Mr. Francis German, of Worcester, a Disquisition on "Felix Mendelssohn."

We understand that our townsman, Mr. JULIUS EICHBERG, is preparing Schumann's "Pilgrimage of the Rose" for public performance, with orchestra and chorus, in the autumn.

The Rev. Edward Hale's church at the south end, is to have a new organ, built by the Messrs. Hook, at a cost of about $12,000, and Mr. B. J. Lang is to be the organist. This will probably surpass any church organ in the city. The Organ of the Music Hall is creating a demand for really noble organs all around us.

THE OPERA SEASON this fall, says the Transcript, promises to be one of uncommon brilliancy. Many of the singers will be new to our audiences, and two young ladies are now studying music in New York with a view of making their debut upon the operatic stage this season. Maretzek has engaged a fresh orchestra. He will play at the New York Academy from early in September to late in December, and then will come to Boston for five or six weeks, the Germans returning to New York in the meantime. The Evening Post has the following statement in regard to the arrangements for the coming campaigns:

"The German opera troupe will, it is said, open at the Academy of Music in September, Mr. Grover, of the Washington Theatre, being interested in the enterprise, while it is possible that a second German company, under Carl Anschutz, will play at the new Stadt Theatre in the Bowery.

"Early in October, the Academy Germans, like migrating birds, will fly southward to sing in Baltimore, Philadelphia, and Washington; and Max Maretzek will occupy the field in Irving place. The tenor of the company will be Signor Maximilian—not the Mexican Emperor of that name, but an Italian artist who calls himself Maximilian, at least while on the stage."

JENNY LIND'S DEBUT.—The Queen received her with marked attention. The Dowager Queen invited her to visit her Majesty in private. Invitations, which she was as unwilling as unable to accept, were showered on her by the English nobility. The late Duke of Wellington was most sedulous in his demonstrations of respect and admiration, and on one occasion invited her to his country seat, promising that "music should form no topic of the conversation." But amid all the honors they lavished on her, the shy prima donna invariably preferred the intimacy of her choice private circle, and was glad to flee the flattering incense sought to be bestowed upon her, by escaping to the country house of the kind friend who had first welcomed her in London. There she would heartily enjoy a ride, or rural ramble; and anon, seated among wild ferns and shaded by ancient beech-trees, she would study her new parts, the score laid open upon her lap. Every anecdote which transpired abroad, every detail which could be caught up, eagerly seized upon as it was by the "outside" public, contributed to throw a romantic halo about the name of the favorite prima donna.—Reminiscences of the Opera. By Benjamin Lumley.

A MUSICAL DEBUT.—Under the title of "Musical and Personal Recollections," Mr. HENRY PHILLIPS has published an interesting volume in England, from which we take his account of his first appearance.

"After much discussion it was agreed that I should appear, as the bills say, positively for one night only, and sing the 'Bay of Biscay' in character. Posters appeared, the small bills were enclosed to the visitors at the hotels, and my name was consequently in wide circulation. I felt an importance suddenly growing upon me. I was no longer a lad, but becoming a very great man. The evening had arrived when an unexpected difficulty presented itself—what was to be done for a sailor's jacket? The wardrobe boasted of but one, and that would have enveloped my whole person. There was no time to be lost, however, as the play was nearly over. A thought struck the ingenious tailor of the establishment; he would sew the little tail of my jacket up behind, which certainly would create a hump, but I must be careful, he said, not to turn round and show the hump to the audience. All was submitted to, and I was sewed up. The play over, there I stood in a state of nervous excitement, painted and plumed for the task. The scene was set—an open sea, painted on the back of some other scene, where the wood-work was more prominent than the water, and unmistakable evidences of a street door appeared in the middle of the ocean. All was ready; tinkle went the bell; up went the curtain, and the glorious orchestra, which consisted of two fiddles and a German flute, struck up the symphony. As I strutted on in the midst of a flash of lightning—which electric effect was produced by a candle and a large pepper box filled with the dangerous elements, while somebody shook something behind the scenes with the intention of inducing weak-minded people to believe it was thunder—my reception was very flattering, a storm of applause before the curtain seemed to strike awe into the storm behind, and I began my theme—'Loud roared the dreadful thunder;' pointing my finger toward the left hand side of the stage, as if the storm came from that direction—which unfortunately it did not—it was a little oversight. At the termination I was again loudly applauded, the whole company shook hands with me, all the ladies kissed me; and, in fact, I was the great lion of the evening. Thus I made my first effort in public, and laid the foundation-stone of my future fame."

THE ORPHEONISTS. Under this head, the Pioneer (New York) has the following:

Some years ago, a system of singing schools was established in Paris, designed to extend to the poorer classes of the community the advantages of gratuitous instruction in music. The scheme succeeded, and a large choral society was the result. Workmen and their children found in the new enterprise a more instructive and agreeable disposition of their leisure evenings than was afforded by the estaminet or the cheap theatre; and last year, the Orpheonists were more prominently brought into public notice by an excursion they made from Paris to the London Crystal Palace, where they gave a highly successful concert.

The Orpheonist system has been imported to this country, and tried here by Mr. Charles Jerome Hopkins, an accomplished organist, an ambitious composer, and a musician of untiring industry and energy. A couple of years ago, Mr. Hopkins was appointed organist of St. Ann's Church in Brooklyn, Long Island, and proceeded at once to form a choir from the Sunday-school and congregation, to act as a supporting chorus to the regular quartet of singers who had hitherto occupied the organ loft. The effort was successful, and "St. Ann's Choral Society," as the choir thus increased was called, gave several very acceptable "public rehearsals,"—in fact, concerts—at the church.

Encouraged by this, Mr. Hopkins decided to open free schools for such boys as wished to learn to sing church music; and for nearly two years he has kept up this institution with varying success. In an amusing circular he issued a few weeks ago, on the occasion of his closing concert for the season, at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, he stated that he had carried on these schools at a heavy personal loss, being obliged to pay out of his own pocket all the expenses, while the public carefully abstained from attending the few concerts he gave to enable him to carry through the undertaking. Besides this, he had great difficulty to find a room in which to hold his classes, for the trustees and sextons of churches were so much afraid that the boys would damage their property, that they refused to allow the use of their Sunday-school or lecture rooms, "and for five weeks," says Mr. Hopkins, "we literally had to hold our meetings in the open air without a roof to cover us!" It may, however, be fairly presumed that at these out-door gatherings very little singing was done, and very little musical instruction given.

Mr. Hopkins recently closed his season with a concert given at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, at which a number of the boys sang a variety of choral selections, while artists, vocal and instrumental, engaged for the occasion, performed the solos. Next September, the classes will be resumed, and all boys of musical taste, disposed to conduct themselves properly, will have the opportunity of obtaining gratuitous instruction in vocal music. Mr. Hopkins works energetically to carry out his "Orpheon" scheme; but whether he is the man to make it a permanent success, or whether some imitator, with more tact and skill at managing children, will adopt his idea and carry it out in successful competition with the original experimenter, remains to be seen.

A Parisian Critic.

Lately died and was buried in Paris, a great critic of music and the drama, P. A. FIORENTINO, who was fifty-seven years old when he died. He it was who raised the French Feuilleton to its present position; and foreigner though he was, he possessed an influence, acquired through a perfect mastery of the language, which pointed him out as first critic of France. His mind was an admixture of Italian liveliness, French wit, cosmopolitan intellect, and a shrewdness which did not place him above the charge of mercenariness, nor exempt him from that of speculation. He had an unusual facility of expressing himself, and wielded satire occasionally to cruel purpose. Speculation was his great rock, and on this his honor has often split; yet Fiorentino pursued his calling with an effrontery which savored of cynicism.—struck out for himself a theory, which he regarded as the justest in the world. "My feuilletons," said he, "create for a number of singers, comedians, virtuosi and dancers, salaries of twenty, thirty, or a hundred thousand francs a year; and I, who make their fame and fortune, shall content myself with five hundred or a thousand francs a month," which by the way he did not; for he left a fortune behind him amounting to 600,000 francs.

As often as this corruptibility of his was discovered—and this often happened when cases more than usually glaring were brought to light—he retired, from the Constitutionnel, in which his name appeared at the foot of articles, and remained on the staff of the Moniteur, in which he wrote under an assumed name, retaining, however, his influence over the artists. And this he ever preserved to such an extent, that, dead and powerless, he was still regarded as had he been a man of honor, of untainted probity, of spotless reproach. When the poor spirit had fled, and he lay there, who nevermore should build up artistic fortunes of a hundred thousand francs nor enjoy his own six hundred thousand, they stood around the grave, they who had known him alive, as they knew their own venal selves, and gravely told his virtues. And Theophile Gautier, honorable and excellent among French feuilletonists, stood up amongst them, and spoke of his art, the critical art, in serious and truthful fashion, thus:

"Ah, it is difficult, this task, which one holds for so simple! The strongest succumb to it. One needs to have the body of an athlete, a ready, indefatigable, ever watchful spirit. To be witty on a certain day, without bearing thought on the sadnesses, the weaknesses, the sorrows of life; to be witty in the cause of everything and of nothing, despite the absence or the emptiness of subject; to be always wary of one's self lest one offends another; what difficulty! To improvise on some theme accidentally dropped from a theatre, to possess erudition in readiness for any subject, to dress the silly piece in a charming report without destroying its character; thorough knowledge of the repertory and the personages of art; to touch with courtesy the player's vanity, which is yet more sensitive than that of the poet; to remember nothing of one's own life, one's own time, one's own trouble; to run from the furthest end of the town on the first call of an idea; ever to meddle with the fame of others, and never with one's own; to be the trumpet, when one might be the lyre; to combine the activities of the man of business with the work of the student; to strew countless leaves to the wind, which might amount to the honor of a book; this is the frivolous work, which, no one of the public doubts it, is done in play."—Orchestra.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

The Soldier lay on the tented field. (The Soldier's dream.) H. S. Thompson. 30

One of Thompson's graceful ballads, with a very sweet melody, and a chorus at the close.

If on the meads. (Sch' ich die weite grüne au.) F. Gumbert. 30

One of the German gems, with English and German words.

Sitting lonely, ever lonely. Ballad. Elis Philp. 40

This ballad has the recommendation of having been sung in public by Miss Adelaide Phillips. The poetry is beautiful, and the music smooth and appropriate, and not too high for a mezzo soprano voice.

I dreamt I was a child again. Song. J. L. Hatton. 30

A sweet home song, with "Father" and "Mother," and the other names that "make music in the heart" is it.

Fountain and the glen. Song. F. W. Crouch. 30

A pleasing, romantic song, from a good composer.

Instrumental Music.

The Tempest of the heart. (Il balenel suo sorriso). Op. 1501. Ch. Grobe. 50

These variations, on an air from Travatore, may be classed among the best from the prolific pen of the composer. They are of medium difficulty, and fit easily to the hand.

Love-lighted eyes. (Liebesblicke). Bluettes pour piano. T. Oesten. 40

A very sweet "song without words," of medium difficulty, and fits easily to the fingers.

Dew drop schottische. A. P. Lighthill. 30

Unpretending, pretty and easy.

Waken my injured honor. (Vieni la mia vendetta), "Lucretia," arr. by C. Grobe. Op. 1502. 50

Another excellent piece. The immense number of Grobe's arrangements would disqualify him from bringing out anything of value, were they original compositions; but his great experience only increases his ability to arrange and transcribe classic melodies in the most correct and "playable" manner. This is as fresh as one of his first efforts.

Books.

TRINITY COLLECTION OF CHURCH MUSIC.—

Containing all the Psalm and Hymn Tunes, Chants, &c., used in Trinity Church, New York, or in either of its three Chapels. By Edward Hodges, Mus. Doc. of Sidney College, Cambridge, England. With valuable additions by the Editor, S. Parkman Tuckerman, Mus. Doc., Organist and Director of Music in St. Paul's Church, Boston. Cloth, $3.00; Bds. $2.50

It is singular, that two of our musical veterans, both English born, and both distinguished organists, should have given publicity to their collections of manuscripts about the same time, and each book containing the results of about twenty years of service. They are two noble collections, and worthy of being in the library of every choir in the country. The present one has the advantage of being edited and extended by Dr. Tuckerman.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 609.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, AUG. 6, 1864.

VOL. XXIV. No. 10.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Half a dozen of Beethoven's Contemporaries.

II. ANTONIO SALIERI.

[Continued from page 275.]

Du Buisson—was this the chevalier of that name, who was aide de camp of Baron de Kalb. at the battle of Camden in our Revolution?—had made a French translation of Salieri's "Scuola de' gelosi," and was now laboring to have it brought out in Paris, while at the same time the Versailles operatic company was rehearsing the "Grotte de Trofonio." Du Buisson had also written a text, "Bellerophon," for him, which however Salieri never composed.

Arnault wrote him that he had made the changes suggested by him in his "Sappho" and had read it to the Committee of the Opera, and that no remark had been made upon it. While he, "a second Pygmalion" expressed his impatience to have "this his Galatea soon made alive by the master's music," he also wrote that the Italian company in Paris were preparing to bring out two of his operas—which ones, however, he had forgotten. Du Roger wrote him of the production of Paisiello's "King Theodore in Venice," criticizing it very severely, as Beaumarchais had done in September. The latter had written to Salieri: "It is impossible, without sighing over the fall of the Italian composers, to see the musical art so degraded. There is no common sense in it;" and now Du Roger says he cannot conceive how Moline can have prevailed upon the directors to bring out a work so opposed to the principles of the Grand Opera. He goes on to speak of the continued success of "Tarare," and takes occasion to say: "Without intending mere compliment to you, it requires no small faculty to be able with such a subject to fix our attention through three full hours; it would have been much simply to have escaped being tedious. Let me set it as a task to all the Italian composers who have been or still are; they would never effect it with all their melody. Gluck and you have gained us a great advantage over them."

"DON GIOVANNI," BY MOZART; "L' ARBORE DI DIANA," BY MARTIN; AND "AXUR, RE D' ORMUS," BY SALIERI.

"About the time that Mozart returned [from Prague, after bringing out Don Giovanni there,] to Vienna, died Gluck. Perhaps the success of Don Giovanni in Prague had its effect in inducing Emperor Joseph to keep Mozart in Vienna, who had earnestly thought of emigrating to London, by appointing him chamber musician, by patent of Dec. 7, 1787. Probably the production of Don Giovanni would have benefitted him, but for the present that was not to be thought of." Salieri had, in June 1787, brought out his opera Tarare in Paris, in which Beaumarchais had not only by means of a plot exciting and full of action, of splendid decorations and costumes, sought to work upon the public, but also through political and philosophical doctrine, as where, for instance, in the strange allegorical prologue he makes the Genius of Fire and Nature sing:

Morte!, qui que tu sois, prince, brahme ou soldat,
Homme, ta grandeur sur la terre
N' appartient point a' ton état;
Elle est toute à ton caractère.

"The audience was at first somewhat puzzled and found the music much weaker than that of the Danaïdes, produced three years before; but the splendor of the performance and no doubt also the singular mingling of hetero-geneous elements, which the course of events at that time produced, had a great effect and made the piece "draw."

"The Emperor Joseph, whom the music greatly pleased, ordered Da Ponte to make an Italian translation, and that the opera should be given in Vienna at the celebration of the marriage of Archduke Francis and princess Elizabeth of Wurtemberg. This Italian opera, "Azur," retained the plot in its principal incidents, but both in respect of text and music was completely changed. All the political and philosophical elements were excluded, and those of intrigue and sentiment in the action were reformed in the regular routine of the Italian opera. Da Ponte again showed his great skill, while Salieri evidently found here a more congenial field [than when composing the French original], and engaged in the work of rewriting the music without reluctance. As he was making every possible effort to eclipse the splendid success which Martin's "Arbore di Diana" had had in the autumn, he could not be willing to risk any dangerous competitor before the production of his work. "L' amor costante" of Cimarosa had no success and was not a dangerous rival, but Mozart's Don Giovanni, most favorably heralded by the enthusiasm of the Prague public, threatened again to revive the hardly silenced applause which Figaro had called out."

The above is from Jahn's Mozart, IV, 305-6. Passing over what Jahn adds about the production and success of "Azur," and its popularity in all Germany, I translate the following bitter sentences against Salieri.

"It was now advisable to allow the favorable disposition of the public [toward Salieri] to strengthen itself and not be drawn in any other direction through the production of any great work. Therefore Don Giovanni must not be allowed performance; Mozart might produce dances for the amusement of the Viennese," &c. &c. "But Joseph II, who was pleased with the success Don Giovanni in Prague, had ordered its production, and so at last the work had to be undertaken. On the 7th May, 1788, Don Giovanni was given and was unsuccessful."—But only at first, for as it was repeated at short intervals, May 7, 9, 12, 23, 26, 30, June 16, 23, July 6, 11, 21, 31, the Viennese were forced "to chew upon it," as Mozart said to Da Ponte, and soon found it to their taste.

I have not the assurance to decide that Jahn here does injustice to Salieri. No man has so studied the history of Mozart as that writer; no man's judgment is so weighty in all questions relating to him—and yet it is impossible for me to see this matter in the same light. In justice to Jahn, I have here given complete what he says to the point in question. That which makes me hesitate to accept his view is three-fold—a consideration of the dates of production,—the words of Da Ponte, and the narrative of Salieri himself.

The new Italian operas of 1787-88, were:

1787. April 9. L' inganno amoroso. Guglielmi
May 7. Le trame deluse. . . . . Paisiello
" 25. Lo stravagante Inglese. Bianchi
June 22. Il Bertoldo. . . . . Pitichio
July 28. Le due Contesse. . . . . Paisiello
Oct. 1. L' arbore di Diana. . . . . Martin
Nov. 13. L' Amor costante. . . . . Cimarosa
1788. Jan. 8. Axur, d' Ref Ormus. . . . . Salieri
April 21. La Modiste. . . . . Paisiello
May 7. Don Giovanni. . . . . Mozart
June 2. Le gelosie fortunate. . . . . Anfossi
July 15. Gli amanti canuti. . . . . —
Aug. 10. Il fanatico burlesco. . . . . Cimarosa
Sept. 10. Il Talismano. . . . . Salieri
Nov. 14. Il Pazzo per forza. . . . . Weigl

Thus in 1787, seven new operas, either written for Vienna or brought thither from the theatres in Italy, were studied and brought out; and in the next year eight; the first of which, however, belonged in composition, study and rehearsal to the former year. One has but to reflect, that Don Giovanni was not written for Vienna, while L' Arbore di Diana and Azur were, and that too by command of the Emperor, and that the latter was ordered for an occasion the date of which was not yet fixed and which, for aught Salieri could know, might have come several weeks earlier—to see that the operatic company was fully occupied, without adding to its labors the sublime score of the greatest of all operas! It certainly does seem to me that Jahn has followed prejudice rather than judgment in the above given strictures upon Salieri. Had Salieri been Mozart's most intimate friend, could he have brought out an opera written for Prague and first given there October 29, one day earlier than it really was given? Could he have interrupted the studies of the actors upon a work, which by the command of his master he was furnishing to them, as we shall see, in vocal score alone, from want of time to add the instrumentation?

Let us turn to Da Ponte—whose reminiscences, written thirty years afterward, four thousand miles away from all means of correcting lapses of memory, are often confused in order of time and sometimes mistaken in facts—but which in this case are easily corrected when necessary.

Da Ponte, having wasted time in writing "Il filosofo punito" for Righini, "Il Bertoldo" for Pitoichi, and a new text to an old opera of Brunati, all of which failed, was thus admonished, as he tells us, by the Emperor: "Da Ponte, write only for Mozart, Martini and Salieri, but never again have anything to do with such paltry, ignorant people as these. Casti was craftier than you—he wrote no operas but for a Paisiello or a Salieri.”

“I now thought it time,” says the old poet, “to awaken my poetic vein again, which seemed to me quite dried up, when attempting to write for Righini and Pitichio. The three above named kapellmeisters, Mozart, Martini [Vicent Martin], and Salieri, gave me the opportunity for this, for at the same time they each demanded an opera of me, and I hoped not only to gain from all three amends for my previous failures, but even an addition to the small theatrical reputation which I had already gained. I reflected whether I might not satisfy all three at the same time,—whether I might not write three operas at once. Salieri demanded no original drama. He had written the opera Tarare for Paris, and now desired to re-write it both in character and music as an Italian drama; therefore he called upon me for a free translation. Mozart and Martini left me free choice in the subject; I chose for the former Don Giovanni, which pleased him to an extraordinary degree, and for the latter Il Arbore di Diana.” * * * *

“On the first day, what with the Tokay, Seville snuff, coffee, the servant’s bell, and the young nurse [a beautiful but frail damsel of seventeen, with whom the poet was at first only paternally in love], the first two scenes of Don Giovanni, two others of the Arbore di Diana, and more than half of the first act of Tarare, a title which I had changed into Azur, Re d’Ormus, were finished. The next morning I took these scenes to the three composers, who could hardly believe what they saw and read with their own eyes; and in sixty-three days the first two operas were finished, and more than two thirds of the other. The Arbore di Diana was the first which was produced (Oct. 1). It enjoyed the happiest reception, one which was at least as good as that of the ‘Cosa rara.’” * * * *

“Immediately after the first performance, I was obliged to journey to Prague, where Mozart’s Don Giovanni was to be given for the first time, upon the arrival of the Princess of Tuscany in that city. I remained there eight days, to instruct the actors, who were to appear in the work; but before the performance, I was forced to return to Vienna, by a most urgent letter of Salieri, in which he wrote me—whether truly or not I shall not decide—that the ‘Azur,’ by imperial command, was to be immediately produced on occasion of the marriage of Archduke Francis, and that the Emperor himself had ordered him to recall me. I returned, therefore, as soon as possible, travelling day and night,”—and in two or three days was again in Vienna, where in two days more, he says, the Azur on his part was perfected. By this account, then, Salieri received the remainder of his text just as Don Giovanni was appearing upon the stage in Prague (Oct. 29).

There seems to be no reason whatever to doubt the truth of this story of Da Ponte, and, taking it in connection with other fixed dates, the combination enables us to fix pretty conclusively the time of Salieri’s return from Paris and the beginning of the Azur.

Da Ponte’s Il Bertoldo, with Pitichio’s music, failed June 22; and this event preceded the conception of the Don Giovanni and the Arbore di

Diana. Mozart was ready in September to journey to Prague, that he might finish his composition in communication with his singers; and Martin had his opera ready for rehearsal early enough to secure its performance on October 1. The writing of these two texts by Da Ponte was finished in sixty-three days; allowing then four weeks for the study of the Arbore, we are able to fix upon the beginning of July, 1787, as the date of the conception of three of the most popular operas of that time—one of them of all time; a date, too, which allows Salieri some four weeks between the production of his Tarare in Paris June 8, and his reappearance in Vienna.

(To be Continued.)

Mr. Lumley’s “Reminiscences.”

Mr. Lumley has given us a very pleasant book, (Reminiscences of the Opera), a little too reticent perhaps, and too much swelled out with allusions to operas and ballets which the public remember as well as he does, but readable, full of anecdotes, and fair to a point defeated managers are seldom able to attain. The most unfair annoyance inflicted by an artist never rouses his temper; the veille garde, the organized conspiracy of dancers, dancers’ friends, and singers, which almost ruined the theatre, elicits only a moderate censure, and even Lord Ward, who sold him up, is let off with the remark that he became unexpectedly a harsh creditor. In short, Mr. Lumley writes like a gentleman, in one or two instances perhaps in too gentlemanly a tone. He might have omitted all mention of Lola Montez, for example, but he scarcely expects us to believe that he terminated her engagement after the first night because “true Spaniards indignantly refused to acknowledge the impostor as an exponent of their national dance,” and this although she “would have drawn large sums of money to the treasury.” The popular explanation that Lola was a little too “piquante,” and “provocative” even for the ballet, that Mr. Lumley sacrificed money to caste, may not be true, but his own account is just a little highflown. He does not give the public either quite so much information as to the pecuniary history of the opera as he might have done; we cannot even guess from his pages what “success” and “failure” mean in the dialect of impresarios; but there is ample food for those who like light reading nevertheless, and he explains to us pretty clearly the temptations which induce a man to become a manager, the difficulties of the position, and the aggregate of conditions required to make a fortune out of the experiment.

Mr. Lumley himself was a lawyer, and his first connection with operatic management arose from his being consulted professionally by M. Laporte, then lessee of Her Majesty’s, and the man who made of the opera-house the rendezvous of the aristocracy—the scene where every box was a drawing-room and Pops’ Alley the most attractive of London clubs. He was in training for the bar, and his acuteness so interested M. Laporte, of whom he speaks in the warmest terms, that he at last offered him a partnership. Mr. Lumley, fascinated by a life which seems to interest those drawn into it as the dreary life of courts, where “all one can hope is to diversify l’ennui,” interests courtiers, consented, and was thenceforward plunged in a sea of difficulties, pecuniary and personal, which lasted, at short intervals, until his final downfall. The theatre was trammelled by all manner of leases, debts, contracts, and pecuniary obligations, and the management by a combination among the artists. This cabal consisted of the best singers, the best dancers, and the singers’ and dancers’ lovers and admirers outside, with Grisi for revolutionary queen. The clique dictated to the unhappy manager what artists to engage and what operas to choose, and on one occasion raised a furious row because Tamburini had not been engaged. In vain did M. Laporte promise concessions, in vain did the frightened dancing girls stand for an hour in their prettiest attitudes waiting to begin; the omnibus boxes had been filled with men eager for a row, the music could not be heard, the respectable portion of the audience left the house, and at last the rioters, headed by a Prince of the Blood, jumped upon the stage. Nobody was prepared to kick the Prince of the Blood or hand him over to a policeman, and the curtain fell upon Mohockism open and triumphant. Mr. Lumley, when on Laporte’s sudden death he gained the reins of power into his own hands, had not the “cabal” to meet, but he had other difficulties as serious; but then he understood governing,—was in his way a little Napoleon. He had a grand talent for silence, used to adopt a policy of reserve which, as he says, gained for him the name of “Le Mysterieux,” but which succeeded, and he had a trick of refusing to interfere in matters out of his own department, which was wonderfully effective. When he did interfere it was either by a coup d’état, as by the dismissal of Lola, or by some small but most able exercise of address. He wanted one year to have a grand sensation ballet, and having at command the four best dancers who ever lived, Taglioni, Cerito, Carlotta Grisi, and Lucille Grahn, thought he could manage it. Perrot, the ballet master, composed a pas de quatre with all the art of which he was capable, and then the difficulties began. “Material obstacles were easily overcome. When it was feared that Carlotta Grisi would not be able to leave Paris in time to rehearse and appear for the occasion, a vessel was chartered from the Steam Navigation Company to wait the sylph at a moment’s notice across the Channel; a special train was engaged and ready at Dover; relays of horses were in waiting to aid the flight of a dansuse all the way from Paris to Calais.”

When it was necessary to display energy, Mr. Lumley had it at command. When his prima donna Grisi suddenly declared she could not sing because of her approaching confinement, he dashed off to Rome, caught Madame Frezzolini, and returned in time for the London season. In no instance was he ever fairly beaten, though to the end of his career he was embarrassed by the pressure put upon him, sometimes from courtiers using the Queen’s name, sometimes from the great people who simply as great people claimed a right of interference. Miss Edwards was forced on him under the name of Signora Favanti, and one royal duchess wrote to him that his management had not given her unalloyed satisfaction! But the worst were the friends of the artistes, of some of whom Mr. Lumley gives an amusing account:—

“Part of my troubles, certainly, arose from the repeated exigencies of the great in name and position, and some few of the more influential of the subscribers. Demands for changes in the performance, for the suppression of this opera or the repetition of that, to suit the convenience of one great person or another, for the purpose of serving a singer’s interest or for the gratification of a passing fancy,—all these were constant thorns in the side of a manager who was only desirous to conciliate all his patrons. When to such annoyances are added the unreasonable requirements and caprices of artists, with their angry expostulation relative to the position of boxes given, and “explosions,” in which Mademoiselle Cerito, for instance, was continually indulging, it may be easily conceived how that difficulties should habitually occur. Many of these were caused by a set of people (called by the Italians ‘procoli’) consisting of the fathers, mothers, aunts, or other relatives, real or fictitious, of the artistes. These hangers-on consider their ‘vocation gone’ if they do not ‘stir up the waters.’ The ‘Père Cerito’ was a notable specimen of the genus. He considered his own presence at the theatre as necessary as that of his daughter. In lauding her choice ‘effects’ he would invariably speak collectively, and say, for instance, ‘Nous avons dansé magnifiquement ce soir.’”

Letters used to shower on him complaining of this, that, and the other favoritism or want of favor, and sometimes the manager was compelled to conciliate a dancer supported by a clique outside with as much tact and judgment as would have been required to administer a state. The dancers seem to have been more explosive than the singers, perhaps from the immense prominence given to the ballet. Mr. Lumley evidently believed that prosperity lay in his artistes' legs rather than their throats, and mourns almost pathetically over the decline of the "choreographic art,"—the old ballet, which told a long story, and bored the loungers who came to look at pretty women in pretty attitudes almost to death.

The truth is the opera-house is a state, and it is in this fact that the attraction of management to men like Lumley consists. The great of the world under the hereditary system find their lives ennuyant, and try to make them interesting by turning pleasure into business, use as much "influence" to secure the engagement of a new singer as to pass a Parliamentary vote, intrigue for the favor of a clever dancer more anxiously than for that of a monarch. The manager is therefore a person of high importance to a high circle, finds himself socially courted like a duke, the companion, and for many purposes the equal, of princes. The pecuniary result of a good season is pleasant, but it is the social result which tempts. Peers were bowing before Mr. Lumley during his reign, he was considered at Court almost a benefactor for bringing over Jenny Lind,—a bishop rang Cathedral bells for her on her entrance into his city,—Metternich wrote to him as "Mon cher Lumley,"—ambassadors made a State affair of the engagement of a troupe of Viennese ballet-children, the most indefensible act in Mr. Lumley's career,—and he tells an amusing anecdote of Cavour, full of that sense of being himself a politician, to which we have alluded.

"Nothing could exceed the kindness shown to me on this as on all occasions by my friend Sir James Hudson, the English Minister. It was during this short visit to Turin that I was introduced to the great Italian statesman Cavour, at the spontaneous solicitation of that minister. I was taken by Sir James Hudson into Cavour's box at the theatre, where I talked for some time with him. By chance, on leaving Turin, I met Count Cavour at the railway station. The statesman invited me to travel in the official carriage provided as far as our directions went together. In the course of conversation I remarked that the necessity of talking was one of the inconveniences of constitutional governments, and that, in my own little sphere, I should dislike very much to explain my views on all occasions. Cavour replied quickly, 'On ne s'explique pas, on répond seulement.' He was then on his way to some place where he had promised to be godfather to the child of one of the government officials. On his return from his further expedition I was frequently summoned to conferences with the statesman, from which it seemed at one time probable that important results to my own advantage might have followed."

His fétes at his private residence at Fulham were the events of the season. "They were thronged by persons of distinction of both sexes, as well as by 'notabilities,' dramatic, artistic, and literary, both foreign and English: the present Emperor of the French among the rest. Invitations to these gay 'réunions' were eagerly sought," Jenny Lind and the Duchess of Bedford in one pavilion attracting the whole London "world." Mr. Lumley bore himself well among these personages; but to succeed in his rôle a man must have something more than governing ability, tact and appreciation of the public. He wants the fortune of an old noble or a great linendraper, and Mr. Lumley had it not. He was always compelled to rely on the aid of some "patron," or association of patrons; the patrons took out their money in control, and at last a quarrel with Lord Ward brought him to operative ruin. Into the details of this quarrel it is unnecessary to enter, suffice it to say that the Peer had the power of cancelling the lease, and that, contrary to Mr. Lumley's expectations, he insisted on having his money like any untitled person without artistic instincts. Mr. Lumley therefore retired, happy, he says, in the recollections, certainly happy in the temper which, after such a downfall, could support him in writing this most genial book.—English paper.

The Forty-First Musical Festival of the Lower Rhine.

(Concluded.)

The second evening of the Festival boasted of a programme in which shone the names of Bach, Gluck, Mozart, Beethoven, and Mendelssohn Bartholdy, names which are the just pride of the German people, and to do honor to which is peculiarly the object of those large gatherings of artists rendered possible by Musical Festivals alone.

After the overture to Die Zauberflöte—magnificently executed by the stringed quartet, though the connecting passages for the wood wind instruments might have been somewhat softer—came Johann Sebastian Bach's "Magnificat" in D major, for vocal solos, five-part chorus, full band, and organ, for the first time, as far as we know, at any of our festivals, and with such large numbers. It is a magnificent creation, which on the whole, when executed with perfect precision and plenty of voices, as it was on the present occasion, produces the powerful impression Bach's wonderful polyphony always does. The difficult work had been well got up by Herr Wüllner, who conducted it with great vigor and certainty, the execution of it leaving nothing to be desired. In the arrangement of the score, the conductor partially followed the version published by Robert Franz. There is one thing certainly which merits our thanks and deserves to be imitated; that is, that the greatness of the immortal German master, before whom all succeeding musicians have bowed and still bow, is rendered at our Musical Festivals more appreciable than ever, as these Festivals supply the means of performing his works in a manner worthy of them. That the public has become more fitted to receive them by the frequent repetitions, during the last few years, in the Rhenish Provinces, of the grand Passions-Musiken, was demonstrated by the impression that "Magnificat" produced upon the audience at Aix-la-Chapelle.

Bach's "Magnificat" was followed by scenes from Gluck's Iphigenie in Tauris. A sharper musical contrast can scarcely be imagined. In both productions, the words are the foundation of the music; but while, in the former instance, they work up the music only to a certain state of feeling, while the music then raises itself, with all the resources of its art—independent of words—as regards contrapuntal and thoroughly polyphonic composition, to the labyrinthian tone-passages peculiar to itself, and in which only knowledge and intelligence are able to follow the clue of Ariadne which runs through them, Music, in the latter instance, makes it her task and pride to absorb into her own domain every sensation, expressed by words, of the human heart, every position in which certain individuals appear during the course of their life, giving them again in tone, and, by means of melody and harmony apparently artless, connecting herself most closely with the poetry. There is no doubt that this second composition has more affinity with our feelings and views, as developed since the end of the last century, and produces a deeper effect upon us than the former; nay, more, it might visibly be proved that even the height attained by our absolute music—instrumental music—is based upon the development of applied, that is, vocal, music, since it has gone on including more and more within its domain the expression of human emotions and passions of all degrees, so that the music of Beethoven's Symphonies may not unjustly be called dramatic.

It is well known that Gluck conceived more clearly than any one else the task of music as the sanctifying supporter of poetry, and he was assisted in his resolution to accomplish this task, in conformity with his conception, by the qualities natural to him: strength of character, truthfulness of conviction, and musical talent of a kind completely adapted to the realization of his ideal. The Iphigenie auf Tauris is his last great dramatic, and also, his most magnificent work.* He was sixty-five years of age when he wrote it to a fine text by Guillard, which far surpassed the previous texts set to music by Traetta and Piccini. It was played for the first time in Paris, on the 18th March, 1779, though most of it was composed in Vienna, and, while his former operas had gradually to win the sympathy and favor of the public amid the party struggles, which are so well known, success, in the case of Iphigenie auf Tauris, was decided, general, and above all opposition. Even Grimm, the great critic, and an opponent of Gluck, was converted. "I do not know," he writes, "whether what we heard is song. Perhaps it is something far better; I forget the opera and find myself in the midst of a Greek tragedy."

* It is true that, after this Iphigenie, Gluck composed, to please a Baron von Techudi, an opera called Echo und Narcisse, but it was performed only once, and his dramatic career, properly speaking, closed with the Iphigenie auf Tauris.

On the 2nd April, 1782, that is to say, three years after its first performance, the opera was represented in Paris for the one hundred and fifty-first time; on which occasion it drew 15,125 livres. The first performance of it with German words in Vienna took place on the 23d October, 1781, and in Berlin on the 24th February, 1795. In the nineteenth century it has sought refuge in Germany, the true home of its music, and to the Berlin Opera-house is due the merit of having become its principal, and for a long time only, asylum; Paris is dead for it, and it was not till within the last few years that it was again produced at other theatres in Germany besides Berlin, with the sister work, Iphigenie in Aulis. On the Rhine, the Ducal theatres at Darmstadt and Carlsruhe* are probably the only ones which once more present their audiences with operas by Gluck. We are, therefore, bound, not merely to justify but also to praise the fact that these masterpieces, which stand alone in their way, are taken up at the Musical Festivals of the Lower Rhine, and that the public are at least enabled, by a series of scenes, to form an opinion of the wonderful effect produced by dramatic works, which they have not the privilege of seeing performed upon the stage. The effect these works would produce, even now, after the lapse of nearly a hundred years—nay, which they would produce more especially at the present time—provided the fitting artists could be found to play them, was again proved by the very profound impression once more created at Aix-la-Chapelle, on the present occasion, by a few scenes from the Iphigenie auf Tauris, merely in the concert-room, and without the slightest assistance from the resources of the stage.

But what an Iphigenie was Madame Louise Dustmann! With what skill she understood how to fill our hearts with the warmest compassion for the tragical fate of the unhappy maiden, who, having been once snatched from instant death, is obliged for years to devote her life to the most horrible tuition, and sees her only consolation, her only hope of seeing her brother come to redeem her, annihilated by the false report emanating from Orestes of that brother's death! There stood the wonderfully-gifted lady, without any of those accessories, which, by means of the eye, bring the illusion on the stage nearer the truth; she had naught save her voice and her soul, with which she felt the deep woe of Diana's unfortunate priestess; but that was sufficient to captivate, with a strange charm, the ears of the audience, to move their hearts, and to render Mad. Dustmann herself a sublime priestess of her art. Since Mad. Milder-Hauptmann, whom we were fortunate enough to hear, we never heard such an Iphigenie, and to her, too, would Goethe have had to dedicate the verses which he sent to the first-named lady:

"Das unschuldvolle, fromme Spiel
Das edlen Beifall sich errungen,
Erreichte doch ein höheres Ziel,
Von Gluck betont, von Dir gesungen."

Herr Hill sang most admirably, with his fine voice and correct, expressive, dramatic elocution, the recitative and air of Orestes. In a similarly satisfactory manner, the choruses, especially the two-part ones of the Priestesses, completed the picture of which they form the background.

The following were the pieces selected: From the first act—the overture which carries us into the midst of the storm that hurls the ship of Orestes on the inhospitable shore, and the fairy of which calls forth the appeal of Iphigenie and the Chorus to the incensed gods; then the narrative of the dream, the following chorus, the air to Diana (why was the recitative: "Ach, arme Pelopiden!" furnishing by its conclusion, "Nein, länger hoff' ich nicht!" the motive of the air, omitted) and the next chorus; as the succeeding number we had the scene of Orestes with the chorus of the Eumenides; as the third, the dialogue between Iphigenie and Orestes, and Iphigenie's magnificent air, "O laßt mich tiefgebeugte weinen!" with the choruses belonging to it. For the sake of fully rounding off the selection, we should have liked to have, also, the addition of the short recitative in which Iphigenie summons the Priestesses to the sacrifice for the manes of Orestes, who is supposed to be dead, as well as the wonderful sacrificial chorus itself. It is true, however, that the close connection of the whole would have been broken by the long-continued applause which followed Iphigenie's grand air.

* Iphigenie in Aulis was produced at Carlsruhe on the 9th September, 1863, in honor of the Grand Duke's birthday; and at Darmstadt in last March.

After these scenes of Gluck's, Mendelssohn's setting of the 114th Psalm was subjected to a severe ordeal, but, thanks to its grand double-choral form, and the admirable manner in which it was executed, it produced its effect as a genuine masterpiece.

Concerning the performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony we need say no more than that it was so perfect as to leave nothing to be desired. In achieving this result, the orchestra, chorus, and the admirable singing of the soloists—by whom all the notes, however much the latter were written in instrumental fashion, were given with the utmost clearness—combined with the excellent and fiery conducting of Herr Rietz, to create among the audience an enthusiasm evoked at Musical Festivals only by the most successful performance. Herr Rietz's reading and conducting merit very high praise.

The third evening of the Festival was, as usual, devoted principally to solo displays. The latter were on this occasion enclosed in a framework consisting of the grand Concert Overture of Julius Rietz, which thus celebrated the twenty-fifth year of its existence, and the brilliant execution of which enabled the audience to pay the composer and conductor a well merited ovation; the Egmont overture by Beethoven; Bach's choruses: "Sicut locutus est" and "Gloria;" and the concluding chorus from Handel's Belshazzar. In the way of vocal pieces, we heard Agatha's grand scene from Der Freischütz, as well as songs by Schubert and Mendelssohn, sung by Mad. Dustmann; an aria from Costa fan Tutte, by Mlle. von Edelsberg; Belmonte's second air from Die Entführung, and songs by Schumann and Schubert, by Herr Gunz; and the air "Gott sei mir gnädig" from Mendelssohn's St. Paul, sung by Herr Hill. All these pieces were received with universal applause, fully deserved by the artistic zeal of the various singers. Herr Gunz, especially, sang Belmonte's air with a softness and warmth of expression which rendered Mozart's melodies in a genuinely Mozartean manner, while Mad. Dustmann once more proved what a rich treasure of the most magnificent music there is in Agatha's air, with which she fairly entranced every one.

Instrumental music had only one representative, but that one was Joseph Joachim, who played his own clever "Violin-concerto, composed in the Hungarian style"; a charming "Adagio" by Spohr, together with a "Prelude" and "Fugue" in D minor, with that artistic finish which is truly unique in its way, for, in it, all the marvels effected by the executant's magical skill disappear before the noble and original intellect characterizing the style of this great artist.

Jenny Lind's Scruples.

Little by little, during the winter, rumors had crept abroad, and had even found a place in the public papers that Jenny Lind had fallen under the influence of an adviser, highly placed in the hierarchy of the church, who had used all his powers of eloquence to persuade the singer that, out of respect to herself and to religion, she was bound to quit the stage. Many of the better judging would not credit the report that a bishop, whilst enjoying a reputation for liberality and tolerance, had endeavored to detach the artist from the stage, instead of encouraging her to remain in a sphere wherein her bright example might continue a purifying influence. Nevertheless, the belief gained ground that, from whatever sources they proceeded, powerful influences were at work upon the mind of the young lady to induce her to abandon the stage forever, as a profession incompatible with true religious feeling, and even with moral propriety. Whatever exaggeration there may possibly have been in these rumors, it is more than probable that some foundation for them did really exist. Vacillating as the young singer was known to be, there must have been a painful struggle in her mind relative to the advice offered her to abandon her profession. [This "advice," I have since learned from undoubted authority, was not proffered to Mademoiselle Lind in reference to any dislike of her profession. The estimable prelate here alluded to was induced to believe that Jenny Lind, though desiring earnestly to quit the stage, felt compelled to remain from a sense of obligation towards her director, whom she had, perhaps unwisely, encouraged to expect that she would stand by him for another season. The kind counsels of the bishop and his respected family went solely to the point of sustaining the young singer's own decision, supposing it to be truly taken by her, against the importunity of her theatrical friends and "confidantes."] At one time she resolved to submit to this influence, at another she seemed unhappy at the thought of extinguishing what had been the hope and aim of her girlhood, the ambition and pride of her womanhood. Thus all was indecision—all perplexity. One day the wavering lady declared she would abide by the counsel of a valued friend, who advised her on no account to relinquish her career; and on the next she would recall her promise, and let it be announced that she "could not come." Friends of long date and long acquired sympathies urged her not to give way to counsels founded on mistaken views of her interests, or to take a step which she would eventually regret. Affectionate solicitude endeavored to steady her mind, evidently harassed and torn by remonstrances of varied character. Her state of indecision was as injurious to her own peace, as it was perplexing and distressing to her manager. The public prints which had hitherto made regretful and painful allusions to the supposed religious influences in high quarters brought to bear upon the susceptible temperament of the Swedish singer, in order to induce her to relinquish the stage, as a profession, (now about the month of February), began to team with hints respecting influences of a more direct nature exercised upon the young lady to the same intent. Soon it was positively asserted by these indiscreet chroniclers, that she was engaged, and would shortly be married to a young gentleman of good family, related to an eminent banker. Little by little the rumor spread that it was the intended bridegroom whose religious scruples had induced the prima donna to express her desire of leaving the stage forever. Some of the principal organs of the press evinced much indignation at the slur thrown upon a whole profession; some loudly remonstrated with the wavering singer; some with gentle words urged the fallacy of her quitting a profession which "could neither contaminate her nor degrade her either morally or socially." That her mind was in a state of harassing perplexity there can be no doubt. At last it was publicly announced that the "Swedish Nightingale" would again sing in public, but in concerts only, and that those concerts were to be held in Exeter Hall. Exeter Hall! Was I, then, to be entirely thrown over? In this state of affairs, subscribers who had looked for Jenny Lind as the main attraction of the forthcoming season, naturally held back. Even the Court remained undecided. No box was to be taken for Her Majesty the Queen until it was known whether the favorite prima donna was, or was not, to appear upon the boards of Her Majesty's Theatre; or, at all events, until a definite programme could be issued. Now, it was impossible for a director, while all was yet in abeyance, to put forward to the public an official prospectus of the season, by which the future fortunes of the theatre were to stand or fall. I could do no more than send out a written circular to the Court, the principal subscribers, and the press, detailing what my arrangements might probably or possibly be. Many of the principal frequenters of the theatre held on by the manager "through thick and thin." Many more looked on and waited, and asked, "Is Jenny Lind to act?"—Reminiscences of the Opera. By Benjamin Lumley.

Robin Adair.

Those who have heard Herr Habelmann sing the air of "Robin Adair" in the opera of La Dame Blanche, will be interested in the following article from the London Notes and Queries concerning its origin and the history of its hero:

E. K. J. is most decidedly in error, both as regards the hero, nature, and date of "Robin Adair," which in no sense of the phrase can be called "a drinking song," or as showing "the warmth of that friendship which subsisted between that gentleman (what gentleman?) and his friends;" but is merely a sentimental, sorrowful lament of a lady for the absence of her lover.

Robert Adair, the hero of the song, was well known in the London fashionable circles of the last century by the sobriquet of the "Fortunate Irishman;" but his parentage and the exact place of his birth are unknown. He was brought up as a surgeon, but "his detection in an early amour drove him precipitately from Dublin," to push his fortunes in England. Scarcely had he crossed the Channel when the chain of lucky events, that ultimately led him to fame and fortune, commenced. Near Holyhead, perceiving a carriage overturned, he ran to render assistance. The sole occupant of this vehicle was a "lady of fashion well known in polite circles," who received Adair's attentions with thanks; and, being lightly hurt, and hearing that he was a surgeon, requested him to travel with her in her carriage to London. On their arrival in the metropolis she presented him with a fee of one hundred guineas, and gave him a general invitation to her house. In after life Adair used to say that it was not so much the amount of this fee, but the time it was given, that was of service to him, as he was then almost destitute. But the invitation to her house was a still greater service, for there he met the person who decided his fate in life. This was Lady Caroline Keppel, daughter of the second Earl of Albemarle, and of Lady Anne Lennox, daughter of the first Duke of Richmond. Forgetting her high lineage, Lady Caroline, at the first sight of the Irish surgeon, fell desperately in love with him; and her emotions were so sudden and so violent as to attract the general attention of the company. Adair, perceiving his advantage, lost no time in pursuing it; while the Albemarle and Richmond families were dismayed at the prospect of such a terrible mesalliance. Every means were tried to induce the young lady to alter her mind, but without effect. Adair's biographer tells us that "amusements, a long journey, an advantageous offer, and other common modes of shaking off what was considered by the family as an improper match, were alternately tried, but in vain; the health of Lady Caroline was evidently impaired, and the family at last confessed, with a good sense, that reflects honor on their understandings, as well as their hearts, that it was possible to prevent, but never to dissolve an attachment; and that marriage was the honorable, and indeed the only alternative that could secure her happiness and life."

When Lady Caroline was taken by her friends from London to Bath, that she might be separated from her lover, she wrote, it is said, the song of "Robin Adair," and set it to a plaintive Irish tune that she had heard him sing. Whether written by Lady Caroline or not, the song is simply expressive of her feelings at the time, and as it completely corroborates the circumstances just related, which were the town-talk of the period, though now little more than family tradition, there can be no doubt that they were the origin of the song, the words of which, as originally written, are the following:

"ROBIN ADAIR."

"What's this dull town to me?
Robin's not near;
He whom I wish to see,
Wish for to hear.
Where's all the joy and mirth,
Made life a Heaven on earth?
Oh! they're all fled with thee,
Robin Adair!
What made the assembly shine?
Robin Adair!
What made the ball so fine?
Robin was there!
What, when the play was o'er,
What made my heart so sore?
Oh! it was parting with
Robin Adair!
But now thou art far from me,
Robin Adair!
But now I never see
Robin Adair!
Yet he I love so well
Still in my heart shall dwell,
Oh! can I ne'er forget
Robin Adair!"

Immediately after his marriage with Lady Caroline,* Adair was appointed Inspector General of Military Hospitals, and subsequently, becoming a favorite of George III., he was made Surgeon-General, King's Sergeant-Surgeon, and Surgeon of Chelsea Hospital. Very fortunate men have seldom many friends, but Adair, by declining a baronetcy that was offered to him by the king for surgical attendance on the Duke of Gloucester, actually acquired considerable popularity before his death, which took place when he was nearly four score years of age, in 1790. In the "Gentleman's Magazine" of that year there are verses "On the Death of Robert Adair, Esq., late Surgeon-General, by J. Crane, M. D.," who, it is to be hoped, was a much better physician than a poet.

Lady Caroline Adair's married life was short but happy. She died of consumption, after giving birth to three children, one of them a son. On her death-bed she requested Adair to wear mourning for her as long as he lived; which he scrupulously did, save on the king's and queen's birthdays, when his duty to his sovereign required him to appear at Court in full dress. If this injunction respecting mourning were to prevent Adair marrying again, it had the desired effect; he did not marry a second time, though he had many offers. But I am trenching on the scandalous chronicles of the last century, and must stop. Suffice it to say, Adair seems to have been a universal favorite among both women and men; even Pope Ganganelli conceived a strong friendship for him when he visited Rome. Adair's only son by Lady Keppel served his country with distinction as a diplomatist, and died in 1855, aged ninety-two years, then being the Right Honorable Sir Robert Adair, G. C. B., the last surviving political and private friend of his distinguished relative, Charles James Fox. His memory, though not generally known, has been also enshrined in a popular piece of poetry, for, being expressly educated for the diplomatic service at the University of Göttingen, Canning satirized him in "The Rovers" as Rogero, the unfortunate student-lover of "Sweet Matilda Pottingen." WILLIAM PINKERTON.

* In "The Grand Magazine of Universal Intelligence" for 1778, the marriage is thus announced: "February 22d Robert Adair, Esq., to the Right Honorable the Lady Caroline Keppel."

JENNY LIND IN PARIS.—The dinner party at the Embassy was a small one, no other company being invited except Mr. and Mrs. G——, Mademoiselle Lind, Madame Catalani and her daughter, and one English gentleman, a well-known amateur of the opera; the secretary of the Embassy, and a sister of the Ambassador being also present. After dinner, the weather being warm, the party strolled in a garden attached to the Embassy—Catalani and Jenny Lind talking much together. In the evening some little embarrassment arose about asking Jenny Lind to sing, because no one ever refuses a request made by the representative of majesty, the Marchioness considerably forebore to place the young Swede in a position of difficulty. But Catalani, who was burning with curiosity to hear Jenny Lind sing, perceived that there was some hesitation, went up to the "Nightingale," and asked her with grace and earnestness to oblige the company with a song, adding, "C'est la vieille Catalani qui desire vous entendre chanter, avant de mourir!" Such an appeal from such a person overcame all Jenny's habitual dislike to sing in private society. She sat down to the piano, and after a few bars of prelude gave her incomparable "Non credea mirarti," playing the accompaniment herself.—Lumley's Reminiscences.

M. Fiorentino.

(Correspondence of the Evening Gazette.)

Mons. Fiorentino is dead. Mons. Dumas's prediction of his poverty in Paris was contradicted by fate. After Mons. Fiorentino became associated with Mons. Dumas he never knew what it was to want money, and he left an estate of 600,000*fr.* although he lived expensively. It is true that during the last few years of his life his pen brought him a great deal of money. He received $100 for his weekly contribution to Le Moniteur, and $100 for his weekly contribution to La France (each was an article, to the first on the music, to the second on the music and drama of the week, which would occupy about three columns in your paper); these two papers gave him $10,400 a year. He was chief editor of L'Entrée, which brought him in $1000 a year (it is simply the play bill of all the theatres in Paris, with analyses of new pieces and theatrical news). But it has not been long since he received this annual income; his fortune was drawn from other and less licit sources. He levied black mail with a ferocity unknown even in this capital of black mail. Everybody connected with the lyric theatres was squeezed by his relentless hand. This story is told: Some fifteen years ago Mons. Amedée Achard, the well known novelist, attacked him in a feuilleton for this same habit of levying black mail. The attack was made in such direct, unequivocal terms that Mons. Fiorentino could not pass it unnoticed. He challenged Mons. Amedée Achard. The latter was doubtful whether he could meet a man with so blemished a reputation and referred the matter to men experienced in duelling. They decided that he could not refuse satisfaction. Mons. Fiorentino was exceedingly anxious to kill Mons. Achard and he was, of course, leading such a Bedouin life, a practised master of pistol and sword. He regarded the pistol the surest weapon and proposed it. The seconds discarded it and selected the small sword. Mons. Fiorentino made desperate assaults upon his adversary and finally put in a thrust in the latter's breast. How he missed his heart Providence alone can tell! Mons. Achard fell apparently dead, and was in bed for a year afterwards. This duel and the circumstances which led to it roused the attention of the Literary Men's Association, to which they both belonged. An investigation was ordered. One of the first persons visited to discover what grounds of reason, if any, existed for the alleged levy of black mail, was Mlle. Albani (she was then unmarried and at the height of her reputation). It happened that Mlle. Albani was not at home and the hearth was guarded by her mother, an old woman whose loquacious, impetuous character was that of the Italian Nurse which Shakespeare has so admirably delineated in Romeo and Juliet. She did not speak French; the committee did not speak Italian. All she caught in the enquiry was the name "Mons. Fiorentino." The moment she heard it, she flew into a violent passion, seized a broomstick and belabored their shoulders, screaming in Italian: "Canaglia! Didn't we give you 1000*fr.* last week, and a golden bracelet set with precious stones last month, and d'y'e, canaglia that ye and him who sent ye here are, d'y'e suppose there is no end to our purse? Off with ye! Off with ye! Canaglia! Banditi! that ye are!" The committee fled quite satisfied with the evidence! Mlle. Albani's mother took them for emissaries of Mons. Fiorentino, who had come for a new instalment of black mail!

Mons. Fiorentino was expelled from the society, and for some time he hung under quite a cloud; but this disreputable affair did not prevent him from levying black mail. Far otherwise. He was at this time attached to a petty newspaper, Le Corsaire, where he might ruin as many reputations as he pleased, and most persons purchased his silence or his praise. Two persons alone refused to grant him pensions: Mmes. Albani and Mons. and Mme. Mario (Mme. Grisi is, as you know, Mme. Mario). To the last hour of his life he attacked them. Mons. Meyerbeer paid him a large pension with government punctuality. The managers of the Italian, Lyrique, and Opera Comique paid him considerable sums annually, and as for the costly presents he received there was no end to them. The "stars" made him presents at the beginning of the season, on New Year's Day, and at the end of the season. Maiden artists to our boards gave him valuable presents or money before they made their bow. I am afraid to tell you what sums of money I have heard he annually received, lest you may think I had the traveler's long how in hand. He was a man of rare talents, and might on the broad, straight road of honor have attained an enviable place here. Mons. Sainte Beuve has repeatedly said that few foreigners or Frenchmen ever attained his command over the language of his country. His knowledge of music was extraordinary. There were few composers and no singers in Europe for the last thirty years with whom he was not well acquainted. Malibran and Pauline Viardot were his playmates, Lablache knew him well before he quitted Naples. I do not know whether he was trained to any profession; but after he turned his attention to literature, he cultivated letters with the greatest assiduity. He left, as I have said, 600,000*fr.* behind him. He bequeathed 400,000*fr.* to his only child, Marcel Fiorentino della Rovere—a baby not quite a year old, and, though not born in lawful wedlock, "recognized" for his son. He bequeathed 200,000*fr.* to the child's mother, Mlle. Nelly, a very pretty actress who was formerly attached to the Porte St. Martin Theatre, and for whom Mons. Fiorentino made those attacks on this theatre, which led to his rupture with Le Constitutionnel. The will has been opposed by his family, who, as soon as the breath left his body, turned Mlle. Nelly and child out of doors, and had seals placed upon everything he possessed. They reckoned upon an abundant quarry—he left them nothing. He was all his life generous to them; he supported his father, and left him an annuity of 5000*fr.*; his father preceded him a month in the grave. He supported a brother until the latter died, and to the day of his death supported another brother, who is still confined in a private lunatic asylum near town. It seems that there are some weak points in the will and his executor—who is Mons. Jules Favre—has advised Mlle. Nelly to effect a compromise. Mons. Fiorentino was ill only two days. He died of gout in the heart. He was but 55 years old.

SPERIDION.

Music Abroad.

LEIPSIK. The correspondent of the Orchestra, July 9th, pays a just compliment to a most faithful, single-hearted laborer in the cause of great classical choral music.

One of the most meritorious of the Leipzig musical societies is the Riedelscher Verein, which derives its name from its founder and conductor, Herr Riedel, who received his musical education in the Leipzig Conservatorium; his society devotes itself principally to the study of oratorio and church music, from the earliest to the most modern times. Herr Riedel's exertions have been beyond all praise; he has shunned neither labor nor expense, and is now rewarded by being at the head of one of the best mixed choruses in Leipzig. There is one point, however, in which, in common with most German societies, there is room for improvement—a more intelligent conception of Handel's works.

Last week's concert of the Riedelscher Verein had, as usual, an interesting programme. Marcello's Psalms are no easy task; the employment of but a single voice in a long composition of this nature, runs the risk of being monotonous to modern ears, especially where there is not much change of feeling throughout the psalm. Frau von Milde's delivery of the xxxix. Psalm shows that although the voice has lost some of its freshness, the purity and expressiveness of her style are remarkable, and make it a real pleasure to listen to such a performance. Some Russian church music was very interesting; the oldest specimen produced in this concert dates from about the middle of the eleventh century; its melody is said to have been brought into Russia by the Byzantine bishops who ruled the church under Wladimir the Holy and Jaroslaw the Great; about a century later the Russian native composers became productive, and began to modify the traditional melodies, and to give them a certain national character. Collections of these "Antiphons" were made in Kiev, Nowgorod, and Czeringow. Of the Kiev collection we had also a specimen. The turn which forms the cadence at the close of each phrase is very peculiar and quaint. Both this and the first Antiphon were given as harmonized by M. Lamakin, director of the Scheremetew Orchestra. These ancient forms seem to have continued for some time, till at last the Italian influence made itself felt, at first refining, but ultimately denationalizing and degrading the Church service. Bortujánsky, from 1779 to 1825, director of the choir of the Court Church at St. Petersburg, set himself to restore the ancient forms, but at the same time, like a wise Conservative, bringing these forms into harmony with the progress of modern music. A "Cherubim hymn" of his, which was also sung, shows how successful he was. It would be doing good service to make excavations among this Russian music; there are many treasures in it worth disinterring. A cantata by Bach, for soprano and bass, with accompaniment for small orchestra (for this performance arranged for the organ), with obligato violin, excellently played by Herr Röntgen, was new to me. Bach's majesty is most shown in his choral works, where the old giant has room to display all his mighty strength. In the present cantata, "Ach Gott, wie manches Herzleid," divided into five numbers, in the first and fifth numbers the subject, a choral, is sung as a cantus firmus by the soprano; while the bass (in the last number the violin is also added), revels around it in elaborate counterpoint. The other numbers are given as solos; in one of these, No. 3, the violin has again a very important part. From the great formalist to the great revolutionist! And yet upon this occasion "revolutionist" would be an unjust epithet to apply to Dr. Liszt, whose "heattitudes" for baritone solo with chorus (published by Kahnt, Leipzig) would do honor to any composer. There is nothing outré here, none of those atrocious discords and progressions in which the composer delights to revel; the rich sonority of some of the vocal combinations is magnificent. Herr von Milde's singing of the solo part was excellent. The text being in Latin, there would be no difficulty in bringing this work before an English audience. There were also compositions by other living composers—the Herren Herzog, Müller-Hartung, and Franz—all of more or less merit; but I have not space to speak of them now. Some variety was given to the concert by the organ performances of Herr Thomas, but neither as a composer nor as a player was he altogether satisfactory; his style is too "choppy." The organ of St. Thomas's Church is a very inferior instrument; Bach's church ought to have a better one.

In this week's number of the Signale, Dr. Hauptmann calls attention to the issue of the posthumous works of the late Herr Burgmüller by the publishing house of Fr. Kistner. This composer died in 1836, at the early age of twenty-six; the latter years of his life were passed in great suffering. Mendelssohn and Schumann thought much of him. An overture and a string quartet of his, which I heard last year in the Gewandhaus, are of great merit. Besides the overture, a pianoforte concerto and two symphonies have already been published, and other works are about to follow. It would be worth while for English concert directors to look up these works.

VIENNA. Little in Viennese operatic circles, but the "Domestic War" of Schubert at the Hofoperntheatre and Gluck's "Iphigenia," which is to be put on the stage during July. Imperial-Royal Court-piano-manufacturer Herr Friedrich Ehrbar, is about to undertake a journey in order to add some notes to the publication of a great work of his, "The History of the Piano."

The schoolmasters have held a "Liedertafel of the Schubert bund." They have always been among the most faithful friends of "Franz Musica;" they carry the magic of song into the farthestmost provinces. In what village or lonely hamlet is there not a schoolmaster who does not represent the whole art in his own person. He scrapes upon the fiddle, strums upon the piano, teaches the flute, and, every Sunday, plays the organ, to the glory of God.

This privileged trade in music has obtained a certain additional amount of celebrity since the time that Schubert, the son of a schoolmaster, lived in the Lichtenthal, where he composed and even kept school himself. As most persons know, he was really schoolmaster at the village school in the Lichtenthal for a year, not, however, from liking for the profession, or from necessity, but in order, under the protection of the schoolmaster's name, to be relieved from serving as a soldier. The chorus of Schoolmasters have deemed it advisable to make some reference in their title to this fact, and so they have called themselves the Schubertbund, or Schubert Association.

COLOGNE. A pastoral letter of the Cardinal Archbishop of Cologne throws us back to the middle ages. Seven centuries ago, says the letter, Friedrich Barbarossa, having conquered Milan, gave the bodies of the "Three Kings" which had been preserved there, to Archbishop Reinhold of Cologne, who on the 23d July, 1164, entered Cologne with the precious relics, since which time they, with the bones of St. Ursula and her 11,000 virgins, have been the palladium of the city. The archbishop summons the faithful to a grand religious festival which is to commemorate the 700th anniversary of the reception of the "Three Kings," and which will last from the 23d to the 30th July. Whatever we may think of the object, there can be no doubt that it will afford a rich display of ecclesiastical pomp, in which music will take its part, in the glorious cathedral, the interior of which is at length completed.

MANNHEIM. Rehearsal is busy in Mannheim for the production of Richard Wurst's opera "Vineta," in July. Hitherto operatic proceedings there have comprised Fr. Stehle's appearances from Munich, who has been performing in Gounod's "Faust," in "Le Nozze," as Rose Friquet in "The Hermit's Bell," (Glöckchen des Eremiten) and in "La Figlia." After the effect produced by Carlotta Patti, the Mannheimers appreciated Fr. Stehle the more; for Mannheim, it would seem, took the oppositionary side in the Continental schism touching Carlotta's merits, and Stehle, being free from vocal coquetry and unspoiled by the advertising weakness of Ullmanity, was welcomed in Mannheim. The success of Schneider, from Rotterdam, is historical but unimportant.

MUNICH.—The following are the programmes of the Concerts of the musical Academy this season, under the direction of Herr Lachner, and which, having been interrupted by the death of the king, were not brought to a termination until the 13th May:—

First Concert:—A major Symphony, Beethoven; Soprano Air, with obligato clarinet accompaniment from Spohr's Faust; Violin Concerto, by Lafont; two Vocal Quartets, by Mendelssohn; Taubert's overture to Tausend und eine Nacht.—Second Concert: Suite in E minor, No. 2, by Franz Lachner; Aria, by Rossini; B minor Concerto by Hummel; two Songs by Franz Schubert and Esser; Mendelssohn's Overture to Athalie.—Third Concert: A Symphony in C major, by J. Haydn; Duet from Spohr's Jessonda; Symphonie Concertante, for violin and tenor, by Mozart; three Songs (one by Franz Lachner and two by Schumann); Violoncello-Concerto, by Lintner; Overture to Les Abencerrages, by Cherubini.—Fourth Concert: Mozart's A major Symphony; Two Trios for female voices, by Franz Lachner; Romance for the Violin (op. 40) by Beethoven; "Columbus" a Symphony, by J. J. Abert.—Fifth Concert: Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony; the 63d Psalm, by Franz Lachner; Suite for Stringed Band, by J. S. Bach; two Duets for female voices, by Weber; "Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt," by Mendelssohn.

FLORENCE.—The Lower-Rhine Musikzeitung has an article on "German Music in Italy"—limited for the most part to chamber music. The writer says:

We have already directed attention in these columns to the fact that, considering the predominant partiality of the Italians for singing, and the widely diffused taste for popular melody more especially, we must regard it as a remarkable sign of modern times that chamber music is beginning to make its way in a country which, it is true, has produced such violinists as Corelli, Tartini, and Paganini, as well as several eminent pianists, but has hitherto appreciated and admired the violin and piano simply as solo instruments, and the most distinguished masters of the latter as mere solo virtuosos.

The Quartet Association of Florence is, therefore, deserving of the highest praise. It has been in existence for three years, and, despite of want of sympathy and prejudice, besides opposition on the part of musical Italianissimi, an opposition actually connected with political hostility and partiality proceeding from the latter, has, by perseverance and devotion to art, brought matters to so high a pitch, that its meetings are numerous attended and deeply appreciated. We have received the following information from Florence respecting its last meeting:—

On the 26th of May, the third year of the Quartet Association was brought to a characteristic conclusion by a "Mendelssohn Festival," which was hailed with genuine enthusiasm. Yet it was not one of the master's oratorios or symphonies which met with this success, but a performance of some of his chamber music, for the propagation of which the Association has already done so much.

The programme for the occasion comprised only such pieces as had produced the greatest impression at the previous morning concerts. The pieces were: the Violin Quartet in B flat major, the pianoforte Quartet in F minor, and the Ottet for Stringed Instruments. The performance was marvellously good. The young violinist Papini, who is only eighteen years of age, astounded the audience, and has already eclipsed every other violinist in Florence. Signor Jandelli, violoncellist; Signor Sasso, second violinist; Signori Chiostrì and Matrolini, violists, greatly distinguished themselves. "But what shall we say of the execution of the Ottet?" asks the number of the musical paper Il Boccherini (edited by Signor Basevi) now lying before us. "This colossal composition was played with astounding magnificence by the eight excellent artists. All the movements of this master-work were rendered with the most conscientious fidelity characteristic of real artists, and the tumultuous applause they evoked was unanimous. This meeting will be long remembered by all those who attended it. How highly desirable it would be if professional musicians, as well as teachers and students of music, would no longer close their minds to the conviction that it is no loss of time to listen to such music, and that it is far more advantageous and profitable to become acquainted with, and learn how to appreciate the beauties it contains, and to form one's taste by them, than to employ one's leisure in composing romances, polkas and other productions of an ephemeral nature."

"All which," says a correspondent of the London Musical World, "may sound very new and æsthetic in Florentine ears, but is simply a string of truisms to Englishmen."—And not to them alone.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, AUGUST 6, 1864.

Public School Festival.

The seventy-first annual festival of the Public Schools of Boston was held on Tuesday afternoon, July 26, at the Boston Music Hall. It was mainly a musical festival, after the pattern established a few years since, and still continually improved upon, under the auspices of the musical branch of the School Committee,—especially of its enthusiastic and devoted chairman, Dr. J. B. UPHAM. This gentleman was the originator of the plan; and to his ingenuity and unwearied supervision even to the smallest details, of selecting and organizing the singers, making them available to Mr. ZERRAEN's drill, and seating them so admirably, this most beautiful of the periodical occasions of our city is due.

It is but a short time since the children were brought together in the same tuneful manner for the special purpose of welcoming our Russian guests. That experience opportunely served as a rehearsal for the present, the programme being largely, though not entirely, the same. The coup d'œil was more beautiful than ever; the 1200 children rising tier on tier each side of the Great Organ to the upper gallery,—boys in the rear and centre like grey seeds or stamens in a huge flower,—girls in lily white, variegated with gay colored scarfs and ribbons, forming the wide-spread petals, while the multitude of fairy little restless fans fluttered like so many curious butterflies. In the centre, front, stood the orchestra; behind them sat Mr. LANG at the Organ, and in front the Conductor waved his baton. The perfect order, unity and quiet with which the numerous squads and companies of children, issuing from mysterious recesses in all parts of the building, filed into their places at various heights of the great pyramid, was perhaps the most remarkable thing in the whole spectacle; it was like a fugue, or any polyphonous composition, to the eye.

The singing we thought better on the whole than ever before. First came the Lord's Prayer, to a Gregorian chant, in unison, by the whole. More ritual than music about this. The "Star-Spangled Banner" was sung very effectively. The grandest pieces were Luther's Choral: "A strong castle is our Lord," and Handel's "Hallelujah" Chorus. The latter was much more impressive than we had expected of children's voices, without the tenors and basses; but here, as in other pieces, the great Organ came in for an admirable solution of that problem, supplying all the bass desired. On its great sea of harmony you can float the largest chorus of child voices with full safety. Softer and sweeter pieces were the "Chorus of Angels" from Costa's "Eli," sung by pupils of the Girls' High and Normal School, with such precision and delicacy that it had to be repeated, and the "Prayer" in Der Freyschütz "in muted tones," that is hummed with closed lips,—a repetition of a very curious and pleasing effect.—In the intervals of the music addresses were made by several leading citizens; the medal scholars (of two years, some 500 in number), were marshalled round the hall to the front of the stage, where each was introduced to Mayor Lincoln and was presented with an elegant bouquet of flowers; and the exercises closed with the singing of "Old Hundred" and a benediction by the chaplain of the day. The only thing that seemed superfluous, inducing uneasiness, was the speech-making, although the speeches were all short and good. But what need of them at all?

Mendelssohn's Organ Sonatas.

The analysis in the Leipzig Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung, which we commenced translating in our last, proceeds as follows:

"The first movement of the Fourth Sonata (in B flat major, Allegro con brio, 4-4,) consists for the most part in the elaboration of a rather orchestral than organ-like principal theme, accompanied partly by single strokes in full chords, partly by a running motive in semi-quavers, introduced at the very outset. Well as this movement in itself is worked up, and little as it falls short of the effect sought by massive organ music, still it seems to lack the breath that quickens and warms up the hearer. But for this we are fully compensated by the Adagio religioso, which again makes admirable use of the alternate Manuals, and by the Allegretto, 6-8 time, into which it leads, and which is as charming and as tender as only Sebastian Bach's Pastorella can be. A middle voice executes upon the first Manual the ductile accompaniment, written in fleeting semi-quaver figures; the Pedal marks the ground-tone in single crotchets, separated by pauses. The melody, in F major, lies at first in the upper voice, and is also played on the first Manual; then there enters a counter-theme, situated in the tenor and performed upon the second Manual, of a wonderful, romantic expression in its more sombre minor coloring. At last both voices unite in continuous and unbroken companionship, and so the movement ends as a duet. An energetic, skilfully wrought Finale of considerable compass closes this Sonata.

"No. 5 is introduced by an earnest, devotional Chorale, whose perhaps rather artificial closing turns are as remarkable in a harmonic point of view as they are suited to the organ. In the orchestral manner again, but not the less organ-like, is conceived the following somewhat gloomy and constrained Andante con moto, in B minor, with its pizzicato basses, and which finds a fresh and glad solution in the appended Allegro maestoso in D major. The tempo of this Finale must indeed be fiery, but it cannot be taken too fast without compromising its effect upon the organ, which does not admit of very great rapidity in the somewhat piano-like triplet figures here employed.

"The Sixth Sonata contains, besides the plain Chorale: 'Our Father who art in Heaven,' several variations of the same, a fugue upon a theme taken from the Canto fermo, and lastly, a Finale, Andante, D major, 6-8 time. The Chorale, which belongs to the Dorian mode, is here treated throughout in D minor. The first variation is like so many written by Bach; for three voices, each of which pursues its own self-determined course, entirely characteristic and distinct from that of the others. In the second variation the Pedal has a figured bass in triplets, while the Manual bears the simple Chorale in full harmony. In the third the tenor takes the melody; the Pedal, in a short, fragmentary manner, accompanies the right hand, whose movement is now short and broken, now more or less bound, for the most part duet-wise, in Thirds and Sixths. The two treatments of the Chorale which now follow, in the first of which the Pedal executes the Canto fermo, while in the second it is divided among the several upper voices, have for their accompaniment a figure in broken chords, whose so extended use we cannot altogether like. On the other hand, the Fugue, which follows, with its spirited and lively rhythm, and in its dignified and simple keeping, brings us back to the right ground. With this we would have gladly ended the Sonata. Truly beautiful, full of childlike piety and devotion as the following Andante (Finale) in itself is, and much as we recognize the deep significance which the composer meant to give to this movement in this place, yet it seems to us, in its ever modern, although noble coloring, to contrast too strongly with the antique Chorale of Luther, which, as treated in this Sonata, tells far better than the one incorporated in the third. It does not seem to set the right seal on the whole as the concluding piece.

"And so we close our notice of a work in many respects so new and so peculiar. It commends a great wealth of things excellent and beautiful, and must surely have a weighty influence on our present organ literature, which cherishes the traditional forms more than it does the ancient spirit."

Organ Concerts.

Mr. GEORGE W. MORGAN, of New York, gave a performance on the Music Hall Organ, on Thursday evening, July 21. It had been announced in several newspapers that this concert was especially designed "to test the powers" of the great instrument, and the programme was made up accordingly. What this might mean, 'twere difficult to say, seeing that "the powers of the instrument," to our unenlightened way of thinking, seemed to have been pretty satisfactorily "tested" by every organist and every programme thus far, including Mr. Morgan himself. And as to Mr. Morgan's present programme, every organ piece in it but two had been played on the great organ repeatedly before, and the two exceptions were not at all exceptional in character or claims upon the organ's powers. However, Mr. Morgan has certain requisites of a fine organist in a remarkable degree. In prompt, free, sure delivery of passages, whether for full organ or a few stops; in a certain dash and animation with which he starts off and carries through the broader, grander movements: in clever knack of instrumentation (by couplings and contrasts of stops), and in various masteries of "effect," he is unsurpassed among our organists. Of his artistic tone, as illustrated in his programmes, in his variations, transcriptions, &c., and in the sacrifices which he seems to us sometimes too willingly to make to momentary effect, we cannot speak so highly. If now and then he chooses a work of Bach, it is a work of minor importance, like that Fugue in D, which doubtless belongs to Bach's apprentice days, and sounds as if written for a finger exercise; how thin and empty compared with the great fugues, toccatas, &c., into which the master has put all himself! The "St. Ann's" fugue, as the English call it, because in its first theme you may recognize some of the intervals of the church tune so called, is more important; but still not one of the most interesting, not one of the most characteristic of Bach's fugues; chiefly remarkable among the others for consisting of several movements with change of time; a good solid work, yet not one to account for whose origin we need a Sebastian Bach. This piece opened the concert referred to, and Mr. Morgan played it clearly, firmly, altogether well.

His transcription of movements (Adagio ma non troppo, Minuetto and Trio), from a Symphony (No. 21), by Haydn, struck us as the most successful of all his renderings of that kind. The piece admitted of it, the involution of the parts not being too polyphonic; and so nice was the choice of stops, so clear the reading, that it afforded us a very life-like and genial portrait of a Haydn symphony. The other new piece, Prelude and Fugue No. 3, by Mendelssohn, was large, full, and satisfying. This, if we remember rightly, was one of several instances in which good taste might quarrel with a trick which this organist has of lengthening out the final sub-bass tone without rhyme or reason, as if that pipe, and not the composer's idea, were the thing to call attention to.

Of the Battiste Offertoire in F minor (dedicated to Morgan); the Overture to "Tell"; the "Pastoral" by Kullak (so often played, and really one of the best of the pretty things); the March from the Prophete, and "National Airs," it would hardly be worth the while, if it were possible, to say anything new. We all know Mr. Morgan's mastery in such things. In execution he has one rare merit, above all the organists, perhaps—especially in playing the full organ—that of not dragging behind the time, starting off briskly and decidedly and making you feel the movement.

Mr. Morgan had the vocal assistance of Mr. F. A. CHASE, basso of Grace Church, New York, who sang Callcott's "Last Man," quite a declamatory piece, with such a musical, sonorous organ, such chaste style, such life and expression as to excite the enthusiastic applause of an audience unusually large. In response he sung a sentimental ballad, and afterwards another, the "Jewish Maiden," by Kücken, with equal acceptance. A more classical and earnest audience would have better relished somewhat different selections.

Mr. MORGAN played again at the regular noonday concert of the following Saturday, with this programme.

1. Fugue, in D. . . . . J. S. Bach
2. War March, (Athalie). . . . . Mendelssohn
3. Larghetto, (Second Symphony). . . . . Beethoven
4. Overture, (Freyshuts.) Transcribed. . . . . Weber
5. March, (Tannhauser). . . . . Wagner
6. Improvisation on National Melodies. . . . . Morgan

On Wednesday, July 27, Mr. WILLCOX played, as follows:

1. Short Prelude and Fugue in E minor. . . . . Bach
2. Offertoire in C minor. . . . . Wely
3. Gloria, from Mass in G. . . . . Weber
4. Offertoire in D minor. . . . . Battiste
5. Improvisation, introducing Vox Humana. . . . .
6. Chorus. "Achieved is the glorious work". . . . . Haydn

The richest programme, and to an intelligent, serious audience, most interesting organ concert of the season, was that of Mr. J. K. PAINE, last Saturday. And it was encouraging to see an audience so large, and such good listeners.

1. Variations on the Chorale. "In greatest need I cry to Thee. . . . . Bach
(For the Full Organ, in six part harmony and with double pedals.)
2. Sonata in D. No. 6. . . . . Mendelssohn
1—Andante. 2—Andante con moto. 3—Allegro maestoso.
3. Offertoire in B minor. No. 2. . . . . Paine
4. Toccata in E flat minor. . . . . Thiele
5. Choral Variation. "O, weep for thy great sins". . . . . Bach
6. Trio Sonata in C minor. . . . . Bach
1—Vivace. 2—Largo. 3—Allegro.
7. Grand Prelude in E flat. . . . . Bach

Here was a plentiful provision of the best. Possibly a little too much of a good thing,—that was the only fault. It exceeded the hour. We suspect that the omission of the Toccata by Thiele would have improved the effect of the whole. That is a very long, crowded, roaring movement for full organ without a moment's relief, nor are we quite sure that its inspiration is not too much of the bravura character. An immensely difficult, astounding piece, but not so very edifying, to judge from that one hearing. At all events the concert contained meat enough without that. And there are too many long stretches of full organ for right enjoyment thereof all in one hour. The ear and nerves become fatigued with the excessive strain, when so prolonged; and yet there is nothing so grand, so inspiring, so fit to roll out the great thoughts of a man like Bach, when largely given but with a little more relief.

The first piece, variations on the Chorale: "Aus tiefer Noth," was inexpressibly grand and satisfying. Its richly involved six-part harmony would reward long study; but the effect, æsthetic and spiritual, is felt at once, only deepening with repetition. This was all given with full organ, but it was short, and it was while the senses were fresh. The Mendelssohn Sonata is one which has been played here less frequently than the others, but a very fine one; a little want of evenness in time suggested the question whether the different degrees of remoteness of different choirs of pipes does not sometimes prevent the sounds from reaching the ear precisely at the same instant. Mr. Paine's Offertoire, a new one, has at least the merit of being in a serious, religious vein, and not after the operatic, showy, Verdi-ish French offerings by that name which have been so liberally contributed to these Organ concerts. It is moreover a pleasing, clearly connected, contrapuntal piece of writing, with only perhaps a little too much repetition here and there of form and phrase without addition to the meaning.

The second Choral Variation of Bach is one of the sweetest and loveliest of the tribe. The Trio Sonata is even more interesting than that in E flat; there certainly is no lack of variety or individual charm in its movements, and we think no piece could have been more enjoyable to the audience at large. It is by frequent hearing of a few such pieces, together with a few of the grander kind, like the Toccata in E, the Fugue in G minor, &c., that the ear and heart of the public may best be educated to a true appreciation of Sebastian Bach. The Grand Prelude in E flat is a splendid composition and was splendidly played; but this too was new, and being mainly for full Organ, after so much of full organ, and so long a programme, did not make all the impression that it might have done under other circumstances. To students of Bach, like ourselves (if on the strength chiefly of "loving much" we may dare call ourselves so), the hearing of so many new pieces was an opportunity by no means to be missed. It is only in view of educating an audience, or public for such music, that we question whether it was altogether wise to give so large a dose of the new and best at once. But then such an organist and Bachist as Mr. Paine seems seldom to get a chance of late. We hope it will not again be so long before he takes his turn.

MUSICAL THEORY.—The diffusion of a knowledge of musical theory among us is desirable beyond measure, as it is by that means alone that the art of music may become something more than a mere amusement or superficial accomplishment. Let this science be studied as universally as the science of any other language, and the result would soon appear in such a general refinement of taste and judgment that the musical trash which now attracts so strongly the popular attention, would speedily give place to noble and genuine works of art which would excite a far more earnest and heartfelt enjoyment.

It is with much pleasure that we see by the advertisement of Mr. OLIVER, Principal of the "Mendelssohn Musical Institute," that he will give opportunity to all who desire it, to make a separate study of the Theory of Music, in its broadest sense, and in the most thorough manner; and, what is quite as desirable to many, upon very reasonable terms, that it may be within the means of all. From our knowledge of Mr. Oliver, and from his pupils who are enthusiastic in their delight in this branch of their study, we are satisfied that it is presented in a very attractive and interesting manner, and the pleasure of attending such classes, will, we have no doubt, be equal to the profit gained by the instructions.

NEW YORK.—In spite of dog days they have been giving English Opera at the Olympic Theatre. Balfe's "Rose of Castile" was played all last week. We take a few sentences from a criticism in the Tribune of July 30:

"An operatic company singing and sweating in a theatre with the thermometer near ninety is the pursuit of Apollo under difficulties. So, accordingly, Madame Borchard succumbed by the close of the first act of Rose of Castile, on Wednesday evening, overcome by rehearsal fatigues and the weather; and the audience was invited to go away by the stage manager, getting admission checks for Thursday night. On the latter night the entertainment was resumed from the commencement, and played spite of the mercury till the end.

The music of Rose of Castile is by Mr. Balfe. It is called an opera in English parlance—and even "a grand opera" in the bills—but strictly speaking, according to the Italian meaning of the term opera, it is not one, but simply a musical drama, more than half being spoken dialogue.

The objections to the introduction of speaking into a so-called opera are numerous, but the chief are that the breaks between the singing and speaking are horribly nasty and disagreeable; as no voice, not even the best, can stand such clips and cadences as occur between the sustentations of the singing voice and the gobbling-up of words in the required manner for English consonants and all the world of elision with which our language abounds. Another reason is that vocalists after singing declaim badly, and after declamation are apt to sing badly. Another is that if a singer be gifted with a fine voice and good method and style, and is a stick of an actor, his acting is much overlooked while singing, but not overlooked at all when acting—and hence he subsides from an artist into a bore. Another reason is the dreary rubbish which constitutes about nineteen-twentieths of the dialogue of the so-called English opera.

Rose of Castile is a drama the merit of which lies with Mr. Balfe's music. The libretto is good for nothing. Plot there is none.

It is a pity that a man of the quickness and resources of Mr. Balfe has to waste them on such words. It is a pity, too, that the publishers' interests in England should reduce what ought to be opera to certain ballads with occasionally a concerted piece, dislocated by a quantity of dreary bulk between each piece. That music under such apologies for opera can succeed in establishing a critical love for lyrical art is impossible.

There are several charmingly-written pieces in this work; but the school does not admit of the scope or elaboration of the grand opera, or carry away the auditor with the défilé of the scene.

The rehearsals were inadequate. Some singing was out of tune and some acting astray.

Among the artists new to our boards we have had occasion to mention several times Mr. Campbell. He has a baritone of extraordinary power, and all he needs is more familiarity with the stage. Mr. Castle has a tone of grazia which is much liked and approved by the audience. Another debutante showing distinct talent is Miss Meyers. This young lady under proper drilling has the stuff for an artist. We do not deem it necessary to criticize further—and may merely mention that the English or American Company at the Olympic Theatre are to close this week, according to announcement."

GERMAN OPERA.—The company under the management of Mr. Grover, and the musical direction of Carl Anschütz, achieved such success last season, as to make it clearly for the interest of Art and all concerned, that such a capital nucleus should be kept together at all hazards, drawing to itself new elements, so as to take the field with irresistible prestige next autumn, and make German opera henceforth an established institution in this country,—equal in outward position to Italian Opera, and much more than equal in intrinsic musical importance. This troupe left Boston last May with the promise to return to us before next winter—perhaps as early as September. But meanwhile the newspapers have had ominous hints of a division of the company, of Anschütz, with Formes and others, seceding and setting up a lyrical confederacy by themselves, while Grover has an agent in Europe gathering up new artists. The latter part of the statement is well, but the former were disastrous if true. Fortunately it is not true; these Germans feel that in union there is strength. Mr. Grover's company, we are assured, will maintain its integrity, with Anschütz as conductor, and with the addition of several new artists, especially the much needed baritone. Johannsen the charming Frederici, the tenors Habelmann and Himmer, Mephisto-Falstaff-Hermanns, and all are pretty certain to revisit us, and at an early date taking the start of Maretzke.

ITALIAN OPERA.—For some time the papers have been full of manifold guesses, rumors and announcements of Maretzke's new troupe for next season. These have taken a more definitive shape at last in the New York Times of Aug. 2, as follows:

Briefly, his company, up to the present time, is as follows: Prima Donnas, Carlotta Carozzi-Zucchi and Elvira Brambilla. These are sopranos; the first dramatic and powerful, the second lyric and tender. Prima Donnas Contraltos, Mmilles. Gebelle and Morensi, the latter a New York favorite, who was last season with Mr. Grau. Tenors, Signor Massimiliani and Signor Lotti. Basso, Signor Susini. Baritone, Signor Bellini. Fortune has favored Mr. Maretzke in the matter of a tenor. The gentleman is already here, and we learn from excellent authority that his voice is of surpassing excellence and grandeur. So far from being an unworthy successor of Signor Mazcollini, it is hinted, with an irreverence which nothing but the infinite truth can justify, that he far excels that fine artist. Not having heard the new tenor we may be permitted to display a lofty and conspicuous discretion by not speaking of his merits. The weather being warm, however, we cannot help uttering a feeble explanation of surprise at the strange coincidence, that whilst Mazcollini should go to a bad Maximilian, a good Massimiliani should come to us, and in an abject way we think this augurs well for the future of Fourteenth street if not of Mexico.

The ladies are known to Fame, who speaks well of them. Mlle. Zucchi has sung at three of the principal opera houses of Europe, and always with success. Mr. Maretzke endeavored to engage this lady two years ago, but was unable to do so. He has now the satisfaction of paying her two thousand five hundred dollars per month in gold, which, in its picturesque but fickle equivalent, will be (say to-day at 6 A. M.) equivalent to $6475. Brambilla will probably "strike" for a higher salary after the first season, for the poor girl only receives (say to-day at 6 A. M.) $4144 per month.

Every one will be glad to welcome Susini back to the New York stage. He is one of the best basses we have ever had in this country, and has now no superior. The same pleasure will be manifested at the re-entrée of Bellini—an admirable baritone. Of the younger kind, M. Maretzke has undoubtedly selected the two best in Mde. Morensi and Signora Lotti. It would be difficult, indeed, to find fresher voices in any theatre of Europe. Other engagements are yet in an embryonic state.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Baby, sleep, shadows creep. Cradle song of the Soldier's wife. Theo. H. Barker. 30
A simple lullaby, rendered touching by the allusion to the father, camping "far away beside the river."

The Mermaid. (He was a Prince with golden hair). C. A. Shaw. 30
A pretty fragment of some old legend, commemorating the love of a water-nymph for a handsome prince, who, all unconscious of the eyes that watched him from the waves, thought to espouse a young lady whose residence was on the dry land.

Ruler's daughter. Sacred song. Mrs. M. S. B. Dana. 30
Simple and beautiful. Mrs. Dana's songs are among the best of our sacred, easy lyrics.

Sister, thou art now an angel. Song. S. O. Spencer. 30
A simple home ballad, pleasant to sing "in memoriam" by those who have lost a sister.

Here upon my vessel's deck. (Sulla poppa). "Prison d'Edinburgh." 35
This includes the favorite melody of Ricci's waltz, and has both Italian and English words, the latter a translation of the former.

The Post Horn. Song. F. Schubert. 30
A German song of classic merit, with words in the original and in English.

Instrumental Music.

Wilt thou not love me? (M'aimerez vous autant?). Poesie pour Piano. D. Krug. 40
A piece that may be safely recommended. Very melodious and tasteful, and not difficult.

Mountain stream. Morceau for piano. S. Smith. 60
Of medium difficulty, with music conveying the idea of a sprightly torrent, dancing down from the hills.

The dream after the ball. Fantasia. H. C. Lumbye. 30
A lady, returning from the ball, might, naturally enough, dream over the incidents of the preceding hours of pleasure; and the fantasia contains just a dream; a brilliant melange of ball-melodies, with additional music appropriate to the train of happy memories.

Helter skelter galop. James Cassidy. 30
As the name indicates, a hurry scurry of notes, that would serve as a march for a crowd rushing to a steamboat landing, when the boat is just ready to be off.

Books.

THE SABBATH SCHOOL TRUMPET.—A new collection of Hymns and Tunes, Chants and Anthems, and a Cantata, "The origin of the Seasons," by W. O. & H. S. Perkins. Boards 35
Paper 30

Another contribution to Sabbath musical literature, in the shape of about a hundred and twenty new songs, containing quite a variety of subjects, and most of them very spirited. The cantata at the end is pretty, and may be just the thing for your next S. S. anniversary.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 610.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, AUG. 20, 1864.

VOL. XXIV. No. 11.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Half a dozen of Beethoven's Contemporaries.

II. ANTONIO SALIERI.

(Continued from page 282.)

Mosel gives us the history of Azur from Salieri's own papers. The composer and poet began their labor as a mere translation—obeying in this Joseph's order. Three or four mornings they had wrought thus in company, but with little satisfaction in their work, as both doubted the possibility of its success in Vienna. "The music," says Salieri, "being composed for the French singing actors, was everywhere too wanting in melodies for the Italian acting singers. When the poet was satisfied with his verses, the music—to use the expression of Gluck—tasted too much of translation; and when, to satisfy my ear, the text was adapted to the finished music, Da Ponte was displeased with his poetry. In my anxiety lest we both should labor in vain, I chose rather to compose a new music to the same subject. I therefore asked the poet to plan a poem on the basis of the French original, but suited to the Italian Opera Company, and to arrange the various vocal pieces in concurrence with me, while as to the versification he should follow his own taste: I would see to the rest." Da Ponte accepted the proposition. They began anew. Poet and composer went hand in hand. When a musical idea in the Tarare could be used, Salieri adopted it; when this was not the case, he composed the music afresh. A rheumatic disease of his knee compelled Salieri for some three weeks to keep his room, and thus, by relieving him from all his duties in the theatre, enabled him to devote his whole time to the Azur and hasten its completion. As another means of gaining time, he composed the scenes as Da Ponte brought them, one by one, at first for the voices and the instrumental bass, and sent them in this condition to the copyist, that they might be put the sooner into the hands of the vocalists. Joseph, learning that three acts were already finished, not knowing however in what manner the composer had wrought, but supposing a mere translation of the French text had been made by the poet and adapted to the music by Salieri—desired to have what was ready in his usual afternoon concerts. He had the manuscript brought him from the copyist and the usual musicians called together. They soon noticed that the scores contained nothing but the vocal parts, with here and there a ritornel as a hint for the accompaniment, and that the rest of the staves for the instrumentation were vacant. They mentioned this to Joseph, who replied: "That's no matter; we have the printed score of the French opera; the instruments can be played out of that, and the others can sing with me, at the pianoforte, out of the Italian manuscript."

So each took his place. The Emperor, sitting at the pianoforte, began. "Act 1. Scene 1,

"The French opera begins with a prologue," was the reply.

"That they have probably omitted in the translation," answered Joseph; "turn to the first scene."

"Here," said the musicians, "it begins with a dialogue in recitative."

"In my copy," returned the monarch, "the opera begins with a duet, which serves as an introduction, followed by an air and then by a short duet."

"In our score," said the musicians, "there is nothing of all that to be found."

Nearly two hours were spent in examining and comparing, without finding anything that was exactly the same in the two scores; and the fruit of all their pains was at last the discovery occasionally of a similar musical thought, which, however, was generally in another key and introduced in an entirely different connection with the others. At last Joseph exclaimed, laughing: "It is enough to make one crazy! What in the world have the two been about! Go to Salieri," turning to Kreibitz, "and tell him of the pretty comedy we have been playing." Kreibitz [or Kreibitz] came the same evening to the composer, told him the story, and added that the Emperor was not satisfied with the alterations he had undertaken. A day or two later Salieri was able to go again to the palace. As soon as Joseph saw him, he began: "I am glad to see you well again. Day before yesterday you brought us almost to despair with your music. Tell me though, why you have so completely changed your French music?"

Upon Salieri's explaining (as above given) the reasons for this, not only were they deemed sufficient, but Joseph, after the performance, "praised the work and gave the composer an imperial reward for the pains he had taken."

The haste with which Da Ponte had been recalled from Prague before the production of Don Giovanni—an order which as salaried Court Poet he could not disobey—proved unnecessary. The marriage ceremony of the Archduke Francis was to be performed by his uncle, Maximilian Francis, the young Elector and Archbishop of Cologne; but he did not leave Bonn until the 11th of December ('87), and was nine days on the way. Then came the Christmas holidays, so that the wedding was put off until January 6th, 1788,—and of course with it the production of Azur. When given, it proved in its new form as splendid a success in Vienna as it had been in Paris in its old. It was given twenty-nine times during the year, notwithstanding—as shown by the list above given—seven other new Italian operas were studied and brought out by Nov. 14th—the second of them being Don Giovanni. A sufficient reason why Mozart's opera did not immediately follow the Azur may also be found in the taste of Joseph for the pure opera buffa—which taste was gratified by the production of Paisiello's "La Modiste"—not to mention the inhumanity, it might almost be called, of demanding of the troupe the study and rehearsal of Mozart's mighty score immediately after the great labor of bringing out Salieri's greatest work.

Azur immediately went the round of the Italian opera houses in Germany, and in a poor translation was, within some two years, on all the principal national stages also. It was one, if not the last, of the operas in which Ludwig van Beethoven, viola player in the Bonn orchestra, could have performed his part before leaving his native city forever.

The story told by Kriebitz to Salieri of the attempted rehearsal in Joseph's music-room of the unfinished music of Azur is fully borne out by the long parallel which Mosel gives of the Tarare and the Azur. The overture and an aria or two are about all that is unchanged. The critic, who in the Berlin Mus. Wochenblatt (Oct., 1791), says, after the performance of Azur at Potsdam: "Still a large portion of the music composed for the French text remains,"—should inform us what he understands by the term "a large portion." He, however, praises the work very highly indeed. "On the whole," he concludes, "this music produces an effect which can only be felt, and admits not of description; and it might properly be reckoned among the very best of its class, if it was not here and there a little too rhapsodical."

Mosel says: "The opera Azur not only shares all these combined excellences, [those mentioned above as distinguishing Tarare], but surpasses them in this, that, without diminishing any one of them, the melody is still more prominent, captivating and penetrating than in Tarare. It may therefore be boldly affirmed, that Azur is the most excellent of all serious Italian operas—Mozart's Clemenza di Tito included—that is, be it carefully remarked, as a dramatic tone-work, and not as a vocal composition in the wider sense of the term."

In April, 1788, old Bono died, at the age of seventy-eight, and Salieri was appointed his successor as Imperial Royal Chapelmaster—a place to which he was certainly entitled, and of which he was worthy, if long and successful service as director and composer could give him a title or render him worthy. If this appointment was made directly after Bono's decease, the patent must have been ready some time previously, as the Emperor left Vienna February 29th for the camp, in the war against the Turks, and did not see his capital again until the 5th of December. His office gave him two hundred ducats ($1250?) more salary (according to Gerber), but added much to his labors, for he had now the direction not only of the Opera, but also of the sacred music in the palace chapel.

If the patent, as I suspect, was dated in April, we have the significant fact that his first duty as chief Chapelmaster was to bring out Mozart's Don Giovanni—for La Modiste, by Paisiello, was already rehearsed, so as to be produced April 21st—and that at this very time he had himself finished a new opera, "Cublai," text by Casti, which he had not power nor influence enough to put upon the stage—neither then nor at any subsequent period.

Another sentence from Jahn (IV. 307), immediately following what has been above cited in relation to the production of Don Giovanni, belongs here, and is as follows: "But Joseph II., who was much pleased with the success of Don Giovanni in Prague, had commanded the performance [of it in Vienna], and so at last it had to be taken in hand." If Salieri and his partisans were the cause that Mozart's opera had not been given previously, during the Emperor's presence in Vienna, is it not a very curious circumstance, that now, when at the head of the Italian theatre, Salieri, with the aid of his allies, was unable, in the absence of the monarch, to suppress it entirely and produce his own new work in its stead? Fourteen times during Joseph's absence Don Giovanni was performed, and once (Dec. 15th) after his return. But whether he—mostly confined to his bed as he was—ever heard that opera, is a point I am unable to determine.

And here, I think, the close of our discussions of the relations between Mozart and Salieri—save a fact or two which will come in their proper places—is reached. I cannot, however, dismiss the matter without a farther remark or two.

1. Mozart writes to his father in July, 1783, [see Nissen, 474-5; Holmes, 239-40 (Am. Ed.)]; Jahn III., 276-7] that, having composed a rondo for the tenor Adamberger to introduce into Anfossi's opera, "Il Curioso Indiscreto," Salieri, at a rehearsal, took the singer aside and told him that Count Rosenberg [general manager] would not like it if he introduced an air, and as a friend advised him not to do it; and that in consequence of this "tour," or trick, the rondo was omitted. Of the bare fact in this case there can be no question. True, it rests upon Mozart's letter alone; but he was a man of truth. It should, however, not be forgotten that on this occasion the German songstress, Lange, sister of Mozart's wife—who did introduce two arias—and Adamberger, the German tenor, made their first appearance on the Italian stage, thus invading a territory which had belonged almost exclusively to the Italians. It was the most natural thing in the world that the Italians, young Salieri and all, should make common cause in the work of keeping the Italian opera in their own hands, and not allowing the Germans from the Kärnthnerthor to drive them from the stage of the Burg. It was equally natural that Mozart should put the worst construction upon the affair, and suppose that Salieri was the "head and front" of the offence of not allowing him opportunity to exhibit the talents he was conscious of possessing.

2. Mozart's suspicions of Salieri seem to have had their origin in an occurrence soon after his settlement in Vienna, in 1781. The Princess of Wurtemberg, the bride of Archduke Francis, had come to Vienna to have the advantages of the capital in completing her education, and Mozart applied through Archduke Maximilian (afterward Elector of Cologne) for the position of her music teacher. Maximilian, says Jahn (III., 49), "applied at once to the Princess * * *, but received the answer that if it depended upon her she should have chosen him; but the Emperor—'with him there is nothing but Salieri!' writes Mozart, fretfully—had proposed Salieri for the sake of her singing, whom she therefore must take, for which she was very sorry."

Knowing as we do the relations between Joseph and Salieri, and the latter's very great talents and acquirements in the vocal art, is it possible to conceive that the Emperor should pass him by and give the appointment to the young emigrant from Salzburg? But that the next year Mozart could not obtain the place of teacher of the piano-forte to the Princess, owing to the opposition of Salieri, seems to be the fact, and one which is to the discredit of the Italian.

Finally. Da Ponte nowhere hints at any misunderstanding between the two composers, nor at any efforts of Salieri to hinder the production of either Figaro or Don Giovanni. Yet he, Da Ponte, was a friend and even protégé, as well as countryman, of Salieri; and it certainly would not have been difficult for the Imperial Royal Court Chapelmaster to have exerted some decisive influence upon his countryman, the Imperial Royal Court Poet, and to have hindered him from giving Mozart two such splendid subjects for the exhibition of his talents, as those two greatest of Italian operas.

And now let a few lines from Holmes (227-8), of which the reader may believe as much as he pleases, or his judgment will let him, conclude this matter.

"The most active and inveterate against Mozart of all the Italian clique was Salieri. This composer, whose talents were just sufficient to enable him to live in some estimation, was a creature of Gluck's. Salieri had been with that master in Paris [a mistake], and to him Gluck confided the libretto of his opera [mistake No. 2] of the 'Danaïdes,' the work with which he intended to close his own labors, when an attack of apoplexy made him suddenly cease writing and consult the preservation of his health in retirement."

Then in a note Holmes adds:—

"Salieri imitated the style of Gluck in his Tarare and other works, which are now, according to the usual fate of imitations, forgotten. As this composer has long been notorious for his animosity against Mozart, some personal description may not be unwelcome. The mother of the celebrated Signora Storace, who saw him repeatedly in Vienna, described him as a little man, with an animated countenance and peculiarly fine eyes, and his appearance altogether strongly reminded her of Garrick."

These passages from Holmes remind one of St. Paul's words: "For I hear them record that they have a zeal of God, but not according to knowledge."

NOTE.—Würzbach, in his Austrian Biographic Lexicon, Art. "Joseph II.," gives the following dates:—

- 1788. Jan. 6. Marriage of Archduke Francis.
- Feb. 9. War declared against the Turks.
- " 29. Emperor's departure for the army.
- March 14. His arrival at Semlin.
- April 24. Taking of Sabacs.
- Aug. 7. Turkish invasion of the Banat.
- " 27. Taking of Dubicza.
- Sept. 20. Retreat from Caransches.
- " 29. Taking of Chocsim.
- Oct. 3. Taking of Novi.
- Dec. 5. Joseph's return to Vienna.

I have consulted several authorities, all of which confirm the absence of Joseph through all this season. What is to be said, then, to Da Ponte's story, in form following:—

"The Emperor sent for me [after his return from Prague] and, while he overwhelmed me with the most flattering expressions, made me a present of another hundred ducats and said he had a great desire soon to hear Don Giovanni. Mozart came back and gave his score instantly to the copyists, who hastened to write out the parts, because the Emperor was soon to leave Vienna. The Opera came to performance—and shall I say it?—Don Juan did not please! Everybody, except Mozart, thought it defective. Additions were made, entire airs were changed, it was again brought out—and the Don Giovanni did not please! And what said the Emperor thereto? 'The opera is exquisite—is divine—perhaps better even than the Figaro, but it is no meat for the teeth of my Viennese.' I told Mozart this expression, who answered me with perfect calmness, 'Time must be given them to chew upon it.' He did not deceive himself. By his advice I caused it to be often repeated, and with each performance the applause increased," &c., &c.

It is impossible to think that Da Ponte invented this story; was there, then, a private performance in the winter? How can the story be reconciled to the fact that Joseph was not in Vienna at the public production of Don Giovanni? The most rational hypothesis is, that Da Ponte, writing after thirty years had elapsed, supposed a remark, really made in the Emperor's afternoon concert over the score, to have been made after the public performance of Don Giovanni in the theatre.

(To be Continued.)

The Musical Library in the British Museum.

(From the Athenæum.)

It appears surprising, indeed, that the English nation does not yet possess a musical library adequate to the greatness, wealth and musical taste of the people. True, there is in the British Museum a musical library, the catalogue of which comprises one hundred and five thick folio volumes. But any one expecting to find in this library the necessary aids to the study of some particular branch of music, is sure to be disappointed. The plan observed in the construction of the catalogue is the same as that of the New General Catalogue of the Library in the British Museum. The titles of the works are written on slips of paper and fastened, at a considerable distance from each other, down the pages, so that space is reserved for future entries. The musical catalogue contains only two entries upon the one side of a leaf and three upon the other. Each volume has about one hundred and eight leaves. The whole catalogue, therefore, contains about 56,700 titles of musical compositions and literary productions on the subject of music. The Museum possesses besides a collection of musical compositions and treatises in manuscript, of which a small catalogue was printed in the year 1842. It contains about 250 different works, some of which are valuable. These facts are probably known to many of your readers; still I think it necessary to notice them briefly, in order to guard against the possibility of the following observations being misunderstood.

Even a hasty inspection of the written catalogue must convince any one that it contains principally entries of compositions possessing no musical value whatever. Every quadrille, ballad and polka, which has been published in England during the last fifty years, appears to have a place here, and occupies just as ample space as Gluck's "Alceste" or Burney's "History of Music." This is perhaps unavoidable. If works of merit only were to find admission, who would be competent to draw the line between these and such as ought to be rejected? In no other art, perhaps, do the opinions of connoisseurs respecting the merit of any work differ so much as in music. Since music appeals more directly and more exclusively to the heart than other arts, its beauties are less capable of demonstration, and, in fact, do not exist for those who have no feeling for them. There are even at the present day musicians who cannot appreciate the compositions of Sebastian Bach. Forkel, an enthusiastic admirer of S. Bach, as well as a learned and conscientious musician, has written a long dissertation, in which he endeavors to prove that Gluck's operas are execrable (vide "Musikalisch-Kritische Bibliothek," Band II). Again, among the adherents of a certain modern school, despising distinctness of form and melody, may be found men who speak with enthusiasm of the masterworks of Handel, Gluck and Mozart. Besides, it must be borne in mind that even our classical composers have now and then produced works of inferior merit, which are nevertheless interesting, inasmuch as they afford us an insight into the gradual development of their powers. In short, in a musical library for the use of a whole nation, every musical composition which has been published ought necessarily to be included. In the Musical Library of the British Museum it unfortunately happens, however, that those works especially are wanting which are almost universally acknowledged to be the most important. Indeed, it would require far less space to enumerate the works of this kind which it contains, than those which it does not, but ought to contain. One or two instances in confirmation of this assertion must suffice. Should the musical student resort to the Museum for the purpose of ascertaining the means by which Weber has produced the beautiful and justly renowned instrumental effects in "Der Freischütz," he will find himself disappointed. The score of this admirable opera, although published in Berlin more than twenty years ago, is still wanting in the library. Among Gluck's operas he will search in vain for the scores of Iphigenie in Tauris and Armida. Neither will he find the scores of Mozart's Don Giovanni, Figaro, Entführung aus dem Serail; nor those of Beethoven's Fidelio, Egmont, &c. Bach and Handel will in course of time be amply represented, as the Museum subscribes to the German Bach and Handel Societies. The Handel Society proposes to issue regularly two works in every year, and to publish about sixty works in all, so that, if no unforeseen obstacles intervene, this publication will be completed within a period of about thirty years. Thus, in the beginning of the next century the student may hope to find in the British Museum the works of Bach, Handel, and, perhaps, also of Beethoven, of which Brietkopf and Härtel in Leipzig, are issuing a complete edition. But, is it advisable to withhold from the present generation the use of the most important compositions of the great masters, because a future generation is likely to have them in a set with less important ones?

Again, the student must be prepared for a disappointment should he have to consult any of our standard scientific works on music. To note only one instance: Mattheson, the well-known contemporary and friend of Handel, has written, it is said, a greater number of works relating to the theory and history of music than the number of years he lived, and he died at the venerable age of eighty-three. There are, according to the musical catalogue, only four of his works in the British Museum, and of these only one is generally classed by judges among the most important productions of his pen. However, there may be more works relating to the science of music in the library than would appear from the catalogue of music. Several have evidently been entered in the New General Catalogue. I find this to be the case, for instance, with some recent German publications—as Spohr's Autobiography, the interesting treatises on Acoustics and on the construction of Musical Instruments, by Zämmner and Helmholtz, and some similar works. Would it not be advisable to have all the books relating to music entered in the musical catalogue? Even the most important dissertations on musical subjects, which are found in various scientific works, might, with great advantage, be noticed in this catalogue. I shall mention only the essays in the "Asiatic Researches," in the works of Sir W. Jones and Sir W. Ouseley, in "Description de l'Égypte," and in the Philosophical Transactions.

Thus much respecting the present condition of the Musical Library in the British Museum. Allow me now to submit a few suggestions as to how a National Musical Library ought to be constituted in order best to answer its purpose. Premising that it must be formed with as much regard to the convenience of those who resort to it for reference, as of those who are engaged in a continued study of some particular branch of music, the following classes of works ought to form the basis of its constitution.

1. The score of the Classical Operas, Oratorios, and similar Vocal Compositions with Orchestral Accompaniment.—Many of these scores have not appeared in print, but are obtainable in carefully revised manuscript copies.

2. The scores of Symphonies, Overtures, and similar Orchestral Compositions.—The editions which have been revised by the composers themselves are the most desirable. The same remark applies to the scores of operas, oratorios, &c.

3. Vocal Music in Score.—The sacred compositions "Alla Capella," and the madrigals of the old Flemish, Italian and other continental schools, as well as those of the celebrated old English composers. The choruses of the Greek Church in Russia, &c.

4. Quartets, Quintets, and similar Compositions in Score.—The study of these works of our great masters is so essential to the musician, that especial care should be taken to secure the best editions. The classical trios for pianoforte, violin and violoncello, and some other compositions of this kind, have recently been published in score. These editions are greatly preferable to those in which the part for each instrument is only printed separately. The same remark applies to the concertos of Mozart, Beethoven, and other masters, which have recently been published with the orchestral accompaniment in score.

5. Sonatas, Fantasias, Fugues, &c.—Of all the classical works composed for a single instrument, the original editions, generally revised by the composers themselves, are indispensable. Besides these, the most important subsequent editions of the same works would be required. Beethoven's pianoforte sonatas, for instance, have been re-edited by Czerny, Moscheles, Hallé, and other eminent performers. It is highly interesting and instructive, to examine and to compare the readings of these musicians, which differ in many points from each other.

6. Arrangements.—Those of operas, oratorios, masses, and other elaborate vocal compositions, with orchestral accompaniment, must necessarily be confined to the instrumental portion, otherwise they are useless either for study or reference. Those arrangements are greatly preferable which have been made by the composers themselves, or under their superintendence.

7. National Music.—All the collections of national songs and dances which have been published in different countries. The advantage which the musician might derive from a careful study of these, is not yet so fully appreciated as it deserves, but it would, probably, soon be better understood if these treasures were made more easily accessible.

8. Books of Instruction for Vocal and Instrumental Practice.—The best schools for every instrument, as well as for the voice, which have been published in different countries and languages.

9. Works on the Theory and History of Music.—All the standard works ought to be found in the library, not only in the language in which they were originally written, but also in the translations, if any such exist. Many of the latter are valuable on account of the interesting explanations and other additions by the translators. This is, for instance, the case with some English books which have been translated into German; as "Brown's Dissertation on the Rise, Union and Power of Music," translated by Eichenburg; "Handel's Life," by Mainwaring, translated by Mattheson; besides several others.—Perhaps I need scarcely add that the biographies of celebrated musicians ought also to be included among the most desirable requisites.

10. Works on Sciences intimately connected with the Theory of Music.—Treatises on Acoustics, on the construction of Musical Instruments, on Aesthetics, &c.

11. Musical Journals.—All the principal ones published in different countries and languages. To these might advantageously be added the most important literary journals containing critical and other dissertations on music.

12. Dictionaries, Catalogues, &c.—The English language possesses no musical dictionary, technical, biographical, or bibliographical, of importance, similar to the French and German works by Fétis, Schilling, Gerber, Rousseau and others, which are indispensable for the library. With these may be classed the very useful works on the Literature of Music, by Forkel, Lichtenthal, and Becker, as well as Hoffmeister's comprehensive "Handbuch der musikalischen Literatur." The collection of catalogues should comprise all those of the principal public musical libraries on the Continent, as well as in England; those of large and valuable private libraries, several of which have appeared in print,—as, for instance, Kieselwetter's "Sammlung alter Musik," Becker's "Tonwerke des XVI. und XVII. Jahrhunderts," and others; those of the principal music-publishers, and those of important libraries which have been disposed of at public auctions.

I think it unnecessary to extend this list any further, as it will suffice to indicate the plan which, in my opinion, ought to be pursued in the formation of a National Musical Library. I shall therefore only observe further, that there are, besides the above mentioned, several kinds of works which can scarcely be considered as of secondary importance,—such as musical travels, novels, and entertaining as well as instructive musical essays; librettos of operas and the poetry of other elaborate vocal compositions; drawings illustrating the construction of musical instruments,—as, for instance, of the most celebrated organs, of the various improvements in the pianoforte, &c.; engravings from the best portraits of celebrated musicians; and faithful sketches from sculptures and paintings of nations of antiquity in which musical instruments and performances are represented.

There remains yet another point which requires a moment's consideration. I allude to the daily increasing difficulty of forming such a Library as I have just planned. The interest in the study of classical works relating to music is evidently no longer confined to classical musicians, but is rapidly spreading among amateurs and men of science. Their libraries now absorb many of the old and scarce works which formerly were almost exclusively in the hands of the musicians. Moreover, the English Colonies have already drawn upon our limited supply of the old standard works, and there is every reason to suppose that the demand for them will continue to increase. Many of these works have evidently been published in an edition of only a small number of copies. Still it is not likely that they will be republished. In a few instances, where a new edition has been made, it has not apparently affected the price of the original edition, because the latter is justly considered preferable. I will give one instance: the new edition of Hawkins's "History of Music" has not lessened the value of the first edition. Indeed, the price of the first edition is still, as formerly, on a par with the price of Burney's History, of which no new edition has been published. About ten years ago it was possible to obtain the scores of old classical operas, and other works of the kind, at the average rate of 10s. per volume; now they fetch double the price, and there is every probability that they will become every year more expensive. Indeed, whatever may be the intrinsic value of any such work, the circumstance of its being old and scarce seems sufficient, at least in England, to ensure it a high price. I have it from good authority, that at the recent sale of the library of the late Professor Taylor, some old works of authors who have never enjoyed a high reputation as musicians, were sold for about as many pounds as they cost their former owner shillings. A book of songs, published in the reign of Henry the Eighth, entitled "Bassus," was (as noticed in the Athenaeum, No. 1886) recently sold at auction for the sum of eighty pounds. The suggestion of your correspondent that it consists of the bass part only of a work (vide Athenaeum, No. 1888) is undoubtedly correct. This work, or rather part of a work, has been purchased for the Library of the British Museum. It appears to consist of a compilation of different composers, similar to the "Chansons Musicales à quatre parties de plusieurs auteurs," of which a series of volumes was published in Paris at the beginning of the sixteenth century. It may, however, be valuable on account of the poetry, or at least on account of the words; musically, a bass part alone can have no value. If the next eighty pounds which the authorities of the British Museum are disposed to spend for the benefit of the Musical Library were laid out in the purchase of the scores of the important works of Mozart, Beethoven, Gluck, Weber and others, which are wanting, a decided step would be made towards the improvement of the Library. The most practicable method, undoubtedly, would be to procure the old and scarce works from the Continent, where the prices have not yet risen to the same extent as in England. Sale-Catalogues of second-hand works on music are regularly published in Leipzig, Berlin and other towns, and are easily obtainable in London. Whatever requires to be done in this matter, ought evidently to be done soon. The well-known kindness of the officers of the British Museum is a sufficient guarantee that any well-founded suggestion for the improvement of the Musical Library would be received by them with proper consideration. But as the question is, or ought to be, of public interest, a public discussion of it seems to give it the best chance of being perfectly taken up.

"Mirella."

The production of M. Charles Gounod's latest opera, "Mirella," Italianized into "Mirella," at Her Majesty's Theatre, has been an utter failure. Everything was done to ensure a success which the work itself, it was hoped, would be sufficient to command. With the incomparable Tietjens as Mirella, Giuglini as Vincent, Santley as Ourrias, Reboux, fresh from the Parisian representations, as Vincenette, and Trobelli as Taven, with an important subsidiary cast; with the opera itself carefully cut down and the wear-some remorse of Ourrias at the Rhone, and the absurd chœur des cadavres cut out; with the scenery, and, lastly, with a perfect orchestra under the leadership of one of M. Gounod's greatest admirers; with all these advantages—advantages which the work never had in Paris to a like degree,—Mireille is a total failure. When we say this, we do not for an instant attribute the ill success of Mireille to the composer.

M. Gounod has in Mireille split for the fifth or sixth time upon the rock of a weak libretto. And here again we must make a reservation, due not only to M. Gounod's collaborators, but due likewise to the critical importance to the great lyrical craft of the reason why and wherefore Mireille has proved flat and ineffective. When we say that Gounod has suffered repeatedly from weak libretti, we mean that, in a dramatic point of view—the prime light in which every opera should be judged—they are powerless and insufficient. Poetry many of them have—Mireille especially—but most of our composers soon learn that a poetical libretto is not the safest vehicle to which they can entrust the safety and welfare of their most precious thoughts. M. Gounod has a hankering after pure poetry; that is perfectly evident; and where his librettist has given him a story with the requisite graces of imagination thrown over its outline, M. Gounod has apparently been content. In one illustrious example—that of Faust—he was fortunate enough to get poetry plus plot—the perfection, in fact, of a libretto, and we all know the charming lyric that resulted. But in every other of his operas recently, Gounod has been singularly unfortunate, or rather singularly consistent in setting a poem, not a play. We can quite understand, for example, how a man of Gounod's delicately poetical organization came to set such an adumbration of a play as Mireille is. To begin with, the story is Provençal and pastoral, with pretty episodes in the early acts of mulberry picking and harvesting; and M. Gounod's genius lies essentially in pastoral writing, delighting to charge his pictures with quaint figures, and their quainter modes of expression. Next, there is plenty of the neutral tint in the Mireille canvases, against which M. Gounod delights to work in his full-colored rustics, such as the Val d'Enfer and the Desert of the Crau; and lastly the opera closes in with a blaze of religious contrast, organ pealing, priests promenading, girls singing. Then, the thin thread of story itself is at least a silken one. The simple Provençal girl's truth and fidelity, leading her through wildernesses in search of her lover, dead or dying, is a pretty speciality for the heroine of a story, if not an opera; the tenor, a rustic, comes out nicely in opposition to the rough and brutal bull-fighter who wants to rob him of Mireille; and the remorse of Ourrias himself (which it has been thought, and rightly, not advisable to limn any more) at the ghastly bridge of sighs over the Rhone, the Charon, the corpses, the drowning cry of the murderer, all have the true poetical tinge; whilst the dénouement at the trying place, where Mireille drags her weary limbs to find her lover living whom she thought dead, is in strict romantic taste.

All this is very pretty to tell or to be told. Put upon the stage and expanded into five, or even into four acts, the Provençal legend loses all its charm, and becomes an uninteresting play. The first acts, if they contain little situation, are extremely pleasing from the opposite grouping and singing together of villagers, whilst there is story enough in the jealousy of Ourrias, the dawning love of Mireille, and the family quarrel which terminates the second act, to interest the listener not only in the music as music, but in its purpose as a lyrical exponent of feeling and expression. Act third, the meeting between Ourrias and Vincent, disenchants the mind at once. Santley, himself, who has the divine spark sufficiently strong to electrify most dead bodies, failed to make the scene tell, and when Giuglini's concluding phrases (the old pianissimo cadence with the upturned eyes which people like) were applauded, the compliment was for the tact of the actor, not for the composer. Act fourth, the wild, beautiful, but arid desert of the Crau, develops still more forcibly the lamentable weakness of the drama. A goatherd comes on and jodels a quaint pastoral, and then goes off. Neither the goatherd nor his song has anything whatever to do with the action of the piece, and the young person is never seen again. Mireille then appears, and on the conclusion of her scena down comes the curtain. Act fourth, by bringing Mireille and Vincent together, and giving occasion for a chorus of priests, &c., affords a chance for a sort of finale, but in reality there is only one finale, that to the second act already mentioned.

Now, no music in the world could make a "book" such as this interesting. Nor is M. Gounod's setting an exception. We again admit the genius, the inspiration that shines in every scene; but we do so, the more strongly to point out the absolute dependence of a composer on dramatic situation and dramatic effect for a successful opera. It is time M. Gounod of all people should learn and act upon this fact in lyrical composition. To go no further back from Mireille, than his Rhine de Saba, a much more powerful work than the former in every way, what was it but the ridiculous impressing of Solomon and the Queen of Sheba into his service, that has marred the representation of that work?—Orchestra.

An Inanimate Artist.

We have been favored with a view of an invention, which, if ever perfected, promises to inflict a heavy blow on the community of paid artists. The Anthropoglossos has for some time occupied a prominent position on the walls of the town; that mysterious Greek word has awakened curiosity enough to make the inventor's fortune, but that people are satisfied with being curious. A hand circular stating that the Anthropoglossos was now in perfect voice and in a condition to sing several popular melodies, we took occasion to inspect the invention at the place of exhibition, St. James's Hall.

There is no doubt that the figure is mechanical, and that it sings of its own unaided powers. More than this, that it pronounces with wonderful distinctness. The sibilants alone are rather hazy, and are half lisped and half suppressed, as is not uncommon in animate society. In singing Mr. Brinley Richard's immortal hymn, for example, the Anthropoglossos gives the refrain as we have heard many artists of real life render it. "God bleh the Prin of Wale" is not so indistinct as to prevent one applauding the wonderful sostenuto at the end of the figure's song. In form the Anthropoglossos is not prepossessing. He has a very large head of that intellectual type seen in hairdressers' windows, but the expression is heightened by the slightest cast in his eyes. His hair is thin; but he wears a promising beard and moustache. His mouth is stuffed with a large funnel, through which the notes proceed. Beneath the head is a glass case, through which you see a cylinder in motion, and a couple of valves, which operate like bellows, and serve as lungs. The pulmonary organs (so to speak) are visible to the audience; the bronchial organs, which produce the actual words, are concealed inside the head. You see how the wind is carried from the bellows up two tubes into the head; but how articulation is effected, is a mystery it would be difficult to explain.

The whole figure is suspended by a chain from a temporary rafter in the upper part of the room. It touches nothing which has any connection with below. On entering the hall, we thought the sounds were ventriloquial, but closer examination undeceived us; for on going up to the figure, the notes could plainly be heard proceeding from the funnel.

The Anthropoglossos sings half-a-dozen popular songs from a varied selection. While we were there, he gave us "Polly Perkins," "Annie Lytle," "A Gipsy's Life," "God Bless the Prince of Wales," and the National Anthem. The words were distinctly pronounced with the exception of the s and sh, which were indistinct; and the voice is between a tenor and a baritone, though very weak and plaintive. We have heard the same sort of voice a dozen times in the street. The most curious of this automaton's capacities is that he can get up a song in any language, if you give him about six hours. His accent is distinctly a cockney one; he turns his a's into i's, and his o's into ou's; but he is warranted to sing a song in pure French, German or Italian, and in six hours. Could any of our more expensive artists do more?

We confess to being afraid of the Anthropoglossos. He possesses too many advantages over his animate brethren in art. He is cheaper to keep; he is less distracting; he is more to be relied on, for he never takes a cold. Consider how adaptable he is to an artistic tour: requiring, as he does, neither first-class carriage nor hotel accommodation. No; in the interests of the profession, we protest against the Anthropoglossos, who, if his voice only grow a little more powerful, may prove a formidable rival to many a costly pet of the public.—Orchestra (London).

THE ANTHROPOGLOSSOS.—The room in St. James's-hall, long enlivened by the Christy's Minstrels, is now devoted to a singular exhibition, bearing for its title the singular word printed above.

Entering the room the spectator finds his attention attracted by a large waxen head, bearing no slight resemblance to the late M. Jullien, with something like a silver funnel stuck into its mouth. This head does not stand on a pedestal, but is sustained by gilded chains suspended from the ceiling. At the first glance it might be taken for a very idealized "Aunt Sally," but on closer inspection the spectator will perceive below the bust a small glass case containing some sort of mechanical apparatus. To an aperture in this case the exhibitor applies a key, and after a winding-up process has been duly accomplished, a pair of little bellows are seen to work, and the sound of a human voice, singing the music and words of a song, quite as distinctly as any flesh and blood vocalist, issues from the mouth of the head. Six songs, terminating with "God Save the Queen," constitute the entire entertainment. Two other heads, likewise with funnels in their mouths, may be observed at the back of the room, but these are not yet brought into active operation. When their musical education is complete we may possibly be favored with duets and trios.

If we remember right, it was Alexander the Great who played the lyre with such wondrous skill as to elicit from his father the remark that the performance was too good for a future King. In the same manner, notwithstanding the assurance that the loss of "Polly Perkins" and the fascination of the "dark girl dressed in blue" are celebrated "by means of the nicest and most exquisitely arranged mechanism," we cannot help remarking that the articulation is almost too unexceptionable for a machine. There is nothing wooden or metallic, or squeaky or hitchy, in the whole performance, but the lyric effusions go off as glibly as though some artist at the Music Hall were singing them through one of those pipes that form a communication between the principal's parlor and the clerk's room in a merchant's countinghouse. Hence we fear wicked Pyrrhonists will arise who will doubt the connection between the winding-up of the machine and the utterance of the melodies. Of course, they will be altogether wrong, but the presence of a voice less decidedly human would have incalculably increased the facility of refuting them.

However, the sceptic and the believer will both agree that the exhibition is extremely ingenious. The head is not large enough to contain any human performer, nor does it communicate in any visible manner with any remote source of sound. There it hangs, in chains, in a state of defiant insulation, and if you will not believe that its voice proceeds from the little bellows it challenges you to point out another origin.

To most persons of the present generation the "Anthropoglossos" will, we think, be an absolute novelty, but the older among us will, perhaps, recollect that at a time when the name of Madame Tussaud was unknown in London there was, on the southern side of Fleet street, a collection of wax figures, ostensibly belonging to one Mrs. Salmon. In one of the rooms of the edifice that contained this collection was the so-called "Invisible Girl," a small suspended box, from which issued a voice that answered questions and sang songs. Whether the old "Invisible Girl" was similar in principle to the "Anthropoglossos" we cannot say.—London Times.

Music Abroad.

ST. PETERSBURG. A correspondent of the London Musical World encloses the programmes of all the concerts given by the Musical Society of Russia during the past season. They are full of piquancy and novelty, as well as of tried gold, and may furnish some hints to our own concert-givers. At any rate, a perusal of the list may amuse our readers.

First Concert: Music to Munfred; Schumann; Overture, Les Girondistes—Litolff; Cavatina, Faust, Gounod; Concerto, Violin—Ferdinand David; "Romances," Pianoforte, Gurileff; Symphony (A major), Beethoven.

Second Concert: Overture, Les deux Journées—Cherubini; "Symphonetic Poem," Orpheus—Liszt; Fragments from the opera of Orpheus—Gluck; Concerto, Piano (F minor), Chopin; Symphony (A minor)—Mendelssohn.

Third Concert: Overture and Fragments from the Opera; Russlan and Ludmilla—Glinka; Serenade (D major, first movement for full band)—J. Brahms; Air, Titus—Mozart; Symphony (D major)—Haydn; "Nachthelle"—Franz Schubert; Chorus, Men's Voices (Orchestral accompaniment by Singer)—Franz Schubert; Overture, No. 3, Leonore—Beethoven.

Fourth Concert: Overture to a Tragedy—Bargiel; Concert Air—Mendelssohn; Concerto (C minor), Pianoforte, Beethoven; "Hundredth Psalm," Handel; Symphony (B flat major)—Schumann.

Fifth Concert: Overture and Fragments from Oberon—C. M. von Weber; Overture, Hafiz, L. Ehler; Concerto, Violoncello (MS.), Davidoff; Two Choruses "a capella" ("Tenebræ factæ sunt," Haydn, and "Ave verum," Mozart); Symphony (C major), Schumann.

Sixth Concert: Theme and Variations from the

Suite, Franz Lachner; Air, Don Juan, Mozart; Concerto (D minor), Pianoforte—Mendelssohn; "Romances, Piano"—Glinka; Fragments from "Missa Solemnis"—Beethoven; Symphony (G minor)—Mozart.

Seventh Concert: Overture, "Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt"—Mendelssohn; Chorus, "Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt"—Beethoven; Concerto (F sharp minor), Violin, Ernst; Serenade, Women's Voices, Franz Schubert; "Passacaglia" (scored by Esser), J. S. Bach; Two Choruses a capella ("Tenebræ factæ sunt," Haydn; "Crucifixus," for eight voices, Lotti); Symphony (C minor), Beethoven.

Eighth Concert: Symphony (C minor), Spohr; Fragments from Lelio, Berlioz; Concerto, Piano, Schumann; Air, Life for the Czar, Glinka; Overture (C major, Op. 124), Beethoven.

Ninth Concert: Overture, Faust, Wagner; Chorus, Isis, Lulli; Chorus, Cantor et Polux, Rameau; Overture, Der Söldner, Vietinghoff; Kui; Concerto, Clarinet, Weber; Chorus, Die Zauberflöte, Mozart; Symphony (D minor), Schumann.

Tenth Concert: Overture, Hamlet, N. W. Gade; "Nachtlid," Chorus and Orchestra, Schumann; Ballet, from the opera, Der Dämon, Vietinghoff; Aria "Ah, Perfido," Beethoven; Concerto, Piano (E flat major), Liszt; Symphony No. 9 ("Choral"), Beethoven.

So much for the Musical Society, over the doings of which Herr Antoh Rubinstein presides with so much spirit. The programmes of the Quartet performances are quite as varied and interesting in their way:

First Evening: Quartet (C major, Haydn; Sonata (in A), Pianoforte, Op. 101, Beethoven; Quartet (A minor), Mendelssohn.

Second Evening: Quartet (E flat major), Beethoven; Sonata, Pianoforte, Op. 109, Beethoven; Quartet (D minor), Franz Schubert.

Third Evening: Quartet (C minor), Beethoven; Sonata, Pianoforte, Op. 110, Beethoven; Quartet (A minor), Schumann.

Fourth Evening: Quartet (C major), Haydn; Sonata, Pianoforte, Op. 111, Beethoven; Quartet (F minor), Beethoven.

Besides all this, it appears that the Society got up three Mutines for Mad. Schumann, in which that lady played compositions by Schumann, Beethoven, Chopin, etc.

Two hundred and sixty-three pupils have entered the Conservatory this year. Branch Societies have, also, been opened at Kieff and Charkoff. The Branch Society of Moscow seems to have greatly distinguished itself during the past twelvemonth. Three grand concerts, held in the Riding School, attracted altogether no less than 12,000 auditors. The object of these performances was to afford the poorer classes, by means of reduced prices of admission, a chance of hearing really good music. So none can say that the "divine art" does not progress in Russia. Nor will anyone refuse to give the credit, which is his due in this movement, to Herr Anton Rubinstein, with whom is frequently associated in the good work in which he is engaged, the celebrated violinist, M. Henri Wieniawski.

WEIMAR. The theatre was closed on the 26th ult., with Meyerbeer's ever fresh opera, Robert le Diable. According to report it will re-open on the 16th September next, with Goethe's Egmont. The operas recently given have been Rossini's Guillaume Tell (a very flat performance, owing principally to the evident indisposition of Madame von Milde); Rienzi (twice); Der Freyschütz; Der Fliegende Holländer; Lohengrin (a weak performance, especially as far as the band was concerned); Die Kindische Sralnixe (after Kauer's Donauschützen); La Juive; Martha; and Il Trovatore. Mendelssohn's Elijah has been admirably executed at Eisenach, under the direction of Professor Muller-Hartung. The celebrated Salsung church-choir, formed on the model of that at the cathedral, Berlin, lately gave a concert in the Town-church. The following was the programme: "O, Roma nobilis" (hymn of the 8th century); "Panis angelicus," by Palestrina; "Lux æterna," by Jomelli; "Exultate Deo," by Scarlatti; chorale, "Jesu, meine Freude," by Sebastian Bach; "Tantum ergo," by Cherubini; Prayer for three-part Boy's Chorus, by Hauptmann; and the Eightieth Psalm, by Dr. Emil Naumann. With the exception of a few trifling deficiencies, the performance was excellent, and the advanced state of the choir, which is under the protection of the Crown-Prince of Meiningen, does the greatest credit to its conductor, Herr Müller.

LEIPZIG.—The King of Saxony has conferred the Cross of the Albrecht Order on Professor Moscheles, "in consideration of his services to the art of music in general, and to the Conservatorium of Music at Leipzig in particular."

Herr Blaseman has resigned the Kapellmeistership of the Euterpe Concerts, refusing, it is said, to submit to the force to which he was subjected by a section of the Directors, headed by Dr. Brendel, the principal apostle of the New German School, who were always trying to bring before the public works of the most "advanced" description. Herr von Bernuth, Director of the Sing-Academie and the Dilettanti Orchestra Verein, has been appointed to the vacant place; but he wisely insisted upon the remodelling of the Direction before he would accept the office. It is, perhaps, from Spartan principles, good that these advanced works should sometimes be heard, for nothing should be condemned without a hearing, but to make them the main part of a concert is more than an ordinary mortal can endure.

DRESDEN.—The correspondent of the Orchestra July 2, writes:

The theatre at Dresden was reopened on Tuesday. The first three operas selected may well be called representative—The Huguenots, Tannhäuser, Don Juan. The performance of the Huguenots was especially dedicated to Meyerbeer's memory. The appearance of the theatre is much improved and brightened by the renovation. There are few theatres where so artistic an atmosphere prevails as at Dresden. The principal artists, both dramatic and operatic, may be better at one time than at another; but the whole effect is always good; even down to the stage footmen there is an air of refinement and completeness that might put to shame institutions of larger resources. The orchestra is splendid; the string instruments all proceed from one maker, as is the case, I believe, with the wood and brass. The homogeneity of tone which thus arises is peculiarly rich and sweet. Since Dr. Rietz has been at the head of the orchestra, it has made the nearest approach to perfection. In place of the late machinist, Herr Hänel, whose death was hastened by the burns he received in rescuing Frau Bürde-Ney from imminent peril, Herr Brandt of Darmstadt has been appointed. This gentleman is a master in his craft, and is the only machinist who has yet ventured to put upon the stage the perilous Foundry-Scene of Gounod's Queen of Sheba.

CARLSRUHE.—A grand demonstration of musical "latter day saints," or "men of the future," seems to be the meaning of the following announcement:

In the last week but one of August the great musical fête of the General German Musical Association takes place in Karlsruhe. It is to last four days and is to consist of four grand concerts, the direction of which has been undertaken by Dr. Hans von Bülow. Liszt and Wagner are in Karlsruhe for the purpose of preparing the way, and the musical society looks forward with great interest to August.

London.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE.—The principal novelty of the past month or two in the operatic world has been the production of Gounod's latest work, "Mireille," done into Italian as "Mirelia." The fine powers of Titiens, Trebelli, Giuglini, Santley, Junca, Gassier, &c., could not save it from a failure, although it was allowed several trials. A fuller account will be found on another page. The Times, however, thinks, in spite of its defects, that it improves upon acquaintance, and adds:

It is not another Faust, but that merely proves the author's versatility, the subject having nothing whatever in common with Faust, while the music, it may be stated without reserve, is in every sense happy and effective. Mireille shares two peculiarities with Faust. It does not contain a single example of elaborate writing, a single example either of grand morceau d'ensemble (to employ an untranslatable compound), or of the grand finale, in which the most famous dramatic composers, from Mozart to Rossini, have delighted to exhibit their strength. On the other hand, an individuality of style which, in spite of occasional resemblances to Auber and occasional imitations of Meyerbeer, reveals the fact that M. Gounod's music is M. Gounod's and no one else's; an individuality, of which, seeing how few living composers can boast anything of the sort, the accomplished French musician has a right to be proud, is apparent in Mireille, just as it is apparent in Faust and La Reine de Saba, the unsuccessful predecessor of that singularly popular work; but further, we repeat there is nothing in common between M. Gounod's last opera and his last but two. That Faust should be immediately understood and its worth acknowledged, not alone in Paris and London, but wherever it has been performed, while Mireille in Paris was laid aside after twenty-four representations, is solely attributable to their respective books.

On Monday (18th), beginning of the "cheap nights," Faust. Tuesday (Mireille, 7th time). Thursday Il Trovatore, Mdlle. Grossi as Azucena, the rest as before, Mad. Harriers-Wippen having thrown up the part of Leonora (which, however, fell safely into the arms of Mdlle. Tietjens) at the eleventh hour.

On the 23d, Weber's Oberon was produced with the following cast:

Rezia, Mdlle. Titiens; Puck, Mdlle. Grossi; Fatima, Mdlle. Trebelli; Mermaid, Mdlle. Volpini; Schernasmi, Mr. Santley; Babehan, Signor Gassier; Oberon, Signor Bettini; and Sir Huon, Signor Gardoni (his first appearance in that character). It bears us out in what we have often urged, referring to the all-importance of a good libretto, that even Weber's music cannot insure the success of an opera like Oberon, or render its revival anything but risky. With the present cast the music, great as it is, could not fail to be suitably given, and spectacular display was also brought in to create additional effect. The artists concerned did the utmost justice to the composer; Mdlle. Tietjens was simply magnificent in the music of Rezia, and exerted all her powers in the great scena, "Ocean, thou mighty monster! Mdlle. Grossi created a sensation as Puck; Mdlle. Trebelli received two encores; Mdlle. Volpini sang "The Mermaid" sweetly and well. Signor Gardoni was deficient in force, but his performance was artistic, and he received a merited encore in the grand scena. Signori Bettini and Gassier and Mr. Santley were hardly fitly placed; in respect of their merits, which are great; for the last two especially filled very small parts. Band and chorus were admirable, and the opera was splendidly mounted; it was in short a kaleidoscope of beautiful effects; effects of scenery and pictorial illusions, effects of fairies, and nymphs and dancing girls, effects of brilliant costume and strange wild music. But this book is singularly undramatic, and not all Mr. Mapleson's care of detail could blind the critical eye to the fact.

COVENT GARDEN.—Meanwhile, at the rival theatre—to go back to the first week of July—Mlle. Artot has been singing exquisitely in La Traviata, with Naudin, the French tenor, and Graziani; and "little Patti," Mario, Ronconi and Faure were such a four as one may seldom hear in L'Elisir d'Amore (the Orchestra, having exhausted all its vocabulary of praise, is forced to say of Patti, that "she looked, acted, and sang as Pattiistically as ever"). Gounod's Faust, too, still comes up at intervals.

Second week of July. No change. L'Elisir again, followed by the ballet L'Île Enchantée, with young Arthur Sullivan's music; Don Giovanni, with Patti as Zerlina; Traviata again (Mlle. Artot "reminded us of the Bosio—elegant, lady-like, almost pure—with the good taste of leaving out the cough and physical misery of the last act as commonly interpreted"), and La Prophète, with Tamberlik and Nantier Didiée.

On the 23d, Meyerbeer's Etoile du Nord (first produced in London in 1855, with Bosio, Gardoni, Lablache and Formes) was revived. The Times, at great length, re-analyzes and re-glorifies the opera, and of the singers says:

Madame Carvalho's highly finished execution, invariably good taste, and thoroughly artistic training were doubly welcome. Mdlle. Brunetti (pupil of M. Duprez), who appeared as Gilda (Rigoletto), four years ago, at Her Majesty's Theatre, has wonderfully improved since then; and as representative of the agreeable and by no means unimportant character of Prascovia her co-operation is really valuable. To Signor Ciampi was assigned an unenviable task. Whoever had seen the late Lablache as the Cossack soldier would be disinclined to look with charitable eyes on any successor (except, perchance, Ronconi). Nevertheless, Signor Ciampi did his very best to be humorous, and had evidently well studied his music. Signor Naudin played Danilowits (Signor Gardoni's part in 1855); Signor Neri Beraldi, Savoronsky (formerly allotted to Signor Lucchesi); and the two vivandieres again wore the features of Madame Rudersdorff and Mdlle. Jenny Bauer, upon whom the passage of nine years has seemingly exercised but little influence, physical or otherwise. The remaining small parts were more or less efficiently represented.

A few nights later Mme. Grisi (Mons. Tonson come again!) appeared as Norma at the manager's benefit; "house crowded, every number encored;" what is Grisi but the personification of Enore!

The London English Opera Company will begin its season in October next with Benedict's "Lily of Killarney," with Madame Lemmens Sherrington as the heroine, Mr. Santley as Danny Mann, and an American tenor as Miles-na-Coppaleen. The first new opera is to be "Helvelyn," music by Macfarren, composer of "Robin Hood."

Carlotta Patti is to be the vocal star at Alfred Mellon's coming promenade concerts at the Royal Italian Opera.

Arabella Goddard is engaged for the next Birmingham festival where she is to play Mendelssohn's second concerto (in D), which has never been heard there since the composer played it himself in 1840.

Another of the Athenæum's wry faces about Schumann:

At Mr. Ella's Seventh Concert of the Musical Union were to be heard Schumann's equinoctial Piano Forte Quintet, and the equally indissoluble stringed Quintet of Mendelssohn, Op. 87, indisputable in right of its andante scherzando and its superb adagio e lento. In the latter the composer rises very near to the height of Beethoven's sublimity. M. Leschetizki was the pianist.

MR. HALLÉ'S RECITALS. The eighth and last recital of the season took place on Tuesday last week. The following was the programme:

Sonata in E flat, Op. 29, No. 3	Beethoven
Prelude, Sarabande, Bourrée 1. and II. and Gigue from "Suite Anglaise" in A minor (first time)	Bach
17 "Variations Serieuses" in D minor, Op. 84 (first time)	Mendelssohn
Sonata in F minor, Op. 90.	Beethoven
Study, in D flat, Op. 90, No. 15.	Heller
"Moment Musical," in F minor, Op. 94, No. 3.	Schubert
Impromptu, in A flat, Op. 29.	Chopin
Scenes Carnavalesques (by general desire).	Schumann

These delightful mornings with this accomplished pianist have come to an end, but they will stand out in memory clearly and vividly from the musical chaos out of which we are now getting. It is one of the most precious events in our musical season in town; this annual visit of Mr. Hallé. Vale Preceptor!—Orchestra, July 9.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, AUGUST 20, 1864.

Harmony and Melody.

1. HARMONY is the heart, the main spring and origin of music. Harmony is the elder sister, rather say the parent of Melody. Harmony is first, as Love is; Melody is derived from it, as Intelligence is derived from Love. It is a common notion that Melody is the essential element of expression in Music, that melody is the gift of genius, the inspired part, the soul of every composition; and that Harmony is but an artificial scientific accompaniment, which makes the thing more complex and refined, but yet might be dispensed with. But the contrary is the fact. Harmony is founded purely in nature, her immediate offspring. The vibrations of a tone generate first the tones which harmonize with it. Each sound naturally accompanies itself with the other notes of its accord. You have but to listen to the sound of a bell, or the string of an instrument tuned to any note, to become aware of its Third and Fifth in higher octaves, forming the perfect Common Chord. In horns and trumpets these harmonic intervals yield themselves spontaneously as you blow harder. They are the natural scale of all such instruments.

This natural or harmonic scale of tones produced in this way is very different from the Melodic scale. It ascends by Thirds, the most pleasing consonant intervals. Melody results from dissonance, from the introduction or interpolation between these harmonic Thirds of the tones which do not accord with them, simply because they differ less in pitch. Melody deals with smaller intervals, and constructs its scale in a more finely graduated ascending progression, wherein each sound is succeeded by the one whose pitch is least above its own. Now the concord between two notes is to a certain point inversely as their distances; those which are immediately contiguous to each other will not harmonize.

Harmony, therefore, classes by agreement and affinity; Melody classes by differences and antipathies, which it arranges into beautiful and complete series. Harmony is the expansion of the One; Melody is the escape from unity, the tendency to individuality and variety. Harmony is fixed and constant; Melody is discursive. Harmony gives all in one; Melody gives one after another, and would straightway run off into utter forgetfulness of its first starting-point, did not the centripetal law of harmony lurking behind, though unperceived, recall its steps and round its course into a graceful orbit. So all thought is prompted by a sentiment and must be true to that, or what consistency is there after all in all its logic? Harmony, then, is the combining, unitary tendency in music; it constitutes the atmosphere of the picture; and determines its whole sphere of sentiment. It is the pervading spirit of the composition, whether song, or symphony or chorus. If it is not expressed in the way of an actual accompaniment, still the truly musical hearer feels it to be understood and implied, as the invisible ground-work of the air or tune.

2. MELODY, on the contrary (which of course implies Rhythm) is the unfolding and spreading out of harmonies or chords into orderly sequence, connecting the wide consonant intervals by intermediate sounds, which can only bear to be heard in succession, (excepting of course those cases in which discord is desirable as preparation for harmony). It is the restless and progressive tendency, which wearies of the richest, grandest and completest effect of simultaneous concord, and stimulates each part or voice to detach itself and move along. It would be taking steps continually; it denies or qualifies what was last asserted and takes a new position, passes into a tone that bears no necessary affinity to the first, and through this to another equally discordant with the second, but agreeing with the first.

Her first work, therefore, is to construct a scale of tones through which she may range. Remember, Harmony is secretly at the bottom of this scale, though Melody seems to make it of herself. She (Melody) graduates the sounds into a regular series of Seven, corresponding to the seven colors of the rainbow; and through the whole range of audible sounds this peculiar series of Seven repeats itself, higher or lower, in such wise that the same degrees or steps in these series correspond and form accords of perfect identity. Each of the seven notes derives its character from its relation to the Key-note or Tonic of the Scale or Series; and the Diatonic scale itself, so called, is but the unfolding in graduated sequence of what is implied in one tone. Presently it appears that each of these seven may become in turn a Key-note, and may be unfolded into its scale or series of seven in a similar manner. But the intervals between the seven notes are not of equal width; two of them are only half-steps: to form a new scale therefore, based on a new tone, new notes must be introduced. Hence the origin of the Five Semi-tones, the Flats and Sharps, which are the transitional element, by whose mediation only can there be any modulation into new keys or scales. These, ranged in gradual progression amongst the original Seven, give us a new series of Twelve, or what is termed the Chromatic Scale.

Harmony creates combinations therefore, while Melody creates Series. Harmony attracts, melts, blends into one; Melody distributes, bound however in her distributions by the nature of Harmony, which generates all her tones, and which says: "Of the infinitely various shades of tone imaginable between any two given degrees of pitch, thou shalt use only these tones and no others, these which are of such fixed proportionate distances from each other, that their very differences may help to enrich my harmony."

Now mark the intimate connection between Melody and Discord. Discords (so long as no sounds enter which do not belong to the true scale) are not only tolerable in composition, but they even enrich and enliven the effects of Harmony. The discordant element always is thrust in by the movements of Melody. When what should be successive becomes simultaneous, there is temporary discord. Hold back a note that should move on, so that it finds itself in the midst of a new chord, and a certain jar of dissonance ensues. So if a note of a coming chord is anticipated while the last chord continues to sound. In fact discord, (such as is legitimate in music, that is, such as does not borrow any sounds outside of the given scale or series) is merely the confounding of tenses, Present, Past and Future. As the full ranks advance, a member of one falls back into the rank behind his own, or overtakes the one before. Have we not states of feeling much analogous to this? and is not the momentary dissonance of the co-presence of two states of consciousness, the meeting but not blending of a past state with the present, followed as it always soon is by a happy resolution, one of the richest experiences? Our passions have their laws of concord, discord and modulation too, by which their music grows so rich and complex.

Great Organ Record.

Since our last paper went to press—that is, from Aug 3 to Aug. 17 inclusive—there have been not less than eight Organ Concerts in the Boston Music Hall: namely, five of the regular noon-ings, and three evening entertainments by Mr. G. W. MORGAN, of New York. The latter we would have gladly heard, or portions of them; but we had no musical ardor strong enough in those dog-days to snatch us from the cool embraces of suburban breezes. We must content ourselves with setting down his programmes.

Thursday eve. Aug. 4.

- |   |           |
|---|-----------|
| 1. Introduction and Fugue.                  | Morgan    |
| 2. Adagio, Minuetto and Trio. (Sym. No. 4). | Momart    |
| 3. Solo, Basso. Fairest Maiden.             | Werner    |
| Mr. Chase.                                  |           |
| 4. Movement from P. Forte Lessons.          | Handel    |
| 5. Overture: "Prometheus."                  | Beethoven |

PART II.

- |  |             |
|--|-------------|
| 1. Overture. (Stradella.) Transcribed.       | Piotow.     |
| 2. Nocturno.                                 | E. Schumann |
| 3. Solo, Basso. Grave Digger.                | Kalliwoda   |
| Mr. Chase.                                   |             |
| 4. Andante and Allegro. (Over. William Tell. | Rossini     |

Tuesday eve. Aug. 9.

- |   |  |
|---|--|
| 1. Grand Fugue and Chorus, "He led them through |  |
|---|--|

- the deep, and the waters overwhelm'd them." (Israel in Egypt.) Handel
 2. Aria, "On mighty pens." (Creation.) Haydn
 3. Poco Adagio. (Sym. No. 4.) Mrs. Mozart. Mozart
 4. Solo. "The last man." (By request.) Mr. Chase. Calcott

PART II.

1. Overture. "Die Zauberflöte." Mozart
 2. Aria. "O mio Fernando." Donizetti
 3. Prelude and Fugue in G min. Mrs. Mozart. Mendelssohn
 4. Ballad. "Rock'd in the cradle of the deep." Knight
 5. Overture. "A Midsummer Night's Dream" Mendelssohn

Sunday eve. Aug. 14.

1. Grand Fugue and Chorus "He led them through the deep, and the waters overwhelm'd them." (By request) Handel
 2. Air. Basso. "Pro Pectus." Mr. Chase. Bach
 3. a. Fugue in G minor. Mr. Chase. Battiste
 4. Solo, Soprano. "Hear ye Israel" (Elijah). Mendelssohn
 5. Prelude and Fugue in D min. Mrs. Mozart. Mendelssohn
 6. Duet. "Gracful Consort." (Creation.) Haydn
 Mrs. Mozart and Mr. Chase.

PART II.

1. Organ Duet. Andante, Minuet and Trio, from Surprise Symphony. Haydn
 2. Song. "O ye tears." Messrs. Thayer and Morgan. Abt
 3. Vivace, from Sym. (No. 21). Mr. Chase. Haydn
 4. Song. "Consider the Lilies." Mrs. Mozart. Topliff
 5. Overture. (By request). Rossini

Mr. Morgan's popularity does not wear out, and his audiences, we are told, were larger than the average. The hearty good nature of the man is attractive, and also—it is but fair to say it—in spite of all the dash and bravura of his playing, his real modesty. The fine bass voice and easy, natural delivery of Mr. CHASE appear to have left a most favorable impression; but we would fain couple with any mention of the Great Organ either a nobler list of songs, or none. And what has "O mio Fernando" to do outside of a theatre, or an Italian operatic medley concert? In front of that great instrument such things seem like masquerading in a church, and remind one of Scott's "Abbot of Unreason" and his crew before the altar of the monastery. But Mrs. MOZART's selections were not all, nor mostly of this kind; those from the "Creation" and "Elijah" were of the best; and we are glad to learn that they showed her beautiful soprano voice and execution greatly improved, and realizing the fine promise of her former residence in Boston. Mr. THAYER's contribution to that Sunday concert was singular—or, more properly speaking, ambiguous; a Fugue of Bach, a great one, followed by a Battiste Offertoire! Verily a fantastical tail-piece. Such frivolities are certainly in bad taste.

We come now to the regular noon-day concerts. Mr. LANG was organist on Wednesday, Aug. 3, and this was his programme, which we were compelled to lose:

1. Overture to "Alexander's Feast." Handel
 2. Fest. Fantasia, on a theme from "Creation." Koehler
 3. Nocturne, from "A Midsummer Night's Dream." Mendelssohn
 4. Overture to "Le pardon de Ploermel." (Transcription). Meyerbeer
 5. Improvisation.
 6. Fugue on B. A. C. H. Schumann

MR. LANG played again last Saturday (13th), one of the most happily varied and agreeable of the mixed programmes of the season:

1. Prelude and Fugue (Piano-Forte). No. 31. Bach
 2. Overture: "Midsummer Night's Dream." Mendelssohn
 3. Berceuse. Lang
 4. Overture to "Le pardon de Ploermel." Meyerbeer
 5. Improvisation.
 6. Chorus. "Be not afraid." "Elijah." Mendelssohn

The selection of that Prelude and Fugue from the "Well-tempered Clavichord" seemed to us not a bad idea. It is the one in E flat major in Book II. The Prelude is singularly piquant, fresh, vivacious; and the Fugue one of the most pronounced and clear, one of the best we know for forming the uncultivated ear for fugue. And both seemed to lose nothing, but rather to gain by being transferred to the Organ. The Prelude especially was sketched to a charm, in fresh, bright colors; gay foreground to the broad, dark blue mountain sweep of fugue (full organ) rolling away on the horizon. Mr. Lang's "Cradle piece" was but a breath, fine-drawn and delicate, truly melodious. Such breezy pine-tree murmurs are surpassingly rendered by the Dolce in the Swell of this instrument. The overture to Meyerbeer's romantic pastoral opera surprised us by its effectiveness on the organ; we felt the poetry of it more than we have done in the opera house.

Mr. MORGAN's stay in town was happily available for Saturday noon (Aug. 6), when he presented an interesting selection, as follows:

1. Preludium in B min. Bach
 2. Communion in A min. (Dedicated to G. W. Morgan) Battiste
 3. Prelude and Fugue in D min. Mendelssohn
 4. Duet. "Andantino Grazioso from Sym." (Op. 51). Gade
 Mr. E. A. Kelly and Geo. W. Morgan.
 5. Air, with Var'ns Extempore. Morgan
 6. Vivace, from Sym. (No. 21).

In the first number of this programme Mr. Morgan for once refuted our observation that he never plays the more important works of Bach. The Prelude in B minor is one of the great works. The Mendelssohn Prelude and Fugue it was good again to hear, and played so unexceptionably. The movement from Gade's Symphony was beautifully done by the two organists; Mr. KELLEY is from Providence. Mr. Morgan showed much skill and variety in his variations on an air, although one or two of them appeared to us outré and more illustrative of certain organ stops, and certain facility of feet and fingers, than of the musical theme itself.

Mr. THAYER has played the last two Wednesday noons, as follows:

Aug. 10.

1. Prayer and March, from "Moses in Egypt." Rossini
 2. Grand Offertoire, in C. W. E. Thayer
 3. Passacaglia. Bach
 4. Le Priere, for Bassoon. W. E. Thayer
 5. Passacaglia. Handel
 6. Offertoire, for Vox humana. Battiste
 7. Overture to "Faust." (Transcribed, 1st time). Gounod
 8. Wedding March, from "Huguenots." Meyerbeer

Aug. 17.

1. Marche Offertoire. Battiste
 2. Overture to "Faust." Gounod
 3. Double Fugue, in B flat. Handel
 4. Offertoire, for Vox humana. Eugene Thayer
 5. Passacaglia. Handel
 6. Larghetto, from 2nd Symphony. Beethoven
 7. Concert Offertoire, in C. Eugene Thayer
 8. Transcription, from "Semiramide." Rossini

Mr. Thayer is enterprising. He not only tries his hand at all the others do, but he explores new fields. We wish they were all as fruitful ones as this last which he has entered, which really yields new and important matter for these concerts. We mean the purely organ works of Handel. Strange to say, we have now for the first time any work of Handel originally written for the organ; hitherto it has been only choruses, arias, and overtures from the oratorios, or some variations from a Suite for the piano. It was interesting, too, to hear a Passacaglia by Handel in the same hour with the great one by Bach, which cannot become too familiar. Handel's has none of the sublimity or breadth and depth of that; it is a much lighter effort, genial and graceful, a series of charming variations on a naive half sad melody. The organist did well to repeat it. The Double Fugue is clear, bright, positive, Handelian, not of so deep an inspiration or of art so wonderful as Bach's great ones; but where, outside of Bach, shall we go for better? We trust Mr. T. will continue to work this vein; not discontinuing the pure gold of Bach, however, which is needful for comparison. The "Overture" (Introduction rather) to Gounod's "Faust" reveals its qualities quite clearly on the organ.

These Organ "noonings" seem to grow more popular. The many strangers passing through our city take advantage of them. One is struck by the number of new faces each time, as well as by the intelligent, attentive aspect of the company. A certain nucleus of habitués one seldom misses.

To-day Mr. LANG will play, and almost exclusively from Mendelssohn.

We call the attention of those who desire instruction in the cultivation of the voice, to the card of Mrs. FORD on our first page. She is a pupil of Sig. Bendelari.

OXFORD, OHIO.—We have before us the programme of the tenth annual Examinations and Commencement exercises of the Female College in this place, occupying the entire last week in June. Music seems to have enlivened each hour of the seven days' exercises. Many of the pieces, performed by the pupils, with or without their teacher, Mr. KARL MERZ, indicate sound classical intentions; for instance Beethoven: Sonata, op. 49; 5th Symphony, 1st movement, for 4 hands; Quintet, op. 16, 4 hands; Sonata, op. 7; Scherzo of 7th Symphony; Mozart: Sonata in C, 4 hands; also pieces by Chopin, Mendelssohn, Schubert, &c., partly vocal and partly instrumental. These are mixed with things by Wagner, Verdi, Kuhe, Meyerbeer and others. Music as a science also had its hour in the examinations, under the heads of "Thorough Bass" and "Musical Compositions." The "Grand Finale" at Commencement is entitled "Miriam's Song of Triumph," chorus and solos by K. Merz. Older colleges might take some hints from this.

WORCESTER Co. (South).—The following is dated Whitinsville, Aug. 8th.

MR. EDITOR:—I send you the programmes of several Organ Concerts given during the summer in our village, on a fine two-bank Organ in our church, hoping you will give them a place in your Journal, in justice to a really fine organist, a hard worker, ambitious to excel; and above all, an estimable young man, Mr. H. B. DANFORTH. N.

July 4.

- |                                     |           |
|-------------------------------------|-----------|
| Selections from Faust.              | Gounod    |
| Offertoire in E Minor Op. 7. | Battiste  |
| Fantasia: "Mazurka."                | Anber     |
| Fantasia Fugue (A Minor).           | Rink      |
| National airs, with variations.     |           |
| Flute Concerto.                     | Rink      |
| March, "Le Prophete."               | Meyerbeer |
| Offertoire , Op. 28.         | Battiste  |

July 16.

- |  |             |
|--|-------------|
| Fugue in G minor                         | Bach        |
| Adagio and Maestoso, from Sonata, No. 2. | Mendelssohn |
| Fantasia in A minor.                     | Mozart      |
| Overture, to "Martha."                   | Flotow      |
| Offertoire in D minor, Op. 8.     | Battiste    |
| Andante from the Quintet in D.           | Mozart      |
| Offertoire in A minor, Op. 20.    | Battiste    |
| American Hymn with variations.           | Rink        |

July 23.

- |                               |         |
|-------------------------------|---------|
| Toccata and Fugue in D minor. | Bach    |
| Benedictus, 12th Mass.        | Mozart  |
| Overture to "Oberon."         | Weber   |
| Tantum Ergo.                  | Rossini |
| Offertoire in G.       | Wely    |
| Fugue in A minor.             | Mozart  |
| Overture to "William Tell."   | Rossini |
| Hallelujah Chorus.            | Handel  |

The last descendant of the great old Belgian composer, LASSUS (or Orlando Lasso, or Roland de Latre), died recently, at the age of eighty-two years, at Munich, where he had exercised his profession of organist. With him one of the most brilliant names in the musical art of the sixteenth century—in fact those of Palestrina and LASSUS are the two greatest before Bach and Handel—has become extinct. Orlando Lasso spent the latter portion of his life in Munich, where the musical traveller, passing down the stately street over against the royal palace, has a pleasant surprise in coming upon his statue, by the side of that of Gluck,—not the least interesting among the many monuments of Bavaria.

DEATH OF MRS. WOOD.—No singer, (Jenny Lind alone excepted), is probably remembered with more interest, here in America, than Mrs. Wood (formerly Miss Paton), the original Sonnambula on this side of the water, and one of the most charming of all English singers. Indeed the first true operatic enthusiasm of Boston dates from her. The London Telegraph of July 25th thus notices her death:

This once celebrated vocalist expired on Thursday last, at Bulcliffe Hall, Bretton West, near Wakefield, where she had resided for the last twelve months. Mrs. Wood had retired from public life for many years, and devoted her talents to the teaching of music at Leeds. It was at the national theatres, Drury Lane and Covent Garden, that Mrs. Wood, as Miss Paton, first won her great fame as a vocalist, and gained a hold upon the admiration of the public which never ceased until her final retirement from the stage. Her repertoire, when her fame became established, extended through the whole range of English opera, in which there was scarcely a piece which she did not adorn by her attractive vocalization and dramatic talent. It was in the zenith of her reputation as a vocalist that she was married to Lord Wm. Lennox. The union, however, did not prove a happy one, and no very long time elapsed before a separation, followed by a divorce, took place. She subsequently married Mr. Wood, himself a vocalist of considerable talent. As Mrs. Wood she continued to maintain the high position she had achieved as the first of English female vocalists, gradually contracting her public engagements, however, until she finally retired from the stage and took up her residence at Wakefield, where she lived for several years. She afterwards removed to Leeds, where, as already stated, she occupied the position of a teacher of music.

DEATH OF M. ZELGER.—The death of that very excellent and popular artist, M. Zelger, who for nearly a dozen years held the post of primo braso at the Royal Italian Opera, is announced in the French and Belgian papers. M. Zelger died at Ghent after a long and painful illness, supposed to be brought on by a poisoning of the blood caused by the use of white lead. It is said that some three years since M. Zelger, having to perform the part of Walter in Guillaume Tell at Covent Garden, and having to whiten his moustache and beard, made use of a new composition which in the course of the night brought on a violent fit of vomiting, which was succeeded by a long lethargy. From that time his health was never completely restored, and he sank in all probability a victim to his imprudence or heedlessness. M. Zelger had been honorably known in England previous to his connection with the Royal Italian Opera, and came over in 1846 as one of the Belgian company, with M. and Madame Laborde, M. Massol, &c., &c. Although hardly entitled to be called a first class artist, his fine voice, correct style of singing, and imposing appearance, made him a great acquisition at the Covent Garden Opera; and indeed it has been found no easy matter to fill up the void he has left in such parts as Walter in Guillaume Tell, Baldassare in La Favorita, Oroveso in Norma, the Doctor in La Traviata, and the Sheriff in Martha.

RULING PASSION STRONG IN DEATH. Malibran, the famous singer and actress, tells the following amusing anecdote of herself; "Not long since I was playing Desdemona at the Paris opera-house for my benefit, and the stage was covered with bouquets. It was the very first time that flowers had been thrown upon the Paris stage, and I never beheld any more lovely; but you see I was obliged to die, and it was a great pity, for under the circumstances, I couldn't pick them up. Otello had to die also, and the man was bête enough to prepare to stab himself just where he must fall on at least half a dozen of the best. This was more than I could endure, so, although I was quite dead at the time, I exclaimed in a low voice, 'Take care of my flowers! take care of my flowers!' Louis Philippe was in a side box that night and heard me; and so the next day I had a magnificent present of exotics from St. Cloud, with a polite message, signifying that his majesty, observing my posthumous love of floriculture, begged my acceptance of the accompanying tribute."

DRAGONETTI, the celebrated performer on the double bass, used to keep a large number of children's dolls at his lodgings for his amusement. When he travelled he usually took a black one with him, which he called his wife, and he used to dance it at his carriage window when he passed through any little village.

MARETZEK intends to produce during the coming season Gounod's new opera of "Mirella;" also, Verdi's "La Forza del Destino," and, perhaps, Nicolai's opera of the "Templar." The last-named work is based on Sir Walter Scott's novel of "Ivanhoe," which has been used also by Marschner in his "Templar and Jewess."

The project of establishing an opera house at Saratoga is regarded with so much favor that the frequenters of Saratoga have subscribed liberally for its support.

F. W. Jahns, music director to the king of Prussia, is about to edit a "Chronological List, with Explanations, of the Entire Works of Carl Maria Von Weber," and appeals to all the admirers of the composer who may possess manuscripts or autographs of Weber, to aid him by entrusting him for a short time with the same.

TITIENS has received a present from the fashionable subscribers to Her Majesty's Theatre, including dukes, marquises and others. The presentation was at the residence of the prima donna, and included a magnificent diamond bracelet and pair of diamond earrings of the richest and costliest design, with an appropriate inscription, recording the occasion of the gift and the names of the donors, engraved on velvet.

SONFRA, the Italian composer, living in London, is at work on his new opera, "Leah."

A London critic calls GRISI the Queen Dowager, ADELINA PATTI the Queen Regnant, and MARIO the King of the Realm of Song.

On the 21st of August will be inaugurated at Pesaro the statue of ROSSINI. At the theatre will be given ten representations of "William Tell." Mercadante has composed for the occasion a hymn for four hundred voices, which will be sung while the statue is uncovering.

CRICKET MUSIC.—Music being now introduced (to the great relief of the ladies) at our grand Cricket Matches, Mr. Punch is induced to publish the list of pieces which, at his suggestion, were performed during the Harrow and Eaton match, and the fitness whereof was the subject of complimentary remark by the Princess of Wales.

Invitation to the Ball, "Batti, batti;" "Maiden Over! Over with me;" Favorite Catch, "Home! Sweet Home;" Cricket on the Heath Quadrilles, "On a Bat's back do I fly;" "Proudly and Wide;" "O, Mother, he's come to the Wicket;" "Good bye, sweetheart, good Bye."

The Athenaeum understands that "an English version of Bach's Christmas Oratorio has been prepared for that singularly select body of musicians, the Bach Society, by Miss Johnson; who also rendered, fairly well, the text of the Passions-Music into English. The success of the last public performance of that interesting work by the Society in question, and its utter silence since, reminds us of nothing so much as of the proceedings of Dorcas Fyssh, in Hood's Quaker's 'Conversations.' Having craved permission to ask whether speech might be allowed, she was answered in the affirmative. 'Whereupon she held her peace.'

NEW YORK.—The Atlas has the following items of intelligence:

We understand that a Historic Concert will be given within the walls of Old Trinity somewhere about the first week in October, which will be made the occasion of the opening of the new and pleasant chancel organ. We are informed that Dr. Cutler is making great preparations for the event. Dr. Vinton will give an historical lecture illustrating the rise and progress of music from the earliest date. The compositions to be performed will consist of selections from the oldest masters, illustrative of the different epochs in music.

A splendid musical festival is indicated, to take place at Jones' Wood on Monday, the 29th of August, under the auspices of Carl Anschutz and Carl Formes. It is to be called the "Haydn Festival," and the principal feature will be the performance of the "Creation" of that great master, with a strength of instrumentation and chorus likely to stamp the event as the inauguration of a new character of festival on this continent.

ROSSINI, it is said, improvised an elegy in memory of MEYERBEER, while the funeral procession of the latter passed his window.

STANZAS FROM THE GERMAN.

My heart, I bid thee answer—
How are love's marvels wrought?—
"Two hearts to one pulse beating,
Two spirits to one thought."
And tell me how love cometh?
"It comes—unsought—unsent!"
And tell me how love goeth?
"That was not love that went!"

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

She is sleeping, sweetly sleeping. Bernard Covert. 30
In memory of "Gentle Carrie," who sleeps beneath the "dark Magnolia tree."

The Alabama and the Kearsarge. Song. F. Wilder. 30
Descriptive of the great naval combat, with a "hurrah" for Yankee tars.

Bear this gently to my mother. Ballad.
J. W. Turner. 30

A greeting of the dying soldier to his friends at home. We have now many songs of this nature, and it is sad to know that they are in unison with the feelings of so many wounded hearts.

The Stirrup Cup. Song. Arditi. 30

A song of high character, and sweet, but peculiar melody, containing the farewell of a knight to his lady, ere he "mounts, and rides away," after the "last saraband" has been "danced in the hall."

Selections from W. C. Levy's operetta, Fanchette. A collection of neat songs and duets, among which are:

How sad all nature seems to be. Song. 30 and

Look, this is joy, how gaily bright. Song. 30
The latter is a musical interpretation of the language of flowers, and is extremely graceful; the first is plaintive, but pleasing.

Instrumental Music.

Social Pastime. A selection of popular melodies for the Violin, with Piano accompaniment. By S. Winner.

No. 1. Smith's march. 35

This will be found to be a capital collection of easy pieces for violin and piano. In Smith's march, both accompaniments and melody have no difficulty for common performers.

Horse Guards Quadrille, Lancers. J. C. Knight. 40
Dance lovers will welcome this arrangement, by a favorite musician of the Lancers' Quadrille.

Carol polka. L. B. Whitney. 30
A sparkling and pretty production. May be classed among the really good polkas.

Evening Bells. Galop. J. P. Clarke. 50
Mr. Clarke is well known as one of those English composers who has the rare talent of making music, at once very simple, and full of melody. "Evening bells" ring here quite pleasantly.

Books.

New School of Velocity. Bks 1 and 2. L. Köhler ea. $1.50

Special Studies. (Velocity), in Two Books. L. Köhler. $1.50

Köhler's studies for beginners have been already noticed. The Special Studies are for students quite advanced, who wish to conquer the technical difficulties of concert music, and the exercises are admirably adapted to this end. They will commend themselves at once to any practical teacher who examines the book.

The New School of Velocity, is about on a level with Czerny's excellent studies, being about as difficult as they, and about as good. A teacher with a number of pupils will doubtless find occasion when he will wish to substitute this one for the other.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 611.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, SEPT. 3, 1864.

VOL. XXIV. No. 12.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Half a dozen of Beethoven's Contemporaries.

II. ANTONIO SALIERI.

[Continued from page 290.]

Salieri, who hardly ever knew a day's sickness until some seventy years of age, has left us one little picture of his family life, at the time he was confined to his bed with the rheumatic trouble in his knee before mentioned, January, 1788.

[Here is again a date which does not well correspond to the story of the composition of Azur, as given before; but Mosel had a happy talent for mixing dates, as his sketch of Salieri's life in several places abundantly shows.]

"My wife," says the composer, "usually sat with two of my daughters, working at a table by my bedside; my son was busy at my writing desk with his studies; two younger daughters were in the next room knitting and in charge of the three youngest girls, who played with their dolls; I lay in bed and, in the intervals of reading and thinking, enjoyed this, for me, exquisite sight. At seven o'clock my wife and children performed aloud their evening devotions, and then again proceeded with their various employments. At a later hour my son took his seat at the piano-forte, and, if either of his sisters wished it, he would play a waltz, and the girls danced in merry round. At nine o'clock came my wife and a maid to steam or smoke my lame leg, or whatever else the physician had ordered; one of the oldest girls then brought me my soup, and half an hour later, came wife, son, and my seven daughters,—she giving me a kiss, the others kissing my hand, to wish me a good night. How pleasantly in this wise flew the evenings! How quickening to the heart of a fond husband and father is such an enjoyment!"

Poor Salieri! wife, son, and three daughters went before him to the grave; the loss of his only son was especially bitter, and one he often mourned over in his latter years.

Perhaps nowhere, better than here, can a word be introduced upon Salieri's love of nature. In this regard he was like Beethoven, with, however, a characteristic difference. Beethoven delighted in long rambles over the hills and in the deep vallies among the mountains, which approach within a few miles of the capital. Unmarried and unconfined by any official or family duties, he could indulge this taste—in his case rising to the strength of a passion—to its fullest extent. Salieri, tied by his duties as Chapel-master and enjoying the sweets of a happy family life, had his favorite walks near the city, on the broad, flat island of the Danube, which, at its upper end, is called the Brigittenau; which, immediately opposite the city, is partially covered with the suburb, Leopoldstadt, with its fine public garden called the Augarten; and which then spreads away for some miles, in the public grounds known as the Prater. ("So jolly as in the Prater," says Mephistopheles to Faust.)

Beethoven's stormy nature delighted in mountains and woods; Salieri's gentler feelings found play in the broad, green spaces and scattered groves of the plain. Beethoven delighted in looking down from the heights; Salieri in contemplating the heights themselves from below. Let him tell the story of his three favorite trees.

"Many years ago. I had selected three noble trees, standing apart, for my favorites, under whose cool shade I passed many a happy hour in reading, composing, and reflection. One of them stands in the Prater, the second in the Augarten, and the third in the Brigittenau. The view from the first embraced to the right an arm of the Danube, and wooded islands beyond; to the left broad reaches of greensward adorned with wild-rose bushes and handsome groups of young trees; while in front the eye looked across plains and vallies away to the Leopold's and Kahlen-Bergs, crowned with romantic old cloisters.

"The second of my trees was in the Augarten, thickly surrounded with bushes various in sort and size, between which I could see at a distance the people as they strolled through the various avenues. From the third tree, I saw to the right hills and valleys—abodes of men; to the left thick woods; in front the river and a superb view of the city and its suburbs. How many happy hours lived I under these three majestic trees! The dreadful hurricane of 1807 caused them, it may be said, to disappear; that in the Prater and that in the Brigittenau, spite of their size, were, with a thousand others, torn up by the roots; that in the Augarten split down to within a man's height of the ground. Two days after that raging storm I saw and shuddered at the terrible devastation. True, there were still pleasant spots enough left in those lovely groves; but, as I was so accustomed on every first of May to spend at least half an hour under my favorite trees—yes, even in winter time, and especially in March and April, to visit them, that I might enjoy the first signs of their reviving vegetation—so even now I often go, and not without a melancholy feeling, to visit the spots where they stood, and note with pleasure that from the roots of the first two new sprouts are shooting, and from the trunk of the third new branches are springing, which, if not healing, are to some extent hiding the mutilation."

And here—like Cid Hamet Ben Engeli—J. F. Edler von Mosel, composer, critic, historian, and Imperial Royal Librarian, breaks forth into an exclamation in manner and form following, to wit:

"And a man like this, who found such pure joy in the presence of his family; who possessed such a warm feeling for the beauties of nature; who—as we have seen—saved the life of his servant through a truly paternal care,—not a servant long proved and faithful found, but one engaged but temporarily; who cherished the feeling of gratitude for favors received, even to the borders of the grave;—such a man his enemies (and what extraordinary man is free from them?)

had the impudence to pretend was guilty of the meanest and most hideous crime against one of his brethren in art—against Mozart—and this, too, on no other ground for so shameful a slander, than not even fault-finding with that great master's compositions, but only silence upon their preëminent beauties; a silence, which, even if it may have had its origin in jealousy of the fame of a rival—of which the noblest artist cannot fully divest himself,—still could never have been any ground for giving so deadly a thrust in his last days at the fame of a man in every respect honorable and virtuous."

That in the matter of Salieri's expressing his ill opinion of Mozart's dramatic music by silence alone, Mosel is here wrong, the reader has already seen; but as to the rest, this burst of feeling is creditable to him, and well grounded.

But, to return to the narrative and to the year 1788.

We have seen that the year began for Salieri with the production of his amazingly popular Azur, and that, while producing (as Chapel-master) new works by Paisiello and Mozart during the spring, he finished the composition of Abbate Casti's "Cublai"—a heroic, comic opera.

"This opera," says Mosel, "has hitherto (1827) nowhere been given, and its performance might perhaps meet with difficulties on any stage, because of its somewhat doubtful subject, which is treated by the poet rather with biting satire than with good-natured wit. The music, without standing in the front rank of Salieri's works as a whole, has yet in parts much that is meritorious."

The reader may perhaps remember that in 1779, from kindness to a composer named Russ, whom various circumstances deprived of the opportunity of bringing out the opera ordered of him for the opening of a new theatre in Milan, Salieri had voluntarily given up to him the composition of the second act of "Il Talismano," and that the work proved a success. After the "Cublai," the composer turned his attention to this Milan work, and wrote new music to the second act. Three new operas had been brought out under his direction [see the list before given] since the Don Giovanni, but with so little success as to call for "Il Talismano" on the 10th Sept.*

"This opera pleased sufficiently," says the modest composer. Truth, however, requires the expression 'very greatly,' and it fully deserved its success." (Mosel.) It was given nine times before the end of the year. "Noteworthy is it that in this work Salieri for the first time employed clarinets, and the fundamental bass plays a more important part than in most of his earlier productions. The text ranks in the better class of Italian comic operas—the number of which is not large—having the same subject with that well known drama to which Carl Maria von Weber wrote such pleasing music—Preciosa." (Mosel.) Salieri's appointment as first Chapel-master has been noticed. Mosel's record, confused as to dates, is as follows:

* Mosel's confusion of the dates of Salieri's labors in 1787-8 in this account rectified by means of the Vienna Theatre Calendar and Dr. Sonnleithner's MS. Catalogue.

"In the same year Salieri was given the position of the deceased Bono, I. R. Chapelmaster, by which the direction of the chapel and chamber music of the court and the opera came into his hands, for which last function, however, he drew a separate salary. The chamber concerts began already at that time to be less frequent, and on account of the increasing ill health of the monarch soon ceased entirely.

"Austria, allied with Russia, took the field against the Turks. Joseph II., in spite of his feeble health, departed for the camp (Feb. 29, 1788.) To celebrate his return, Salieri prepared himself with a new Mass and a Te Deum; but the monarch, after his return (Dec. 5), was almost constantly confined to his bed by the long and painful sickness which was destined to put so early an end to a life, so dear to millions of men, and the Te Deum did not take place."

Meantime another opera, "Il Pastor fido," text by Da Ponte, was in Salieri's hands, and came to performance on the 11th of February, 1789. The text was bad and the music not remarkable—the result nothing to boast of. "Il Turco in Italia," music by Seidelmann, came upon the stage April 28; "I due supposti Conti" and "I due Baroni," both composed by Cimarosa, respectively on May 12 and Sept. 6; after which, the first new opera was "La Cifra," of which the text was a remodeling by Da Ponte of "La Dama Pastorella," composed by Salieri in Rome in 1780, and the music almost entirely new.

Da Ponte merely remarks that these two operas "formed no very brilliant point in Salieri's fame," though the latter appears to have been a success.

If, however, this year (1789), with its multiplied duties and cares, and probably anxiety and grief at the condition of Joseph's health, did not add much to the composer's fame at home, he had testimonials in abundance of the spread and increase of his reputation abroad.

Mazzala wrote him from Dresden of the immense success of Azur on that stage, and besought him to compose a text, "Il Poeta ridicolo," after an English piece,—which, however, came to nothing.

La Salle, Secretary of the Academy of Music at Paris, offered a text, "Le Troubadour," (by an author not named)—which also came to nothing. And Du Roger wrote him about a four act text, which his description shows was but a Frenchifying of Shakespeare's "Tempest."

Matteo Liverati informed him that his Il Talismano had been given in Potsdam in honor of the Princess of Orange.

From a pretty wide examination of the annual reports of the principal German theatres of those days, I draw the conclusion that, in the original Italian or in German translations, the more important works of Salieri were far more popular and much oftener given than those of Mozart; while the Grotto di Trofonio was at the least as much performed as Mozart's "Entführung." Indeed, Paisiello's "Barbier di Sevilla" had then a similar relation to Mozart's Figaro's Hochzeit, in regard to the frequency of performance, which Rossini's "Barbier" has in our day. In other words, as, with the exception of the Entführung, Mozart's operas were less to the taste of the monarch and the public in Vienna than those of Salieri: so it was all through Germany. Whatever the appreciative few may have thought of "Figaro's Marriage" and "Don Giovanni," to the general operatic public Salieri was certainly the greatest of then living composers! This seems hardly possible to us in 1864, but it was so; and while it shows how little reason Salieri had to treat his rival ungenerously, it accounts satisfactorily for the bitterness of his remarks upon that rival's music, when thirty years later it was to be heard on every operatic stage, while his was forgotten!

Thus in 1789 the composer, in his fortieth year, had attained all the objects to which a musician could look as the aims of his ambition. He was Imperial Royal Chapelmaster of the Emperor of Germany; his combined salaries made him comparatively rich; his successes at Paris gave him not only fame but a steady income from the Grand Opera; his works were given everywhere and were considered standard pieces; from all sides came orders for new works, the then most distinguished operatic poets wishing to have their texts put into his hands; he was already the great teacher of operatic composition, and but a few years later numbered Beethoven among his pupils.

(To be Continued.)

A Night in Florence.

BY HEINRICH HEINE.*

In the ante-room, Maximilian met the Doctor, who was drawing on his black gloves. "I am in a great hurry," were his words; until Signora Maria fell into a light slumber, a few minutes ago, she had not slept a wink all day. I need not caution you to avoid disturbing her by noise of any kind. When she awakes she must not on any account be permitted to converse. She may not move, nor stir, nor speak. Mental exertion alone may save her. Let me prevail upon you to tell her some of your odd stories, so that she may lie still and listen."

"Do not fear, Doctor," answered Maximilian, with a melancholy smile. "I have become an expert tattler and shall not suffer her to get a word in edgewise. I will tell her enough fantastic stuff --- but, tell me, how long may she live?"

"I am in a great hurry," the Doctor said and disappeared.

Black Deborah, with her acute ear, had recognized Maximilian's step and gently opened the door for him. When he motioned to her, she glided out of the room, leaving him alone with his friend. A single lamp shed a flickering twilight through the chamber, now and then, throwing half fearful, half searching gleams upon the face of the sick woman who, clad in a white muslin dress, lay upon the green damask sofa. Whenever the lamp shed its pale rays over her face, he trembled—"My God!"—he muttered—"What is this? what recollections does this awaken?—Yes, now I remember, the white picture with the green background; yes, now.

At that moment the patient awoke. As from the depths of a dream, her mild, blue eyes gazed at him imploringly, beseechingly. "What were you thinking, Maximilian?" she asked with that sad, soft voice of the consumptive, in which we seem to hear the lisping of an infant, the twittering of a bird and the death rattle of a human being. "What were you thinking of, just then, Maximilian?" she repeated, whilst she raised herself so quickly that her long curls played about her head like frightened golden serpents.

* Translated for this Journal by S. J. Searan.

"For God's sake!" exclaimed Maximilian, as he gently pushed her back upon the sofa; "you must lie still and not talk. I will tell you all my thoughts, all my feelings, and, in fact, even more than I know."

"Truly" he continued, "I can scarcely recall my thoughts and feelings. Dim pictures of my childhood passed through my brain. I was thinking of my mother's castle, of its deserted garden and of the beautiful statue that lay there in the green grass. I said my mother's castle, but do not, I beg of you, imagine that it was a lordly and magnificent one. I always speak of it in that way, and my father was wont to say my castle with a peculiar expression and a strange smile. Long after that, when I was already twelve years old and travelled to the castle with my mother, I discovered why he used to smile at the mention of it. It was my first journey. We rode the whole day through a dense forest, (I shall never forget how dark it was) and, towards evening, we stopped before a large meadow from which a cross bar separated us. We had been waiting nearly half an hour when the boy came out of the neighboring hut and removed the bar in order to admit us. I say the boy, because that is what the aged Martha always called her forty-year old nephew. In order to receive us with becoming dignity, he had donned his departed uncle's old suit and had left us waiting outside while he beat a little of the dust out of it. If there had been time enough, he would have put on stockings. As it was, there was but little contrast between his long red legs and his flaming scarlet coat. Whether he wore pantaloons under it I do not now remember. When Johann, our servant, who had often heard of the castle in which his departed master had dwelt, saw the little, rickety, tumble-down building to which the boy conducted us, his features betrayed his astonishment. He was, however, almost confounded with wonder when mother told him to bring in the bed. How could he have dreamed that there were no beds in the castle? He had either forgotten mother's orders to bring them, or had regarded them as unnecessary.

The little one-story house had, in its best days, boasted of but five rooms, and presented a sorrowful picture of desolation. The furniture was broken, the hangings were torn, and, in many spots, the flooring was removed. There was not one whole pane of glass left. On every hand were the traces of the reckless and riotous soldiers who had at one time been quartered there. "Billeting always amused itself with us," said the boy with a bashful smile. Mother signified her wish to be left alone, and, while Johann and the boy were engaged with each other, I went to look at the garden. There, again, was a most sorrowful picture of destruction. Some of the trees were riven; others lay there dismantled, with mocking parasites climbing over their fallen branches. Box-bushes, here and there, showed where paths had once been. There were statues, also, of which the most were headless and even the best preserved, noseless. I still remember a Diana, the lower half of whose body oddly enough, was covered with dark ivy, and a goddess of plenty, out of whose cornucopia there issued naught but rank weeds. The wrath of time and of man had spared but one statue; and even that had been thrown from its pedestal and was lying in the high grass. There it lay, uninjured—a marble goddess, with pure, lovely features and finely chiselled, noble bosom, shining forth from the high grass, like a Grecian revelation. I was almost frightened when I first beheld it; the spectacle filled me with a strange feeling of oppression and fear, while inexplicable timidity prevented me from looking long at the beautiful sight.

When I returned to my mother, she was standing by the window in deep thought, her head resting on her right hand and tears flowing down her cheeks. I had never before seen her weep so bitterly. She embraced me with tender concern and begged me to forgive her because Johann's carelessness had deprived me of a bed. "Old Martha," she said, "is very sick and cannot give her bed to you; Johann may, however, arrange the carriage cushions so that you can sleep on them, and can cover you with his cloak. I shall sleep here on the straw; this is the bed chamber of my blessed father; things once looked better here. And now leave me to myself." And she wept yet more bitterly than at first.

What with the strange couch and the excitement, I could not sleep. The moonlight streamed in through the broken panes as if to entice me out into the clear summer evening. I tossed from right to left, closed my eyes and opened them again, without being able to banish the recollection of the beautiful statue out in the grass. I could not account for the bashfulness that overcame me when I beheld it, and felt vexed because of my childishness. "To-morrow," I muttered, "I will kiss thee, beautiful face of marble! on the corner of thy beautiful mouth, where the lips join and fade away into the lovely dimple." Wondrous impatience consumed me. I lost all control over the wondrous impulse and sprang from my couch, exclaiming: "What odds! This very night will I kiss thee, lovely creature!" Fearful that my mother might hear my footsteps, I went out as quickly as possible. This was easily done because, though a great coat of arms surmounted the door-frame, there were no doors. Not a sound was heard. All lay quiet and solemn, bathed in the gentle moonlight. The shadows of the trees looked as though they were nailed to the ground. As I approached the lovely goddess, lying motionless on the grass, I almost feared that, by the slightest sound, I might awaken her. Her beautiful limbs seemed locked in a deep sleep rather than chained by some marble god. I bent over her, in order to admire her perfect features—shuddering fear held me back, while boyish desire impelled me towards her; my heart beat as though I were about committing a murder; and at last I kissed the lovely goddess with greater warmth, affection and wildness than I have ever kissed at any time in my life. Nor have I ever forgotten the sweet, shuddering sensation that flowed through my soul while my lips pressed the cold marble ones. And let me tell you, Maria, while I stood there looking at you, you reminded me of the white statue in the green grass. Had you slept longer, my lips had not withstood—

"Max! Max!" she cried with deep feeling; you are horrible! You know that a kiss from your lips—

"Oh! don't say a word. I know you would find anything like that horrible. You need not look at me so imploringly. I do not misinterpret your emotions, though their cause remains a mystery to me. I have never been permitted to press my lips against yours—"

Without allowing him to finish the sentence, she seized his hand and covered it with passionate kisses. Then, smiling, she said: "Pray, tell me more about your loves. How long did you adore the marble statue that you kissed in the garden of the castle?"

"We left there the next day, answered Maximilian. "I never saw the beautiful statue again. But it filled my heart for nearly four years and awakened a strange passion for statuary, that has clung to me ever since. It was but this morning that I again felt its force. After leaving the Laurentian Library, I found myself, scarcely knowing how I got there, in the chapel where Italy's noblest race slumbers in peace on the bed of jewels it prepared for its couch. During an entire hour, I remained lost in contemplation of a female statue, the powerful physique of which betrayed the force and boldness of Michael Angelo, while the whole figure seemed enveloped in an atmosphere of ethereal sweetness rarely looked for in the works of that master. It seemed as though the spirit of dreamland, with all its peaceful bliss, lay buried in that marble figure: as if graceful rest dwelt in its beautifully proportioned limbs and gentle moonlight flowed through its veins. It was Night by Michel Angelo Buonarrotti. Ah! how gladly would I sleep the sleep eternal in the arms of such a Night!"

"Paintings of women never interested me as much as statues. Once, only, have I been in love with a painting. It was a beautiful Madonna, whose acquaintance I formed in a church at Cologne on the Rhine. I suddenly became a zealous church-goer and my soul was soon absorbed in the mysticism of the Catholic religion. Like a Spanish cavalier, I would gladly have fought every day for the Immaculate Conception of Mary the Queen of the Angels and most beautiful Lady of Heaven or Earth! At that time, I felt an interest in all the members of the holy family, and never passed a picture of Saint Joseph without lifting my hat in the most friendly manner. That did not last very long, however; for as soon as I made the acquaintance of a Grecian nymph, in a gallery of the antique, I left the Madonna incontinently and without the least ceremony."

"And were you never in love with any but sculptured or painted women?" asked Maria, with a suppressed laugh.

"Oh! yes! I have loved dead women," answered Maximilian, while his face became shrouded with an expression of great seriousness. He did not observe that his words had caused Maria to start with terror, and continued:

"Yes, strange to say, I once fell in love with a maiden, seven years after her death. When first I became acquainted with little Mlle. Very, she pleased me exceedingly. During the three days I passed in her company, I was delighted with every word and action of that wonderful and charming creature; yet my heart remained innocent of love. Nor was I deeply affected, a few months later, when I learned that she had died of nervous fever. I forgot her entirely, and did not, I am sure, think of her for years. Full seven years had passed, when I found myself at Potsdam, whither I had repaired in order to spend the summer in undisturbed solitude. I associated with no one. My only companions were the statues in the garden of Sans Souci. One day, while there, I suddenly recollected certain features and a peculiarly lovely voice and manner, without being able to remember the person to whom they belonged. There is nothing more tormenting than such rummaging among old memories, and when little Very's face came up to me a few days afterwards, it was with surprise and delight that I recollected it as the lovely and forgotten image which had so agitated me. The discovery made me as happy as one who has unexpectedly recovered a most intimate friend. Gradually the faded tints became life-like, and, at last, the sweet little creature stood before me incarnate—smiling, pouting, and more witty than ever. After that it seemed as if the lovely image would never desert me. It filled my soul; wherever I went, or strayed, it was at my side, speaking to me, laughing with me; always gentle, but never over-affectionate. Day by day, as the image gained in substantiality, I became the more enchanted by it. It is easy to summon spirits, but difficult to send them back into the dark void whence they come. They look at one so imploringly, and one's heart pleads for them so powerfully —. And thus, as I could not destroy my chains, I fell in love with little Very, when she had been dead for seven years. For six months I lived at Potsdam, absorbed by my passion. During that time, I was more careful than ever before to avoid all contact with those around me, and felt annoyed and embarrassed when any one chanced to brush against me in the street. I cherished an engrossing dread of all objects, similar, perhaps, to that felt by the wandering spirits of the dead; for it is said that when they meet us living creatures, their fright is equal to that of human beings on meeting a spectre. A traveller whom I dared not avoid, happened to pass through Potsdam at that period. I allude to my brother. His presence and his remarks about recent events in every-day life, seemed to awaken me from a dream, and I started with fright when I realized how long I had buried myself in frightful solitude. I had not even noticed the change of the seasons, and I gazed with astonishment upon the trees already in the garb of autumn and long since leafless. I bade a hasty adieu to Potsdam and little Very, repaired to another town, whither affairs of importance called me, and where, through my straitened circumstances and other influences, I was soon thrust back into the actual world."

"Good heavens!" said Maximilian, while his lip quivered with a smile of pain. "Good heavens! how the live women I used to meet at that time tortured me—affectionately, I mean—with their pouting and caressing, their petty jealousies and constant sighs. To what lots of balls they made me trot with them;—what quantities of scandal I was mixed up in;—what delight in lying;—what deceitful kisses—what poisoned flowers! Those women succeeded in destroying all the happiness and affection of which I was capable, and, for a while, I became a woman-hater. My condition resembled that of a certain officer of the French army, who, during the Russian campaign, had, with great difficulty, been rescued from the icy caverns of Beresina, and who, ever since that time, entertains such an aversion for anything frozen, that he will not even suffer Tortoni's sweetest and most excellent ices to be brought near him. Yes, the Beresina of love through which I had passed caused me to look with feelings of disgust upon the finest ladies, angelic women and damsels like vanilla-herbet.

"Do not despise the women, I beg of you," said Maria. "Those cant phrases, affected by all men, are worn out. When you look for happiness, you must needs seek woman after all."

"Oh!" sighed Maximilian, "that is all very true. But women, alas! have but one way in which to make us happy, while they have thirty thousand ways of making us miserable."

"My dear friend," answered Maria, while she bit her lips to hide a smile, "I speak of the union of two kindred souls. Have you never enjoyed such bliss? Ah! but I see that you blush—, so pray continue, Max."

"Truly, Maria, I am almost boyishly bashful when about to confess to you the blessed love that once made me unutterably happy. I have not yet lost my recollection of it, and my soul often flees to its cool shades when the suffocating dust and the burning heat of the life around me become insupportable. However, of this inamorata I cannot give you a correct idea. She was so ethereal that in dreams alone could she reveal herself to me. You, I trust, are free from prejudice against dreams. Those nocturnal phenomena possess as much reality as the coarser images of the day, upon which we can place our hands and with which we oftentimes soil our fingers. Yes, in dreams I saw the lovely being who made me happier than aught else in this world ever did. I cannot tell you much regarding her general appearance, nor can I describe her features minutely. Hers was a face that I had never before seen and never saw afterwards. I can remember this much: it was neither florid nor pale, but softly sallow, and as transparent as crystal. The charm of that face lay neither in regularity of features nor in interesting mobility; its character lay rather in its enchanting, fascinating, and almost appalling truthfulness. Full of conscious love and graceful goodness, it was more like a soul than a face, and, on that account, I have never been able fully to recall its outward form. The eyes were as soft as flowers. The lips were pale, but gracefully curved. She wore a prigmoir of blue silk and naught besides. Her neck and feet were uncovered, and her graceful proportions peered forth stealthily through her soft, thin dress. I cannot recall what we used to say to one another. I only know that we were affianced, and, frank, happy, and confiding as we were, we chatted like cheerful bride and bridegroom, or brother and sister. At other times, we ceased to speak, and gazed into each other's eyes, living ages in that happy contemplation.

(To be continued.)

Robert Schumann and Clara Wieck.*

Robert Schumann's residence in Leipzig, having proved so important in many respects for German music, deserves our particular consideration. Robert Schumann, born at Zwickau, on the 8th June, 1810, was the youngest son of August Schumann, a bookseller. He took his first lessons in the art—on the piano to wit—from Herr Kunsch, Bachelor of Arts, and teacher, at that period, in the Lyceum of the above town. "The empire of tone soon filled the boy's soul; its magic"—as Joseph von Wasielowski expresses himself in his admirable biography entitled Robert Schumann—"quickly loosened the bonds of his spirit, and, at the same time, exercised such a power upon his youthful and excited mind, that, of his own accord, and without any knowledge of the theory of general bass, he even attempted original productions. The earliest of these, consisting of small dances, were written as far back as between his seventh and eighth year. The gift of extemporizing, too, was simultaneously manifested in a degree commensurate with the manual proficiency he had attained." With regard to the last point, we read, among other things, in a biographical sketch published in the Allgemeine Musik-Zeitung (series for 1840): "It is related that, even when a boy, Schumann possessed a particular partiality and gift for painting feelings and characteristic traits in tone; nay, more: he is said to have been able to sketch so precisely and comically the various dispositions of his playfellows who stood around him at the piano, that they would burst out laughing at the excellence of their portraits."

* From a work entitled, Zur Geschichte des Theaters und der Musik in Leipzig, by Dr. Emil Kneschke. (F. Fleischer, Leipzig.)

It would lead us too far were we to attempt to follow further the process pursued in its development by Schumann's talent, during the days of his boyhood and of his youth, however interesting the subject is of itself. His various acts, frequently highly amusing, and frequently even touching, while he was growing up in his father's house, have all, probably, been mentioned and collected, in a reverential spirit, by Wasielowski, and therefore, it must suffice for us again to refer to that writer's book, which has been our guide in the present chapter.

In March, 1828, Schumann went to the University of Leipzig to study law. Of the many acquaintances he formed in our town, there was not one which proved more important for him than that with Friedrich Wieck, concerning whom it may here be advisable to give a few biographical facts. He was born on the 18th August, 1785, at Pretsch, a small town near Wittenberg. At an early age he manifested a partiality for music, but, on account of his parents' poverty, was unable to satisfy it. By the help of kind patrons, he was subsequently enabled to attend the Torgau Gymnasium. On leaving that institution, he proceeded, in 1803, to the High School at Wittenberg, as a student of theology. Here at last, having several musical acquaintances, he found an opportunity of indulging his ruling passion, and tried his hand at four or five instruments, such as the harp, the piano, the violin, the horn, and the double-bass, simultaneously. He received, at that period, some half dozen piano-forte lessons from Herr Milchmayer, the Musical Director, living in Torgau, and this was the only instruction he ever had in his who's life. The student years in Wittenberg were followed by his residence, as private tutor, in a noble family, at Zingst, near Querfurt, but his sojourn ended, for some reasons not quite clear, by his leaving secretly and at night. He next accepted a similar appointment in the house of Herr von M., at Bielitz, not far from Bautzen. But here, too, as well as in several other families, he did not remain long. At last, a nervous affection compelled him to abandon his old profession entirely. He now went to Leipzig for the purpose of consulting Hahnemann. He remained in the town, and founded a musical circulating library. He also gave piano-forte lessons, at first according to Logier's system, and then according to one of his own: "based upon rational views, and gradually improved by a keen and delicate faculty of observation." Wieck has been called not unjustly "a horn piano-forte teacher." At Easter, 1840, he quitted Leipzig, and settled in Dresden, where he is still engaged as actively as ever in the exercise of his profession.

Schumann, who had then scarcely made his acquaintance, begged, like others, Wieck to give him piano-forte lessons. He took some, though indeed only a very limited number. As early as February, 1829, Wieck was compelled, from want of time, to leave off giving these lessons. But even had such not been the case, our friend could not have learned much more of him, because, soon afterwards he quitted Leipzig for a lengthened period, to go and study at the University of Heidelberg. Here, again, Schumann entered himself as a student of law, though during his stay at the University he became clearly conscious that he was not born for learning but for art. The notion of changing his career took firm possession of him. He opened his mind to his mother—his father was already dead—and appealed to Friedrich Wieck to decide the matter. Wieck pronounced altogether in his favor. On this, Schumann's family offered no further objection, and at Michaelmas, 1830, Schumann returned to Leipzig, resolved to live entirely for music, and educate himself further in it under Wieck. In order to be near him, Schumann even took a lodging in Wieck's own residence, in the Grimmaische Strasse.

The earnestness, however, with which he immediately devoted himself to an artistic career, in order to make rapid progress, was attended, unfortunately, in one respect, with very disastrous consequences. In order to give his right hand the greatest possible mobility and quickness, he made experiments with string, always tying up one finger, and keeping it in the air, so as to render it independent of the others not thus raised. By so doing, he stretched the sinews of the hand immoderately, and the consequence was that it became completely crippled. He thus saw himself disappointed in the hope of ever being a piano-forte virtuoso, and so, "driven to it almost inevitably by fate, he at length entered upon that ground in which the seed of creative power slumbering within him sprouted forth, and grew up till it gradually became a tree full of blossoms and of fruit, though, alas, ultimately withered at the top: he devoted himself entirely to composition." (See Wasielowski.)

At that period, Heinrich Dorn (now Royal Capellmeister in Berlin) was Musical Director at the theatre, then a Theatre Royal, Leipzig. Schumann applied to him for theoretical instruction, and how thankful he was to the end of his life for that instruction, which really first opened to him the inward nature of art, appears from letters which the two men subsequently wrote each other. For a few years our friend's principal occupation was composition; what he composed may be seen on reference to Wasielowski's book. We may here remark that the first movement of a still unknown and unfinished symphony, in G minor, for orchestra, was destined to be the first work by Schumann publicly played, which was at a concert given by Clara Wieck, then thirteen years old, on the 18th November, 1832, at Zwickau, the composer's native town. The composer himself was present, and, unobserved by any one, heard the performance from a modest hiding place. By the way, for the sake of change, he spent the entire winter of 1832-33 once more at home, and did not return to Leipzig before the March of the year last named.

He now gave up his lodging in Wieck's house, not because he had ceased to be on an intimate footing with Wieck, but only to move into an idyllic and tranquil summer retreat in "Riedel's Garden, which he animated not only in the day time with his music, but frequently, on mild nights, with his acquaintances. He did this sometimes in a humorous, and, it must be confessed, rather fast manner." In September, however, he quitted these quarters, and hired a lodging on the fourth floor of Helfer's house, in the Burgstrasse. Here he was destined to be thrown into a state of most serious and violent mental agitation, foreshadowing his future fate. A sister-in-law of his died, and the intelligence of the fact, coming upon him unexpectedly, produced a profound impression which, on one particular night, attained so great a height as nearly to result in suicide. With reference to this there is the following entry in his diary: "The fearful night of October 17th."

(To be continued.)

Music Abroad.

London.

THE ROYAL ITALIAN OPERA brought its season to a close with four performances of L'Étoile du Nord in the last week of July. We have already made note of the performances from week to week. The Times pronounces it the most brilliant and prosperous season since 1851.

HER MAJESTY'S THEATRE also finished its regular season about the same time, followed by a series of extra nights in August at reduced prices. The operas of the first week were Oberon, Mirella, Faust, Trovatore and Lucrezia Borgia; of the second and last week, Lucia, Lucrezia, Faust, &c.

Mr. Mapleson's season (says the Athenæum) is understood to have been a less fruitful one than Mr. Gye's; it may be owing to his comparatively smaller experience,—it may be owing to the hampered conditions of Her Majesty's Theatre, it may be owing to the constitution of his company and the cast of his operas. Mdlle. Tietjens has still a superb soprano voice; but it is too much to expect that she should bear the weight of a theatre on her shoulders; and yet, obviously, every lady who has had a chance of dividing duties with her, as last year Mdlle. Artot, this year Madame Harriers-Wippen, has been produced as charily as possible. Strange policy this of discouraging new artists, who by giving rest would adjourn the waning time of the elder ones! Signor Giuglini stands less well with his public than he did; his style cloyes. Mr. Santley has made further progress in every one's good graces. Of the rest of Mr. Mapleson's company there is no great need to speak, save to tell that the doleful heaviness of M. Junca deprived one of the manager's novelties, the carefully pretty opera of "Falstaff," of its main prop, and thus damaged its chance of success. The revival of "Fidelio" produced its usual sensation.

THE BIRMINGHAM FESTIVAL is the last great theme of talk, and especially the three new works composed for it by English musicians, if we may count Costa one. The Orchestra, (Aug. 6) gives a pleasant account of the rehearsals thereof at Hanover Square Rooms:

The appearance of the Queen's Concert Room was unusually interesting on Monday. The entire area was filled with the members of Mr. Costa's band—the finest body of instrumentalists in Europe. Everywhere, amongst the serried ranks of wind and strings, you could pick out the well-known face of a capital solo player, content for the nonce to sink his individuality, and assist in the wonderful ensemble of harmony Mr. Costa's orchestra can produce. On the platform the artists of the day were seated, charting to each other; RUDERSDORFF, full of animation and the confidence of a hundred triumphs in oratorio; SAINTON-DOLBY, calm and self-possessed in the knowledge of her great school; MISS PALMER, veiled and nicely got up in morning dress; SANTLEY, baritone, and scrutinizing the far end of the orchestra through his eye-glass; CUMMINGS, impressed with his rising talents, and their responsibility. Add to the artists Mr. OLIVER MASON, the portly and gentlemanly managing director from Birmingham, handing up ladies politely to the orchestra, and throwing salutations about recklessly; Mr. COSTA turning over his score; Mr. CHORLEY, from the Athenaeum, in watchful somnolence in his chair; and a handful of friends and amateurs who are sprinkled at the back of the platform, and you can realize the appearance of the orchestra. Later on, Mr. SIMS REEVE turns up in resplendent raiment and the glossiest of hats, makes a feint of wishing to stop down below, but finally ascends and takes his place on the platform. And lastly, ADELINA PATTI, in a neat cuir-colored dress and white bonnet, trips up the stair, and adds her dark, intelligent face to the little ring, where so much enchantment in the way of vocal music is going to be done. In the gallery at the far end of the room, and just above the trombones and Mr. CHIFF's drums, a score of ladies are seated by invitation to hear the performance, and lounging darkly behind them are men critical, and men professional, and men curious—all present, likewise, by the kind invitation of Mr. Mason.

Punctually at noon, the appointed hour, Mr. Costa with his broad, benevolent face and dapper appearance, is visible full front at his desk, baton in hand—the band ceases the agreeable caterwauling which is seemingly indispensable for getting in tune—Mr. STIMPSON settles down to a wee harmonium, which, by a pleasant fiction, represents the Birmingham great organ. Mr. SANTLEY looks at his opening bars, and, after a few magic waves from Costa, the Overture to "Naaman" commences. It is, of course, premature to speak critically of a work of the importance of "Naaman" after a cursory hearing at rehearsal. Suffice it to speak of it at present in the most general manner, and to give our readers a notion of the libretto and the distribution of the musical numbers. The argument drawn up by Mr. BARTHOLOMEW (author of the books of "Elijah" and "Eli") states that the incidents are taken from the 2nd, 4th, 5th and 6th chapters of the Second Book of Kings, beginning with the translation of ELIJAH to heaven, as witnessed by ELISHA and the Sons of the Prophets. There are the miracles of the multiplication of the widow's oil; the promise to the Shumanite of a son; the triumphal arrival of NAAMAN, and the application to ELISHA at the suggestion of the Jewish captive maiden ADAM, and the healing of the waters. In the second part is the failure of GEHAZI to work the cure of the child of the Shumanite, followed by a Sanctus of angels, the reanimation of the dead child by ELISHA, the relation by the boy of his hearing the angels sing in heaven, the effect of the miracle on NAAMAN when narrated to him by ADAM, the bathing in the Jordan, the restoration of NAAMAN and his becoming one of the elect, and the Hallelujah glorification at the close. The setting comprises some 44 numbers, including two elaborate marches, two choral finales of magnitude, fugues and chorus, duets, trios, quartets, a quintet, and solo for tenor, bass, soprano and contralto.

It will thus be seen that the book in many respects closely trenches on the incidents of the "Elijah," but not so much as to make comparison inevitable or prejudicial. There can be no doubt that "Naaman" is a great work, far broader, and, essentially, more dramatic, although possessing the same characteristics of melody and treatment, than the "Eli." The scoring is indeed wonderful. Costa touches all the instruments of his large orchestra in his score as delicately as if they were one—art, experience, time, can do nothing more perfect in the instrumenting of a work than Mr. Costa has achieved in "Naaman." The other astonishing feature of the rehearsal was the perfect reading of the score at sight by the orchestra. It was marvellous. Here and there, Mr. Costa stopped them; not for any practical error, but for the enhancing a particular effect—and, from end to end of the oratorio, every thought and every note was picked up and interpreted with a readiness and intelligence that have no parallel in Europe. As regards Adeline Patti, she will be a success in oratorio. When her style is chastened a little, to consist with the popular notion of oratorio-singing, her pure and sympathetic voice and perfect culture will do all the rest.

On Tuesday Mr. H. SMART's "Bride of Dunkerron," and Mr. SULLIVAN's "Kenilworth" were rehearsed, conducted by the composers respectively. The libretto of Mr. Smart's cantata is written by Mr. Frederick Enoch, and is Undinish in its plot. We give the argument:—The Lord of Dunkerron, who has become enamored of a sea-maiden, seeks her for his bride: she has not the power to quit her element, and he follows her to her spirit-home: the sea-maiden leaves him that she may obtain the sea-king's sanction to the union; but he, with the storm-spirits, has already doomed her to death, for loving one of mortal birth,—and she reappears to her lover only to announce her fate: he, for his temerity, is driven from the spirit-land, and cast back by the tempest to the shores of the upper-world. The sea-spirits lament the loss of the maiden,—the sea-ferries the death of their master. This tradition, the scene of which is the ruined castle of Dunkerron, on the coast of Kerry, has been the subject of a ballad by Crofton Croker, the catastrophe in which, however, is deviated from in the present version.

This cantata will advance Mr. Henry Smart's fame as a composer of the highest acquirements. The story and its treatment are essentially dramatic, and the scoring is brilliant. The singers are Mme. Rudersdorff, Mr. Cummings, and Mr. Weiss.

Mr. Chorley has written an elegant and scholarly libretto on the subject of Queen Elizabeth's visit to the princely Leicester at Kenilworth, and Mr. Arthur Sullivan has succeeded in infusing into his music much picturesque and local coloring. The artists, who will sing in this cantata are Mme. Lemmens-Sherrington, Miss Palmer, Signor Mario, Mr. Santley, and Mr. Cummings.

Both of the cantatas were considered to be genuine successes.

In the same paper we find the arrangements for the Festival, as follows:

The triennial meeting in the Town-hall of Birmingham, in aid of the funds of the General Hospital, is fixed for the 6th, 7th, 8th, and 9th of September. The Earl of Lichfield is the president, which signifies that he will enjoy the exclusive privilege of extending encores to such pieces in the sacred works as he may deem worthy of repetition. The outline of the performances stands thus:—On Tuesday, the 6th of September, Mendelssohn's "Paul" will be revived—an oratorio unaccountably superseded by the subsequent work of the composer, "Elijah," but quite equal to, and, according to the notions of many good judges, superior even to the last named oratorio. On Wednesday will be produced Costa's sacred oratorio "Naaman," composed expressly for this festival. On Thursday morning will be given Handel's "Messiah;" and on Friday, the last morning, Beethoven's "Mount of Olives" will be given, as also Mozart's Mass in C, and Handel's "Solomon;" the latter, of course, compressed. Instead of the ball, which usually terminated the festival, a much more appropriate winding up will be the execution of Mendelssohn's "Elijah."

As regards the evening performances, the scheme will comprise interesting novelties as well as attractive variety:—On Tuesday night will be the first performance of a cantata, by Mr. Henry Smart. ("The Bride of Dunkerron,") one of our cleverest English composers. On Wednesday the concert will include Mendelssohn's "Lobpreisung." On Thursday the new cantata, "Kenilworth," by the rising young composer, Mr. A. S. Sullivan, will be performed for the first time.

The solo performers engaged on this occasion are Madame Arabella Goddard and M. Sainton. The former will play two concertos; the one Mendelssohn's in D minor, which he once performed at a festival in Birmingham; and we believe the other will be Weber's Concert Stück. Madame Goddard and M. Sainton will play a duet for piano-forte and violin.

Mr. Stimpson is the organist, and Mr. Costa, as usual, conductor. The band will comprise picked players, of whom 106 are stringed instruments, namely, 28 first violins, 26 second violins, 18 violas, 17 violoncellos, and 17 double basses. The wood, brass, and percussion number 31; the flutes, oboes, clarionets, and bassoons being doubled.

The principal vocalists are Adeline Patti and Tietjens, Madame Rudersdorff, and Madame Lemmens-Sherrington, soprani; Madame Sainton-Dolby and Miss Palmer, contralti; Mr. Sims Reeve, Mr. Cummings, and Mario, tenori; Santley and Weiss, bassi.

The chorus will muster 94 soprani, 29 contralti, 58 alti, 87 tenori, and 88 bassi—total, 356; which, with band, will be close upon an effective of 500 executants, all carefully selected.

Paris.

A letter of the New York Tribune's special correspondent (August 5) contains interesting information about the opera houses, Meyerbeer, &c., from which we cull the following:

The new Opera house, when completed, will cost the State about 25 million francs—more than all the primary schools of all France [one-third of whose adult males this day cannot read or sign their names, 600,000 of whose girls and boys do not go to school at all] cost the State in any one year. But it will be the perfectest theatre in every respect but external architecture, in the world. A commission of very first-class men in science and art, has just been instituted by Government, whose function it is to study all questions relating to the rise, beauties, safety, and comfort of the house in all its parts and purposes, and of the arriving, seeing, hearing, and departing public—to find and devise practical applications of the solutions to their questions.

At the old Opera in the Rue Lepelletier there has been a little emeute, a struggle, a revolution, in which the manager has triumphed, and crinoline has been suppressed!

For any reader of Paris newspapers, or the Paris correspondence of any foreign journal, to pass from the Grand Opera to Meyerbeer is no transition—only continuation. L'Africaine, alias Vasco de Gama, the Paris correspondent's faithfullest, fertilest theme of paragraphs any time these ten years, was bodily brought from Berlin to the Director of the Opera last Wednesday week; the very partition complete in every musical note, and enriched with notes literary by the hands of the great composer, that anticipate and furnish variations for avoiding or overcoming all possible difficulties in the execution and putting on the stage of what the Master seems to have considered his masterpiece. Rossini's homage to his German brother in genius, improvised, it is said, under the inspiration of profound respect and emotion, as Meyerbeer's funeral procession passed under his windows, is soon to be published.

Among the honors paid to Meyerbeer dead, not the slightest is, a very lively performance now in preparation at Vienna. The story goes, at least, that it will be a parody in advance on the Africaine. The scene is a virgin forest in America, where L'Africaine has sought refuge from the pursuit of opera managers and musical publishers; but where, hardly having time to bewail in an adagio her long course of imprisonment in the portfolio of the author of her days, she is fallen upon by an armed band of managers and publishers, &c., &c.

I mentioned at the time of it, some six months or so ago, an imperial decree granting "liberty to the theatres," which was to take effect on the first of the then following, now last past, first July. This liberty of the theatres—defined, qualified, and restrained by the sixty articles of a voluminous ordinance of police published in the last days of June—amounts briefly to this: any dramatic production can hereafter be performed at any theatre; that is, theatres hitherto restricted to a particular kind of performance (say, for instance, like the Ambigu, to melodrama and vaudevilles), may now present classic comedy and tragedy if they choose.

But of the half dozen or more, new theatres, the really new one is the little Italian opera of the Rue Cadet, this is to be a Buffa, a real Italian Buffa, giving to Parisians for the first time what the habitués of the Italian opera of Paris, London, St. Petersburg, Madrid, New York, or Havana never seen and heard, except very rarely and then very imperfectly, the light, fantastic, charming, graceful, super-comic but not gross, Buffa not Buffon, Neapolitan, and other specially national Italian fancy and humor set to music, played, sung, and danced.

GOUVON is said to be occupied in writing incidental music, on an unusually grand scale, for a new play by M. Legouvé, in which Madame Ristori will appear at the Théâtre Lyrique. He is also re-writing the last two acts of "Mirella."

M. SCUDO, the musical critic of La Revue des Deux Mondes, has been attacked with a very severe affection of the brain. His friends had for some time remarked in him a certain exaltation, which caused them great anxiety.

The GRAND OPERA keeps on re-producing the eight or ten pieces of the same old repertoire. For the past month or two nothing but Les Huguenots, La Juive, Guillaume Tell, Le Conte d'Ory, La Favorite, and Le Trouvère (Travatore), with Mlle. Sax, Mlle. Wertheimer, M. Morère (tenor), and M. Faure (basso), as the leading singers. For novelty a fascinating new ballet, called "Nemee," is having a great run.

The other Opera houses are closed. But the Opera Comique was to re-open about the end of August with Lara and L'Eclair. Among the novelties announced for the coming season are: "Le Capitaine Henriot," text by Sardou, music by Gevaert, to be interpreted by Coudere, Achard, Ponchard, Crosti, Prilleux; Mmes. Galli-Marié, Bella, Colus;—"Tout est bien qui finit bien" (All's well that ends well), text by Carré and Hadot, music by Felicien David, singers: Montaubry, Gourdin; Mmes. Cico, Girard, Révilly, Tual and Casimir;—"Le Trésor de Pierrot," text by Cormon and Trianon, music by Eugène Gautier, singers: Montaubry, Potel, Nathan; Mmes. Monroe and Tual;—besides which, a fourth new opera, music by Bazin.

Of the annual Concours of the Conservatoire Impérial de Musique the correspondent of the Orchestra says:

In former years those competitions were always of real interest, but this year they have greatly fallen off. The competitors have been very far from attaining that point of excellence which characterized them in previous years; but whose fault this is, it is difficult to say—the professors' or the pupils'. Without saying that there is a decline in the study or progress of music generally, we may venture to say that the jury was somewhat puzzled, in certain branches at least, in the presentation of awards. The pupils did not possess this year that so-called feu sacré for their art, the want of which rendered the Concours so cold and so devoid of interest; nevertheless, some clever pupils have been duly appreciated in several branches, and, no doubt, next year every one will do his best and endeavor to spare the school that little disappointment.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, SEPT. 3, 1864.

CHANGE OF TERMS. In common with all the other periodicals and journals, dailies, weeklies, semi-monthlies, &c., and for the same reason, namely the greatly increased cost of paper (three times what it was before the war), and of all the elements that go to the making up of a journal, DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC is compelled to raise its price. We too, have an additional reason for this step. The case of an Art journal is exceptional; it appeals to a limited patronage, to a class interested in its speciality. Yet in spite of this, our paper has been furnished at a rate much too small to remunerate its publishers or give a decent living to its editor. We are continually assured by our subscribers that our terms were ridiculously low, and that every real reader of a high-toned musical paper would as willingly pay two or three dollars for it as only one. We intend to give them a trial.

From this time, therefore, the price of the Journal to all new or renewing subscribers will be two dollars per annum. Of course all our existing contracts with subscribers will be fulfilled at the old rates. Price of single copies ten cents.

Apropos of "Mus. Doc."

Several of our Colleges, as we see by the reports of their "Commencement" exercises, have seen fit this year to confer for the first time the honorary degree of Doctor in Music. Quite a batch of "Mus. Docs" are now afloat in the community. It is to be feared that the title will become too common, like that of "Professor," which so many singing-school masters and psalm-book makers have conferred upon themselves. And naturally for some time it must mean about as little. The musical Doctorate hails exclusively from English Universities and from the Church of England. There are no Mus. Docs. in Germany, land of the great musicians. German Universities, wishing to honor men like Mendelssohn, Schumann, Liszt, and others, and to put a certain seal of academic sanction on their eminence as men, men of large culture and humanity, have conferred on them the degree, not of Doctor in Music, but of Doctor in Philosophy, in Arts, or what not, just as our Harvard and Yale compliment eminent men with the degree of L.L. D., though they may never have opened a law book in their lives. But at Oxford and old Cambridge the title carries with it a meaning; it implies authority, on the strength of satisfactory examination and approval, to teach, by lesson or example, in this speciality, the art of music. Before a University can confer such authority, it must first be an authority itself; it must have its musical department, its musical foundations, musical scholars and professors, its experts capable of judging. The Doctorate in Music, therefore, is preceded by a first or Baccalaureate degree. The conditions of the two degrees are correctly stated in a recent number of the Pioneer as follows:

A person desirous of becoming a Bachelor in Music (Mus. B.) must enter his name in some college of the University of Cambridge, and be admitted as a member (otherwise he cannot proceed to any degree whatever); he must satisfy the Professor of Music, on actual examination, as to his proficiency in the art, and must compose a solemn piece of music, for five voices, with orchestral accompaniment, and cause the same, at his own expense, to be performed, at the appointment of the Vice Chancellor, before the university.

For the degree of Doctor in Music, (Mus. Doc.) a much more extended composition is required, written in eight parts, for voices, with full orchestral accompaniments, to be performed before the university, at the expense of the candidate. This expense must be pretty large, as the performers must be paid for rehearsals, and for all expenses of their visit to the university.

In this way Dr. EDWARD HODGES, late organist of Trinity Church in New York, formerly of Bristol, England, received the Doctor's degree at Cambridge; and Mr. Havergal, in his "History of the Old Hundredth Psalm Tune" tells us what sort of an exercise he wrote for it;

In the year 1825, Dr. Edward Hodges, formerly of Bristol, and now, to our national loss, of New York, introduced the tune, as a tenor part, in a splendid chorus, which formed a portion of a most elaborate anthem for his Doctor's degree at Cambridge. The tune formed a stately contrast to the more quickly moving subject, which in all the ingenuity of fugal counterpoint, was careering beneath and above it. The Doctor was heard, very characteristically, to say, that he just wanted fifty parish-clerks to take up the tune "lustily, and with a good courage," when the point came for beginning it in the chorus.

Here in America we have at last the title; but it is purely honorary; it costs no examinations, no doctoral exercise. It first appeared among us about ten years ago. And here again we quote the Pioneer:

No American, as far as we know, has received either of these degrees, "in course." Indeed the majority of those who would be ambitious of the honor, would be apt to flinch at some of the requisitions.

The archbishop of Canterbury has the prerogative of conferring the degree of Doctor in Music on persons not of English birth, without any special examination or performance of music. The only such doctorate worn by a native American is that very gracefully "sporting" by Dr. S. P. Tuckerman of Boston. This was conferred in this manner by the archbishop, at the personal request of one of our recent ministers at the court of St. James. Dr. Lowell Mason was thus decorated by the New York City University.

This last named instance, the first example (we believe) by an American College, occurred in 1855. It has not been imitated until this present summer, when we read that the Catholic College at Georgetown has conferred the "Mus. Doc." upon J. H. WILLCOX, organist at the Church of the Immaculate Conception in Boston; that Columbia College has passed the same compliment upon H. S. CUTLER, successor of Dr. Hodges at Trinity Church; and Yale College upon GUSTAVE J. STOECKEL, musical instructor in that institution. All these gentlemen, doubtless, are musically accomplished in their several ways, and we would not detract from their just honors. But we think too highly of them, both as musicians and as men of sense, to believe that they themselves attach much value to the title. Indeed, when we consider what our Universities and Colleges are in respect to the science and the art of Music, it is difficult to regard these ceremonial edicts seriously. In the first place what University is there in the land, which is at all competent to judge of anybody's claims to such an honor? What College has a musical department, above the rudimental condition of a common singing school, or includes a recognized class of educated musicians, musical scholars, Masters, or even Bachelors, in this one among the Arts? Notoriety, popularity, mere outward professional success among a people not particularly musical, or among the music-lovers of a certain class or church, is sure to decide each case, in the lack of any power to put it to the true test. How many of these "Doctors" have ever grappled successfully, or at all, with such problems in musical composition as the Doctor's exercise required in England? And again, without meaning to disparage the musical attainments of either of the gentlemen above named, who doubts that superior musicians to any of them exist in most of our principal cities, whom no one ever thought of Doctoring, and that precisely the most accomplished would be the very last to wish to wear such a title?

We should not have touched upon this theme at all, were it not that it suggests another more important. On one account we hail this action of the colleges as a good sign (although it is at least a comfort to think that good old Alma Mater Harvard does not as yet let herself be betrayed into any such solemn nonsense). It is a sign that Music, and musical character are at last beginning to be respected in our seats of learning. Things go very much by "respectability" in this world. When the Colleges show that they believe in Music, it will not be long before society at large, the merchants and the practical rulers and providers of this world, will begin to believe also: and nothing but that general belief is wanted to ensure donations and endowments of music in our colleges or in noble institutions of its own, Conservatories, &c., on as generous a scale as other sciences are now endowed. It seems to us a seasonable moment to repeat here some hints which we threw out several years ago. Now that we have got so many Musical Doctors among us, these hints will perhaps be listened to more than they were at that time.

We trust it will not be many years longer before our Universities shall embrace Musical Professorships in their learned Faculties. Rich would-be benefactors may do as much good to posterity by endowing schools of Art, as by endowing schools of Literature, Theology or Science. Nay, an amply endowed permanent provision of the highest kind of orchestral concerts, oratorios, &c., in a city like New York or Boston, lifting these things far above the fluctuating patronage of half-cultivated publics, and so keeping the standard always classical and high, and ruling out all clap-trap and mere fashion, were as useful and as noble a disposition of a millionaire's abundance, as the bequest of a like fund for any sort of a new professorship at Yale or Harvard. Can Greek or Latin, Algebra or Logic, do more to refine, to humanize and elevate society, than a deep, intimate love and understanding of the great tone-creations of the inspired masters? Can Homer or Virgil quicken the human soul more than Beethoven? And is it any extravagance of fancy to suggest that Handel's "Messiah" may have done as much good in the world as Dr. Paley's Ethics?

These are hints which we think it behoves the fathers and wise men, the "men of eminent gravity" of our community to consider. Until recently the worth of Music, as one of the great means of intellectual, emotional and social culture, has been little known or dreamed of in this busy land, save by a few isolated enthusiasts, or small groups of such. But now there are thousands who will not hesitate to ascribe much of their best culture, much that is most precious and most soul-supporting in life's fever and perplexity, to Music; thousands who feel a debt of gratitude to it as deep as any feel to Plato and the great philosophers and poets, or to all the lights of literature and science; thousands who need not look upon that noble statue of Beethoven in the Music Hall, to feel that there is as great and noble sphere for the devotion of a man's intellectual and spiritual energies in Music, pursued as an Art, as there can be in any honored occupation. Now if this were as widely and generally believed, as it is unquestionably true, Music would be as liberally and variously endowed in Colleges and Universities, in lyceums and concert halls and lyrical temples and Conservatoires in every city and large town, as any of the branches of scholastic culture have been from of old.

There is no lack of schools and colleges. There is no lack of funds, by subscription or bequest, for any needed number of professorships in any old or modern literature, in any branch of Physics or of Metaphysics. There is wealth enough, and the wealthy take a patriotic pride in these things. Whatsoever is expended upon public education is accounted well spent. It is among the glories of the merchants of Boston, as a class, that no subscription for a new observatory or telescope, or for the founding or strengthening of a scientific or a literary professorship, with a live man to fill it, is ever suffered to fall to the ground among them. Whose are the names borne by so many of the best foundations in our Alma Mater? They are the names of public-spirited, far-seeing, prosperous merchants, who saw the value of education to the coming generations, and who felt it a duty which they owed to their children and their country, to open, out of their material abundance, permanent fountains of such education in its several branches. Every month brings report of some munificent donation or bequest of this sort. Yet never, so far do we hear of anybody in his will bequeathing fifty or even ten thousand dollars for the endowment of any thing musical. And why? Simply because the conviction of the usefulness of such an object has not acquired the sanction of society at large, has not become public opinion. Those having the means and will to benefit posterity, bestow their wealth, as others have done before them, upon certain old-fashioned, respectable, conventional good objects. Few seek out new and equally needed ways of doing good. Here is a wealthy and eccentric old bachelor, who has original notions and refined tastes of his own, among which perhaps a passionate devotion to good music, to indulge which he thinks it little to appear strange and visionary to his neighbors all his life. He believes in music; believes in it enthusiastically, extravagantly; cherishes it in his quiet way as the divine fire of his life; yet it is a hundred to one that when he comes to make his will, he will bestow all he has upon some conventional old form of charity, upon a hospital, a Greek professorship, a chapel, or what not, without its once occurring to him, inasmuch as it never has been done, that it is quite practicable, and would be an extremely useful thing for him to open a perennial fountain of that divine Art he so loves to those that shall come after him. But wait a few years; let Music become as widely prized and honored, as now Greek and Hebrew are, and here and there a dying millionaire will begin to think he has a debt to Music too, among his responsibilities for the true culture of posterity. We do not despair of this. No one who knows and feels the social worth of music, can despair of it. If it have such worth, it must ere long be generally felt, and then subscriptions, donations and bequests will come as naturally for this good object as for any other.

Two ways have occurred as worthy. One is to give St. Cecilia her chair among the fair and venerable "humanities" in our old universities. Another way, and one which would result in even more practical good, would be to endow a large permanent Orchestra, under wise and strict conditions, for the frequent public performance in any city of the really great classical compositions of the masters,—or still better a CONSERVATORY, which should embrace this among all the branches of a complete provision for musical instruction and example.

Church Music.

"TRINITY COLLECTION of Church Music; containing all the Psalm and Hymn Tunes, Chants, &c., used in Trinity Church, New York, or in either of its three Chapels. By EDWARD HODGES, Mus. Doc. of Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge, England. With valuable additions by the Editor, S. PARKMAN TUCKERMAN, Mus. Doc., Organist and Director of Music in St. Paul's Church, Boston." (Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.)

Such is the title in full of one of the last and most important collections of Psalmody,—a clear, distinguished, generous looking volume of 240 pages, in large form, which to the eye at least appears to promise something better than the common crowded, tile-shaped and plebeian psalm-books, so numerous that one might fancy the whole land—not heaven, we hope, if we are to go there—paved with them. And really we think it is better than the most. Dr. Hodges was distinguished as a learned musician of the English Church school before he came to this country. Read what is said of him in the preceding article. The collection, now for the first time published, includes all the music in these forms used during his twenty years' directorship in Trinity Church. The larger pieces at the end of the book are confined to a very few occasional pieces, anthems, &c., good of their kind. The chants of course relate more to ritual than to music, and require no comment. The book therefore is essentially a Psalm Book. It contains 277 Psalm tunes and chorals (some of the number being various arrangements, as to harmony, of the same tune). Less than half of these are marked as belonging to the "Trinity Church Collection." This we set down to the credit of Dr. Hodges, as one rare merit at the outset. If he limited his range of this plain, short, set class of tunes to hardly more than a hundred, he showed a good sense by no means prevalent in our church choirs, where endless variety of the same sort of thing only serves to aggravate the monotony.

About twenty tunes are of Dr. Hodges' own composition; good solid pieces of harmony, with a melody of some character for the most part, although sometimes a little dry and commonplace, but never maudlin sentimental or operatic. All is dignified, in keeping with the service.

The rest are drawn from various sources. First a goodly number, really the best, of the solid old tunes such as never die, like Old Hundred, York, St. Ann's, Mear, Dundee, &c.; a few old Moravian chorals; but the larger half from old English composers; a few, and but a few, made out of instrumental works, Masses, Oratorios, &c., of Handel, Haydn, Beethoven, and the like. Very many of all these are harmonized by Dr. Hodges; and his harmony impresses us as chaste, clear, dignified, with easy movement of the parts, and (what we may say indeed of the whole book) with no nonsense in it. You find, at least, none of those childish, sentimental, sweetish duet passages in thirds, which have formed so much of the staple of New England psalm-books, and which were wont to tickle foolish ears in church. His harmony, too, is more free than most books from those empty reiterations of the same chord, and of the same cadence at the end of nearly every line of the hymn, which lends a senseless, lazy, routine character, or want of character, to so much that comes out of the mill of the "psalm-smiths." Yet we have to notice, that in here and there an instance, his study of free movement of parts, or of expression of the verbal sense, has led him into progressions that are hard and chords that trench too sharply on the discordant. Thus for the words "Peace, troubled soul" he takes a Russian melody, ("Middleton," No. 155), and harmonizes it in the key of D, beginning on the word Peace with the chord of A on the tonic D for Bass, followed by the clear chord of D on the next syllable. The tune "Mozart," No. 256, illustrates the usual rashness of trying to chip out a psalm tune from a Dona nobis, or other long movement of a Mass; to shape it to an end, he is obliged to tack on an empty phrase, which is so much dead wood and never grew with the green growth of Mozart's original composition.—It ends the tune mechanically, but does not end the musical thought. But most of the arrangements from such sources are credited to Walter's "Manual of Church Music," and are done with remarkable symmetry and clearness. We notice, by the way, that Dr. Hodges has used the "Joy" Hymn in Beethoven's Symphony for one of his subjects; with questionable result, for to us it seems not church-like, while the real religion undeniable in it as it stands in the Symphony seems lost by such transplanting. But tastes may differ.

The copious additions made by Dr. Tuckerman are mostly of kindred style and character with the nucleus of the book above described, having the same merits, while they open a somewhat wider range of variety. One feature of very marked, important value he has added, which alone should bespeak favor to his editorship. We mean the introduction of some half dozen of the Lutheran Chorals, precisely as they are harmonized by BACH. One of these, "Jesu, King of Glory (Jesu, meine Freude)" is given with two of Bach's arrangements, for four and five voices. We can see no earthly reason, and certainly no spiritual one, why capable choirs, in all our churches, should not learn and sing these things in this way. No musical soul can get once familiar with them, without finding their charm, their edifying depth and tenderness and beauty unspeakably superior to our common humdrum style of psalm tune. Much of this charm lies in the choral melodies themselves, the mere plain chant; but far more of it resides in the skill, the art, the genius with which Bach has harmonized them, making them truly polyphonic compositions. Bach has also harmonized "Old Hundred," with a changed rhythm to be sure, and with a running figurative bass. It would have been well to give it in this book, if only as a curiosity, together with the three arrangements of the grand old tune with which it opens.

Our readers will bear witness that we have seldom found so much to say in favor of a Psalm-book!

WORCESTER, MASS. The "Heart of the Commonwealth" is in a flutter of hopeful anticipation of the arrival of the new great Organ (next largest in this country to that of the Boston Music Hall) which is now nearly completed at the manufactory of the Messrs. Hook Brothers. Mechanics Hall is ready for its reception, and portions of the work are daily expected. There are rumors that the opening concert will be given almost wholly by organists of Boston and New York; to which some of the Worcester papers, sensibly enough, demur, asking: Have we not organists, and good ones, of our own? Do we not claim Thayer among our Worcester boys? and have we not also B. D. Allen, musician of modest sterling worth, and Stearns, and others?

Mme. ANNA BISHOP and her daughter are singing in the Canadian towns.—Miss CAROLINE RICHINGS and company are, or have been until lately, giving English opera in San Francisco, such pieces as "The Enchantress," "Bohemian Girl," &c. There have also been some Italian Opera nights at the same theatre (Maguire's), with Miss Richings, Sig. Bianchi and others in La Traviata and the like.—Dr. James Pech, who was for some time Conductor and Musical Director of the English Opera at the Theatre Royal, Drury Lane, is now making arrangements for a short season of English opera at Montreal. Particular attention, we hear, will be paid to the orchestral and choral departments.

Mrs. WOOD (LADY LENNOX). Mr. Fry, of the Tribune, thus recalls the artistic career of the once famous English singer recently deceased:

Mrs. Wood was the most eminent cantatrice that ever appeared on the English stage. She was, up to nearly the time when Von Weber was known in London, some thirty-five or forty years ago, chiefly occupied with concert-singing and parts in the little musical dramas that passed by the name of operas. Her success in Der Freischütz, along with Mr. Braham, was followed by an invitation to the illustrious composer to visit England and write an opera for Drury-Lane. He came and occupied himself with some eighteen months' preliminary studies, and produced Oberon, and then died and received the honors of a distinguished funeral in London. The opera of Oberon did not prove a success, however, even with Mrs. Wood, notwithstanding the fine music. The overture alone is worth more than some operas. The fault lay in the poor libretto—words unfitted for music, and scenes of supernatural rubbish, instead of direct dealings with the humorous passions. Mrs. Wood, at that time, was in the fullness of her musical power, and was gifted with a physique and a volume of voice not second to Grisi. She came to this country some where about thirty-four or five. The impression made was not equal at first to the expectations formed of her exalted reputation. The fault was not hers, but arose from the feebleness or inefficiency of the dramatic situations. It was not until Mrs. Wood appeared in a wretched translation of the Sonnambula that her supremacy was felt. Her levil singing was not of the first order; her enunciation of words was not distinct in the tamer passages, which, however, was often a gain, considering the trash verbally she had to deal with; but in the chamber scene, where extreme passion and a very heroic one of despair are needed, attended with profuse action of gesticulation, she was probably never equalled. We have never seen any one to compare with her. The present generation does not know what La Sonnambula musico-dramatically is on the stage.

On her third visit to this country Mrs. Wood played Norma, in 1842, in Philadelphia. It was especially translated for her, and was the first sumptuously illustrated drama, musical or otherwise, ever put on the stage in this country. She had immense success in it, but circumstances called her back to Europe suddenly, and she never appeared in it in New York. In the flaming wrath and denunciations of the Druidess, she was on a plane with Madame Grisi, and the mise en scène of the American performance contrasted so magnificently with the poverties of the Italiens at Paris that some travellers who had seen Mrs. Wood in this country were sorely disappointed with the opera abroad. Here the stage setting was as miniature painting; there it was a dabb. Mr. Joseph Wood was a very fine tenor, and his retirement from the stage left a hiatus much to be regretted.

One of GLUCK's less known operas, "Paris and Helen," had been republished in Leipzig.

FLOROW has just finished a new opera in two acts and three tableaux, entitled "Natda." M. Saint-Georges is the librettist. It is to be brought out in St. Petersburg.

The Grand Duchess Helena of Russia has presented to the Mozarteum at Salzburg a volume of music containing a few pages of piano-forte exercise, written by Mozart's father, but towards the end of the book there are some ten or twelve pages in the hand of Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart himself. They date from the years 1762, 1763, and comprise five compositions hitherto unknown, namely: 1. Allegro, C major, composed in Brussels, 14th October, 1763; 2. Minuette, D major, composed the 30th November, 1763, in Paris; 3. Air, F major, composed 16th July, 1762; 4. Minuette Sketch, composed 11th May, 1762; and lastly, 5—which seems to be the movement of a study or sonata, of the same period.

Two volumes of a new Geschichte der Musik (History of Music), by Ambros, have appeared in Germany. The first volume treats of the ancient music. Volume II contains.

The first period of the new Christian World and Christian Art. The Gregorian System and its promulgation. The Time of the Carolingians. Hucbold of St. Arnand and the Organus. Guido of Arezzo and the Solmisatio. The Troubadours and Minstrels. The "Minnesanger." The People-Song. In the second part of the same volume the author considers: The development of Four-Part Singing. The Discantus and Fauxbourdon. Musica mensuralis and the Counterpoint. The first School of the Netherlands. William Dufay. Antonius Burnois, as well as many explanatory remarks and musical supplements. In the third volume Mr. Ambros will treat the time of 1450—1600 (from Okeghem to Palestrina). The fourth volume will contain: The Musical Renaissance. The origin of Monody, of the Opera, of the modern system of Music. The golden time of Secular Music.

The first volume of L. Nohl's "Beethoven" has been published by H. Markgraf in Vienna. It contains "Beethoven's Youth," 1770-1792. The second volume, "Beethoven's Manhood," 1793-1814, will be ready in the course of this year; then will follow "Beethoven's Last Years," 1815-1827, to conclude with "Beethoven's Works." The whole work will be rather extensive, as the first volume already contains 442 pages. This volume gives some new information about the youth of Beethoven as well as about the circumstances under which he was living, and which were of great influence upon him. The volume is divided into three parts. The first, headed "Dreaming," 1770-84, has six chapters with the following titles: Lower Rhine Country. Ancien Regime, Maximilian Frederick, Family and Teacher, School and Education, Literature and Theatre. The second book, "Dawning," 1784-87, gives us four chapters: Maximilian Francis, Music in Austria, The Visit in Vienna, At Mozart's. The third book, "Awakening," 1787-94, contains four chapters: Studies, The School of the Composer, Exercises, Revolution, On to Vienna. The conclusion is made up by "Sources, Testimonials and Remarks."

Adolph Sax, the great brass instrument maker, has just completed a new saxotromba, which, it is confidently asserted, will be the most perfect instrument of the kind ever invented.

A Turkophone can be heard at Alfred Mellon's promenade concerts in London; and a real live Turk, Ali Ben Soualle by name, plays upon the Turkophone.

In Sala's new story, "Quite Alone," there is a musical character—one Sir Timotheus O'Boy—who is said to have nine of Father Schmidt's organs at his country seat in Devonshire, and the original anvil beaten by the Harmonious Blacksmith in his smoking-room in London.

Viardot has been singing in "Norma" at Carlsruhe, and is expected to sing in English opera in London, in Chorley's version of Gluck's "Orpheus."

Ulmann has reorganized for the coming season his concert troupe, so as to include Carlotta Patti, Jaell, the pianist; Vieuxtemps, the violinist; Steffens, violoncellist; Ferrari, baritone; Vivier, the horn-player; and Godeffroid, the harpist. All these artists will appear in a series of concerts at Berlin next winter.

William Vincent Wallace has been engaged to edit the music for the London Musical Monthly Magazine.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE

LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

If ever I should marry. Comic Song.

Howard Paine. 30

Miss Amelia Gushington here describes her ideal of a husband.

Ye pretty birds. In F. for Soprano. F. Gumbert. 30

A fine German song, already a great favorite.

When they come marching home. Song.

W. Kittredge. 30

One of the simple ballads for the "million," some thousands of whom will hear Mr. K. sing it, as he is a great traveller. Those who do not have this good fortune, are informed that the melody is easy and "taking," and that the piece is in the spirit of "When Johnny comes marching home."

The Lost Chord. Song.

Wm. Herz. 30

A beautiful thought well expressed. An organist is allowing his hands to wander over the keys, almost without his volition, and accidentally produces a harmony of great beauty, which he afterwards endeavors in vain to recall.

The Unhappy Man. Comic Song. W. Kittredge. 30

Good to make the boys laugh.

Angels of Paradise. (Anges du Paradis.)

"Mireille." 30

One of the songs from Gounod's new opera, about which European critics differ, as to its general merit, but all agree that it has much fine music. The opera is of a "pastoral" character, and the present song is that in which Vincent, the lover of Mireille, calls on heaven to protect the gentle maid, who is on her way to a distant charmer, crossing the arid, sultry desert tract of Crau.

Instrumental Music.

Martha. Fantasia Brillante. E. Katterer. 75

One of the most brilliant, and perhaps the prettiest fantasia on Martha ever published. It is rather difficult, and a capital show piece for advanced players.

Merry Wives of Windsor. Galop.

Victor Colline. 30

Quite brilliant and easy.

Ghost's Galop.

Frank Musgrave. 30

Quiet, bright and easy, with a sort of comic effect when rightly played.

Bow Bells Polka.

Frank Musgrave. 30

Simple and musical. Good for learners.

Orphan's Prayer. Piano Solo. T. Badarzewska. 35

By the composer of the Malden's prayer. His compositions are favorites with every one.

Books.

THE TRUMPET OF FREEDOM.

45

The various incidents of the war have given rise to many musical compositions of great merit. The above named book is a collection of choice war ballads, duets, trios and quartets, all of them wide awake, and full of fire and patriotism, or tender and plaintive, as they refer to those who have died to save their country.

Some of the songs are already very popular; and all are of above average merit.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 612.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, SEPT. 17, 1864.

VOL. XXIV. No. 13.

A Night in Florence.

BY EDWIN HENRE.

[Continued from page 300.]

ITALIAN ART AND FEMALE BEAUTY.—MUSIC.
—ROSSINI.—BELLINI.—PAGANINI.

"I cannot remember what awakened me from that dream, and, for a long time afterwards, I revelled in the vivid recollections of that blissful love. Long afterwards did I seem to imbibe unheard-of delights. My languishing heart seemed filled with happiness and my emotions were flooded with joy. I remained thus happy and cheerful, though I never afterward saw the beloved of my dream. Had I not lived ages while contemplating her? And then she knew my love of variety too well to forget that I abhor repetitions."

"Truly," said Maria, "you are un homme à bonne fortune. — But tell me, was Mlle. Laurence a statue, or a painting? a corpse, or a dream?"

"A union of all, perhaps," answered Maximilian, in an earnest tone.

"I might have imagined, my dear friend, that inamorata to have been of rather doubtful composition. When will you tell me about her?"

"To-morrow. I am tired now, and the story is a long one. I have just returned from the opera and the music is yet ringing in my ears."

"I believe you attend the opera frequently, and that you go there to see, rather than to hear."

"You are right, Maria: I go to the opera in order to observe the faces of the beautiful Italian ladies. Truly, they are beautiful enough outside of the theatre, and, in their fine ideal features, the student of history might easily trace the influence of the plastic arts on the physique of the Italian race. Nature seems to have taken back the capital she once lent to the artist, and behold, how charmingly the interest has increased it! To-day nature copies the master-pieces of which she erst furnished the models. The sense of the beautiful pervades the entire nation, and, where once the body wrought upon the mind, the mind now acts upon the body. It is not without results that the bridegroom pays his devotions to lovely altar-pieces, beautiful madonnas whose image fills his soul, while the bride cherishes in her ardent fancy the picture of some handsome saint. The magnificent race to which such elective affinities have given birth, is yet more beautiful than the sunny skies that, like a frame of rays, encompass the generous soil on which it blooms. The men do not interest me unless they be painted or sculptured. Therefore I leave it to you, Maria, to grow enthusiastic over the handsome, lithe Italians with fierce, black beards, aristocratic noses, and mild, arch eyes. The Lombards are said to be the handsomest of men. I have never investigated that branch of the subject; as regards the Lombardines I have reflected seriously, and have really found them as beautiful as fame makes them. They must have been handsome as long ago as the middle ages. Do you not know that the fame of the beautiful Milanese was the secret cause of the Italian campaign of Francis I.? The courtly monarch must have been curious to know whether the kinsfolk of his spiritual nurses were really as beautiful as he had heard they were. — Poor rogue! at Pavia he was made to suffer for his curiosity.

But how much more beautiful are the Italian women when music illumines their faces. I say illumines, because the effects of music on the faces of the handsome women, as I observed them at the opera, resemble those remarkable effects of light and shade noticeable in statues when seen by torchlight. At such times those marble figures reveal to us, with alarming truthfulness, the spirit that dwells within them and the secrets they mutely preserve. In the same manner, you can read the characters of the beautiful Italian women you see at the opera. It is then that the varying melodies awaken emotions, recollections, desire, and hatred, which betray themselves by the movement of their features, their blushes, their pallor, and even through their eyes. He who knows how, can then read many sweet and interesting things in their beautiful faces; — stories, strange as the tales of Boccaccio; emotions, tender as Petrarch's sonnets; moods, wild as Ariosto's measures; sometimes frightful treachery or majestic fury as poetical as the Inferno of the great Dante. It is worth one's while to gaze up into the boxes. If the men were only less violent in expressing their admiration! The crazy noise of the Italian theatre often becomes intolerable. But music, after all, is the soul, the civilization, the national trait of this people. Though other lands may boast of as great musical celebrities, there is no other musical race. In Italy, music is not represented by certain individuals, but by the whole population. Music is here the distinguishing national trait. With us, in the north, things are quite different; — here a certain man, call him Mozart or Meyerbeer, is the embodiment of music. And further, if you will carefully examine the works that the northern musicians have given us, you will find them full of the sunshine and orange breezes of Italy, and will admit that they seem more like the property of beautiful Italy, the home of music, than of our Germany. Yes, even though her great maestri descend into the tomb, or, if living, are silent: even if BELLINI dies and ROSSINI is mute, Italy will ever remain the home of music."

"Truly," observed Maria, "ROSSINI preserves his silence strictly. If I am not mistaken, he has done nothing for the last ten years."

"That, I presume, is a joke of his. He wishes to prove that his title, 'The Swan of Pesaro,' is quite inappropriate. While swans do not sing until they are about to die, ROSSINI ceased to sing before he attained the meridian of life. And it is well that he did so, for he has thus proved himself a genius. An artist who has mere talent, retains the desire to exercise it as long as life lasts. Spurred on by ambition, he feels that he is constantly improving, and strives to reach the highest pinnacle of art. But the genius, having already attained the highest, is content, looks down upon the world and petty ambition, and returns to his home; — just as Shakespeare went to Stratford-on-Avon, or as GIACOMO ROSSINI walks the Boulevard des Italiens in Paris, laughing and cracking jokes. If our genius happen to be gifted with a fair constitution, he may continue to live long after he has delivered himself of his master-works, or, as the phrase goes, has fulfilled his mission. It is an error to suppose that genius must die early; indeed, the critical period lies, it is said, between the thirtieth and the fortieth year. I have often tormented poor BELLINI, by prophesying, jestingly, that, as he was a genius, he would surely die when he reached the fatal age. Strange to say, notwithstanding the jesting manner in which I uttered the prophecy, it always gave him so much concern that he called me his evil eye and made the sign of the Jettatore whenever I repeated it. He loved life, had an intense fear of death, and could not be induced to converse about dying, of which he seemed to have a dread akin to that of children who are afraid to go to bed in the dark. — He was a good, amiable child, and, though naughty at times, to admonish him of his early end was always the sure way to produce the Jettatore sign and to make him silent. — Poor BELLINI!"

"So you were personally acquainted with him. Was he good looking?"

"Well, he was not ugly. — Thus you see that we men resemble women in disliking to answer affirmatively when such a question is asked regarding one of our sex. He was tall and slim; his movements were full of grace and coquetry; he was always a quatre epingles; his face was neither pale nor florid: his hair was of a light, almost golden hue, and hung in ringlets. His forehead was very high; his nose straight; his eyes light blue; his mouth well-proportioned; his chin round. His features seemed as vague and as void of character as milk. In fact, his face was a milk-face, and was frequently marked by a lackadaisical expression of pain which made up for the want of character. But it was pain without depth; void of poesy or passion, it glistered in his eyes and quivered on his lips. The young maestro seemed bent on making a show of his sadness. Fantastic melancholy betrayed itself in the arrangement of his hair, languor in the cut of his clothes, and ideality in his light cane. Thus he always reminded me of the old pastorals in which shepherds, in light colored jackets and short pants, tripped about, carrying staffs bedecked with ribbons. Then his gait was so mournful, so feminine and ethereal. His whole appearance suggested a sigh en escarpins. Though the ladies flattered him very much, I doubt whether he ever awakened deep passion. To me, there always seemed something so comically unenjoyable about him, caused, perhaps, by the style in which he spoke French. Though BELLINI at that time had been living in France for some years, I doubt whether, even in England, the language was ever as badly treated as when he used it. He spoke it terribly; he butchered it unmercifully. The way in which he often tortured the poor French words, as though an executioner were breaking them on the wheel, and the way in which he uttered his monstrous cogn à l'âne were enough to make one look around with fright to see whether the world was coming to an end with a mighty crash. Deathly silence reigned on such occasions; mortal terror was depicted in every countenance, whether rouged or powdered; the women seemed undecided whether they had better rush out of the room, or faint where they were; the men looked down towards their pantaloons to make sure that they really had such garments on; and, worst of all, the circumstance would fill every one with an almost uncontrollable desire to laugh outright. BELLINI's presence always filled one with fear, which, through some strange fascination, seemed at once to attract and to repel. Sometimes, his involuntary puns were mirth-provoking and reminded one, by their droll absurdity, of the castle of his countryman, Prince Pallagoni, which Goethe, in his 'Italianische Reise' called a museum of bizarre distortions and ill-matched monsters. As BELLINI always imagined that he had been making some serious and harmless observation, his face, on such occasions, was in strange contrast with his remarks, and then the unpleasant expression of which I spoke, became more marked. That which I disliked in BELLINI cannot be called a fault, and did not seem to displease the ladies in the least. His face and figure had an air of physical freshness, blooming health and rosiiness, that was calculated to make an unfavorable impression upon one with my morbid tastes. It was not until later, when I had known BELLINI for a long time and had found him of a kind and noble disposition, that I grew to like him. I fully believe that his soul remained pure to the last, and that the childlike kindness of temperament which men of genius usually possess, but never parade, was truly his."

"Yes," said Maximilian, while he sat down in the chair against the arm of which he had hitherto been leaning,—"I remember one occasion on which BELLINI appeared in so amiable an aspect that I observed him with delight, and determined to become more intimate with him. But, alas! that was the last time I was to see him in this life. It was one evening, at the house of a great lady who had the smallest foot in Paris, after we had dined and been merry and had been listening to the piano's sweetest strains.——I can yet see BELLINI before me, as he dropped into an arm-chair, exhausted by the many Bellini-isms he had uttered.——His seat was so low that it brought him at the feet of the beautiful lady, who, reclining on a sofa, looked down on BELLINI with sweet mischievousness. He was trying hard to entertain her with a few French phrases, and repeatedly found it necessary to assure the fair listener, in his Sicilian jargon, that what he had been saying was not a sottise, but a compliment. I do not believe that she heard one word of what he said. The thin cane, with which he sometimes endeavored to give force to his weak rhetoric, she had taken from him and was using it to destroy the graceful hair architecture that adorned the temples of the young maestro. Her wanton employment must have produced her peculiar expression, for hers was unlike any human face I have ever seen. I shall never forget that countenance. It was one of those faces that seem to belong to the dreamland of poesy rather than the actual world. A contour that reminded one of Da Vinci and the noble oval, with the naive dimples and sentimental, tapering chin, of the Lombard type. Her complexion was Roman mildness mingled with soft sheen of pearls and noble pallor: morbidezza. In short, it was one of those faces that can only be found in the old portraits of some of the great Italian women with whom the Italian artists of the sixteenth century were in love when they created their master-works, of whom the poets of that time thought when they sang their immortal strains, and after whom the French and German heroes longed when they girded on their swords and rushed beyond the Alps.——Yes, on just such a face there played a smile of sweetest mischief and aristocratic wantonness, while its owner was destroying the fair locks of the good BELLINI. At that moment, he seemed as if touched and transformed by a magic wand, and my heart warmed towards him at once. His face shone with the reflection of her smile, and it was, perhaps, the most delicious moment of his life. I shall never forget it.——A fortnight later, and I read that Italy had lost one of her most renowned sons!

"Strange to say, PAGANINI's death was announced at the same time. I did not, for a moment, doubt the death of the latter, for pale old PAGANINI always seemed near death's door. But that the youthful and blooming BELLINI had died, seemed incredible. Yet the report of PAGANINI's demise was untrue; and, while the violinist is at Genoa, alive and well, BELLINI lies in his grave in Paris!"

"Do you admire PAGANINI?" asked Maria.

"I consider him an honor to his country," answered Maximilian, "and he certainly deserves a most distinguished position among the musical celebrities of Italy."

"I have never seen him," said Maria, "but, if report speak truly, his appearance would hardly satisfy a fine eye for beauty. I have seen portraits of him."

"None of which resemble him," broke in Maximilian. "They all either flatter him, or do him injustice; none reproduce the true expression. I believe there is but one man who ever succeeded in transferring PAGANINI's features to paper, and he was a deaf painter named Lyser, who, in his genial eccentricity, with a few rough strokes, made so truthful a likeness of PAGANINI that the beholder was at once impressed with a double feeling of mirth and fear. 'The Devil guided my hand,' said the deaf painter, while he chuckled mysteriously and shook his head with an air of good-natured irony, as was his wont when he indulged in such madcap flights. Ah! he was a strange fellow. In spite of his deafness, he loved music with enthusiasm, and when he could get near enough to the orchestra, was able, it was said, to read the music in the faces of the musicians, and to tell by the movements of their fingers, whether their performance was more or less successful. He also wrote operatic criticisms for one of the leading journals of Hamburg. But is there anything wonderful in that? The deaf painter could see tones in the visible characters of playing. Are there not human beings to whom tones are as invisible characters in which they hear colors and forms?"

"You are one of those!" exclaimed Maria.

"I am sorry that I no longer possess Lyser's little drawing; it might have given you an idea of PAGANINI's looks. Those fabulous features, that seemed to belong rather to the sulphurous land of shadows than to the world of sunshine, could only be seized in bold, sharp lines. When we stood before the Alster pavilion in Hamburg, on the day of PAGANINI's first concert in that city, the deaf painter again assured me that Satan had directed his hand. 'Yea,' he continued, 'what all the world says about him must be true. He sold himself, body and soul, to the Devil; and, in return, was to become the greatest of all violinists, was to fiddle millions into his pockets, and was to be liberated from the accursed galleys in which he had languished for so many years. After that, you see, he got to be chapel-master at Lucca, fell in love with a theatrical princess, of whom and a little abbate he became jealous, and by whom, in all probability, he was henpecked; whereupon he stabbed his amata, in most approved Italian style, was sent to the galleys at Genoa, and as I said before, sold himself, in the end, to Satan, in order that he might escape, become the greatest of violinists, and be able to levy a contribution of two thalers upon every one of us.——But look! Let all good souls praise God! For there he comes through the allée, accompanied by his ambiguous Famule.'"

(Conclusion next week.)

Shakespeare in his Relation to Music.

A Lecture delivered on the 23d April, 1864, before the "Berliner Tonkünstler-Verein."*

BY EMIL NAUMANN.

"If music and sweet poetry agree,
As they must needs, the sister and the brother,
Then must the love be great 'twixt thee and me,
Because thou lov'st the one, and I the other;
Thou lov'st to hear the soft melodious sound
That Phoebus' lute, the queen of music, makes,
And I in deep delight am chiefly drownd'
When as himself to singing he betakes;
One God is god of both, so poets sing,
One knight loves both, and both in thee remain."

These lines emanate from the pen of the poet whose close and profound connection with music will form the subject of the words which I shall have the honor to address to you—from the man whose natal hour struck three hundred years ago to-day, and whose name is, at the present time, encircled with the admiration of the whole world.

Shakespeare, the greatest poet of any age, first beheld the light of day on the 23d April, 1564, at Stratford-upon-Avon.—Next to his countrymen, the English, we Germans have, probably, especial reason to honor the memory of this prince of poets. It was by him, no less than by the intellectual civilization of classical antiquity, that our own literature raised itself into independent and national life. "In opposition to the influences of bastard French art, Lessing, Wieland, Herder, Goethe and Schiller pointed, as far as a century back, to Shakespeare, as to a model, never to be equalled, and as to the deliverer, who alone could lead us back again to truth and nature. Such men as Schröder, Kaufmann, August Wilhelm von Schlegel, Ludwig Tieck, Count Wolf von Baudissin, Karl Simrock, and Franz Dingelstedt, were actuated in their labors by the same spirit, and, by presenting us with masterly translations, followed up the impulse given by the heroes of our classical literature. These translations are, to some extent, of such high value, and we Germans are so familiar with them, that they have completely rendered the great Englishman a part of the intellectual wealth of our nation.

* Translated for the London Musical World, by J. V. BAIDMAN.

But, besides the German nation generally, we musicians more especially have reason to remember the great poet with gratitude and admiration. We refer the reader to the motto prefixed to our observations, and, starting from it, dwell to-day with more than ordinary emphasis on the maxim, so frequently quoted, that a bond of most intimate relationship twines round all the arts. In consequence, however, of the still more intimate connection which we find existing, within this relationship, between separate art-groups, our—that is, musicians'—right to yet nearer affinity with Shakespeare may, perhaps, be rendered more apparent than any other. Just as, on the one side, the plastic arts—Architecture, Sculpture, and Painting—grasp each other by the hand as sisters in a peculiar kind of art, on the other side, Music and Poetry stand opposite them, as sisters bound together in a manner no less intimate and peculiar.

That I may be able to exhibit to you Shakespeare as the poet in whom the musical element is most lavishly and most frequently wedded to the poetical, I must beg permission first to attempt a survey of the mutual influence of poetry and music upon one another, as they are historically known to us.

In the most remote times, we find music and poetry blended in an almost indissoluble manner. All primitive poetry is of a religious purport, and, when we first meet with tune, that, also, is most undoubtedly employed to offer up hymns in honor of the Divinity or the gods. Nay, the connection between the two arts, on this their first appearance, is so close, that, in many cases, it is absolutely impossible to decide which of the two art-elements, tune or language, was the first to gain a definite shape in the breast of untutored man, following unconsciously his natural inward impulses. At any rate, the one did not remain long without the other, and, in most cases, both probably grew simultaneously like two branches of one and the same trunk, as we learn from national songs.

The proof of this is furnished by Indians, Persians, Egyptians, Phœnicians, and Jews, the oldest civilized peoples known to us, in the progressive connection in which music and poetry are exhibited among them. With regard to the Indians, we will remind our readers only of the religious songs intended for music in the Vedas; of the dance, accompanied by religious hymns, of the sacred virgins (Bayaderes); of the song accompanied by the "Wina" (most probably a stringed instrument) in Sakuntala, &c., &c.—Herodotus says of the Egyptians, Phœnicians, and races near them, when he is touching upon a most primitive religious song common to them all: "The Egyptians have a song, the 'Linos,' found, also, in Phœnicia, Cyprus, and elsewhere, but having different names according to the different peoples. It is proved, however, to be the same the Helenes sing under the name of 'Linos.' But, in Egyptian, it is called 'Maneros.'"

Even still more developed and close, than among the above civilized nations before the epoch of Grecian antiquity, appears the connection between Music and Poetry among the Israelites. As early as in the second book of Moses we read after the destruction of Pharaoh in the Red Sea: "And Miriam, the Prophetess, the sister of Aaron, took a timbrel in her hand, and all the women went out after her, with timbrels and with dances. And Miriam answered them: Sing ye to the Lord, for he hath triumphed gloriously; the horse and his rider hath he thrown into the sea." But it is in the Psalms that the old indissoluble connection of religious poetry with song is exhibited in its last and most complete shape. Here even the most varied and practical musical directions have been preserved. For instance, at the commencement of the 4th Psalm we read: "To the Chief Musician on Neginoth, a Psalm of David."* Or, "To the Chief Musician on Neginoth upon Sheminih," as at Psalm 6.† Or, "To the Chief Musician upon Githith," as at Psalm 8. Or lastly, "A song of degrees,"‡ as at Psalm 120, &c. Still more essential evidence of this complete blending with song is exhibited by the Psalms in their parallel system of verses, calculated for delivery by alternate choruses, and by the refrains, in this fashion significant only with musical treatment, such as we meet with in the 136th and other Psalms.

With the Greeks begins a new section in the history of the connection between poetry and music. It is true that here, too, we find the most ancient religious hymns indissolubly connected with song. But poetry and the plastic art soon became so exceptionally developed, that, despite the perfection to which they had attained in and of themselves, music and painting, as far as the first two arts were concerned, adopted more than aught else a relation of imitation, or of subordinate development pursued in a kindred manner. It is, however, significative for the blending of poetry and music, a blending which, among the Greeks as among other nations, was primitively one of perfect equality between the two component parts, that, when speaking of the influence of the "singers," Homer evidently employs the term "singer" quite as much to designate the poet as the composer. It is here perfectly plain that the matter declaimed and characterized merely by the word "song" applies quite as much to the subject-matter as to the strain. How intimately the Greek poet was acquainted with the most touching and moving effects of music upon the human mind; how strong is the relationship of the two arts to each other, and how complete the understanding existing between the poet and the composer, is proved us by the fact that when Penelope, in her apartment up-stairs, hears "the heavenly strain" of the singer, singing of Troy, she comes down weeping into the men's apartment, and asks for another song, because the first breaks her heart; or that when Odysseus, among the Phœnicians, conceals his head, as the singer, striking the golden chords, speaks of the hero's brothers-in-arms who have fallen, or of the woes of the weeping hero himself, not supposing that the latter is listening to him.

* The German rendering of the above is: "Vorsingen auf Saitenspielen"—literally: "To be sung publicly on stringed instruments."

† In German: "Vorsingen auf acht Saiten"—"To be sung publicly on eight strings."

‡ In German: "Ein Lied im höheren Chor"—"A song in the higher chorus."

(To be Continued.)

Robert Schumann in Leipzig and Clara Wieck.*

(Continued from page 300.)

The following year, 1834, is called by Schumann himself "the most remarkable year of his life;" it was, indeed, a most eventful one for him. In the foreground stands the establishment of the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik, concerning which he speaks as follows in the preface to his Collected Works published in 1854: "At the end of 1833, a number of rather young musicians used to meet every evening, as if by accident, in the first place for social intercourse, but no less for the interchange of ideas on art, which for them was the meat and drink of life. It cannot be affirmed that the state of musical matters in Germany at that period was a very satisfactory one. Rossini still reigned supreme upon the stage, and on the piano almost exclusively Herz and Hünten. And yet not many years had elapsed since Beethoven, C. M. von Weber, and Franz Schubert had lived among us. It is true that Mendelssohn's star was in the ascendant, and wonderful things were heard of a Pole named Chopin—but it was not till afterwards that these two exerted any permanent influence. One day, the hot-headed young disciples of art suddenly said to themselves: Let us not look idly on; let us set about improving things, and causing the poetry of art to be once more honored. This was the origin of a Neue Zeitschrift für Musik."

With regard to the tendency of the publication, Schumann expressed himself very clearly in its columns on several occasions. "Our line of opinion was settled off-hand. It is simple and as follows: We were to remind people as emphatically as we could of the olden time and its works, and to call attention to the fact how only at such a pure source new art-beauties could be strengthened; we were thus to oppose as unartistic the most recent period, because all its efforts tended only to the increase of material virtuosity; and lastly we were to assist in hastening to bring about a new and poetic period." Further on he says: "The elevation of German taste by German art, whether by a reference to the great old models, or by fostering young men of talent—such an elevation may now be regarded as the goal of our efforts. The red thread which spins forth this idea might, certainly, be found in the history of the 'Davidabündler,' an association of which the members, though coming forward in a rather fantastic fashion, were recognized less by any external mark of distinction than by inward similarity. They will, also, endeavor in the future, to erect a dam against mediocrity, by word as well as by deed. If this was formerly done in an impetuous manner, let people place in the other scale the warm enthusiasm with which all that was really talented and really artistic was on every occasion distinguished. We do not write for the purpose of making tradesmen rich; we write for the purpose of doing honor to art."

* From a new work entitled: Zur Geschichte des Theaters und der Musik in Leipzig, by Dr. Emil Knechtke.

It may be said that, in the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik, the rising generation waged war against that which had outlived itself; romanticism and geniality were opposed to pedantry and pigtailism. Viewed in a polemical light, the enterprise possessed a degree of importance not to be denied, and consequently created among the public that sensation which it deserved. The Zeitschrift performed in the domain of music a part completely similar to that played in the domain of literature by Ruge's Jahrbücher, which had sprung into existence a few years previously. While the Jahrbücher cut off the pigtail of the old literary periodicals, Schumann's journal—to name only one of the publications which were its artistic antipodes—directed its attacks against the no less bepigtalled criticisms of the Allgemeine Musikalische Zeitung.

This paper appeared for the first time on the 3rd October, 1798. It was published by Breitkopf and Härtel, Leipzig, and that estimable gentleman, Friedrich Rochlitz, was the editor from its first establishment to 1827. It cannot be denied that the paper, one of the oldest, nay for a long time the sole periodical, of the kind in Germany, could boast of having enjoyed a period of great prosperity. It was conducted by Rochlitz with a vast amount of technical knowledge and warm enthusiasm for our classical composers, and its editor's opinion, intelligent and moderate as it always appeared to be, was, during a long series of years, regarded as an authority in the world of art. But the worthy gentleman had arrived at a very advanced age. He retired, therefore, from the editorship, and Gottfried Wilhelm Fink (author of many historical and theoretical works on art, and subsequently Lector publicus at the University) took his place. Despite his various good qualities in other respects, it must be said of Herr Fink, that he was attached far too narrow-mindedly to the Past, and that, even if he possessed a proper appreciation of modern times, he had not, at any rate, the love and unprejudiced opinion suited to them. The fiery youths, boiling over with enthusiasm, were, perhaps, offensive, in life as in art, to older gentlemen, who had become cooler and more cautious—hence the calm reserve, or the pedantic carping and airs of superiority of the latter towards the former, and hence, too, on the other hand, the bold and defiant front shown by the younger combatants, who not unreasonably felt affronted, and continually kept hammering away on the justice of new ideas and new views.

The editors and principal contributors to the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik were, from the commencement, besides Schumann and Wieck, Ludwig Schunke, Julius Knorr, and Carl Banck. The first of these three, a son of Gottfried Schunke, the universally celebrated French horn player of his day, was born at Cassel, on the 21st December, 1810. When only in his sixth year, he had pianoforte lessons from his father, and played in public as a child. When he was eleven, he made his first professional trip to Darmstadt, Hanover, Leipzig, etc., and his playing met with unanimous approbation. This was the case in a still higher degree, on his making a second journey, which he did, in 1824, to Munich, Vienna, etc. In 1828 his father took him to Paris, where he remained till 1830, still seeking, and finding, improvement, from Kalkbrenner in pianoforte playing, and from Reicha in composition. After staying a year and a half in Stuttgart, whither he had proceeded on leaving Paris, he went to Vienna, where he edited several works, gave some most successful concerts, and remained till 1833. He then went to Leipzig, and formed a friendship of the closest nature with Schumann, in conjunction with whom he founded the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik. Unfortunately, however, he died of consumption as far back as the 6th December 1834. In him was prematurely lost an amiable man of more than ordinary talent.—Julius Knorr was born in Leipzig itself on the 22nd September, 1807, where he attended the Nicolaischule, and afterwards studied theology. In 1827, he applied himself entirely to music, having, however, previously attained, under Wilhelm Neudeck, considerable proficiency on the piano. He afterwards appeared most successfully in public as a pianist, and it was, by the way, reserved for him, at the concert of the 27th October, 1831, to be the first to execute a work by Chopin in the Gewandhaus. He wrote, also, several theoretical works, and, as we have already said, had a share in editing the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik. In 1862, he died in our town, greatly esteemed as a piano forte teacher.—With regard, lastly, to Carl Banck, he was born on the 27th May, 1811, in Magdeburg, and played, from his sixth year, the piano, to which he afterwards added the organ and theoretical studies. In the middle of 1827, he went to Berlin, where he had the benefit of lessons from Bernard Klein. He enjoyed, also, the guidance and counsels of the worthy old Zelter, as well as of Ludwig Berger. A journey to Italy, in company with his poetical friend, Alexander Simon, matured his first work, the Liederkreis aus Italien. After this he lived, for many years again, actively productive, in his native town, till he proceeded, in 1834, to Leipzig, his principal object being to publish several of his compositions. But he, too, very soon became mixed up in the matters for which Schumann and his confederate in art interested themselves. He took an active part in the editorship of the new paper, till he went, in 1840, to Dresden, where he has fixed his permanent residence, writing all the theatrical and musical criticisms in the Dresdner Journal. Of his later works, we may mention more especially his music to the poems of Claus Groth and Lenau.

This is the place to speak of the idea—exactly agreeing with the foundation of the paper, and appertaining to Schumann—of the "Davidabündlerschaft." He himself says concerning the latter, in the preface, already cited, to his Collected Works: "And here I must mention an association which was more than secret, for it existed only in the head of its founder, namely, the association of the 'Davidabündler.' In order to give utterance to various views on art, it appeared not unsuitable to invent artistic characters opposed to each other. Of these, Florestan and Eusebius were the most important ones, while Master Raro stood as a mediator between them. The 'Davidabündlerschaft' went through the paper like a red line, connecting in a humorous way, 'truth with fiction.'"—So writes Schumann. The name of the association, which, as we have already said, existed only as an idea, is, of course, an allusion to the Biblical history of the defeat of the Philistines by David. Florestan and Eusebius were Schumann himself under two different aspects. The former represented the vigorous and passionate, the latter, on the other hand, the wild and dreamy side of his disposition. Raro was intended for Friedrich Wieck. Under the accompanying forms of Serpentinus and Jonathan, Banck and Schunke were meant. As far back as 1836, Schumann wrote very happily to Heinrich Dorn as follows: "Florestan and Eusebius are my double nature, which I, like Raro, would fain blend into a man." We all know that the idea of the 'Davidabündlerschaft' is reflected in many of our friend's compositions dating from this period, as, for instance, in the Carnival, in the separate inscriptions: "Florestan," "Eusebius, etc.," and the concluding march of the "Davidabündler" against the "Philistines," as well as in the "Pianoforte Sonata, dedicated to Clara, by Florestan and Eusebius."

Everyone knows who this Clara was: the daughter of his teacher and friend, Friedrich Wieck, and afterwards his wife. It is true that in 1834, Schumann was on terms of close friendship with a young lady, Ernestine von Fricker, of Asch. She had come in the April of that year to reside with Wieck in Leipzig, for the purpose of perfecting herself, under his guidance, on the piano. "It was there," says Wasielewsky, "that Robert became acquainted with her, directly after her arrival. He quickly conceived a passionate admiration for her, which was fully returned, though it did not end in a lasting connection, as Schumann, according to his own confessions, had for a time intended it should. If we can believe the description of those who knew Ernestine, she was neither particularly handsome, nor unusually gifted intellectually. It appears, indeed, that Schumann was attracted simply by the bloom of youth and the power exerted by material charms, and that it was only the poet in him that believed her endowed with those qualities which we are always so fond of presupposing in the object of our affection, though they might not exist in the slightest degree." The connection between the two was dissolved in a most friendly manner. Some years later, namely, in January, 1836, our friend's heart was filled with a second and profound passion for a truly poetical and spiritually feminine nature, his future wife, Clara Wieck.

(To be continued.)

Don Quixote Dramatized.

The Paris correspondent of the New York Tribune writes:

Here at last, after long drawn notes of preparation first sounded months ago, was brought out last Monday week, the Don Quixote of Victorien Sardou. But if the preparatory, anticipatory, expectant notes sung and said since winter were many, they are as nothing in quantity compared to the volume of criticising—somewhat discordant—that fruition has evoked. Speaking within bounds, I should say that in the last ten days, in fulfilment of my sad duty as a "well informed own" and for my sins, I had read to the amount of a stout octave of written talk and have heard a balloon full of articulate waste wind on the subject. Then, taking my courage in both hands, as the French say, and opportunity of a refreshing change in the torrid air of the preceding three days, I did dispose myself, as Tribune reporter, four nights ago, in the orchestra of the Gymnase to see and hear for myself and your readers. And a very admirable sight it was—and is, and shall be photographed on my memory's retina. The first entrance of Lesueur, as the exalted, crack-brained, laughable but never ridiculous, fantastic, truly noble and gentle man, was though in a totally different kind, the unexceptionably highest, most poetical and completely triumphant work of historic art that I have seen since Rachel quickened Racine's artificial Phœdra to the passionate reality of life—and that within the narrow limits imposed by the intensely artificial forms of the poem.

When the curtain rises, the barber is in the dining room, busied, with the housekeeper's encouragement, in nailing a tapestry over the door that lets into the library of chivalric romances, the perusal of which has turned Don Quixote's brain. Scarcely is the last nail driven, when the Don enters,—a long, gaunt figure already draped in a knight's undersuit of buff leather; gray haired, with out-set eyes, looking beyond and over the present time and its poor work-a-day interests, fixed on the second page of a folio that he holds in his left hand, and reading as he walks. The first provocation is to laughter, but a something in that laughable figure commanded a respect recognized by all the house. On he marches, absorbed in his reading, rapt from the vulgar world and his household surroundings; he has nearly reached the bottom of the page, he applies thumb and finger to reverse the leaf, it clings to the next, won't turn; then the reader, still having some lines to finish, draws out from under his left arm his unsheathed sword some four feet long, and while his eye and mind unbrokenly follow the printed lines that close the page, cuts open the next closed leaf with such a magnificent sweep of his arm and hand, that rests outstretched as still he reads on in the next page—I tell you—the first deep admiring hum of the house, quick swelling, then bursting in stormy applause—tells how Lesueur had in those sixty or a hundred seconds, produced, created, became the laughable madman, the generous enthusiast, the essentially true, noble, pure gentleman, Don Quixote. As some one of the critics happily said the other day, "Cervantes had clapped hands with the loudest to see this creature of his imagination so reproduced, Sancho Panza is only less meritorious than his master. Such of The Tribune's readers—and they are many—will conceive what Prado, late of the Bouffes Parisiennes, might be as a Sancho, nature has done so much for him. Well, he is Sancho, not indeed with the fine artistic delicacy and intimate persuasion of its realness with which Lesueur makes and lets himself become Don Quixote's self, but yet with a sincerity and a comprehension of the rôle, for which all readers of Cervantes' wonderful book owe him great thanks.

The plot of the piece, so far as it has any, is taken from the episodic story of the loves of Cardenio and Lucinda, of Don Ferrand and Dorothea. Intermixed with the plot, patched on to it, hitched on to it, forced right through it, are the Knight de la Mancha and his Squire—bringing with them a few of the many famous adventures and scenes of Cervantes' hero and Cervantes' imagination.

A Conversation with Meyerbeer.

M. Alexander Weill, a personal friend of the late Meyerbeer, reported in a late number of the Archives d'Israélite an interesting conversation which he had with the latter on various topics, a portion of which we translate. The great artist having been informed by M. Weill that fault was found with him by Jewish organs for not having composed anything for the synagogue, the composer replied: "This does not surprise me. For thirty years the German Christians have reproached me for being unable to produce any other compositions save Jewish music. It is but natural that the Jews should now reproach me for not producing Jewish music." In the course of the conversation Meyerbeer further remarked that it had been his intention to compose an opera, "Moses," but that he relinquished the idea partly because he had been anticipated by Rossini, and partly because he did not understand Hebrew. On this subject he further remarked: "I must make a confession to you. In order to be a Jew, even to the smallest extent, one must understand Hebrew, just as to be a Frenchman one must understand French. For Judaism is not only a religion, but also a nationality. The nationality sticks to us were it only because we are always charged with it, even when the religion has entirely vanished. If I had a son, and wished to bring him up in the Jewish religion, I should take care that he should understand Hebrew. For the little of Judaism that still clings to me I am indebted to some Biblical words, some reminiscence of Hebrew. Not only Jewish boys, but Jewish girls too, should at the age of three begin to learn Hebrew; they would then never run the risk of wishing to change their religion."

"What you tell me," replied M. Weill, "delights me, and at the same time astonishes me. You may easily imagine why; for you are reproached for having permitted your amiable daughters to get baptized."

"I have," replied Meyerbeer, "allowed my daughters the liberty to choose their religion. I believed then that I acted in this as a kind parent, philosopher, and good citizen. I believed that a father had neither the right nor the obligation to teach his children his religion. Alas! I then had nothing to teach. I myself did not know the Jewish religion! Women, and especially young girls, must have in earliest childhood something that can inspire them. If the word had not been so often abused, I should have said that children required the least bit of fanaticism."

"Do you think that instruction in Hebrew alone is sufficient to fire the imagination of a young person of the Jewish faith?"

"Certainly, Dieu, God, says nothing to me. 'The Lord, is as much Christian as Jewish. The same is the case with the 'Eternal.' But Adonai tells me something, especially when I know that this is a mysterious word, which combines the notion of the past, present, and future. What do you think of this, who understand Hebrew as well as your mother tongue?"

"I think you are giving utterance to precious remarks, and therefore should not like to interrupt you. I shall take note of everything and publish our conversation sooner or later." And after a few irrelevant remarks M. Weill continues, "No, no; I am not come to speak but to listen. Let us resume the subject. It is as simple as it is true. A Jew who does not understand Hebrew makes upon me the impression of a Peter Schlemiel, who has lost his shadow. The Israelitish youths in Germany, who only learn Latin and Greek, are either simpletons or get baptized. It is just the same with Jewish girls," and having continued to describe the degeneracy of modern Jews, Meyerbeer replied:

"Of a surety, Hebrew is the language of reason, and in order to be a good husband one must have much reason, and that too, in a goodly proportion."

"Who tells us this?"

"I have read the Bible; my mother has, moreover, often repeated this to me. When she was tired of arguing she always concluded with some Hebrew quotation, which summed up everything in two words; for my mother understood Hebrew. As for me, when I was a boy, Hebrew appeared to me as difficult as useless. I have since changed my view. My brother understood more Hebrew than I. He began all at once to study it, but he had no longer time for it; it is only in youth that one learns well."

"In this case I pity our young Jews and those of the future; for our young Jews, even the sons of orthodox parents, have a dislike to Hebrew. They prefer drawing their rules from 'Figaro,' the Nain Jaune,' and from morn to eve study nothing but the money articles. As for the poor, they only devote their sons to rabbinical and Hebrew studies, when their talent is mediocre. When a youth exhibits extraordinary talent he devotes himself to some other branch. Do you know what our young men now-a-days become? Writers of farces, journalists, pianists, literati, sometimes mathematicians, and still more rarely professors—i. e., scholars, as Montaigne says, who know what others before them knew better. Even our medical men, since they have deserted the study of Hebrew, are no longer as distinguished as they were in the middle ages. Nearly all of them are materialists, and according to them the world rests upon three pillars—upon money, money, and again money."

"You are perfectly right," replied Meyerbeer. "In my time the aspiration of all young Israelites of my age was to distinguish themselves through science, art, and irreproachable conduct. Now-a-days the young wealthy Israelites only think of heaping million upon million. From their earliest infancy they learn to despise everything that is not money. If they practise an art it is only a trade to earn money. The rabbinate itself has become a speculation. How many rich Jews formerly studied the Talmud! Now-a-days they are sent to polytechnic, commercial, and military schools. If anybody wants to become a rabbi it is because he wants a salary. Everything is calculated beforehand. In the same way there is scarcely a rich Jewish young lady but she thinks of a marriage beyond the pale."

"You have," replied M. Weill, "a little while ago uttered some truths concerning the Hebrew, which you will permit me to complete. What distinguishes Hebrew above all modern languages is, that it excludes everything unholy. Nearly all ancient and modern works, whether written in Greek or French, contain vulgarities, rascalities, wicked and dirty ideas. Hebrew alone, from Genesis to Esther, always exhibits the greatness of virtue, the littleness of vice, nay, even more, the nothingness of life and the grandeur of God. No human being, whether man or woman, will, if the principles of the Bible are impressed upon their memories, become useless, proud, hard-hearted, or avaricious. They will be discreet, compassionate, and affable towards all. They will thus be pre-eminent, for they will feel their dignity and seek to maintain it. Formerly Hebrew, with which the father was acquainted, and which the daughter imbibed with her mother's milk, lent to the Jewish race a charm of special distinction. Now-a-days the race, still lively and ardent, is distinguished by nothing but an ardent craving after mundane frivolities and material enjoyments. If it does not invigorate itself with the national source, it may before the expiration of a century disappear before the German, Italian, and French nationalities. However, this is a question of vital importance, which we may discuss another time."

Music Abroad.

London.

The opera season having melted away under the dog-star, the promenade concerts of Mr. ALFRED MELLON, with his splendid orchestra of eighty, take their turn, as usual, at Covent Garden Theatre, the porters being floored over on a level with the deep stage for that purpose. Like Jullien père, he has his Beethoven and his Mendelssohn "nights," which draw delighted crowds. One of the last programmes was "a feast to set before a king;" to-wit:

Overture—"Egmont."	Beethoven
Aria—"Gold" ( Fidelio ).	"
Concerto in E flat—Pianoforte.	"
Grand Sonata—"A qual furor" ( Fidelio ).	"
Pastoral Symphony.	"

The second part was miscellaneous, including an "operatic selection" from Don Giovanni. The Daily Telegraph thinks that Mr. Mellon's concerts ought to be superlatively good to tempt people in hot August weather. "But in this overgrown city of three million inhabitants there are many weary, helpless, town-ridden wretches, to whom other health-giving pleasures are denied; and there are many who prefer hearing Beethoven's 'Sensations on first revisiting the country,' splendidly described in his Pastoral Symphony, to testing their own feelings on the subject."

The following may give some idea of London tastes:

THE OPERA SEASON.—We find that (at the Royal Italian opera) seventy-seven performances have been crowded into the interval of four months between the 29th of March and the 30th of July. There have been four opera nights in every week, except the first and second; the number has latterly been increased to five, and last week the theatre was open every night. Some statistics which we have deduced from a list of the performances may have an interest for our readers. From these it appears that M. Gounod's Faust has been by far the most popular opera of the year, for, although not produced at all until the season was half over, it has been given since then no less than twelve times. Next in precedence comes Don Giovanni, the representations of which number seven; and then Il Barbiere, which has been six times repeated. Rossini, it would seem, is still the most favorite composer, for various works from his pen have been thirteen times brought into request, while Meyerbeer and Verdi each number twelve representations. Strangely enough, only one of Auber's operas, namely, Masaniello, has been given, and this only once in its entirety. The second and third acts, however, have several times followed some other opera—as, for instance, on the 14th of April, when the white-chokered habitués did hearty homage to the red-shirted hero of Italy on the occasion of his right royal visit to the theatre.—Daily Telegraph.

Paris.

The National Festival of the 15th August has been celebrated at the theatres with more than usual eclat. As all places of entertainment were thrown open to the public gratis, the crowds at the various theatres were very great. The Opéra especially—the only lyric theatre available at the present moment—was crammed to suffocation. The performances comprised Guillaume Tell, and a new cantata written expressly for the occasion, words by MM. Ludovic Halévy and Henri Meilhac, music by M. Daprat, sung by Mlle. Sax and MM. Mèrès and Dumestre. But, although all the lyric theatres except the Opéra were closed, it did not therefore follow—particularly as now musical monopoly no longer exists—that musical performances would not take place elsewhere. In fact, several non-lyric theatres adventured new musical productions in honor of the occasion. A cantata, first time of performance, entitled "Vive la France!", written by M. Noriac, and composed by M. Lindheim, was given at the Variétés, sung by M. Alexandre Michel; at the Vaudeville was brought out a cantata called "Les Gloires de la Paix," words by M. Armand Renaud, the music by M. Pillevestre, sung by all the artists of the establishment; the strophes recited by M. Ariste; at the Gymnase, "Napoleon," a cantata by M. Alexandre Pédaguel, was sung by all the artists; at the Châtelet, "L'Hotel Dieu et l'Opera," an apropos sketch, was sung by M. Rosier; at the Porte-Saint-Martin was given a cantata, "Le Canon des deux règnes," words by M. Jules Delahaye, music by M. Albert Vinentini; at the Gaité, and at the Folies-Dramatiques, "Le Quinze Août;" and at the Folies-Marigny, "La France et l'Empereur." On Tuesday a Gala Representation was given at the Opéra in honor of the King of Spain. The illuminations of the National Fête had been preserved all round the boulevards and in the Rue de la Paix, and were kept up all the evening. The interior of the Opéra had a magnificent appearance. All the leading members of the diplomatic, military, and civil departments now in Paris were present. Beauty, youth, and jewellery made the salles radiant and scintillated in honorable rivalry. The box occupied by their Majesties was placed in that part of the first tier directly fronting the stage. It was richly and superbly embellished. The Emperor was decorated with the order of the Toison d'Or, and wore the uniform of a general officer. The King of Spain was also in military costume. The Empress attracted especially by the brilliancy of her diadem, which flashed with a thousand shifting lights. Her Majesty was accompanied by their Royal Highnesses the Princess Mathilde, the Prince and Princesses Murat. I am ill at silks, satins, cashmeres, muslins of India, Canton crapes, Genoa velvets, tarlatans and Gros-de-Naples, or I should have attempted to render you some account of the rich and varied toilettes of the dames and demoiselles. But I lay down my pen au desespoir, and commend the description to the imagination of our readers. I thought it a pity, indeed, that so much Majesty, aristocracy and wealth, so much "youth, beauty and clean linen," as Farquhar hath it in the Beaux Stratagem, should have been brought together by the allurements of a mere ballet. But so it was, the ballet of Némée alone made up the spectacle.

The Academy of the Fine Arts, in its sitting of the 13th inst., elected as correspondents in the section of musical composition, Mr. Benedict at London, in the room of M. Beaulien, deceased, and Mde. Flotow in the room of Signor Verdi, promoted to the rank of Associate.

Contemporaneously with the production of the Africaine at the Opéra, will be brought out La Jeunesse de Goethe at the Odéon, and, in all probability, a French version of Struensee at the Porte St. Martin—two dramas, with musical illustrations by Meyerbeer. The first as yet is in MS. Struensee, as everybody knows, was written by Michel Beer, brother of the composer; that of La Jeunesse de Goethe, as every body does not know by M. Henry Blaze de Bury.

M. Bagier is making extraordinary preparations for the opening of the Italian campaign in October. One of the features of his policy seems to be to engage as many tenors as can be had. He has already on his list, Fraschini, Naudin, Negrini, Nicolini, Corsi, Baragli and Tamberlik.

The newly granted "liberty of the theatres" was celebrated at the Variétés by a droll medley piece called "La Liberté des Théâtres." The correspondent of the Orchestra describes the plot:

An ambitious pastrycook of theatrical proclivities wishes to take advantage of the new law by opening a theatre of his own; but his neighbors, the grocer and the butcher, have formed a similar idea, and hence a comical competition between these and other managers desirous of securing the services of a lot of good, bad, and indifferent artists, assembled in a coffee-house, who are sold by auction and knocked down to the highest bidder by Mme. Duval, who, armed with a punch-ladle for a hammer, sells off her lots with great vigor. This gives occasion for much drollery, as each artist has to give a specimen of his or her dramatic or musical powers. The successful competitor starts a Théâtre Restaurant, in which the pleasures of the table are enjoyed along with those of the drama—each dish being served up with its corresponding artist—soup with the soprano, veal with the jeune premier, roast beef with the basso, and so on. The piece played before this gourmandizing audience is "Don Quixote," windmills and all, which is interrupted in a pathetic part by Dulcinea, who has got hungry at the sight of so much good fare, and refuses to do more without her dinner. Then followed an opera, the "Violon Enchanté," in which M. Hervé, as Cabocino, personates an "enraged musician," as chef d'orchestre, in an amusing manner, and Mlle. Vernet, an actress of Lyons, plays an air on the violin with a masterly execution; but the tenor has fallen ill, and so we have a guignol—the puppets, as large as life, representing in laughable style Lemaitre, Beauvallet, and other well-known artists. Then follows a ballet admitting pretty scenery, with a real fountain in the centre, the leaping waters of which are illuminated by electric light in brilliant colors, producing the well-known effect. After that, we have the rehearsal (in costume) of an extravagant military drama of the Cirque Impérial kind. The whole ends by a grand ballet in honor of theatrical liberty, in which there are characteristic dances of all nations. The piece, as you perceive by this short description, is very amusing from beginning to end, and promises to have a long run, being full of fun and laughter.

LEIPZIG. The performance of sacred music lately given by Kiedel's Association in the Thomas Church was distinguished for the following interesting programme: Fantasia (E flat major), violin—composed and executed by G. Ad. Thomas; "Ob Gram und Elend," Psalm for soprano solo with accompaniment—Marcello (sung by Madame von Milde of Weimar); three Russian sacred four-part songs for chorus: 1. Old Russian Sacred Song from Kiev, and of the 12th century; 2. Song of a primitive Russian race of the 10th or 11th century; and 3. "Cherubim-Hymn"—Bortnjansky; "Die Seeligkeiten"—Liszt, Prelude and Fugue (D minor)—S. Bach (performed by Herr Thomas); "Agnus Dei" for four-part chorus—J. G. Hertzog, of Erlangen; "Troestet mein Volk," chorus—Müller-Hartung of Eisenach; "Ach, Gott, wie manches Herzeleid," cantata for soprano and bass with accompaniment—J. S. Bach (sung by Herr and Madame von Milde); and the Hundredth Psalm for double chorus—R. Franz. The gems of the performance were the Psalm by Marcello, Liszt's "Seeligkeiten," and R. Franz's motet. Marcello could not have found a more satisfactory representative than Madame von Milde, who sang his composition most admirably. The Russian Sacred Songs—with the exception of that by Bortnjansky—were interesting only from a historical point of view. Bortnjansky's "Hymn," however, produced a deep impression, and found very many admirers.

STUTTGART. During the theatrical season which commenced on the 2d of last September, and was brought to a close, on the 24th June, by the death of the King, there were in all 204 performances, of which 86 were operatic. Eighteen works by German composers were given on forty-two evenings, namely: Fidelio, three times; Stradella, three times; Martha, four times; Iphigenia in Tauris, once; Das Nachtlager in Granada, three times; Czaar und Zimmermann, once; Le Prophète, Les Huguenots, and Robert le Diable, twice each; Die Zauberflöte, three times; Don Juan, twice; Le Nozze di Figaro, once; Die lustigen Weiber von Windsor, once; Jessonda, twice; Tannhäuser, three times; Der Freischütz and Oberon, four times each; and Euryanthe, once. Of operas by French composers there were 10 on twenty-five different evenings, namely: Le Châlet, three times; La Part du Diable, three times; Les Diamants de la Couronne and Fra Diavolo, twice each; Le Maçon, once; La Dame Blanche, twice; Marguerite, four times; La Juive, three times; La Reine de Chypre, twice; and Joseph, three times. Of operas by Italian composers there were ten on eighteen different evenings, namely: Les Deux Journées, once; Lucia, three times; Le Philtre and Lucrezia Borgia, twice each; Guillaume Tell, twice; Il Barbiere and Le Comte Ory, once each; Azur, three times; Il Trovatore, twice; and Rigoletto, once. The operas most frequently performed were Martha, Marguerite, Oberon, and Der Freischütz. Of the above thirty-eight operas, Rossini's Comte Ory and Adams' Châlet were new here; the revivals were Azur, by Salieri; Oberon, by Weber; and Jessonda, by Spohr. The last had not been performed for twenty-two years.

MILAN. The great topic of conversation here at present is the inauguration of the Quartet Society, which took place recently in the rooms of the Conservatory of Music. Quartets by Mendelssohn and Mozart, with Beethoven's Septet and Sonata in D were performed on the occasion. Beethoven's Sinfonia Eroica was played at the third concert of the Conservatory.

NAPLES. The pupils of the Royal Academy of Music lately got up a concert in honor of Meyerbeer. The pieces performed were: the overture to L'Etoile du Nord; chorus of conspirators from Der Kreuzfahrer; fantasia for the flute on motives from Robert Le Diable; the overture to Struensee; chorus and introduction from Der Kreuzfahrer; fantasia for piano on Les Huguenots; and the overture to Unorah. The concert was preceded by an address from Signor M. Baldacchini, Governor of the Academy. The San Carlos Theatre closed its season with Linda di Chamounix, in which Signors Perelli, Caracciolo, and Signor Dehassini were greatly applauded. The theatre re-opens in November.—Florentino's mortal remains arrived here some time since. They are to be buried with great solemnity.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, SEPT. 17, 1864.

"Light" and "Heavy."

No one objects to a felicitously varied programme. Indeed it is always desirable. But it is childish to suppose an incoherent medley, of Symphony and polka, Beethoven and sable minstrelsy, the sublime and the frivolous, the delicately ideal and the boisterously rowdy, essential to variety. There really is more effective variety, more stimulating contrast, between the different movements of the same good Symphony, for instance, than there is between the different pieces of the most miscellaneous "popular" programme: just as a select society of persons, who have real wit and character, and whose meeting proceeds from a certain key-note to a certain end, offers far less monotony and far more entertaining contrast of true individuality, than a great miscellaneous assemblage, which is aimless, light and frivolous. And of all monotonies to which soul and sense are liable, save us from the confused Babel in the brain, the torpor of stunned nerves and feelings, which results from listening to a purely heterogeneous succession of songs, dances, overtures, solos with variations, &c., &c., where one impression is recklessly trodden out by another, until hearing everything and hearing nothing come to be pretty nearly equivalent. Contrast is all-essential, but it amounts to nothing, when there is no relation between the things contrasted.

The lovers of "light" music of course complain of music that is "heavy." But heaviness and dullness do not alone or necessarily pertain to solemn subjects and to learned treatment. On the contrary, what heaviness can be compared to the effect upon the mind of an interminable series of flashy flute variations, or a whole evening of pretty waltzes, polkas, &c., which with all their brilliancy, and their coquettish gracefulness of rhythm, sound like changes rung upon one theme, until passages from all of them will haunt you in the memory of each! If you want wit and sprightliness, can not Shakespeare give it to you in as full a measure as Dion Bourciquault, or the author of the Pillicoddy farces? If you crave grotesque and fantastic recreation in your music, is not a Beethoven Scherzo, or a Mendelssohn Capriccio or Overture, as daintily refreshing as a Jullien quadrille? Or do you like the glitter best without the gold?

We are no exclusive sticklers for one style of music. There is as wide room for difference of style within, as there is without, the so-called "classical" boundaries, if any one can tell just where these run. We cheerfully compromise a good deal to get a good thing, and do not mind taking quite a quantity of sand, if we are assured there is a diamond somewhere in the midst of it. Mixed programmes we have always willingly accepted, and indeed they have been the necessary policy of concert-givers thus far. But the earnest music-lovers are more tolerant of a few light things in a programme, than the party who go to talk and be amused are of a Symphony.

Our Orchestras, Quintette Clubs, concert-givers generally, may do well to try the experiment of an entire distinction. Let them not give purely classical programmes to a ruinous extent, in a business point of view; but it is quite well, so long as their whole season's business can afford, that some unique opportunities of this sort should exist; that there should be some purely musical occasions, as well as mixed entertainments, where music only accompanies and fills the pauses of small talk, or hints the pleasurable excitements of the ball-room and the military parade.

Moreover, there are many very clever things which come under the category of light music; indeed there is sometimes even genius in a waltz. What we would see more widely recognized and practiced upon is, the notion that it is quite possible to preserve all the vivacity and sparkle of the waltz, all the "Begone dull Care," the buoyancy, the variety, the lightness of "light music," within the limits of a choice selection almost wholly from the works of genius. There should be a distinction drawn between light, in the true sense, as opposed to grave, contemplative, and solemn, and "light" in the sense now applied to music, and which means merely promiscuous, miscellaneous, in the scale of excellence as well as in the scale of character variety, and which is made to include in its programme much that is dreary and stupid; much that is of the street and noisy; much that is heavy and overwhelming, without the least suggestion of grandeur; much that is sickish sentimental, hacknied, "flat, stale and unprofitable." And the reason why a whole evening's medley of such things is called "light" is, as everybody knows, because they do not tax the mind's attention, do not bespeak a quiet and harmonious attitude on the part of the audience, do not interfere much with talking and laughing and all sorts of non-musical amusements. Those who go to a concert merely to be amused, of course cannot be contented with a pure concert; they cannot comply with the conditions of a purely musical evening; they want an orchestra for accompaniment, interlude or prelude to their own social jollity; a singer to gossip about, to ogle through a lorgnette, to like or to dislike (for personal curiosity is two-thirds of the charm.) In a word they want music, as people in a great, promiscuous, full-dress ball, or "jam," want music; or as promenaders on the Battery or Common want it, as something to make the world seem gay and rhythmical, which they may heed or not, as conversation or flirtation wanes or waxes. Light music, in this sense, is something for the unmusical; and a concert so made up may lack the essential element of music, the essential character of a concert, as much as clever and ingenious rhyming may lack any spark of poetry.

Now we consider Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" light music;—light in the good sense;—its airy, fairy fancies certainly are light; Puck and Pease-blossom are light, and Nick Bottom, likewise, in the sense of funny. The graceful Allegretto to Beethoven's eighth Symphony, so often played, is light; so is the Saltarello in Mendelssohn's fourth, and the Scherzo in his third symphony; so is much of the Pastorale. These things require neither a grave and solemn mood, nor learned preparation and attention, to be enjoyed; while their charm teaches the common listener to detect and disrelish the false charm of inferior clap-trap.

Is it not rational to presume that light good music (light with the airy play of true soul and imagination), may be made as captivating to the general audience, as light bad music, (light because there is nothing in it)? May not a well-contrasted variety of good pieces be made as fascinating and as entertaining as anything else? We recall the earliest musical excitement of our boyhood, when "Der Freyschütz" used to be played at our old Federal street-theatre—not as an opera to be sure, but with much of the music, probably imperfectly enough rendered; and we remember that many of its melodies, at all events the Hunters' and the Bridesmaids' choruses, used to be hummed and whistled about the streets as commonly as negro melodies or the march in Faust are now. Does it not prove that good music is in itself intrinsically as "catching" as the namby-pamby, vulgar tunes that every now and then infest the tuneful atmosphere?

Great Organ Record.

We have the "business" (as theatrical critics say) of a whole month to record. And indeed, in a mere business point of view, we may remark that the Great Organ has been doing very well of late. Better and better, in fact; the crowds of visitors in Boston, of travellers en route mountainward or homeward, at this season, gladly avail themselves of these Wednesday and Saturday "noonings," when they may sit in the cool Music Hall, face to face with the majestic "huge house of the sounds," with the still more majestic forms of Bach and Beethoven, and be piped to by its pastoral reeds and flutes, sung to by its sentimental Vox Humana, roused by its trumpets, roared to by its thundering billowy basses, or lifted up and flooded away beyond all consciousness of earth and meanness by its great fugal surf of harmony. Curiosity and love of music combine to draw all classes, and to fill up a good part of the Hall and of its treasury. There must have been an average of at least five hundred listeners at each of these occasions for a month past; new faces for the most part, but always an audience of most cheerful, wholesome, well-dressed, clear-faced, intelligent, attentive and delighted aspect. This is well for business, and well (although it might be better) for Art also. To be sure, in matters of Art one is tempted sometimes to ask, what business has Business to lord it so? What right has he to say a word, for instance, in regard to programmes? Who is he? Is he not subordinate, and does he not belong down in the kitchen? Are not Ideality, Art, Poetry, Religion, Love, divine Enthusiasm, lords of the house, even as the soul is master of the body? Shall music serve business, or business music? Will you have your house all kitchen, your city all shops and ware-rooms; or will you have some home in it, some place, and that the largest, sacred to the true, the higher ends of life? So when we have concerts, when we invoke the presence of divine Cecilia, shall we keep our hearts in our pockets and pay only a seeming and half homage to her? Is it good, is it beautiful, is it musical, is it divine? asks Bach or Mendelssohn, seated at the key-boards. Will it pay? asks the impresario. We have no Bachs nor Mendelssohns, and so our programmes are compromises; sometimes cleverly contrived, with fair result, sometimes amounting to mere senseless medleys. But it has to be borne in mind, that these noonday concerts are partly designed to gratify curiosity with sight and hearing of the Great Organ and with some taste of its stops and various resources, and only partly to minister to pure love of music.

But let us glance back over the past month—eight concerts. Some of them we did not attend and can only chronicle the pieces and their interpreters.

Saturday, Aug. 20. Mr. B. J. LANG gave an hour with Mendelssohn, playing favorite things which he has often played: the third Sonata (in A); the "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture (in which the violin class of stops and the deep bassoon in the Swell tell so finely); selections from the "Hymn of Praise," and, after some improvisation, the "Wedding March."

Wed. Aug. 24. Mr. EUGENE THAYER began with his concert variations on the "Star-spangled Banner," of which to our mind the trumpet-toned first variation seems the most reasonable part, while a sort of musing, pastoral interlude is not without interest. Of real organ music, he gave us Bach's great Passeacaglia, a very creditable rendering of a piece with which organ-lovers cannot become too familiar; and (for the first time) a charmingly fresh and genial set of Variations in B flat by Handel. Was there a single listener who did not find these infinitely more interesting than the overture to Gounod's last, "Mireille," which immediately preceded, and which had been announced as the attraction of the concert? It is no overture at all; only a medley kind of introduction, in much the same vein of sentimental, pastoral, sweetish, north of France strains, mostly with drone bass, that we already have, more felicitously worked, in Meyerbeer's Pardon de Ploermel. There were two of the French Offertoires: a new one, in A, by Wely and the Vox Humana one by Battiste; and for a grand Finale, that to Beethoven's 5th Symphony, which Mr. T. knows how to recall quite vividly and powerfully.

Aug. 27. Mr. LANG played first another of the 48 Preludes and Fugues for the Piano-forte ("Well-tempered Clavichord"), namely No. 33, in E major, —hardly one of the most striking of them for this purpose, but solid and good. Then his Freyshütz overture transcription. Then Mr. Dresel's charming little "Slumber Song" ("Sweet and low"), which haunts many houses pleasantly, but we never thought it had a hiding place in that metallic grove. It sounded very prettily, however, with its echoed snatches of melody, and was exceedingly encored, as lullabies and sweet things always are. Rink's Flute Concerto (first movement), an improvisation, and the Allegro assai Vivace from Mendelssohn's first Organ Sonata, filled out the hour. Mr. Lang always does all gracefully, with musical tact and feeling.

Aug. 31. Mr. THAYER again, with this programme:

Overture to "Faust."	Gounod
Offertoire for Corno bassetto,	Battiste
Double Fugue, in G minor	Handel
Offertoire, for Vox humana,	Eugene Thayer
Overture to "Huguenots." (Transcribed, first time),	Meyerbeer
Fugue in G minor,	Bach
Concert Offertoire, in C,	Eugene Thayer
Passeacaglia ,	Handel

Sept. 3. Mrs. L. J. FRODOCK was welcomed back after revisiting her old home in the West. We are pleased to learn that she had one of the best audiences of the season, as we are to perceive that she is steadily gaining respect for her high artistic qualities and her truly womanly and quiet way of manifesting them. This was the programme:

Pedal Fugue, in G minor,	Bach
Adagio, from Symphony No. 1,	Haydn
Fantasia, No. 8,	Schellenberg
Allegretto, from Sonata No. 4,	Mendelssohn
Overture to "Oberon." (Transcribed),	Von Weber
Idylla. (Transcribed for Vox humana),	Lysberg
Marche, from "Le Prophete,"	Meyerbeer

Sept. 7. A new candidate made his first trial of the Organ,—Mr. D. PAINE, organist of the church in Chauncey Street. He played a goodly variety of pieces of comparatively modest pretension, but all having character:

(a. Choral,—A Mighty Fortress,	Arranged by Bach
(b. do. in A minor.
Minuetto,	Handel
Allegro,	Rink
Pastoral,	Corelli
Overture to the Occasional Oratorio,	Handel
Masstoso—Allegro—Adagio—March.
(a. Adagio,	Bodenachatz
(b. Air.	Beethoven
Con Spirito, in E minor.	Rink
Air (Introducing the Vox humana.
Allegro,	Handel

The opening betrayed nervousness, but the two chorals were grand and edifying. The Overture by Handel was an interesting addition to the repertoire and was well handled; so was the pretty Minuet from "Samson" and the Allegro from we forget what work. The Pastoral by old Corelli must be the very one to which Handel owed the suggestion of the "Pastoral Symphony" in the "Messiah"; no mistaking the family traits; same rhythm, same motive, almost the same treatment. It was enjoyed accordingly. The two Rink pieces were organlike and spirited; and the two Airs well chosen and gracefully rendered.

Sept. 10. Last Saturday we had the PAINE, Mr. J. K. Paine, whose concert, with amusing eye-to-business simplicity or irony, was recommended in one of the newspapers as having "only two pieces by Bach" in it! Those two, however, were admirable pieces, and the others, making a fine variety, with plenty of relief, were all artistic and worthy of attention.

Prelude in C major,	Bach
Sonata in A major.	Ritter
Andante from a Sonata in C major,	Mozart
Fantasia on the "Portuguese Hymn."	J. K. Paine
a. Pastoral; b. Interlude for the Piffaro; c. Alla Marcha.
Canzone,	Bach
Air and Chorus.	Gluck
Variations on the "Star Spangled Banner,"	J. K. Paine

The Bach Prelude, heard here for the first time, is in a bold, quaint, rollicking kind of humor, a giant rejoicing in his strength, free and glorious in the bonds of Art. The other piece, the Canzone, played with softer organ, is one of the loveliest and tenderest things of Bach; a strain that goes right to the heart, a "musing while the fire burns," and yet this too in the fugue style; having two charming subjects, both treated fugue-wise. No one plays these things so lovingly and understandingly, with such clear individualization of parts, as Mr. Paine.

The Sonata by Ritter (organist at Magdeburg and author of the remarks on Mendelssohn's organ Sonatas, which we have printed) proved a very interesting work. It consists of two parts: first a beautiful Andante in somewhat Mendelssohnian style, and somewhat orchestral too; and then a very artistic series of variations on the Dutch National Hymn, finely contrasted, full of captivating detail, episodic passages, and suggestive cadenzas. It brought a good variety of stops in play, and gave general pleasure in spite of its length. The Mozart Andante was fascinating. Mr. Paine's Fantasia on the "Portuguese Hymn" (Adeste fideles) loses nothing by repetition. But, shy as we are of fantasias on national airs, we cannot help thinking his Variations on the "Star-spangled Banner" one of his happiest and most artistic compositions. It is all dignified, all in keeping; all organ-like and polyphonic in structure; laid out symmetrically, with good contrast and balance, as a whole, while elegantly wrought in detail. The most striking parts to us were where the deep bass murmurs the melody, while soft stops in the upper parts keep up a sort of pastoral figure; the noble minor variation; and, led into by a very ingenious cadence with trill in the pedals, the imposing reproduction of the essential subject of the air in a grand fugue with figurative counter-subject.—This was one of Mr. Paine's most successful and delightful concerts, although in the beginning he evinced a little nervousness and slight lack of his usual steadiness in tempo.

Sept. 14. Last Wednesday was again Mr.

THAYER's day. Programme:

Offertoire, to Tancredi. (first time).	Rossini.
Variations, in B flat.	Handel.
Great Prelude, in C minor. (First time).	Bach.
Offertoire, for Vox humana.	Eugene Thayer.
Offertoire de Concert.	Eugene Thayer.
Marchetto, from 2d Symphony.	Beethoven.
Pastorale, from Wm. Tell.	Rossini.
Overture, to Les Huguenots.	Meyerbeer.

Verily a queer mixture of Rossini in his lightest, funniest vein; theatre and footlights. But how sparkling and bright! As for mere sensuous charm of sonority, we have heard no combination of stops more brilliant, nor orchestral combination either, than that in which Mr. T. dressed out the dancing, laughing, devil-may-care Rossini tunes. Hard to believe that we are not in the theatre, even for some time after the beautiful Handel variations have begun. The Bach Prelude is one of the grandest we have heard yet; who can measure the breadth and depth of such a genius; his creations seem inexhaustible like Nature. Where is Rossini now? Let us consider the concert ended, and what follows mere play and gratification of the children's curiosity about the organ and its several stops. Offertoire upon Offertoire! The first is cleverly contrived to show the Vox Humana and to please the many. But is not a "Concert Offertoire" a contradiction in terms? An Offertoire is a religious offering in the church; how would a Prière de Concert sound!

IN PROSPECT. It is enough to say that Mr. LANG will be organist at the Music Hall this noon.

Members of the HANDEL and HAYDN SOCIETY are reminded that their weekly rehearsals recommence to-morrow evening at Chickering's Hall. A great five days' Festival next Spring or Summer is in contemplation, for which the Society proposes to double the number of its chorus. Candidates for admission should present themselves at the place of rehearsal. This looks alive!

It will rejoice some thirsty souls to know that there is reason to expect a choice series of Piano-Forte Concerts early in the winter from OTTO DRESSEL.

CARL ZERRAHN has rich plans of "Philharmonic" or Orchestral Concerts nearly matured, of which we shall soon be allowed to disclose the leading features. Schumann's "Paradise and the Peri," with chorus, solos, and orchestral accompaniments, is among his cherished projects; may nothing deter him therefrom!

Mr. EICHBERG perseveres in his design of bringing out another Cantata by Schumann, "The Pilgrimage of the Rose," also for solo voices, chorus and orchestra, and we are looking daily for his definitive announcement. (DRESSEL will play Schumann, —Concerto among other things,—and so we are likely to learn some of Schumann this winter.)

We are pleased to notice that Mr. HERMANN DAUM, the pianist and teacher, has recovered from his long and dangerous illness, and, having taken unto himself a partner through life's thorny path, is not only prepared to resume his lessons, but hopes to give some concerts.

There is also a novel enterprise on foot, of a popular character, to furnish musical entertainments every evening at the Melodeon; something between the classical concerts of "the appreciative few" and the burnt-cork "minstrelsy," whose vulgar lease of life is already too long. Efficient parties, among others the members of the Mendelssohn Quintette Club, are interested in the movement. The music to be both classical and popular, a plenty of each kind. Some kinds neglected of late will be represented, such as old English Glees and Madrigals. There will be a vocal quartet, a quintet of instruments, and soloists. Of artists new to us we hear of Miss RIDDELL, a superior soprano, and Mr. GABRIEL, pianist. It is all well that there should be such things; no doubt there is demand for them; but we hope the Quintette Club are not going to abandon the purely classical field besides; if they do they must drop the "Mendelssohn."

Mr. LYMAN W. WHEELER has been appointed teacher of singing in Dr. Gannett's popular school for young ladies.

Mr. FIRM, of the old firm of Firth & Hall, in New York, died a few days since at an advanced age. He was the oldest and probably the best known music publisher and piano dealer in the States.

ST. LOUIS. We have before us the Annual Report of the Secretary of the "St. Louis Philharmonic Society,"—now a well established institution, having its orchestra of forty instruments, its choir of a hundred or more singers, and Mr. E. SOROWSKI for director. The number of members, "active" and "subscribing," is about 400. The past season of the Society—its fourth—embraced six concerts, made up of symphonies, overtures, choruses, instrumental and vocal solos, &c. Its library is getting rich in sterling and imperishable scores; besides the natural accumulation of things of slight or only passing value. Of the past concerts the Report states:

Twenty-nine new works, of various authors, were brought out; among them, such compositions as the "42d Psalm" (As the hart pants), and the "Ode to the Artists," by F. M. Bartholdy; the first part entire ("Spring") from Haydn's Seasons; the "Pastorale" Symphony, by Beethoven; and Haydn's Symphonies—No. 1 in E flat, and No. 2 in G major. Besides these, portions of Beethoven's Symphonies—No. 1 in C, and the "Eroica"—as also parts of Handel's "Messiah," and Mozart's "Requiem," were produced.

Among the authors newly introduced are: W. Sterndale Bennett, Gluck, N. W. Gade, Gounod, Huneyade, Graben-Hoffmann, Iwan-Mueller, Pechatscheck and Petrella. Other works are to be found on our programmes; but heard at other outside occasions, and therefore not enumerated as novelties.

The concerts received about the average attendance of the previous season, and each gave "special and marked satisfaction."

The total number of tickets issued was 7,928, and the total attendance on the six concerts was 6,183. Precisely the same proportion of the tickets distributed were used this series as at the last, which proves conclusively that our patronage is now resting on a purely musical basis.

CINCINNATI. The Gazette says:

Our Musical Societies are busy preparing for the winter campaign, which promises to be a lively one. The Maennerchor will have a season of operas at an early day; the Cecilia Society have just elected as their new leader Mr. Andres, the talented leader of the Cathedral Choir, and commence the season with fresh zeal; the Harmonic Society will begin again their weekly rehearsals on Monday next, and take up the grand oratorio of "The Messiah," by Handel, which has never yet been performed entire in this city.

MADAME ANNA BISHOP and her daughter, Miss LOUISA BISHOP, are charming the Canadians by their singing. A Kingston paper says of the daughter:

Miss Louisa Bishop is a perfect musician, as might be expected from the daughter of Sir H. Bishop and her accomplished mother. Her voice is not powerful, but the sweetness of her tones, her execution, and her perfect articulation make ample amends for strength of lungs. She is a thorough artist, as her singing of "Adelgisa's" part in the Norma duet amply showed. She sang her father's difficult song "Should he upbraid" with good taste and spirit, and received the well merited applause of an appreciative house. Owing to a whitlow on one of her fingers, she was unable to play the piano-forte solo announced, which was probably a great loss, for her reputation as a pianist stands very high.

SAN FRANCISCO. Mrs. JENNY KEMPTON, who sang but yesterday in front of our Great Organ, is suddenly heard from on the opposite edge of the continent, in the city of the gold hunters. There she was singing (last week of July) in English Opera, with Miss RICHINGS, Mr. HILL and Mr. PEAKES, (the same three who figured last year in Mr. Eichberg's Operetta at the Boston Museum. The Californian (July 30) says:

On Monday evening Linda di Chamounix was given. It was a modified version, with much of the recitative turned into dialogue—the plums retained, without too much pudding, which is apt to be heavy. Alone, it would have been quite enough to draw a fine house, but the "occasion" of the evening was the debut of Miss Jennie Kempton as "Pierotto." The new contralto has a voice of considerable power and pathos—rich, full, and sympathetic; a pure style, and, what is rare enough for commendation, sings recitative remarkably well. She also enunciates her words clearly and distinctly. Her further attractions are those of a good-looking blonde with a fine figure, but her movements were somewhat constrained by the habiliments of the ruder sex. On subsequent nights she seemed more at ease in her boys' clothes, and could she have been induced to have regarded her guitar more as a musical instrument than an article of clothing she would have done better. Yet for her first operatic performance—as we are told it was—she acted fairly enough. Her Savoyard song—the first strain of which is continually recurring through the opera with an inexpressibly tender and touching effect—was very beautifully given, as was also her duet with "Linda" (Miss Richings) in the second act.

As a further specimen of the above "little Jack Horner" style of criticism, we may cite one sentence about the performance of The Bohemian Girl:

Such popular airs as "I dreamt that I dwelt in marble halls," "Come with the Gipsy Bride," and "Then you'll remember me"—melodies that have grown old between the well-thumbed pages of music-books without losing their freshness (!) and beauty, and have survived the steady thrumming of solfeggio misses—drew a large number who are not habitual opera-goers, as well as the critics who admire Balf's originality. (!)

The Gazette des Etrangers announces that the piece composed by ROSSINI on the day of MEYERBEER's interment is entitled:

"Quelques Mésures Funébres à mon pauvre ami Giacomo Meyerbeer."

6 May, 1864, 8 o'clock, A. M.
GIOACCHINO ROSSINI.

It is a chorus in four parts, the large rhythm of which is indicated simply by blows struck in equal times on muffled kettle-drums. The theme is solemn and of a melancholy character, and seems to have been suggested under the inspiration of deep emotion. The words were written by M. EMILIE PACCHINI, co-laborer in all the vocal pieces which have recently proceeded from Rossini's pen.

The Brazen Age of Music, we would fain hope, has culminated, and may soon begin to wane; for we read that:

M. Adolph Sax, the great brass instrument maker, has just completed a new saxotrombe, which, it is confidently asserted, will be the most perfect instrument of the kind ever invented. The instrument is lauded to the skies and said to possess extraordinary advantages over old instruments of the same family.

Parisian journals say, that a life of MEYERBEER is to be written by M. Georges Kastner, of the Institute. M. Kastner was very intimate with the composer, who often expressed a desire that he should be his biographer. Meyerbeer's family have sent him all the documents in their possession. The work will make two octavo volumes, and will not be published until after the production of "L'Africaine."

ELIZABETHAN MUSIC AND POETRY.—In the sale of a library of music on Tuesday, by Messrs. Puttick and Simpson, of Leicester-square, there were several sets of the early madrigals of the Elizabethan age, of extreme interest, as well for their rarity as for the poetry allied to the music. The most remarkable of the lots sold as follows:—Yonge's Musica Transalpina, the first publication of English words to for eign music, two books, 1588-97, 10l. 15s. (Lilly); the first set of Italian Madrigals, Englished by T. Watson, 1590, 6l. (Lilly); Kirbye's first set of English Madrigals, one of the rarest books of its class, 21l. (Pickering); Weelkes' Madrigals to three, four, five, and six voices, 1597, 8l. 18s. 6d. (Lilly); Weelkes' Ballets and Madrigals, 1608, 8l. 15s. (Lilly); Wilbye's Madrigals, first and second sets, 1598-1609, 29l. (Ellis); Morley's First Booke of Ballets, 1595, 16l. 10s. (Lilly); Morley's Madrigals to five voices, 1598, 17l. 10s. (Lilly); Morley's Canzonets, 1606, 16l. (Ellis); Morley's Triumphes of Oriana, a set of Madrigals written in honor of Queen Elizabeth, 1601, 12l. 12s. (Lilly); Bateson's first set of Madrigals, 1604, 12l. (Lilly); Giovanni Croce, Musica Sacra, 1608, 10l. 15s. (Ellis). It is believed that these prices are the highest ever realized for the same works by public sale, and it is a curious fact that these identical copies which yesterday produced nearly 200l. had formerly been bound together, and at the Rev. W. Gostling's sale in 1777 sold for 3l. 10s.—Musical World, Aug. 27.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

The good old times, "Fanchette." W. C. Levy. A melodious duet, between Fanchette and the Marquis, in the pretty operetta of the above name.

Sing, happy maidens, (Chantez, chantez, magnananelles) Song or Duet. From Gounod's "Mireille." 30

One of the prettiest things of the opera, and is the song sung by the Provence peasant maidens, who are gleefully gathering their harvest of mulberry leaves. It is arranged as a song, and also as a duet, which is its original form.

Kiss me good night, mother. Ballad. Frank Ellis. 30

A war ballad, the story of which is a true one. A young soldier, just about to die, recognises his mother, and in the flood of old memories, says, "Kiss me good night, mother," and "falls asleep." One of the best songs of its class.

Will you come to meet me, darling. Ballad.

L. H. Gurney. 30

Beautiful verses, containing a call to some departed one to meet the writer's spirit, when it arrives at "the other side." Music simple and melodious.

Listen to the echo of the shepherd boys' song.

A. D. Crabbe. 30

A pretty ballad, with a still prettier echo chorus.

Happy, happy art thou, (Heureux petit berger).

Cavatina from "Mireille" by Gounod. 30

This song, a favorite with those who have heard the opera, is the one sung by Mireille as she passes the little shepherd lad, who so cheerfully tends his flock on the wild pasture lands of Oran.

Instrumental Music.

Gen. Sherman's grand march. Val. de Ham. 30

A splendid march for the western hero to march by, over the Georgia plantations.

Kate Kearney waltzes.

Charles Cooté. 75

"Kate Kearney," "Kathleen O' Moore," and "Terence's farewell to Kathleen," neatly arranged into a set of waltzes. Very easy, and capital for learners. Has an illustrated title page.

La Fille du Regiment. Fantasia for violin and piano. Alard. 75

A very brilliant piece, and not difficult. Ladies who have a violin playing brother or friend, would do well to have it upon the piano.

Six celebrated marches for piano and violin.

G. Eichberg.

Turkish March.

Mozart. 35

These arrangements, by an excellent musician, will be welcome to teachers and players.

Books.

The Concertino. A select library of Psalmody, Ballads, Duets, Quartets, Chants, Glee, Sacred and Operatic Choruses.

By Virgil Corydon Taylor. $1.00

Mr Taylor has composed a great deal of pure, sweet music, and lovers of his style will welcome this book, which is partly new, and partly composed of selections from former compositions.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 613.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, OCT. 1, 1864.

VOL. XXIV. No. 14.

A Night in Florence.

BY HENRIK HARRIS.*

[Concluded from page 506.]

PAGANINI (CONCLUDED).

"It was indeed PAGANINI who soon approached. He wore a dark grey overcoat, extending to his feet, and making him appear very tall. His long black hair fell in wild locks upon his shoulders, and like a frame, encompassed his pale, corpse-like countenance, upon which sorrow and genius and hell had graven their indestructible characters. A short, self-complacent person, plainly attired, tripped along at his side. His face, though florid, was full of wrinkles. He wore a light grey coat with steel buttons, and bowed in all directions with most excruciating politeness, while he, now and then, cast half-fearful, half wistful, glances at the sombre figure walking at his side, serious and wrapt in meditation. It reminded one of Retsch's picture of Faust and Wagner walking before the gates of Leipzig. The painter, however, criticized both individuals in his droll, peculiar way, and made me take particular notice of Paganini's wide and measured gait. 'Does it not,' he asked, 'seem as if he yet had the iron bar between his legs? He will never get rid of that gait. Do you observe with what contemptuous irony he looks down upon his companion whenever the latter annoys him with his dull and prosy questioning? He cannot cut loose from him. He is bound, by a bloody compact, to this servant, who is no other than Satan himself. The ignorant suppose this companion to be the dramatist and anecdotist Harris, of Hanover, and believe that Paganini carries him along in his journeyings in order that he may attend to the financial management of the concerts. The people do not know that Satan has merely borrowed the form of Mr. George Harris and that, along with other trash, the poor soul of that poor creature will remain locked up in a chest in Hanover until the Devil returns its fleshy envelope;—when, under the nobler guise of a black poodle, he will accompany his master, Paganini, through the world.'

"But if Paganini looked sufficiently wild and remarkable in broad daylight, when he walked toward me under the Jungfernstieg, how much more surprising was his terribly bizarre appearance at the concert in the evening. The performance took place in the Hamburg theatre, and the art-loving public had assembled at so early an hour, and in such numbers, that it was with difficulty I obtained a seat near the orchestra. Although it was letter day, I saw in the first tier of boxes all of the fashionable mercantile world—a perfect Olympus of bankers and other millionaires, gods of coffee and of sugar, attended by their fat household divinities, the Junos of Wantram and the Aphrodites of Dreckwall. Awful silence reigned through the building. All eyes were directed towards the stage. Every ear prepared to listen. My neighbor, an old fur-broker, took the dirty cotton from his ears so that he might more easily drink in the expensive tones, to hear which he had already paid two thalers. At last a sombre figure that seemed to have arisen from the dark regions appeared upon the stage. It was Paganini in full dress. His black coat and vest were of some such horrible cut as mayhap infernal etiquette prescribes at the court of Proserpine. The black pantaloons flapped about his legs fearfully. His long arms seemed yet longer when he made his strange obeisance to the audience, and bent forward so far that the bow in one hand and the violin in the other almost touched the ground. There was something so terribly wooden and yet so foolishly animal in the angular bendings of his body, that his bowing awakened a great desire to laugh. But then his pale face, rendered more death-like by the glaring orchestra lights, seemed so supplicating and so full of shy timidity that shuddering compassion suppressed it. Had he learned these salutations from an automaton or a dog? Is his imploring look that of one doomed to death, or does the mockery of the shrewd miser lurk behind it? Is that a living being about to die, and who, in the arena of art, like an expiring gladiator, wishes to delight the public with his convulsions? Or is it a dead man risen from the grave—a vampire with a violin, who, instead of sucking the blood out of our hearts, is content to draw the money out of our pockets?

"Such questions filled our brains while Paganini cut his interminable capers. All such thoughts vanished, when the wonderful master placed his violin under his chin and began to play. As for me, you know all about my musical second sight, my gift of seeing the proper acoustic figure for every tone I hear. Thus it was, that with every stroke of his bow, Paganini displayed to my eager gaze visible scenes and figures; that, in tuneful picture-writing, he told me all sorts of strange stories and caused gaudy phantoms, in which he, playing, was always the central figure, to stalk before me. As soon as his bow touched the strings, the scene suddenly changed. There he stood beside his music stand, in a cheerful apartment loaded down with bright decorations and filled with scrolled furniture a la Pompadour. Everywhere there lay or hung small mirrors, gilt amourettes, Chinese porcelain, a most lovely chaos of books, wreaths, white gloves, torn laces, false pearls, diadems of gold-foil and other such tinsel ware as one is apt to find in the sanctum of a prima-donna. Meanwhile Paganini's appearance had changed for the better. He now wore short breeches of violet satin, a white vest embroidered with silver, and a coat of light-blue velvet with gold-covered buttons. His hair was carefully dressed in small curls and played about his blooming and youthful face, which shone with sweet tenderness whenever he glanced towards the pretty little woman who stood beside him while he played.

"Truly, at his side, I seemed to behold a young and pretty creature, clad in old-fashioned attire.

She wore a dress of white satin, slashed below the hips, her waist seeming the more charmingly small in consequence. As her powdered hair was brushed back, the round face beamed forth more freely, with its sparkling eyes, rouged cheeks, beauty-patches, and its pretty, saucy little nose. She held a roll of white paper in her hand, and, from the coquettish way in which she moved her body from side to side, seemed as if singing. But not a single note of hers was audible. It was only through the violin-playing with which young Paganini accompanied the beautiful creature, that I got at what she was singing, and the emotions that filled his heart while she sang. Oh! these were such melodies as the nightingale warbles at twilight, when the rose's perfume fills her yearning heart with the promise of spring. O, what melting voluptuousness! What blissful languor! Those were tones that kissed, and then, pouting, eluded one another—then, laughing, intertwined and, becoming as one, they died away, drunk with joy. Yea the sounds sported gaily like butterflies, as when one, teasing the other, eludes it, hides behind a flower, is at last caught, and then, in careless joyousness, flutters upward with its pursuer through the golden sunlight. But then a spider, a mere spider, can suddenly prepare a sad fate for such loving butterflies. Did the young heart forbode such? A sad, sighing tone, like a presentiment of stealthily approaching misfortune softly glided through the most ravishing melodies that radiated from Paganini's violin. . . . His eyes become moist. . . . He knelt in prayer at the feet of his amata. . . . But alas! just as he bent forward to kiss her feet, he espied a little abbate under the bed. I do not know what he may have had against the poor fellow, but the Genoese became as pale as death, grasped the little man with hands of rage, administered several slaps in his face, and, after bestowing quite a number of kicks, threw him out of the room; * * * then, drawing a long stiletto from his pocket, he plunged it into the heart of the young lady.

"At the same moment, cries of Bravo! Bravo! resounded on all sides. Hamburg's enthusiastic men and women were bestowing their most boisterous plaudits upon the artist who had just finished the first part of his Concerto. He was bowing with even more angles and contortions than before, and his face betrayed still greater meekness and humiliation than in the earlier part of the evening. His eyes glared with terrible fear, like those of a poor sinner.

"'Divine!' exclaimed my neighbor, the fur-broker, while he scratched his ears. 'That piece, itself, was worth two thalers.'

"When Paganini again began to play, everything before my eyes seemed to grow dim. The tones did not assume distinct forms and color as before; the body of the master seemed enveloped in dark shadows, from the depths of which his music sent forth a wail of most piercing and sorrowful tones. Only at intervals, when the little lamp that hung above shed its rays upon him, did * Translated for this Journal by S. A. SRAEN.

I beheld his pale face, from which the traces of youth had not yet departed. His dress was strange, and was divided off into two colors,—one yellow, the other red. At his feet he dragged heavy chains. Behind him there moved a face, the expression of which betrayed a merry, faun-like disposition; and the long, hairy hand that seemed to belong to it, I saw, occasionally, fingering about the strings of the violin, as if to assist Paganini. At times it guided the hand in which he held his bow, and a bleating laugh accompanied the tones that flowed from the instrument, as though they had cost pain and blood. Those tones were like the songs of the fallen angels, who descended to the earth with faces blushing with shame, because they had been banished from the realm of the immortals, on account of their having wooed the daughters of earth. In the bottomless depths of those tones there was no glimmer of either hope or consolation. When the saints of Heaven hear such, the praises of God die upon their lips, and, weeping, they hide their pious heads. At times, when the obbligato goat-laugh mingled with the melodic struggles of the violin-tones, I beheld, in the back-ground, a crowd of little women, who nodded their tiny heads with malicious pleasure, and who, with crossed fingers and provoking malignity, hissed at him. Then there burst forth from the instrument cries of terror and terrible sobs and sighs, such as never were heard on earth before, and never shall be heard on earth again, unless it be in the valley of Jehoshaphat, when the trump of judgment resounds, and when the naked dead creep forth from their graves and await their doom. * * * But, suddenly, the tortured violinist drew his bow with such energy of crazed despair, that his chains rattled and broke, and his forbidding assistant and the mocking furies disappeared.

"That very moment, my neighbor, the fur-broker, said: 'Pity! what a pity! His string has broken—and that comes from his everlasting pizzicati!'

"Had the string really broken? I know not. I only observed the transfiguration of tones, and Paganini and his surroundings seemed to have suddenly changed again. I could hardly recognize him in the brown monk's costume that hid, rather than clothed, him. With his bewildered face half-hidden by his hood, a rope around his hips, and barefooted, stood Paganini, solitary and defiant, on a rocky promontory by the ocean, playing on his violin. Methought it was twilight. The glowing evening sky overflowed the broad expanse of waters that, in mysterious harmony with the tones of the violin, gradually became redder and roared more awfully. While the sea gained in ruddiness, the heavens grew paler, and when at last the angry waves seemed like so much red blood, the sky became ghastly and as livid as a corpse, and large and threatening stars came forth * * * and the stars were black—as black as shining coals. But the tones of the violin continued to grow bolder and more boisterous; the eyes of the terrible player sparkled with a horrid desire to destroy, and his thin lips moved so rapidly and fearfully, that it seemed as if he were muttering some wicked old charm to lay the storm and unfetter the evil spirits imprisoned in the depths of the ocean. He would, sometimes, stretch forth his bare arm, so long and haggard, from the wide sleeve of his gown, and move his fiddle-bow through the air. Then, more than ever, did he seem a wizard, who with magic wand rules the elements; then howls as of the possessed came up from the deep, and the angry, blood-like billows rose so violently on high, that they almost splashed their red spray against the pale heavens and the black stars. There were shrieks and screams and crashes as if the world were going to destruction, and still more stubbornly did the monk continue his playing. By the strength of his powerful will he intended to break the seven seals with which Solomon fastened the vessels of iron after he had locked the conquered demons in them. Those vessels Solomon threw into the sea, and, while Paganini's violin growled its angry bass-notes, I thought I heard the voices of the imprisoned spirits. But at last I seemed to hear the shouts of the liberated demons and saw their heads rising from the blood-red waves. There were monsters of fabulous ugliness, crocodiles with bat-wings, serpents with horns like deer, monkeys with conch-shells, sea-dogs with long patriarchal beards, female faces with breasts in place of cheeks, green camels' heads and hermaphrodites of inconceivable construction;—all staring at the fiddling monk with cold, glaring eyes, and stretching their webbed feet towards him. . . .

"In the excitement of exorcising them, his hood fell back, and his curly hair, playing in the breeze, encircled his head like black serpents.

"The whole scene confounded me so much that I held my ears and closed my eyes for fear of becoming crazed. When I opened them the illusion had vanished, and when I looked up again I beheld the poor Genoese, looking as usual, and making his customary obeisance, while the audience applauded with energy.

"Ah! that was the remarkable performance on the G string," observed my neighbor; "I play the violin myself, and I know what it takes to acquire the command of that instrument."

"Fortunately, the intermission was not of long duration, or else the musical judge of furs had muffled me up in a long art discussion. Paganini quietly placed the violin against his chin and, with the first stroke of his bow, the wonderful transfiguration of tones recommenced. This time the shapes they assumed were less bright and corporeal than before. They arose peacefully in majestic waves, swelling like the notes of an organ choral in a cathedral, and all around me had extended in width and increased in height, until the space was so colossal that the eye of the soul alone could grasp it, but not the eye of the body. In the centre of the space floated a sphere of light, on which there stood a man, of giant stature and proud mein, who was playing on a violin. Was the sphere the sun? I know not. But in the man's features I recognized those of PAGANINI, only they were beautifully idealized, serenely clear, and wore a smile of forgiveness. His form glowed with manly strength, a light blue garment covered his noble proportions, and his black hair fell in curls upon his shoulders. —And when, like some great god, he stood there playing on his violin, it seemed as if the whole universe were listening to his tones. He was the human planet about whom the Cosmos revolved with measured solemnity and to the sound of blessed rhythms. Were the great lights that shone so peacefully, as they floated around him, the stars of heaven? And were the tuneful harmonies produced by their movements the music of the spheres, concerning which poets and seers have told so many charming tales? At times, when I looked forth into the dim distance, I thought I beheld nothing but undulating white robes in which were colossal pilgrims, who approached, bearing white rods in their hands; and, strangest of all, the golden heads of their rods were the lights which I had mistaken for stars. Forming a great circle, these pilgrims marched around the performer, the tones of his violin adding greater lustre to their rods, while the chorals that issued from their lips, and which I had supposed to be the music of the spheres, were, in truth, the reverberating echoes of his instrument. The fervor of unspeakable holiness dwelt in those sounds. They were sometimes trembling and scarcely audible, like mysterious whisperings on the water; at others, swelling and shivering on the air like the tones of a horn by moonlight;—and then bursting forth with riotous joyousness, as if a thousand bards had struck the chords of their harps, and had lifted up their voices in a song of triumph. Such tones the ear never hears; but the heart may dream them, resting at night against the heart it loves. Perhaps the heart can understand them even by day when, exulting, it loses itself in the beautiful lines and curves of some Grecian master-work of art."

"Or when one has taken a bottle too much of champagne"; suddenly exclaimed a laughing voice, that started our story-teller as from a dream. When he turned around, he beheld the Doctor, who, accompanied by black Deborah, had softly entered the room to learn how his medicine had affected the patient.

Maximilian, who had been too much absorbed by his fancies to notice that Maria had fallen asleep, bit his lips with vexation.

"This sleep," said the doctor, "already gives her countenance the look of death. Does it not resemble those white masks, the plaster casts in which we endeavor to preserve the features of the departed?"

"I would like to have such a cast of our friend's face," whispered Maximilian. "She will remain beautiful even in death."

"I would advise you against it," replied the doctor. "Such masks make us sicken at the recollection of those we have loved. We fondly believe that in the plaster there is at least some thing of life retained, while that which we thus preserve is, after all, nothing but death itself. Regular and beautiful features thus acquire a rigid, mocking, odious expression of terror. For real caricature, however, you must go to the plaster casts of faces of which the charm was spiritual, and the features more interesting than regular; for, as soon as the living graces are extinguished, the real deviations from the ideal lines of beauty are no longer softened by the charms of expression. All plaster faces have one puzzling trait in common, that causes one's very soul to shudder, if they are looked at for a long while: they all look as though they were starting to go on a long and painful journey."

"Whither?" said Maximilian, as the doctor seized his arm and led him out of the room.

Shakespeare in his Relation to Music.

BY EMIL NAUMANN.

[Continued from page 300.]

After the decay of the old world, and with the propagation of Christianity, another highly significant and different change takes place in the relation of poetry to music—just as, with the magnificently sounding language of the Greeks, and the wonderful development of their verse—both music in themselves—the musical art became a servant whose principal task consisted in raising the melodious harmony of the first, and strengthening the rhythm of the second—for a song-like delivery of Homer's strains, or the musical treatment of the strophe and anti-strophe in the choruses of the tragic poets are conceivable only in this manner—we see, under the superior influence of Christian elements, the process reversed, and music transformed into the dominating art, to which poetry is attached more in a subservient than in any other character.

The whole of the most ancient hymnology was written with a view to music, that is to say: all the primitive songs in question were from the very beginning intended to obtain the fullest and most profound significance by the means of music. As showing how, to a certain extent, at the very gates of the new world which Christianity called into existence, poetry and song grasped each other by the hand, we may quote the following description of the meetings of the first Christian congregations: "In the subterranean vaults, in the thickets of the forest, on mountain tops, in caves, and among the clefts of rocks, were they obliged to celebrate their first religious services, so as not to be betrayed by the loud tones of their songs. Instead, however, of remaining dumb, under such straits and anxiety, seeing that the price of the confession of having sung their songs to Christ was their life, they sang those songs with only the greater faith. Even at the stake they gave utterance to their last strains, like those of the dying swan, till smoke and flames smothered their voices, and their soul, borne on the last sounds, winged its course upwards to its heavenly home." One thing especially characteristic of the new period is that we find in its very first attempts rhymed verses. This is decidedly an outward distinguishing sign of the close relation of all the earliest Christian poetry to music. We meet with rhymed religious hymns as far back as in St. Ambrosius, that is, in the fourth century, and even long previously. Ambrosius and other inspired singers of the Church were followed by innumerable disciples; musically considered, the Ambrosian Church chant was changed into the Gregorian, till the rich spring of sacred song-writing reached its acme in the thirteenth century. Among the German songs of this last period, the gentle and fervent "Marien-Lieder" are particularly distinguished, their dreamy poetical purport demanding, as it were, musical treatment. They formed a large and rich class of their own, and among the poets who produced them we meet with the names of Walter von der Vogelweide, Hartmann von der Aue, and others. Side by side, and simultaneously with the sacred songs, a wondrous and rich store of secular songs as well was created, as the names of the above poets tell us. The "Minnesänger" and Troubadours, also, flourished most in the twelfth and thirteenth century, as did likewise the secular national song. But here again one of the leading considerations was, in most cases, the active co-operation of music, as well as—quite apart from the fact of the poets themselves frequently striking the strings as musicians—the circumstance that a deeply musical spirit, and a poetical purport musically expressible are inherent in all their writings.

As the influences of classical antiquity upon the Christian world again became stronger, the relation of the two closely allied sister arts underwent a third and different change. Dante is, to a certain extent, the quintessence and intellectual focus of the expression of an entire age, and, moreover, the first really great poet in whom we meet with the revolution to which we allude. As was previously the case in the more important epic attempts of the period of the "Minnesänger"—for instance: in the Nibelungen Lied, the Amelungen Lied, in Parcival, Tristan and Isolde, poetry begins with Dante once more to stand entirely on its own feet. Yet it always differed essentially from the antique poetical style by a fundamental feature of a lyrically musical nature. Such a trait runs through all its productions, whereas a predominant epically-plastic stamp is peculiar to the poets, even the lyrical poets, of the Greeks and Romans. That dreamy revelling in emotions, and that blissful process, sufficing for itself, of losing one's own self in nature, so characteristic of the Christian and more modern poets, and so nearly allied moreover to musical feelings, was almost entirely foreign to the poets of the Ancients. On the other hand, however, we find quite as rarely, in the poets of the specifically Christian period, that objectivity and clearness of representation so common among the Ancients. The Nibelungen probably contained more of the epic element than any other poem of the Middle Ages. But we must not forget that at their commencement—in the form of ancient folk's legends—they extend back, perhaps, to a period previous to the Christian era. There is much, too, suggesting that the musically-poetical element still so abundantly represented in them dates its origin only from the re-arrangement of the Lied in the 13th century. We intend this to apply especially to the character of Volker, that agrees but too well with the time to which the re-arrangement belongs; that is to the most flourishing time of the "Minnesänger," who, like Volker, were as well able to wield the sword as to touch the lyre. When, therefore, we read of Hagen's brother-in-arms:

"Volker, der schnelle, legte den Schild von seiner Hand,
Und legte den viel guten hin, an des Saales Wand,
Zum Saale ging er wieder, wo seine Geige lag.
Da dient er seinen Freunden, wie er so gerne pfleg.
Als ihm der Salten Tönen so süß und klar erklang,
Die stolzen Heimatfarnen, die sagten es Volkern Dank.
Und süßes, immer süßes, zu spielen er begann;
So wiegt er in den Schlummer gar manchen sorgenden Mann."

such deeply musical outbursts spring, probably, rather from the romanticism distinguishing the age of men like Wolfram von Eschenbach, Gottfried von Strassburg, and Walter von der Vogelweide, than from the original spirit of the old heathen poem.

To return to Dante, with especial reference to the central point in his poetry, namely, his Divina Comedia, the fundamentally epic tone preserved through the whole must strike us as an attempted return to the poetical style of the Ancients. But, for this very reason, its purport appears the more essentially different, for it is not in the slightest degree, of an epic, but, genuinely, of a thoroughly lyrical nature. And herein we recognize another and a new element, which distinguishes from the Greek poets not only Dante, the greatest poet of the Christian Mediæval period, but, also, the whole modern world of poetry, even when, as early as the 15th and 16th century, classical influences were exerting their full strength. The Greek poets, it is true, assign a certain place in their works to music; they allow it to re-echo through their compositions; they even depict its profound effects upon the mind, or cause us to feel them; but out of their actual poems, despite all the harmony of the verse, and all the magnificence of the forms; despite all the depth and splendor of the style, there issues no music. As we have already hinted, we are not now speaking of the music of the language, but of the fundamental musical tone, of the total spirit and feeling, streaming forth like music as it were, and which, since recourse had been had to the principles of Christianity, spread like a magic perfume over all poetry. In such a state of things, it is of quite secondary importance whether music, as such, is mentioned or not.

In Dante, now, a fundamental musical spirit appears in relation to subsequent poets almost with a certain overpowering, though wondrous one-sidedness, remaining up to the very last years of his existence the background on which his character seems to repose. It was thus that in Ravenna, when, after long-sufferings and troubles, he found there his last earthly refuge, he wrote his seven Penitential Psalms, his Credo, also, being assigned to the same period. Lastly, the Divina Comedia appears almost everywhere completely permeated with musical spirit and feeling. Thus in the second canto of the Purgatorio, on the appearance of Casella, the admirable singer and composer, who had been Dante's master and had set several of his canons to music, we read:

"Such full contentment that illustrious sage
And those who stood around him, testified,
Naught else, it seemed, their senses could engage.
We all were fixed with rapture on his song,
Listening attent."

Or in the fifth Canto:

"Meanwhile upon our flank obliquely hung
A band of souls that o'er the mountain came,
And verse by verse the Miserere sung,
When they observed that, as I passed along,
My body was impervious to the ray,
Into a long hoarse "Oh!" they changed their song."

And no less in the seventh:

"'Salve Regina' chanting, met our eyes, Spirits who rested on their flowery seats."

I might cite a hundred passages of a similar tendency. Such quotations, however, as we have already given the reader to understand, are here not the essential part of the matter; the musical feeling of the poet is displayed far more in the choice of his subjects and in his manner of treating them; his poem has of itself the effect of music.

We have thus come, without hazarding any long leaps, much nearer our theme, properly so-called: the consideration of the musical element in Shakespeare. For Shakespeare, like Dante, belongs to the epoch of the third of the changes affecting the mutual relation of poetry and music; only Dante stands at the commencement of the epoch when classical influences were revived and worked upon men's consciousness, till then specifically Christian, while Shakespeare marks their full height, and the harmonious blending, already commenced, of the elements of civilization belonging to two distinct periods in the history of the world. As, moreover, the Englishman displays an innate susceptibility for, and comprehension of, the effects of music in a higher degree than any poet before or after him, so in the case of no one else, probably, would it be so easy to display to the soul the completely inward fashion in which poetry and music have, in modern times, permeated each other. Before endeavoring to do this, however, I must beg leave to refer to a couple of great minds nearly allied to Shakespeare, and which, most significantly, are most closely related to him in this very musical element innate in him.

(To be Continued.)

Costa's New Oratorio.

(From the London Times, Sept. 2.)

A new work of such dimensions as the oratorio of Naaman must be heard several times before a decided opinion, backed by arguments deduced from a careful consideration of it both as a whole and in detail, can be fairly pronounced. It has already been explained how Mr. Bartholomew has used the materials presented to his hands in the 2d Book of Kings; how the conspicuous figure in his drama is the Prophet Elisha, by the side of whom (inevitably) Naaman, Syrian Captain, though an heroic, is but an uninteresting personage; how the Biblical "little maid" (only alluded to in verses 2, 3, chap. 5*) is expanded into an important and certainly interesting character, whom he has prettily christened "Adah;" how Naaman's wife (same passage) is equally made subservient, under the less euphonious name of "Timna;" how the acts and miracles of Elisha are transposed where convenient, or retained where convenient, in their proper places; how the text of scripture is given literatim, paraphrased, or abandoned altogether for words of Mr. Bartholomew's own invention, just as it suited him; how, indeed, the whole book is constructed, and how it has been divided into scenes or sections for the purposes of the musician. No further reference to the book, beyond what is indispensable to a clear understanding of Mr. Costa's share in the work, is necessary. Enough, though the subject is by no means a happy one; though the obtrusion of Naaman's leprosy is neither condoned nor rendered in any less degree unengaging by his miraculous cure; and though the march of incidents in no way progresses towards climax, that, on the whole, Mr. Bartholomew has done the best that could be done with such materials, and that Mr. Costa by his attractive music has wonderfully helped him out.

The point of view from which Mr. Costa regards

* "And the Syrians had gone out by companies, and had brought away captive out of the land of Israel a little maid; and she waited on Naaman's wife."

"And she said unto her mistress, 'Would God my lord were with the prophet that is in Samaria! for he would recover him of his leprosy.'"

"And one went in, and told his lord saying, 'Thus and thus said the maid that is of the land of Israel.'" oratorio is no doubt the same as that embraced by Mendelssohn in writing Elijah, with the exception that while Mendelssohn in that great masterpiece almost wholly discarded the strict scholastic forms, Mr. Costa in several instances adopts them, as Mendelssohn adopted them in his first oratorio, St. Paul. In St. Paul, Mendelssohn, though glowing with creative power, looked back to Handel and to Bach—witness his fugues and his chorales; while in Elijah he got rid of Handel altogether, though still adhering to the chorale so cherished by the Leipzig cantor. The employment of florid counterpoint as accompaniments during the procession of strict fugue, as it appears in Mendelssohn's works, may be claimed as Mendelssohn's own invention. Now, Mr. Costa has looked at Mendelssohn from every point of view except that of style. Both in Eli and Naaman we find endeavors at the Handelian fugue, and at the chorale of Bach—seen through the vista through which they were lovingly and anxiously scanned by Mendelssohn, as well as at the fugue with florid counterpoint which belong more essentially to that composer. On the other hand, Mr. Costa's style is Mr. Costa's own. He neither imitates Mendelssohn nor any other master. His melody, though it flows with the grace and freedom of Italian melody, is not the melody of Rossini, much less that of Bellini, least of all that of Verdi—the three Italians of the present century whose individuality is the most striking, and therefore the most alluring to a musician, who, unable to invent melody himself, unconsciously, and under divers aspects, appropriates the melody of his contemporaries and predecessors. Cherubini, the other great Italian, who belonged both to the last century, and to this, was what even the genial and brilliant Rossini cannot claim to be—a practised master of the severest canons of art, a contrapuntist only inferior to the deepest—but in manner hardly "Italian" at all—certainly not what we have been accustomed to regard as "Italian" since Rossini filled the world with melody. The seraphic and Orphean Mass in F, and other sacred pieces of Cherubini, bring him in closer affinity with Mozart; while the color and turn of his phrases derive rather from Sarti and his elder compatriots. But Cherubini has no more attraction for Mr. Costa than the rest; and neither in Eli nor in Naaman is there a trace of his influence. It is, perhaps, on this account that our preference is for those parts of Naaman in which the composer's own individuality and melodic fluency are left full play, while he is thinking neither of the forms of Handel nor those of Mendelssohn, but drawing simply from his own resources. These are ample enough. Mr. Costa knows how to write for the voice, alone or in combination, as well as Rossini himself; he is a thorough master of vocal recitative, as the uniform excellence of the recitatives, accompanied or unaccompanied, in his new oratorio emphatically prove; his orchestration, always clear and sonorous, is brightly colored, full of contrast—natural, not forced—and of happy variety, every instrument being as conveniently written for as though he were (which for aught we can say to the contrary he may be) a proficient on it himself, and every progression as satisfactory to the ear as though, while putting it on paper, he was perfectly sure of the effect that must result. There is not a weak or uncertain point, not an inharmonious combination, not a single doubtful or awkward passage to be detected from beginning to end of Naaman. Everywhere the practised musician, conscious of his power, and using it with sobriety, is apparent. And amid all this amber-like transparency, the character of each orchestral agent being as familiar to Mr. Costa as its mere executive capacity, there is not a touch of monotony. As the harmony is perfect when the full orchestra, with or without chorus, is in play, so, when solos, or concerted pieces, for two, three, four, or five solo voices, have to be accompanied, richness and delicacy of tint are so artfully blended, and the various instruments made to speak so gratefully when "obbligato" phrases are assigned to them, and fall together so naturally when the monologue is over, that the ear is continually charmed. An occasional tendency to superfluous use of trombones and other brass instruments Mr. Costa shares with most of his contemporaries. The gifted Rossini himself was not free from it; nor Auber, the most genuine and delightful of French composers; nor that dramatico-musical eclectic, the late regretted Meyerbeer; nor need it be added?—the sometimes over-energetic Verdi. Costa—like his compatriot the Neapolitan Mercadante—is also addicted to an excessive employment of prelude and interlude, which is calculated to arrest the dramatic progress, and thereby enfeeble the interest of the hearer. But these are rather matters of taste than blemishes. The great point is that whatever Mr. Costa designs in the construction of his orchestral accompaniments he carries out completely and with evident facility; a thorough master of his means, he employs them with the sure hand of a master.

To pass from generalities to particulars, the personage which has seemingly taken strongest hold of Mr. Costa's imagination is that of Adah. He has delineated her with a tenderness quite poetical. She is always musically interesting, whether inveighing in soliloquy against the heathen worship—as in the graceful and delicately accompanied air, "They shall be turned back;" consoling or exhorting Naaman—as in the recitative, "O deign to heed thy captive Hebrew maid," and "Obey him, try and thou shalt know;" or petitioning Heaven for the Syrian chief's recovery—as in the melodiously simple and expressive prayer, "Maker of every star." The composer was evidently in love with this engaging creation of his co-laborer; and his music is an eloquent expression of his leaning. In Middle, Adelina Patti he was lucky in finding his beau idéal personified. This young lady's début in oratorio has been a triumphant success; and it will be difficult henceforth to separate the idea of Middle Patti from the idea of Adah. Her enunciation of the English language is as perfect as her singing is intelligent. The prophet Elisha, too, is a prominent and agreeable figure on the musical canvas. All his declamatory music is excellent, while his solos are almost invariably happy. Of the airs introduced into the scenes with the Shunamite woman (the miracle of the oil-pot and that of the resurrection) "Arise, O Lord," cheerful in tone, and expressive of inward faith, must, we think, bear away the palm from "Lament not thus," the less striking exhortation to the child-bereaved mother. But better than either, perhaps, is "The seed shall be prosperous," the prophecy of fertility to the people of Jericho, so tranquilly devotional, so melodious, and again so full of faith—one of the brightest thoughts in the oratorio. It would not be easy for Mr. Costa to meet with a singer in every way so thoroughly calculated to do justice to the music of Elisha as Mr. Santley. Naaman, the Pagan warrior, converted to the true faith by his miraculous cure in the waters of Jordan, is, for reasons already enumerated, a less malleable personage. The short dialogue with Timna ("Come, and on thy bosom press me," in which he shuns his wife's embrace, on the plea of the leprosy with which the gods of Syria have stricken him, might be omitted with no detriment to the music, and otherwise with advantage. It is not merely uninviting, but repulsive. Naaman's first air, "Invoking death," in which he alludes to his martial exploits, and then sorrows for his slain comrades in arms, is stirring and effective, the slow movement which brings it to an end—"It made me sad, it gave me pain," affording a convincing example of a truth too often ignored—that pathos may be forcibly conveyed without necessarily having recourse to the minor key. The other air, "What! meaneth he to mock at me?" when Naaman is sceptical about the efficacy of ablutions in the Jordan, is hardly so happy, though the second part of it ("Our Abana and Pharpar glide") is melodious and graceful. All the martial music that forms part of the paraphernalia attending the several appearances of Naaman, including a splendidly instrumented triumphal march, both original and characteristic, in the second—is as vigorous and spirited as could be wished. Naaman's last solo, "Blessed be the Lord God," a sort of prologue to the imposing final chorus, is a grand piece of musical declamation. It is doubtful whether any other tenor than Mr. Sims Reeves, who in his reading imparts almost as much dramatic significance as if he were surrounded by all the accessories and appointments of stage representation, could be found to make Naaman the striking character he makes him. Never has this artist been more completely master of his resources than at this festival, and never did he exert his rare powers with more assiduity and success than on behalf of Mr. Costa's new work. "There is but one Reeves," was the remark on all sides after his noble delivery of the first phrase in the inspiring quartet, "Honor and glory, Almighty, be Thine," with Middle Patti, Miss Palmer, and Mr. Santley, which created so extraordinary a sensation yesterday, and to which it is needless again to refer. The characters of Adah, Timna, and Naaman are elsewhere combined in a trio, "Haste! to Samaria let us go," almost as effective, quite as well constructed, and quite as tuneful as the quartet—one of the most remarkable performances on the same occasion. There are, however, other characters to be named. The widow, whose duet with Elisha, "I sought the Lord," and the child of the Shunamite woman, whose vision of the Cherubim and Seraphim, "I dreamt I was in heaven," are both worthy of note—the first for its flowing tune and beautiful accompaniment, the last for its appropriate simplicity. These both fell to the lot of Madame Suinton Dolby, and to more accomplished hands they could not have been confided. Her recital of the "Vision" was one of the most genuine effects of the morning. To the Shunamite woman is also given an air, "Look up, my son," full of tender expression, and well suited to the earnest delivery of Madame Raderdorff. To Gehazi, Elisha's servant, nothing but recitatives are allotted, except a share in the pleasing trio, "Is anything too hard for the Lord?" with the Shunamite and Elisha, and in the quintet which precedes, and subsequently intermixes with the final chorus. Mr. Cummings was Gehazi, and a more careful Gehazi could not have been desired. The very original and ingenious manner in which the introduction, embodying the translation of Elijah, his last interview with Elisha, and the division of the waters of the Jordan by Elijah's mantle, is laid out, was commented upon in the general analysis of Naaman elsewhere alluded to. Whatever objection might be made to bringing forward Elijah, who, with his fiery chariot and fiery horses, was dangerous ground to tread, has been wholly obviated by Mr. Costa's judicious treatment, and this introduction is decidedly one of the best parts of the oratorio. The choral recitatives are uniformly good, and the sparing use that is made of them enhances the impression they are intended to produce. To the choruses generally high praise may be awarded. The most ambitious of all is the "Sanctus" of Angels, in the second part ("Holy! Holy! Holy! Lord God of Might!"), which contains, on the words, "Hail, everlasting God!" a fugal episode cleverly constructed upon a theme more than usually melodious. Each part of the oratorio terminates with a grand chorus, upon which Mr. Costa has evidently bestowed immense pains and reflection. In the first of these ("Praise the Lord for His goodness") we meet with another fugal episode—to the words, "He turneth the wilderness into a standing river." This is the one noticed elsewhere as suggested by the Mendelssohnian idea of fugue with florid counterpoint sustained throughout its progress. The theme, in the minor key, is striking, and its conduct elaborate. The last chorus of all, "Great God of Gods," also has a fugue, worked out with great vivacity, on the "Hallelujah—Amen," the theme of which is more in the style of Handel than of Mendelssohn, the development being, as in the other instance, after a manner which Mr. Costa has every right to claim for his own. Add to these a fugato, in the characteristic chorus, "Mighty Rimmon," where the Syrians implore their idol for Naaman's recovery, the theme, in the minor, coming befittingly to the passage, "Hear, O hear our cries," and a more extended fugal episode, in the jubilant and aspiring choral hymn, "Thanks, grateful thanks, Almighty Lord," occurring on the words, "Not unto us, but unto Thee," which has an ingenious accompaniment, staccato, and is one of the best contrived of the series. There remains but to name the simply harmonized, and not for that less impressive chorale, "When famine over Israel prevailed;" and three more choral pieces—namely, "The curse of the Lord is in the house of the wicked;" "Be comforted! the gods of Syria"—the sacrificial offering to propitiate Rimmon; and "God who cannot be unjust." The second of these is too replete with melody to be sung to a god of stone, the first and third are the most tuneful, expressive, and beautiful in the work, and bear, to our thinking, the impress of the composer's individuality more strongly than any of the others—for which reason we cannot help liking them the best, despite their wholly unpretending character when compared with some of their more soaring companions. They are genuine inspirations.

[The subjoined letter, from a well-known musical correspondent and critic, discourses of the Great Organ in such a pleasant and practical vein, that we make no apology for copying it entire. We find it in the Brooklyn Daily Union.]

The Great Boston Organ.

LETTER FROM C. JEROME HOPKINS.

So much has been spoken, written, and photographed about this gigantic organ, that I might at first be considered foolish, if not presumptuous, for adding anything thereto, were it not that, of all which has come under my observation, hardly anything has appeared of value to practical organists or calculated to assist them in coaxing a solitary sound from its vast treasure-house of melody and harmony.

ITS PECULIARITIES.

The points of newness which strike a stranger organist most forcibly, apart from its immense size and the number of its registers, are:

First—The limited motion of the registers or stops, which, in appearance and distance of draw, resemble those of the Alexandre organ.

Second—The number and complexity of pedals—not only the two octaves and five notes of foot keys, but the little square composition pedals of iron, of which there are no less than seven on one side and six on the other.

Third—The arrangement of the Swell pedals, which are three in number, and are in the centre instead of at one side, as is usual in American and English organs.

Fourth—The position of the different manuals or key-boards, which are four in number, and of which the Great organ is the second from the bottom, and yet counts No. 1 in the naming on the ends of the registers; No. 2 is the bottom or lowest manual, and answers to our Swell organ; No. 3 is the Choir, and No. 4 the uppermost or Solo organ.

All these peculiarities (and to us Americans, novelties) render it exceedingly confusing to a strange organist when he attempts to make music on it for the first time. But it is still more disheartening in other respects. Imagine yourself to draw all the stops of the Great organ, and then, on striking what you think is to be a terrible thundering chord, find that you make not the faintest sound, and you gain some idea of the despair and aggravation that ensues. You then touch a little iron pedal with the point of your boot. It moves about one inch. You also touch a knob with one finger, and strike the same keys as before, and you are frightened at the avalanche of sound which not only proceeds from the Great organ (whose stops are drawn) but also from the Solo, Choir, and Swell organs, whose registers are all shut, and you wonder how these last three organs can sound. This is another trick, however.

Until these and twenty other things are explained, it is as useless for a stranger to expect to make any music on this huge machine, as it would be for him to try to extract honey from a head of cabbage or a large pumpkin.

The "touch" is also new. The keys go down nearly if not quite three-quarters of an inch, thus rendering it of the utmost importance for each one to be fully pressed down in order to obtain the full effect. Organists will here appreciate the extreme difficulty of enunciating rapid passages. Add to this the fact of a second, or fraction thereof, of time elapsing between the striking of a key and its sound reaching your year, and a further cause for difficulty and obfuscation will become obvious. You have to play one note while still hearing the last one you just struck. This is on account of the immensity of the structure, and the distance between the player and the pipes. It is especially observed in the Swell organ.

The touch, even when all couplers are drawn, is very light and easy. This is effected through the Pneumatic attachment under the keys, by which the labor of pressing the keys actually falls upon the power which works the main bellows, namely, the Cochituate water. It is therefore, hardly more fatiguing for a lady to play this organ than it would be for her to manipulate her boudoir piano, so far as the fingers are concerned.

HOW THE EFFECTS ARE PRODUCED.

The coupling arrangements form a very remarkable feature in this instrument. Those of the pedals to manuals are worked by the feet, but those of one manual to another by the hands.

Thus, you wish to couple the pedal to Great organ: you do not raise your hands to draw a register, as in our organs, but merely touch one of the little iron pedals protruding from the front board with the toe of your boot, and the attachment is instantly effected. I shall now suppose you wish to couple the Great organ to Choir or Swell. As before, you need not raise your hands from the keys, but only touch with your thumbs a spring knob which projects from the finger-board, and this coupling is effected; and so with all the rest. So instantaneously are these couplers acted upon that from the faintest whisper on the Swell organ you can, in a second's time, be using the full force of the entire Great, Swell, Choir, and Solo organs, combined with the Pedal organ.

The advantage of such skilful mechanism must be obvious to any organist who values orchestral effects in the organ—and all but old fogies and bigots do—but then one must be careful not to be confused by them; and after all it is very easy to play on so grand an instrument, provided only (as Heller says of some of his tricks in necromancy) you know how to do it!

One thing relating to the manual couplers must be borne in mind, which is that all the coupling is done through the Great organ. To many who, on a three-ranked organ, are accustomed to use a moderate "Great," as it were by means of the Choir and Swell coupled, this will prove a stumbling-block. You must play on the Great manuals in order to sound the Choir and Swell coupled. "But supposing you do not want the Great to sound?" you inquire; "what then?" I reply that you can instantaneously throw off the stops of the Great, so that it is silent itself, but only seems to sound through its couplings, while by means of the pneumatic attachment the weight of pressure required is not increased thereby.

THE PEDALS AND THEIR COMPASS.

The pedal-sticks of this organ are very short, and are placed much further apart than in our organs. This may be a convenience to some, especially those schooled in the German mode of using them with alternate feet, touching the pedals with the toe only, without the ankle motion required by the toe and heel movement; but to others it proves rather inconvenient. The organ is a C organ, and of course the pedals begin on C, but since they extend two octaves and five notes (or to F above), a larger space is needed for their accommodation than would be the case were they placed closer together; consequently, that organist with the longest legs possesses an advantage. They work beautifully, and are so cushioned and padded at the sides that no organist need fear his pedal passages will be ruined in effect by any rattlings of the pedal-sticks themselves, as is the case with nine organs out of ten in our churches.

THE REGISTERS.

The German names on the ends of the registers puzzle all but German scholars amazingly at first. I think myself that they might as well have had them translated, but they are not so aggravating, after all, if one only remembers the family of pipe to which certain stops belong, and learns by heart that "Gedekt" represents the Stopped Diapasons, and "Flöte" the Flutes. The others, being principally chorus stops, such as the "Bifra" and "Scharf," are not so important to the tyro. There are, however, in this organ several solo stops with such marked attributes that they should not be drawn with the Full Organ, nor are they included in the "Crescendo Pedal," of which more anon. These are the "Physharmonica" in the Choir (a lovely free-reed pipe) and the "Vox Humana" and "Corno di Bassetto" in the Solo; the first and second named have separate Swell pedals for themselves, and possess a tenderness of tone which must be heard to be adequately appreciated.

Besides the German names, however, most of the registers are also marked with the scale of pipe to which they belong, which is a great assistance to the new player, provided only he knows enough of the principles of organ-building to understand to what pitch of tone they correspond. For instance "Gedekt" sixteen feet, Gedekt eight feet, Gedekt four feet, Gedekt two feet, means "Tenoroon," Op. or St. Diapason, Principal and Fifteenth, the number of feet referring of course to the pitch.

It would be useless for me to go further into details regarding the numerous composition pedals and solo stops, the possible combinations, contrasts of tone, and so on, since in these particulars nothing can take the place of practical illustrations at the key-boards; but a few words about the Swell and Crescendo pedals may not be superfluous.

THE SWELL AND CRESCENDO.

The Swell pedals are three in number, and, as before mentioned, are in the middle and not at one side of the foot-board. Their construction is peculiar, and instead of having one motion for the foot, and then rising when the foot is removed, they are pivoted in the centre like a country school-boy's tottering-board, and the foot must make an ankle motion, pressing on toe or heel as a soft or loud tone is required. By this means, and a balance arrangement inside, the Swell-box can be retained at any desired degree of openness or closure. This is the right hand pedal. The middle pedal acts only upon the Physharmonica stop in the Choir, and the left hand one upon the Vox Humana in the Solo organ, both being pivoted similarly. It is difficult to conceive of any thing more perfectly complete in appliances whereby to produce the innumerable effects of shading required by the true tone-poet, than is this extraordinary marvel of ingenuity, and, as might be expected, under the hands of a Master the effects are indescribably sublime.

The grand Crescendo Pedal, as it is called, is perhaps the most overpowering contrivance in the organ. It is not a pedal at all, at least does not resemble what is usually understood by a pedal, although moved by the foot, but consists of a slat with knobs attached at intervals of eight or ten inches throughout its entire length. This slat moves on a roller action, and runs longitudinally from right to left and left to right, just in front of the pedal sticks, being moved by a lateral pressure of the foot. There is a dial-plate, with one hand as an indicator, right in front of the performer, and as the slat-pedal advances this indicator shows how many stops are "on" or "off." When the hand has made one revolution, or points to "84," it shows that the entire force of the organ, or rather of the five organs (counting the pedal), is being used, except of course the two solo stops—the Physharmonica and Vox Humana.

THE WONDERFUL EFFECTS PRODUCED.

How shall I describe the effect thus produced? Words fail me. The audience are electrified and the female portion not unfrequently are moved to tears through the nervous excitement occasioned. Morgan played that transcendent chorus, "His enemies hath he overwhelmed in the Red Sea" (from Handel's "Israel in Egypt"), and when he came to the last part, with the triplet moving bass after the grand crescendo, I felt as if I too was about to be swallowed up by those ruthless waves! I can but wish that all New Yorkers and Brooklynites might go and hear it, and then come home again feeling ashamed that they should have thus allowed a little Yankee town to get ahead of them in an institution which affords such pure heavenly manna to man's better part—his soul—as does this unequalled organ!

HOW THE ORGAN HAS BEEN SLANDERED.

The first thought which occurred to me after becoming acquainted with the Boston Organ was: How it has been slandered! What lies I have heard about it! Can this be the instrument which people told me could not even be filled with wind? Is this the organ which was said to be "all squeal and scream with composition stops," that had poor Diapasons, and that "mixed everything up?" Whence then those full, round, luscious, and religious tones? Whence that thundering bass, which betokens no quint nor "brassiness" of any kind? Whence that clear enunciation of complicated harmonies in fugue and fantasia? Alas! for jealousy, prejudice and bigotry, when backed by an ignorance of art and things artistic, which is ever so plentiful in this country! As this is a masterpiece of the art of organ-building, it naturally requires a Master to handle it. An Indian could not manage a steam engine, but is the fault in the engine? Just so the intricacies of this wonderful organ have had to be studied carefully even by our first organists, and the instrument is only now beginning to finish unfolding its almost boundless resources, as Bostonians themselves say, who have heard it constantly for months. * * *

C. JEROME HOPKINS.

Burlington, Vermont, August 18.

Music Abroad.

BIRMINGHAM FESTIVAL. This "colossal music meeting," which occurs triennially, and which has the greatest history of all musical festivals, came round again for the 29th time, on the 6th of September, and lasted four days. It was of unusual interest this time, owing to the production of three new works expressly written for it (Costa's oratorio, and the Cantatas by Henry Smart and Arthur Sullivan), as well as to the revival (for the first time at Birmingham since 1837, when Mendelssohn conducted the performance in person), of St. Paul, besides the more familiar Elijah and the Lobgesang; also Beethoven's Mount of Olives, Handel's Messiah, of course, and selections from his Solomon. To which add a rich variety of vocal and instrumental pieces in the evening concerts. The chorus numbered nearly 100 in each of the four parts; the rest of the personnel is thus enumerated:

The list of solo-singers is formidable, comprising Mdlles. Titiens and Adelina Patti (her first appearance in oratorio). Mesdames Rudersdorff and Lemmens-Sherrington (sopranos); Madame Sinton-Dolby and Palmer (contraltos); Signor Mario, Messrs. Cummings and Sims Reeves (tenors); Messrs. Weiss and Santley (basses). Add to these for the evening performances, M. Sinton (solo-violinist), and Madame Arabella Gaddard (pianist). Mr. Stimpson of the Town Hall, as usual will preside at the organ, and Mr. Costa conduct the whole performances, with the exception of the new cantatas of Messrs. Smart and Sullivan, the care of which, according to custom, devolves upon their respective composers. The band, perhaps the finest ever brought together, includes 28 first violins (principals, M. Sinton and Mr. Blagrove), 26 second violins (Mr. Willy, principal), 18 violas (Mr. Doyle, principal), 17 violoncellos (Mr. G. Collins, principal), 17 double-basses (Mr. Howell, principal), four flutes (Messrs. Pratten, De Folly, &c.), four oboes (Messrs. Barret, Nicholson, &c.), four clarionets (Messrs. Lazarus, Maycock, &c.), four bassoons (Messrs. Hutchins, Anderson, &c.), two trumpets (Messrs. T. Harper and Irwin) . . . , —137 in number.

Costa's Naaman seems to have been received with extraordinary favor; no less than twelve pieces were encored, and the raptures of the critics were beyond bounds; but then Costa has become an Englishman—so are we all, all Englishmen! On another page we have copied at length Mr. Davison's very intelligent appreciation of the work and of the performance. For the rest we have only room here for a very brief sketch of the first two days and evenings of the Festival, from the Orchestra of Sept. 10.

Smart's "Bride of Dunkerron," went extremely well, and praise is lavish on the subject of the cantata. The Bride of Dunkerron consists of some fifteen movements. It is preluded by a short instrumental movement, followed by a chorus of serfs and sea-maidens, which is characteristic and fanciful throughout, and deliciously scored for the band. The following intermezzo, exquisitely played by the band, is a scholarly piece of writing, full of exquisite passages, and containing an enchanting melody for the stringed instruments in unison, which could scarcely fail to commend itself to all who heard it. This is succeeded by a recitative, sung by Mr. Cummings, and a beautiful melodious air, "The full moon is beaming." This, although starting with a theme which at first seems somewhat commonplace, is so worked up as to become a very artistic and pleasing composition. The recitative and the air "Oh! the earth is fair in plain and glade," is thoroughly in keeping with the character of the work, the air being particularly bold and spirited, and having a very artistic accompaniment for the strings in light staccato passages, and being particularly effective in the middle of each verse, where the character of the accompaniment and the air change very appropriately. The chorus, "O Storm King, hear us," with its fine opening passages for the wind instruments, and its elaborate scoring throughout, was grandly given; and so was the following chorus, "Hail to thee! hail to thee! child of the earth," which is so pleasing, light and fantastic, that it was rapturously encored. We have not space to dwell upon the delicious beauty of the melodious air, "Our home shall be on this bright isle," exquisitely sung by Madame Rudersdorff, or the tender and impassioned duet, "Here we may dwell," likewise appropriately rendered by the before-mentioned lady and Mr. Cummings. Nor can we dwell upon the grand trio, "Where art thou?" which is really one of the finest pieces in the work, or speak at length of the finale and chorus which describes the serfs waiting Dunkerron's arrival home, and which is so graphically and artistically treated by the composer. Suffice it to say that the cantata was a success.

"Naaman" was brought out this (Wednesday) morning with a success which cannot be disputed. The pleasure of the audience, evinced in numberless encores, ultimately became tiresome, for by encoring they prolonged the performance far into the afternoon. Looking at Mr. Costa's new work as a whole, it is a great improvement upon his former oratorio. It is better in nearly every respect—it is higher in tone, nobler in quality, and if it does not contain quite so much strict writing, it is, perhaps, because Mr. Costa feels that many fugues and such-like are out of place in modern oratorios. A lack of sublimity and a want of loftier tone will doubtless be the great faults found with Naaman. A great part of it is certainly very light and operatic in style, almost too much so, but Mr. Costa has undoubtedly just kept within the line, though he appears to have ventured as near the edge as is prudent or judicious in an oratorio. Some of the chorales could scarcely be improved, and could not be more ably treated or more effective in performance than they are. In some of the airs, duets, &c., the composer seems unconsciously to have made use of fragments of well-known melodies; but perfect originality of melody is quite a novelty now-a-days, and it is more in the original manner in which a theme is treated that we now distinguish the master. The elaborate scoring, and the perfect mastery Mr. Costa shows himself to have over the resources of his art in this work, are worthy of notice, and the rich variety, the almost endless series of little subjects which are introduced into the band parts of the accompanied recitatives, are worthy of particular remark.

We have not space to dwell upon the various pieces comprised in the evening concert. Mendelssohn's Lobgesang was magnificently performed. One of the principal features of the second part was Beethoven's Sonata in G, No. 3, op. 30, for piano-forte and violin. This was a real work of art played by two real artists. M. Sainton is not so well known as a solo violinist as a leader in an orchestra, but in a work like this sonata, where there is wanted thoughtful, intelligent, conscientious playing, and not trickery or mere display, few violinists can equal, much less excel, this gentleman. Madame Arabella Goddard's capabilities are too well known to leave a doubt as to how her part would be performed.

This morning (Thursday) the Messiah introduces Tietjens, Sherrington, Reeves, and Santley, once more to a Birmingham public; and to-night Arthur Sullivan's Kenilworth, the cantata composed expressly for the Festival. Friday brings the Mount of Olives, Solomon and Elijah, which concludes the Festival, by which time Birmingham may well be wearied of melody.

HEREFORD. The 141st Festival of the Three Choirs began on the last Tuesday in August, lasting four days, and the report thereof occupies some ten solid columns in the London Musical World. The principal singers were Mlle. Tietjens; Mmes. Lemmens-Sherrington, Sainton-Dolby and Weiss; Messrs. Sims Reeves, Montem Smith, Santley and Weiss. The band consisted of between 60 and 70 instruments, and Mr. Townshend Smith, organist of the cathedral, conducted. We have only room for the programmes of each day.

Tuesday. Choral service, followed by a Fugue of Bach; Sermon; first two parts of Creation; Overture to Mendelssohn's St. Paul; Beethoven's first Mass in C, (Anglicanized into "Service in C!")—Evening: Selections from Weber's Oberon; Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony; songs, duets, &c.

Wednesday. Service music; Oratorio, Elijah.—Evening: Benedict's Cantata, Richard Cœur de Lion; Beethoven's C minor Symphony; "Vintagers' Chorus" from Haydn's Seasons; solos, &c.

Thursday. The first part of Spohr's oratorio, The Fall of Babylon, (one hour and a half long), succeeded by the whole of Rossini's Stabat Mater; interval of 15 minutes; Overture to Handel's "Occasional Oratorio; selections from Judas Maccabeus; airs from Theodora (Handel); and a selection from Israel in Egypt! There's a dinner for John Bull! But, coming as it did in the middle of the day, we suppose he would call it a "lunch."—Evening: Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music; Shakespearean song: "Sigh no more, ladies" (Sims Reeves); Spohr's Scena cantante for violin; overtures, songs, &c.

Friday morning. The Messiah.—Evening: Chamber Concert in College Hall. Quartets, Quintets, &c., by Mozart, Beethoven, &c.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, OCT. 1, 1864.

The Musical Season.

In spite of the distracting influences of the war, the Presidential election, the feverish dances of the gold thermometer, and what not, and in spite of difficulties of the situation purely musical, such as poverty of orchestral resources, preoccupation of means and evenings by the multitude of money-making popular or medley concert enterprises, Boston is likely to have, this coming winter and spring, its fair share of those more edifying entertainments in which Music takes the high ground of Art. Art never asks what is most certain to be popular; if it had done so it would have long since forgotten to be Art. Let us briefly count up the good things in prospect.

1. First, and most interesting the ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS. The good old days—a period exceptional and transitory, as it proved—when we could have some twenty classical orchestral concerts in a winter, do not come again. It may be partly owing to public indifference, partly to lack of management; but is far more owing to the singularly small number of musicians fit to play in a true Symphony orchestra that Boston, for a city of its size and musical pretention, can command. Such as there are, there are barely enough to supply the theatres; and even the best of them are not spared from that drudging service. It is literally, and ludicrously, true that not a single pair of bassoons can be found to play in a Symphony! And as for a proper complement of strings for a band proportioned to the Music Hall, we all know what sketches we have had to content ourselves with in the name of Grand Orchestra performances, feeling thankful to get only so near to Beethoven, rather than cease to know him at all. Mr. CARL ZERRAHN, with a great deal of enterprise, has done the best he could for us under the circumstances. For this year his plans were larger and braver than usual,—only to be met by a new and unusual obstacle. It seems that all the theatres, as well as the various cheap and popular music halls, are to have performances on Saturday evenings, thus precluding the possibility of a concert orchestra on any evening except Sunday. Mr. Zerrahn, therefore, must either abandon his good purpose altogether, or else give his concerts on Sunday evenings. This, we are happy to say, he proposes to do. Some timid, conventional, unthinking, unappreciative persons, who still think piety inseparable from forms, will probably be shocked in their proprieties. There will be some sanctimonious criticism. Some old leaven of Puritan prejudice (the weak and silly, not the strong and glorious side of Puritanism) still blinks afraid of sunshine, and even leaves its mould upon the statute book. It may be necessary to call them "Sacred" Concerts to make them legal,—a name that has been brought into such disrepute of late, and so vulgarized, by the lowest and most secular kind of musical entertainments, as to afford the most convincing comment on the absurdity of all such prohibitions. Mr. Zerrahn, with an artist's self-respect, of course shrinks from borrowing so hypocritical a title; but if he must use the name, his safeguard will be in making the character of his music all so high, so pure and classical, that it must needs be religious, whether it wear the name or not. To the pure all things are pure; to the true music-lover all true music is sacred, in a very sincere sense. How many persons, even in the most God-fearing, or, better still, God-loving and man-loving, houses, dare flatter themselves that they have spent their Sabbath evenings more spiritually than he who listens, heart and soul as well as ears, to a Beethoven Symphony!—But it is late in the day to be combatting these prejudices; they have long since ceased to be regarded by enlightened minds; they are no longer public opinion, and have taken shelter only in dark places, in a few narrow minds. The great Symphony Concerts of the Conservatoire in Paris, the best concerts in every German city (and are not people there as good as we are, the best of us), take place on Sunday evenings. Bach and Handel, Haydn and Mozart, Beethoven and Schubert, Mendelssohn and Schumann, are just the souls to speak to us and keep our holier spirits up after a Sabbath truly spent. If it be wicked to converse with them, then is it wicked to enjoy the solemn beauty of the sunset, or to lift our eyes and souls to the eternal stars and feel the "sweet influences of the Pleiades."

Mr. Zerrahn proposes four concerts. He will have an orchestra of forty; and for the better effect of so small a band, as well as in the uncertainty of a very large attendance, he will give his concerts, at least the earlier ones, at the Melodeon. They will be strictly classical, embracing of course some of the great old overtures and Symphonies, including one of the greatest which has not been heard here for a long time, Schubert's in C. Then he has procured a number of new scores of important works, which he will present here for the first time; viz.

1st Concert. "An das Vaterland:" a prize Symphony, in 5 parts, by Joachim Raff (first time in America.)

2nd Conc. "Gretchen" (Marguerite): Andante scave, from the "Faust Symphony" (Part II) by Liszt.

3d Conc. Overture to "Medea," by Bargiel (first time in America).—Organ Toccata in F, by Bach, arranged for Orchestra by Esser. (First time in America.)

4th Conc. "Fratres ego enim accipi:" chorus in 8 parts, unaccompanied, by Palestrina. "Loreley:" Cantata for solo voices, chorus and orchestra, by Ferdinand Hiller. (First time in America.)

We are sorry that certain practical obstacles put it out of Mr. Z.'s power to produce "Paradise and the Peri" this season. We think there can be no doubt that this plan will be carried out successfully, with the countenance and gratitude of good and serious people. Mr. Z. will begin about the first of December, avoiding, of course, Oratorio nights, and weeks when musical senses require rest from the Opera.

2. Previous to this, about Thanksgiving time, a grand concert will be given by the "Boston Musicians' Union" (a mutual protective league), with an orchestra of over a hundred instruments:—who will not turn out to see such a miracle in Boston! Among the selections are: a Beethoven Symphony, the Leonora overture (No. 3); Wagner's Rienzi overture; and a Quartet for four violins, with orchestra, by Maurer; besides songs, part-songs, &c., probably by the Orpheus Club.

Of the Afternoon Concerts of the ORCHESTRAL UNION, and of the MOZART CLUB, there will soon be something to say.

3. The HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY are already rehearsing Handel's sublimest oratorio, "Israel in Egypt," for the five-days' musical Festival, which they intend to hold next Spring or Summer, on their 50th anniversary. Other Oratorios on those days will be the "Messiah," "Elijah," perhaps the "Creation," and the "Hymn of Praise." The "Creation" is to many ears so hacknied, that we cannot help wishing that the Society would improve the occasion by learning for it at least one of the easiest of Bach's Cantatas (it is high time that a beginning be made in Bach; we are behind all the world in that!) or else Mendelssohn's "St. Paul," as well worth knowing as the "Elijah." Grand orchestral concerts will alternate with the Oratorios, the orchestra being enlarged to 80 or 90 by borrowings from New York.—Meanwhile the H. & H. will give the "Creation" in Thanksgiving week (a very fitting time for it), and the "Messiah" at Christmas time.

4. Mr. EICHBERG, as we have before announced, is preparing Schumann's "Pilgrimage of the Rose" for early performance.—The same excellent artist, as will be seen by the following extract, is to have charge of a novel series of entertainments, in which it is natural to suppose that there will be some intermixture of classical things, at least Haydn's Symphonies, which are also "popular."

Manager Field is arranging a series of Saturday evening musical entertainments at the Museum, which cannot fail of proving in the highest degree attractive and popular. The performances are to consist of orchestral and vocal music, such as the best resident talent can afford, and also a variety of "star" engagements, and of some of Mr. Eichberg's charming operettas, including his new one, a detailed mention of which we are compelled to defer to another week. Mr. Eichberg will have charge of the entertainments, and this fact is a sufficient guarantee of their excellence. The orchestra will be enlarged, and the operettas will be given with all the attention to casts, scenery, costumes and general appointments that characterizes the dramatic performances at this establishment.

5. CHAMBER MUSIC. We have already mentioned Mr. OTTO DRESEL's contemplated Piano-Forte concerts, which of course will be of the choicest.—Mr. HERMANN DAUM's plan also will be borne in mind.—We hear nothing of the renewal of those delightful soirées of Messrs. KREISSMANN, LEONHARD and EICHBERG, but we can assure those artists they are wistfully if not loudly called for.—Nor has the usual classical prospectus of the MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB made its appearance—a sign that never yet has failed us for these fifteen years—has the drought anything to do with it? All its members, individually, are just now absorbed in the nightly "Popular Concerts" at the Melodeon, of which we shall speak anon. But there is hope that the success thereof will soon warrant their making one of the evenings of each week a classical night when we shall hear the Quartets and Quintets of Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Schubert, &c. even more frequently than heretofore.

6. GERMAN OPERA will soon be upon us. On Monday evening, Oct. 10, the Grover-Anschütz company, with all the strength it had before, besides several new singers, and a still finer orchestra and chorus, will re-open at the Boston Theatre, and give us, there is reason to believe, a pretty long, rich season of it. Read the letter of our intelligent New York correspondent, if you need to be reminded who and what they are. Their former experience in Boston should ensure us a somewhat better repertoire than this last one in New York; that is to say, in addition to Meyerbeer and Gounod, can we doubt that we shall have Fidelio again repeatedly, and La Dame Blanche ditto, and several operas by Mozart.

7. ITALIAN OPERA (MARETZKE'S), which opens in New York next Monday, is expected here in December. Of this hereafter.

8. The GREAT ORGAN, of course, will not be silent. That, like the poor, we have always with us.

The "Popular" Concerts.

Messrs. THOMAS RYAN and JAMES P. DRAPER, musical and business managers respectively, inaugurated their plan of cheap and popular concerts, at the Melodeon, by a private invitation "Soirée" last Saturday evening; since which time the concerts have been regularly given every evening, with encouraging success, if the attracting and delighting of large audiences be any test. The invitation programme may serve here as a specimen for all:

1. Overture to "Das Nachtlager," Kreutzer
2. The Alpine Echo (Vocal Quartet), Swiss
3. Fantasia for Flute, on a German Air. Robert Goering.
4. Love's Request—German Ballad. Reichardt
5. Fantasia for Piano—on Themes from La Traviata. Miss Ryan. Ascher
6. Vocal Trio—"Love's young Dream." Joseph M. R. Gabriel. Moore
7. Recitative and Air—from La Sonnambula. Miss Riddell, Draper and Barnabee. Part II. Bellini
8. Fantasia for Violoncello—on Russian and Irish Airs. Miss Riddell. Franchomme.
9. Duet—"Trust her not" (words by Longfellow) Wulf Fries. Balfe
10. Solo for Violin—"Sounds from Rome." Miss Riddell and Ryan. Gungl
11. Glee—"Bank of Violets" (four voices). William Schultze. Stevenson

Now, as the invited ones on this occasion were mostly of the class accustomed to the classical concerts of the Quintette Club, and not the class to whom these concerts are mainly addressed, this was not the programme to interest them very much, although the general good will spoke out in frequent applause. That overture, for instance, a weak thing in itself, was tamer still when rendered only by the Mendelssohn Quintette Club, with the addition of STEIN's double-bass, and with RYAN's clarinet for color contrast. Besides, the Quintette Club being there, such small employment of them collectively reduced them to a sort of pale and posthumous nonentity; we would as soon have "rapping spirits" instead of live, real, interesting persons. Then four instrumental solos, mainly show pieces, always tedious to really musical listeners, are, we fancy, too much of that sort even for uneducated publics. The life of the entertainment, as it seemed to us, both then and since, was in the singing. And if the concerts are to be chiefly popular, to attract and please the many, with the design also of gradually insinuating more and more of the classical and finer element, for which we give the managers credit, we suggest whether the end would not be best reached by making the concerts mainly vocal, and letting the few instrumental pieces be of the best and most familiar out of the Club's old treasury of Quartets, and Quintets, with an occasional good violin or piano solo, or duet, or trio?

But, as the concerts are to go on every evening, as the aim is to shape them to the wishes of an unflinching public, by trying various experiments, with the hope of demonstrating that something a great deal better than burnt cork "minstrelsy" may draw nightly crowds the year round, it is only fair to consider these first models as entirely malleable, open to modification and improvement of every sort, and by no means a fixed ultimatum to be judged once for all. We shall watch their history with interest, hoping for better and better.

A few words of the personnel engaged in them. Of the five Mendelssohnians there is no need to speak. Miss RIDDELL is a new soprano of interesting promise; a clear, pure not quite sympathetic, bright voice, good intonation, considerable fluent execution, but yet lacking much of style and finish. The rich contralto and pretty way of Miss RYAN are well known. Mr. DRAPER has a pleasing tenor voice, not powerful, and an unaffected style. Mr. BARNABEE's basso was quite rich and telling. The ensemble of these four was hardly sympathetic, but it must improve in time. The glees and trios were, on the whole, nicely rendered and effective. Mr. GABRIEL chooses merely show pieces by tenth-rate composers for the piano, and his execution, brilliant and dashing, lacks the fineness, the poetry, which it is in vain to seek to learn in such a school. Such music, played by the angel Gabriel himself, could never charm us. As an accompanist Mr. G. appears quite serviceable.

Quite unawares we find our space so shortened as to crowd out our Great Organ Record, as well as twenty other things, such as notices of the nice editions of the Masses of Haydn, Mozart and Weber, which Ditson has been publishing; of Greeley's admirable History of the Great Rebellion, and other books; personal intelligence of artists, teachers, &c.

To-morrow (Sunday) evening, Mr. JOHN K. PAINE will give a Sacred Concert on the Great Organ.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, SEPT. 27.—Mr. GROVER, manager of the German Opera, opened the musical season with Gounod's "Faust." The great interest, and overflowing attendance, with which the public in general has received the performances of the German opera troupe, is justified by the improved management displayed. Mr. ANSCHUTZ, although completely at home at the conductor's desk, and there scarcely surpassed by any one in energy and capability, is not suited to the position of manager. The costumes and decorations are much superior to the former mise en scene of the company; chorus and orchestra strong in proportion, and very effective under Anschütz's baton. But to ensure the future of the German Opera, all flavor of dilettantism about it must be done away with, and some of the voices replaced by better and fresher ones; for singers of good will and little voices are not sufficient. If Mr. Grover succeeds in this, his will be the merit of having grounded a lasting existence for German opera in this country, and that in spite of clique and cabal and plot and counterplot; nor will he find his reward in pecuniary success alone, but also in the thanks and recognition of those to whom the welfare of art, in all its varied phases, is dear.

The troupe consists of the following artists: Mme. FREDERICK, who possesses a fresh, powerful, sympathetic, and sufficiently extensive soprano voice. Her execution is still imperfect, and her formation of tone not yet all that can be desired. The character in which she pleased us best was that of Agatha in Der Freischütz; she gave the great scena, and especially the prayer, with remarkable inspiration, and the most correct taste. As Margarethe in "Faust," we consider her superior to all who have appeared in that character here, and when her acting has gained a little more finish—if it may, without losing its charming naturalness, and without falling into conventionality—she is sure of success everywhere in this part. She is wrong to undertake parts lying in so low a register as that of Nancy, in "Martha;" she cannot render them with effect, and no voice can be forced out of its natural compass without evil consequences.

Mme. JOHANSEN is a pains-taking artist; but she pleases us more in serious than in comic parts; in the latter her voice and acting display somewhat of triviality. But for such parts as that of Rachel in the "Jewess," which requires immense power, her voice is no longer reliable enough, although her efforts are not altogether unsuccessful.

Mme. ROTTER is also a zealous artist; somewhat too zealous, perhaps; for we suspect that a noticeable deterioration of voice since her first appearance here may be in part owing to her over-exertions as an actress.

Fräulein CANISSA possesses a good voice and a bad method, and too often sings false besides. Her conception of character is superficial.

Herr HIMMER is evidently a thoughtful, earnest artist. It is only to be regretted that his voice is not sufficient for the demands of his intelligence, though it might be rendered far more effective by a more open production of tone. Nothing can be said against his conception and representation of character; as Eleazar in "The Jewess," as Robert, as Faust, his acting not unfrequently reaches the sublime.

Herr HABELMANN possesses a flexible, sympathetic, and sufficiently powerful tenor voice, a good method besides, and knows how to make a careful use of his natural and acquired resources. If we have a fault to find with this artist, it is that he occasionally oversteps the boundaries of good taste. His acting is also good. As the representative of Lyonel in "Martha," and Max in Der Freischütz, he leaves nothing to be desired.

Every one knows what KARL FORMES is, or at least what he was. FORMES is still superb at times in Bertram, Plunkett, etc. But alas, that years of carelessness have in part destroyed an organ once so fine! Can the singer who possesses a truly noble voice, show himself too heedful in his use of it? For the human instrument is no drum, whose skin, when worn out, may be renewed at pleasure.

Herr HERMANN is in stage appearance, acting, and voice so excellent a representative of Mephisto, that it would be difficult to imagine a more complete embodiment of the hero of the cloven foot. But in rôles taxing more especially the singer's powers, Herr Hermann's want of method, the close quality of his upper tones, a lack of decision in the lower ones, and his habit of gliding a third, a fifth, sometimes even an octave in attacking certain tones, render his good bass voice comparatively ineffective.

Herr STEINCKE is a useful member of the company, although possessing little voice; but his intelligent acting partly atones for that deficiency, in characters of secondary importance.

As we have already said, the chorus and orchestra are excellent; indeed the chorus singers merit especial praise for their lively, careful, natural singing and—acting!

The operas given by Mr. Grover's company during the past representations of two weeks have been "Faust," "Martha," "Der Freischütz," "Robert le Diable," "The Jewess"; and "Don Giovanni" is promised for this (Tuesday) evening, with two new singers lately arrived from Europe,—Fräulein DJUBA and Herr LEHMANN—in the cast. Quite a good repertory for so short a season.

The most complete performance was that of Der Freischütz; whose old yet ever new, soulful melodies proved their divine origin by their effect on all hearts not yet blasés. "Robert" was put upon the stage after a single rehearsal and went indifferently as regards theatrical effect, in consequence. The second performance was altogether an improvement on the first. "Faust is still the public favorite, and the commonplace soldiers' chorus is still encored, to the horror of musical ears. In consequence of Himmer's illness, an Italian tenor, TAMARO, undertook the part of Faust with success. "The Jewess" was much cut, and on the first performance might have gone more smoothly; its great music, too, almost necessitates voices of immense power; but notwithstanding the need of them in the three principal parts, still from the dramatic talent of the artists engaged, the representation was an effective one.

"THE CREATION."

Some weeks ago, Messrs. ANSCHÜTZ and FORMES announced their intention of establishing oratorio performances, which were to commence with Haydn's "Creation." The first concert was to have taken place in the open air, in Jones's Wood. But the rain had also made up his mind to visit Jones's wood on that day; so he slipped on his wet mantle, and spoiled the fun. The concert was postponed to the following Sunday, and promised to be crowded, especially as the ears that thirsted for classical music were to be regaled with instrumentation strengthened by "four great bells, and a battery of six-pounders!" But destiny again forbade. The superintendent of police, seconded by the superintendent of showers, laid his protest on the Sunday performance. At length, on the 16th of September, the affair took place before a small public—the whole thing a failure. The choir was small and ineffective; and the orchestra sounded thin in the open air. The Solos were in the hands of Mme. JOHANSEN, Mme. ZIMMERMANN, Herr FORMES, and as Herr QUINT was taken ill with a "sudden cold," a nameless gentleman sung the part of Uriel. The right temper was wanting to the whole personnel engaged. "There is but one step" etc., etc., and this occasion again proved the truth of the old proverb. When the turn of Handel's "Hallelujah" chorus came, every ear was on the stretch for the promised "four great bells, and the battery of six-pounders." Four small bells hung on one side of the platform; the battery was invisible and inaudible, although "Hallelujah, Hallelujah," loudly sounded; but all anticipated the immense effect that was expected at the hands of those who had so wisely improved on Mozart's already rich instrumentation of Handel's score. Anschütz gives the sign—to the left, to the right—he stretches out his neck, and his head, moves his arms—bends his whole body—the long drawn hallelujahs of chorus and orchestra had almost died away,—and the bells? the battery? At last, timidly, tremblingly, a little bell sounded—and an artillery of giant form threw off hastily a few—fire-crackers! Doubtless, both artists had made a mistake in counting their bars. In place of exciting awe and reverence, such as scarcely any other chorus is able to awaken, most Handel's sublime composition be thus made the groundwork for humbug, laughter and derision?

CONCERTS, ITALIAN OPERA, &c.

On the 19th the "Musical Mutual Protective Union" also gave a concert in Jones's Wood. Six hundred performers were announced. We hope the M. M. P. Union will give their future concerts in some large concert hall, for the best of orchestras with string instruments will prove acoustically ineffective in the open air. The aim of the society is praiseworthy and should be supported. The Harmonic Society displays new life, and is practising Schumann's "Paradise and the Peri," with other works.

The Philharmonic commences its rehearsals next month. The first concert will be given under BERGMANN's direction.

MARETZKE's Italian Opera company will begin their season on the third of October. Many new works, and native and foreign singers are promised. We shall see how these promises are fulfilled.

On the whole, a very lively musical season is expected.

LANCELOT.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Hurrah for Abe and Andy. L. B. Starkweather. 30
A capital campaign song, with Chorus. Light and pretty melody.

Is it Mother's gentle touch? V. E. Marston. 30
Another of the "Mother" songs. They are getting to be numerous, but are not yet too much so. This is a pretty song and chorus, and has been sung by the Arion Glee Club.

Song of the Shepherd boy. (Le jour se leve.)
"Mireille." Gounod. 30

This sweet little air is one of the encore pieces of the opera, and is that sung by the young shepherd, or more properly goat-herd, whom Mireille encounters on her pilgrimage to the church of the Sainte Marie.

God bless the Prince of Wales. Song and Quartet.
Brimley Richards. 30
The original quartet was composed for the occasion of the marriage of the Prince with Alexandra, who, of course, is to have a fair share of the blessing. Good, hearty music, and full of harmony.

Evening Song. C. P. Morrison. 30
A pleasing "Good Night" mountain song. Music somewhat difficult.

Johnny Bell's Woeing. C. J. Hargitt. 30
Not a comic song, as one might guess from the title, but a very tender and neat Scotch ballad. Will, very likely, take its place among the decided favorites of its class.

Instrumental Music.

Overture to "Mireille." Gounod.
The overture is quite simple in its construction, and quite appropriate to the pastoral character of the opera. A few Provençal airs are introduced.

The "Stamp" galop. Arthur O'Leary. 30
Belongs to the order of excellent instructive pieces, being quite easy, and is besides, quite "taking" and brilliant. Has an illustrated title page, with the "stamps" of various nations in the picture.

Overture to Fidelio. Beethoven.

Six morceaux for Cabinet Organ. L. H. Southard.

No. 1. Anticipation. 35
2. Remembrance. 35

The two pieces of this set will be welcome, as adding so many to the very limited list of good pieces for the instrument.

Overture to Alessandro Stradella. 4 hands.

Flotow. 75
In good shape for duet practice, which cannot be too much recommended to learners. The opera is not so well known in this country as Martha, by the same composer, but the name is sufficiently so to "sound familiar."

Books.

Heller's Studies. Op. 47. Rhythm and Expression. In two books, each, $1.50

Heller's Studies. Op. 46. Progressive Studies. 2 books, each, $2.00

Heller's Studies. Op. 45. Art of Phrasing. (Introductory.) 2 books, each, $1.50

The above are all standard studies, by Heller, who is in high favor with teachers.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 614.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, OCT. 15, 1864.

VOL. XXIV. No. 15.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Half a dozen of Beethoven's Contemporaries.

II. ANTONIO SALIERI.

(Continued from page 298.)

From the point which is now reached in the life of Salieri, Mosel hurries on to the conclusion, epitomizing the rest into a very small space. I shall follow his example, not from a lack of matter, but because I cannot suppose others to feel my interest in the history, and because there must be somewhere a limit to an article prepared for a journal. From what has been already detailed, the reader must see that at this period, 1790, Salieri stood at the head of the living musical operatic composers of the world in the popular estimation. The greatness of Mozart's works was known to an "appreciative few," and those works were establishing themselves in their true position; but they were—the "Entführung aus dem Serail" excepted—on the whole, caviar to the generality, and the "Magic Flute," which was the magic wand to open the popular ear to his exquisite melodies and divine harmonies, was not yet composed. Salieri, therefore, stood before the world in 1790, as Rossini did in 1830,—the acknowledged greatest living composer for the stage.

The year 1790 began with a heavy blow both to Salieri and Mozart—Joseph II. died on the 20th of February. His successor was his brother, the narrow-minded, bigoted, despotic Leopold II., Grand Duke of Tuscany. It takes long to mature, adopt, and put in force any great measure of state; but the repeal of a law, the return to the old way, the re-adoption of the old policy is the work of a moment. This Leopold proved anew. The measures and general polity, which Joseph, by many years of labor and perseverance, had but fairly introduced and which were intended to make Austria an enlightened and progressive state—which curbed the insolence of its greedy, immoral and debased priesthood, reducing in number and power its everywhere swarming legions of monks, which encouraged freedom of thought and speech, improved the schools, and was building up domestic industry in all directions,—these measures, this polity were annihilated by a stroke of the pen. The man seems to have adopted as his rule of action, the maxim that whatever had pleased Joseph must for that reason be detested by Leopold. This was as true in relation to the theatre and music, as to politics and public affairs. On the 13th of March he assumed the crown—on the 15th July a writer records: "The present king has not yet been in a theatre, has had no music at home, nor has given any sign of love for music." These facts, however, the writer supposes to be owing to the pressure of public business, and that "the golden age of music would begin a new epoch, after the giant mountains of state affairs had been reduced to sand hills." As Leopold died March 1, 1792, there proved to be hardly time for the new musical epoch to open.

The accession of Leopold, however, does not seem to have had any immediate effect upon the position of Salieri, although of course, after the death of Joseph, the court theatres were closed for a time, and the Chapelmaster was for so long relieved of his duties in the orchestra.

His first work of this year, 1790, appears to have been the changes made in "Tarare" for the opera in Paris. Towards the end of the preceding year, this popular work had been neglected, the leading parts given to inferior actors and singers, and finally it was withdrawn altogether, to the great loss of the treasury, and the great wrath of Beaumarchais. By February, (1790), the directors began sensibly to feel the mistake, and a deputation from them waited upon the poet, and, after admitting that the receipts of the opera house had fallen below the necessary expenses, prayed him to bring the Tarare again upon the stage. They however desired that the piece should close with a magnificent spectacle, the Coronation of Tarare, promising to employ only singers and dancers of the very first class in it. Beaumarchais at last consented to make the necessary alterations; which consisted in the addition of the new finale, and a consequent shortening of the previous acts. Impatient to draw the pecuniary benefits of the revival, the directors applied to Le Moine and Gretry to compose the new music, and thus save them from the loss of time involved in sending for it to Vienna. Whatever may have been the motive, pride, modesty or delicacy for Salieri, the French composers refused the engagement, and Beaumarchais forced the committee to make formal application to his friend by letter. He sent a letter, with his texts to the "Coronation," and to certain other pieces which were to be introduced, in which he tells Salieri: "You will certainly find it [the "Coronation"] in importance adequate to the position [as a new finale to the very successful Tarare]. With the election of a beloved king by a liberated people, I have associated several of the grand questions with which the nation is just now busied."

These questions were, says Mosel, the marriage of ecclesiastics, the cancelling of marriages (which was brought into the piece, by the divorce of the two characters Calpigi and Spinette) and other such productions of that unhappy epoch. A letter from the Committee, of June 2, 1790, and another from Beaumarchais of the 6th, urged Salieri to hasten his work, and visit Paris to superintend its production, as well as bring out his new work "Castor and Pollux," a text, however, which he did not compose. Salieri was detained in Vienna, and sent his new music to the Committee. In the middle of August, Beaumarchais announced the extraordinary success of the opera in its new form.

"It was put upon the stage with astonishing pains," he says, "and enjoyed by the public as a sublime work of the musical art. You now rank, with us, at the head of all composers! The treasury of the opera, which for a year past has received but 500 or 600 livres a night, made with Tarare 6540 livres at the first performance and 5400 at the second. The performers, who have this time carefully observed my maxim, to consider their singing as but a supplement to the action, have been for the first time ranked among the greatest actors of the stage, and the public cried: 'That is music! not a single fantastic note! Everything is aimed at the grand effect of the dramatic action.' What a pleasure for me, my friend, to see justice thus done you, and to hear you unanimously called the worthy successor of Gluck." In a later letter, he writes: "I repeat to you, that the French public feels the dramatic beauties of the music in Tarare more than ever. This is the only work that gives the Opera a profit."

Mosel is of opinion that Salieri's disgust at the principles advocated in the "Coronation of Tarare," was the reason why he did not go to Paris to bring it out,—a view which finds some confirmation in the fact that no copy of it was found, after the composer's death, among his music. But Salieri had other duties at this time. As chief kapellmeister, it devolved upon him to prepare and conduct the music at the various coronations of Leopold. One of the compositions composed expressly for these occasions was a grand Te Deum. The ceremony at Prague, where Leopold was crowned King of Bohemia, took place September 6; his election as Emperor of Germany followed on the 30th of the same month at Frankfort, a.m., and the coronation on the 6th of October; his coronation as King of Hungary, at Presburg, took place on the 15th November. In the list of Leopold's suite at Frankfort, as given in the Kronungs-Diarium [2 vols. folio] we read:—

K. K. Hofkapelle. (Imp. Roy. Court Chapel).
Herr Anton Salieri. I. R. Court Chapelmaster.
Herr Ignatz Umlauf, substitut.
15 Chamber musicians.

In 1791, Salieri petitioned to be relieved of the direction of the Italian Opera, with which, except during his absences in Paris and Italy, he had been charged now for four and twenty years. His prayer was granted, with the condition that he should still have charge of the sacred music in the palace chapel, and should deliver an opera annually to the stage. Joseph Weigl, a pupil of Salieri, took his place in the opera, being appointed to that place by Leopold, as he himself said, "to honor the master through his scholar." Mosel makes the resignation of Salieri a transaction creditable to Leopold's goodness of heart,—other authorities give quite a different view of the matter. Leopold's mind was thoroughly poisoned against the managers of the imperial theatre; moreover, he intended, instead of the German Opera, and the Italian Opera Buffa, to establish the Opera Seria and Ballet on a grand scale, and to put up a new house for them. Hence we read among the various remarks made by Leopold in the conversation recorded by Da Ponte, which bear upon the first point, the following :

"Da Ponte. "Salieri, too—"

Leopold :—"It is unnecessary for you to speak of Salieri. I know him sufficiently. I know all his cabals, and those also of the Cavalieri, [a prima donna of the Opera Buffa]. He is an intolerable egotist, and would like to have nothing succeed in my theatre but his operas and his favorites; he is not only your enemy, but that of all the chapelmasters, all the singers, all the Italians, and especially mine, because he knows that I see through him. I will no longer have either his Germans or himself in my theatre."

The Berlin Mus. Wochenblatt records in October, 1791 : "It is said that chapelmaster Salieri has resigned, and that Cimarosa has been called to his position."

"As to the intentions of the former, nothing is yet distinctly known; but it is believed that he will fix his residence in Paris, where he has already produced three operas, in consequence of which he receives a handsome pension. Some are of opinion that the cause of his dissatisfaction lies in the proposed plan of a new court theatre, in which the boxes are to be fitted up for card playing."

Again: "Vienna, October 20. Chapelmaster Salieri has retired, retaining his full salary, but will for the future furnish an operetta annually to the Italian stage." To which the Editor (Reichardt) remarks in a note: "We desire to have, from some competent Viennese, the particulars in relation to this piece of news. Why is so young and excellent a composer put upon the retired list? Has a special troop for the grand Court Opera been engaged? and is this company paid so much less than the Opera Buffa formerly was, one member of which, the songstress Storace, for instance, received 1000 ducats annually?"

But the changes made by Leopold were general. Count Rosenberg, the director, gave way to Count Ugarte; Da Ponte, the poet, and the Ferraresi, prima donna, dismissed in disgrace, &c. At all events Salieri's forty-first birth-day, (19 August) saw him on the point of leaving that orchestra forever, in which he so long had labored. With his departure the orchestra began to lose its excellence. In less than ten years a writer in the Leipzig Music Zeitung (for June 10, 1801) could say, "When the worthy Salieri was chapelmaster of the Italian Opera, and Herr Scheidlein, if I mistake not, was director of the orchestra, the members were the same as now (a few excepted who may have left it), and yet the operas were executed so that the severest criticism could demand nothing more. The perfect time of all the instruments, and the precision with which all worked together were among the least of its excellencies. The voices were accompanied with extreme delicacy; every shade, to the very lightest, in the accompaniments brought out; the exact expression always hit. At that time this orchestra was indisputably one of the very first theatre orchestras in Germany, a fact admitted by every competent judge. But when Salieri had to give up his position to another, and Herr Conti became leader, the orchestra sank by degrees, until it fell to the point where it now stands. The fault must therefore lie not in its members, but rather in its leaders."

During this year (1791), when Mozart, discouraged and disheartened in his career as operatic composer, sought the appointment of successor to Hofmann, as chapelmaster in St. Stephen's church, and gladly accepted the order of the buffoon Schikaneder to compose the "Magic Flute," and of the authorities at Prague to compose the "Titus," which two works he just lived to complete with young Süssmayr's aid, Salieri, though politely disgraced by his Emperor and set aside, was receiving orders for operas from various quarters. Beaumarchais and the directors of the Grand Opera still continued to urge him to come to Paris, and a new text, "La Princesse de Baby-lone," by Martin, was put into his hands. The turn which the Revolution took there, however, prevented the composer from accepting the invitation. Mazzola, the poet at Dresden, promised very soon to make such changes in his text, "L'isola capricciosa," as the composer desired, offered him again "Il Poeta ridicolo," and informed him that "Azur" had met with such a success in Dresden, "that every other opera, however beautiful, seemed weak when compared with this." Still another text was sent him from Padua, "Alessio," by Sografi, of which, however, nothing came.

At one o'clock in the night of Dec. 4-5, 1791, Mozart died. At 3 P.M. of the 6th, the funeral ceremony took place in the cross chapel, in the North transept of St. Stephen's church. Salieri was one of the few who were present, in spite of a terrible storm with rain and sleet. Whether he was one of those who went with the remains to the city gate, but there turned back appalled by the rage of the storm, sweeping across the broad open glacis, does not appear.

Seventeen years later (1808) appeared the second edition of Niemtschek's short biography of Mozart, in which (p. 81) the following anecdote is given :

"A still living, and not undistinguished composer in Vienna,"—Salieri is said to be meant, remarks Jahn—"said to another, when Mozart died, with much truth and justice: 'It is indeed sad, the loss of so great a genius; but well for us that he is dead. For had he lived longer, verily, the world would not have given us another bit of bread for our compositions!'"

Whether the anecdote be authentic, especially whether Salieri really is meant, certainly admits of doubt. But as years went on, and the Italian saw the works of his rival growing in the public estimation, until they were put by the whole musical world at the head of all operas, and their influence was felt in all schools of operatic composition; when he saw "Don Juan" and "Figaro's Marriage" everywhere on the stage, while his own works, which had so surpassed them in immediate success, had become partially forgotten, it is true a feeling of bitterness grew up in the heart of the old man, which in private circles, in his last years, found vent in words.

(To be continued.)

Shakespeare in his Relation to Music.

A Lecture delivered on the 23d April, 1864, in the "Berliner Tonkünstler-Verein."

BY EMIL NAUMANN.

[Continued from page 315.]

In his introduction to Don Quixote, the best thing, perhaps, that ever proceeded from his pen, Heinrich Heine says :

"Cervantes, Shakespeare, and Goethe, constitute the poetical triumvirate who have achieved the greatest things in the three branches of poetic style: the epic, the dramatic, and the lyric. While ascribing the finest productions in drama, romance, and song, to the above-mentioned great triumvirate, I am far from carping at the poetical value of other great poets. Not only the Ancients, but many of the Moderns likewise, have given us poems in which the flame of poetry blazes as brightly as in the masterpieces of Shakespeare, Cervantes, and Goethe. Still these names are connected as if by some secret bond. A kindred spirit beams forth from out their creations; a gentle breeze of eternal mildness, like the breath of God, blows through them all; and the modesty of Nature blooms in them. Goethe constantly reminds one of Cervantes, just as of Shakespeare, and he resembles the former even in the details of his style; in that pleasing prose, which is tinged with the sweetest and most harmless irony."

A fresh similarity, not perceived even by Heine, is exhibited by Shakespeare, Goethe, and Cervantes, if we consider the internal music that resounds through all their writings. It must here strike us as highly significant that it is precisely in the three greatest poets the world has seen since the times of Antiquity that we find this predisposition so strongly developed. Is the near intellectual affinity of the two arts so closely related to each other displayed in all its grandeur only upon the highest summits of genius? Such would almost seem to be the case. Where is there a heart endowed with feeling that does not beat more loudly when the name of Schiller is mentioned? Nay, perhaps that name is the most brilliant one of which modern times can boast, if we leave out of consideration our three heroes. Yet it is astonishing how much the musically-poetical element is flung into the background in the case of Schiller, when compared to Cervantes, Shakespeare, and Goethe. Notwithstanding the poem: "Die Macht des Gesanges" (The Power of Song), and the beautiful and spirited words spoken by the Muse of Music in the "Huldigung der Künste" (Homage to the Arts), Schiller wants the inward poetical music of which we have been speaking. His disposition, which, despite all his elevated sentiments, and all his enthusiasm for what is best and most divine, is really always of a reflective turn, does not allow him to hit so easily upon that musical tonefulness in the heart presupposing a certain degree of unconsciousness. In Goethe, on the contrary, from the fact of his being, probably, the greatest lyrical poet of any age, this musically poetical spirit is, as it were, innate. Songs like the song to the Moon: "Füllest wieder Busch und Thal still mit Nebelglanz," or the one commencing: "Das Wasser rauscht, das Wasser schwoll," possess not merely incomparable musical harmony, but, in the spirit and feeling from which they flowed, are genuine music of the soul, for which reason they inwardly affect us exactly as actual music would. A similarly predominating musical spirit runs through all Goethe writes; nay, we find it even in his prose. It would lead me too far were I to go into detail. But music and poetry, as far as he is concerned, celebrate the greatest triumph of their sisterly affinity in that Easter night, when the strain of the organ and singing of the choir, together with the song of the Angels: "Christ ist erstanden," snatch the poisoned goblet from the lips of Faust :

"O stinet fort, ihr süßen Himmelslieder;
Die Thräne quillt, die Erde hat mich wieder."

At the outset, in consequence of his peculiarly epic nature, Cervantes does not appear, perhaps, to deserve, in an equal degree with Goethe, to be ranked next to Shakespeare as one of our most musical poets. But it is only the said epic element which at first deceives us, and conceals the musical feeling and sentiment beneath the surface. If we examine more closely, every doubt on this head vanishes. We will begin by reminding our readers of the innumerable songs, nearly always expressly adapted for music, scattered throughout Don Quixote, and twining, like continuous garlands of flowers around the pillars, niches, and arches of the wonderful fabric, half fanciful, half Moorish, of that incomparable poem. Let the reader call to mind the musical goatherd, Cardenio, pouring forth, in melodious tones, the complaints of his heart, in the solitude of the forest; the voice of Don Louis, suddenly re-echoing, at midnight, before the small inn, when its soft notes cause the eyes of his mistress, as she wakes from sleep, to overflow with tears; the singing Knight of the Mirror; the incomparable serenades which Don Quixote and Alisidora give each other, etc. How much musical feeling, too, is there in such passages as the following, with the like of which we meet in countless numbers in Don Quixote: "Thus do we wander in the mountains, the woods, and the meads, singing, here, our songs of joy; there, our plaints of love, and drinking the liquid crystal of the springs and clear brooks. The oaks offer us, with liberal hand, their sweet and pleasing fruit, and the stumps of the cork-trees artless resting-places. The pastures afford us shade; the roses, perfume; the far-extending meadows, thousand-colored carpets; and the air its pure breath; songs cheer us; lamentations bury us in gentle melancholy; Apollo furnishes the gift of poetry; and Amor, longing thoughts." What a thorough knowledge of music the beautiful Dorothea is proved to possess by the fact of her saying to her hearers in the Sierra Morena: "And if I had a few hours of leisure left, I entertained myself with some religious book, or diversified my amusement with the harp, being convinced by experience that music lulls the disordered thoughts, and elevates the dejected spirits." We must beg leave yet to cite one of the most psychologically significant and poetic traits from a thousand others. At the summer night's adventure, arranged, in the midst of the forest, by the Duke and the Duchess, for their guests, and which, in the whole manner of its realization, breathes, in the highest degree, a musical spirit, the subject is continued thus: "Soon no other sound was heard but that of an agreeable musical concert, which rejoiced the heart of Sancho, who took it as a good omen, and, in that persuasion, said to the Duchess: 'My lady Duchess, where there is music there can be no harm.'—'As little should we expect any harm where there is light and illumination,' answered the Duchess.—'And yet,' replied the Squire, 'we may easily be burnt by such torches and bonfires as these, notwithstanding all the light and illuminations they produce; but music is always a sign of joy and feasting.'—'Time will show,' said Don Quixote, who overheard the conversation; and he said well, as will appear in the next chapter." However touching the first remark of Sancho is, that last made by Don Quixote is the more interesting, and is so significant, because the music to which he alludes is a sign neither of merriment nor joy, but employed to announce the magic appearance of the enchanted Dulcinea. In a few words, Cervantes penetrates to the inmost core of music, and the initiated will require no further quotation to prove the great profundity of his musical knowledge.

But there is a poet who surpasses both Goethe and Cervantes in musically-poetic gifts. We refer to Shakespeare, who, in this respect, as in every other, was the greatest poet ever born. All the phases of feeling and all the facts in human existence or in the world of fancy, which music can in any way express or enhance, has Shakespeare uttered or endeavored to elevate by tune. We will first direct the reader's attention to the fact, rather unessential to our argument, maybe, but still worthy of remark, that most of the dramatic subjects he selected contained in themselves so much of the musical element as to have been changed, with striking frequency, into opera books. We possess Othello by Rossini; the Capulets and Montagues by Bellini; a Midsummer Night's Dream by Felix Mendelssohn; Merry Wives of Windsor by Nicolai; Benedict and Beatrice by Berlioz; Macbeth and The Tempest by Taubert; another version of the latter piece by Halévy; music to Macbeth by Chelardi and Spohr; an arrangement of the Winter's Tale, written with the pen of genius by Franz Dingelstadt, and set to music by Flotow; and overtures to Coriolanus, Hamlet, Leir, etc., by Beethoven, Niels Gade, Berlioz, and others. In some of the above, the co-operation of music is facilitated in so remarkable a manner by Shakespeare himself that they have an almost operatic stamp. This is the case with The Tempest, the Winter's Tale, and A Midsummer Night's Dream. In nearly all Shakespeare's dramas, too, music is introduced in a more general manner to a greater or less extent. Such is the case in Othello, Hamlet, Macbeth, Leir, Cymbeline, Henry VI., Richard II., The Merchant of Venice, Romeo and Juliet, and the comedies. No less frequently in Shakespeare are music and its influence made the subject of reflection and discussion. But all this vanishes into nothing compared to the wonderful place which Shakespeare nearly always accords to this influence of music, as well as to the grave purport of what is said concerning it, while ordinary poets can speak of it in only a very traditional fashion.

(To be Continued.)

Robert Schumann in Leipsic and Clara Wieck.*

(Concluded from page 308.)

Clara Wieck was born in Leipsic, on the 13th September, 1819. With her fifth year she began to learn the piano, of which instrument she was destined to become a surprising mistress. The course of her instruction was based upon her father's judicious method, and in four years she had made such progress as to be able to take part for the first time at a concert in public. She did so on the 20th of October, 1828, at the concert given by a fair pianist from Prague, of the name of Perthaler, with whom she executed four-handed Variations by Kalkbrenner. Thanks to the great number of musicians who frequented her father's house, which had become the regular resort for all the musical celebrities of Leipsic, as well as for such as merely passed through it on their travels, Clara found opportunities for causing her talent, so happily developed, to be appreciated, and also for improving it. In this respect, according to the assurance given us by Wasielewsky, the lasting influence exerted upon her by Paganini's presence in Leipsic during the month of October, 1829, deserves most especial mention. Besides playing the piano, Clara attempted of her own accord composition. In her eleventh year she appeared before the world as a concert player. Her father accompanied her on her first short trip to Weimar, Cassel, &c. On their return, they prepared for a long flight, which carried them as far as Paris. Clara Wieck there appeared at a concert of her own, as well as frequently in private circles, and carried away with her that reputation which proved decisive for her prospects, and of which the influence was perceptible wherever she subsequently performed. After staying several weeks in the French capital, she returned, on account of the outbreak of the cholera, to Leipsic, and devoted herself with renewed zeal to her musical studies, which were no longer restricted to those of a technical nature, under the further guidance of her father, but embraced theoretical subjects likewise, the study of which she had previously begun under the Cantor, Herr Weinlig, and now continued and ended under Carl Gustav Kupsch and Heinrich Dorn. In order to render herself as universal as possible in her knowledge, she took lessons in violin-playing from Prinz, as well as, subsequently, in singing from Miksch of Dresden. Other professional trips, during which she was the first to make known Chopin's works in the cities of Germany, were undertaken by her in company with her father in the years 1836-1838, to Berlin, Breslau, Dresden, Hamburg, and Vienna, when she achieved the most extraordinary success by her wonderful performances. We may here state once for all, that, whenever she happened to be in Leipsic for a longer or shorter period, she played on various occasions at the Gewandhaus Concerts, and the Quartet Evenings. In January, 1839, she made a trip by herself to Nuremberg, Stuttgart, Carlsruhe, and Paris, returning in the August of the same year to Germany. The following winter she played at concerts in various towns in North Germany, and always with equal success. In this manner did she conclude one portion of her brilliant artistic career, commenced so soon; she subsequently continued it by the side of Robert Schumann.

Ever since he had known Wieck's family, Schumann had always manifested sympathy and interest for the highly talented young girl who had at so early an age made such progress in her art. When she reached the threshold of womanhood, a love, which gradually filled his whole being, was added to the above sentiments. Schumann was long in doubt whether his love was returned by the object of it, and when at last he felt certain that it was, he could not obtain the consent of the young lady's father, who did not feel inclined to give a daughter who had wound herself round his heart, to a son-in-law who had no fully assured and settled source of livelihood. A period of struggles and orisons now commenced for the two young people; attempts to find an asylum in Vienna miscarried; but hope and belief in the Future were not lost. At last Schumann had recourse to the law. The Court of Appeal at Leipsic dispensed with the paternal consent, otherwise necessary for a matrimonial contract; and on the 12th September, 1840, the marriage of Robert with Clara Wieck took place in the village of Schönefeld.

What Schumann had produced in the preceding summer, as well as what he produced in the ensuing winter, consisted principally of songs, melodies set to the gems of our German lyric poetry, the most beautiful pieces of Chamisso, Eichendorf, Rückert, J. Kerner, H. Heine, Geibel, and R. Reineck. The sudden leap to a region of art, into which he had previously scarcely set his foot, is explained by the influence of domestic circumstances on him. As Schumann himself expressly remarks, in a letter to Dorn, that Clara Wieck "was nearly the sole cause" of a number of works he composed for the piano between the age of thirty-five and forty, we may here, with a full conviction of being right, repeat Wasielewsky's assertion: "that it was she again who gave the decisive impulse which induced him to take up the lyrical style." The principal feature is a coy and sacred fever of the most blissful passion and love, which seizes on Schumann, as man and artist—both in one—in the domain of lyric poetry, often ecstatic and joyous, but still not without a painful trait now and then glimmering through, as a reflection of sorrow experienced, and of anxious doubt. This is certainly as little to be described in words as the essential principles of love are to be represented; but, in the songs of an amatory kind composed during the year 1840, the whole human heart is exhibited to the naked eye plunged into the profoundest emotion, and inflamed by the power of a noble passion."

There are no less than 138 various vocal pieces, of different length, some for one voice, and some for several voices, which were composed in 1840. We may, therefore, well call it "A Year of Songs." As we have already said, they were all conceived and committed to paper in Leipsic. What magnificent things they are, every one feels and knows. Schumann judged with perfect correctness of himself, when he wrote to August Kahlert, in Breslau: "I wish you would look more carefully at my compositions in the way of songs. You speak of my future; I do not dare to give more than I have given (especially in songs), and am contented."

The remaining years of the stay in Leipsic were filled up by a series of instrumental works, and works for grand orchestra. Thus it was at this period that Schumann wrote the Symphony in B flat major and that in D minor, as well as one of his most extensive works: Das Paradies und die Peri. The libretto, founded upon Moore's poem of Lalla Rookh, was written for him by his youthful friend and schoolfellow at Zwickau, Emil Fleiszig. The work was performed for the first time in the Gewandhaus, Leipsic, under Schumann's own direction, on the 4th December, 1843, and repeated a week afterwards, amid the lively applause of the public. A particular charm was added to these performances by the co-operation of Mad. Livia Frege, formerly Mlle. Gerhardt, who, despite her having withdrawn from a successful professional career, and retired into private life, sang "with the warmest devotion and enchanting grace" the part of the Peri, a part, to a certain extent, planned and written for her. The work was very soon heard of elsewhere than in Leipsic; it was repeatedly performed in most large cities, including even New York.

It was, however, nearly the last which Schumann produced in our town. In the year 1844, he set out, with his wife, on a professional trip, lasting several months, for Russia, (Petersburg, Moscow, etc.); at the end of June, on his return home, he gave up—as he had long intended—the editorship of the Neue Zeitschrift für Musik, from which he entirely withdrew. The paper, it is true, had, for some time, been becoming an object of greater and greater indifference, and he had lost more and more the desire, at first so lively in him, of fulfilling the functions of a journalist and a critic. He was able to retire from his literary exertions with the consciousness of having assured the reputation, merely forming in his time, of Franz Schubert, Mendelssohn, Heller, and Taubert, and, on the other side, of having helped to lay the foundation for that of Norbert Burgmüller, Chopin, Robert Franz, Niels W. Gade, Stephen Heller, and Adolph Henselt. Men, too, like Bennett, Berlioz, and Verhulst were introduced into the musical world partly by him.

In the Autumn of 1844, Schumann went to Dresden, but did not completely fix his residence there till the December of the same year, after having taken, with his wife, at a Musical Matinée, on the 8th December, a formal and public farewell at Leipzig. It was then universally said that the cause of this change of residence was a feeling on the part of Schumann, that he had been slighted, by not being selected to conduct the Gewandhaus Concerts. But whether there is any truth in this, and, if so, how much, Wasielewski leaves undecided.

* From a new work entitled: Zur Geschichte des Theaters und der Musik in Leipsig, by Dr. Emil Kneebke. (P. Fleischer, Leipsic.)

We may pass rapidly over the last portion of the master's life. He and his wife remained at Dresden till 1850, when they went to settle in Düsseldorf, where Schumann had accepted the post of Municipal Musical Director, formerly held by Mendelssohn, Rietz, and Hiller. Here that mental malady, which had already given several indications of its dread approach, was destined to increase in intensity and end in suicide. It was on the 27th February, 1854, that Schumann, en aëglie, and with nothing on his head, left his house very quietly, went to the Rheinbrücke, and endeavored to put an end to his existence by throwing himself into the stream. He was rescued, it is true, by some boatmen, but for what a wretched fate was he reserved! He spent two years with his mind hopelessly deranged, in the lunatic asylum at Endenich, near Bonn, till on the 29th July, 1856, the Angel of Death laid his hand upon his weary brow.

Subsequently to 1844, Schumann and his wife were several times in Leipzig, though only for a very short period, as for instance in the Summer of 1850, when his opera of Genoveva was produced for the first time. We all know that since Mad. Schumann has become a widow, she has resumed her professional tours, and is one of the most complete and accomplished mistresses of the piano. Her permanent place of residence is no longer Düsseldorf, but Berlin.

History of the Leipzig Gewandhaus Concerts.

As the Gewandhaus Concerts commence next month, a short sketch of the rise and progress of one of the oldest European concert-institutions—one too which has exercised so great an influence on modern music—may not be without interest. The preparation of this sketch has been much facilitated by the recent appearance of Dr. Knechtke's History of the Theatre and Music in Leipzig.

The first Leipzig Concert Society of which we have any notice, originated among the students in the last decade of the 17th century, and was called the "Collegium Musicum." It devoted itself chiefly to vocal music. In 1702 Georg Philipp Telemann—one of the many distinguished men who in the course of four centuries, beginning with Urban in 1439, and ending at present with Hauptmann, have shed such lustre on the office of Cantor of the Thomas Church and School at Leipzig—established a second Concert Society of about forty members, all of whom were students. All the orchestral instruments of the time were represented, and many of the players attained so great a reputation that they were sought for to join various royal and princely orchestras—foreshadowings of the future Leipzig Conservatorium. Telemann stayed here but two years; after his departure Melchior Hoffmann, organist of the New Church, undertook the direction of the Collegium.

In 1736 we find more activity in the musical life of Leipzig. Mizler says—"The public concerts which are held here weekly are in permanent bloom. One of them is directed by the Kapellmeister Johann Sebastian Bach, and is held every Friday evening from eight to ten in Zimmermann's Coffee House, in Catherine-street; during the Fair it takes place twice a week. The other is conducted by J. G. Görner, music director at St. Paul's Church, and organist at St. Thomas." It also meets once a week in Schellhafer's Saal (now the Hotel de Saxe) on Thursdays from nine to ten, and during the Fair on Mondays and Thursdays. The members consist for the most part of students, and there were always such good musicians among them, that in the course of time they frequently became celebrated virtuosi. Each member is permitted to play publicly in these concerts; the hearers are such as are competent to appreciate and judge the worth of an able artist." There can be no doubt that the increased energy with which music was then practised in Leipzig was in a great part due to the influence of Bach, who had been Cantor of the Thomas Church since 1723.

In 1738 Mizler founded a "Musical Society," the especial object of which was the cultivation of the theory of music. According to the statutes—"Mere practical musicians can find no place in this society, because they are not in a state to contribute anything to the promotion or improvement of music." It may have been because they thought Bach "a mere practical musician" that he was not admitted a member till 1747. The statute requiring new members to send in a composition as a proof of their eligibility was not dispensed with even in his case; as his "admission piece" Bach gave them his elaborate choral "Von Himmel hoch da komm' ich her," and a six-part canon. Another rule was that each member should present his portrait to the society. Of these none have been preserved with the exception of Bach's, which now hangs in the music-room of the Thomas School.

None of these concert institutions seem to have had in them the elements of life; all died after a longer or shorter existence. But there was one which I have not yet named that had a longer life, and even to-day it shows no symptoms of old age. On the 11th March, 1743, the "Great Concert Society" was established. At first it consisted of but sixteen members, of noble as well as of burgher rank. Each had to pay twenty thalers a year. At the commencement, the meetings were held in a house in the Grimma-street, belonging to Bergrath Schwaben; but so popular were the concerts, that after the first month the room was too small, and they had to be removed to another locality. The first music-director was J. F. Döles, at that time one of Bach's pupils. He held his office but a year, as he then removed to Freiberg; but he stayed long enough to glorify the anniversary of the Great Concerts by the composition of a cantata "with trumpets and drums." Upon the death of Harnner, in 1755, who was Bach's immediate successor, Emanuel Bach and Döles were candidates for the cantorship. Döles, although inferior to his opponent, was elected; the "Porpora-Harko" style, which he had adopted, being then most popular. Döles' influence was most felt in the Thomas Church, to the training of the choir of which he devoted all his energies; for it he also composed much music, some of which is still sung. He must have been a lovable man; in his later days he was universally called "Father Döles;" endless were the greetings he received when, in his red velvet cloak, he daily appeared upon the promenade. In his house Mozart was a frequent and happy visitor; and he it was who first made Mozart acquainted with the treasures of Bach's genius.

The troubles of the Seven Years' War had caused the temporary suspension of the great concerts. After the peace of 1763, they were recommended under the direction of Johann Adam Hiller, who in 1789, became Cantor of the Thomas Church after Döles had retired upon his pension. The concerts were held in the Three Swans' Tavern, in the Brühl, in a room which was entered by a long narrow passage. On one side was the platform for the orchestra; on the other, a gallery for those who came "in boots and with unpowdered heads." The orchestra consisted of sixteen violins, three violas, two violoncellos, two contrabasses, two flutes, two oboes, two bassoons, two horns, a lute, and a piano. Trumpets, drums, and English horns were supplied when required, by the town orchestra. Many of the members acquired fame as solo players. The names of the singers who were engaged for several seasons are enough to make the ears of the present generation of Gewandhaus concert visitors tingle with envy. Among them were Corona Schröter, who inspired Goethe, then a student in Leipzig, with the most enthusiastic admiration, if not with a tenderer feeling; and Gertrude Schmalzing, who is better remembered as Madame Mara. Each concert was divided into two parts, with a pause for refreshment. The first part generally consisted of a symphony, an aria, a concerto for some instrument, a "divertissement" for several instruments, and a quartet, ensemble, or chorus from an opera; the second part, of a symphony, an aria, and a "partie" for the whole orchestra. The management was in the hands of a committee of nine of the most respectable citizens, three of whom were selected from the German merchants, two from the French, and one from the Italian. Herr Reichart, a critic of the time, speaks of the performances as showing a want of sufficient rehearsals. The symphonies which were often played, went tolerably, but new music, and especially the accompaniments to the concertos and arias, were played carelessly; the "Herrn Virtuosi" being too conceited to take sufficient pains. The audience too comes in for a rap: "Full of gallant company, who are perhaps a little more powdered, sit a little stiffer, dispute about the music a little more impudently than in the case in other concerts, but have the beautiful gift of chattering and making a noise in common with all other concert company. It is true, indeed, that a merchant, who has the superintendence of the concert, stands upon guard, and when anyone speaks quite too loud, taps with a great key upon the piano, which he at the same time puts out of tune, and commands silence; which command, however, is not obeyed. But this heroic conduct he confines to the gentlemen alone; with the ladies he makes use of the politeness he had learnt in Paris; he joins them—and increases the discourse."

We now come to an important era in the Leipzig Concerts. Through the influence of the public-spirited Bürgermeister Mäller, whose name should be kept in grateful remembrance by all who enjoy the beautiful promenade, a concert-room was built in the Gewandhaus (Cloth Hall), and there, on the 25th November, 1781, the first Gewandhaus concert took place. Hiller continued to officiate as Kapellmeister; Häser was the first Concertmeister; and Schicht, who subsequently was Hiller's successor both in the Thomas Church and Gewandhaus, and attained great fame as a church composer, presided at the piano. The sisters Jodlerka, in whom, when wandering singers, Hiller had detected the materials of future greatness, and to whose education he devoted the greatest pains, appeared as singers. Their gratitude to their master is attested by a monument which now stands on the promenade, opposite the Thomas School.

Schicht was Kapellmeister from 1785 to 1810. It was under his direction that the public became acquainted with the first three symphonies of Beethoven, and with his Pastoral Symphony. Whether any of the others were also then produced cannot now be ascertained, for the old programmes do not give the keys. Doubtless did many critics shake their heads at the audacity of the revolutionist. A practiced musician like Naumann considered that even Mozart had exceeded all bounds in the progressions and modulations he had introduced. But in spite of the critics the new composer made his way.

From 1810 to 1827, J. P. C. Scholz, and from 1827 to 1835 C. A. Pohlenz, directed the concerts. Häser's successors as concertmasters were Campagnoli from 1797 to 1817, and Matthai from 1817 to 1836; the latter has the merit of having established the Gewandhaus Quartet Concerts. During the whole of this period there was only one interruption to the regular course of the concerts. The sanguinary days of October, 1813, turned the concert-room, and almost all the public buildings, churches, etc., into hospitals. But by the end of the year music again sounded in the rooms which had echoed with the moans of the wounded and with the ravings of the fever-stricken. Many an interesting bit of musical history might be picked out of the early programmes of the Gewandhaus Concerts, but space compels me to close. In my next I hope to continue the history of the Gewandhaus from its Golden Age under Mendelssohn to the present time.

Music Abroad.

BIRMINGHAM FESTIVAL (Concluded).

Of the original Cantata, by young Arthur Sullivan (whom we had the pleasure of knowing but three years since as a student at the Leipzig Conservatoire), and of the last day's work of the Festival, we read briefly in the Orchestra:

Mr. Sullivan's cantata, "Kenilworth," on Thursday evening, had the largest audience assembled at any of the Miscellaneous Concerts. The author of the libretto, Mr. Chorley, thus introduces his work:

"Once having chosen 'The Princely Pleasures of Kenilworth,' prepared in summer of 1575 for Queen Elizabeth, by the Earl of Leicester, as subject for an English cantata, nothing was required save to make rhymes fit for music—so rich in contrast were the pleasures offered to the Queen.

"A temporary bridge, seventy feet in length," says Miss Aikin in her careful biography, "was thrown across the valley to the great gate of the castle. . . . The Lady of the Lake, invisible since the disappearance of the renowned Prince Arthur, approached on a floating island along the moat to recite adulatory verses. Arion, being summoned for like purpose, appeared on a dolphin four-and-twenty feet long, which carried in its belly a whole orchestra. A Sybil, a Salvage Man, and an Echo, posted in the park, all harangued in the same strain. Music and dancing enlivened the Sunday evening, and a play was performed," &c.

"My fancy was directed to this Kenilworth pageant, not merely from its local interest to those interesting themselves in our great Midland Festival, but because I have long known, almost by heart, Scott's wondrously musical, but as wondrously simple description of the arrival of England's maiden Queen at her subject's palace, on a 'summer night.' And I name Scott expressly, seeing that I have to plead his great example for an anachronism which will be found here. When such a master of history, of passion, of poetry, and of romance, as he, allowed himself to introduce in his novel allusions to 'Troilus and Cressida,' and 'A Midsummer Night's Dream, as so many court (if not household) words, familiar to Raleigh and to Sidney, ere the Queen made her progress into Warwickshire (at which time Shakespeare was but a boy), I hope I may be forgiven for representing the play 'set before the Queen' by the exquisite 'summer night' scene from the 'Merchant of Venice.'

The Shakespeare scene has been most deliciously set by Mr. Sullivan, who has here introduced some beautifully contrasted instrumentation. Mmes. Lemmens-Sherington and Mr. Cummings particularly distinguished themselves in the duet; and Miss Palmer sang the music allotted to her with her usual grace and feeling. We must not omit to mention Mr. Santley's spirited execution of the song, "I am a ruler of the sea," which, from its striking melody, is sure to become popular. At the conclusion of the cantata, Mr. Sullivan was loudly applauded, and had to return to the platform to receive the approving acclamations of the audience.

The performance on Friday morning of Beethoven's 'Mount of Olives,' was the most splendid it has ever been our fortune to hear of that wonderfully dramatic work. Mlle. Tietjens, Mr. Sims Reeves, and Mr. Santley threw their whole energies into the interpretation of the music allotted them, and the chorus, with one or two trifling exceptions, showed by their precision and delicacy the effects of the training they had received. The final Hallelujah was marvellously rendered, though its effect was marred in some measure through Lord Lichfield's encoring it. Mr. Bartholomew has displayed some skill in the libretto of the 'Mount of Olives,' which is very far before his 'Nanman.' Those passages which are in the German supposed to be spoken by the Second Person of the Trinity are given by Mr. Bartholomew to John, in order not to offend the religious susceptibilities of an English audience. (!)

Mozart's hackneyed Twelfth Mass followed, and was creditably executed. Madame Rudersdorff, Miss Palmer, Messrs. Cummings and Santley took the solos. A selection from Handel's 'Solomon,' with Madame Sainion-Dolby, who was encored by Lord Lichfield in "What though I trace," brought the morning's lengthy performance to an end, to the relief of many who found it possible to tire of even such music and so executed.

The evening's performance of 'Elijah' brought the Festival to a close. Eight years ago this work was first given to the world at the then Birmingham Festival; and certainly Mendelssohn's great work has not lost any of its interest through the production of 'Nanman.' The general execution of 'Elijah' left nothing to be desired, principals and chorus all exerting themselves to the utmost; and the audience separated, greatly delighted with their last hearing of the celebrated artists assembled for the Birmingham Festival of 1864.

A NEW SCHOOL FESTIVAL.

CARLSRUHE. The festival of the Allgemeiner Deutscher Musikverein (Universal German Musical Union), which has before been held once in Leipzig and once in Weimar, occurred this summer, near the end of August, in this "most deadly-lively of German residences," without flags or garlands or any general show of festivity in the streets. It was a demonstration of the disciples of Liszt and Wagner, and the musical "new lights" generally.

Judging from the programme, from the peculiar heroes and their followers assembled, from the description of each day's performances which we find furnished by a correspondent of the London Orchestra, it was altogether a curious affair,—more curious, we fear, than edifying. In chronicling the musical condition of the world we must not overlook this singular phenomenon; and therefore we will copy largely from the correspondence just alluded to, only suggesting that it be borne in mind that the comments are from an English point of view, which is always strongly prejudiced against new things, and which still absurdly persists in mixing up Schumann in the same category with the Wagnerites.

... Was it bitter irony, or was it want of self-knowledge, that caused Gluck's 'Armida' to be fixed upon to open the festival? The beautiful clearness and the grand simplicity of this opera are in strange contrast with the creation of the New School. Although hardly to be reckoned among the greatest of Gluck's operas, 'Armida' has many numbers which show the master in all his strength and grace. Where is anything more graceful, more charming, than the music of the second act; more intensely dramatic than the great scene with the Spirit of Hate; more touching than Armida's conflict with herself when trying to steel herself to kill Rinaldo? Some of the most striking numbers were cut out. But I have not space to enter into such details. Suffice it to say, that the opera was on the whole respectably given; but a thoroughly satisfactory rendering of Gluck's operas demands singers who can act, and actors who have been taught singing on better principles than are now to be acquired in German schools. The first orchestral concert, which, as all the other performances, was held in the Grand Ducal Theatre, was opened by a "Festival March," by Herr Ed. Lassen, of Weimar. The work is insignificant, and entirely devoid of any festive character; even here the innate dreariness of the school made itself felt. A prologue, written by Dr. Eckardt, and spoken by Frau Johanna Lange, came next. It endeavored to identify the direction of the New School with the German patriotic movement. It admitted that the works of the sect were not written to satisfy the taste of the day, but looked forward to a future when freedom would be established; and art, represented by the New School, would be purified of all trivialities, and take her fitting place in the State. Allusions to the titles of several of the compositions which were to be performed were ingeniously brought in, and the whole ended with a string of the most fulsome compliments to Dr. Liszt, who was characterized as the great prophet of the sect. The following is the programme of the concert:—Overture to Byron's poem, "Tasso's Klage," by Heinrich Strauss, of Carlsruhe; concerto for violoncello, by R. Volkmann; "Columbus," symphony, 3rd and 4th movements, by Herr J. J. Abert, of Stuttgart; overture to Pushkin's drama, "Boris Godunov," by Herr Youry von Arnold, of St. Petersburg; Joachim's "Hungarian" concerto for the violin; "Des Sängers Fluch," ballade for orchestra (after Uhland's poem) by Herr Hans von Bülow, of Berlin; Psalm XIII, for tenor solo, chorus, and orchestra, by Dr. F. Liszt.

Herr Strauss's overture is too vague and obscure to leave any distinct impressions. Herr Popper, of the Hohenzollern-Hechingen Orchestra, at Löwenburg, played Volkmann's concerto. He has made most decided progress as a violoncellist since I heard him last winter in Leipzig. If he goes on thus, he will soon rank among the masters of his instrument. In addition to great technical acquirements he has real musical feeling. As a musical composition, the concerto has some good thoughts, though not altogether original; but the greatest fault is the dreary tone which prevails throughout. The two movements from Herr Abert's symphony were the most respectable music of the evening. Whether if the other movements had been given, the purport of the title of "Columbus" would have been clearer, I cannot say; at present I certainly do not see its appropriateness. The third movement, an andante, sounds well throughout, and although possessing no decided originality, is so well made that it can be listened to with pleasure; a little more contrast, however, would have relieved its somewhat too great length. The last movement begins with more life, and is worked up to a really exciting close; but between the beginning and end there is an episode of strange sounds—the significance of which (unless it be to depict the roarings and howlings of wild beasts) is by no means clear. But with all drawbacks, the fragment was so enjoyable that I should be glad to hear the whole work. Herr von Arnold's overture is terribly dreary; it is so fragmentary that no clear idea of its purport can be attained; the instrumentation seems very unskillful. Joachim's interesting "Hungarian" concerto, the noble themes of which grow upon one more and more, can never be heard to perfection unless it be played by its composer. Herr Remenyi showed little respect either to his countryman or to his audience in the way in which he had prepared himself. The slow movement, indeed, was in some parts excellently given, but with this exception, by persistent falsity of intonation, and by slovenly execution of the passages, the player did his best to spoil the effect of the composition. And yet the applause which greeted him at the end, and the repeated recalls could not have been more enthusiastic had the playing been perfection! Such indiscriminate makes applause of no value. The orchestral accompaniment was very satisfactory. Herr Von Bülow's ballade was the most ferociously ugly work of the programme: it really defies any attempt at description, unless one may say that it is incoherent cursing and swearing translated into orchestral sounds. Being so very ugly it was of course received with unbounded applause. Liszt's Psalm offered some compensation for the sufferings of the evening. As a whole it is deficient in melody, and the commencement especially is vague; but nowhere is the tone vulgar or commonplace. The final chorus, however, in which there is an excellent fugue, made amends for all; its construction is really masterly. The difficulties of the Psalm, especially the voice parts, are very great. That it was so well performed is a proof that the members of the chorus had worked hard in its preparation.

The first concert for Chamber Music was held on Wednesday evening, and consisted of the following compositions:—Trio for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello (a flat minor) by R. Volkmann—the Herren Rötcher, of Berlin, Reményi, and Popper; Two Lieder (Kuss der Nacht and Frühlingsfeier) by Herr W. Fritze, of Bremen; sonata for pianoforte, by Franz Liszt—Fräulein Alide Topp, of Stralaund; Russian Ballade, by Herr Youry von Arnold; Sonata for pianoforte and violin, by Franz Bendel, of Berlin—the Herren Bendel and Remenyi; "Mephistowalzer," episode from Lenau's 'Faust,' composed and arranged for the piano, by F. Liszt—Fräulein Alide Topp. A more wearying trio than Volkmann's I have seldom heard. If anything like an intelligible phrase appears for a moment, it is immediately drowned in a sea of dreary disharmony. Even the scherzo was dull. Gloom and despair can be as vulgar as the veriest barrel-organ tune, and are quite as offensive as the most trivial sing-song ballad. Herr Rötcher, who took the piano part, is at present too much of the beginner to allow any opinion of his abilities to be formed. Herr Remenyi was as perseveringly out of tune as ever. Herr Popper was the only one who showed himself a real artist; his ensemble is as masterly and expressive as his solo playing. In the desert a sip even of rapid water is refreshing. Hence Herr Fritze's songs, although not possessing the remotest approach to a recognizable tune—that sine quâ non of song-writing—were not altogether unwelcome. Dr. Liszt's sonata is a strange composition. It may have a meaning, but to me it was as ravings in an unknown tongue. As for any discoverable connected construction, it was more like the cross readings of a newspaper page. How such a farrago could be committed to memory is little short of marvellous; the technical difficulties, too, are enormous; and yet Fräulein Alide Topp, a very young lady, played it by heart in a style that defies description. Should this lady fail of attaining the highest position in her subsequent career, it can only be from her taste becoming vitiated by the unhealthy atmosphere in which she has been educated. Possessing a thorough command of all the technicalities of the key-board she does her master, Herr von Bülow, the highest honor. Difficulty is a word which has no more significance for her; but if she persist in making her repertoire of works such as this sonata, no one will wish to hear her again. At present she has time to improve her taste, and from what I hear I have no doubt she can play other music equally well. More distracted even than the sonata is the "Mephistowalzer," and as marvellous was Fräulein Topp's performance of it. Herr von Arnold's Russian ballade would be better described as a melodramatic scene with pianoforte accompaniment. In itself formless and void of the least musical character, it was made interesting by Frau Hauser's excellent declamation. Herr Bendel's sonata was exceedingly uninteresting.

The following (Thursday) evening was to have been devoted to the second orchestral concert, but in the morning bills were issued stating that in consequence of the sickness of several members of the orchestra the concert must be postponed till the next evening; the truth being, as I understand, that there had been a regular strike of the orchestra in consequence of some of the works which had been placed in the programme being so insufferably bad and impracticable that they could not be performed. The gentlemen who had to play the wind instruments declared that their lips were reduced to such a state that it was impossible for them to go through a second rehearsal and concert without another day's rest. Considering that the members of the Grand Ducal Opera Orchestra had never been invited to co-operate, but had to give their services at allerhöchster command, their sufferings deserve much sympathy.

The rest next time.

"HONORING A SWAN."

PESARO. While the disciples of the newness, the musicians of "The Future," were in council, trying to be in concert, as above,—or a few days before, Aug. 21,—there was another sort of festival in honor of a cheerful hero of the Past—one who still lives, thank Heaven!—the tribute of Italy to her greatest musical genius, ROSSINI, called, from his birth-place, the "Swan of Pesaro." We are again indebted to the correspondence of the Orchestra:

Thirty thousand strangers, among whom many noble names could be counted, swarm about Pesaro this bright and cloudless morning, waiting for the noon. At noon the fete commences. It is the hall of the prefecture, where there is an effigy of Rossini, in statue form. Florence the beautiful—"bella Firenze"—in the mouth of all Italians who musically utter her name—comes to offer her tribute to the occasion in the shape of a gold medallion presented to the Maestro's statue, and the hand that brings it is that of the venerable Count Perticari. The prefecture is full: musicians, poets, magistrates, councillors, members of institutes, members of the press, representatives from other Italian towns, and an eager listening crowd. Presently the mass shapes itself; the worthy concourse on the platform divides; and at its head, and standing next the Prefect himself, having on his right and left the Syndic of Pesaro and the Syndic of Bologna, stands a figure. Up goes a shout—a hearty, surprising, gratified shout—"Viva il re! Viva!" It is Ubaldo Peruzzi, Minister of the Interior, sent from the Court of Turin to represent the Italian government at Rossini's fete.

He gets very proxy presently, the noble Signor PERUZZI, but the idea of the Minister of the Interior's presence just now is very popular. It is as though Sir GEORGE GREY had gone down to Stratford the day when England strove to honor her Swan and failed. When Florence the fair, by her deputy Count PERTICARI in a trembling voice, has presented the medallion, and the Syndic of Pesaro has replied, and when Signor REGOLI, editor of Il Pirata (desperately suggestive name of a journal that cribs its intelligence!), has made an awfully long and tedious "éloge" on Rossini, and when the Minister of the Interior has had his say, the first ceremony is over, and the crowd troop off to the railway station. Here is an actual statue—not the statuesque effigy honored of Firenze, but a heavy, solid thing. It is to be uncovered at three precisely; and, thanks to the editor of the Pirata and the proxy Minister—it wants but little to three now. There is a large pavilion for the uncovering business, and six hundred and fifty executives—singers and instrumentalists—are in the pavilion to perform a Rossinian programme apropos of the occasion. The "Gazza Ladra" overture strikes up, and the effect from the mass is indescribable. Then comes the Minister of the Interior and removes the veil which covered the statue. Again they shout—"Viva, viva!" and forth bursts from the immense orchestra the Inno a Rossini. This hymn is a curious pot-pourri of Rossini's airs—melodies selected from every opera and every theme he wrote, and set by MERCADANTE, the good old blind musician, to MERCANTINI's words. The effect is overwhelming; sixty first fiddles alone, and the remaining orchestra in keeping, move and play like a single man. The universal demand for an encore brings one, and the whole hymn again played through produces no less a sensation the second time. Then a speech from the representative of Roman Railways (though what Roman Railways have to do with Rossini, Pesaro only knows); and then the overture to "Semiramide." This too is encored by a general cry. The conductor turns, bows, smiles, and directs the orchestra to repeat the overture from the andante. "No, no, no, no; all; all, no, no, no!" The vivacious Italian crowd negatives the abbreviation with twenty thousand waving arms and heads; and the overture is bisé from the beginning.

It is nearly evening by this time, and time to prepare, but the Marquis PEROLI, syndic of Bologna, stays the people by coming forward. He holds in his hand a despatch from his own city, and he tells them that Bologna is so proud of the Swan of Pesaro, who was educated there, that the municipality has that day changed the name of the Piazza SAN GIACOMO to the Piazza ROSSINI, and that a marble slab on the door of the Lyceum of Musique tells the fact thus:

Here entered as pupil, and hence departed as prince of the musical sciences, Gioachino Rossini; and Bologna in eternal token of honor has given his name to this place and has fixed this stone 21 August 1864.

In the evening Pesaro bursts with light; on the great square tri-colored obelisks, everywhere else lampadaries, lampions, mottoes, banners, padelle, and fireworks. The streets are a perfect block. The great square is taken up by the national guard of Bologna, directed by ANTONELLI—not the Cardinal however. A concert at nine o'clock draws off a portion of the crowd, who simply block up the theatre and have to be stowed about the stage. The concert is Rossinian of course—Rossini's music and a cantata in his honor written by Mercantini, and composed by Pacini, his friend and confrère. It is a very poor production, but what of that rock the happy audience? They shout their applause, for Rossini is in their thoughts, and whatever fites him pleases them.

There is not much more. By midnight Pesaro is dark and disposed to rest; by next morning the 20,000 visitors are flying away to their own homes out of the red roofs and from the tri-colored obelisks. The little town is now quiet and dull, and order claims its own; but Pesaro is glad to have contributed something towards the fame of one man, who has made Pesaro famous for ever.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, OCT. 15, 1864.

German Opera.

The return of Mr. GROVER's admirable company is now the absorbing theme of musical interest in Boston, and has filled the Boston Theatre with very large and brilliant audiences every night this week. The charm and the success are pretty sure to go on greatening for three weeks longer; for the season is to be one of twenty nights, besides Saturday Matinées, and, besides the operas of this week, there is public promise of Fidelio, La Dame Blanche, the Huquenots, Tannhäuser, and Gounod's Mireille—the last two for the first time here—while we have also private assurance of Mozart's Don Juan, Zauberflöte, Figaro, and possibly Die Entführung aus dem Serail.

Truly a most tempting programme! Particularly when we know that Mr. Grover brings a company fully adequate, in numbers, talent and appointments, for its complete artistic execution. When they were here before, and took us by surprise, they soon convinced us that they constituted on the whole, considering both solo talent and those important accessories of which the Italians here have never made enough account, and which are indispensable to the true effect of any opera as a whole—about the strongest lyrical troupe that ever came among us. It is now all that it was and more. FORMES, still essentially the king of basses, has been added to it. Another charming soprano, Mme. JOHANNA ROTTER, reinforces Frederici and Johannsen. An Italian tenor, Sig. TAMARO, might (as we heard it hinted) have been spared till to-morrow, seeing that we are rich enough to-day in Habelmann and Himmer. A new first baritone, Herr ISADOR LEHMANN, from the Berlin Royal Opera, is yet to make his debut, and a baritone was the voice most needed. We have several new second ladies and soubrettes. Then the chorus is enlarged to nearly forty voices, the like of which in freshness, sweetness, power and purity of ensemble we have not had upon our stage before. And the orchestra, although not to be named with those of the great theatres in Germany, where you hear seventy and even ninety instruments, is the largest and the best which the Boston Theatre has ever known. CARL ANSCHUTZ, too, is still the capital conductor.

With this rare show of means and purposes with character established here last Spring, and fashionably endorsed so lately in New York, the German Opera entered upon a new series of triumphs here last Monday evening in Martha, followed on successive evenings by Faust, Robert le Diable, Der Freyschütz, La Juive, and Faust again for this afternoon. And here, before particularizing on each performance, we ask indulgence for a few general remarks, more by way of wholesome precaution, and for the sake of seasonably lending what little force we can to that right direction in Art, which, however bravely begun in this or any other enterprise, is always endangered by opposing currents in this country, than from any spirit of fault-finding. Our idea of the right direction is no narrow one; with us it simply means that Art be pursued primarily as Art, and that "business," popularity and fashion should be secondary.

The German Opera has bravely met and conquered the obstacles that rose up to dispute its passage at the outset, such as the ignorance and prejudice of an Italianized public taste, distrust of novelty, scepticism with regard to German voices, lack of the prestige of fashion, and so forth. It has now to meet a foe more dangerous; it has now to bear the harder trial of prosperity. Prosperity demoralizes many good things in this country. Theatres of Art, places of amusement, hotels, restaurants, clubs, even political parties, begin with earning a good name by doing the good thing; after a while, alas! we see them trading on the good name, while getting more and more careless of the good thing. Success itself is the highest trump card, in the eyes of the unbelieving speculator; this he finds to be the best advertisement; and not what is best, but what will advertise best, he counts as his most solid capital. Is he a dealer in Art, say in Opera? he not only covers the city walls with flaming posters; he turns Art itself into mere advertisement, selects such pieces as may best serve the purpose of advertisement, pieces whose announcement is the surest advertisement of a crowd,—the crowd being the main thing, the Art coolly dismissed as a once useful servant now no longer so much needed. It is this "business element" which has first helped to build up and has then demoralized many a noble enterprise of Art.

Now when the German Opera came to us last Spring, it took high ground and made its appeal to the serious artistic feeling and conscience of the real music-lovers, thereby building up its reputation. If it should now, this prestige won, proceed to act as if quite content with this endorsement once for all, straightway forgetting the endorsers, but making its appeal in their name to those who follow crowds and fashion and have no knowledge and no consciences in Art, it would be only yielding to that temptation of prosperity, which so few have been able to resist. If the programmes grow commonplace and "popular" instead of intrinsically and artistically fine; if the cheaper success of hacknied things is weighed against the cost and difficulty of bringing out the best things possible; if there is careless preparation, hum-drum running through with operas by way of doing as much business as can be crowded into a week, and reaping the largest, quickest harvest with the smallest outlay, then the enterprise has lost its soul, becomes suspect and infidel with its first earnest friends, and is really on the downward way, morally bankrupt, although it may have still a considerable harvest to reap from the first planting.

Such fears began to suggest themselves to not a few, after the first two performances this week, from several symptoms both of management and of performances; the earlier they find expression, the likelier to be dissipated. Those symptoms were carelessness in execution, of the orchestra especially; a lack of that life and spirit with which the same things were given before; substitution of inferior artists in leading roles, while the rightful owners thereof were held in reserve; the beginning with the easiest instead of with the best, &c. Nor should we pass over the fact, that to some extent the wrong end of the repertoire (for real lovers of German art at least) has been put foremost. Martha is trivial and hacknied, and even Faust grows dull, in comparison with those masterworks of German opera, which none of us have heard half enough, many of them not at all. Fidelio, which made the greatest impression of any work on its single presentation last Spring, would have been the very name to charm by at the outset, and would have been fresher at the end of a whole week's run, than all the kaleidoscopic promise that we had. Then consider: Out of six performances (and five operas) this week, only one, the Freyschütz, is strictly a German product written for the German stage; Faust and the "Jewess" are by French composers; Robert was written for the Grand Operas while Martha is more French than German in it, spirit. Not that these are not good things, all, and such as ought to take their turn; but more important and more German things have been too long waiting—that is all.

But now, having hinted our fears, we may tell what has since happened to relieve us of them in a considerable measure. The third night was altogether better. Robert le Diable, although written for the French, is the most German, the most genial and the best of Meyerbeer's operas. It has his freshest, finest inspirations in it. The music, from beginning to end, nearly all of it, interests and charms us, and does not stale. The music of the part of Alice is truly exquisite, genuine flowers of melody, and the whole role is one of the most beautiful in any opera. Mme. ROTTER, whose petite person and plain face did not suit the dramatic requirements of the Lady in Martha, was admirable here. Her true soprano voice, though slightly veiled, has that real German heart sweetness which wins its way to your heart, sweeter still as it keeps on. She sings with real feeling, never overwrought, and her execution is artistic to a degree not very often exceeded. Her dramatic conceptions and rendering are life-like and consistent.

FORMES was all himself, in grand presence, voice, strong passion and intellectual magnetism in his great part of Bertram. Surely we never heard him sing better, while dramatically the thing was perfect. HIMMER, noble in his tenor voice and noble in personal bearing, always dignified and graceful, always the chaste, artistic, telling singer, made the best Robert we have known here. The concerted pieces by these three went to a charm; and that most difficult trio, unaccompanied, at the end of the second act, had to be repeated. Mme. JOHANNSEN, true artist with fine lyrical instinct, sang the florid and arduous music of the Princess with rare feeling, finish and effect. She acts well in everything. Then who could be better for the light and pretty tenor part of Raimbault than Herr HABELMANN, who acted it all truly, and sang his ballad in the first act, and his part of the comical duet in which the devil fools him, in his most charming voice and manner. Add to this, that the chorus, male and female, made a rich, clear, fresh ensemble of tone, always true to the mark, and that Anschütz and his large orchestra rendered the rich instrumentation with great care and spirit, and it will be seen that Robert, always more than half a failure heretofore in Boston, was this time fairly re-dered and made known to an enthusiastic audience. Indeed all seemed to do their best, and this was the first great success of the week. The only drawback was in the awkward machinery of the resurrection of the Nuns scene,—indeed the almost absence of scene—which was refreshingly queer in spite of some good dancing.

Thursday night brought still new assurance in the fine opera Der Freyschütz, with the one weak part as it was given before, that of Caspar, grandly supplied by FORMES! This change would hardly have been made, but that some of the "fears" above alluded to grew general and found their way to the ears of the management. It looks as if it would all go right now. We must go to press before hearing the Freyschütz. Three nights in succession has that great conservative, the Devil, figured in the Opera; first as Mephistopheles, then as Bertram, then as Zamiel; let honesty take courage from the way in which all three are thwarted, and never be afraid to face the Copperheads!

To glance back at the first two nights: Martha passed off with less life than before. All were disappointed not to have FORMES in his old part of Plunkett; Herr STREINCKE sings and acts faithfully, but the quality of his baritone is not very clear. HABELMANN was a good Lionel, but hardly the equal of Himmer in that part. FREDERICI is the most charming of Nancies; but we fear lest the rich reedy vibration of her delicate and pure voice may become impaired by singing in so low a register. Mme. ROTTER won upon us steadily by sterling qualities, but for reasons above noted we would have still preferred JOHANNSEN. There were careless slips in the orchestra, and at every fortissimo climax the dreadful bellow of a huge brass instrument in the corner banished all thought but of itself. The unruly monster has since been subdued, we are happy to say.

Faust impressed us less and less as a great musical composition in the best sense. We do get weary of a very large part of the music. But we do not care just now to obtrude our minority report. The performance suffered incalculably by the putting of the Italian tenor TAMARO in the part of Faust, instead of HIMMER as before. We not only missed his dignity of person, his nobility of voice and singing, but we felt that FREDERICI's almost perfect rendering of Gretchen, as she used to sing the love scenes with her husband, was now rendered impossible. And yet her Gretchen was still very beautiful. Nor is Sig. Tamaro without merit as a singer. HERMANN was great as usual in Mephistopheles; only the grotesqueness of it this time was occasionally overdone. That prolonging of the trill on a deep note to a length as painful as extraordinary was simply absurd; a mill wheel can keep on still longer, but who finds music in it?

Musical Correspondence.

HARTFORD, CONN., OCT. 9. At last we have had an Opera—a bona fide Opera—not such an one as has been over and over advertised heretofore as having a "full and efficient chorus and orchestra"—said chorus, in reality, consisting of from three to six persons, and said "orchestra" made up of one or two violin boxes, a piano-forte stool, a violin and piano, a French horn with no mouth-piece, and a double bass fiddle,—but an opera, with an orchestra of twenty-seven different instruments, with a trained chorus of about forty—playing and singing just as they do in New York and Boston. Didn't it seem good,—after having been humbugged so many times,—to see even the twenty-seven chairs placed ready for the orchestra—(who knew but that there were more chairs after all than performers)—No! every seat was occupied, and ANSCHÜTZ came in at precisely 8 o'clock and immediately gave his signal for the introduction to "Faust." What original and beautiful harmonics, by the way, those are! Sig. TAMARO sang the part of "Faust," and with great acceptance, although we were disappointed in not hearing Herr HIMMER.

HERMANN was great, as he always is, and FREDERICI won hosts of friends by her refined, natural, totally unaffected rendering of Marguerite. How delicious her voice is through its whole compass! Allyn Hall was filled—with prices at $2.00 and $1.50—and the enthusiasm was equally high.

Mr. GROVER had the honor of giving us the first complete Opera since the city was founded. It was the best entertainment ever produced in Hartford.

Miss KELLOGG, the prima donna, has sung here within the last three weeks, with her usual success. Madame VARIAN, E. HOFFMANN, MOLLENHAU, (Violoncellist,) and J. R. THOMAS, gave a concert here last week to a full house.

NEW YORK, Oct. 11.—The German Opera season closed with one of the noblest productions of musical dramatic art—Don Giovanni. The Italian commenced with one of the flattest manufactures of the modern opera mill—Il Trovatore. We regretted to part with the German company, spite of its many deficiencies. We could not join in the cry, "le roi est mort, vive le roi!" MARETZEK has this time made use of a new policy, with which to tickle the palate of the amusement seeking public. Mystery was the order of the day; the public was almost persuaded into the belief that it had a judgment; and the press, which formerly trumpeted forth in intoxicating tones the glories of what was as yet unheard by us poor mortals, this time withheld all preliminary praise and puffery and merely indicated the coming performances. But the initiated, with solemn and knowing faces, whispered here and there of Marezek's new singers—admirable!—no better ever heard! &c. The first week is over, awakening no enthusiasm. The present company is far behind that of last year. In my next letter its members shall defile before you.

Mr. GROVER, in the short time he remained here, perhaps spoiled us a little. There was a freshness, a life about the whole company, that exhilarated. Now, we find the old "shent-per-shent" physiognomies leavening the mass of the concern; stale operas, phlegmatically led by Marezek's baton, in the stereotyped humdrum way; in short, the Art impulse is wanting, and in spite of business, it is impossible for an opera management to ignore Art and yet succeed. New works are promised; let us hope that they will not long be withheld.

One fact is now undeniable, the day of exclusively Italian Opera is gone by here. The American will have progress,—every year increases his experience in Art—and although he still likes to boast occasionally that he is a self-taught man, the conviction gains upon him with every fresh insight, that he can only find the how and the why, knowledge and model, in the works of great masters of all countries—especially in those who grounded and immortalized the German school,—Handel, Bach, Gluck, Mozart, Haydn, Beethoven, &c. This onward striving of our studious youth must necessarily spread more or less through the whole people; we shall at last hear no more of exclusive Italian or German opera management; but the union of all forces in to-day this, and to-morrow that school, will lead the nation to the knowledge and enjoyment of the chef-d'œuvres of every school. This is the future of opera management here, and from it, all that is narrow-minded and nativistic must step into the back-ground, as contrary to the very being of the spirit of art, which is essentially cosmopolitan.

The first Philharmonic public rehearsal took place on Saturday afternoon. We had Beethoven's Eroica Symphony, Liszt's Praludes, and Weber's Oberon Overture. Here is the programme for the season:

SYMPHONIES: Beethoven's Eroica; Mendelssohn's "Scotch;" Schumann's No. 1, in B flat; Liszt's "Faust Symphony."

OVERTURES: Gluck's Iphigenie; Mozart's Magic Flute; Beethoven's Egmont; Weber's Oberon; Mendelssohn's Midsummer Night's Dream; Schumann's Manfred; Gade's Hamlet; Berlioz's King Lear; Liszt's Les Preludes; Bargiel's Medea.

WITH CHORUS (German Liederkrantz): Beethoven's Choral Symphony; Credo from Liszt's Graner Mass; "Frutres ergo," by Palestrina; Mendelssohn's Der Menschheit Würde; Schubert's "Mondschein-Sündenböcke."

LANCELOT.

NEW YORK, OCT. 10. To take up my pen to write again to "Dwight's," seems like sitting down to hob-nob with some trusty old friend—a pleasant chat with some kindred spirit. And yet in these days of civil and political discord and dissension, with the air resonant with the rattle of musketry and the roar of artillery, it seems strange, almost heartless, to write of so harmonious, and yet inharmonious, a thing as music. In fact, one would naturally expect from "our correspondent" details of some sanguinary conflict, with the record of its fearful scenes, its terrible surroundings. It is well that it is not so; that there can be words written and read, that do not bear the tinge of human blood, that do not carry sorrow and sadness into many hearts. It is well that we can still write of peaceful sounds and scenes, unmixed with aught to chill or terrify. Let us hope that ere long the voice of the whole nation may be raised in the old choral "Nun danket alle Gott" (Now let us all praise God), as on the blood-stained field of Leuthen, in thanksgiving to the great God of battles, who has led us on to that crowning Victory that bringeth Peace!

There will be music in many a heart now torn and sad; there will be "Glorias," and "Jubilates," and "Te Deums" over all the land; there will be one grand "Hallelujah Chorus," that will rise in one mighty sound, and in its majesty make thrones tremble, in its solemnity chant the requiem of departed heroes, in its beauty soothe the grief of the sorrowing, in its distant but never dying echoes, sing the pæans of the nation, "Glory to God on high, and on earth Peace, good will to men!"

The Italian Opera season has commenced under auspicious circumstances. The short and successful season of German Opera, was a presage of the like success of the Maretzek company. The public mind seems to be in just that state that requires the brilliancy and gaiety of some place of amusement, and the Opera has come just in time. The audience that welcomed Maretzek, as he ascended the Conductor's chair on Monday night last, was of more than wonted brilliancy and magnificence. The display of rich toilets, laces, diamonds, silks, would rather dispute the idea that we were engaged in a terrible war, with sorrow and suffering on every side. Never did there seem a more joyful, happy set of faces, never a more cheerful sound of voices, never a more rich and elegantly attired audience, than was present on that opening night, to hear "Il Trovatore," with CAROZZI-ZUCCHI, and MASSIMILIANI, the new soprano and tenor. The natural timidity and fright of a "first appearance" was evident at the first notes of both these artists, but ere the opera concluded, this gave way before the hearty, assuring applause of the audience, and they made a most favorable impression.

The programme of the week has been "Trovatore," "Traciata" with BRAMBILLA, MASSIMILIANI, and SCBINI; "Lucrezia Borgia," with CAROZZI-ZUCCHI, MORENZI, LOTTI, and SCBINI; and "Lucia" with MISS HARRIS, &c.

The success of the artists has been in a measure marred by severe colds and hoarseness, which it is to be hoped will not prove chronic, as is so often the case. Max to-day publishes a good humored letter in regard to this matter, and his vivid portrayal of the trials and annoyances of an operatic manager is truthful and convincing. This cause, it is to be hoped, will soon be removed, and never more disappoint both manager and public.

This week we are to hear "Trovatore," "Un Ballo in Maschera," "Faust," and "Lucrezia Borgia" at the Brooklyn Academy.

The revivals of the "Huguenots," and "Prophete," and also the new works of Gounod, promised, will soon be realized. Without a detailed criticism, it is safe to say, that Maretzek has as strong a company as that of last season with Medori and Mazzoleni. The slender little Massimiliani would look small alongside of Mazzoleni, but he stands comparison well. An eminent New York critic has pronounced him "one and a half Mazzoleni," but, of course, there are very many different views and tastes.

The familiar faces and voices of Lotti, Morensi—both greatly improved—Bellini, Susini and Weinlich, are not unwelcome; and Max Maretzek's presence in the orchestra is a sufficient guarantee that that branch of the service will not be neglected.

Our vivacious, "slap-dash," indomitable friend, C. JEROME HOPKINS ("Timothy Trill") has made his introductory bow to us in the following shape:—

NEW YORK, September 20, 1864.

MR. C. JEROME HOPKINS, (Cooper Union.) Dear Sir: Believing that the art of Music is progressive, and that American composers are destined in time to occupy as high positions as our painters, poets and sculptors now do, we hereby invite you to produce some of your orchestral and piano works in our city, as from the pen of one whose past and present labors to popularize High Art command the honorable esteem of fellow artists and the high consideration of Yours, very truly, (Signed by sundry eminent personages, some however of dubitable musical proclivities). And

DEAR SIR OR MADAM:—

You are politely requested to accept the enclosed Complimentary Ticket to Mr. Hopkins' first Concert in New York for nearly four years. The accompanying letter of invitation, signed by a long list of our most prominent citizens in business, letters and in society, show how high a degree of respect is entertained by them for the talents of this young American Composer and Pianist, whose works already number several hundred, in nearly every style of this difficult Art, and whose philanthropic efforts in the design and carrying out of the "Orphan Free Chorister School of Brooklyn," have gained for their originator so enviable a reputation.

This Concert will be the first ever given (with orchestra) in America, consisting mainly of the works of our Composer, and he a self-taught American who has never enjoyed the benefits even of observation which a tour of foreign travel affords.

I commend this method to all who propose following in Mr. Hopkins's footsteps. It may not insure success, but it certainly has the merit of novelty. Mr. Hopkins, in a most refreshing manner, announces that on this occasion "he will enjoy the valuable assistance of the following able talent:—Mrs. J. H. BARCLAY, contralto; Mr. ERNEST PERRING, tenor; Mr. E. TRASTUM, pianist; Mr. A. DAVIS, pianist and accompanist, and a full orchestra from the Philharmonic Society." It is to be hoped that the audience will enjoy this "able talent" as much as Mr. Hopkins predicates for himself.

The following will be my concluding extract:

Mr. Hopkins will have the honor of producing on this occasion, an entire novelty, the following selection from his works: "Two Movements from his Sinfonia 'Life';" "The Orchestral Dirge No. 4;" "A Wedding March for Grand Orchestra;" The famous Prayer from "Otello," arranged for one hand alone as a piano solo;" "Liszt's celebrated 'Storm March,' arranged for three of the Driggs Patent Violin Pianos, with two sounding-boards."

⊞ Besides several Songs with Orchestral Accompaniment. ⊞

All this on Tuesday evening, Oct. 11, at Irving Hall.

I had the pleasure a few days ago, of listening to Wm. A. KING's performance on Erben's new organ, built for the Roman Catholic Cathedral in Memphis, Tenn. I think you have already had a detailed description of the organ. It is one of Erben's most successful efforts, and it seems almost a matter of regret that it should be taken from our city. The exhibition, usual upon the completion of a new organ, in this case has been in a great measure a private one.

Mr. King's performance included the overture to "Semiramide" and "William Tell" and his own "Wedding March," and organ arrangement of "Home Sweet Home." The exhibition was in every degree satisfactory, but made us long for the time to come when we may sit down to a regular "Organ Concert," such as you only have in your Music Hall, under the inspiring shade of "the great organ."

T. W. M.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Dissen & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

The soldier sleepeth, he is not dead! L. Heath. 30

This song ought to be good, for the great Union R. Dodge says that it was composed expressly for his concerts, and that he paid the author therefor the "sum of fifty dollars." It is a very pretty and affecting ballad.

Evening is sweet. (Chanson de Magali.) Song or Duet. "Mireille." 40

One of the best, and some would call it the prettiest piece in the opera. It is a kind of musical play, contained in the responsive song or duet sung by Vincent and Mireille. The poem includes a number of beautiful thoughts. The piece may be sung by one voice, as the two voices are not employed at the same time.

The Soldier to his Mother. Ballad. B. Covert. 30

It differs from most of the recent soldier songs, in the fact that the hero is neither sick, nor wounded, nor dying. It is written by a gentleman in the army, and is very beautiful.

At your feet, behold! I remain. (A vos pieds, hélas, me voilà.) "Mireille." 30

Neurotic and affecting. The petition of Mireille to her father.

Instrumental Music.

Chœur des Moissonneurs, de l'opera. "Mireille." W. Krüger. 40

This "Chorus of Harvesters," is at once very original and very brilliant. Those who try it will not find it like any other piece. It is, at the same time, not difficult, containing small notes in the harder parts, which can be left out at pleasure.

Souvenirs de l'opera "Mireille." H. Rosellen. 60

Contains four of the principal airs of the opera, skillfully combined and varied.

Gems from "Mireille." J. C. Johnson. 50

Contains six of the most brilliant pieces of the opera. La Farandole, Magali, Song of Taven, Savoyard air, Leaf-gatherer's chorus, and Harvest chorus, arranged in the simplest manner. The modulations between the airs are short, and all is made as easy as possible.

Marche funebre. Piano and Violin. J. Eichberg. 35

Another of Mr. Eichberg's excellent series.

Six morceaux for Cabinet Organ. L. H. Southard.

No. 3. Penitence. 35

" 4. In Memoriam. 35

The preceding numbers have already been announced. These are somewhat different in character.

Books.

THE CHORUS WREATH; a collection of Sacred and Secular Choruses, selected from the best Oratorios, Operas, and Glee Books. For Musical Conventions, Societies, Singing schools and the Home circle.

The first half of this book contains a most careful selection of Oratorio music. The second half contains an equally careful selection of Glee and Opera choruses. It is sufficient praise to this collection of glees to say, that they are fully equal to those in the Boston Glee Book. While they are by the best English composers, a number of them have been known to but a very few of our singers. "Old May Morning," "See the Chariot at hand," and others, cannot fail to be favorites.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 615.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, OCT. 29, 1864.

VOL. XXIV. No. 16.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Half a dozen of Beethoven's Contemporaries.

II. ANTONIO SALIERI.

(Continued from page 322.)

On Thursday, March 1, 1792, Leopold, the Emperor, followed his brother Joseph "to the other side," as the Germans express it (jenseits), after an illness of but 36 hours. At the coronation of his successor, Francis I., as King of Bohemia and as Emperor of Germany,—the latter at Frankfurt, 14 July—Salieri again had the direction of the music, which consisted mainly of the same pieces, which had been performed on similar occasions two years before.

Changes in the direction of the opera and other causes occurred, which in succeeding years relieved Salieri from his duty of delivering an annual composition for the stage. Still the number of his works was largely increased. I shall content myself, and doubtless more than content most readers, by simply adding a chronological list of these works. The little that remains to be said of the quiet life, which for thirty-three years the composer led, mostly in Vienna, can then close the narrative.

1792. "Catilina," 2 acts, text by Abbate Casti, never performed. It was a tragi-comic work in which the chief comic character was, Marcus Tullius Cicero! One Italian wrote, another composed it; of course it was all right.

Salieri seems also in this year to have composed a part of Martin's "Princesse de Babylone," and to have gone on with the next work noted, viz:

1793. "Il Mondo alla rovescia," which he had formerly begun for Venice, under the title "L'isola capricciosa," 2 acts, brought out under the direction of Baron von Braun, Jan. 13, 1795. In this text men have the duties, cares, characters and feelings of women, and vice versa. The men are the blushing and modest objects of the stormy passion of the other sex. It proved a bad subject for the stage, and a failure.

1794. "Eraclito e Democrito," text by Gamera, 2 acts. Salieri calls this in his own papers, "Operetta buffa filosofica," a very good descriptive title for a work which presents the weeping and laughing philosophers. It was produced August 13, and had a fair run until superseded by

"Palmyra," "opera eroica comica," in 2 acts, text by Gamera, drawn from the "Le Princesse de Babylone," sent to Salieri from Paris, as already noted. None of the music which he had composed to the French text was retained to the Italian words, for the same reasons which had led him to compose the "Azur" anew, when Joseph II. wished for the "Tarare." This was one of the master's most successful and famous works, and in 1803 was reproduced in the Theater an der Wien, revised and with alterations by him. It not only made the round of the German stage in Italian or in German translation, but in 1812 was brought out at Warsaw in the Polish language.

In this opera appears for the first time, so far as I know, or at least recollect, a vocal unaccompanied quartet, Silenzio facciasi, an effect made common enough since, but then a new and striking proof of the simple means by which true genius produces great effects. This was invariably repeated.

1796. For the annual concerts for the benefit of the widows and orphans of Vienna musicians, established by Gassmann in 1771, and especially to celebrate the 25th anniversary of the Association, Salieri composed a cantata entitled "La riconoscenza," consisting of a chorus, recitative and air with concerted instruments. The vocalist was the composer's pupil, Gassmann's second daughter, Theresa. Salieri had taught her ten years gratis and had made her one of the ornaments of the Vienna stage. Not expecting, with his feeble frame, to live to see the 50th anniversary of the society, Salieri wrote at the end of this cantata:

"The author of this Cantata sends greeting and peace from the lap of eternity to that composer who shall write the Thanksgiving Cantata for the celebration of the half century, and to all who shall assist in the performances.

Vienna, 1796.

SALIERI."

His opera this year was "Il Moro," opera buffa, 2 acts, text by Gamera, performed August 7. It had some excellent numbers, but was no success. Orgone, the lover of the piece, sings always in falsetto, and is asked by the Moor why that is? Orgone replies:

Ella sappia
Che si danno fra noi certi spetaroli
Chiamati opere serie e che son veri
Mostri dell' arte. In esse,
Fur sempre i maschi amanti
Che dicono mille e mille cose tenere,
Per legge teatral di dentro genere.

[You must know that with us there is a kind of plays called Opere Serie, which are monsters of Art. In these it has always been the rule to have the lovers who say a thousand upon thousand of tender things, of the neuter gender.] So Orgone must sing falsetto in order to make love like the Eunuchs, who performed the heroes in Handel's and all the other Italian operas of his time and for long years after. A satire that hits also such parts as the lover in Rossini's "Romeo and Juliet," sung by women.

1797. "I tre Filosofi," also by Gamera, in which the systems of Pirro, Diogenes and Pythagoras appear in ludicrous contest, remained a fragment.

"Falstaff, ossia le tre burle," opera buffa, in 2 acts, text by Defranceschi. First performance Jan. 3d, 1798. Of course the subject is the "Merry Wives of Windsor." The overture is lively English contre-dance music, the cue being taken from the first words of the introduction: "Per si torni di nuovo a ballar!" (Then begin the dance anew.) In the opening scene Bar-dolph sits talking in his sleep, in a low monotone until the last note, which is very high and loud; for Falstaff enters and gives him a punch in the ribs at that point to wake him. It is curious that one of the airs is in German—sung by Mistress Ford ("Ah, the men—I know them well!") No. 3 is a duet: "La stessa la stessa."

Ten variations upon which, by Ludwig van Beethoven, are advertised in the Vienna Zeitung of March 2d, two months after the first performance of the opera.

A still greater compliment from the same source was paid him a few months later. That proud, impetuous young genius, moving in the higher circles of Vienna society, among princes and counts of the empire, as an equal with equals, the dedications of whose works thus far,—except a few of minor importance, and the Sonatas dedicated to Haydn—had been to kings, princes and persons of noble birth, published his opus 12, with the following title: "Tre Sonate per il clavicembalo o Forte-Piano, con un Violino, Composte e dedicate al Sig. Antonio Salieri, primo Maestro di capella della Corte Imperiale di Vienna, &c., &c., dal Sig. Luigi van Beethoven, Opera 12. A Vienna, Presso Antonia e Comp." Beethoven had been studying dramatic composition with Salieri, and this dedication was a pure mark of esteem and gratitude—it was really a compliment.

1799. Two cantatas: "Der Tiroler Landsturm," in German, and "La riconoscenza dei Tirolesi," in Italian, composed for the benefit of the suffering Tyrolese, and performed at a grand concert in Vienna, belong to this year; as also a Mass, with Graduale, Offertorium and Te Deum, all in double chorus, intending for performance on occasion of the declaration of peace with the French republic; but as the piece was not concluded, the music was for the time laid aside.

1800. "Cesare in Farmacusa," opera eroi-comica, 2 acts, text by Defranceschi, was produced June 2, successfully. Among his notes upon this work is one which Mosel cites. There is a bass air in the first act in which Tullo laments the danger of starving; "the air is comic for the reason," writes the composer, "that when the comic actor weeps upon the stage, the audience must laugh."

"Angiolina, ossia il matrimonio per sussuro," opera buffa, 2 acts, text by Defranceschi, produced October 22, had some success through the excellent music, though the text was almost beneath criticism.

1801. "Annibale in Capua," Opera Seria, 2 acts, text by Advocate Sagrafi, composed at, and for the opening of the new theatre in Trieste. It was successful there, but nowhere else does it appear to have been put upon the stage, and for a very good reason; Salieri had of course to accommodate his music to the powers of his singers, and the leading character was written for a Castrato, as in olden times was so common. Think of the mighty Hannibal, quavering and roulading in soprano!

From Trieste the composer was to have gone on to Venice; but the prospect of peace and the wish to conduct his double choruses, at the celebration of it, was stronger than his desire to earn money or laurels by so every-day a matter as composing an opera. On arriving in Vienna he found a new invitation to Paris awaiting him, with the first act of a text ("Les Troyennes," by R. Bernard); but this he also declined.

1802. "La bella selvaggia," opera in 2 acts, text by Bertati, not brought out. The subject was not that of the Ballet "Das Waldmädchen," (girl of the forest), a theme from which was varied by Beethoven, and of the opera by Weber, but a wild girl supposed to be found by the Spaniards on an American island.

"Die Neger" (the Negros), a heroic-comic German opera, two acts, text by Friedrich Treitschke, first given in the Theater an der Wien, Nov. 10, 1804, on the stage, where one year later Beethoven's "Fidelio" met such ill success.

Cantata for Archduke Ferdinand, prepared in anticipation of the delivery of the archduchess. As both mother and child died (Sept. 19, 1802) of course the piece was not performed.

1803. Overture, entr' acts and choruses to Kotzebue's "The Hussites before Naumburg," a noble work of the stamp of Beethoven's "Egmont" music.

"Gesù al limbo," sacred cantata by Prividali, composed for the Empress, and sung at the palace. The overture—or rather symphony—was a piece of programme music, which, for its ludicrous want of intelligibility, unless heard with a running commentary before the eyes, would do honor to any of the great lights of the so-called "new school" composers. This piece of music was intended to depict the entire life of Jesus in tones. Accordingly in Salieri's score may be read, often to passages of not more than four to eight bars of music, such notes as these: "Gesù in mezzo di dottori," (Jesus in the midst of the doctors); "Arrestamento di Gesù," (Arrest of Jesus); "Viene interrogato" (his examination) &c.

1804. "Requiem" Mass, composed for performance at his own funeral obsequies, whenever they might take place.

On the 8th December Salieri had the satisfaction of conducting the Mass for double chorus, composed five years before. It was given upon occasion of the celebration of the adoption by Francis I. of the title of Emperor of Austria.

1805. "Habsburg." This was a long poem of a historic-allegoric character, with no variety of rhythm, and merely divided into stanzas, not intended for music,—but as an offering to the new Emperor of Austria. The author, Ferdinand von Geramb, it seems, formed the plan of arranging a national festival the next year, at which his poem should be sung as a Cantata. But hardly was the music ready, when the question came up, whether an Austrian nation was to exist. October 17, Ulm capitulated to the French army; on the 30th Bernadotte entered Salzburg, and on Nov. 16, Murat marched into Vienna. Beethoven's "Fidelio" was given to an audience mainly of French,—but Salieri's Cantata in praise of the Habsburgs, it is hardly necessary to add, was laid upon the shelf. It was of course no loss to the musical world.

Another Mass, and church pieces suited to the times—a Miserere, a De profundis, a Salvum fac populum, &c., employed Salieri's pen during the last half of this year.

At this point Mosel gives a summary of Salieri's other compositions down to this time. They were, an organ concerto, 1775; two piano-forte concertos, 1778; one for violin, oboe and violoncello, 1774; a symphony, 1776; five serenatas for various instruments; 40 canons for three voices—"all written," says Salieri, "during my walks or when in the company of musicians or amateurs, who could sing them on the spot"—more than a hundred vocal pieces, for church, theatre or the private circle; twenty-eight vocal pieces with piano-forte accompaniment, and various smaller matters. A collection containing twenty-five of those canons (a tre voci) and a terzette was published in 1815, with the title "Scherzi armonici Vocali."

(To be continued.)

History of the Leipzig Gewandhaus Concerts.

II.

MENDELSSOHN. 1835-47.

Rightly to appreciate what Mendelssohn did for the Gewandhaus Concerts—and through them for the general propagation of better ideas of what musical performances should be—we ought to know in what state they were when the baton was put into his hand.

Up to that time, the Kapellmeister conducted only those compositions in which voices, whether solo or choral, took part; all other works were directed by the Concertmeister, i. e., the leader of the violins. A certain mechanical, jog-trot kind of correctness had been acquired; where a forte stood, the band played loud, and where a piano, softly; but graduation of light and shade, intelligent phrasing, all that gives poetical charm to a performance, were unknown ideas. Warmly as Mendelssohn speaks of the orchestra when he entered upon his duties, its excellence was but comparative; for I am told as a positive fact by one who can speak with authority, that at that time only two, or perhaps three, of the violinists could play at all decently; but one tenorist could be depended upon, as also but one violoncellist. The members of the orchestra, who had also to play in the church services and in the theatre, were miserably paid; and therefore took the first opportunity of obtaining a more profitable post.

Such was the state of things, when in January, 1835, Mendelssohn, at that time Kapellmeister at Düsseldorf, was invited to take the direction. His letters to Herr Schleinitz in reply deserve to be printed in letters of gold, so noble, so unselfish, in short, such a gentleman do they show him to have been.

The first concert under Mendelssohn's direction took place on the 4th October, 1835. I cannot do better than translate some passages from a letter to his family written two days after the concert. "I cannot tell you how satisfied I am with this commencement, and with the whole way in which my position here begins. It is a quiet, orderly business position; one sees that the institution has existed for fifty-six years; and with this the people seem to be well inclined and friendly to me and my music. The orchestra is very good, thoroughly musical, and I fancy in half a year it will be still better; for with what love and affection do these people receive them—that was quite touching in the two rehearsals we have at present had; there was always a difference, as if another orchestra played. There are still some deficiencies in the personnel, but they will probably be remedied by degrees, and I believe I may anticipate a series of very agreeable evenings and good performances. I wish you could have heard the introduction to my 'Calm at Sea,' with which the concert commenced; both in the room and in the orchestra there was a quiet, so that the finest tone could be heard, and they played the whole adagio quite masterly; less so the allegro, where they had hitherto been accustomed to slower time, and would always drag; but the end again, where the four-four time ff begins, was magnificently done; the fiddles went at it with a fury, that I was regularly frightened, and Publicus was delighted. The following pieces, aria in E major, by Weber, spohr's violin concerto, and introduction to Ali Baba went less well; one rehearsal was not sufficient, and they were sometimes unsteady; but the B flat symphony of Beethoven, which filled up the second part, succeeded gloriously, and the Leipzigers shouted after each movement. There was an attention and an eagerness (Spannung) in the whole orchestra, such as I have never seen greater; they looked out like Schiessvögel (birds to be shot at), as Zelter would have said. After the concert I received and made, in the orchestra, a mass of congratulations; first, the orchestra; then the Thomans (who are famous lads, they take up their parts so punctually, and sing out so well, that I have promised them an order); then came Moscheles, with a whole train of dilettanti; then two musical journals, and so on." A few months later, he writes to his sister:—"The whole orchestra, which has some very excellent men, seeks to anticipate my every wish, and has made the most remarkable progress in delicacy and style, and is so devoted to me, that it often affects me."

No wonder that every member of the orchestra loved him, for though he passed over no fault, he corrected with so much justice and kindness, never hurting anyone's self-respect, and showed so friendly an interest in each individual, that they could not but be devoted to him. Some of them still speak with tears in their eyes of the kind glance with which he would nod at them, when they had successfully mastered any particularly difficult passage.

Nor did he let his kindness end in words or nods. Twice, at his express and urgent representations, did the Town Council increase the salaries of the members of the orchestra.

Just as considerate, too, was Mendelssohn to the composers whose works were performed, and to the artists who appeared, in the concerts. No trouble was too great to insure them a favorable hearing. His warm-hearted endeavors to set Liszt right with the public, when the latter were offended by some unusual financial arrangements made by the great pianist's agent, are but a specimen of his way of acting. His letters to composers who could not be present at the performance of their works, show how cordially he rejoiced at their success, and at the same time was so truthfully loyal, and so modest in pointing out any imperfections. That these letters have been published is as honorable to those who received them, as to him who wrote them.

The resignation, from ill-health, of Matthäi, soon after Mendelssohn's appointment, gave him the opportunity of bringing Herr Ferdinand David to Leipzig as Concertmeister. By a strange coincidence this consummate artist was born in the same house in Hamburg, in which Mendelssohn himself in the previous year first saw the light. It is scarcely too much to say, without such a prime minister, even Mendelssohn himself could hardly have brought the orchestra to such perfection.

It was also at Mendelssohn's invitation that Herr Niels Gade came to Leipzig, so delighted had he been with the first symphony of the young Danish composer. Dr. Bennett's early compositions were also performed in the early part of his directorate. His reign was also remarkable for the great number of English lady singers who appeared at the concerts. We find the names of Clara Novello, Shaw, Birch, Lincoln and Dolby.

There is one remarkable omission in the "Mendelssohn letters." It was during Mendelssohn's conductorship that several of Schumann's compositions were brought out in the Gewandhaus. That he did not like all Schumann's works is true; but it is equally true that he greatly admired some of them, and that he expressed his admiration in letters to his friends; some of these were laid before the editors when the letters were being prepared for publication—but yet no trace of them appears. There is a littleness in this, of which Mendelssohn himself had not one atom in his nature, and which he would have been the first to condemn.

Space would fail me, were I to record all that Mendelssohn did for the Gewandhaus, and for music in Leipzig. The visits of the King of Saxony to the concerts, and the influence which Mendelssohn thus gained with him, led to the establishment of the Conservatory box: one of his greatest services was the way in which he educated his audience. At that time, the tickets were not transferable, and although the places were not reserved, each subscriber was always to be found in the one place. It was almost like a large family party, and Mendelssohn was the head of the house. His cordiality and appreciativeness were contagious, and the audience rejoiced when they could applaud a new name or a new work, and thus give an encouragement to those who had not yet had an opportunity of making a name. The affection between the audience and the Kapellmeister showed itself in a hundred ways. Let one serve for an example. At the last concert before Mendelssohn's marriage, the finale of "Fidelio" had been performed. The applause which bade him farewell, seemed as if it would never cease. With a countenance beaming with happiness, Mendelssohn sat down to the piano to play his thanks. He chose that theme to the finale, to which belong the words:—

"Wer ein holdes Weib errungen, Mische seinen Jubel ein," and made it the subject of the most brilliant and touching variations. Of course the applause was more enthusiastic than ever.

From 1841 to 1845, Mendelssohn was generally residing in Berlin, whither the King of Prussia had called him with the hope of finding some fitting employment for him. During his absence his place was supplied by the Herren David, Ferdinand Hiller, and Gade. In 1845 he returned to Leipzig, and alternately with Gade conducted the concerts till Easter 1847, when ill health obliged him to resign.

The season 1847-1848, was conducted by Gade. Its commencement was clouded by the death of Mendelssohn, which occurred on the 4th November, the very evening upon which a concert should have taken place, but which was of course postponed when it was known that the beloved master was dying. The following concert on the 11th was devoted to his memory. The first part was selected from his own compositions, and included Luther's Prayer—"Verleih uns Frieden;" overture to Melusine, Eichendorff's Nachlied, "Vergangen ist der lichte Tag," composed with special reference to his sister Fanny's death—the "Nunc Dimittis" from the English evening service, written in the previous summer, and the overture to "St. Paul." The second part consisted of Beethoven's "Eroica." A hard task it was for the performers to master their feelings. It was a solemnity never to be forgotten by those who were present.

My letter has gone to a greater extent than I first anticipated. I therefore reserve the little that yet remains to be said till next week.—Corr. Lond. Orchestra.

Mozart's "Magic Flute."

Beethoven pronounced the Zauberflöte the masterpiece of Mozart, which goes far to substantiate what has been often asserted, and as often denied, that the composer of Fidelio was jealous of the reputation of the composer of Don Juan. Without presuming to offer an opinion on so delicate a point—without wishing to pry into the inward depths of the heart of Beethoven, or to arraign human nature on the plea that the greatest and most gifted have the failings of the weakest—we may state, without reserve, that so far as a close acquaintance with the dramatic writings of Mozart can entitle us to judge, the opera of Die Zauberflöte, viewed as a whole, appears not comparable to Figaro, Don Giovanni, or even to Idomeneo, a much earlier effort. That the score is crowded with beauties—that the melodies are abundant, fresh, and genuine—that the fact of having a tale of enchantment to set to music conducted Mozart into another world, where the inexhaustible fertility of his invention was triumphantly demonstrated, cannot be denied. But several causes militated against the possibility of the Zauberflöte (any more than the Clemenza di Tito, its inferior, which was composed almost at the same time) being one of the greatest and most perfect works of its author. The circumstances under which it was written were unfavorable. Emanuel Schikaneder, the manager of one of the Vienna theatres, an old companion of Mozart's, when on the brink of ruin, prevailed on the great musician to promise him an opera in which the frivolous tastes of the majority of the habitués of his establishment should be in some measure consulted. Schikaneder himself wrote the book, and though the task was very unwelcome to Mozart, who was uncompromising in all that concerned his art, he undertook to save his friend. How this kindness of heart was repaid by the basest ingratitude, is well known. Mozart never received a florin for the music of Zauberflöte, although the opera met with great success and revived the fortunes of the theatre. Schikaneder (who was also the original Papageno) disposed of copies of the score to the directors of other theatres, and appropriated to himself what it had been agreed should be the only remuneration for the time and pains Mozart had bestowed upon it. During the progress of the composition Mozart was suffering under constant ill health, and forebodings of his approaching end were incessantly tormenting him. But worst of all, the book of Schikaneder is little better than a farrago of absurdities, which no genius, however transcendent, could possibly succeed in elevating to serious interest. A brief sketch of the plot may help to substantiate this assertion. Sarastro, high priest of the temple of Isis, is desirous of educating Pamina, daughter of Astrifammante, Queen of Night, in the faith and mysteries of the true religion. To carry out his purpose he has her conveyed away secretly from her mother's custody. Tamino, Prince of Egypt, is enamoured of Pamina, and tracing her to the temple of Isis becomes a novice in the mysteries, in the hopes of regaining possession of the object of his love. To test the constancy of his nature, Sarastro, a very well meaning personage for a priest of Isis, condemns him to a temporary separation from Pamina, and causes him to undergo sundry ordeals by which his truth and courage may be established. Pamina is condemned to similar trials. Both come out victorious, and in spite of the arts of the Queen of Night, who, burning with the desire of vengeance against Sarastro for having robbed her of her daughter, attempts to persuade Pamina to kill him and steal his crown, the lovers are found worthy of Isis and of each other. The comic action is divided between Papageno, a bird catcher, who follows Tamino in his adventures, and Monostatos, the chief of the slaves of Sarastro, a traitor who betrays his trust and endeavors to seduce Pamina. As a safeguard, Tamino is provided with a magic flute, by means of which he is enabled to give alarm and summon aid in case of danger. Hence, it is needless to add, the name of the opera—Die Zauberflöte. Papageno is also gifted with an instrument of music, which, when played upon, turns anger into mirth and sets everybody dancing. The effect which Mozart has made out of this, in the finale to the first act, where the famous tune, O dolce concerto, is introduced, must be well-remembered by all who have seen the opera. The other personages of the drama are three attendants on the Queen of Night, three good genii (boys of the temple, in the German libretto) in the interest of Sarastro; an old woman, who afterwards becomes Papagena, the wife of Papageno, Domofontes, an orator, styled "initiated," who plays a part in the second act, into the secret of which the audience is not initiated; Oronte, a priest; and two men in armor, whose precise business is inexplicable.

Out of such materials it would have been strange if an interesting story had been constructed. Schikaneder could not do it, with Mozart to assist him, as the result shows. While the first act at least verges on the intelligible, the second would require an Iamblichus (not translated by a Taylor) to explain. Genii of either sex, priests, slaves, monsters, armed men, orators, and lions are mingled in happy confusion. The real signification may possibly have something to do with the mysteries of Isis and Osiris; to the multitude it is "caviare," and sets comment at defiance. Goethe, the poet, nevertheless, wrote what he called a second part of Zauberflöte, one of the least generally read of his works. Our intention is not to enter into a critical analysis of an opera which, composed for a German stage in 1791, is at the present moment (60 years after) brought out in an Italian Opera as a certain means of profit. Moreover the music, thanks to its beauty and variety, is familiar as "household words." The short pieces have enjoyed an unchanging popularity in the concert room, and are known to amateurs as well as musicians. The overture, the most learned and admirable of all Mozart's orchestral preludes, is probably the finest ever composed. Mozart would seem to have written it to console himself for those ephemeral portions of the opera which he was persuaded by Schikaneder to write and rewrite, until Schikaneder was satisfied. It is a regular feast of counterpoint; but the beauty and sublimity of the ideas, and the exceeding clearness of their development, take away all vestige of pelantry. The chorale, or canto fermo, in C minor, for the two armed men, in the finale to the second act, is also an elaborate and majestic composition, the fugal accompaniment in the orchestra betraying the hand of the consummate master. In opposition to these grand pieces we may cite the first air of Papageno, the birdcatcher; the duet between him and Pamina; and, in short, all the music in which Papageno is concerned, as among the lightest music Mozart has produced—although, on the other hand, extremely lively and pretty. But, as a counterbalance, there are many passages in Zauberflöte which discover neither the beauty of melody, nor the prodigious science, nor the lofty and passionate expression, for which the dramatic music of Mozart is generally remarkable. The march, with the flute solo, when Pamina and Tamino are passing through the ordeals of fire and water, with another flute solo near the opening of the first finale, are absolutely trivial, and are evident proofs of Mozart's contempt for the excessive absurdity of the situation. Wherever opportunities for dramatic effect present themselves, Mozart, as usual, has availed himself of them in a masterly manner. A striking example of this is found in the introduction to the first act, where Tamino is pursued by a serpent, and saved by the intervention of the three attendants of the Queen of Night. Of the passionate declamatory music—a style in which Mozart has never been surpassed and rarely equalled—there are several fine specimens in Zauberflöte, among which are the largo of the first air of the Queen of Night (in G minor), the song of Pamina (in the same key), and the exquisite quartet in E flat, at the commencement of the second finale, for Pamina and the three boys of the Temple. The power of endowing each of his characters with a distinct and well-sustained individuality, so noticeable in Figaro and Don Giovanni, is scarcely less remarkable in Zauberflöte. The solemnity of the music given Sarastro and the priests of Isis is wonderfully contrasted with the reckless levity of that of Papageno; while between the bravura songs of the Queen of Night (from the profuse employment of the highest notes of the register, destined, no doubt, for some exceptional voice) and the music of Pamina, the difference is equally well maintained. Even in the trios for the female attendants of the Queen of Night, and those for the boys of the Temple of Isis, the concert is preserved with scarcely less felicity; and it must be noticed that the separate characteristics are set forth quite as strongly in morceaux d'ensemble as in solos, duets, and airs, where of course, its exhibition would be comparatively easy. If we would refer to isolated pieces, we need only point to the beautiful air, in E flat, of Tamino, O cara immagine; the merry little song of Papageno, Gente è qui l'uccellatore, one of the most sparkling tunes ever written; recitative and air of the Queen of Night, (in B flat,) Infelice consolato, with its pathetic adagio and extraordinary passages of bravura; the song of Monostatos, the chief slave, to which the sparing employment of the contrabasso, and the incessant reiteration of semi-quavers, impart a special character; the second, and by far the grandest, air of the Queen of Night, Gli angeli d'inferno (in D minor), in which a mother's curse is conveyed with such terrible power, while the unnatural strain upon the higher notes of the voice in the last movement is overlooked in the belief that the personage and the situation is as natural; and last, not least, the solemn and magnificent air of Sarastro (in E) Qui s'adegna, which the efforts of all the bass singers, bad, good, and indifferent, for the last half century have failed to render commonplace or hackneyed. This song is an apostrophe to Peace, and music never spoke in language more tranquil, expressive, and sublime. The air in G minor of Pamina, Ah lo so, stands alone in pathetic loveliness, and we have therefore separated it from the rest, as incomparable with anything else. Among the best concerted pieces we may include the morceaux d'ensemble for the three attendants of the Queen of Night, and those for the three boys of the Temple, which only differ in character, not in degree of beauty. The first finale, though very long and varied, is not to be named in the same breath with the finales to Figaro and Don Giovanni; but the second is full of musical beauties, and were it not for the ineffective march of the action, which necessitates so many changes and full closes, would be exceptionable. The opening quartet and concluding chorus, both in E flat, are both exquisite in their way. The two quintets are ingenious and interesting pieces of concerted music; but that in the first act (in B flat), where Papageno begins to sing with the padlock on his mouth, is by far the most beautiful. The little duet, in E flat, La dove prende amor ricetto, is as simple and popular a tune as, O dolce concerto, and has as long been the property of the orgues de Barbarie and other instruments of street harmony. Its melody will be recognized by the initiated as the "Manly Heart." To the introduction of the first act we have already alluded, as to one of the finest and most dramatic pieces. The instrumentation of the whole opera is masterly, transparent and gorgeously colored. Among the effects peculiarly impressive, we may note the use of the trombones in the opening overture, and in the beginning of the second act; the sparing manner in which these solemn instruments (too often made the representatives of mere noise by composers) are employed throughout, is worthy of attention. As in Don Giovanni the trombones are only brought in when the statue of the Commendatore appears, so in Zauberflöte they are (after the overture) entirely confined to the music of the priests; and we cannot commend those who, violating Mozart's intention, for the sake of an imaginary increase of power or brilliancy, force them into other parts of the score, and deprive them of their individuality in the points where the composer has himself introduced them. Without entering into further detail, however, we may bring this rapid sketch to a close by repeating, that though the opera of Zauberflöte contains some of the best, it also contains some of the least admirable music of Mozart, and therefore cannot justly be cited as the chef d'œuvre. What is feeble or trivial, however, we readily lay to the stupidity of Schikaneder and the libretto; while that which is great and beautiful springs exclusively from the immortal genius of the composer.—London Times, July 11, 1851.

To the above very fair musical appreciation we add here a deeper insight into what is most Mozartish in this opera, from the pen of Mozart's Russian biographer, OULIBICHEF. It is an extract from his analysis of the entire opera, piece by piece, which may be found translated in an earlier volume of this journal.

Let us see if there be no not some way of discovering another meaning in this work; another cause, which may have created this miraculous score; in a word, a thought, which we can admit without slandering Schikaneder.

Mozart, when he undertook to compose the Zauberflöte, had but a few months to live. His strength was so enfeebled, that he had frequent fits of fainting while he wrote. And yet he works away incessantly upon this opera, which seems to have interested him very greatly, in spite of all there was about it that would have repelled another. During this time that fateful messenger, the man who ordered the Requiem, presents himself. For whom is this mysterious order? And the dread voice, which spoke so often to the predestined man, replied: for thyself! From that time forward the thought of poison, which he believed that he had taken, gained more and more possession of him, hastening his end.

Already very weak, with one foot in the grave, Mozart could no longer, as in former times, yield himself up to the storm of sensual inclination. He was no longer the Mozart of Don Giovanni. On the other hand, it is nothing strange in youthful invalids, for the emotions of love to grow more intense while they grow purer; reaching a higher pitch of spirituality and poesy, with the increase of physical exhaustion. When this decline has gone so far that the poor sufferer has little hope, then the love which lacks the power of earthly gratification, fondly takes refuge in the realm of memory; it takes on the colors of that magical prism, through which we contemplate the past; it runs through one by one all the elegiac chords of the minor tones of the soul; and when the unalterable order of the psychological modulation has finally brought back a major harmony, the love streams back to its source. It awakens mysterious images; it announces itself in inextinguishable presentiments; it becomes religion and religious poesy; the worship and the aspiration for the unknown Beautiful.

I think there is no one among my musical readers who will not feel, to what a degree the character of Zauberflöte harmonizes with the moral phenomena, whose origin and consequences, I have recalled. But such analogies could not have made themselves apparent in a piece of theatrical music, had not the libretto afforded an occasion, or at least here and there a pretext, for it. Whether it did or not we will now proceed to examine.

In this medley of unconnected scenes, which the poet had invented just to occupy the eyes, there had crept in almost providentially some common-places of feeling, some of those lyrical thoughts, which in their abstraction or their universality suffice to lend to vocal music the coloring and expression that are most favorable for it. With these common-places a man of genius can always produce beautiful, true, expressive, and even sublime songs; but for the great effects, on the contrary, which belong exclusively to dramatic music, such mere lyrical moments do not suffice, unless they are introduced and motivated by the progress of the drama, and are pushed to a certain degree of energy by means of the characters and situations.

Let us see, then, what kind of lyrical common-places we find scattered here and there in both acts of this opera. If we examine closely, we may assure ourselves that they are nearly all based on religious and elegiac feelings. Lament and reverie, a regret of the past and a mystical longing are expressed in them. A pure accident in this work of folly, we admit. But let us collect these scattered thoughts, and we shall see them, to our great surprise, all gather round a sort of symbolic focus, which will reflect back to us, trait for trait, the image of the man who had to recognize himself therein. Even the text, flat as it is, seems to be almost always an allusion to the moral state of the composer:

Dies Bildnis ist besaubernd schön.
This portrait is enchanting fair.
(Tenor Aria.)

One of the sweetest spots of refuge for a sick imagination is the remembrance of the days of youth, to which the text carried back our hero, those days when the yet virgin heart pursued an image, the type whereof the eyes have never seen, and of which the fancy alone in some of those inspired moments of clairvoyance had dreamed.

Zur Ziele führt Dich diese Bahn.
This path conducts thee to the goal.
(Finale of the first act.)

Mozart stood at the end of his career; he saw the goal before him; the grave within a few steps, present; in the future an immortal glory.

Ja, ich fühl's, es ist verschwunden.
Yes, I feel that it has vanished!
(Aria of Pamina.)

Yes, I feel that it is all over with me! Is not this the mournful theme, out of which all the musician's thoughts at that time flowed, and into which they all ran back?

In other passages religious thoughts and feelings found for their outpouring texts of a truly Christian savor, such as one is justly astonished at in a libretto of this sort.

Sarastro invokes the protection of the gods for those who hover on the brink of death; then he continues:

Doeh sollten sie zu Grabe gehen.
So lohnt der Tugend kühnen Lauf;
Nehmt sie in euren Wohnsitz auf!
[But must they go down to the grave,
Reward their virtuous brave career
And take them to your purer sphere!]
(Invocation to Isis and Osiris.)

As Tamino is led before the mysterious gates, which open only once for the initiated, we hear:

Wenn er des Todes Furchen überwinden kann,
Schwingt er sich aus der Erde himmelan
[If he victorious o'er Death's terrors rise,
So shall he soar from earth up to the skies.]
(Finale of second act.)

The power of harmony, which the Magic Flute represents, conducts the aspirants through the ways of darkness into which they have ventured:

Wir wandeln durch des Tones Macht,
Froh durch des Todes düst're Nacht.
[We walk by Tone's controlling might Rejoicing through Death's dark night.]
(Finale of second act.)

At the beginning of this same finale the Three Boys announce the dawn of a new day and the bliss of the initiated:

Dann ist die Erd' ein Himmelreich
Und Sterb' loben den Göttern gleich.
[Then is the earth a heaven of love,
And mortals like the gods above.]

Here Mozart, doubly inspired by texts so purely musical in themselves, and bearing such a wonderful affinity to the state of his own soul, has shown himself entirely like himself. This is what speaks to us so eloquently at the present day and, with a few other pieces favored by analogous texts, shines with immortal lustre in the score. The comic and tragic features of the subject, that is to say the action, the drama itself, sink more or less into the background, and we see in them to-day the weak parts of the work. One might say with truth, then, that this is the least dramatic of the operas of Mozart, since its most salient scenes are nearly all attached to moral situations, which may properly enough present themselves as episodes in a drama, but should not make up the whole work essentially. The drama requires action and acting passion. But what is the style of the greatest scenes in the Zauberflöte? It is that of Oratorio, and sometimes even the high church style, in all the grandeur and severity of its old forms.

Here at length we find the thought which fructifies the poem, and has extorted such a wonderful harvest from the most unfruitful and apparently uncultivable soil. This thought, concealed essentially from everybody but Mozart, was evidently the initiation, not indeed into the mysteries of Isis or of free-masonry, but into the mysteries which every dying Christian beholds behind the half-opened gates of the grave; Sarastro and his priests are true priests in the score; and the magic instrument, the flute, is it not the very symbol of music's unspoken and intuitive revelation of objects beyond the grave, of revelations, whose weight Mozart surely must have felt better than any other.

Music Abroad.

A NEW SCHOOL FESTIVAL (CONCLUDED.)

CARLSRUHE.—The correspondent of the London Orchestra concludes his report as follows:—

"The result of the mutiny was that the second Chamber Music Concert had to be given this evening. The programme comprised the following numbers: sonata for pianoforte and violin by F. Kiel of Berlin—Frau and Herr Langhaus of Hamburg; Goethe's "Mignon" song ("Kennst du das Land?"), by Liszt—Frau Hauser; sonata for the pianoforte by the late Julius Reubke, a pupil of Liszt—Herr Otto Reubke of Hausneindorf; grand duet for two violins on Schubert's "Divertissement à la Hongroise," by E. Reményi—the composer and his pupil Ferdinand Potényi; trio for pianoforte, violin, and viola, by Ernst Naumann of Jena—the Herren Pfughaupt of Aix-la-Chapelle, Reményi, and Seyffris of Löwenburg; two songs by Liszt. "Es muss ein Wunderbares sein," and "In Liebeslust"—Herr Hauser; Chopin's polonaise in C sharp minor, transcribed for the violin, and fantasia on themes from the Huguenots, composed and played by Herr E. Reményi; grand duet for two pianos by F. Liszt—the Herren Bendel and Pfughaupt. Herr Kiel's sonata was the only piece of music approaching respectability. That it was good would be too much to say; but there were really some appreciable ideas in it, some approach to grace. Possibly had it been less tamely played it might have made a better impression. Mignon's song has been composed over and over again. To enjoy Liszt's version of it one must have become used to his way of song writing. When this is the case, the charm of this song is very great, the depth of longing it expresses is almost painful. Frau Hauser's singing of it was admirable. Less to my taste were the other songs. The better of the two is "Es muss ein Wunderbares sein." Herr Hauser is not so good a singer as his wife. Herr Julius Reubke's sonata is as utterly ugly as can be imagined. That Herr Otto Reubke, who has a considerable amount of mechanical power, should wish to make his late brother's work known to the public is very natural, for affection may bias any judgment; but that the directors should have allowed such a composition to be inflicted upon an audience admits of no excuse. Herr Reményi's violin duet on Schubert's divertissement is good so long as he contents himself with literally transcribing the original theme; but as soon as he writes from himself it is so poor, so irrelevant to the original composition that the new matter is but a deformity. The same remarks apply to his "Huguenot" fantasia; the polonaise is merely a transcription. His playing was as much out of tune as in the other concerts. A few passages were well given, but the whole was most unartistic. Being re-called, he gave the Rakoczy March in a style more suited for the vulgarity of a fair than for an assembly of artists who profess to judge so severely, but whose applause was now so rapturous. In the duet Herr Reményi was assisted by his pupil Ferdinand Potényi, a youth with a most winning and modest countenance. At present he has learnt but little; nor, I fear, is much progress to be looked for under such a master. Herr Naumann's trio showed an inordinate bias to all the worst parts of Schumann's character. The performance was most slovenly; so insufficient had been the preparation that in the last movement there was a complete break down. The duet for two pianos was an addition to the original programme, and one which might have been well dispensed with. It must have been written in an unlucky moment, for not one flash of genius illumines it.

The second Orchestral Concert was held on Friday evening, the programme having been purged of Herr Freudenberg's most wonderful setting of a dramatic scene from an opera by Herr Lohmann, which had been the main cause of the rebellion, and of which it would be difficult to say whether the words or the music were the most crazy. In the early part of the week it had been announced that Herr Kiel's piano-forte concerto was to be sacrificed, and that a concerto for the same instrument by Herr Bendel was to be substituted for it; but not even the latter was given. As finally settled the programme stood as follows:—March to Waldow's historical drama "Maria of Hungary," by Heinrich Gottwald, of Breslau; Reverie and Caprice for violin, by Berlioz—(Herr Concertmeister Kömpell of Weimar); Uhland's poem "Gesang der Nonnen," for soli and female chorus, with piano and horn accompaniment, by Herr Adolf Jensen of Königsberg; Overture by Max Seifriz of Löwenburg; "Mephistowalzer," episode from Lenau's "Faust," by Liszt; two piano solos. Concert-Etude in flat minor, Bendel, and Rhapsodie Hongroise, Liszt—(Herr Franz Bendel of Berlin); Wedding Music, to Heibel's "Nibelungen," by Otto Bach of Mayence; Uhland's "Bräutlied," (Das Haus benedei' ich), for tenor solo, chorus, harp, and two horns, by A. Jensen; "Festklänge," a symphonic poem, by Liszt. Herr Gottwald's March has nothing in it to excite any interest. Herr Kömpell disappointed me; from having heard him in Leipzig I knew that he was an excellent player, but upon the present occasion he was not successful; the fault may have partly been in the piece he selected, which was anything but inspiring. Since the festival, I have heard an anecdote in connection with this Reverie, too characteristic to be suppressed. Some five and twenty years ago, Berlioz visited Leipzig; at Mendelssohn's suggestion, a concert was given in his honor in the Gewandhaus. Among the works selected was this Reverie and Caprice, which was intrusted to one of the greatest of German violinists, who still lives to tell the tale. After the piece was finished, there was, of course, the most enthusiastic applause; the player turned round to Mendelssohn, and whispered, "I am glad enough that I have got through it, for I never had such a task in my life. I have not the remotest idea, what I have been playing, or what the piece can be about?" Scarcely were the words out of the bewildered fiddler's mouth, when Berlioz rushed up to Mendelssohn, exclaiming: "Never have I heard my composition so divinely rendered! Never have I heard an artist who has so completely caught my meaning, and so wonderfully interpreted it!" Those who knew Mendelssohn can picture for themselves the quizzical look which he threw at the astonished fiddler. Herr Jensen's choral compositions were below mediocrity, and are thoroughly unvocal. It is a sin so to maltreat Uhland's lovely "Bräutlied." Herr Seifriz's overture is as pretentious as it is ineffective. He has chosen for his motto a verse of Eckardt's ending,

"Denn aus Nacht und Dunkel bricht Wolken scheuend stolz das Licht!"

Night, gloom, and clouds are there in abundance, but of light not one solitary ray is to be found. An appearance of science is sought to be given by the distribution of the themes, and the working them out in different parts. It is an easy thing to put a theme now in the upper part, now in the lower or middle, or to force different subjects together; the difficulty is to do this so that the whole sounds well, and that no violence is done to the ear. In this Herr Seifriz has not succeeded. Liszt's "Mephistowalzer," the transcription of which for the piano had proved so ugly, was more interesting in its original form; beauty is not to be looked for in such a subject. There is a wierd colouring, a demoniacal wildness—which carry one away for a time; but whether such nightmare music can be healthy, is quite another matter. Herr Bendel's Concert Etude is not characteristic enough to call for remark; his playing of it and of Liszt's Rhapsodie was very unequal; amid much that was unsatisfactory, some passages were admirable. Bach's Wedding Music to the "Nibelungen" would be fitter to celebrate an encounter of savages. Liszt's "Festklänge" are a strange mixture of beauty and chaos. Some of the orchestral combinations are masterly, and they are themes of real beauty. But no work of art can be complete without form and symmetry. Dr. Liszt was enthusiastically called for after each of his works; the winning grace with which he bowed his acknowledgments is but the expression of the power of captivation which he exercises on all who approach him. Nor light is the debt of the new school to his personal influence.

Considering the strangeness of the works performed, and the difficulties occasioned by their perverse impracticabilities, the performances have on the whole been respectable. The energy of the principal double-bass, a gentleman of the Hohenzollern-Hechingen orchestra, was too remarkable and amusing not to deserve notice. The conductor-in-chief was Herr Seifriz, the capellmeister in the orchestra just mentioned; he took the bâton in the place of Herr von Bülow, whose illness prevented his attendance.

It may be asked, What has art gained by the festival? I fear it must be answered nothing. Were the hearing of their works to bring self-knowledge to their authors, the gain would be worth the cost; but the present members of the School seem too blind to learn. Each encourages the other in self-delusion. Because some great works have been slow in making their way, therefore they seem to believe a work has only to be unsuccessful at first, and then it must be great.

That the School is declining in influence, seems evident. Rumors of internal dissension prevail; the gods seem about to leave their worshippers. The school has had its day. What amount of good it could do, has long since been done; now it is an element of almost unmixed mischief, and the sooner it expires, the better for art. Upon one point, however, I must guard myself against been misunderstood. The opinion is too general in England that the men of the New School are the only representatives of music in Germany. This is utterly untrue. They represent Schumann in all his worst characteristics, intensified by the still more disorganizing tendencies of Wagner and Liszt. But there is another body of earnest musicians, who, rejecting what is formless and unbecoming in Schumann, work out the good impulses which he has given; fully recognizing the indispensability of form and science, they strive to reunite the seemingly diverging paths of Mendelssohn and Schumann. Reinecke, Bargiel, Brahms, Rubinstein, are among the names which have already won significance. Some of them have still to attain greater clearness of expression, a more positive feeling of the essential importance of beauty in a work of art. It is to them and their followers that we look with confidence in the future.

The only entirely gratifying remembrance connected with the Carlsruhe Festival is the appearance of Fräulein Topp and of Herr Popper; they have made themselves names which are certain of acquiring a wider fame.

To complete my report, I should add that papers on the following subjects were read:—Professor Eckhardt, "On the Future of Music, especially in reference to Church Music, Oratorio, and Opera." Herr von Arnold, "On the extension of the Course in Music Schools." Herr von Særf, "On the rôle of the key of D major, in the midst of C sharp minor, with reference to Beethoven's Quartet, Op. 131." Dr. Zopff, "On the influence of German Manners on the development of the people."

On looking over my report, I cannot but fear that the monotony of the ugliness of the music may have extended itself to it. I can only plead that the English language is not rich enough to express so many various shades of the word "ugly," without a constant repetition of the same term.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, OCT. 29, 1864.

German Opera.

MR. GROVER has redeemed his promises. Especially has he disarmed even the most imaginary fear lest his enterprise, so bravely launched with excellent fidelity to Art, should wreck upon the dangerous rock of prosperity. Too many prosperous things degenerate in this and every country, falling off in those essential virtues which were the beginning of their prosperity. Especially has this been the case with Opera, as we have known it. Opera managers have seemed to be a class peculiarly affected with what von Weber, speaking of Meyerbeer in his younger days, called the "accursed desire of success." But here is a manager of another stamp. If he had not been, he would scarcely have selected the German Opera for his field, instead of the well advertised and fashionable one of the Italians. But he had faith in German music, believed in its superiority, its better wear, and loved it; and on an honest, generous plan he set to work to give us the best in that kind that was possible with a travelling company on this side of the Atlantic. And it is remarkable what rich materials, vocal, histrionic, and instrumental, he has been able to draw and hold together, and how well the combination will compare with famous Operas in German cities. Two tenors, whose equals we certainly did not hear in Berlin, Dresden or Vienna (we have not heard Niemann, nor Wachtel); two basses, Fornies and Hermanns, whose superiors (all things considered) we would not care to undertake to find in Europe; a soprano, Frederici, of such pure, fine individuality, and so simply beautiful in rôles congenial with her nature, that we cannot remember the like in the cities above mentioned to compare her with; two other prima donnas, Johannsen and Rotter, both possessing remarkable lyrical ability; uncommonly large and good provision for the secondary rôles; a splendid chorus and orchestra, and an excellent conductor:—nothing wanting, in fact, except a first-rate contralto and baritone, and even the latter is more than respectably supplied by Herr Lehmanns. The performances have, with few exceptions, the distinguishing virtue of Opera in Germany, that conscientious regard to all the minor parts, that perfection of ensemble, which the Italian Opera had never taught us to expect. Here at last, we have the musical work, the composer, held in as high respect as the singer. Here the main thing is not to display the pet prima donna, or renew the spoiled tenor's triumphs; but it is to bring out the beauty and the meaning of the best products of creative genius, of works like Don Giovanni, and Fidelio, and the Freyshütz, at the same time gratifying curiosity with newer, perhaps more ephemeral efforts.

We were in season to notice only, in our last, the first three pieces of the season. Already in the third, Robert le Diable, we saw we were not to be put off with cheap fulfilment, and that the management really meant to give us nothing short of the best within its power. Since then good signs have multiplied; Gretchen has had her own true Faust restored to her (if the public will still have these reproductions, it is only fair that the copy should preserve all the striking features of the original picture); Fornes has been cast in his fine old parts of Plunkett and of Caspar; the statue in Don Juan has been made a great part; the orchestra has been more careful;—and then, what a noble series of first-class works of genius has been presented! What an unexampled repertoire, for Boston, for America, has been unfolded! That second week must mark an era in our operatic history, as will be seen in our review, which we herewith resume.

4. Thursday night, Oct. 13. Der Freyschütz. The wierd charm of Weber's ever fresh, romantic music, with its wonderful reflection of the strife of good and evil, its alternate suggestion of overshadowing dark influences, gloomy forebodings, wild forest superstition, and of heavenly irradiations of light and love and hope (the one colored with strange, sombre tones of trombones, bassoons and the startling low reeds of the clarinet, with syncopated, agitated rhythm, &c., the other with the mellow warmth of horns, the human tenderness of the higher register of the clarinet, the bright ethereal flute, in simple, open, heart-felt strains, like "native wood notes wild")—this, and the exquisite impression left by the two performances last Spring, ensured a crowded, eager audience. Nor was there any disappointment. On the contrary, the great weight of CARL FORMES, vocal and personal, was thrown in to replace the then weak, all-important part of Caspar. It was a grand impersonation of the satanic desperado. It lifted up the before faltering concerted music of the first act and put new life into it; and it filled up the charmed circle of the horrid incantation scene with magnetic force of character enough to make it really terrible in spite of the diablerie and fireworks. In spite of some damage to his voice, it still retains its weight and warmth and richness. If tremulous at times, and not getting a firm grasp on those emphatic high tones in his first great solo: Triomphe! &c., yet his singing for the most part was as fine as his acting; how could the fierce drinking song be sung much better?

Mme. FREDERICI was quite as charming as before in Agathe; in fresh, refined quality of voice, in truth of intonation, chaste perfection and purity of style, and in simple, self-forgetting, serious consistency and charm of action, it realized the ideal of Weber's pure and pious maiden. Nothing more nearly holy has been felt in any theatre than her singing of the prayer: "Leise, leise." We fancy we should have to go back to the fresh days of the Lind to find the equal of Frederici's Agathe. We could wish there were a little more of poetry, both of voice and manner, and of the whole nature, in the representative of the brighter member of that Minna and Brenda couple; one is troubled by the externality of all that little lady's prettiness and cleverness; yet there is no denying that Fräulein CANISSA does the part of the light-hearted Aennchen cleverly, her voice being at least bright and telling, her action lively, and her face—shining. Herr HABELMANN was in better condition for Max than he was in the Spring; besides its unfailing sweetness, his voice this time found power sufficient for the trying tenor passages; the great solo: "Durch die Wälder, durch die Auen," and his part of the trio in the second act, were all that we could wish. Chorus and orchestra were remarkably good. We only missed the unction of the genial old stager who sang the little part of Kilian before, and a sufficiency of voice in the other small part of Kuno.

5. Friday. Halévy's "Jewess" (Die Judin). An opera which never has possessed us much beyond the moment of actual listening to it, although it has many traits of masterly musicianship. Its chief hold on the hearer is dramatic; besides which it is spectacular, or it never would have been cradled in the Grand Opera of Paris; the melo-dramatic horror of the last (the execution) scene is peculiarly "sensational" and Frenchy; we can only look upon such things as monstrosities in Art. Therefore we did not look, but came away. There is a grand march and procession in "The Jewess" vastly superior to the much belabored and clap-trap one in Faust. The part of the Jew Eleazar is an eminently dramatic one, and Herr HIMMER, though he has not the great power and reach of voice which helped to make Stigelli memorable in that character, was admirably faithful and for the most part equal to its requirements. Mme. JOHANNSEN as the Jewess, and Mme. ROTTER as the Princess Eudoxia, both sang and acted with fine artistic skill and fervor. Their duet brought the house down, and it was indeed a fine triumph of double prima-donna-ship. HABELMANN was grateful to ear and eye in the part of the prince; double primo-tenore-ship also! Herr HERMANNs furnished voice in plenty, and of rare quality, but not the right aspect and bearing for the Cardinal; the stern denunciation he declaimed was never in his look; the roguish twinkle would not leave his eye; you could not forget Mephistopheles and Falstaff. (By the way, will not Mr. Grover let us see the latter capital impersonation again, and hear Nicolai's sparkling music?)

6. Saturday afternoon. Faust, second time, and as before. We only make one note of encouragement: our audiences have left off encoring the brass band and soldiers' chorus; they have found out!

Here beginneth a new chapter, the era-making week referred to. Think of this list of operas in a single week: Don Juan, Zauberflöte, Die weisse Dame, Der Freyschütz, Robert le Diable! and for the Sunday evening there was announced, but afterwards withdrawn on account of the great labor of rehearsing "so many heavy works," Mehul's very pleasing and touching little oratorio-opera, "Joseph and his Brethren," another French work which, like La Dame Blanche, has also taken in root in German soil,—an opera in which there are no female characters,—composed in 1807. We hope the project will come up again.

7. Monday, 17th. Mozart's Don Juan, it will be remembered, was about the least fortunate of this company's performances when they were here before. This time it went a great deal better, although much was lacking. The cast in several essential parts was new. Especially did the assumption of the Commendatore by HERMANNs give new life to the first scene, and a new dignity and grandeur to the finale. Never was there such a Statue,—here at least. How the ponderous petrifying tones rang out! Every note told; and the awful sublimity of the whole scene was doubly realized, thanks to that superb impersonation. Thanks also to the more natural behavior of the Leporello (FORMES), who, beginning with the usual buffoonery, soon sobered down at the appearance of the ghost. FORMES was most welcome in his old part. The new Don Juan, Herr OTTO LEHMANN, who made it his debut, was at least free from any offensive gaucherie or coarseness, so common in representations of the courtly, splendid roué; in person agreeable; in action also, although with too much betrayal of the effort to be easy; in voice musical and rich, and of fair power; artistic, without being of great mark, as a singer. The three manly voices made not only the Statue scene, but the trio in the first scene, unusually telling.

There was a new Zerlina too, Mlle. DZIUBA; considerably better than Canissa; pleasing in person, action, voice, and singing, but not to be named with our rare list of Zerlinas headed by Bosio and Sontag. Nor is Mme. JOHANNSEN's best worth seen in the part of Donna Anna; nor was she in voice that night for the great recitative and air: Or sai, &c. FREDERICI, of course, looked and sang sweetly as Elvira, but as she left out her great soliloquy: Mi tradi (too seldom sung), it was but a small part for her. HABELMANN sang all the tenor music of Ottavio admirably, and earned especial gratitude by introducing the exquisite aria: Dalla sua pace. Herr HAIMER filled but passably the not so very small part of Masetto,—a part in which we have heard so great an artist as Ronconi. The chief fault of the performance was the somewhat more than usual want of completeness, consistency, and intelligibility of scenery and stage effect:—not to be wondered at with a change of piece each night.

The partial disappointment of a public so fond of Don Giovanni was doubtless due, in a greater measure than people themselves suspected, to the substitution of spoken dialogue for the old recitative (or rather, Italian parlando), and to missing the sound of the dear old Italian words, with which the melodic phrases have become to our ears so indissolubly wedded, that, until we get accustomed to the German, we scarcely feel at home for some time in the melodies themselves. With custom that will wear away.

8. Mozart again,—Die Zauberflöte. Most that we would say of the opera itself, we have told by extracts on another page. We ask attention, particularly, to the remarks of Oulibichef, who so tenderly identifies its noblest passages with Mozart's deepest personal experience. Two things must be borne in mind. First, that the plot, with all its frivolous absurdities, was dictated to Mozart by a Papageno buffoon of a manager. Secondly, that he composed it within a few months of his death, while he was also engaged on the Requiem. Hence, what we have always felt and more than once remarked, the singular identity of style and spirit between some of the grander music of the last act of the opera and that grand Mass. Indeed some pieces, before the trial scene, &c., are in the self-same vein with the Requiem. We agree with the Times writer, that the "Magic Flute" contains much of the noblest, much of the lightest, and some of the weakest music of Mozart's writing. But we do not agree that, as a whole, it is such an inferior opera. Inferior only to Don Juan and Figaro, say we. With those exceptions, we doubt if any opera of Mozart's contains so much that must remain forever admirable.

The story indeed is bewildering and silly, in one point of view. And yet, lit up with the Aladdin's lamp of Mozart's music, it may be made to read almost as well as some of the Arabian Night's tales. Did not our good A. W. T. (the "Diarist") write it out for us once in this sense, and tell it for the children in these columns? The sillier parts (if you choose to call them so) abound in delicious music, such as haunts you afterwards and has haunted the general air since Mozart lived; some of the airs, like Tamino's: Dies Bildniss (o cara immagine) and Pamina's: Ach! ich fühl' es ist verschwunden, are almost unexampled for pure, sweet pathos and spiritual beauty. But when you come to the Priests' music, it is nearly all sublime. What made this opera tedious to many on that evening was, principally, the utter want of anything like proper scenery and stage effect; Grecian architecture, where Tamino stands in awe and wonder before the Egyptian columns of the temple of Isis, was but one of a host of misleading circumstances. And then the want of a suitable Pamina; that serious, tender, lovely role would seem made almost for Frederici; but Mme. ECKHARDT, who has ripened into quite a singer since her Museum days, gives no fair conception of Pamina.

These were the drawbacks. There were many excellencies in the performance. Mme. ROTTER sang the florid, passionate, high-soaring airs of the Queen of Night in the most clear, neat, telling manner that we have heard since Lind. FORMES wore the autocratic priestly dignity of Sarastro superbly; and though his great tones shook in such sustained and trying arias as "In diesen heiligen Hallen" like a big ship breasting a heavy sea, yet their richness (in spite of some acquired roughness), their essentially musical quality, and the intellectual power throughout the whole, made the impersonation worthy of his fame. Herr HIMMER, always noble in bearing, never looked more so than in the part of Tamino; and all his singing and his action, too, was manly, chaste and nobly satisfying. Herr GRAFF was by no means a bad Papageno, and the exquisite comedy of the duet with his Papagena (CANISSA) did not escape an encore. The "drei Damen," headed by Mlle DZIUBA, sang their fine trios very nicely; and the "drei Knaben," three boys, or Genii, of doubtful gender, but for their odd make-up, made a good impression; the contralto part so prominent in their beautiful trios was quite satisfactory. The orchestra played the wonderful overture right well. We still believe that, on repetition with proper attention to details, the "Magic Flute" will become popular.

9. Die weisse Dame.—Boieldieu's ever fresh, genial, and delightful La Dame Blanche. An unfailing favorite everywhere but here, where as a whole it was pretty much unknown, until it startled with new delight the small audience on one of the first nights of the German troupe last spring. This time it had a crowded audience, and it worked to a charm again. The music, from the perfect overture to the working up of "Robin Adair," all simple as it is, wears that bloom of genius which time cannot brush off; it is full of charming original ideas, and in form faultless, especially that overture, which is a model in its way; and yet the means employed are few and very simple; the result admirable. Herr HABELMANN won all hearts by graceful action and thoroughly musical and sweet, yet manly, singing of George Brown, a part which he may make almost as famous as Roger, having the advantage of the great French tenor in the freshness of his organ. The dash and élan of the soldier's song, the tender appeal to the mysterious "holde Dame," and the exquisite rendering of "Robin Adair," may rank among the finest specimens that we have known of tenor singing. He was well supported by JOHANNSEN in the part of the White Lady. HERMANN again made an admirable Gaveston; and the parts of Jenny and Dickson were better filled than before by DZIUBA and LEHMANN. Chorus and ensemble excellent and full of life. Everybody acts in this troupe.

10. Thursday (the 14th) was the great night of the season. Beethoven's sublime and only opera, Fidelio, drew the largest and the finest audience of any opera yet. Is it not an era in the musical history of Boston, when we can truly say that such a work is popular? It made its mark decidedly in that first and only performance in the Spring. It was not for nothing that Boston ears have been made familiar for twenty-five years with the nine symphonies; not for nothing does the statue of the mighty master stand there in the Music Hall. Beethoven somehow speaks to the earnest heart and soul of this people as almost no other artist, whether in music or in other arts. And his Fidelio suits the temper of these times. It all appeals to the noblest, the purest, the heroic sentiments. It sings of captivity and patient hope and glorious deliverance through a wife's heroic and sublime devotion. Its keynote is Freiheit—universal Liberty—the aspiration for which and the godlike struggle with opposing fates, is felt throughout all Beethoven's music. And it illustrates and in the end celebrates, in a great hymn of praise, the excellence of Woman! Such sincere, true expression of passion and every feeling from the tenderest to the noblest, is as refreshing as it is engrossing to minds so long accustomed only to Italian Opera, and to hearing the Italian music called peculiarly the language of feeling and of passion. Talk no more of these great German works as only "classical" and cold and scientific and elaborate. Fidelio has taught you what true feeling, what grand passion is. And seek no longer to set apart the great instrumental musician, as only a master in the realm of abstract music, but not master of the human tones. Does not the orchestra all through Fidelio mightily throb and heave in perfect vital sympathy with voice and action? How spell-bound you listened, heart and soul, to that great overture (Leonore, No. 3), which, being introduced thus after the prison scene, from which it derives its motives, was for the first time understood by hundreds who had often heard it in concerts! Was it not the drama over again, still more divinely idealized, reflected in its essence? Was ever overture so listened to and so applauded in an American theatre before? And had you not that night a revelation of what a great power in an Opera the Orchestra may be—a power such as even Meyerbeer and Gounod have only built around it on the outside, not developed with germinal creative power from within, song and accompaniment leaping whole, Minerva-like, out of one inspiration of the brain of genius.

But we have said our say about this opera before now more fully than we have need or room to do it now. We will only say that it gained immensely in favor by this repetition (and still more the second one last Wednesday night); and that the manner in which it was performed justified the fine result. It went more smoothly than last Spring, and indeed vastly better than could have been expected in this country. The orchestra was admirable; a greater body of strings being the main desideratum. In that great crescendo near the end of the Leonora overture, where the struggling violins reinforced each other one by one, they come in by tens in the great orchestras abroad; the want of mass and breadth of violin, viola and 'cello tone is always felt here; but Herr ANSCHUTZ has the best orchestra possible under the circumstances. Mme. JOHANNSEN, despite all her wear of voice, has fairly earned very great respect by her fine impersonation of Fidelio. It is her great part, and in it she catches the inspirations of the music and the subject. She seems to have that true lyric instinct which lifts her above herself and enables her to cope with the most arduous difficulties. Her great scene: "Abscheulicher! wo eilst du hin," with its outburst of horror at what she has overheard, with its gentler visitings of hope, and its heroic glorious determination, took the full sympathy of her audience. Herr HIMMER sang and acted Florestan most feelingly and nobly, the prisoner's first soliloquy and dream of deliverance, his strain of gratitude for the first signs of human kindness, his part in the breathless duet: "O namen-namenlose Freude," were all admirable. Herr STEINICKER had more weight of voice, more power of action for the angry, vengeful music of Pizarro, than Herr LEHMANN, who took it in the last performance; but the latter's voice is clearer and more musical. HERMANN's could hardly be surpassed as the old jailor, Rocco. The pretty parts of Jaquino and Marcellina, and the slight streak of humor which they carry through the sombre play, were well represented by HABELMANN and CANISSA; but the latter is a part which requires a much finer voice and singer. The wonderful choruses of the prisoners, greeting and bidding farewell to the open air and daylight, were well sung. The quartet in the first scene had its encore again, going in better tune the second time, but filling the listener with new surprise and joy on the last as much as on the first hearing.

No opera within the means of this troupe deserves so many repetitions as Fidelio; no one is now so sure of the largest and best sort of audience. The enterprise, expense and labor already involved in promised novelties, "heavy operas," like Tannhäuser, Mireille, &c., are creditable to the manager; but we believe that most people would willingly postpone those experiments rather than relax their hold upon such sure gain as Fidelio. And there be other fine things, much more easily commanded, which lovers of German music would be much more glad to hear: Mozart's Figaro for instance.

11—15. The remaining operas, to this time of writing, have been repetitions; namely: Der Freyschütz, Robert, Martha (with Formes as Plunkett, Himmer as Lionel, and Dziuba as Nancy), Faust (3d time, with Himmer in his old part), and Fidelio (2nd time) on Wednesday; and splendid houses always. For the remainder of the week; the Dame Blanche again, The Huguenots (first time), and this afternoon Der Freyschütz.

Great Organ Record.

We have been forced to let a long arrearage of organ concerts run up against us. The Wednesday and Saturday "noonings" are still kept up successfully, although the audiences, no longer swollen by the stream of summer travel, have shrunk to their usual size. The interest, however, still increases. Within a few weeks regular Sunday evening concerts have also been commenced. Of these the programmes are of course not quite so light and miscellaneous as the others. In these Mr. JOHN K. PAINE properly led off with the following excellent programme, and never has he seemed more master of himself and instrument:

Fantasia in A minor.....Thiele
Sonata in A major.....Ritter
Religious Offering.....J. K. Paine
Pascaglia.....Bach
Variations on the "Austrian Hymn".....J. K. Paine
Reverie—Song of the Silent Land.....J. K. Paine Choral Variation—Christ our Lord to Jordan came.

Andante from the Organ Sonata in A.....Mendelssohn
Fugue in G minor.....Bach

Mrs. FROMOCK followed, on the 16th, showing excellent skill in a Fantasia on Ein feste Burg, by Schellenberg; an adagio by Mozart; Mendelssohn's 4th Sonata; a slow movement from one of Haydn's Symphonies (showing fine tact in registration); variations on a Russian Hymn, by Freyer; a Song by Franz (Die Lotoblume), which sang particularly well upon the Vox Humana; the Andante to the 5th Symphony, conscientiously transcribed but not yet quite smooth in the execution; and Bach's Toccata in F.

Last Sunday Dr. TUCKERMAN played a rich variety of selections from Palestrina, Handel, Haydn, Zipoli (16th century), Beethoven (andante of Kreutzer Sonata), Weber, Franz and Hesse. The attendance was large.

Of the "noonings," from Sept. 17 to this time, three have been given by Mr. LANG, who has played each time a Prelude and Fugue by Bach; a Fugue on B, A, C, H, by Schumann; transcriptions of overtures (Dinorah being the newest); pieces from Handel's Oratorios and Mendelssohn's Sonatas, &c. This gentleman has carefully abstained thus far from the French Offertories.—Two have been by Mrs. FROMOCK; a new and lively Toccata in C, by Bach; Fantasia in C minor, by Hesse; transcriptions from Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Weber; a charming Idyl for Vox Humana, by Lysberg; Offertories by Battiste and Wely;—Three by Mr. THAYER: Grand Toccata in D minor, Passapied in E (first time), Andante and Allegro from Sonata in E minor, all by Bach; Pascaglia by Handel; overtures, offertories concert variations, &c. One each, by Messrs. WILLCOX, WHITING, D. PAINE and CARTER.

Mr. HENRY SCHRIMPF, having returned from Europe, has resumed his teaching of the piano-forte and music generally. We hear good accounts from his pupils.

NEW YORK, OCT. 24.—The Italian Opera at the present time, enjoys a monopoly; for, with the exception of an occasional performance at Irving Hall, and the afternoon rehearsals of the Philharmonic Society, it is the only entertainment of a musical nature in the city. It is not easy to account for this great falling-off of concerts, unless upon the supposition that musicians have become entangled in the toils of politicians and contractors, and are too busily engaged in these new professions, to care much about the "dear public" for whom they have so often catered; or perhaps the last draft was too strong for them, and carried them off, voiceless conscripts.

Unaccountable as it may be, it is none the less a fact, that there was never so great a musical dearth as at the present time. Gottschalk, Sanderson, Castle, Campbell, Thomas, D' Angri, and the whole host of concert artists, whose memory (and old concert bills) still linger around the quiet aisles of Irving Hall, are strangely quiet, and bid fair to remain so, from all that can be learned. It is true that Mme. D' ANGRI and CASTLE and CAMPBELL have been singing an occasional ballad at a series of "gift concerts," given by the "Jewelers' Association," but aside from this their voices have not been heard.

THEO. THOMAS's popular, but pecuniarily unprofitable matinees will not be resumed before January next. He intends giving a series of grand orchestral concerts at Irving Hall. SANDERSON soon sails for Cuba, where he is a great favorite. GOTTSCHALK, who is soon going to Mexico, is still visible, with an appendage, which the following letter, lately received by him, will explain.

"Royal Palace of Madrid, 16th Sept. 1864.—Dear Sir: Her Majesty, the Queen, has deigned to sign this morning a decree, by which you are made a Knight of the Most Noble Royal Order of Charles the Third. I will have the honor of remitting you very soon the insignia of your new dignity. Meanwhile I beg to say that I am really happy to be on this occasion the interpreter of Her Majesty's flattering sentiments towards you. May God spare you many years! With respect, Your servant, His Excellency the Minister of State, Pacheco."

With this preliminary gossip, let me return to the doings of the Maretzek company since my last. The fact that the new artists had had but one rehearsal together, prior to their debut,—a most unfortunate circumstance for artists so little known to one another—resulted in great leniency in criticism; but the roughness and uncertainty consequent upon such a circumstance has completely worn off, and every thing passes smoothly and with great satisfaction. Artists, like operas, require acquaintance, with which they may or may not improve. In the present instance the improvement has been very perceptible, and the success of the season placed above doubt. As yet the promise of novelties has not been fulfilled, and we have been listening to the strains of operas, that have become as familiar as household words. The carefulness and correctness of their rendition, however, has made them welcome, even if lacking the charm of freshness.

Since my last, Maretzek has given us Verdi's Ballo in Maschera, with CAROZZI-ZUCCHI, MASSIMILIANI, BELLINI, BRAMBILLA, and the debut of Mlle. FRIDA DE GEBELE as Ulrica. This new artist is a lady of great promise, possessing a powerful voice;—some one has criticized her as "possessing a ponderous voice, and an insufficient command of it." The role of Ulrica is not favorable to a debutante, for it lacks any definite air or melody that an artist can use to advantage, and its grotesque "make-up" robs it of any personal charm. In a more congenial role Mlle. de Gebele will undoubtedly form an acceptable artist.

Lucrezia Borgia, with ZUCCHI, MORENSI, LOTTI, SUSINI and WEINLICH, was very finely rendered.

Faust introduced the favorite of last year, the charming Marguerite, CLARA LOUISE KELLOGG, and although there was marked comparison between the artists of last year and this, in the roles of Faustus and Mephistopheles—MAZZOLENI as compared with LOTTI, HERMANN with SUSINI—still the performance was very fine.

Poliuto has been the great success of the season, and will undoubtedly be repeated at an early day. Its cast embraces ZUCCHI, MASSIMILIANI, BELLINI and WEINLICH, and they all interpreted their respective roles in the most satisfactory manner.

To-night we are to have Martha, with Kellogg, Morensi, Lotti and Susini; Tuesday Poliuto; Wednesday Faust; Thursday Poliuto in Brooklyn; Friday Don Giovanni, and Saturday a matinee. Next week Robert the Devil will be revived. The following (election) week, the opera house will be closed, to be re-opened on the 10th November with Don Sebastian, which will unite the attraction of the spectacular and lyric drama.

Verdi's Forza del Destino will be the next novelty; but Mirella will be postponed until after its production by the German troupe, the Italians waiting to be sure of its success before presenting it themselves. Maretzek will make strenuous efforts to make opera permanent in New York, as he is tired of roaming around the country in "wandering minstrel" style.

T. W. M.

To the foregoing letter we append—presuming that our opera-going friends read French—the following from Le Messager Franco-Americain, published in New York:

ACADEMIE DE MUSIQUE. Croira-t-on qu'à propos de ce titre: Opera Italien, à la représentation d'avant-hier soir, à l'Académie de Musique, mon voisin de stalle, vieil abonné dont j'estime en ne peut plus et le jugement solide et l'excellente jumelle, me demanda tout d'un coup:—Monsieur, pourquoi cela s'appelle-t-il un opéra italien?—Mais probablement, lui dis-je, parce qu'on y donne des opéras italiens.—Faust, Don Sebastian, les Huguenots, le Prophète, Fra Diavolo, etc., sont-ce là vos opéras italiens?—Alors parce que ces opéras y sont chantés par des chanteurs italiens.—Bah! écoutez ceci,—et tirant de sa poche la liste des artistes qui composent la troupe de Maretzek:

Mlle. Laura Harris, américaine.
Morensi, do.
F. de Gebele, do.
Van Zandt, do.
De Motte, do.
MM. Lotti, allemand.
Veinlich, do.
Müller, do.
Reichart, do.

—Ma foi, répondis-je à bout d'arguments, vous admettez toujours qu'on y chante en Italien?
Mon vieil abonné se mit à rire en me montrant M. Veinlich qui chantait l'air d'entrée du 1<sup>er</sup> acte du Trovatore, et nous en restâmes là.

PHILADELPHIA.—A concert was lately given, at the Musical Fund Hall, by Mme. WHITING-LORINI and Messrs. STEFANI, TESTA and AMODIO, who have been on a successful operatic tour in the West. The Bulletin, says:

The First Grand Concert under the auspices of the New York Jeweller's Association will be given on Saturday evening at the Academy of Music. Mr. Gottschalk, the great pianist, is engaged, his performance at these concerts being the last he will give before he departs for Europe. Mrs. Behrens and an orchestra led by Mr. Bergfeld, are also engaged.

Messrs. CROSS and JARVIS have issued their annual advertisement of a series of four classical soirées, to be given in the Foyer of the Academy of Music. The great success of the former seasons and the growing love for music of a high character make it certain that there will be a large attendance of the best connoisseurs.

THE PHILADELPHIA CLASSICAL QUINTETTE CLUB is a new association formed by Messrs. Carl Gaertner, Charles H. Jarvis, M. H. Cross, C. Plageman, and Charles H. Schmitz. Their intention is to give a series of classical matinees in the Assembly Buildings. They will be given weekly at 3 P. M., on Wednesdays, beginning on the 16th of November.

THE GERMANIA ORCHESTRA held their annual election on Monday last. The following officers were chosen: John Grenn, President; C. Schmitz, Leader; A. Schmitz, Secretary; G. Bastert, treasurer; C. Reinhard, G. Mueller and C. Boettger, standing committee. All engagements and all business of the orchestra must be negotiated with the standing committee. The time for beginning the Saturday afternoon rehearsals, for the coming season has not been determined on.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- O could I see my father! Song and Chorus. J. W. Turner. 30
The mothers of our soldiers have more than their share of praise. There are many loving, tender hearted, patriotic fathers as well, who have felt that they risked far more than all their worldly goods, in sending their sons to the field. Mr. Turner has done well in remembering them in this fine ballad.
- Stick Together. Patriotic Song. R. Culver. 30
A patriotic sentiment. E Pluribus Unum, set to appropriate music.
- Union Soldier's Battle Song. R. Culver. 30
Will do to go with the other.
- Thirty years ago. Song. Anne Fricker. 30
A reminiscence of old times. Pretty.
- Morning Service in C. S. P. Tuckermann. $1.00
Stately and church like. The author's name is sufficient to warrant its sterling goodness.

Instrumental Music.

- Eugenia. Valse brilliant. E. Gilbert. 30
Quite original and brilliant. A good show piece for those who wish to please their friends, and not difficult.
- Little spring song. (Quellenliedchen) Salon Studie. Carl Hering. 30
A charming little study, which might be introduced to young players by the title of "What the brook said," for it prattles off its music as prettily as a rattle sing along its pebbly path. Easy and useful.
- Faust, by Gounod; (Revue melodique). 4 hands. F. Beyer. 75
A brilliant and not difficult arrangement.
- Ever merry mazourka. S. B. Whitney. 30 Light and "merry."

Books.

- FAUST; a Lyric Drama in Five acts, by C. Gounod. Adapted to English and Italian words, and revised from the full score, with indications of the instrumentation. $4.00

Those who wish to enjoy the opera at home, have now an opportunity. The book is well got up, the argument is well written, a good story by itself, and much of the music is quite within the reach of home singers. The indications of instrumentation are of value, as leading the mind to the charming orchestral effects which are so common throughout the composition.

- A NEW MANUAL OF THOROUGH BASS, AND TEXT BOOK OF MUSICAL THEORY. By Edward B. Oliver. Cloth, 67; Boards. 50

Mr. Oliver has done well by his fellow teachers in bringing out this small, but very comprehensive text book of the theory of music.

In this country, there are not many who wish to go through the whole course of harmony, as studied by the great composers. But there is a large and increasing number who desire to go through a thorough short course, so that they shall understand the great principles, and be able to compose common music well. This is a capital book for this class. It is arranged with questions and answers like a catechism, and is easily taught from.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 616.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, NOV. 12, 1864.

VOL. XXIV. No. 17.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Half a dozen of Beethoven's Contemporaries.

II. ANTONIO SALIERI.

[Continued from page 330.]

From this point down to 1816 there is a break in Salieri's notices of his own history as composer—a period of eleven years—and one which Mosel but partially fills with notices drawn mainly from the correspondence found among Salieri's papers. From these notices and from other sources, let a slight picture of this portion of his life be drawn—from his 56th to his 66th year. It was the period of the Napoléonic wars, one of domestic calamity and sorrow to the composer, from whom his son, three of his daughters, and at last his angel of a wife were taken. Moreover the change in public taste in relation to the opera was one which to him seemed all for the worse. Of this change he writes: "From that period I became aware that the taste for that [dramatic] music was turning gradually into a direction quite contrary to that of my time. Extravagance and a confusion of the various species of composition introduced themselves in the place of a rational and masterly simplicity."

Altogether, it is not at all remarkable that he rejected even the two applications which came to him from the Parisian Grand Opera in these years, to compose for the stage. He obeyed an order from the Vienna Opera, which had now become permanently German—the visits of Italian troops being already but extra seasons—to revise and alter the second act of his famous French work "Les Danaïdes," with a German text by F. X. Hüber, (author of the words to Beethoven's "Christ on the Mt. of Olives,"); but circumstances prevented it from coming to performance. Besides this, I find, during this time, no mention of any dramatic work from his pen—that pen which from 1769 ("Le donne letterate,") to 1802 ("Die Neger") had given to the stage thirty-nine complete operas, and which had made him known from Naples to Riga, from Paris to Warsaw.

But that pen was by no means inactive, though in another field. The number of his compositions for the church—that is, for special use in the palace chapel—was greatly increased; such as a Vesper service consisting of six psalms, a hymn, a Salve Regina and a litany; a number of Graduals, Offertories and the like. He wrote five patriotic choruses, four of which came to performance on public occasions during the wars—for instance one with an echo: "May Providence, oh happy Austria, thee protect," which closed a concert opened by Beethoven's "Coriolan" overture, on 25th April, 1814; and in 1816 he published 24 variations for full orchestra upon a theme called "La follia di Spagna."

"Da quell' epoca poi mi sono ancora assorto che il gusto della musica si andava a poco la volta cangiando in una maniera tutto affatto contraria a miei tempi. La stravaganza e la confusione dei generi si è introdotta in luogo d'una ragionata e maestrale semplicità."

During these years the master's ordinary course of life was generally this: four days in the week the morning hours were taken up with his duties in the chapel and as Vice-president of the Institute for Musicians' Widows and Orphans. On the other three days, the hours from nine to one were devoted to giving instruction, gratis, in singing, thorough bass and composition to students of both sexes. His afternoons to his long walks; his evenings with musical friends, where the works of Gluck, of the old Italian masters and such of his own as were unknown in Vienna, or had long been laid aside, formed the staple of the evening's entertainment. He was a voracious reader, and what time remained over was devoted to books. He had much literary taste, and most if not all the texts to his "Scherzi Armonici" were of his own composition. The theatre he very seldom visited, and the more so as composers departed more widely from what he held to be the only true dramatic style. He believed that a reaction would take place, and that a time would come when simplicity and delicacy of expression would again be the aim of the dramatic composer.

That time has not yet (1864) come; but the enormous demand for new editions of Mozart's, Haydn's, and other composers' works for the piano-forte, shows a reaction from the monstrosities of the pseudo new school in that branch of music, as the revival of Handel and Bach, and the study of their works in their completeness does in another; and one can but hope, that by and by the braying of brass and the crash of barbaric noise-making tools will give place in the operatic orchestra to — music.

But the gloom caused by domestic sorrow seems to have been brightened by his religious faith; as any feelings of disappointment which the course of public taste had taken, in Vienna at least, were consoled by the proofs of esteem and regard which came to him from all quarters, and by revivals of some of his works, made with splendid success.

At the celebrated production of the "Creation," March 27th, 1808, at which Haydn was present for the last time, when all that was distinguished in the musical world of Vienna, came together to do the old man honor, and women of the highest ranks of the nobility gave their shawls to protect him from the draught,—it was Salieri who held the chief place—who conducted. In December, 1813, he joined in those two grand concerts in which Beethoven produced his 7th Symphony and his "Battle of Vittoria," not thinking it beneath his dignity to conduct the band of drums and clashing instruments, which represent the shock of the contending armies.

One great enjoyment during those years was afforded him by the Moravian Count, Henry von Haugwitz. This nobleman, a devout admirer of the solid compositions of Gluck, Naumann, and especially Handel, and wealthy enough to retain his own orchestra and singers, not only called Salieri in to conduct the works of those authors when in Vienna, but, during several summers had him at his seat in Moravia. There the composer's two passions were gratified to the full, his love for Gluck and Handel, and his love of nature.

In the spring of 1813, there came letters to him from Paris, which did his heart good; they announced the performance there of his "Azur" at the Italian Opera, with a success amounting to enthusiasm—not less than that which that opera in its original form, as "Tarare," had won on the French stage. After the air of Aspasia, "Son queste le speranze," the clapping of hands, shouting "Viva Salieri!" lasted nearly a quarter of an hour.

The foundation at Vienna of the great "Society of the Friends of Music," about this time, gave him another opportunity to labor for the cause of good music, which he embraced, and for some time led the weekly rehearsals. For this Society he composed a very curious work,—a school of singing, in which all the rules are versified, and then the stanzas set to such music as illustrates the very words which one is singing.

Another work of this period was a plan for private study and instruction in the nine species of musical composition, which comprehended a full explanation of the characteristics of each. As a further illustration, he prepared the skeleton of an opera in which can be introduced any desirable examples of these species of composition, the person representing a chapelmaster explaining their peculiarities. Salieri supposed, too, that such an opera might be the medium for bringing upon the stage many works or parts of works of deserving but forgotten composers. There is one stubborn fact, however, in the way of such a project—people go to the opera for amusement, not for instruction.

The reader may perhaps remember that Gassmann reached Vienna with the boy Anton Salieri, June 15, 1766, and that the first thing the next morning was to take him to the Italian church to perform his devotions; and that on the way home the master said to his pupil: "I thought I must begin your musical education with God. It will now depend upon yourself whether the result shall be good or bad. At all events I shall have done my duty!"

The 16th of June, 1816, the semi-centennial anniversary of that first walk in Vienna, was coming on apace, and was longingly anticipated both by Salieri and his friends. They had determined to celebrate it in a becoming manner; but more than all—and so far as appears, quite unknown to the composer,—the Emperor, Francis I., was preparing a surprise for him. Early on the morning of that day, Salieri, accompanied by the four daughters who remained to him, went to the Italian church to offer his thanks to the Almighty for all the blessings and the extraordinary success which had crowned his fifty years of conscientious study and labor. At 10 in the morning a court carriage took him to the hotel of Prince Trauttmansdorf-Weinsberg, chief marshal at court, where he found all the members of the chapel awaiting him in the anteroom. The prince and Count Kueffstein, the "Musikgraf," (general director of the Court music), immediately entered and led him into the room selected for the little ceremony which was coming. The members of the chapel came in and ranged themselves in a half circle; in the front of which Trautmansdorf and Kueffstein took their places with Salieri between them. The former now made an address to the composer, explaining in terms the most flattering the grounds upon which the Emperor had decided to decorate him with the great civic gold medal and chain of honor. At the close of the address the Prince hung the chain about his neck and embraced him; Kueffstein then followed with a short speech and embrace. Salieri's reply, out of a full heart, was a simple expression of thanks, with the remark in substance, that his soul at this joyful moment was filled with double delight, from the proof afforded him of the monarch's satisfaction with his efforts, and because he had the opportunity to here express his sincere thanks to his fellow-servants of the chapel, for their unremitting zeal in sustaining him, and in gaining the chapel its widespread fame. After a few minutes spent in receiving the congratulations of the gentlemen present, he drove to the palace chapel—it being Sunday—to conduct the usual 11 o'clock grand mass. He chose one of his own masses for performance, with graduale and offertory, also by him, in which both text and music expressed praise and thanks to the Most High.

After service came a dinner in the company of his four daughters and a few intimate friends. Towards six o'clock, in answer to special invitations, his past and present pupils—except Hummel and Moscheles, who were not then in Vienna—were assembled:—Carl von Dahlhof, Joseph Weigl, Stunz, Franz Schubert, Asmeyer, Liszt, (not the pianist), students of composition; Mozatti, Fröhlich, Platzer and Salzmann, singers; Madams Rosenbaum and Fux—both were daughters of his old teacher Gassmann—and twelve others of his female pupils in singing.

Salieri placed himself at the piano-forte with his daughters beside him, all dressed alike; at his right hand the fourteen female pupils in a half circle; at his left the twelve men similarly placed. In front two seats had been placed for Trautmansdorf and Kueffstein—the former, however, happened to be called out to Schönbraun by the arrival of the Emperor from Italy—the latter was present. Between the seats placed for these noblemen, stood a bust of Joseph II., his first master "and, I may say," adds Salieri in his notes, "my father, protector and benefactor." When all were in their places, the chapelmaster made a short speech in his usual broken German, ("How can I have thoroughly learned German, since I have only lived fifty years in Germany?" he was in the habit of saying, when jesting upon his incapacity to bring his Italian organs to the correct enunciation of the German gutturals)—praying his friends and pupils to thank God, in his name, for his mercy, in granting him a life now of fifty years in Vienna and in the service of the Imperial Court, "at least without disgrace to his native land, his family and his friends." This thanksgiving consisted on the part of the pupils in singing a chorus of which both words and music were by Salieri. Then followed pieces suited to the occasion by each of his pupils in composition, beginning with the most recent of them, and including two which had been sent in by the absent Hummel and Moscheles. The concert closed by singing some numbers of one of Salieri's oratorios, consisting of solos, choruses, and an echo from the next room.

On the same day he received the imperial permission to accept his diploma, as member of the French Academy, and the medal of the Legion of Honor, sent him by Louis XVIII., both granted in acknowledgment of his distinguished services in the cause of music and of the great reputation gained by his works for the Parisian stage. What doubtless added much to the interest of this occasion, was the fact that the year before Salieri had been brought very low by a fit of sickness.

(To be continued.)

History of the Leipzig Gewandhaus Concerts.

III.

SINCE MENDELSSOHN.

During the winter of 1847-48 Gade continued the direction of the Gewandhaus Concerts, producing in them his symphony in A minor (No. 3), and his Comala overture. In the following spring the political troubles consequent upon the breaking out of the first Schleswig-Holstein war, compelled him to return to Copenhagen, where he was appointed Hofkapellmeister by the King of Denmark.

From 1848 to 1852 and from 1854 to 1860 the Kapellmeistership was held by Dr. Julius Riets. The multiplicity of his labors—for, besides directing in the Gewandhaus, he was Kapellmeister in the theatre and the Singakademie, and Professor in the Conservatorium—induced him to withdraw from the Gewandhaus from 1852 to 1854, during which time the Herren Gade and David conducted. In 1854 Dr. Riets gave up the theatre and returned to the Gewandhaus, where he continued until in 1860 the King of Saxony called him to Dresden as the successor of Reissiger. Dr. Riets is a born director. His intense energy at times, it must be confessed, manifesting itself rather roughly, carried everything before it. There was no will in the orchestra but his. And rough though he might be, every one knew that he was thoroughly upright, and that his only thought was to make the orchestra "go"—and go it did, without any doubt. It is not asserting too much to say that as a conductor of orchestral music he was, and is without a rival.

In 1850, in the hope of retaining Joachim—then a youth of 19—in the orchestra, the post of second Concertmeister was created. Joachim did not retain it long, as he accepted a call to Weimer in the same year. The office was found so useful that it was continued and Herr Raimund Dreveschok was invested with it, and still worthily fulfils its duties.

In 1860 Herr Karl Reinecke was elected as Dr. Riets's successor. A thorough musician, and, in a particular style, a composer of singular elegance and merit, Herr Reinecke has hardly that energy and decision which are necessary where one has to command men. The Leipzig orchestra has certain traditions, and where these do not harmonize with the readings of the Kapellmeister it is apt to take the bit between its teeth and bolt. Such antagonisms were more frequent in the earlier part of Herr Reinecke's reign. Lately the commander and his forces seem to understand each other better, and consequently things go smoother.

It has sometimes been made a reproach that the directors of the Gewandhaus Concerts are too conservative. If it be a sin to refuse works of the Liszt-Wagner school, then the reproach is just. But if the directors are of opinion that the spread of this school would be destructive to the art of music, they are no more to blame than the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's would be for not inviting Professor Renan to preach in their cathedral. It is quite right that these works should be heard, but let them be brought forward and performed by those who sympathize with their tendency.

A more just cause of complaint is the state of the vocal performances, both solo and choral. With regard to the soloists, the directors are not so much to blame. They have but a certain sum at their disposal, and so long as the locality is not enlarged this sum cannot be increased. The large sums which first-class singers demand could only be met by starving the orchestra. Rather than do this it would be better to dispense with solo singers altogether. Not so guiltless are the directors with regard to the choral department. Formerly the chorus was supplied, when required, by the Singakademie, the Pauliner Verein, and the Thomaner choir. Now the Gewandhaus has a chorus of its own, which is occasionally augmented by the Thomaner singers. Whether it be from insufficient practice, or from want of interest, or from inefficient training I cannot say; but the fact remains, that the choral singing is most unsatisfactory. When Mendelssohn was director he had the pick of all the voices. Every one was proud to work under him. Now there are singing societies without number—each having, perhaps, a few good voices and trained singers; but these few overpowered by the great majority of the voiceless and careless.

The locality too, in which the concerts are held may have something to do with this dark side. Excellent as are the acoustic properties of the Gewandhaus Saal for an orchestra on Beethoven's scale, it is too small for music so heavily instrumented as are many modern compositions, which require a far larger number of strings to cover the brass. The room can only seat about 800, and about eighty of these have to be turned out when the orchestra is enlarged for a chorus. These eighty and other unfortunate, who after years of waiting are still unable to obtain a reserved seat, have to sit in a small room at the end of the large Saal, the folding doors of which are so filled up by a standing crowd that all the sounds have to filter through the heads of the latter. There ought to be money enough in wealthy Leipzig to build a new concert room with an organ and all the appliances of modern art. But the directors seem to fear that the Gewandhaus would lose prestige. But surely it is the performances, not the room, which have acquired such a fame. If it may be allowed for a foreigner to make a suggestion, I would say, why not remove the City Library, which now occupies a room under the Gewandhaus roof, and use the ample space which would be thus gained for the erection of a first-class concert hall. The old Gewandhaus Saal, would then remain for the chamber music concerts, for which it would be difficult to find a locality more thoroughly appropriate. There can be little doubt that as a commercial speculation this alteration would pay as well as its boon to art would be great.

It is often asked, do Gewandhaus concerts take the same high stand they formerly did? The just answer would be, positively, yes; but relatively, no. It is not that they have fallen, but that others have risen. The music schools (Leipzig at their head) have sent out so many pupils, that the number of competent well-trained musical performers has increased, and through them the public has had its taste exalted. Hence, as I have said before, there is hardly a town in Germany of any size where the works of the great masters may not be heard, generally decently, and in many cases excellently performed.

I have spoken of the cordial warmth of the public in Mendelssohn's time. Would that it existed still! Now it seems as if the audience feared to compromise its reputation by applauding a new work or artist. Surely criticism, if it be good for anything, is as much shown in appreciating promise as in finding out weakness. But as it is at present, I would not advise any unknown composer or artist to make a first appearance in the Gewandhaus.

Another piece of advice may be useful. Let those pianists who can do so bring their own instruments with them. The pianos provided by the managers of the concerts are almost always poor and ungrateful in tone, and admit little or no expression. A player accustomed to a Broadwood or an Erard would be woefully disappointed.

I will not close this rapid survey of the history of the Gewandhaus Concerts with words of censure. Whatever may have been their shortcomings in minor matters, there can be no doubt that the advance of art has been the object which the directors have always kept in view, and that they have deserved well of the world of music. May the coming season show that for the future, as in the past, they will carry out their motto:—

"RES SEVERA EST VERUM GAUDIUM."

Richard Wagner's Programme to his Overture to "Tannhauser."

A procession of pilgrims is passing. Their chant, full of faith and penitence, pervaded by hope and trust in salvation, is heard gradually approaching; then, close at hand, it swells into a mighty wave and finally retires. Twilight, and the dying echo of the chant.

Now, as the shades of evening fall, magical visions hover in sight. A mist, deep-tinged with rosy hues, arises; rapturous sounds of joy strike the ear; the movements of an exciting and luxurious dance are felt. These are the dangerous charms of the "Venus-Mount," which at nightly hour manifest themselves to those in whose bosoms the keen passions of sense are burning.

Attracted by the alluring vision, a tall, manly form approaches. It is Tannhäuser, the minne-singer, the minstrel on his way to sing of love in the poetical contest at the Wartburg. He causes his proud, exulting song of love to resound, joyful and defiant, as if to conjure up around him the luxurious magic. He is answered by wild shouts of joy; closer and closer the rosy vapors encircle him, enchanting odors float around him and intoxicate his senses. He is dazzled by the sight of a female form of indescribable beauty that appears before him in the most seductive twilight. He hears her voice, falling upon his ear in sweet, trembling tones, like the song of the syrens, and promising to the bold the fulfilment of his wildest wishes. It is Venus herself whom he beholds.

Then his heart and his passions are all on fire; a hot, consuming desire kindles the blood in his veins; an irresistible power urges him to draw near, and he steps before the goddess herself with his song of joy and exultation, which now in rapturous delight he pours forth in her praise.

In answer to his thrilling song, the wonders of the "Venus-Mount" are now displayed before him in all their splendor; impetuous shouts and wild, ecstatic cries resound from all sides; Bacchantes, drunk with pleasure, sweep by, and in their frantic dances carry Tannhäuser away, into the arms of the goddess, burning with love; she draws him after her toward the regions of annihilation. The wild host rushes on and the storm subsides. Plaintive sounds still stir the air, and murmurs, like the sighing of unholy, sensual passion, float over the spot where the enchanting vision was beheld, and night again spreads over it.

But behold! the morning dawns. In the far off distance the chant of the pilgrims is again heard; it draws ever nearer; day evermore conquers night. The murmuring and sighing of the breezes, that resounded in our ears like the awful wailing of the damned, rings in more joyful sounds; and when at last the glorious sun arises, and the chant of the pilgrims with powerful inspiration proclaims to all the world that salvation is obtained, sonorous waves of supreme bliss float around us. It is the rejoicing of the "Venus-Mount" itself, freed from the curse and stain of unholy, that we hear mingling with the song of heaven. All the pulses of life move and quicken at this song of redemption; and now those two unnaturally divorced elements, reason and the senses, the spiritual and the material, God and nature, embrace in a holy, all-uniting kiss of Love.

Wagner's "Tannhäuser."

FROM THE DESCRIPTION BY FRANZ LISZT.*

The first scene leads us into the mysterious grotto, which, as the tradition tells, was in the Hirsberg. There in a rosy twilight we see nymphs, dryads and bacchantes waving their thyrsus wands and wreaths to the rhythms which formed the first fifty bars in the Allegro of the overture. They surround the goddess, luxuriously stretched upon her couch, clad in the Grecian tunic, which flows in rich folds around her form, as if its slight net-work formed a yet rosier vapor than the whole atmosphere around. In the depths of the grotto the tranquil waters of the lake reflect the shadows of the bushes, under which happy couples wander to and fro; there we behold the tempting syrens. At the feet of Dame Venus sits her lover, melancholy and gloomy, listlessly holding his harp in his hand. She asks him the cause of his sadness. He heaves a deep sigh, as if awaking from a dream that had led him away from the surrounding element. Alarmed, she presses her inquiries. "Freedom!" replies the prisoner at last, and suddenly seizing his harp, he begins a song, in which he makes a vow ever to praise her charms, but adds that he is consumed by a yearning for the upper world:

But from these rose-lit od'rous bowers
I yearn for woods and breath of flowers,
For our own sky's clear blue serenade,
For our fresh meadows' pleasant green,
Our little wood-birds cheerful singing,
Our village bells so friendly ringing:—
From thy soft empire I must flee
O queen, and goddess: set me free!

This song, full of manly energy, gives us again the melody which we have twice indicated in the overture; its words are in praise of Venus. But this strophe is instantly followed by an antistrophe, which, by painful, half-disturbed modulations, escapes from the breast like a piercing scream; the scream of the caged eagle, that would return to the realm of storms and sunshine; the cry of the soul, that would wing its way back to heaven. Thrice are strophe and antistrophe repeated, and every time a half tone higher, which lends thrilling climax to their impassioned intonation.

By a single word, but one of those words which suffice to invest Poesy with the fullest majesty of her sister, Truth, Wagner reveals the greatness of a soul unsatisfied in the lap of sweetest inactivity, when Tannhäuser exclaims:

Mortal remain I yet, and human;
Too great thy love, thou more than woman;
If gods forever can enjoy.
My lot is change, my pleasures cloy;
Not joy alone my heart contains,
In pleasures still I long for pains.

To long for pains! Is not that the longing for the Infinite? For what are pains but the sufferings of the soul chafing against the limits of our nature, which it will never renounce striving to overstep?

The offended enchantress starts up, like a wounded tigress, interrupts her prisoner, snatching the harp from his hand, and summoning up a cloud, which parts them from each other, she mocks at the vain remorse of her delirious slave. She reminds him that he is accursed, that he belongs to her through all the powers of everlasting doom, that he must no more think of a world which would repulse him with horror, should he go back. The proud knight does not believe the imperious dame, and replies: "Repentance will remove the ban!" Their mutual resistance is expressed in a duet, full of impetus, of mutually kindled scorn and hatred, which Venus suddenly breaks off, to have recourse to weapons of blandishment. She lets the songs of the syrens resound, which in the distance seem to grow still more languishing and seductive; and inclining herself towards him, she seems to distil the fatal poison drop by drop into his veins,—that impotence of pleasure which twines about his drooping energies with indissoluble chains. Her somewhat lengthy song takes, a semitone lower, that lovely motive which we quoted in the overture (5th example). It is accompanied, too, pianissimo, and veiled by the tremolo of the violins. To those who cherish symbolism, this scene may be designated as the description of one of those inward conflicts, which rend the manly breast, during which the soul debates with itself, however divided it may be in its will, unlike in forms, but identical in essence; such would fancy that they heard in it, not different persons, but different expressions of the passions, rebutting one another in a vehement conference, whose fatal or marvellous issue no one could foresee. Tannhäuser forcibly disenthuses himself from the arms of the goddess, and in feverish excitement exclaims: "My salvation lies in the holy Maria!" Scarcely has he pronounced this name, when the goddess, the nymphs, the syrens and bacchantes vanish. It all melts away.

Instead of the grotto, we see the outside of the mountain, in whose interior all this is located by tradition, and the rural scenery about the Wartburg. In an instant the knight is transported from the depths, where in the intoxicating mist of sweet perfumes the lamps with their colored sheen illumined a night of pleasures without end, into the freshness of a pure Spring morning. To the bewildered tumult of the last scene succeeds total silence of the orchestra, and the soft, dreamy tune of a shepherd, seated on a neighboring rock; the refrain of his reed pipe, happily imitated by the English horn, creates a beneficial contrast. Presently you hear a chorus of pilgrims in the distance; during the pauses the voice of the shepherd, commending himself to their prayers, forms a new contrast; his pastoral melody winds like a flowering field vine about the stern outlines of the pious hymn, which rises like the arching of a Gothic vault.

The pilgrims approach, appear and pass before us, and their song, in which the second half of the religious theme of the overture is woven, wears a calm and serenely pious character. In this repose there vibrates, however, a certain exaltation and enthusiasm, and you can distinguish in it an enduring ecstasy, a secret uncontrollable delight. They stop before an image of the Madonna; Tannhäuser at their chant falls upon his knees. As much overwhelmed by the miracle of mercy, that has rescued him, as he is surprised to see his bold wish so suddenly heard, his deliverance so unexpectedly fulfilled, he repeats the words of the pilgrims:

Ah, heavy weigh my sins on me,
No longer can I bear the trial;
All rest and comfort now I'll flee,
And choose but pain and self-denial.

The bells of the distant churches summon the faithful to morning prayer, and at the same time hunting-horn signals, from different distances (alternating between F major and E flat minor), complete the impression of this hour of rural repose and woodland solicitude. Presently the landgrave with his hunting party comes along, and perceiving a knight who takes no part in the chase, he approaches him and recognizes Tannhäuser. We have already said, that Wolfram von Eschenbach, his rival in minstrelsy as in love for the princess Elizabeth, who loves him, has finally persuaded him, in speaking of her, to resume his old rank among the minstrels, whom he has so often vanquished, and who nevertheless have mourned his absence. This cantilena of a lovely melodic motive, breathing a tender and inward emotion, is resumed again in its first eight measures and dialogued in the andante of a Sextet, composed of the five singers and the landgrave, who intreat Tannhäuser to return to them. At the name of Elizabeth his face lights up with a quickening beam, and he exclaims:

Again I know thee, ah! and love thee.
O beautiful world, so long withdrawn!
Again the heavens smile sweet above me,
And flowers are fresh with dewy morn.
The Spring with thousand friendly greetings
Like music in my soul doth stir;
In tender and tumultuous beatings
My heart cries out: To her! to her!

As soon as his voice unites with the others, the Septuor sets into a joyful and rapturous Allegro, whose finale, interrupted by the fanfare of the chase, forms the conclusion of the first act. The different voices are grouped in such a masterly manner, and their parts in this ensemble piece are marked with such select and noble fineness, that there is no mistaking therein the calling of the minstrel, the challenge of noble rivals to a noble contest. This finale takes an irresistible hold upon the public, and universal admiration and applause resound through the hall.

The Worcester Organ.

ITS TRIAL AND ACCEPTANCE.—INTERESTING EXERCISES AT MECHANICS' HALL.

(From the Worcester Spy, Oct. 27.)

The noble instrument, the completion of which has been so earnestly anticipated by all classes of our citizens, was formally transferred from the building committee to the Mechanics' Association last evening.

The citizens of Worcester, through whose liberality the instrument has been erected, have just cause for pride and congratulation. It was their design, which has been so ably seconded by the committee into whose charge its construction was given, to place in their beautiful hall a first-class concert organ, which should be a full and correct representation of the progress of the art in America.

Messrs. E. & G. G. Hook of Boston, to whom this important work was assigned, have faithfully endeavored to make their work as perfect as could be produced, and the result is alike honorable to them as builders and to the enterprise of our citizens.

In comparing this instrument with the largest organs built in America, superiority over all others is claimed by its extensive selection of effective and beautiful stops, its improved and artistic voicing, and by the facility with which all is brought under the control of the performer—the three essential characteristics which correctly determine the size and rank of the organ.

As the best means of presenting the capacity and magnitude of the instrument we give a list of stops, &c., which are carefully selected, and present a combination capable of producing almost every desired effect:

LIST OF STOPS, &c.

Great Manual.

1. Open Diapason,	16 feet.	58	pipes.
2. Open Diapason,	8 "	58	"
3. Viola Da Gamba	8 "	58	"
4. Stopped Diapason,	8 "	58	"
5. Claribella,	8 "	58	"
6. Principal,	4 "	58	"
7. Flute Harmonique,	4 "	58	"
8. Twelfth,	2 2-3"	58	"
9. Fifteenth,	2 "	58	"
10. Mixture,	3 ranks.	174	"
11. Mixture,	5 "	290	"
12. Trumpet,	16 feet.	58	"
13. Trumpet,	8 "	58	"
14. Clarion,	4 "	58	"

Swell Manual.

15. Bourdon,	16 feet.	58	pipes.
16. Open Diapason,	8 "	58	"
17. Stopped Diapason,	8 "	58	"
18. Viol d'Amour,	8 "	58	"
19. Principal,	4 "	58	"
20. Flute Octavante,	4 "	58	"
21. Violin.	4 "	58	"
22. Twelfth,	2 2-3"	58	"
23. Fifteenth,	2 "	58	"

* For the entire analysis of Tannhäuser, by Liszt, see DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC, Vol. IV. (1863—4).

24. Mixture,	5 ranks.	290	pipes.
25. Trumpet,	16 feet.	46	"
26. Cornopean,	8 "	58	"
27. Oboe,	8 "	58	"
28. Clarion,	4 "	58	"
29. Vox Humana,	8 "	58	"

Choir Manual.

30. Aeolina & Bordoun,	16 feet.	58	pipes.
31. Open Diapason,	8 "	58	"
32. Melodia,	8 "	57	"
33. Dulciana,	8 "	58	"
34. Keraulophon,	8 "	58	"
35. Flauto Traverso,	4 "	58	"
36. Violin,	4 "	58	"
37. Picolo,	2 "	58	"
38. Mixture,	3 ranks.	174	"
39. Clarinet,	8 feet.	58	"

Solo Manual.

40. Philomela,	8 feet	58	pipes.
41. Salicional,	8 "	58	"
42. Hohl Pfeife,	4 "	58	"
43. Picolo,	2 "	58	"
44. Tuba,	8 "	58	"
45. Corno Inglese,	8 "	58	"

Pedale.

46. Open Diapason,	16 feet	30	pipes.
47. Violone,	16 "	30	"
48. Bordoun,	16 "	30	"
49. Violoncello,	8 "	30	"
50. Quinte,	10 1/2 "	30	"
51. Flute,	8 "	30	"
52. Posaune,	16 "	30	"

Mechanical Registers.

53. Swell to Great Coupler.
54. Swell to Choir "
55. Choir to Great "
56. Solo to Great "
57. Choir to Solo "
58. Great to Pedale "
59. Choir to Pedale "
60. Choir to Pedale " (super octaves.)
61. Swell to Pedale "
62. Solo to Pedale "
63. Tremulant ("swell.")
64. Bellows Signal.
65. Pedale Check.
66. Ventil (for No. 48).
67. Ventil (for Nos. 50, 51, and 52.)

Combination Pedals.

No. 1. { Great Manual. } Forte.
No. 2. { Swell Manual. } Piano.
No. 3. { Swell Manual. } Forte.
No. 4. { Swell Manual. } Piano.
No. 5. { Choir Manual. } Forte.
No. 6. { Choir Manual. } Piano.
No. 7. (Pedale) operates on Nos. 46, 50, 51, and 52, and with the aid of Ventil (Nos. 66 and 67), allows of various combinations.
No. 8. { Couplers. } Forte.
No. 9. { Couplers. } Piano.
No. 10. Operates on "Great Pedale" Coupler.
Balanced Swell Pedal, with double action.

SUMMARY:

No. of stops of Great Manual...	14, with 1160 pipes,
" " Swell Manual...	16, " 1090 "
" " Choir Manual...	10, " 696 "
" " Solo Manual...	6, " 348 "
" " Pedale...	7, " 210 "
No. of Mechanical Registers...	15,
" Combination Pedals...	10,

Total.....77 3504 pipes.

Many rare and costly stops, and many new mechanical arrangements are introduced, and by means of the pneumatic lever, which is applied to the great manual, and connected by couplers to each of the others, all four manuals, comprising the thousands of pipes distributed throughout the various departments of this large instrument, are operated with unusual ease and promptness.

The pipes are supplied with wind by two very large bellows, the reservoirs of each containing nearly 200 cubic feet, each of different pressure, and controlled by mechanism in a room beneath the organ.

The whole occupies a space nearly the entire width and height of the rear end of the hall, with a depth of about 25 feet.

THE TRIAL LAST NIGHT.

The formal presentation took place last evening, previous to which the instrument was exhibited in all its various capacities of tone, force and volume, by Mr. J. H. Willcox, organist at the Church of the Immaculate Conception in Boston, one of the most accomplished organists in this country. Without any formal programme, he gave selections which would best exhibit the instrument in all its parts: and his ability and control of the instrument, no less than the excellence of the organ itself, won frequent applause from his audience.

The gathering was not intended for a public exhibition, but only as an opportunity for the organ committee and the contributors to the fund, to gain some knowledge of the instrument, and if it was found worthy, to be formally transferred to the Mechanics' Association, as the gift of the citizens of Worcester.

The trial was as full and complete as it was possible to give in an hour and a half in the hands of a superior organist, and was eminently satisfactory in every respect. This is not the time for a comparison of this with any other instrument, but it is safe to say that it has few if any superiors in this country. To mention one of the features in which it stands pre-eminently superior to the great Boston organ, we ought to particularize the vox humana stop, which seems to be as nearly perfect as it is possible for art to attain. But the countenance of every person present last night showed plainly how satisfactory beyond expression of words the noble instrument was. It is a splendid organ.

At the close of the exhibition Dr. Bemis, in behalf of the building committee, asked the trustees if they were satisfied with the organ as exhibited at the trial this evening, which was answered by a hearty "yea." A similar inquiry of the audience in general was in like manner answered with hearty applause.

THE COLLATION—SPEECH BY JUDGE CHAPIN.

The musical part of the evening's entertainment was followed by a collation, * * * * after which the assembly was called to order and

JUDGE CHAPIN opened the formal exercises with a few words of compliment for the magnificent organ, and said in behalf of the organ committee that they had tried to do their work well. The gentlemen who were to make the formal presentation and reception of the organ he would call upon immediately, and all following contributions would be, like the subscriptions for the organ, voluntary. In alluding to the work of the committee he said the gentleman on his right (Mr. Abraham Firth) was deserving of more commendation than any other living man. It was chiefly through his individual exertion that the work had been so promptly and successfully carried through. One other firm was deeply interested both in heart and pocket—the contractors,—and never was contract more honorably and faithfully performed than that made by the Messrs. Hook. The amount of their bill ($9040) has been paid, and in answer to a question as to what they would build another organ like it for they say not a cent less than twenty thousand dollars. It might be judged what we owe for this magnificent gift. * * * *

THE PRESENTATION BY MR. FIRTH.

Mr. President:—It is well known to you, sir, that in the month of April, 1863, now 18 months ago, a few gentlemen in this city met to consider whether the time had come to give this hall an organ. A generous citizen had offered $1000 to the Mechanics' Association for one, on certain conditions, but it was not known that the money would be accepted on the terms offered. At that meeting a large committee was appointed to consider and act according to circumstances, with full power. They decided to appeal to the public spirit of the city. They met a response beyond their highest hopes, so that in August, 1863, they saw their way clear to contract with Messrs. E. & G. G. Hook of Boston, for a first-class instrument; but subsequent subscriptions enabled the committee to add several valuable stops to the original specification, until it assumed its present noble proportions, making it worthy, in the judgment of the committee, to be known now and henceforth as the WORCESTER ORGAN.

Now why this liberality? I know I express the sentiments of the organ committee, and I think I do those of all the donors now before me, when I say that they hope to be able to have hereafter concerts of a rarer value than were possible without it, and at a price within reach of our whole population. They believe that such concerts will not only aid in the musical education of the community, but do a greater service in carrying far the refining influences of the best music. They hope to see, under the direction of competent and liberal men, from time to time, a series of them, so varied as to offer another means of innocent recreation to our busy workers, besides withdrawing many, and especially our young men, from places where no good can come.

They know, also, that this organ may powerfully aid every cause of charity, whenever meetings in that sacred name shall be held here; and I rejoice, sir, that the trustees have already most promptly and honorably offered gratuitously both hall and organ for a concert to help our excellent Ladies' Soldiers' Aid Society, under the auspices of the organ committee.

It shall lend its might too in arousing the men of the city to their duty, at the call of patriotism; it shall add solemnity and pathos to the Requiem over the "unreturned brave"; and sound its loudest and sweetest peans on that doubly blessed day when peace shall be proclaimed, and "liberty throughout the land to all the inhabitants thereof."

Or when met in the name of religion, its inspiring tones shall "introduce their sacred song" and make the occasion more hallowed.

"For," to solemn and eternal things
We would dedicate the notes sublime."

Nor can this instrument, in this place, fail to bring here county and state musical festivals, even if they have yet to be inaugurated. Our city musical organizations it will directly and continually assist, and when the children of the public schools meet here their sweet voices shall be led and harmonized by its sympathizing accompaniment. Already, sir, the board of trustees have voted that all the children in our schools shall have an early opportunity to hear it without charge.

So that, sir, it is no figure of speech to say, this hall has now a voice: a voice which many will come far to hear; a voice in harmony with all that is elevating, noble, pure and devout; more melodious than any "pealing organ" Milton ever heard, and which was yet sweet enough to "Disperse him into ecstasies

And bring all Heaven before his eyes."

And now, sir, (turning to the representatives of the Mechanics' Association,) I rejoice to add that we are able to give it to your association.

And now, having dealt unselfishly with the association you represent, these donors have a right to expect, and they do expect, that in the discharge of their high trust, the trustees will be governed by an intelligent, generous, and far-sighted public spirit. * * *

But, sir, as you know, we hold this piece of wonderful mechanism only a few brief hours, until we can transfer all our rights and title to the society you so well represent. That moment has now come. Speaking by request of the contract committee, and also in the name of the donors before me, I now declare their wish that the Worcester County Mechanics' Association accept this organ without conditions other than those which are of public concern and have regard only to the best interests of the community.

Do you, sir, accept it in their behalf?

Then I pass into your hands this key as the outward symbol that the Worcester organ now belongs to the Worcester County Mechanics' Association.

[We regret that we have not room for Mr. BALL's speech of acceptance, as well as for the interesting speeches by Mayor LINCOLN (of Worcester), Judge RUSSELL (of Boston), Rev. Dr. HILL, Rev. Mr. RICHARDSON, and others.]

In conclusion, Mr. Firth offered the following sentiment.

"Long life and prosperity to the Master Builder of this magnificent instrument!"

Which was acknowledged by Mr. Hook by rising while the assembly greeted him with hearty and long continued cheers.

As a fitting finale to the evening's exercises, Mr. B. D. Allen took his seat at the instrument, and played "Old Hundred," and "America," accompanied by the voices of the whole audience. The effect was grand beyond description, and the contributors to the organ fund dispersed with a feeling of satisfaction and happiness, which was cheaply purchased at the price of their contributions.

Music Abroad.Paris.

GRAND OPERA.—A single event, of doubtful importance apparently, has diversified the old routine of the Meyerbeer, Halevy, and Gounod operas. A new opera (although written fifteen years ago), "Roland à Roncesvaux," by a composer new to fame, M. Mermet, was produced on the third alt. The correspondent of the Orchestra (with whom by the way the correspondent of the Musical World differs) writes:

The great event has at last taken place. The long expected and often postponed "Roland à Roncesvaux," libretto and music by M. Mermet, came off on Monday last at the Grand Opera; and, from the first hearing, already it may be said to be a decided success.

The music is written throughout in a masterly style; the piece, although full of military scenes, is not overladen by the use of brass; on the contrary, the composer has succeeded in being impressive by means of stringed instruments. Here and there we find some great clat of trombones; but, altogether, they are not too noisy. Several wonderful choruses are written in unison, and although such music is apt soon to become monotonous, this is not the case in M. Mermet's work; there are two such choruses in the second act, which produce the greatest effect. The overture is a symphony of a very serious character, full of admirable effects and without vulgarity. The first part contains some beautiful passages and a wonderful finale. The second act opens with a chorus in 3-4 time, which made a deep impression by the wonderful accompaniment of stringed instruments, in the treatment of which M. Mermet seems to have attained the highest pitch of excellence. Two duets in the same act, one by the tenor (M. Gueymard), and soprano (M<sup>me</sup>. Gueymard), and the other by sopranos (M<sup>me</sup>s Gueymard and De Mäsen) produced also very great effect. The same act contains also a charming ballet, the music of which is wonderfully arranged, and full of flowing melodies. The third act may be considered nearly a masterpiece from beginning to end. It opens with a song by a pétre (M. Marat), after which follows a farandole, Provençal dance, full of local color; then comes the most salient point of the whole work, a romance by Roland (M. Gueymard), followed by a powerful trio between Roland, the Archbishop (M. Belvel), and Aldé (M. Gueymard). This trio is of the greatest dramatic effect, and produced a great sensation; the act terminates by a warriors' chorus, well marked and instrumented, which was rendered with clat and excited the greatest enthusiasm. The whole house joined in one thunder of applause, and this admirable finale was repeated, as may be easily imagined. After these dramatic and wonderful effects in the third act—effects which could not be surpassed, the fourth and last act, although full of charming passages, came off very quietly. M. Mermet has his own style; it is neither Meyerbeer's nor Rossini's, but quite his own. The music has nothing vulgar in it, nor can the composer be charged with plagiarism.

Of Meyerbeer's long expected, posthumous, great work we read:

The distribution of the principal parts in the Africaine has been settled definitively up to the present time. It is as follows:—Vasco da Gama, M. Naudin; Don Pedro (Grand Admiral), M. Belvel; Nelasko, M. Faure; Le Grand Inquisiteur, M. Aubin; Don Alvar, M. Warot; Selicia (Reine de Madagascar), M<sup>lle</sup>. Maria Sax; Inès, M<sup>lle</sup>. Maria Battra. All I know about the book is, that the scene in the first two acts lies at Lisbon—the first act taking place in the Hall of the Grand Council, and the second in the prison where Vasco is incarcerated; in the third act on board a vessel at sea; and in the last two acts in Africa. After all there is a deficiency in the score of the Africaine. Meyerbeer had not written the ballet music when he died. Indeed, according to his usual custom, he put off composing the dances until the rehearsals had commenced. It was proposed—wherefore, the Parisian Gods only know—that the task of supplying this want—the ballet was to have played an important part in the Africaine—was to be intrusted to M. Saint-Léon, but M. Fétis put his direct vote thereupon, and suggested that two of the principal choruses should be adapted to the divertissement, which means nothing more than that the ballerines should dance to the singing of the chorus. This of course was not what Meyerbeer intended, but anything was preferable to interpolating music by another composer. M. Fétis holds out the flattering hope that the Africaine may be ready for production early in March.

THE ITALIAN OPERA is at its full swing. M<sup>lle</sup>. Patti, at each appearance, excites the greatest enthusiasm. She is really the enfant gâtée of the Parisians as well as the Londoners. Whenever her name occurs on the play-bills, M. Baguier is sure to have a full house. Last week she appeared twice in Donizetti's "Don Pasquale." The part of Norina, which suits so well her voice and manner, was admirably rendered; every opportunity is afforded her in this rôle to display the numerous and different qualities of her wonderful voice, and she made quite a hit in the part; she was well sustained by Delle-Sé-de in the rôle of Malatesta, and by Scalse in that of Don Pasquale.

THEATRE LYRIQUE.—"Rigoletto," in a French dress is to be produced to-night at the Théâtre Lyrique, with M. Mongauze, Ismael and M<sup>lle</sup> Maesen in the chief parts. An important work in three acts has been received at the same theatre, and is to be brought out during the season: "The Widow of the Highlands," libretto by MM. Flourier and A. Favre, music by Derin Durivier. "Mireille" is also to be revived with the tenor Michat, in the rôle of Vincent. Apropos of "Mireille," M. Gounod intends to reduce the work to three acts, and to add a grand duet to it. The celebrated composer Verdi is expected here in a few days. Some pretend to know, that he comes to superintend "Macbeth" at the Théâtre Lyrique, others say it is for the production of "La Forza del Destino" at the Italian Opera.

CONCERTS; DR. LISZT.—The correspondent of the Orchestra, writes:

M. Pasdeloup, the clever manager and conductor of the Popular Concerts, inaugurates his fourth season on Sunday next. The programme has just been issued, and is composed as follows:—Jubel overture, Weber; Symphonie in  $\sharp$  minor, Haydn; Polonaise of Struensee, Meyerbeer; Andante, Mozart; Symphonie in  $\flat$  minor, Beethoven. Hitherto no soloists have been announced, and none are to appear in the first concert; but with the beginning of November M. Pasdeloup will bring before his audience a host of talented artists, among whom the celebrated Dr. Liszt will make his appearance before the end of the year.

The maestro is more than ever disposed towards monastic life, and before his adieu suprême to this world of fame and success he has promised to perform at one of M. Pasdeloup's well conducted Sunday Concerts. Dr. Liszt passed through Paris last week on his way to Rome with his daughter, M<sup>me</sup>. Hans von Bülow, and it was at an interview with M. Pasdeloup that the Prince of Pianists kindly consented to perform before a Parisian audience. The date of the concert is not yet stated, but will be during December and will be the great feature of the season.

Leipzig.

The noticeable feature of the first Gewandhaus Concert of the season, which took place on the first Thursday of October, was the appearance of the famous London pianist, Hallé. But the whole concert was interesting enough to warrant copying the Orchestra's report of it.

The first concert opened with Cherubini's Overture to Anacreon. Cherubini's overtures are always played by the orchestra as if they thoroughly enjoyed them; and their enjoyment is at once communicated to the audience. In the overture, as also in the other orchestral work, Beethoven's Symphony in A, the gradations of sound, down to the softest pianissimo, were given with that intense musical feeling which characterizes the playing of the Gewandhaus band. The Andante in the Symphony, that most prayerful of movements, was interpreted to perfection.

The singer of the evening was Frau Dr. Schlegel-Köster. In 1837, this lady, then a girl not far advanced in her teens, was engaged for the Leipzig theatre, first as a "star," and subsequently as a regular member. Some time afterwards she was enlisted among the singers of the Berlin Opera, of which, until her recent retirement, she has been one of the most distinguished ornaments as a singer of the highest dramatic power. Some good notes still remain, but time has made perceptible inroads on the voice; still a grand style and noble delivery are there, as was proved by her singing of the aria "O last mich Tiefgebeugte weinen" from Gluck's "Iphigenie;" even in her decay we can hear how great she must have been in her prime in Gluck's operas. The "Chorus of Priestesses" belonging to this aria was sung by some of the "Thomas" boys, who, however, were hardly numerous enough to give effect to the part. It is remarkable how much less volume of voice the German boys seem to have, as compared with English cathedral boys. Two ariettes—ballads they might be called—from Handel's "Susanna" were new to me. The first, Ihr grünen Au'n ("Ye verdant hills"), is written for a tenor voice, and is in the part of the First Elder; in itself it is graceful, but is hardly so passionate as the situation demands. The second, Frag, ob die Rose ("Ask if yon damask rose be sweet") is supposed to be sung by Susanna's attendant, to divert her sorrow at her husband's absence. Its naiveté and freshness are really charming; it is very evident that this ballad was not unknown to the composer of a certain song of St. Giles' classicality. What a pity it is that the subjects of Susanna and of some of Handel's other works make it impossible to perform them as a whole. One of Schubert's Lieder, Des Mädchens Klage, was very expressively sung, and warmly applauded.

Familiar as was the name of Herr Karl Hallé to the Leipzig musical public, they had had no opportunity of making his acquaintance till this evening. He played Beethoven's E flat Concerto, and solo pieces by Chopin and Heller. His style is so totally different from that of the generality of German players, that the public at first seemed hardly to understand him, although with the musicians his success was immediate and decided. The calm, almost statuesque repose of his style, gave an idea of want of warmth, especially in Beethoven's Concerto. It was therefore fortunate that Herr Hallé, in a Soirée which he gave on Saturday evening, had an opportunity of becoming better understood. Upon this occasion he played Beethoven's Sonatas, ops. 53 and 111, parts of Bach's great Partita in B minor, and smaller works by Mendelssohn, Heller, and Chopin. Now he is acknowledged, both by the public as well as by musicians, to be among the greatest players of the day. The clearness with which he rendered the difficult op. 111 was the theme of general admiration. Most exquisite, too, was the taste with which he played Bach's Partita. But to English readers an eulogy upon Herr Hallé's playing would be but to repeat an oft-told tale. The applause which followed each piece was a most genuine demonstration. Indeed, it seemed as if the audience wished to encore the whole programme. I regret to be obliged to say that the instruments placed at Herr Hallé's disposal were very unsatisfactory.

At the Michaelmas reception of new pupils into the Conservatorium upwards of thirty were admitted, among whom are several English ladies and gentlemen. There are now nearly 150 pupils in the institution.

Nor must we omit the following incident of the preceding Gewandhaus rehearsal, so thoroughly illustrative of German musician life:

It was the anniversary of the day on which, fifty years ago, Herr Kleugel, the leader of the second violins, entered upon his duties as a permanent member of the orchestra. The fiftieth anniversary of his first appearance in the Gewandhaus was celebrated three or four years ago. As Herr Kleugel entered the room, accompanied by the directors and officials, the orchestra struck up the jubilant strains of the "Wedding March," and the bust of Mendelssohn which surmounts the orchestra, and was garlanded with glowing autumnal flowers, seemed to look down with a smile at the honor paid to his old friend. After the music had ceased, the senior member of the Gewandhaus directorate addressed the Jubilär, cordially acknowledging the zeal with which he had always done his duty, and ending by presenting him with a rich silver coffee service. Herr Haubold, his colleague at the first desk of the second violins, then in the name of the orchestra offered their congratulations, and handed him a handsome clock. The Bürgermeister gave utterance to the good wishes of the citizens and authorities of Leipzig; and the Kreisdirector, the highest government official, in the King's name invested Herr Kleugel with the cross of the Albrecht Order. In a sonorous triple Tsch the orchestra, in its own language, joined in the congratulations. The venerable gentleman expressed his thanks in a few simple but hearty words. It is indeed, a rare instance that in a service of fifty years, Herr Kleugel has not missed a single concert or rehearsal. And even on this occasion, as soon as the business of the rehearsal began, he was at his desk, which was decorated with garlands and surrounded by a gilt laurel wreath, and from the happy expression on his face as he came to each especially beautiful passage of the well known music, it was easy to see that it was really a labor of love. Not long before, I had been reading your article upon the position and treatment of musicians in England, and I could not help saying to myself with regret: They do these things better in Germany.

COLOGNE. The managers of the well-known Gürzenich Concerts have adopted a resolution which has given great satisfaction to German musicians. Every time that anything written by a living composer is executed, the composer will receive notice of the fact together with a pecuniary present. The latter will be five Prussian thalers for overtures and small choral works; ten, for symphonies and vocal works of higher pretensions; fifteen for works filling up the greater portion of the evening; and twenty for such as fill up the whole evening. Pieces serving only for the display of virtuosi are not included in this arrangement, but the managers may, at any time, make an exception to the general rule.

London.

ENGLISH OPERA is now the musical topic. It opened on Saturday, Oct. 15, at Covent Garden; and the point of chiefest interest seems to have been the debut of our Boston townsman, Mr. CHARLES ADAMS (who was at first heralded as "Herr Adam, from the Royal Opera, Berlin," and as about to "sing in English!") The Orchestra, before the opening, thus prepares the way:

If we are to believe all that we hear of this tenor, Mr. Sims Reeves will have to "sound an alarm" in good earnest. Imprimis, Mr. Adams is an Englishman—a native of Leeds in fact; secondly, his organ is both powerful and of the purest quality; thirdly, his voce di petto high C's are more plentiful and of much better quality than Wachtel's; and fourthly, he is said to have acquired of late years, on the Continent, excellent style and an extensive repertoire. His history is as follows:—his family left Leeds when he was a boy, and went to Boston, Massachusetts; subsequently he went into Chickering's extensive pianoforte manufactory, and began to study music; his singing attracted the notice of a well-known virtuoso and entrepreneur named Mulder, under whose guidance Adams afterwards toured as a vocalist through the West Indies and the Continent of Europe. His name getting up, he recently finished a lucrative engagement at Pesth, and went to Berlin, where his success was such as to induce the management to re-engage him for next season. Preceded by all this quasi renown, Mr. Adams is awaited with considerable interest not only by the public but by the profession.

The opening piece was Masaniello, and the same authority says:

The cast of the opera was as follows:—Elvira, Mdme. Parepa; Fenella, Mdle. Rosa Girand; Alphonso, Mr. Herbert Bond; Pietro, Mr. Weiss; Borella, Mr. Ansley Cook; Lorenzo, Mr. Charles Lyall; Selva, Mr. E. Dussek; and Masaniello, Mr. Charles Adams.

The attraction, however, and salient point of interest, centred in the appearance of the new tenor, Mr. Charles Adams. He is a little man—handsome—with expressive features—and, we think, the feeling of an artist dramatically and vocally. His voice is not large, and in its lower register incapable apparently of being tuned to telling account. But in the upper register we discover that Adams possesses singularly pure, equal, and sympathetic notes, wonderfully effective in certain descriptions of music, but totally ineffectual for robusto singing or declamatory passages. Such music as Gennaro's in the "Lucrezia" we should fancy Adams will sing admirably; in the greater part of the "Masaniello" numbers he is lost. It was only in the "Sleep song" and such passages as are contained in the air d'adieu, that he ever rose to the level of what we call good tenor singing on such a stage. True, every allowance is to be made for a first appearance, especially when the debutant knows he is to do something towards putting Mr. Sims Reeves' chibouque out. That Adams has not done, and will never do. He is simply a good addition to the company, but practically of less value, we should say, than Haigh, who, to our thinking, is his superior in vocal ability. Time, however, and a further development of Adam's powers, will put matters more clearly before the public. His reception on Saturday night, after the miserable and nervous rendering of the harcarole, was cold, but the friendly feeling of the house subsequently made up for this forced frigidity, and he was called several times, with the rest of the cast, before the curtain.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, NOV. 12, 1864.

German Opera.

Our last notice extended to the middle of the third week, ending with the second performance of Fidelio—the work with which Mr. Grover's company has made the deepest and most lasting impression,—a work which the best Boston audience will always too willingly accept again in lieu of any great heavy effect piece of the French Grand Opera pattern, which the management may find it inconvenient at any time to execute. Indeed, for such disappointment who is not always thankful? This was the 15th night.

16. Thursday, Oct. 27. La Dame Blanche, second time. Precisely the right kind of piece to follow a hearing of Fidelio! In Boieldieu's ever fresh and charming little opera, one finds delightful rest from the absorbing and intense emotions of Beethoven's sublime drama. Not that Fidelio is "heavy"; great works, works of true creative genius never oppress you and fatigue you, with all the strain upon your faculties; they leave you stronger and more buoyant; they lift you up, not weigh you down. But we cannot be always in the grand mood, always at the climax even of the most wholesome and divine excitement. Alternation is necessary; and we do not believe Mr. Grover could do a better thing, if he expects us to go every night to the opera, than to play Fidelio and Die weisse Dame alternately through a whole week. Here are two thoroughly genial things, one great, one light and unpretending, both wholesome and delightful in their way. We think it argues a spoiled appetite, a taste sophisticated by too highly seasoned operatic food, that so many of our critics failed to recognize the charm of a light and pleasing work which, leaving out the "Marriage of Figaro" and "The Barber," still holds its own in Europe by the side of almost any comic opera. The house that evening was hardly two-thirds full. But the performance was more spirited and more felicitous than ever. Herr HABELMANN was in excellent voice, and made the music and the action of George Brown all that could be desired. People were insatiable in their desire to prolong the sweetness of his "Robin Adair." But the repetition taught them a lesson; so delicate and fine a voice ought not to be ruthlessly overtaxed; a shade of weariness came over it, and it could not so easily keep itself up to perfect pitch. HERMANN was capital, as ever, in the part of Gaveston; the parts of Dickson and his wife Jenny were very agreeably sustained by Herr ISADORE LEHMANN (whom we carelessly confounded in our last with his brother, Otto Lehmann, a worthy member of the chorus) and Mlle. DZIUBA. Mme. JOHANNSEN was true to character as the White Lady, singing charmingly; Mme. ZIMMERMANN deserves mention for her nice rendering of that Mozartish little song at the spinning wheel; and the choruses were all alive and true in song and action. Indeed there is no opera which this company are more certain to do well.

Friday evening should have brought the Huguenots; but the manager, unsatisfied with the result of the laborious rehearsals, issued a card postponing it, and renouncing the profits of the evening rather than substitute a hacknied thing in its place. This was honorable on his part, but we believe that Fidelio, or any opera of Mozart, or of Weber, would have delighted ten persons where it would have disappointed one.

17. Saturday afternoon. Der Freyschütz, third time. Great was the disappointment, greater than any postponement of any Huguenots or Mireilles, that FORMES did not appear, as most particularly announced, as Caspar. And no explanation; that was wrong.

On Sunday evening, Oct. 30, the loss of Friday must have been well nigh made good to the manager by the immense throng to the Music Hall on the announcement of a suddenly extemporized "Sacred" Concert. The trumpet blew an uncertain sound; one newspaper promised this attraction, another that, and the printed programmes in the Hall told still a different story. The artists had been sent to Providence and elsewhere to sing, and returned weary and "out of sorts;" there had been no rehearsal; FORMES was wanting when his turn came, and Herr GRAFF had to sing the "sacred" (!) air of Non più andrai perfunctorily for him; FREDERICI, however, in spite of the bills, did appear and sang delightfully the air of Fides, showing rare compass of voice, fresh and rich in all parts, also Mendelssohn's "Auf Flügeln des Gesanges," and a fine duet with LEHMANN, the baritone. The programme was an odd medley: a Battiste Offertoire on the organ, followed by the Egmont overture by the orchestra—and it is really a long time since we have heard such an orchestra in that hall;—sweet, sentimental Abt songs by HABELMANN, one of the purest of concert singers; other songs by Mozart, Verdi, Lortzing; an interminable violin variation piece; another long solo, on the bassoon! but wonderfully well played (who has not remarked the beauty of that honest instrument in its true place in the orchestra!);—then, for a second part, another French offertoire, furiously encored, (which gauged the musical character of the audience), by way of prelude to the orchestral prelude and selections, chorus and solo, from Haydn's "Creation." Herr FORMES did appear and never sang so coarsely. Little CANISSA executed "With verdure clad" fluently enough. The chorus of less than forty voices was effective enough to give a lesson to our Handel and Haydn hundreds; the orchestra, throughout the concert, redeemed much. But the whole thing was a mistake, artistically, for the credit of the Company, if not financially.

FOURTH AND LAST WEEK.

But not the best week, though better than the original plan, which was more well-meaning and ambitious than it was wise, and which, fortunately (as we think), had to be departed from in some respects. Let us explain our meaning. What has made the prestige of this German Opera troupe has been the fact that it has presented, and with unusual completeness, so many real masterworks of German genius. Freyschütz, Fidelio, the Mozart operas, and that French piece in which every German finds himself at home, Die weisse Dame,—these constitute the distinctive title of this troupe to a higher consideration than any of its predecessors here. These are not only the best things, the surest to please and edify in the long run, but they are the things which they can do the best; for here they are in their element. And if their ambition be to please more widely, and show still greater variety of power and inexhaustibleness of repertoire, were there not things of Mozart and of Weber left, still new to us, each worth (for real inspiration) dozens of the Fausts, Prophètes, &c., of the Parisian Grand Opera? Was there not that essentially German great work of the cosmopolitan Rossini, "Tell;" and his Shakespearian, Mozart-ean "Barber;" and Cherubini's Wassertrager, and so on? But ambitious to bring out all the notable "big things" and fashions of the day, and show how his company could cope with others on their own ground, Mr. Grover, at great expense of money, labor, and rehearsals worrying to artists nearly overworked already, announces a whole week of heavy, lengthy, noisy, wearisome spectacular pieces, requiring scenic effects impossible upon our stage,—pieces such that, with such nightly changes, no amount of merit in the performers could make real successes of them. Here is the list: Les Huguenots, Faust, Huguenots, Tannhäuser, Mireille. And with the style of music, the advertisements all at once descended from that simple and direct style, which had done so much to inspire confidence in this management before, and grew inflated and verbose, after the manner of the vulgar. The last performance of Faust was a "Gala Souvenir," and there were "Souvenir programmes on pink and satin," and much ado was made in the announcement of the grand fanfare and band upon the stage in that soldiers' chorus, which has been long since voted to be "much ado about nothing." Now Mr. Grover had so far so gladdened sincere Art lovers by pursuing the dignified and simple way, that we must be excused if we manifest some sensitiveness at the first shadow of turning. By adhering to the legitimate method he had achieved abundant success, and there was nothing to warrant recourse to these questionable means, to which he had given us an exception so rare and refreshing. With these views, what we shall have to say will not be at all proportioned to the length and the elaborateness of these operas.

18. Monday night, the Huguenots at last! And an enormous audience. Advertising, rumor, delay, did its work, at least in one sense. The performance was not without merits, yet on the whole not good. There was a plenty of spirit in it; the orchestra effective, as well as several of the ensembles. But there were great roughnesses and hitches, choruses out of tune, and, we may say of course a poverty of those stage accessories which almost limit the fair career of this opera to the Parisian theatre. Nor was the cast by any means the best within the means of this troupe. Sig. TAMARO, the identical little man who first squirmed and gasped and strutted in it here six years ago, for Raoul, and singing all alone in Italian, when we might have had Himmer! JOHANNSEN has seldom seemed herself so little as in the role of Valentine, which would have suited Frederici. FORMES, in make-up and action, was the old Huguenot soldier to the life, (we wish some clever artist would reproduce him on the canvas); but in telling power and purity of voice, Hermanns would have filled out its requirements better. Mme. ROTTER was truly the Queen of the evening; her true voice, with its sincere heart quality, revelled in the flowery Isabella music, as it were something between Laborde and the Lind, and her deportment too was queenly. Mlle DZIUBA made a fair page, though it is not one of her best parts. Herr STEINECKE sang St. Bris in his always faithful manner, while the secondary male parts, two of them not felt to be beneath their dignity by HABELMANN and LEHMANN, must count among the strong points of the performance. The piece lasted four mortal hours!

19. The fourth performance of Faust did show, at last! rather a small audience, FREDERICI and HIMMER sang as beautiful as ever together.

20. Huguenots again on Wednesday. We hear that the performance was a vast improvement on the first. But we confess to a personal spite against the Huguenots; we owe it too many headaches. Hearing it well done in theatres abroad did not convert us to it. It would be folly to deny that it has great merits, and there is no need to recount them. But as a whole we always find it wearisome; it lacks inspiration; it is a magnificent piece of mechanism, not an imaginative, vital, quickening fruit of genius. We go from it oppressed and weary, the tired fool of circumstances, not roused and strengthened in the inner man. How different the effect of a really inspired work of genius; from that, however, taxing to the listener's faculties, he goes away refreshed and buoyant; they lift him up until he seems to walk on air. Give us a little work of genius, a Dame Blanche for instance, in preference to the most elaborate result of calculation and mere talent. Meyerbeer's great operas—always accepting Robert—affect us much as Kaulbach's great fresco paintings do; beautiful, wonderful in single groups and details, heavy, unifying in the whole ambitious combination.

21. Tannhäuser is one of the notorieties and novelties which one would wish to have room made for in a German opera season. It is in every sense a German work; it is also really new in plan and execution; and every musical person is of course curious to hear and judge for himself a work about which there has been so much discussion, by a man who is a great original thinker, at least, if not original as a composer, and who proposes to revolutionize the whole domain of opera. It was a real disappointment, therefore, that it was found impossible to prepare more than a single act of it for presentation; but the filling out of the evening with Fidelio was a most welcome surprise to most, for that is always clear gain, and well we know that it is hardly possible for any new thing to be so good, that Fidelio will not still be accounted better. It drew a great audience again; but would have drawn still more, had the lovers thereof known of it before making other engagements. The performance was as good as ever, only the Leonora overture had to be omitted for want of time.

Earlier volumes of our journal, especially the first two years (1852-3) contain copious accounts of Wagner and his theories, as well as rose-colored analyses of Tannhäuser and Lohengrin, by his partial yet intelligent admirer, Liszt. His description of the first act, with Wagner's own synopsis of the overture, we reprint to-day for the benefit of "whom it may concern." We think the effect of the specimen given us last week, unsatisfactory as one act of a dramatic whole must be, was to please people more than they expected, to satisfy them that they were hearing something not so outrageously counter to all musical tradition after all, or so devoid of melody, and to increase the desire to hear the rest. Certainly there is something fresh, piquant about it; it fastens the attention; you are absorbed in its progress; and there is no denying that the charm is poetic, if not in the finest sense. The first criticism forced on one is, that after you have heard the superb overture, you seem to have heard (musically) the whole of it. The curtain rises upon the same intoxicating and bewildering wonders of the court of Venus, which just now took possession of all the instruments. The themes are the same:—That spiral upward phrase of melody which runs through the whole: that remarkable strain in which the Goddess wins her lover back; the chivalrous song of Tannhäuser, and afterwards the pilgrim chant. These themes (the first two we mean) are surely marvellous inventions, singularly suggestive; but with the shrill, fluttering tremolo which invests them, with that continuous squeal of high violin tones, with the whole working up, we cannot help quarreling as something harsh, unnatural, ungenial, and indeed not really sensuous, as it is designed to be, but cold and sharp like the East wind. (This may, however, have been the fault of too coarse execution). The part of Venus was admirably sung by FREDERICI, who looked most charmingly, and whose power of voice in the most arduous and earnest passages was thrilling.

Herr HIMMER lacked no knightly dignity or grace for Tannhäuser, and sang all with true fervor and in good voice. The curious pastoral soliloquy of the shepherd on a rock, all unaccompanied, and long continued, was quite a feat of secure vocalism on the part of Miss CANISSA. The Pilgrim chorus was out of tune, and nothing can well be harder to sing in tune. The song in praise of virtue, in the baritone part of Wolfram, about the best part in the opera, was given in unusually good voice and style by Herr STEINECKE—certainly a smooth and natural melody enough—and the closing Sextet and Septet of the Landgrave and his minstrel knights with Tannhäuser (but wanting one voice) was exceedingly imposing. Farther remark we reserve to a fuller hearing.

22. Gounod's Mireille also had to be reduced to a specimen, the first act only, which certainly did not produce a great impression. It was followed by a new opera to us, the Nachtlager in Grenada (a night's lodging in Grenada), by Conrad Kreutzer, one of the Dii minorum gentium of the German Parnassus. He died in Russia in 1849, at the age of 67. A Suabian by birth, his genius was sentimental and romantic, and kindred with the Suabian school of poetry. He is best known as a composer of part-songs and ballads, and was fond of borrowing his subjects from Uhland. It has been said of him:

What Gutzkow has said of Uhland, applies also in this sense to Kreutzer: "He pulled the bells of chapels, stationed shepherd boys upon the hill-tops and put happy songs into their mouths. He conjured back the Past in transfigured shape out of its germs, bade the old fables once more stoop upon their quarry—bade minstrels knock for entrance at the gates of castles, charmed maidens out for us upon the green plain and let kings' sons pass by and fall in love with them." And so on, open the books of literary history, and almost every word, in which you find the Suabian School of Poetry described, you may apply to Conrad Kreutzer.

This "Nachtlager" was the first and only operatic work in which Kreutzer succeeded, and it was not written until he was 52 years old. It proved quite a charming opera the other night. Simple, natural, thoroughly musical and smoothly flowing, but rather monotonously sentimental, and too much spun out for its exceeding meagreness of plot. It is not at all dramatic, but lyrical and quiet in its music. It consists of two elements: long-drawn sentimental airs and part-songs, some for male, some for mixed voices. All the choruses have this part-song character. Mme. ROTTER as the simple village maiden, and LEHMANN as the Prince, made their parts highly interesting, and HABELMANN was good too in the small part of the lover.

23. The Matinée of Saturday, Nov. 5, closed the richest operatic season Boston ever yet enjoyed, with Flotow's pretty and picturesque little opera Stradella.

The music is not much, but the characters of the two Italian bandits, done to the life by FORMES and HABELMANN, made a most pleasant thing of it. Mlle. CANISSA sang the part of Leonora well, and GRAFF was good as the old guardian. HIMMER made the most of the part of Stradella.

Shall we not welcome the return of Mr. Grover's German Opera next Spring! This week the Philadelphians are heirs to our delight.

Next time we hope to speak of some things besides Opera. The Great Fair for our gallant Sailors now occupies the Boston Theatre. In aid of it the Great Organ of the Music Hall is played every day at noon; and two grand evening concerts will be given under the direction of Dr. S. P. Tuckerman. The first to-night, with Messrs. Paine, Thayer, Tuckerman as organists, besides several good singers, and Messrs. Eichberg, Price, and others. Mr. Otto Dussak's concerts will commence at Oblerking's rooms next Saturday evening.

Musical Correspondence.

(From our regular Correspondent.)

NEW YORK NOV. 7.—The first Concert of the PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY took place Saturday evening at the Academy of Music, before a brilliant and appreciative audience. The programme was as follows: Beethoven's Eroica symphony; Weber's Polonaise in E, with Liszt's orchestral accompaniment, played by Mr. Mills; Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, executed by Mr. Theodore Thomas; Weber's overture to Oberon; and Franz Liszt's Poème Symphonique, "Les Préludes."

It is the critic's business to find fault; how can we escape the curse? We find ourselves at once compelled to quarrel with the Society. Every musical connoisseur must confess that their programme was interesting in the highest degree; but at the same time must allow, that without great mental fatigue such works cannot be fully appreciated. We all know from experience that, a fine and cultivated human voice is always elevating, especially when it becomes the interpreter of some of those immortal songs in which our musical literature is so rich. We cannot understand why the Philharmonic Society does not strive to employ all the means in its power to place Song on a proper footing in its concerts. The neglect is unpardonably one sided. Of course this evil is not to be avoided by keeping in the path which the Society has so far made it its policy to follow; for it is absurd even to suppose, that good artists will be always ready to assist in these concerts merely for the honor of the thing. There may have been a time when such an introduction to a musical public was in a certain sense desirable for an artist; and there are doubtless many here, who would not be unwilling to remind the public occasionally of their existence through such a medium;—how often has the Society not sinned against its subscribers in this manner? How many indifferent solo productions have they not been obliged to take into the bargain? Why not pay first-class singers for an assistance, that would be only due to the subscribers, and certainly prove pecuniarily beneficial to the Society? It is time that all narrow-minded views should be changed, and the Society awakened to a full knowledge of the noble task which it is in its power to fulfil.

But to the concert.—The Eroica was performed, on the whole, with care and blan; the Scherzo, however, was somewhat uncertain, and we could have wished for more refinement of shading in some parts. We did not altogether approve of the Tempo, in which the funeral march was taken; according to our idea, CARL BERGMANN took it a trifle too slow; but the first movement left nothing to be wished for on the part of the conductor—with heroic calmness he led the many-colored mass. Mr. MILLS played Weber's Polonaise clearly and brilliantly. We cannot say that we like Liszt's orchestral additions; they are not made with the tact we are accustomed to in many of his arrangements. Among all existing violin concertos, that of Mendelssohn is one of the foremost; it is a noble work in the fullest sense of the word, and one of the finest productions of Mendelssohn's muse. Mr. THEODORE THOMAS did it justice in his performance. We have seldom heard it better played. His tone was clear, and he possesses the strength necessary for the Academy—so badly constructed as to acoustic effect. Neither did he fail to give it the requisite feeling. In listening to the playing of Mr. Thomas, we have sometimes fancied that it was as if he were afraid lest his hearers might suspect that he also felt as a man feels—and ought to hide it—but on Saturday, as Beethoven was accustomed to say, he "knöpfte sich auf," and in future his reserve will be useless, for now we know he is not made of stone. Save in one moment the orchestra accompanied him finely; and here we must render a tribute to the fine instinct, the carefulness, the precision with which Carl Bergmann leads all accompaniments to solo performances. And this is not the easiest task for a director.

Weber's overture sounded finely. Liszt's "Pre-ludes" closed the evening. This composition of the "new school," has won the popular favor here, and rightly so. It is a brilliant virtuoso piece, a tropical plant that intoxicates the senses. But we advise the man who is only accustomed to the breath of lilies and violets, and who cannot inhale the narcotic perfume of Liszt's melodies without headache, to avoid his garden of enchantment. We do not belong to those musical pietists who always begin to tremble for the well-being of art, as soon as the names of Liszt, Berlioz, or Wagner are mentioned. We are also far from placing these representatives of the new school in the same rank as Beethoven, Schubert and Schumann; but no one can deny that these men have an idea and an ideal, and strive to realize both with great perseverance, self-sacrifice and intelligence. How far they have erred into the wrong path, how far their conceptions have become abnormal in form and contents, how far they have made use of (musically speaking) super-sensuous means to attain their ends—time will judge. But only prejudice and narrowness would entirely banish these composers from our concerts.

ITALIAN OPERA.

The performances of the last two weeks have been Don Giovanni, Lucrezia Borgia, Rigoletto, Il Trovatore, Il Poluto (twice), Faust (twice), and Martha, at evening and matinée representations. The most effective was probably that of the weakest opera in the list, "Poliuto"—the weakest, if we take into consideration what might have been done with the subject, and how little Donizetti and his librettist have done; still there remain many dramatic moments, which can be brought out strongly into relief, when a highly dramatic artist, such as is Mme. CAROZZI-ZUCCHI, undertakes the character of Paulina. Beautiful, a careful actress, often carried by enthusiasm to a height of dramatic power that her good taste always prevents her from overstepping, possessing a powerful and pleasing voice of tolerable execution, and less touched in its freshness and steadiness than might be expected in an exponent of passionate music, no longer in the prime of youth, Madame Zucchini is undoubtedly the most satisfactory prima donna who has appeared on the Italian operatic stage here for some years. As Donna Anna also, she displayed an unhoped for appreciation of this noble character; unhoped for, we say, for in fact, it is so above the comprehension of ordinary Italian prima donnas, and has been so barbarously murdered here, that New York audiences in general have got into the habit of looking on "poor" Donna Anna as a sort of supernumerary mourner, and are utterly ignorant of the sublime beauties, calling for as sublime a donna to express them, contained in the role; while audiences in particular have given up the hope of seeing this fine character represented as it should be.

As Lucrezia and Leonora, Mme. Zucchini was less effective with the public, because more self-concentrated in her expression of these characters; still she showed herself a thinking, as well as a gifted artist. Signor MASSIMILIANI is, there is no disguising the patent fact, a most unsatisfactory first tenor, the tone of his voice, not an uncommonly powerful one, is compressed and covered; his articulation is indistinct, and his style unfinished. As an actor he is too often cold and embarrassed, and his appearance and manner are not imposing. These deficiencies in the premier have made LOTTI's thread-like tenor, and uniform conception of parts, appear to better advantage and meet with more favor than they did last season. With the exception of the fine baritone, BELLINI, and, of course, Miss KELLOGG, the whole company is far behind Mme. Zucchini. The contralto, Mlle. MORENSI, needs to acquire more dramatic animation, if she would follow up the advantages which her pleasing voice and appearance give her. The second contralto, Miss GEBELE, a new German singer, needs vastly more cultivation; while SUSINI's once fine organ is growing woolly in quality of tone, and unmanagable. Miss Kellogg, in Faust, in Martha, and as "Zerlina," has renewed her old successes. Mrs. VAN ZANDT, who has been favorably known as a concert singer during the past two years, made her debut on Friday evening, as Gilda in Verdi's Rigoletto. This lady, whose appearance is very prepossessing, is the owner of a light soprano voice, which she has cultivated to good purpose, under the guidance of Signor Abella. On the evening of her debut, fright partially paralyzed her efforts at first, but towards the end of the opera she became more herself. Future performances will no doubt place her among the first of American sopranos. The so-called "fall season" is now over; the winter season is to commence on the 14th November. We are again promised (?) by the management, Donizetti's Don Sebastian, and Auber's new arrangement of his Fra Diavolo, but not a word of the more important works which were promised at the opening—to-wit: Les Huguenots, Le Prophète, Mireille and La Forza del Destino. When will the patience of operatic subscribers at last wear out?

LANCELOT.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE
LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson &amp; Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- Simon the Cellarer. J. L. Hatton. 30
A comic song of the old sort. It is quite popular.
- Thou everywhere. (Ubersall du.) J. Lachner. 50
One of the most charming of German songs. The poet sees the image of his love in all things fair, hears her voice in all sweet sounds; she is "everywhere" to him. The music is rich and melodious. In five flats.
- The pleasures of youth. (Io voglio il piacer,) Duet. "Faust." 30
This is the well known duet between Faust and Mephistopheles. The song by Faust, with a similar melody, was published and noticed some months since. For Tenor and Bass voices.
- Josephine to Napoleon. Mrs. Onslow. 30
A charming ballad, in good classical style. You will begin to sing it with the idea that it is quaint and old fashioned. But it will be very difficult to sing it through without liking it.
- My mother's cot. Song and chorus. F. Wilson. 30
A simple and sweet ballad, by the author of "The Jockey Hat and Feather."
- When we meet again. Song and chorus. J. H. McNaughton. 30
A good song for friends who are leave taking.

Instrumental Music.

- Farragut's grand march. J. Strauss. 40
Very spirited. Has a portrait of the old hero on the title page.
- Spanisches Ständchen. (Spanish melody,) Op. 149. F. Spindler. 50
A kind of fantasia on a very pretty air. It is somewhat difficult, but pays well for learning.
- Maj. Gen. Sheridan's grand march. With portrait. Gungl. 40
Very energetic and powerful. Has a fine portrait of the newest of our great generals.
- La Priere d'une mere. Reverie for Piano. J. T. Trebell. 50
In the general style of the Nun's prayer and similar compositions. A fine piece, and will well repay study.
- Qui vive! Grand galop de concert. W. Gaus. 75
Quite brilliant and powerful, and of medium difficulty.
- Fairy glen. Polka redowa. A. H. Fernald. 30
An elegant little piece.

Books.

THE YOUNG LADIES' VOCAL ALBUM. A collection of Choruses, Trios and Duets. Selected and adapted for the use of Academies, Seminaries and Singing classes.

By Charles D. G. Adam. $1.50

The good books for young ladies' seminaries are not numerous, and an addition to the limited list will be welcome to teachers. Mr. Adams is a "practical teacher" himself, and familiar with the wants of the profession. His book contains a quantity of new and fresh music, and includes a course of vocal exercises and solfeggios, by Rossini.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 617.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, NOV. 26, 1864.

VOL. XXIV. No. 18.

Sea-Shore.

BY R. W. EMERSON.

[From the Boatwain's Whistle.]

I heard or seemed to hear the chiding Sea
Say, Pilgrim, why so late and slow to come?
Am I not always here, thy Summer home?
Is not my voice thy music, morn and eve?
My breath thy healthful climate in the heats,
My touch thy antidote; my bay thy bath!
Was ever building like my terraces?
Was ever couch magnificent as mine?
Lie on the warm rock-ledges, and there learn
A little hut suffices like a town.
I make your sculptured architecture vain,
Vain beside mine:—
Lo! here is Rome, and Nineveh, and Thebes,
Karnak, and Pyramid, and Giant's Stairs.
Half piled or prostrate; and my newest slab
Older than all thy race.

Behold the Sea,
The opaline, the plentiful and strong,
Yet beautiful as is the rose in June.
Fresh as the trickling rain: 'ow of July:
Sea full of food, the nourisher of kinds,
Purger of earth and medicine of men;
Creating a sweet climate by my breath,
And, in my mathematic ebb and flow,
Giving a hint of that which changes not.
Rich are the Sea-gods;—who gives gifts but they?
They grope the sea for pearls, but more than pearls:
They pluck Force thence, and give it to the wise.
For every wave is wealth to Dædalus,— Wealth to the cunning artist who can work
This matchless strength. Where shall he find, O waves!
A load your Atlas shoulders cannot lift?

I with my hammer pounding evermore
The rocky coast, smite Andes into dust,
Strewing my bed, and, in another age,
Rebuild a continent of better men.
Then I unbar the doors: my paths lead out
The exodus of nations: I disperse
Men to all shores that front the hoary main.

I too have arts and sorceries;
Illusion dwells forever with the waves.
I know what shells are laid. Leave me to deal
With credulous, imaginative man.
For, though he scoop my water in his palm,
A few rods off he deems it gems and clouds.
Planting strange fruits and sunshine on the shore,
I make some coast alluring, some lone isle,
To distant men who must go there, or die.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Half a dozen of Beethoven's Contemporaries.

II. ANTONIO SALIERI.

[Concluded from page 338.]

A revival at Paris, in 1817, with immense success, of "Les Danaïdes," with a very few slight changes in the music, and some new dances composed by Spontini, Paer and Berton, brought Salieri, not only an increase of income, but exceedingly grateful letters from Spontini, Moline, Persuis (Director of the Grand Opera), and Herold, composer of Zampa. The latter says: All Paris will hear this beautiful opera, and the vast crowds which besiege the doors of the theatre at each performance, prove that we know how to appreciate your works. One thing we heartily lament—that we cannot see you here in Paris. Happy they, who, like me, can listen to you and benefit by your instructions. How much I regret that I did not longer remain in Vienna. I shall never forget what you have done for me, and least of all the kindness with which you gave me many an excellent piece of advice. The good fortune which I have thus far had upon the stage, I attribute entirely to the instruction which I had of you—your teachings are invaluable," &c.

His duties in the chapel, during the year 1818, were relieved by preparing his "Tarare" for a new revival at the Paris Grand Opera; by some small works for the "Music Friends" and their conservatorium; and by an excursion with Prince Dietrichstein, and as his guest, to the various seats of that nobleman. The "Tarare" came on the stage again, Feb. 3, 1819, and in August, Persuis sent him 1100 francs as his percentage on the profits of the two revised operas.

I find nothing noted as belonging to this year (1819), except the finishing of a grand Te Deum, though Mosel says he passed the summer in the country and employed himself "in select society, with singing, reading, and the composition of new, or the improving of old works."

In the spring of 1820 he began a labor, which was purely one of gratitude and love.

"The Pension-Institute for the widows and orphans of Vienna musicians" was founded [by Gassmann, and incorporated by the imperial government in 1771; the act granting not only a handsome sum of money down, but the right to give four benefit concerts annually—two at Christmas and two in holy week—on days when no theatres are allowed to be opened for the usual performances. For the first of these concerts, (1771) Gassmann composed Metastasio's "Betulia liberata," which was brought out with upwards of two hundred performers—at that time a large number.

Salieri's composition for the 25th anniversary, in 1796, of that institution has been already noticed. From that time he had always taken part in the concerts; for some he delivered new pieces; at others he sat at the piano-forte, or assumed the principal direction; and not unfrequently took all the labor of instructing the solo singers. Though now in his 70th year, and feeling the approaching failure of his physical powers, the hope became strong that he might live to take part in the celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the institution. For that occasion he undertook to make such a revision of his old master's "Betulia liberata" as should make it correspond to the demands of the then present condition of the musical art. His work was, however, interrupted, especially in the autumn of that year, (1820), by failing strength, and violent pains, which often prevented him from closing his eyes all the night long, and of course rendered him too weak for any labor for the next following days.

During one of these sleepless nights, he set the following words to music: "Spiritus meus attenuabitur, Dies mei breviabuntur, et solum mihi superest sepulcrum," (my spirit grows feeble; my days are shortened, and to me the tomb alone remains.)—a composition which he often sang with his pupils. In the winter his health improved, and his hilarity and pleasure in labor enabled him to bear with the minor ills that still plagued him. In April, 1821, he suffered much with his eyes; but the evil being happily overcome, he finished the "Betulia," shortening the antiquated recitatives and airs, adding choruses and the like; working always in the spirit and style of Gassmann, and that so effectually as not to disturb the unity of the work. To give a more festive character to the occasion, he composed a march and grand chorus, text by F. Treitschke, to the memory of Gassmann. The chorus was divided into two parts, the first preceded by the march opening the concert, the second being sung after the "Betulia." The first part was sung by a chorus of fifty boys, assembled around a laurel-crowned bust of Gassmann; the second by all the voices present. The concert took place April 15, under the direction of Umlauf, Salieri's eyes preventing him from taking any active part. All the expenses of copying, of the bust, &c., were borne by Salieri, and amounted to at least a thousand florins. The concert closed with Klopstock's ode "Frühlingsfeier" (Celebration of Spring) set by Abbé Stadler. The next evening the second concert took place, at which Haydn's "Creation" was given, his bust standing in front, the cost of which also was borne by Salieri,—in short, the entire cost of both concerts was assumed by the now aged composer. Mosel translates these words from Salieri's notes upon this occasion: "Thus, I think, I have publicly proved my gratitude to my teacher, father and benefactor, Florian Gassmann, and my veneration for his memory; and that I have thus not unworthily brought my musical life to its close."

His eyes still troubled him and grew dim; yet he could read and write in moderation and take his walks. The next spring (1822) the sleepless nights came again; but on the whole he was not dissatisfied, for he writes: "I can eat, sing, take walks and gossip; still, however, I think often upon death, and keep myself ready at any moment to receive him."

On the eighth of June, says Anselm Hüttenbrenner, in the article previously quoted, Salieri drove with me and another pupil by way of Hütteldorf to Weidlingen [two lovely villages among the hills a few miles west of Vienna], where we wandered long in the romantic garden of Prince Dietrichstein. When we had reached the highest point of the park, we sang a terzet in praise of the grandeur of creation. The good master was deeply affected, and turning his eyes to the clouds about the setting sun, he said: "I feel that the end of my days is drawing near; my senses are failing me; my delight and strength in creating songs are gone: he, who once was honored by half Europe, is forgotten; others have come and are the objects of admiration; one must give place to another. Nothing remains to me, but trust in God, and the hope of an unclouded existence in the Land of Peace."

This summer, besides keeping up gratis the instruction of his pupils, he amused himself with reading through all his long series of compositions in regular order.

"It is a pleasure for me," he writes, "to find more good than bad in them, and when, as now and then happens, I am able to improve a passage, which had always displeased me, but which I was unable to correct, then no one is happier than I. It may be said that a very little, then, can make me happy; nay, for this only proves the passion of an artist for his art, without which no one would ever produce anything really good."

The January of 1823 was very cold and dry, and seemed to give the old man new strength; for his walks were frequently continued three hours without exhausting him, and that too when the snow forced him to confine himself within the city walls. His wet weather work was still instruction, both in the morning hours, and after dinner until 5 P.M., while in the evenings, till 10 or 11 o'clock, he was as busy as ever in studying his old compositions, or in writing out those short pieces which he so much delighted to compose.

But the spring was wretchedly cold and rainy, and his health failed rapidly. The sulphur baths at Baden (near Vienna) in the summer, and then artificial ones at home, helped him somewhat; but in October his nervous system broke down, and the last hardly legible words written with his lamed hand, are given by Mosel:—

"Gen. 1824. Dio Santissimo! misericordia di me."

(Jan. 1824. Most Holy God! Have mercy upon me.)"

There was now no hope that he could ever again officiate in the chapel, and he sent in a petition to be pensioned. Moritz, Count Dietrichstein—(at this present writing, September, 1864, confined to his room by extreme old age)—had succeeded Kueffstein as Musikgraf. He was himself a composer, and for two generations has been one of the musical authorities of Vienna. He was the one to communicate the answer to Salieri's petition, which he did under date June 15, 1824—the 58th anniversary of the petitioner's arrival in Vienna with Gassmann. He wrote:—

"His Majesty has, by decision dated Prague, the 6th inst., been pleased to grant the petition, offered of your own free will, to be relieved of further duties, and that too with retention of your full salary.

"You will have no doubt, I flatter myself, as to the feelings with which I make known this decision—a duty devolving upon me through my official position. They are the feelings of respect, admiration and gratitude, to which few men in the walks of art have so clear a claim as you.

"In the service of four monarchs of the imperial house you have proved an incorruptible truth and devotion, and a perfect self-negation, which have never for a moment wavered, even in the most diverse, and, for less magnanimous persons than you, tempting relations.

"You have produced a long list of immortal works in almost all branches of music; and, while striving to emulate your great model, Gluck, and your ever honored teacher, Gassmann, you have solidly founded your own fame.

"Through your philanthropy, through your peculiar gift for teaching and friendly communication of knowledge, and through the charms of your social qualities, you have made yourself the centre of a circle of disciples in art, who must thank you, some for their pecuniary welfare, others for the elevation of their tastes and the purest enjoyment. Your beneficial influence upon the musical art and all others related to it is not to be mistaken; and if the former has wandered into many a by-path, still she will by degrees, like so many other things in this world, find her way back to the true standpoint, and throw new glory around her favorites.

"As to myself, through the grace of his Majesty, the Emperor, it has now for six years been my good fortune to be in closer relations to you. I found you already, after 50 years of honorable service, adorned with the marks of imperial favor, with which those of a foreign monarch were joined. I found you in the possession of the respect and affection of your fellow citizens, and of all who favor the loveliest of the arts.

"And now physical afflictions hindered active duties, and this was sufficient to induce you—you to whom zeal in your office was ever above all else—to that step, which gives you your well-earned repose.

"May you enjoy it in full measure; arm yourself, as hitherto, with that greatness of soul, which belongs to a spirit like yours; forget not your noble, irreproachable life, your numberless friends and admirers, and make a place among them for him, who with heartfelt emotion, and the expression of his most distinguished respect, now takes leave of you."

MORITZ, COUNT V. DIETRICHSTEIN, Court Musikgraf."

Upon the acceptance of Salieri's resignation, Joseph Eybler, the Vice Chapelmaster, was advanced to the head of the music in the palace chapel.

It is both amusing and melancholy to read in the Beethoven conversation books, the gossip retailed by his nephew and other intimates. Salieri, as the most distinguished and venerable relic of the preceding generation of Vienna musicians, has his place in that gossip. At one time Carl relates that the poor old broken down man has become so penurious as not to allow his daughters to marry, being unwilling to grant them marriage portions! And when the story gains currency that the old composer has confessed his having poisoned Mozart—a story which it is now perfectly well known had no foundation, other than the possible vagaries of insanity—the youth very wisely informs his uncle, that very probably there is something in it!

The fact is, that after January, 1824, Salieri broke down very rapidly: and the entire prostration of his nervous system brought with it mental aberration. But both his physician and his two constant attendants publicly testified—as may be seen in the Harmonicon, IV. 90—that no expressions ever passed the sick man's lips in their hearing, which could give color to the idea.

The old man lingered on through another year, and finally closed his long and useful career at 8 P.M., on the 7th of May, 1825—in the ninth month of his 75th year—and was honored at his funeral by the presence of all the members of the court musical establishment, with Count Dietrichstein at the head, and by all the distinguished composers and musicians then in Vienna.

Among his manuscripts was found the Requiem already mentioned, entitled by his own hand: "Messa funebre piccola, da me, piccolissimo, Antonio Salieri," which was sung in the Italian church by his pupils, old and new, at the solemn mass to his memory a few days after his burial. Mosel, himself a composer, who knew Salieri intimately, and to whom the papers of the deceased were intrusted, describes him thus:

Salieri was in stature small rather than large, neither fat nor lean, of a brunette complexion, lively eyes, black hair, temperament choleric, quick-tempered, but able to say with Horace: "tamen ut placabilis essem," for reflection always very quickly took the place of his anger. He was fond of order and neatness; dressed in the mode, but always in clothes suited to his years. All games were alike indifferent to him. He drank nothing but water, but was inordinately fond of cake and sweetmeats. Reading, music, and solitary walks were his favorite amusements. Ingratitude was hateful to him; on the contrary, among the pleasantest of his duties were those which a sense of obligation imposed upon him. He enjoyed doing good, when he had opportunity, and his purse was always open to those in need. He liked to talk, especially upon his art, a topic on which he was inexhaustible. Sloth was disgusting, skepticism horrible to him. When he was in the wrong he gladly confessed it; and even when in the right, if the dispute was not one touching his honor, or even that of a third person, he not unfrequently, for the sake of peace, bore the appearance of being in the wrong. He had a terror of pain and misfortune; when they came, however, he found a support in religion, and patiently bore his afflictions. Discreet praise gave him pleasure; when exaggerated it was painful. At times he was oppressed with a melancholy, which he could not explain, and would weep without being able to assign any reason for it. When in these moods he thought often of death, though without fear, and could pass no picturesque group of trees upon an elevated spot, without wishing to be buried beneath them. In general, however, he was in good spirits and full of life; his politeness, his joyous disposition, his jovial and always harmless wit made him one of the pleasantest of companions: this last quality not seldom relieved him when in a stait. On one occasion, a woman who occupied lodgings in a house belonging to Mme. Salieri and her two brothers, demanded some impossible change in the dwelling. She had applied in vain to the elder brother, who had charge of the house, and now besieged Salieri, who vainly explained to her that this was a matter entirely out of his sphere, that he could not give power to make a change which his brother-in-law had declared impossible, &c. She came again and again, until the composer, having exhausted his explanations finally closed the business by saying: "Well, madame, that you may see it is no want of good will on my part to do what I can for you, just write out your demand and I will set it to music." The woman laughed and left him in peace.

Salieri had made a vow to bestow gratis, that which he had received gratis from his benefactor Gassmann. Therefore he not only instructed young talent, which was to make music the means of subsistence, for nothing, but his receipts for lessons to the nobility and the rich were a fund, which he distributed among the poor musicians of Vienna.

In the Leipzig Musikalische Zeitung, XII., 196, is a communication from Salieri in relation to Gluck's last works, worthy of being translated; in XIII. 207, copy of an order to the imperial orchestra in relation to the proper style of violin playing equally, well worth translation; and in the XXVIIth and XXXth volumes are very interesting reminiscences of him by Rochlitz and Anselm Hüttenbrenner.

A. W. T.

The Art of Ballad Writing.

[FIRST PAPER.]

English ballad writing is emphatically an art now a-days, and scarcely anything beyond an art. Twenty and thirty years ago poets there were in the ranks of our half-crown balladeers who graced true touches of nature on their art-growths. They wrote from strong subjective impulse, and anacronisms such as Moore wrote will consequently never die. But this is not the age of the pure ballad. Few of our poets condescend to study the peculiarities of the sung ballad, and consequently not one in ten of their songs is suitable for music. Tennyson is a marked case in point. When we get a contribution of his that is really a short lyric, how the listening world is charmed to hear it, however indifferent the music may be! But it is only now and again that we have the luck to get any effusion of the Laureate's capable of being set to musical strains pleasant to the ear; and, as in his case, so also it is with the most brilliant poetical creators of our time. They will not, as a rule, sing. The consequence has been that, to supply musicians with words, mere versifiers have for many years flourished greenly in the Arcadian bower of song.

The modern ballad (with, let us grant, some brilliant exceptions) being written solely from objective impulse, it is not difficult to describe and analyse the modus operandi employed. This we propose to do, and to facilitate matters we shall separate modern song writing (objectively considered) into six schools, as follows:—

- I. THE WARDOUR STREET SCHOOL,
- II. THE HOROLOGICAL SCHOOL,
- III. THE PROVERBIAL SCHOOL,
- IV. THE SARAH JANE SCHOOL,
- V. THE VINOUSLY PATRIOTIC SCHOOL,
- VI. THE FUNERAL SCHOOL.

Let us, this week, consider how the workman of School No. I., the Wardour Street, turns out his ballad. He glories in decayed furniture—hence the name of his school. For him a frying-pan contains a maudlin romance; song lurks in a well stuffed easy chair; poetry oozes from a water-bucket; and ballads suggest themselves from delf-ware and brass candlesticks. The one condition is, they must be old,—that is indispensable to our balladeer's mode of mechanism. If we mistake not, it was Miss Eliza Cook that first set a-going the Wardour Street School, by writing such mawkish trash as the "Old arm-chair."

"I love it, I love it, and who shall dare
To chide me for loving the old arm-chair?"

Nobody, of course, unless those who are weak-minded enough to rebut the veriest platitudes and puerilities. But the semi-success of such songs as that and more of its class, brought Wardour Street into full play. For a long time—the munitia is not expired yet—it was as if balladeers had discovered the philosophers' stone of publishers' songs. It was so easy. Nothing to do but to get some household utensils in a state of venerable and singable decay, and lo! the ballad was all but done. It was only essential to write sixteen lines, referring every event in one's life to the household article in question, and wind up every octave of lines with its name and the adjectival adjunct of "old." Surely this was not difficult? Suppose we try, by way of illustration, to cook up a Wardour Street song? Anything will do. Let us say a door mat (although the subject is not half so ridiculous as many morbid effusions which people sing to this day and call pathetic)!

First, then, we have to get a refrain with "Door-mat," and "old" in it, and all that remains is to get the hero or heroine of the ballad into a state of extreme despondency, when, of course, their only solace is to think of "The old door mat."

This is invariably the case with people in the Wardour Street ballad. When life's horizon is dark—or they get crossed in love—or are cut down in fight—or are about to be drowned in a cyclone—they immediately turn their thoughts to the "old arm chair," or the "old green lane," or the "old butter boat," or "old elm tree," or other salutary and probable reminiscence of the same kind. Now, as regards the matter of the first and second verses: sometimes the poetaster devotes his First to a consideration of early associations with the subject of the ballad, and his Second to the memory thereof in after time. Or again, he will often devote both verses to utter despondency or despair, upon which breaks in the light of the "butter boat," or the "old flight of stairs," in the last line of each verse. In our song, let us adopt the former of these two systems, and presuming that "sat" and "hat" are obvious and suggestive rhymes to "mat"—we get, without further trouble, the following model lyric—

THE OLD DOOR-MAT.

I.

Oh! fondly still returns the day
When I was still a child,
And roamed among the verdant groves,
And plucked the roses wild;
At night within the old arm-chair,
My mother smiling sat—
My father, too, I paused to view
Upon the old door-mat—
Ah! yes;
Upon the old door mat.

II.

But dreary years have passed away,
And care is on my brow;
I do not ramble in the lanes,
Or pull the wild flow'rs now.
But when the evening-tide is come,
And flits the dreary bat,
With blinding tears I think of thee,
My lov'd and lost door-mat.
Ah! yes;
My lov'd and lost door-mat.

Permission to set the above will be obtained by applying at the "Orchestra" office; and we should not be surprised to have applications. Sometime ago we published in a feuilleton some amazingly ridiculous verses, meant sarcastically to imitate the namby-pamby school of song writing; but what was our horror to receive a letter, a few days after publication, seriously requesting permission to set the same!

Next week we purpose going into the manner and matter of the Horological and Proverbial Schools, with illustrative examples—London Orchestra.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Beethoven's "Sonate Pathétique,"

AS A PIECE FOR PUPILS.

We hear it sometimes said that Beethoven is the fashion. Perhaps this is true to a certain extent. At the same time it may be doubted, whether the Sonatas of this greatest of all tone-poets, this Shakespeare in music, receive that attention from the piano-playing community, to which they are entitled. One may well say: a pianist, who does not know Beethoven's sonatas, misses the best part of his musical enjoyments. However, young players should not approach these pieces, except under the guidance of a good teacher, or some other competent person. In the first place, it must be remembered that there are sonatas in the hands of the public composed by Beethoven in his early boyhood, of which some are scattered about singly, others included in the Complete edition of Beethoven's Sonatas, as republished, in two handsome volumes, by Ditson & Co. The two sonatas op. 49, contained in the second volume, belong to these juvenile works. The Sonatina, op. 79, may be classed with them, though—in spite of its being called Sonatina, i. e., little Sonata—it is in every respect greater, and plainly foreshadows the later Beethoven. How these pieces have come to be close neighbors to some of the grandest creations of our master's fancy, is a mystery not yet explained. Ernst von Elterlein, in his pamphlet, "Beethoven's Clavier Sonaten, für Freunde der Tonkunst," may well exclaim with indignation, that some one, who might have better attended to his own business, has smuggled these works into the edition as they now stand. To be sure, they are pretty pieces; but the spirit of that Beethoven, to whom it is my object here to call the attention of pupils and teachers, is not manifest in them.

There is another reason why young pianists should not begin to study Beethoven's Sonatas, unless guided by some teacher or person perfectly acquainted with them. Many beautiful traits contained in these compositions will conceal themselves from the beginner, if they are not pointed out to him; and it is desirable that his first impression should be as complete as possible. For this reason it is plainly not a matter of indifference which of the twenty-nine Sonatas—after making the above exceptions—is selected for the trial. Teachers will of course differ, according to the nature and capacity of the pupil who is to study the piece. However, do not suppose that the three of the Sonatas published as op. 2., because they stand lowest in number and open the first volume, are necessarily the ones to begin with. For my part, as a preparatory step, I should choose op. 14, No. 2; especially on account of its cheerful, sunny countenance, and because it is shorter and not so difficult. Still, it may be as well to give them at once a taste of the style, peculiar to the master, in the shape of the Sonate Pathétique. This piece is written in Beethoven's—I should almost say—favorite key, C minor. He has composed in this key some of his finest works; works, that for ideal beauty, are unsurpassed, if ever equalled, and which consequently, command the admiration of all schools and parties. Think, for example, only of the Fifth Symphony and the Overture to Coriolanus! Indeed, it seems to me that the true nature and spirit of Beethoven is in no key so strikingly manifest as in C minor; or in other words, that his grand, deep, and incomparable genius found in this key just its true medium of expression.*

The Sonate Pathétique, then, though by no means one of the grandest among the sonatas by Beethoven, is admirably adapted for opening the eyes of young pianists to the beauties of the great tone-poet. Besides, it is more piano-ish or piano-like (claviermäßig, as they correctly say in German), and easier of execution than most others of the same size. It is even in a certain degree brilliant, and players hitherto devoted to music in the brilliant or bravura style—that is, in plain English, showy style—will accordingly become more easily reconciled to the task before them. Again, the Pathétique has the true Sonata form, consisting, as it does, of the regular three movements, which forever will commend itself as most consistent with the nature as well as intent of a Sonata, viz., 1, Allegro; 2, Adagio; 3, Allegro; or fast, slow, fast; or, action, repose, action. A glance through the two volumes will convince any one that Beethoven has taken great liberties with this what I should call outward form of the Sonata. Not only do some consist of four movements, while others have three or two only; but the order in which they follow each other is often contrary to the established rule. But, then, as Schiller says:

"Der Meister kann die Form zerbrechen Mit weiser Hand zur rechten Zeit."

(The master may break the form, with wise hand, at the right time.)

The Sonate Pathétique, as observed, has the regular outward form; and is a model also in respect to the inward form or structure, that is, the way in which the themes and motives of each movement are conducted or worked up. Again, the three movements correspond admirably with each other, the whole sonata being, as it were, of one cast. This cannot be said of most sonatas, not even of all of Beethoven's.

The general character of the sonata is indicated by the composer himself in the word pathétique, or pathetic. Let us glance at the three movement in succession.

Before proceeding, we will remember that the first movement of a Sonata, Symphony, stringed Quartet, Quintet, or any piece based on the Sonata form, according to an established custom, consists of three parts or divisions. In the first of these parts the first and second main subjects, besides other secondary themes, phrases, melodies, motives, etc., are introduced one after another, without being subjected to much treatment. The part is then repeated. This repeat, by the way, is not always superfluous and to be left out, as many suppose. On the contrary it is often based on deep reasons, and when passed over may destroy the proper balance or symmetry of the whole movement. A repeat should always conscientiously be observed, unless the performer has taste, knowledge and experience enough to be sure that the piece is improved, and not mutilated, by the liberties taken with the composer's prescriptions. After the repetition of the first, begins the second (or middle) part. It might also be called the scientific, or intellectual part; at any rate, it is, in general, more harmonic than melodic, more artful than expressive, appeals more to the head than to the heart; and persons not musically cultivated enough to appreciate achievements in the art of counterpoint and modulation, find it the least interesting, often tedious. It is instructive to notice how superior Beethoven appears in this part to his predecessors; he has redeemed it from the odium formerly attached to it; he has infused into the skeleton life, soul and expression. In this part,—though it may sometimes bring a new subject,—the different themes, already heard in the first division, are thoroughly worked up, so as to appear in all sorts of transformations, till finally, by some skilful turn, a passage is cleared for the first main subject to make its appearance again, with which then the third part begins. This third part corresponds with the first one so much that it is often literally the same, except that the second main subject, and all which it has in its train, appear in a different key. Sometimes a coda or appendix, generally a summary of the leading subjects, is added. The second and third parts are rarely separated by a double bar—as is exceptionally the case in the Sonate Pathétique,—and in common parlance are frequently spoken of together as the second part.

*We are afraid this is all imaginary.—Ed.

(To be continued.)

MUSICAL MACHINE.—One Herr Endres of Mayence, has discovered a machine which will write down music as fast as it is played, thus entirely doing away with the great labor of composing. A German paper thus describes the invention, which seems too good to be true:

"This machine, the inward organization of which is still a secret, may be adapted with very little trouble, and at small cost, to any new or old keyed instrument, such as the organ, piano, &c., without the slightest injury to the same. Though, too, it is reckoned for any number of octaves, it is also so small in compass that it can be completely concealed under or behind the instrument. Leaving out of the question the mechanism inside, the visible process outside consists in inserting at one end of the machine an endless strip of paper, about two inches broad, which comes out at the other end with red lines ruled on it, and the notes, &c., printed thereon in black. The machine reproduces every note sounded by the keys, be the notes on or between the lines, not only marking their position, as c, d, e, and so on, but their value as conveyed by the usual characters; that is it, prints off the notes as demi-semiquavers, semi-quavers, crotchets, and semibreves; it shows whether they are dotted or not; marks the pauses; the forte and the piano; points out where the employment of the pedal commences and where it leaves off; and, in a word reproduces the music so completely, that very little is left for the pen to do afterwards. Following every wish of the player as willingly as his fingers, the mechanism works in three-four time or four-four time (and every other time may be reduced to these) and proceeds quickly or slowly at pleasure. But it does even more; it immediately transposes any piece of music from one key to another. While, however, it enables a composer instantaneously to preserve his musical thoughts and fancies by means of the usual notation, it also gives us the power of immediately taking a copy of every piece of music; of writing out from a score the separate parts of instrumental compositions; and of exercising a control over learners by showing whether they play correctly (for it marks every fault) and whether they have repeated certain passages so and so many times; thanks to this invention a deaf person may see what he has played; the master give his pupil a lesson without being close to him, and so forth. If this new machine can really do all, which, to judge by the experiments already made, there is hardly any doubt it can do, it will certainly occasion a revolution in the world of music."

ANOTHER LARGE ORGAN.—The Messrs. Hook have built, within the past year, three remarkable organs: first, the very noble one for the "Church of the Immaculate Conception," in this city, which is, we believe, the largest church organ in the United States; secondly, the great concert organ at Worcester, which is the largest ever built in this country, and only second to the Organ in our Music Hall (the former having 53 sounding stops, 3504 pipes, no stop of 32 feet, but 8 of 16 feet, and seven stops in the Pedale; the latter, 89 sounding stops, 5474 pipes, three 32 ft. stops, thirteen 16 ft., and 20 stops in the Pedale). And now comes the third, which claims precedence in size over any to be found in Protestant churches in the United States, and which has recently been placed in the "South Congregational Church" of this city (Rev. Edward Hale, pastor), for which it was built from specifications prepared by Mr. B. J. LANG, the organist of the church. This organ contains 41 speaking stops (properly 38, when we consider that in three instances the bass and treble of the same series are counted separately); 2260 pipes; 7 Pedal stops, one of which, a Bourdon, has the 32 ft. tone; 6 of 16 feet; and no less than 18 stops of 8 feet. These will serve as points of comparison as to size or volume; but we subjoin the maker's description, which the reader can analyze for himself,—reserving further remark till we can get more acquainted with the work.

Great Manual.

1. Grand Principal	16 feet.	58	pipes.
2. Montre,	8 "	58	"
3. Principal,	8 "	58	"
4. Viola Da Gamba,	8 "	58	"
5. Doppel Flöte,	8 "	58	"
6. Melodia,	8 "	46	"
7. Octave,	4 "	58	"
8. Twelfth,	2 2/3 "	58	"
9. Fifteenth,	2 "	58	"
10. Mixture,	2 ranks,	116	"
11. Mixture,	2 "	116	"
12. Trumpet,	8 "	58	"

Swell Manual.

13. Bourdon Bass,	16 feet.	13	pipes.
14. Bourdon Treble,	16 "	45	"
15. Open Diapason,	8 "	58	"
16. Salicional,	8 "	46	"
17. Gedact Bass,	8 "	13	"
18. Gedact Treble,	8 "	45	"
19. Dulce Bass,	8 "	13	"
20. Dulce Treble,	8 "	45	"
21. Flute Harmonique,	4 "	58	"
22. Octave,	4 "	58	"
23. Vox Angelica,	4 "	58	"
24. Piccolo,	2 "	58	"
25. Mixture,	3 ranks.	174	pipes.
26. Trumpet,	16 feet.	46	"
27. Trumpet,	8 "	58	"
28. Oboe,	8 "	58	"
29. Vox Humana,	8 "	58	"

Choir Manual.

30. Aeolina	16 feet.	58	pipes.
31. Principal,	8 "	58	"
32. Gedact,	8 "	58	"
33. Dulciana,	8 "	58	"
34. Violin,	4 "	58	"
35. Hohl Pfeife,	4 "	58	"
36. Clarinet,	8 "	58	"

Pedals.

37. Grand Bourdon,	32 feet	30	pipes.
38. Open Diapason,	16 "	30	"
39. Dulciana,	16 "	30	"
40. Violoncello,	8 "	30	"
41. Flute,	4 "	30	"

Mechanical Registers.

42. Swell to Great Coupler.
43. Swell to Choir "	(Unison).
44. Choir to Great "	"
45. Great to Pedale "	"
46. Swell to Pedale "	"
47. Choir to Pedale "	"
48. Tremulant ("swell.")
49. Tremulant ("choir.")
50. Bellows Signal.
51. Wind Indicator.
52. Pedale Check.

Balanced Swell Pedal, with double action.
Swell Combination Pedal.

SUMMARY.

No. of stops in Great Manual...	12, with	800 pipes,
" " Swell Manual...	14, "	904 "
" " Choir Manual...	7, "	406 "
" " Pedale.....	5, "	150 "
No. of Mechanical Registers...	11,

Total.....52 2260 pipes.

The marked feature of this Organ, contained in no other of American manufacture in New England, if we except the celebrated Tremont Temple Organ, also made by the Messrs. Hook,—is the thirty-two feet Bourdon Stop, giving tones low and deep, beyond the power of the ear to discriminate,—which are felt rather than heard. It forms a foundation for the grand harmony of the whole, wonderfully pervading and sublime.

The Case, built by J. F. Paul, Esq., from a design by Hammatt Billings, Esq., is of Black Walnut, beautiful and elaborate, with emblematical decorations, elegantly carved, and enriched with gold.

The front pipes are of a new composition, surpassing in richness and color anything before used. They are highly polished, giving a brilliant silvery appearance, in beautiful contrast with the dark woodwork.

Many improvements in scales, voicing, and "action" appliances are here used for the first time.

The instrument is located in the gallery and fills a space twenty-three feet high, eighteen and a half feet deep, with a total breadth inside of over thirty feet.

Fine Arts.

Athenaeum Gallery.

NOTES ON THE PICTURE EXHIBITION IN AID OF THE SAILORS' FAIR.

No 307, by Lehmann, is a fine piece of classical composition, full of repose, and a feeling so tender and touching that it almost gives one pain. This artist's works are always highly classical and poetic, but the coloring is very lifeless and dull, without any atmosphere, light, or area expressed, and the flesh painting is dry, leathery, like india rubber. Yet these faults are easily lost sight of in their remarkable poetic beauty, in which he is surpassed by none of his countrymen. He reminds one, in his painting of figures, of what Heude is in landscape. They have similar defects, and are both very imaginative men, but their painting is either hard and metallic, or dry and dull.

The two pictures in this room by R. Hearn, an Irish painter working in Paris, are delightful for great tenderness of feeling and beauty of color. They are so like Lafarge's pictures as to be easily mistaken for them. This style, shadowy and, some may think, obscure, sentimental and slight, or slovenly; giving sometimes, it may be confessed, the sentiment of things at the expense of the truth and the form, yet is capable of expressing something of the mysterious tenderness and subtler beauties of nature, which few perceive, and fewer feel, unless they have some poetry in their souls. It is some such style, something in kind, as Shelley might have painted had he expressed the thirst of his soul, the feelings of beauty which haunted and possessed him, in art instead of poetry. It draws the soul out of things, and extracts from nature, which is as dry stubble to the unimaginative man, and the literal and materialistic painter, its essence, suggesting a beauty which is supreme, a thing of the soul and of the heart. It is that beauty which is not to be defined or analyzed, but only felt. The sensibility which trembles and adores. What certain stanzas in "The Sensitive Plant," the "Invocation," and the "Prometheus Unbound" give voice to, is here expressed or indicated in art:

A spirit interfused around
A thinking silent life.

Sweet views, which in the world above
Can never well be seen,
Were imaged by the water's love
Of that fair forest green.

And all was interfused beneath
With an Elysian glow,
An atmosphere without a breath,
A softer day below.

This sympathetic feeling, and feeling in art or literature to those who do not bring it with them to the consideration and appreciation of these subjects, is a stumbling block, a myth, a delusion, and worse than emptiness; an affront to their sense, resented with pert scoffing, with supercilious indifference and contempt; but to the poet or artist, an ecstasy, an inspiration, a delight.

We dare maintain that the moonlight (311) in this room is much more beautiful and true, displays more knowledge, love, and feeling for nature than the pretty pieces in the next room by Cassilear. The one is a prettyism; sensational; smoothly and sweetly done enough, and is a subject sure to be effective if tolerably achieved, but displaying no subtlety or real and deep appreciation of nature. Our painters, for the most part depend upon their subject for success, not upon the doing of it. Now art which is art, which deserves the name, can dignify and give interest to meanest things. Hence, the value of still life painting which is just as much a true branch of the art as Raphael's "Transfiguration," or Michael Angelo's "Moses;" for art is the feeling for, and perception of nature in her whole range and compass, texture, mass, and detail; color, form, surface and substance. Nature is nowhere mean, but always wonderful and beautiful. The humblest object, animate or inanimate, has a world of untold beauties, if we but open our eyes to them. As the microscope unfolds the marvellous structure of nature undreamt of before, so does the poet's eye, whether he express himself in verse, in prose, or in art, pierce to the unknown depths, the essence and beauty of things unfelt and unthought of before, and lays bare their beauty to the world, revealing an inner and subtler sense. The dull and incredulous may not be alive to the inspiration, but the artist at last educates all to his standpoint of supernal vision. "He creates the taste by which he is appreciated."

The poet's eye, in a fine frenzy rolling,
Doth glance from heaven to earth, from earth to heaven,
And as imagination bodies forth,
The forms of things unknown, the poet's pen
Turns them to shapes and gives to airy nothings
A local habitation and a name.
Such tricks hath strong imagination.

We must grow up to the artist and not expect him to grow down to us. Our artists are in art just where the poets and many writers of the last century were in literature, still held fast by the charms of an artificial style, and a stilted and false diction; conventional, cold, shallow; dealing merely in prettiness and panorama, theatrical figure-painting, and trite, feeble attempts at reproducing reality. They are almost all wrong and have done nothing which will live. The men of genius as far as we know, may be counted on the finger ends—Hunt, Inness, Lafarge, Vedder, Babcock, Billings, Cole, Gay, Boughton, now rising fast in England, and a few others who will one day attain to fame.

The class of men who paint the sublimities of nature as you would decorate a wall, are not men of genius. Genius is not in proportion to the size of the work, or the sublimity of the subject, but often lies in little and in the doing. These men have wonderful talent, but no imagination and less feeling. To paint a mountain you must have, so to say, something of mountainous or the mountain's genius, not a mounting genius. The mountain must do more for you than it did for Mahomet. It must come to you through the soul or feeling. A painter may be capable, his genius may be adequate to give the truth and sentiment of a field, a gentle river, a hill "of mild declivity," a fall singing in the woods and shining in its own silver light and mist, like a goddess, which the ancients with their rich shaping imagination conceived it to be: a sweet brook

Which to the sleepy woods all night
Singeth a pleasant tune
In the leafy month of June;

but it is a very different thing to attempt to shadow forth any portion of that impressive sublimity which nature exhibits in her fastnesses and her mountains, her seas and her cataracts. These are her infinite moods, which perhaps it is vain to attempt to give in art. At any rate in the present day the French, the great artists of the age, with a true instinct have wisely forborne. The attempt to give this sublimity has hitherto failed. Hereafter we may see the artist who can do it, but thus far it has eluded men's minds and has never yet been achieved, and the effect is emptiness, vanity and desert; or a cold and sterile thing which is no more like God's mountains as they strike down into our souls, than a potato is like a sensitive plant or a lily. Turner, it is true, gives us something of the largeness, distance and glory of nature by Sea and land, over hilly tracts and leagues of level rivers and plain, where as Keats says:

"Innumerable mountains rise and rise, Impatient for the hallowing of thine eyes;"

but our own men, we think, have utterly failed in what they have attempted. The composition of their scene paintings is clever, and they display abundant facility and talent; but it is mechanical dexterity, and not apprehensive feeling, sympathetic emotion and representative presentation, not true, high art which they are able to give. Yet how readily they rush into this; with what acclaim and clapping of hands, and uproarious fame, "where angels fear to tread." With what temerity before they can handle well the little subject, do they dare the highest and the uttermost. These stupendous themes which would appal a modest (and all genius is modest), conscientious, truthful, feeling artist, to whom nature is in the place of his idol, his friend, his mistress, we had almost said, his god.

But we will not enlarge upon the vice of the American mind, its restless ambition and over confident spirit, which overleaps itself. Inflation and exaggeration are characteristic and inevitable to a young nation, unlimited in resources, unlimited in its future, unlimited in its growth, and expanse, and territory; unconfined in spirit and untrammelled by age, not fettered or anchored in the past, but bounding onward in the fleetness of youth and buoyancy, of expectation and emotion, to an endless career of success and intoxication.

By a natural transference and law of mind, such a people expresses itself in the superlative in art, in language, in manners and in life; emphatic, hasty, superficial and eager. In art, Johnson's dictum will hardly hold, "to aim at the eagle if you only hit the sparrow," for the result is bathos, sterility and inflation. Better do adequately what lies around us which is the true art, than seek to scale the mountains by a jump.

"Why thus forever longing, sighing,
For the far off, the unattained, the dim,
While the beautiful all around thee lying,
Offers up its low perpetual hymn."

This should be the sentiment of landscape art.

Musical Correspondence.

PHILADELPHIA, NOV. 20.—The Grover German Opera troupe has just finished its stay with us. During a fortnight, crowded houses testified to the interest we took in the performances; an interest, by the way, greatly excited by a previous dearth of music and by the laudatory comments of sundry journalists nearer the pole than ourselves.

La Dame Blanche was given on the opening night, introducing Herr LEHMANN, the new baritone, and Mlle. DZIUBA, who is to play in some of the roles formerly assumed by Mlle. CANNISSA. To say that Mlle. D. sometimes sings in better tune than Mlle. Cannissa would be cheap praise. It is all that can be said in her favor, except that she acts well. Mme. ZIMMERMANN sang the song at the spinning wheel quite acceptably. HABELMANN did as usual, and the new baritone, Lehmann, was much admired.

On Tuesday night, the Academy held such a crowd as used to assemble there in days of yore, to admire and applaud FORMES as Bertram. It was the night of election day, and the presence of the pleasure-seeking throng might have made one ask whether our people were indifferent to the result of the political battle.

And what better cause for the large house of Tuesday evening than a desire again to witness FORMES as Bertram! Those who had not heard of the change in the quality of his voice must have left the Academy with a feeling of disappointment. The mellow bass-notes are no longer his. But then his singing was generally truthful, his appearance as of old, his conception of the arduous role as full of genius and as thoroughly artistic as ever. As a dramatic effort, it was equal to the best we have yet had and worthy of his better days, his performance in which is held in such pleasant recollection by our opera goers as to be the standard by which all future Bertrams must be content to have their claims to approval tested.

Herr HIMMER, as Robert, compared favorably with the others who have acted and sung in that role. It is, in this region, usually entrusted to some tenor who has retained his reputation but lost his voice. The Alice of Madame ROTTER displayed another phase of her dramatic talent; Mme. JOHANNSEN, as the roulade princess, sang carefully and correctly and then we had Habelmann as Raimbaud, the gentle "wandering minstrel."

Robert le Diable suggests a slight digression. It were too late now to deny Meyerbeer's genius. Others, abler than I to measure his talent, have written pro and con. I cannot avoid, however, adding a few remarks concerning the diabolical on the modern stage. The agents used to signalize the entrance or exit of evil spirits are, of course, intended to produce a certain effect of awe on the beholder similar to that supposed to fill the affrighted or fascinated stage hero, or heroine. And yet they invariably fail to produce such feelings. Who can imagine that the ballet of nuns in Robert le Diable, the Wolf's Glen in Der Freischütz, or the taking away of Don Juan, were intended to provoke an audience to laughter?

By the introduction of mechanical effects at the most telling moments, the composer fails of his object, and that which was well-executed as regards the music, loses its meaning. Up to the moment when the last bullet is cast, the music of the incantation scene in Der Freischütz aways the listener. His interest is awakened—he is all attention—he is fascinated by the weird and gloomy measures of the music. Fear and wonder agitate him, and he awaits the critical moment with as much concern as if he were another Zamiel. The word is pronounced, when lo! a piece of wire is seen to pull an owl from its perch; wooden monsters belching forth flames are wheeled across the stage; the Wild Huntsman and his troop dash through the clouds in the guise of kite bobs; twenty dollars worth of fireworks are let off, and that which began with the sublime ends with the ridiculous. All such appliances remind one of the toys and fairy tales of infancy. Need we wonder that those who have lost their love for the former, and their faith in the latter, remain unmoved by a spectacle fit only to excite the enthusiasm of a child?

In a former letter, I wrote of Gounod's Faust, and of the composer's failure to produce an opera worthy of the Goethean ideal. The task would have been too great for any one, and, viewed in that connection, the opera cannot satisfy. After repeated hearings, the hold of the original tragedy becomes less, and the effect of the music more potent, and then alone can one judge impartially of the merit of Gounod's work. To deny him melody, fine ideal coloring, a mastery of effect, and, in some instances, true poetical insight into the beauties of his subject, were unfair. Gounod was, undoubtedly, elevated by his subject, but did not rise to the proper level to do it full-est justice.

HERMANN's Mephisto, FREDERICI's Gretchen, were excellent performances. Faust was done by TAMARO, in Italian. The substitution of this gentleman for Herr Himmer treated us to a more agreeable voice and a better style than we would otherwise have had in this part. But Herr Himmer, in spite of his pantomimic posturing, has a truer and more fervid conception of the character.

The March was encored. When Valentine and his German volunteers reappeared in answer to the call, the Star Spangled Banner was borne by one of the company. As in duty bound, we applauded our flag, though we were annoyed by the music. The exhibition was out of keeping, however, and savored more of patriotism than of taste, and more of clap-trap than of aught else.

I shall not enter into further details as regards special performances. La Juive, Martha, Stradella, Der Freyschütz, Das Nuchtlager in Granada, Les Huguenots, Don Juan and Fidelio followed in rapid succession. Herr Lehmann's fine voice rendered his Don Juan quite acceptable. Fidelio drew the poorest house of the season!

It is to be regretted that the liberality displayed in some directions by Mr. Grover has not reached the orchestra. Though numerically as strong, it is not as good as it was last year, and much of the material is different. The harp has been abandoned, and a piano now fills its place.

Satin programmes and advertisements to the contrary notwithstanding, Manager Grover may have a great opera troupe without its being a "grand" affair. He would, therefore, do well if he left the showy, spectacular operas to other organizations, and would only allow his singers to appear in those works to which his resources enable him to do full justice.

s.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, NOV. 26, 1864.

Metropolitan Provincialism.

Boston has hitherto enjoyed the reputation of being, in some sense, a musical metropolis—so far as that is possible in a half-musical New World; but just now we are swamped by a back tide of musical provincialisms. The newspapers call it an extremely musical week; the concert advertising column is a yard long; but the real music-lover looks through the list in vain for anything to tempt his appetite. Nothing but miscellaneous medley concerts, squads of opera singers, English and Italian, travelling parties such as start forth from New York and Boston, to "do the provinces," as they would say in London, and turn a penny in the large inland towns, the Western cities, remote outskirts of Music-land, and with the same style of programmes. No Philharmonics, no Beethoven Symphonies, no Mendelssohn or Handel Oratorios, none of the things that inspire!

Since the departure of the German Opera we have had, for such a city and for such a season, a strange dearth of good music. The Great Organ to be sure is played almost daily; but great organ music forms the least part of its occupation; and the truer the organist, the more does he incline to keep himself in the background rather than lend himself to all this promiscuous exhibition. Promiscuous vocal exhibitions, also, rather than concerts in a high sense of the word, concerts of the ad captandum character, what may be called business concerts, in contradistinction to artistic, sometimes gather round the Great Organ, while Beethoven, fixed in bronze, must stand there with no power to intimate that he is bored or scandalized. All this is well enough in its way, if it were not all. There is often good organ playing and good singing, and some good things are played and sung. But what shall we say of a city like Boston, with its proud musical memories, now living so far into a winter and having no Symphony, no glorious Oratorio, no classical chamber concert, nothing but Organ (et toujours Organ) and miscellaneous concerts of the most provincial kind! Here is a Music Hall, perhaps the noblest in the world, haunted for years in every corner by the echoes of the inspirations of Beethoven and Mozart and Handel, and now furnished, furthermore, with the grandest of organs to give utterance also to Bach. Shall it, as the consequence of this splendid acquisition, become only Organ Hall!

We blame no one; we know not where the fault lies. Perhaps it is in the public. Perhaps Boston has not the eager audience it once had for great music. And yet the Fidelio experience of the past month means something! Yet we are sure that Boston people always want to see and hear the best in literature or art, and that the number of persons of cultivated taste for every art is greater in proportion here than in most other cities. Perhaps the musicians, the directors, are too timid, do not trust the public enough. Perhaps the materials of an orchestra, on a fit scale, do not exist among us. The unpleasant fact, is, we are destitute. We hear nothing more of Mr. Zerrahn's fine and confident purpose of "Philharmonic Concerts," except in the dim future. The Mendelssohn Quintette Club seem to have vacated the field of Chamber Concerts, and no new combination rushes in to occupy. The Handel and Haydn Society, to be sure, announce an Oratorio for to-morrow evening; but not one of their great ones (of which they have plenty).—There is just one oasis in the desert,—and that is not advertised! Mr. DRESEL's Piano-forte Concerts begin this evening at Chickering's, and these, to the favored few who can find place there, open fresh springs of unalloyed, unwearying delight.

And this is Boston! This the town which knows the nine Symphonies, and knows Fidelio! This is the middle of the fresh forenoon, or should be, of the long musical day or season. And this is—what a moment in the life of all this people! what a time for music! what a need of its sublimest work, its Choral Symphonies, its Hymns of Praise, its Handelian choruses: ("For He hath triumphed gloriously,") for harmonies of kindred inspiration with that which now exalts and gladdens the heart of a great free nation, which feels that it has shaken a horrid nightmare from its breast, and now breathes freely again after a peaceful victory in the sublime discharge of a great duty on a day forever to be counted among the greatest in all human history! Why, at the end of that day the whole popular heart burst forth into song; Faneuil Hall could not contain the multitudes, but the spontaneous music from within went forth and in a magnetic, sympathetic sense brought all in; the old building rang and shook with the old homely, unartistic strains, and we pity any soul that cared at that time for any better music than "Old Hundred" and "John Brown's soul is marching on" with "Glory Hallelujah!" For everybody seemed to find a voice, a ringing, musical and clear one; it takes a deep pervading inspiration to make such mass-singing truly musical—it was so then. And now, in this great mood of the people, what do we expect of Art? In what tones shall Music Hall respond to Faneuil Hall? In aimless, disconnected scraps of worn-out Italian and English operas? In sentimental ballads and pretty "effects," and things sung just to gratify a curiosity about the singer? In brass band concerts, Heaven save the mark! We are in no mood to listen to any but the real earnest speakers, those who have great thoughts to utter; we are impatient of all babblers and triflers. And is it not the same with music? Who but the Beethovens, the Handels, the Mendelssohns, are fit to speak to such a people now? Their loftiest utterances can by no possibility overshoot us; all but the greatest, or at least the truest, must sound empty, puerile and puny.

We have no objection to "business" concerts, "popular concerts," light and miscellaneous concerts, dazzling virtuosos, brass bands, nor even hand-organs; these all have their "mission" in the world; if any fanatical movement should arise to put a stop to them, as lately to the London organ-grinders, we should be found defending them. We only grumble at the indifference, or whatever it is, of such a musical community in not pre-occupying our fine halls, Art's consecrated places, with enterprises of high Art; in not making permanent and sure provision for Symphony and other classical productions. But on the score of "business," of mere material economy,—the most successful and most thrilling concert, long to be remembered, that ever took place in the Music Hall, was a purely classical one, and in a similar period,—that glorious Emancipation Jubilee on the first of January, 1863. Have we not at least equal motive now, and can we not afford as much? Let the musicians make their appeal to the great spirit of the hour, and try if there be no response. Why has Fidelio pleased more than any opera? The appeal need not be directly, literally, ostensibly to any political or humanitarian motives; let it reside simply in the high character of the music offered, and see if like does not draw forth like, see if there is not audience for the greatest as well as for the prettiest, see if there are not thousands of souls tired of Vanity Fair and seeking sympathy and rest in Beethoven. (Not Beethoven imitated on the Organ, but face to face in person, with his Orchestra).

— There! we have had our grumble. It only remains to say that some fine singers and players, some of them new to us, have figured in the kaleidoscopic medley of the week, with more to come, and to spread out the variegated list, which our amiable Transcript thinks "cannot fail to please the tastes of all classes of the musical public;" but there are some of us who "cannot see it," some unfortunates who, with all these doors standing open, still feel "left out in the cold," and who in all this abundance are put to it to single out a musical Thanksgiving turkey with much taste to it. (But let those give thanks who can hear Dresel!) Here is the list:

1. Monday 21st, Prof. CARNES, the blind musician, "who sings lower on the scale than any other man in the known world," has "five octaves" in his voice (or in his belly), can play the cornet with one hand and the piano with the other, imitate a band with his voice, &c., &c.,—all which one would as lief read of as hear done; for what satisfaction could the realization add to the dream thereof?

2. Wednesday noon. Organ at Music Hall. Of which elsewhere.

3. Thursday (Thanksgiving evening,) the principal singers of Campbell and Castle's English Opera troupe, after winning high praise at Worcester, where they know something about music, gave a concert at Music Hall. Mr. CASTLE we know to be a fine tenor; Mr. CAMPBELL has a very high reputation as a basso, and Misses STOCKTON and FOWLER have made a fair mark. We go to press before the concert, and can say no more at present.

4. Same evening, the "five-octave" Professor again, with the assistance of a steam engine of his own manufacture!

5. Friday evening, at the Music Hall, (Beethoven presiding—did no one do him the kindness to throw a veil over his head!), a concert by the American Brass Band of Providence. Doubtless a most worthy Band, such as it might stir one's patriotic blood to hear in street or camp or political meeting, but—in the Music Hall and on the Organ platform!

6. Same evening, Grand Operatic Concert (Italian) by the "Associated Artists," Mme. WHITING-LORINI, soprano, Mme. NATALIA TESTA, contralto, Sig. STEFANI, tenor robusto, Sig. TESTA, tenor di grazia, Sig. AMODIO, baritone, and Mr. BEHRENS, conductor.

7. This evening, ditto.

8. This noon, Mr. LANG at the Great Organ.

9. This evening, the first of OTTO DRESSEL's five concerts, at Chickering's. The programme of the very choicest and newest. Among other things, a Concerto by Bach, for three pianos, with the string accompaniments played on a fourth piano, Messrs. LANG, LEONHARD and PARKER assisting Mr. Dresel; a Concerto by Chopin, never hitherto played by Mr. D. in public; pieces by Schumann; songs by Franz and from Mozart's Seraglio, sung by Mr. KREISSMANN.

10. To-morrow, Sunday evening. Costa's Oratorio, "Eli," a musician-like work, with a certain popularity, by the HANDEL AND HAYDN Society. It will at all events be pleasant to hear the sound of a great chorus, with an orchestra, and the great Organ, and such solo singers as Miss HOUSTON, Mrs. CARY, Mr. WHEELER, Mr. KIMBALL and Mr. RUDOLPHSEN.

11—13. Monday, Wednesday and Friday next week, three grand concerts (everything is "grand" now-a-days, from an Oratorio to a parlor concert, from a Symphony of Beethoven to a grand solo on the octave flute or Vox humana), at the Melodeon, under the direction of Sig. MUZIO, who will introduce his pupil, Miss LUCY SIMONS, "a young and talented vocalist;" besides GÖTTSCALK, on another round of "farewells," MORELLI, the baritone, DOEHLE' violinist, and ZOEHLE' Brothers, flutists.

—We forgot to mention also Mr. EICHBERG's new operetta, "A Night in Rome," which is to be produced this evening at the Museum, with an enlarged orchestra and chorus.

Great Organ Record.

What has the "Great Instrument" done for us during the past month? It has been played every Wednesday and Saturday noon, every Sunday evening, and during the Sailors' Fair, in aid of that patriotic good work, every day and once in the evening for a week. The selections have been even more promiscuously mingled, and with falling off rather than increase of audience. Mr. PAINE has not played at all, except as one of several in a patriotic concert, and consequently there has been less of Bach and fewer programmes of pure organ music than usual. The instrument itself, by its grandeur, richness, perfectly musical blending of its tones, and fine individuality of separate stops, continues to grow and deepen into the affections of the frequent listener, and is without a rival.

Mr. LANG, from the last week in October, has played twice, and will play again to-day. Of Bach he has given us a lovely Pastorale in F, putting to it a well contrasted Finale by Schumann, and that bright Prelude and Fugue in E flat from the "Well-Tempered Clavier," which he played once before. Not an uninteresting experiment (during the German Opera time) was his attempt to render the wonderful Quartet in Fidelio; we cannot think that he succeeded, or that it would be possible to succeed; the voice parts would not stand out enough from the equally complex and canon-like accompaniments. But there is always something thoughtful, some idea in Mr. Lang's programmes; his improvisations, too, are the continuous development of a theme, and therefore more interesting than most; while there is taste and feeling always in his execution. He is still fond of repeating that third Sonata of Mendelssohn, and we are fond of hearing him; this time he restored the original order of the movements, putting the pensive little Andante last, which on the whole is best,—Mendelssohn's design at any rate. To his usual overture "transcriptions" he has added some selections from Tannhäuser, not with bad effect. Mr. L. likes to compliment his brother musicians, and this last time he made the Organ sing William Mason's "Amitié pour Amitié"—very sweet and pleasing. He still utterly abstains—he only besides Paine—from the French Offertoires; which is refreshing.

Mrs. FRONCK has played twice. On Nov. 2nd, being the anniversary of the inauguration of the Organ, she played a large part of the music on that occasion, though only one of the three Bach pieces, the Toccata in F. On the 12th, she played Bach's Toccata in C, ably as always. Her Andante in the Fifth Symphony was conscientious, well reasoned out as to combination and contrast of stops; but there was great unsteadiness of time. The "Wedding March" and the "Hallelujah Chorus" never sounded better, if so well, to us upon the organ. Fine, too, was the Adagio from Mendelssohn's first Sonata. There was a Battiste Offertoire (in D) for the sake of the Vox humana. Her improvisation was quite creditable. Few organists excel this lady in tasteful choice of stops; and should not a lady be a nice judge of colors?

Mr. THAYER has played once (very likely, once or twice also for the Fair). Bach's Toccata in F; a Prelude in C minor by Mendelssohn; the Qui Tollis from Mozart's (so called) 12th Mass; his own Offertoire for Vox humana; a Pastorale from Rossini's "Tell;" the Overture to Martha (!); Melodies ("by particular request," and "Star Spangled Banner" variations. This ought to suit "all tastes"; though what suits all, commonly suits none.

Dr. TUCKERMAN played on Sunday evening, Nov. 13. Programme essentially the same as in some of his previous "Sacred Organ Concerts;" from masses, oratorios, Stabat Mater, &c., of Rossini, Grun, Haydn, Mozart, Schubert, Spohr; a Chorale by Bach; an Offertoire by Wely. All dignified and, mostly, church-like.

We were sorry not to hear Mr. G. E. WHITING (of St. Joseph's Church, Albany), who played Nov. 11th. Sonata in F minor, No. 1., by Mendelssohn; selections from "Tell;" a Bach Fugue in five parts (F minor); Vespers by Donizetti; improvisation on an air by Mendelssohn; and Overture to Oberon. Mr. Whiting made an excellent impression on a former visit.

Other visitors have been Mr. C. JEROME HOPKINS and Mr. G. W. MORGAN, both of New York.

The former, who now bears the title "Orpheon Professor in Cooper Union" (meaning, we believe, that he teaches free singing classes of the people under the wing of that institution, somewhat on the principle of the Orpheonists in France), played on Saturday and Sunday, Nov. 6th and 7th. Of his first selection, Weber's Euryanthe overture was a pretty bold attempt; by a too staccato treatment, it lacked smoothness and clearness. The other pieces, except a charming MS. melody by Schubert, all bore the name of Hopkins, and were so unique and venturesome in title, form, and manner, that we know no more what to say of them than of confused dreams which we might try to unravel in the morning. One of the titles is commendable for its frankness; namely, "Italian Sugarplums;" others have showered these on us in their organ Carnivals, only without the title. Several of his Sunday selections sounded to us more reasonable; for instance his Nocturne, but not his "Wedding March." The "Pilgrim Chant" from Tannhäuser (from the overture) was worked up with a prodigious crescendo, but the fantasia ran wild and stopped not short of the Venus-berg, which was not particularly "sacred," nor organ-like; the "Song to the Evening Star" was better. A Prelude and Fugue by Hummel, another by Bach, a Mendelssohn Adagio, and the Schubert song (in praise of Music) did more to remind one that it was a "sacred" concert.

Mr. MORGAN was welcomed as he always is, and his mastery of the instrument is as superb as ever. In his programmes we could wish that he indulged less in the sensational. He has played three times, last Saturday and Sunday, and again on Wednesday. His best things have been what he has often played here before: the "Israel in Egypt" chorus, the St. Ann's Fugue, the Introduction and Fugue by Mendelssohn; the Andante from a Haydn Symphony, and Overtures in abundance. Four of them in his Sunday programme: "Midsummer Night's Dream," which seemed to us taken too slow, otherwise excellent; Beethoven's to "Men of Prometheus;" Mozart's to Zauberflöte, which we think the most clear and organ-like of them, as he transcribes it, and Der Freyschütz. The Haydn Andante, the "St. Ann's" fugue, the "Wedding March," a Nocturne by Schumann, and a "Melody" too long "varied" and yet encored, filled out the evening.—In the other concerts the "Tell" overture, (which on the organ is Mr. M.'s peculiar property); the slow movement of Beethoven's 2nd Symphony, which he always plays so well; a Prelude by Bach in G, and that exercise-like Fugue in D, are the chief things not already mentioned, except National airs, "Huguenots" fantasia, &c.

"OUR DIARIST" (A. W. T.) We are happy to be able to state that our old friend, Mr. ALEXANDER W. THAYER, now in Vienna, has been appointed United States Consul at Trieste, an announcement which will give joy to a great many of our readers. His long rugged pathway being thus smoothed for him, we may now hope that he will have the time and means and health to finish the darling labor of his life, his Life of Beethoven, and give it to the world.

M. Thayer's interesting story of the life of Salieri, which has grown even beautiful toward the end, is concluded in to-day's paper. It shows Salieri to have been much more of a man than the musical world of to-day supposed, and is a most valuable chapter in the history of Music, hitherto unwritten.

WORCESTER, Mass.—The formal inauguration of the Great Organ, built by Messrs. E. & G. G. Hook, and described in our last, took place on the evening of the 10th. Here is the Palladium's account of it:

Mechanics' Hall was filled on Thursday evening, 10th inst., by an enthusiastic audience which testified to its appreciation of the noble qualities of the "Worcester Organ" by constant attention and hearty applause. The first performer was Mr. B. D. Allen of this city, who played, in a very acceptable manner, Handel's Hallelujah Chorus, also an Adagio and Rondo from a Concerto by Rink, which showed the unsurpassed beauty of some of the softer stops of the great instrument, and the fine combinations of which it is capable. Mr. W. E. Thayer, of Boston, then gave a fine rendering of Bach's Toccata, in F, the massive harmonies rolling forth with fine effect;

the William Tell Overture; and the favorite Offertoire for the Vox humana, written by Battiste, played now upon every concert-organ, encored by almost every audience, and doubly encored by the inauguration audience, who were enthusiastic over the excellence of this curious stop. Mr. J. H. Willcox played with his sure touch and unusual skill in concert-performance, the celebrated Offertoire in G. by Lefebure Wely; an Improvisation, introducing again the Vox humana; and Beethoven's Grand Hallelujah Chorus from "The Mount of Olives." The performers for the most part did well. In Mr. Allen, the audience found they were to have a fine interpreter of our noble Organ, which must not too often tickle the fancy with the French sugar-plums of music, but sing for us those sublime strains which were written for the instrument by composers of genius, whose music cannot be ground out by hand-organs, nor drawn out in the "linked sweetness" of a flute solo. The instrument revealed new grandeur and beauty. Delight was manifest upon every countenance, and the Organ was again "accepted" this time by the people of Worcester, as it had been before by the Association who now own it and hold it in responsible charge. The occasion might have been more satisfactory to many had there been more unity in the performances, more of an attempt to give an artistic and significant coloring to the whole—as inaugurating not only a grand Organ, but a new era of music in this somewhat unmusical Heart of the Commonwealth.

"Young America" had its own special Inauguration a few days after the above, in the shape of a free Organ concert for the children of the city schools. The same journal says:

The schools at the north side of the city were assembled on Saturday afternoon, to the number of twenty-two hundred scholars, accompanied by fifty teachers, and a concert was given, the scholars uniting in choruses under the direction of their Instructor, Mr. I. N. Metcalf, Mr. B. D. Allen accompanying them with the Organ. Alternating with the choruses, were performances upon the organ of selections well calculated to impress the young audience with the power and beauty of the instrument. The silent wonder and reverence, the child-like joy and admiration which would break forth when the Vox humana sang the Marseillaise and "Sweet Home," and the final burst of patriotic enthusiasm with which not only the scholars in the body of the hall, who had been musically drilled, but the little ones in the side-galleries and the suburban scholars in their gallery—hitherto silent, joined in singing "My Country 'tis of thee!"—all this was a scene that would have trebly repaid every donor of the instrument for his share in this gift of Worcester to her children. The children of the schools on the south side of the city will have their concert this afternoon.

FARMINGTON, CONN.—Corn and melons are not more unfailing, than the report we get every autumn of two classical concerts from this quiet village in "the land of steady habits." Within the precincts of Miss Porter's Young Ladies' School, once every year there drop down out of the heaven of New York two baskets of this fairy fruitage of sonata, quartet, concerto; &c., borne by such shining messengers as Mason, Thomas, Mills, and the like. It is because a true teacher and musician, Karl Klausner, has his sphere of labor there. The classic artists like to visit him, and find a pleasant eager audience in his pupils. Here are programmes of the present month:

21st Concert, Nov. 14.

1. Sonata, for Piano and Violin, in B flat, ..... Mozart.
1. Allegro. 2. Andante. Allegretto.
S. B. Mills and Theo. Thomas.
2. Phantasio-Stücke, for Piano, ..... Schumann.
a. In der Nacht. b. Traumes-Willen.
S. B. Mills.
3. Sonata, for Violin, "Le Trille du Diable," ..... Tartini.
Theo. Thomas.
4. Etude, for Piano, in C Sharp minor, ..... Chopin.
S. B. Mills.
5. Adagio Tarantelle, for Violin, ..... Vieuxtemps.
Theo. Thomas.
6. Fantasia, for Piano—"Faust," ..... Mills.
S. B. Mills.

22nd Concert, Nov. 15.

1. Sonata, for Piano and Violin, in G. Op. 30, No. 3.
Beethoven.
1. Allegro. 2. Tempo di Minuetto. 3. Allegro Vivace.
S. B. Mills and Theo. Thomas.
2. Sonata, for Piano, in D. ..... Mendelssohn.
S. B. Mills.
3. Concerto, for Violin, ..... Mendelssohn.
Andante in Finale.

4. Polonaise, in E flat, Op. 22, ..... Chopin.
S. B. Mills.
5. Sonata, for Piano and Violin, in A minor, Op. 106.
Schumann.
S. B. Mills and Theo. Thomas.

Our reporter adds:

"MILLS played here for the first time and with complete success. Of his admirable, solid technics it is needless to speak—except that they were put to a severe test by an (exceptionally) wretched Steinway Grand—a cause of sorrow to every pianist, we have had here; Satter, Mason, Dresel, &c.—Mills's conception of the pieces of the old and new school gave evidence of a decided mental growth. His rendering was unexceptionable—simple and unaffected. To atone for the Faust fantasia (cleverly done, but here rather out of place)—he had the good taste to give his very best: the Adagio from Chopin's, F minor Concerto."

HARTFORD, CONN.—Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" and Rossini's Stabat Mater were performed last Monday evening, in Allyn Hall, by the "Beethoven Society" with an orchestra of 21 instruments, including the Mendelssohn Quintette Club of Boston. Mr. J. G. BARNETT was the conductor, who also furnished a clear and glowing description of the composition on the bills; and Mr. WM. J. BABCOCK the pianist.

CINCINNATI—Messrs. CHARLES KUNKEL, pianist, and HENRY HAHN, violinist, announces a series of "Concerts de Salon, ou Soirées d'Instruction Musicales," in which they propose to follow "the reigning plan of the Chamber Concerts of London, Paris, and other European Cities, where the cultivation of L'Art Musical is conceded the first among their refinements." The style of their Circular is very French, but the list of composers who are to figure in their season of five "Musicales" (which we suppose means Concerts) is certainly rich; they promise "the rendition of the simplest compositions, to the most elaborate works of such masters as Mozart, Beethoven, Liszt, Heller, Chopin, De Beriot, Vieuxtemps, Ernst, Pramo, Thalberg, Schubert, Robert Franz, Lachner, &c."

A CURIOUS LETTER.—The following, of which the original MS. has for many months lain upon our desk, has, by some mysterious agency, found its way into the columns of the London Athenaeum, which seems to enjoy such a musical item from America prodigiously. To us there is something touching as well as queer in it, and we could not find it in our heart to publish it. But since the Athenaeum has undertaken to give it verbatim et literatim, we feel compelled to print it, re-edited and carefully collated with the MS.; premising also, that the letter hails from our British neighbors on the North, and not from Yankeedom.

"Messrs.——, Dear Sirs,—I should of Written to you before this abought the deth of my beloved Daughter, Miss——, she died with hart desies verrey suddenly on the second of June aged 17 years 7 months 14 days she was acknollaged to be the gratest pie onist in this part of the Provence. You will do me A favour by insurting hir deth in your Jurnal. Please continue to send the paper till the year is up and your bill and I will remit to you. Dear Sir many heavvey peases of Musick my daughter had of by hart to 2 of her choise peases was one carnival de venice by J. Schulhoff and others to maney to be menchind her favorite pease was home swete home by thollburgh she could play this in eight minites and all the other peases on or about the same time Dear Sir, she told hir mother A fu days before hir deth When playing sweat home she said Mam do you heare the arc of home sweat home she said listen Mam how beautiful it is When all the angels will join in the arc of home sweat home how beautiful it will be in Heaven. she spoke these words About 15 days befor she died. We had not the slitest thought of hir death at the time. if you would compose a vurs on the happy angels of God I should beglad as I beleave my child Was A heaven born child destined for eternal glorey, I hope you will simpethise with me in my bereavment. Respectfully Yours, ——"

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE

LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Kermesse. The "Fair" scene. (Su da bere.)

"Faust." 30

The "fair" scene includes seven pretty solos, and the same solos afterward woven together in the form of a six part chorus. The present piece has the solos without the chorus, and as they occur consecutively, they may all be sung by one voice, like a song. The song of the Students, of Wagner, of the Old men, the Soldiers, the Young Students, the Maidens, and of the Matrons, will be found in the piece.

Angels pure, angels glorious. Song. "First." 30

This is the "death song" of Marguerite in the prison. For pure spiritual beauty, it is the finest in the opera.

Parting kiss at the door. Song and Chorus.

W. O. Fiske. 30

A pleasing good bye song.

God grant our soldiers safe return. Solo & Cho.

O. E. Dodge. 30

A song of the war, which will soon be extensively known to persons attending Mr. D.'s concerts. It is a good song, and different in some things from other "songs for the times."

My gentle Mary. Ballad. G. Barker. 30

"Mary" figures often in ballads, as she should, on account of her very musical name. The ballad is of a quiet and gentle style of beauty.

Row, row, homeward we go. Song. M. J. Sporis. 30

A boat song, with the peculiarity, that it is in rowing time; that is, rowers can sing it, and keep time with their strokes. Good on this account for boat parties and boat clubs.

Won't you tell? Song. S. Glover. 30

Mr. Glover has given us here a musical way of popping the question, which will be very convenient for young men with good voices. A delicate and sweet melody.

Good night, my own dearest child.

(Gute nacht, mein herziges kind). Abbt. 30

The stars of evening remind the good mother of her darling's eyes; and the driving clouds, of his raven curls. An affectionate and heartily good ballad.

Instrumental Music.

The Captain. For Violin and Piano. S. Winner. 30

Gondolied. " " " S. Winner. 30

Two favorite melodies, arranged in easy style for Piano and Violin, and will do just as well for Flute and Piano. "The Captain" is the earliest, and "Gondolied," (Gondola song) the richest in harmony.

Annie. Polka Redowa. Schultze. 30

Very melodious.

Books.

LIBRETTOS OF

Fra Diavolo. By Auber. 30

Bohemian Girl, (La Zingara). By Balfe. 30

La Cenerentola, (Cinderella). By Rossini. 30

La Dame Blanche. By Boieldieu. 30

These four librettos would be worth reading, were it only for the stories contained in them, which are very entertaining. But they become very valuable as "helps" to understand the "drift" of these popular operas, and, with the many choice melodies they contain, will constitute very acceptable additions to an operatic library.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 618.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, DEC. 10, 1864.

VOL. XXIV. No. 19.

Shakespeare in his relation to Music.

A Lecture delivered on the 23rd April, 1864. before the "Berliner Tonkünstler-Verein."

BY EMIL NAUMANN.

(Concluded from page 323.)

Let us consider his dramas a little more nearly, in their relation to this circumstance. It is but right that we should begin with the the Kings. In Richard II. we suddenly hear music in the midst of the most painfully minute monologue which the king, tired of life and bowed down by misfortune and his own errors, speaks in the solitude of his prison :

"Mute do I hear?
Ha, ha! keep time: how sweet music is,
When time is broke, and no proportion kept!
So is it in the muffle of men's lives.
And here have I the daintiness of ear,
To check time broke in a disorder'd string;
But, for the concord of my state and time,
Had not an ear to hear my true time broke."

And further on he says :

"This music made me, let it sound no more;
For though it have holpe madmen to their wits,
In me it seems it will make wise men mad.
Yet blessing on his heart that gives it me!
For 'tis a sign of love: and love to Richard
Is a strange brooch in this all-hating world!"

It would be superfluous to add a single word to the profundity, the wonderful similes, or the last touching observations here in relation to music. We would merely direct attention to the fact that scarcely ever, probably, were tones called upon to play so important a part as on this occasion, where they are made to interrupt one of the most philosophical monologues possible, and and give so new and deeply touching a turn to its course. Another wonderful place does Shakespeare assign to music in the Second Part of Henry IV. The dying king says to the princes and lords around him :—

"I pray you, take me up and bear me hence,
Into some other chamber; softly, pray,
(They convey the king into an inner part of the room, and place him upon a bed.)

Let there be no noise made, my gentle friends,
Unless some dull and favorable hand
Will whisper music to my weary spirit.

WARWICK—Call for the music in the other room.

KING HENRY—Set me the crown upon my pillow here."

What deep feeling is exhibited in the fact that the departing spirit of the ruler, who, all through his life, has been combating, full of disquiet, for his crown, should at last, in a strong contrast to the monarch's previous stormy career, desire nothing more than gentle tones to entice it, yearning for rest, over an invisible bridge, to the long sleep leading to a blissful waking, if not to eternal oblivion. With what a saucy play upon musical expressions, forming a strong contrast to the above, do we meet in Romeo and Juliet :—

"TYBALT.—Mercutio, thou consort'st with Romeo.
"MERCUTIO.—Consort! What, dost thou make us minstrels?
as thou make minstrels of us, look to hear nothing but discord; here's my fiddliestick; here's that shall make you dance. Zounds! Consort!"

And, when Mrs. Ford says of Falstaff's words :
"They do no more keep place together than the Hundredth Psalm to the tune of Green Sleeves," does it not seem as if Shakespeare was acquainted with modern Italian opera, and the want of connection between dramatic situation and musical expression, or the Mosaic-like work of certain other musical productions, in which the most contrary things are placed in closest juxtaposition?—
Hamlet's speech to Rosenkrantz and Guildenstern, like a hundred similar passages, exhibits Shakespeare as a proficient in musical manual skill, and other branches of the art. Be it observed that we quite leave out of consideration the high tone of genius manifested in the similes :—

"HAM. Will you play upon this pipe?" &c.

As it may be said that the whole of Shakespeare is filled and permeated with music, it would lead us too far were we to go into details.
I will limit myself to a few important specimens.

Falstaff says of the lean Justice of the Peace, Shallow : "The case of a treble hautboy were a mansion for him, a court." (Here we have a glimpse of Shakespeare's possessing a particular knowledge of separate instruments.) On another occasion, Falstaff says : "Sblood, I am as melancholy as a gib cat, or a lugged bear.—Prince
Hen. Or an old lion; or a lover's lute.—Fals.
Yea, or the drone of a Lincolnshire bagpipe."
—This is a proof that Shakespeare did not entertain less repugnance than any of us for the music played at fairs or ground upon organs, and of which I, at least feel such a horror. Song and music play a wonderfully spirited part in that scene of Twelfth Night where Sir Toby, Sir Andrew and the Clown, in their cups, horrify all ears. "Sir To. Shall we raise the night owl in a catch that will draw three souls out of one weaver? Shall we do that?—Sir And. An' you love me, let's do it; I am a dog at a catch"
And further on : "Malvolio. My masters, are you mad? or what are you? Have you no wit, manners nor honesty, but to gabble like tinkers at this time of night? Do ye make an ale house of my lady's house, that ye squeak out your coziest catches without any mitigation or remorse of voice! Is there no respect of place, persons, nor time in you?—Sir To. We did keep time sir, in our catches. Sneak up."—But Shakespeare has also assigned an elevated position to music in this same piece of Twelfth Night. Never, perhaps, has the close affinity of music with everything in the shape of love and amorous melancholy been more touchingly depicted than when the Duke says to his Musicians :

"If music be the food of love, play on;
Give me excess of it; that, surfeiting,
The appetite may sicken, and so die.—
That strain again; it had a dying fall;
O, it came o'er my ear like the sweet South,
That breathes upon a bank of violets,
Stealing and giving odour."

Or :

"Give me some music that piece of song,
That old and antique song we heard last night;
Methought it did relieve my passion much,
More than light airs and recollected terms
Of these most brisk and giddy-paced times."

Music plays an exceedingly important part in Cymbeline. The loutish Cloten says to the Musicians who are about to serenade the fair Imogen :
"Come on, tune; if you can penetrate her with your fingering, so; . . . First a very excellent concerted thing; after, a wonderful sweet air, with admirable rich words to it, and then let her consider." This is followed by the charming song :

"Hark! hark! the lark at Heaven's gate sings."

which Franz Schubert set to music. Cloten then continues : "So, get you gone; if this penetrate,
I will consider your music the better; if it do not,
it is a vice in her ears, which horse-hairs and catguts, nor the voice of unpaired eunuch to boot can never amend." Fidele's death is announced by solemn music from the cave of Belarius. Subsequently, the two royal youths propose to sing a requiem for the beautiful departed one.

"ARVIRAGUS—And let us, Polydore, though now our voices Have got the mannish crack, sing him to the ground."

GUILDENSTERN—I cannot sing; I'll weep and wail with thee :
For notes of sorrow, out of tune, are worse
Than priests and fates that lie."

The spirits that appear to Posthumus are, also, announced with "Solemn Music," and take part in a song.—In Lear, Cordelia has her father awakened—after she has found him again—with gentle sounds, because the Physician has so ordered, in order to

"Cure this great breach in his abused nature !

and to "wind up" "the untuned and jarring senses. In Othello, Desdemona breathes forth her anxious presentiments in the "Song of the Willow," which her mother's maid sang when her lover left her.

"An old thing 'twas, but it expressed her fortune,
And she died singing it: that song, to-night,
Will not go from my mind."

In Macbeth, the three scenes of the witches are accompanied with singing and dancing. The eight kings who pass in the vision before Macbeth, are made by Shakespeare to appear to the sound of "Hautboys." By this, he evidently wishes to imply that all he desires is the soft and spiritual sound of wooden wind instruments. It is, by the way, very remarkable how Shakespeare characterizes the various situations in his works by his simple directions as to the instruments. Thus, at the banquet given by Wolsey to the King and the beautiful Anna Boleyn, and at which joking love and tenderness play so important a part, there is again a stage direction for the employment of "hautboys." For grand actions of state, on the contrary, for processions and so forth, as well as for the solemn entries of generals and kings, we regularly have "trumpets," or a "flourish." In Hamlet, Polonius says to Reynaldo, whom he sends to his son,

"And let him ply his music."

Tune lightens up the touching madness of Opelia, and it is scarcely possible to conceive anything more touching than the description of her death in the stream :

"Her clothes spread wide;
And, mermaid-like, awhile they bore her up;
Which time she charmed snatches of old tunes;
As one incapable of her own distress,
Or like a creature native and indued
Unto that element; but long it could not be,
Till that her garments, heavy with their drink,
Pulled the poor wretch from her melodious lay
To muddy death."

The manner too is significant in which music is mentioned in the Taming of the Shrew :—

"HORTENSIO—But, wrangling pedant, this is
The patroness of heavenly harmony :
Then give me leave to have prerogative;
And when in music we have spent an hour,
Your lecture shall have leisure for as much."

"LUCEPIO—Preposterous as! that never read so far
To know the cause why music was ordained!
Was it not to refresh the mind of man,
After his studies or his usual pain?
Then give me leave to read philosophy,
And, while I pause, serve in your harmony."

In Much ado about Nothing, Benedick says, while Balthazar is playing, "Now, Divine air! how is his soul ravished! Is it not strange that sheep's guts should hale souls out of men's bodies? Well, a horn for any money, when all's done." And when the fool has sung, and been overwhelmed with praise by the others, Benedick suddenly ex-claims, as we ourselves should sometimes like to do in the society of amateurs : "An he had been a dog that should have howled thus, they would have hanged him!"—In his As You Like It, where song succeeds song, the eccentric Jacques says to Amiens, when the latter has finished singing : "More, more, I pry thee more.—Ami. it will make you melancholy, Monsieur Jacques.
—Jacq. I thank it. More, I pry thee more.
I can suck melancholy out of a song, as a weasel sucks eggs. More, I pry thee, more." On another occasion, this same Jacques observes : "I have neither the scholastic melancholy, which is emulation, nor the musician's, which is fantastical."
The singing Page in the same piece says :
"Shall we clap into it roundly, without hawking, or spitting, or saying we are hoarse; which are the only prologues to a bad voice?—We will allude merely in the most cursory manner to A Midsummer Night's Dream, and its fairy dances, which Mendelssohn so re-poetized, in a manner as gentle as it was cleverly musical; to the Winter's Tale, and the songs of the rogue, Autolycus, the Shepherd's dances, and the awakening into life, accompanied with music, of the wonderful statue of Hermione; as well as to the varied effects of music, in The Tempest, of which effects Shakespeare himself makes the most appropriate remark that can be made, when Caliban exclaims:—

"The isle is full of noises,
Sounds, and sweet airs, that give delight and hurt not.
Sometimes a thousand twangling instruments
Will hum about mine ears, and sometimes voices,
That if I then had waked after a long sleep,
Would make me sleep again."

Lastly, I cannot suppress something Shakespeare says about us musicians, though it is not over-flattering, for it proves at any rate that the great poet knew people like us. In the First Part of Henry IV. Hotspur, wishing to excuse the fickle and changeable Glendower, says to his wife:

"And 'tis no marvel he's so humorous, By'r Lady, he's a good musician."

To which Lady Percy replies: "Then should you be nothing but musical, for you are altogether governed by humors."

But this must suffice. We should fill a book if we continued as we have begun. So much, I am bold enough to hope, has already become clear to you all, namely, that as regards the innermost tones of the heart, a profound intelligence and appreciation of the effects and of the significance of music, or finally, most undoubted musical knowledge, and the practical attainments belonging to it, no other poet is to be compared with Shakespeare. This is the most important, because in Shakespeare's time, music was in a very backward state everywhere, especially in England, and was limited to spheres very foreign to the great mass of the public, or existed only in national songs. To this must be added that the English are one of the most unmusical, and most musically-unproductive nations in the world.

The most striking musical personage among Shakespeare's contemporary countrymen was William Bird (1546-1628), Court Composer and organist to Queen Elizabeth of England. He wrote a number of masses, graduales, madrigals, very learned contrapuntally for that period, but not suited for our present taste. I do not think that such music, stiff and ossified into a system, could have inspired Shakespeare, supposing he took any notice of it, with a high idea of music as an art. A greater influence appears to have been exerted upon him by a certain virtuosity then pretty general in England, as is proved by the third of his Sonnets, in which he mentions very favorably the lute-player Dowland, 1562-1616. Among the musicians, besides Dowland, of that time, with whom we are acquainted were: a John Jenkins, from the county of Kent, 1592-1678, a virtuoso on the bass-viol and violoncello, and a John Bull, 1563-1622, probably organist at Oxford. Compositions undoubtedly genuine, shown me in England, and written for songs in his pieces, by contemporaries of Shakespeare, who are still nearly altogether unknown, furnished additional evidence how small were the pretensions of English music in the sixteenth century.

It was only by the magic power of poetic divination, therefore, that Shakespeare could penetrate so far as to the very core of an art of which only the beginnings were known to him. But the wonderful element in poetic divination consists precisely in the fact that such divination requires only the slightest impulse or hold to go to the very root of a thing. While on this part of the subject, I must not forget to state that in the old English national song, which like national songs generally, is the real expression of the inward life of a nation, Shakespeare found such a hold. Several of the passages already quoted by me suggest this, for in them Shakespeare condemns artificial and pretentious music, praising, on the other hand, those old and simple melodies which find their way direct to the heart.

I will now with your permission, conclude by quoting a few passages from The Merchant of Venice, the most musical, probably of all Shakespeare's dramas.

Bassanio has to choose from three caskets, one only of which contains his mistress's portrait and ensures the possession of her hand. Portia, whose fate is trembling in the balance, and who would fain direct in his selection the man she loves, says:

"Let music sound, while he doth make his choice;
Then, if he lose, he makes a swan-like end
Fading in music: that the comparison
May stand more proper, my eye shall be the stream,
And wat'ry death-bed for him: he may win;
And what is music then? then music is Even as the flourish when true subjects bow
To a new-crown'd monarch: such it is.
As are those dulcet sounds in break of day
That creep into the dreaming bridegroom's ear,
And summon him to marriage."

The last scenes of this wondrous play contain much more music, derived from the situation, and from what is said of the effects of the art, than from its absolute introduction, according to the stage directions, in various portions of the dialogue. We must read these scenes in connection with each other, if we would obtain an adequate idea of them, and of Shakespeare's profoundly musical spirit. We can here only refer to them:

"LORENZO—How sweet the moonlight sleeps upon this bank!

Here will we sit, and let the sounds of music
Creep in our ears: soft stillness and the night
Become the touches of sweet harmony.
Sit, Jessica: Look, how the floor of Heaven
Is thick inlaid with patines of bright gold;
There's not the smallest orb which thou behold'st
But in his motion like an angel sings,
Still quivering to the yung-eyed cherubins:
Such harmony is in immortal souls;
But, while this muddy vesture of decay
Doth grossly close it in, we cannot hear it."

"JESSICA—I am never merry, when I hear sweet music.

LORENZO—The reason is, your spirits are attentive:
For do but note a wild and wanton herd,
Or race of youthful and unhandled colts,
Fretting mad bounds, bellowing and neighing loud,
Which is the hot condition of their blood;
If they but hear perchance a trumpet sound,
Or any air of music touch their ears,
You shall perceive them make a mutual stand,
Their savage eyes turned to a modest gaze,
By the sweet power of music: therefore, the poet
Did feign that Orpheus drew trees, stones, and floods;
Since nought so stockish, hard, and full of rage,
But music for the time doth change his nature."

Both Portia and Nerissa appear in the same moonlight scene:

"PORTIA—Music! hark!
NERISSA—It is your music, Madam of the house.
PORTIA—Nothing is good, I see, without respect;
Methinks it sounds much sweeter than by day.
NERISSA—Silence bestows that virtue on it, Madam.
PORTIA—The crow doth sing as sweetly as the lark,
When neither is attended; and, I think,
The nightingale, if she should sing by day,
When every goose is cackling, would be thought
No better a musician than the wren.
How many things by season reason'd are
To their right praise and true perfection!"

We take our farewell of the poet in the celebrated words—the most magnificent, perhaps, ever yet uttered concerning music—with which Lorenzo concludes his eulogy on our art:

"The man that hath no music in himself,
Nor is not mov'd with concord of sweet sounds,
Is fit for treasons, stratagems and spoils;
The motions of his spirit are dull as night,
And his affections dark as Erebus;
Let no such man be trusted!"

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Beethoven's "Sonata Pathétique,"

AS A PIECE FOR PUPILS.

[Concluded from page 347.]

The first movement of our Sonata, in addition to these three divisions, contains an introduction, parts of which in the course of the movement, and immediately before its close, re-appear. This introduction fitly announces the spirit and tendency of the whole work. What can be more pathetic, more earnest, more solemn, than the motive contained in the very first measure? This motive, having thus with becoming power made its appearance four times in succession, each time with increased emphasis, assumes a more melodious, but decidedly plaintive character; and, though twice admonished by a very energetic, very powerful protest from the lower regions (at the end of the 5th and 6th measures), goes wandering about, more and more plaintive, timid and irresolute, till finally it vents itself in a wail down the chromatic scale, and remains suspended on the minor ninth, from which it leads over to the movement proper, slightly touching in its passage the natural third. Take care, pianists, not to perform this introduction in too fast a tempo; a mistake too frequently made. The time is indicated by Grave; hence, very slow, grave, heavy. But in the stormy Allegro di molto e con brio, now following, you may let the reins loose and dash along as fast as your fingers will bear you; of course with continual regard to distinctness, especially with the entrance of the second main subject, (41st measure, 4th page, Ditson's edition). This subject is one of Beethoven's most original thoughts; from its marked, eloquent rhythm it contrasts admirably with the hasty, restless character of the first main subject. It makes its entrance in E flat minor, and descends a few measures later to D flat major. It reminds one of a conversation or dispute between two persons, male and female, which dispute is gloriously ended in the beautiful cadence preceding the rapid chord passage beginning in the 16th measure on the 5th page. On this quick passage follows a running figure of much sweetness and gracefulness (20th measure before the close of the first part), consisting of only four measures, appearing twice in succession, the second time somewhat reinforced. The bass underlying this passage is simple, the modulation not uncommon; yet, both appear new and fresh. Let the lowest bass note fill out the whole measure every time, as it gently falls a third, and have a slight accentuation,—a distinction to which it is well entitled on account of its, so to speak, melodic aspiration. After this, the restless, passionate first main subject breaks forth again, till it stops with full force on a fermata over the chord of the dominant-seventh; and thus ends the first part. But there is no actual close, for the tendency of this chord is to lead us back to the beginning of the Allegro to witness the same spectacle once more.

The second time, the closing dominant-seventh chord rests on D, instead of G, and leads over to the second part, which begins with four of those slow, majestic measures that opened the introduction. Here, however, they appear in G minor; at the close of the third measure, an enharmonic transition takes place, so as to prepare the key of E minor, in which the quick, stormy first subject makes its appearance again to begin the struggle anew. But its basty onset is several times softened by reminiscences of the pathetic introduction (for instance, 4th and 5th measures of the Allegro resumed). Of a peculiar effect is the deep, murmuring passage beginning with the 31st measure; again with the 1st measure of the 7th page. It is followed both times by the inevitable first subject, which, with a desperate effort, runs up to the highest pitch, whence the second time it cannot get loose, all the while screaming, trilling. The whole rests on a pedal bass or, as it is called in German, organ-point. It comes abruptly to an end with a sharp, shrill crash (13th measure, 7th page), from out of which leaps a solitary figure, running about all alone, wailing and whining, lower and lower, apparently afraid of being thus left to fight its way through, till finally it takes refuge in the bass, on the great C, and contentedly murmurs along, with the ever-ready first main-subject above it, as in the beginning. At the same time the third part of the movement has commenced (21st measure, 7th page). This part, as is the custom, in the main is like the first; still, its tints, so to speak, are much darker. Here, all is minor, illumined by hardly one solitary ray of major. The eloquent second main theme appears in F minor (1st measure, 8th page) and then turns to C minor (13th measure, 8th page). It has lost some of its former energy; its expression is more plaintive than before. All that follows has the same melancholy character. Shortly before the close, in the midst of the tumult just renewed, those slow, grave measures from the introduction appear for the third time, as if to allay the storm. But the restless, turbulent spirit of the movement is not yet curbed; it must needs vent itself once more, if only for a short while. A few violent crashes, and its rapid course is finished. The closing chord is precisely the same, even in the same position, as in the beginning of the introduction. The whole movement is a master-piece of musical poetry. We find in it the greatest variety combined with the closest unity. All its details wonderfully contribute to give it that peculiar expression, which, after all, is better felt than described.

The second or middle movement, Adagio cantabile, in A flat major, may be called a sacred song without words. Its entrance, after the fiery Allegro, is most gratifying. It occupies four pages, and yet, when analyzed, shows the simplest structure imaginable; and also shows how little material is required in the hands of a master to work up a piece of considerable length. A plain melody of eight measures, breathing peace and consolation, fills up the greater part of the movement. After appearing twice in succession, first in the lower, then in the higher octave, it makes room for a second strain of a more passionate character (17th measure), which begins in F minor and closes in E-flat major (23d measure). This is followed by a few melodic fragments of a most characteristic expression, very low, like the heavings of a mind oppressed. In their downward tendency they soon reach the same old calm, consoling melody, which now appears for the third time. The field is then given up to the rule of a plaintive and somewhat restless motive in A flat minor (14th measure, 11th page), responded to by a still livelier figure in the bass. The two go on with their interesting dialogue, when all at once the treble, as if to show its superiority over the talkative bass, escapes high up into the (seemingly) distant key of E major (1st measure, 12th page), leaving its companion far beneath it in the dark, and shouting out its heroic strain in a clear, penetrating voice. But this was only sport; it soon descends and joins the bass again. They continue their former theme (4th measure, 12th page), which gains more interest from being in the new, fresh key just mentioned. The bass, however, does not seem to feel quite at ease here, for it suddenly begins to scold, as it were, in a low, unmelodious staccato passage, based on that everywhere-at-home diminished-seventh chord (7th measure, 12th page), while the treble looks on, or rather, listens, apparently amazed at the strange demeanor of its grave companion; and, unable to move, it remains transfixed on the same note, till, at length, it ventures to descend half a step lower, when it is relieved by the timely re-appearance of the principal melody. The latter appears here in all its glory, with an accompaniment fuller and richer than before; the bass comes in once more with the above staccato passage (5th measure, 13th page), but in a more amiable manner. We have the principal melody now for the fourth and fifth time; yet, to whom did it ever appear monotonous? A short coda finishes the movement, which ends in the same quiet mood, in the same low, subdued tones as it commenced.

Beethoven's novel and superior treatment of the piano-forte, it is often said, in comparison with Haydn, Mozart and others of his predecessors and contemporaries, is partly manifest in his frequently using the bass, or rather tenor, for melodies and melodic figures. But this is quite natural, if we remember how much deeper, fuller, more expressive his strains are, for which the lower and middle regions of the instrument, being the most sonorous and sympathetic, are just the right medium. We have in our Adagio cantabile an example. Compare the two different positions of the leading melody as it appears in the beginning, first in the lower, next in the higher octave, and judge, which suits its character best. Again, those very expressive melodic fragments, beginning in the middle of the 23d measure, mentioned before:—play them an octave higher, and observe how the expression is gone.

Before taking leave of this movement, let us briefly notice its structure, which, as intimated, is very simple. Divided in the usual manner of a first, second (or middle), and third part, the three divisions are plainly visible: namely, the 1st closes with the third eighth, or quaver, of the 13th measure on the 11th page: the 2nd, with the end of the 9th measure (connecting with the third part) on the 12th page; the 3d runs to the end. The first is taken up by the principal subject, including the short melody and bits of a melody following it; the second by the motive in A flat minor, as indicated above; the third again by the principal melody, including the coda. The first moves (mainly) in A-flat major, the second in A-flat minor, the third again in A-flat major.

The stormy character of the first movement, relieved for a while by the timely appearance of the tranquillizing Adagio, resumes control, though somewhat softened, in the third and closing movement, called Rondo. This movement forms a picture of the most varied contrasts; of the soft and the powerful, the tender and the angry, the petulant and the grave; in short, it reflects almost all moods and passions which the language of tones is able to express. But however great the variety, there is one spirit pervading, or rather ruling throughout—like the first and second movements, and, accordingly the entire work—which tempers all and renders it a perfect whole. The movement is also technically a welcome task for pianists; there is much opportunity for the accomplished performer to show his powers of execution, and as much opportunity for the unfinished player to improve. As we have seen, it is a Rondo; the chief part of it, therefore, is a fully developed, lively melody, which continually reappears, (so to speak, makes its rond, according to the length of the piece more or less frequently,—hence rondo), and to which all the rest is subordinate; for, with whatever importance this or that phrase besides may make its appearance, its end will always be to hasten to meet and make room for this leading melody. In the present case this melody is as broad and fully developed as is possible; so that one at once becomes aware there can be no increase to it at its re-appearance afterwards. It is a perfect whole in itself, with as perfect a close as might do for the end of a piece. Observe how it labors to impress upon us the fact that it belongs to the key of C minor, how it lingers, how it revels, as it were, in the atmosphere of this key! No wonder, then, that it closes in it and thus leaves the impression as if nothing were to follow (17th measure). But a heavy crash with the full chord of the dominant-seventh, made all the more piquant by the seventh's being in the bass, leading to F minor, announces that something new is to follow. But, this is not the right ground yet; therefore, another crash, and we are led to E-flat major, the lovely companion to C minor.

The sweet melody following comes to a semi-close (1st measure, 15th page), when it changes to a figure in triplets, of a restless, hasty character, which now assumes away, till, having climbed up to the high F (4th measure from below, 15th page), it pauses a moment, dashes down the scale with precipitate haste, and stops on the third of the dominant-seventh chord. The melody, with the figure annexed to it, just described, reappears afterwards in C major (6th measure, 18th page), filling up, next to the leading subject, the greatest part of the movement, and thereby assuming so much importance as to be entitled to be called the second leading, or second main subject. But first we have to notice the new entrance of the spirited principal melody, which again, as in the beginning, closes with repeated emphasis (17th measure, 16th page). Now follows a remarkable phrase in the shape of a choral-like strain, in A-flat major, of only four measures, which undergo numerous inversions, always retaining their solemn expression.

The first sixteen measures decidedly remind one of a piece of sacred music, while the cassa or close in the dominant, at the end of every fourth measure, suggests vigor, brevity and distinctness.

A short motive, three times imitated, interrupts this melodic web—the last bass-note of the seventh measure (counted back from the end of the 16th page) being at the same time the first note of this motive;—after which the former choral-like strain appears above in the treble, accompanied only by a staccato passage for the left hand (2nd measure from end of 16th page); the order is next inverted, the bass assuming the melody, while the treble undertakes the accompanying staccato passage (3d measure, 17th page).

The whole of this part is a most interesting episode, showing how a few measures of melody can be made to appear continually new, by the simplest means. It forms an excellent example in the art of counterpoint, the skill required to construct it being hidden in the simplicity, as well as soul and expression, of the phrase.

The latter must leave the field now, since the chief of the subjects announces its re-appearance from the distance. A powerful Crescendo, resting on a kind of pedal-bass, and beginning in the depth with an abruptly broken off chord—passage for the right hand, responded to by the left (7th measure, 17th page) fitly heralds the advent of the ruling melody. There is a slight change this time, in as much as the second half of the melody is given to the bass. It does not close so emphatically as formerly, but by a short passage in the treble it connects by means of a semi-close with the second main subject (6th measure, 18th page) now in C major, as noticed before. This, as usual, ends again by preparing the entrance of the chief melody, which appears here for the fourth time, first simple, then varied in its last part (the variation beginning with the 8th measure, 19th page). That lively figure in triplets, so conspicuous in the train of the second main subject, now appears once more, skipping about here and there, rising finally, as it did twice before, up to the highest F, where it dwells for a moment, while the bass makes a modulation to prepare the key of A-flat major. So our skipping motive has to hasten down the scale of this key with the greatest speed possible, and, as if to show its deference to the modulatory power of the bass, remains suspended below, just on that note, which best characterizes the key of A flat (10th measure before the close). A slight allusion to the leading melody in this new key, first in the bass, then in the treble, another rapid passage down the scale of C minor, and the piece is finished.

For overlooking it better, we may divide this movement also into three equal parts and a coda; each part as well as the coda being commenced by the leading melody. The first part extends from the beginning to the first fermata; the second to the second fermata; the third to the last measure on the 18th page, after which the coda begins. Modulation:—first part, in C minor and E-flat major; second, in C minor and A-flat major; third, in C minor and C major; coda in C minor.

The "Sonata Pathétique" has for fifty years been a favorite with the educated musical world, and will probably continue so for some fifty years more. Its characteristic, striking motives and melodies have induced more than one distinguished musician to attempt arrangements of the work for Orchestra. One of these—by Schindeldeisser, if I mistake not, the composer of the Overture to Uriel Acosta—has been performed with great success in some of the leading European cities.

A pupil, who has studied this Sonata properly, it is to be hoped, will not stop here, but desire to rise higher, so as to be enabled to master op. 27, No. 2, in C-sharp-minor, popularly called the "Moonlight Sonata;" that beautiful tone-poem, op. 81, in E-flat-major, called "Les adieux;" the great Sonatas, op.

53, in C major, and op. 57, in F minor, called Sonata appassionata, or, popularly "The Tempest"—the favorite with musicians and perhaps the non plus ultra; and so downwards to op. 2, No. 1, upward to op. 106, where both teacher and pupil may have to invoke the aid of Apollo himself to solve the problem for them.

A. Kk.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Criticism of New Musical Works.

BY TIMOTHY TRILL.*

Some of the English Journals are very lavish of their praises of Mr. Costa's new Oratorio "Naaman." We ask if it is "new?" Perhaps the question itself suggests other inquiries as to what constitutes newness in these, "the latter days" of Art, if not of the world.

Here is a composer who never makes any noise in the world as such until at a mature age, and then, almost his first effort is that kind of composition in which the genius of Mendelssohn culminated. Who but Costa could do such a thing with impunity? Who could string together such a quantity of rehearsed Italian, Anglican, Gallic and Teutonic platitudes as "Eli" consists of, but Costa, the autocrat of operatic conductors, the pet of the cocknies, the wiry, slippery, suave musical eel of the past thirty years in London, and not be cut to pieces by the Chorleys, Glovers, and Davisons of that immaculate city?

The way in which this last-named newspaper Boanerges tries to keep from telling the truth, is funny in the extreme; and, with all his care, his wayward but honest pen now and then slips into something which can almost be believed. Be it remembered that M. Costa has had all kinds of modern—and a good deal of ancient—music pounded into his ears for the greater portion of his life. Add to this the fact that he started as conductor and not as composer, and I ask how it is possible for him to own a single new idea? I shall not say that he does not, but would hazard the opinion that any portion of his music, taken for new, owes its fair reputation as such to the very lucky ignorance of the listener.

Mendelssohn found it of the utmost importance to keep out of the hearing of other people's music, in order to retain his own originality unalloyed as much as possible; and where shall we find more perfect individuality than in him, or Bach? Bach did not even travel much, but kept himself closely locked up from the musical world most of his life. Sterndale Bennett was a sort of poodle dog to Mendelssohn for years, and, being of a delicate and absorbent organization intellectually, what was the consequence? Excepting for the dimness of his inspirations, Bennett's works, in every form, might be taken for Mendelssohn's, diluted.

Now let us figure to ourselves Costa, the elegant, the fashionable, the intriguing impresario, soaked in operas for thirty years, and then turning out an "original" oratorio! Why, to begin with, the book of Naaman infringes on the patent of "Elijah;" and the whole work might much better have been called "Elisha," since the turning-point of the story depends upon this prophet's wondrous miracle. By calling it "Naaman," certain unpleasant and by no means fragrant ideas are awakened, which surely would have presented themselves in no very favorable light to any but a sham artist. I certainly think that one is hard put to it for a subject for an Oratorio, when it must bring into the foreground a loathsome leper, and contain a song called "Come and on thy bosom press me;" which affectionate appeal is enough to show the sad lack of good taste observable in the authors. True, we sometimes see portraits of toads and of great fat swine in picture-galleries; but I ask any refined and candid reader, if such subjects can possibly be selected by the proper personators of poetic and artistic ideals?

* And for which the said Timothy is alone responsible.—Ed.

Behold how great the retrogression of England's boasted choral societies, when they who first produced the "Elijah," and who have feasted on Handel, Haydn and Spohr for so long a time, with their high and sublime texts, can now sing the trash of Covent Garden's musical pet, set to such delicate morsels of Scripture as the above! We shall expect soon to have a grand Sacred Opera called "Potiphar's wife," or "Bathsheba," perhaps from Sig. Verdi's spotless Traviata pen! And why not? cry some. "Have not these subjects claimed the pen and brush of other kinds of artists, and is not Art, Art?" Eh bien! I must then retire from such a verbal contest, when they are my opponents who dissent from Montesquieu in his beautiful tribute to the purity of Music, above all other arts. But I wander, and must quote a little from Mr. Davison.

He commences by saying that: "A work of such dimensions as Naaman must be heard several times before a decided opinion * * * can be fairly pronounced." The Oratorio has been produced but once, yet the gentleman coolly proceeds to deliver himself of a very long and exceedingly "decided opinion." He goes on to compare Naaman with the "Elijah" in the usual modern English fashion, which is to ignore the possibility of any higher criterion than Mendelssohn; hence the charming sameness of style, from Bennett down to Costa (for I must say "down" indeed), which exists in most of the new works "allowed" a hearing in London by the critics of that city for the past seventeen years. In this comparison, however, we are told that the composer of the "Elijah" "almost wholly discarded the strict scholastic forms." Strange news indeed, to the students of Mendelssohn, that composer of all the moderns who most conscientiously clung to form the most "scholastic" even in his merest bagatelles! He says further:

"In St. Paul, Mendelssohn, though glowing with creative power, looked back to Handel and to Bach—witness his fugues and his chorales; while in Elijah he got rid of Handel altogether, though still adhering to the chorales so cherished by the Leipzig cantor. The employment of florid counterpoint as accompaniment during the procession of strict fugue, as it appears in Mendelssohn's works, may be claimed as Mendelssohn's own invention.

Surely another astounding assertion to the student of Mendelssohn's predecessors! What does Mr. Davison call Handel's Hallelujah Chorus, in certain parts, I should like to know; or especially, that splendid master-piece of Chorale, strict fugue, and florid counterpoint combined, in his Judas Macabæus: "We never will bow down." The memory of this renowned feuilletonist has grown rusty, I fear. But here follows a little more conglomerate. My reader will remember that he first credits Mendelssohn with originating what I have shown Handel did before him.

Our critic continues: "Both in Naaman and in Eli we find endeavors at the Handelian fugue," (rather an equivocal sort of compliment to Costa!) yet, "on the other hand, he neither imitates Mendelssohn nor any other master!" My dear, good-natured reader, is not a man who writes such contradictory stuff a phenomenon? Costa makes "endeavors at Handelian fugue," yet he "imitates neither Mendelssohn nor any other master!"

Our critic now jumps suddenly into a comparison of Cherubini and Rossini, as to their profundity in fugue, in which comparison the latter is the sufferer of course, merely because he had not the stupidity to fill his operas with fugues. He says of him, that he was not "a practiced master of the severe canons of art." Gracious! Mr. D., I presume, was not one of the select few invited to hear the private performance of Rossini's late Mass, in which (on the authority of either Scudo or Fiorentino) there were some of the purest possible specimens of fugal writing. It surprises one to find so veteran a critic making such mis-statements, and all unnecessary to the exaltation of his pet Costa!

Then follows a pedantic episode about Cherubin and Mozart resembling each other in the former's Mass in F:—an idea so absurd as to provoke a suspicion of the sobriety of the writer!

After the above, Mr. D. proceeds to talk about his (Mr. Costa's) "individuality!" * * * "There is not a weak or uncertain point, not an inharmonious combination, not a single doubtful or awkward passage to be detected from beginning to end of Naaman. Everywhere the practical musician, conscious of his power, and using it with sobriety, is apparent."

Bless us! how charmingly dull and soporific it must be! Just as if this same praise could not be awarded to a piece of calico! Yet this consistent writer goes on to remark: "An occasional tendency to superfluous use of trombones Mr. Costa shares with the rest of his contemporaries." He then, en passant, administers a paternal rebuke for the same "tendency" to Rossini, Auber, Verdi and Meyerbeer. Truly they should combine in returning thanks! After this parenthetical digression, our critic makes another inconsistent remark about Costa being, "like Mercadante, addicted to an excessive employment of prelude and interlude, which is calculated to arrest the dramatic progress, and thereby enfeeble the interest of the hearer." Astonishing, that such fault can be found with a work which just now was not marred "by a single doubtful or awkward passage," and in which it was apparent that the composer used his "conscious power with sobriety!"

I might fill a few more columns with such quotations; but sufficient has been done of it to show what nonsense even the highest critical oracles may and often do write about new music. I must be worse than a fool to presume to criticize a work before I have heard it; but even after a hearing, how sadly devoid of good taste must he be who launches out into such senseless rhapsodies as those above quoted!

Nor are we without some such literary stars on this side of the water. At a late concert, in New York, of orchestral and vocal compositions, an opportunity was given for various idea-less and unlearned pens to distinguish themselves.

The presumption and self-confidence of these critics has always been a subject for surprise. Despite the incontrovertible facts, that Don Giovanni was a failure for three representations; that very few if any of Beethoven's masterpieces were admired on the first hearing; that so great a master as Beethoven, with all his powers of discernment, seemed rather to underrate, if not wholly to despise, the creations of Von Weber; and that the Fiddio has been nearly twenty years in becoming what one of Verdi's is generally in as many days, namely a paying opera; these brave judges tell the public, at once, all about the proper status of new works, no matter how elaborate or intricate they may be. While there are such critics, and while they are allowed to scribble for newspapers, which in other departments are considered respectable, there can be formed no too extravagant notion of that sublime nonsense to which they give expression.

Thus, regarding the concert in question:—It was said, in one quarter, that a certain duet was "the essence of mental feebleness," when in the finale two melodies were worked up together, the one forming a triple counterpoint to the other! Musicians will know whether or not this is a harmonic problem to be solved by the exercise of "mental feebleness" alone, although it may have been bad enough otherwise!

Another critic, speaking of instrumentation, remarked, that by using certain kinds of tonal color, certain dissonances were "left unresolved," thus mixing up the two questions of color and construction, pretty much as if I should say that because a painter only used crayons instead of oil-colors, therefore his portraits always had pug noses!

The richest "attempt at failure" in criticism, called forth by this concert, was that of the gentleman who objected to what he called "staccato clarinet passages" in a certain orchestral work, which passages did not happen to exist at all!

One also remarked that it was injudicious to have pianos at an orchestral concert, because they "lost by comparison with the orchestra."

Thus it is that Music entraps all would-be critics in her wily meshes. Music, the ever subtle, intangible, deceptive charmer! In no art is deception more easy; in none is it less likely to be detected. The ear is believed to be the least generally educated of all organs of sense; and yet these critical dignitaries persist in ignoring these facts, to the disgust of some, the wonderment of others, and the infinite amusement of the criticized. If these last can only command enough good nature to keep their tempers, and view such common monstrosities from a ludicrous standpoint alone, they have an excellent opportunity of practicing equanimity under difficulties, and of showing the advantage of artistic philosophy by future efforts, such as must eventually convince even the sceptical critics that they are in earnest.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, NOV. 28.—The interest of the opera-loving portion of our community now centres on the long-expected "Don Sebastian," which has at last been produced in the most magnificent and gorgeous style, with a liberality quite unusual in opera managers, but a most pleasing and meritorious characteristic of Max Maretzek. To assume the sure success of a new and unknown opera, or even of one that has met with great success abroad, and to prepare for its production, with costly scenery and dresses, at a large outlay of means, requires the nerve of such a man as Max Maretzek, and it is to be hoped that his judgment in the present instance may receive such hearty approval and support, that his treasury may not be empty, and that the substantial appreciation of such labor and pains may lead him again into the field of novelties, to bring back to us such as may be both for his and our enjoyment and improvement.

"Don Sebastian" was presented for the first time on Friday evening last, after devoting the whole of Thanksgiving day to a full rehearsal. The Academy was thronged, and "standing room only" was early seen on the walls of the lobby. Seats for this and tomorrow evening had also been secured to nearly the full capacity of the house. The time for commencing was made half an hour earlier, on account of the length of the performance, and it was eleven and a half o'clock before the curtain fell upon the closing scene.

To attempt a detailed account of the music of the opera, would be very unsatisfactory, and occupy too much space. To be appreciated it must be heard and studied. As yet, no definite criticism of the press has been published, although many columns have been devoted to the matter, headed with "Don Sebastian" and "Donizetti," and "Maretzek," in the linked hand style. In description, the press has been more than usually generous, and has given the opera a large amount of valuable space. "Don Sebastian" is one of the latest and best works of Donizetti, although it is nearly a score of years since it was written. The libretto is by Scribe, and is founded upon the incidents in the life of the unfortunate King of Portugal, the grandson of Charles the Fifth.

A glance at the argument will suffice to show how admirably adapted it is to the requirements of the composer. As a spectacular work, it abounds in scenic display and picturesque tableaux. Don Sebastian, the King, (Sig. MASSIMILIANI), is about starting on his expedition against the Mahomedans to "carry war into Africa," and upon his leaving the shore in a gaily decorated barge, listens to the prophetic utterances of the poet Camoens, (Signor BAL-LENT), who, while portraying the scenes in the expedition, also solicits the pardon of Zaida, an African maiden captured in Tunis, (CAROZZI-ZUCCHI). The departure of the ship is a scene of lively interest, aided as it is by the salute of real cannon (!) and the martial strains of a brass band. The King is defeated and wounded, and Enrico, his Lieutenant, represents himself to Abaidlo, an Arab chief, as the king, and is deprived of his sword and slain. Sebastian escapes with his life, and returns to Portugal, to find another king raised to the throne, and a funeral procession moving along with coffin, horse and greyhound, and the royal banner draped in mourning, for his own reported death. This cortège is one of the finest scenes in the opera. It is moonlight, and the immense throng of people on the stage, some three hundred, in the costume of knights, ladies of the court, soldiers, priests, and mourners, bearing torches and banners, all robed in black, moving to the solemn measure of a band, together with the gorgeous catafalque, combine to make this act truly impressive. Its interest is so great as to prevent at first an impartial criticism of the music of the act.

The King proclaims himself to his people, but at the instigation of Giovanni di Silva, the Grand Inquisitor, he is arrested as an impostor, and brought before the Inquisition, when he is tried and immured in a tower, and, together with Zaida, who has endeavored to influence the Inquisitor in his behalf, condemned to death. In this unpleasant predicament, Camoens endeavors to release them from prison, in which he partially succeeds; but, as they are about descending from the tower windows, the guards fire upon them, and they fall into the sea.

The departure from Lisbon, the battle-field of Selim Kebir, and the Tower, are the finest pieces of scenery that have ever been placed on the Academy stage.

The music of the opera cannot be fairly reviewed upon only one hearing, but it has much in it that will be sung and played at every concert and by every band. [A very left-handed compliment!—ED.] The novelty of the scenery attracts and charms the eye, to the great disadvantage of the ear, and it must be heard more than once.

The antiquated, old foggy New York Philharmonic Society, long since distanced by the Brooklyn society in the matter of novelty, variety and general excellence, will soon have another formidable, and I trust, successful rival in a series of "Symphonie Soirées," under the vigorous management and leadership of THEO. THOMAS, whose efforts in the cause of classical music have been so widely appreciated. The programme I annex its merit cannot fail to secure a very substantial support. The subscriptions already paid in; ensure its financial success, and there can be no doubt as to its being a most profitable and enjoyable enterprise. The first soirée will take place on the 3d of December at Irving Hall, when Beethoven's Symphony in F major, op. 93, Lachner's "Suite" in D minor, and the second part of Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" will be performed, together with vocal and violin solos.

At the second concert, Bach's Toccata (F) will be produced as scored for the orchestra by Esser of Vienna.

At the third concert a symphony "An das Vaterland," by Joachim Raff, the one which received the prize at the competition of composers in Vienna, will be performed, together with the Overture, "Abenceragen," by Cherubini, and Spohr's "Jessonda."

The fourth and fifth concert, as will be seen by the programme, will be of great interest, including Schumann's "Bride of Messina." The orchestra will consist of sixty of the best musicians in the city, and a number of vocal and instrumental soloists have been engaged. The following is the programme of the series.

1. Symphonie-Soirée—3d December.
1. Symphony (F major, op. 93, No. 8)..... Beethoven.
2. Song.....
3. Solo, Violin.....

4. Suite (D minor, op. 113)..... Fr. Lachner.
5. Song.....
6. Second Part from the Dramatic Symphony "Romeo and Juliet," op. 17..... Berlioz.
2. Symphonie-Soirée—7th January.
1. Symphony (C major, op. 61, No. 2)..... Schumann.
2. Song.....
3. Concerto for Piano (E flat, op. 73)..... Beethoven.
4. Toccata, (F)..... J. S. Bach.
5. Song.....
6. Solo, Piano.....
7. Overture, "Euryanthe,"..... Weber.
8. Symphonie-Soirée—18th February.
1. Overture (Abenceragen)..... Cherubini.
2. Song.....
3. Symphony, "An das Vaterland,"..... Joachim Raff.
4. Concerto Concertante for Piano, Violin and Violoncello, with Orchestra (C major, op. 66)..... Beethoven.
5. Song.....
6. Overture, "Jessonda,"..... Spohr.
4. Symphonie-Soirée—18th March.
1. Symphony (D Major)..... Mozart.
2. Song.....
3. Concerto, for Violoncello..... Rittler.
4. Song.....
5. Overture (Coriolan)..... Beethoven.
6. Symphony (E flat, Op. 97, No. 3)..... Schumann.
5. Symphonie-Soirée—8th April.
1. Symphony..... Haydn.
2. Song.....
3. Symphony Concertante for Violin and Viola, with Orchestra..... Mozart.
4. Song.....
5. Overture—Bride of Messina (op. 100)..... Schumann.
6. Symphony (A Major, No. 7)..... Beethoven.

The second concert of the Philharmonic takes place on the 17th of December, at which time will be performed the following: Mendelssohn's "Scottish" Symphony, in A minor, No. 3; Berlioz's overture "King Lear;" Overture to Mozart's Zauberflöte, and choruses of Schubert and Mendelssohn, by the German Liederkrantz. The concert will be under the direction of THEO. EISELDE.

The first soirée of the eleventh season of the "New York Mendelssohn Union" will take place this evening, at the Chapel of the 4th Avenue Church. The programme includes Mendelssohn's "Lobgesang" (Hymn of Praise), and Sterndale Bennett's "May Queen." Mr. WM. BERG, the accomplished organist and composer, will be the conductor on this occasion.

The miscellaneous concerts at Niblo's Garden, and at the Everett Rooms, a new concert hall of moderate capacity, recently finished up town—have given but little subject for notice, save in the very successful performance on the piano, of Mr. Frank Gilder, a rising young artist of our city. As a teacher of boy choirs, Mr. Gilder is well known among the organists of our city churches, and his system I will endeavor to enlarge upon at some future day. His appearance in the concert room as a pianist has won for him additional commendation.

Numerous concert companies are organized for the winter campaign, and these in connection with the promenade concerts of the different brass bands of the city regiments, which are by no means ordinary, will serve to make the winter a very musical one.

The complimentary concert to be given for the benefit of Mr. Frederick Mollenhauer, the blind violinist and composer, is deserving of mention. It is given under the auspices of Anschütz, Carl Fornes, S. B. Mills, C. Bergmann, and a host of others, and will, I trust, prove a most successful effort for the unfortunate beneficiary.

The inauguration of the Chancel organ recently completed, at Trinity Church, will take place next month, and will attract the notice of all who are interested in the progress of rich Cathedral music, sung by boys, such as those under the experienced tuition of Dr. Cutler, the choir-master of Trinity.

T. W. M.

CHICAGO, DEC. 2.—This city has become quite a centre of musical talent. The name of BALATKA alone is enough to render it famous. In addition to him, we have Lewis and Le Clerque, Staab, Ziegfeldt, Baumbach, and many others of equal merit. Chicago also boasts three large musical Societies:—the "Philharmonic" (orchestral), the "Musical Union," and the "Mendelssohn."

The Philharmonic has just commenced its sixth season of concerts. The second one took place on Tuesday evening. These concerts, which occur once a month, are the great centre of the musical and fashionable circles of Chicago. The former go to hear a high class of music rendered in an artistic manner; and the latter, to see and be seen. The following was the Programme: Symphony in C minor, by Niels Gade; Overture to "Preciosa," by Weber; Fantasia for Trombone, composed by Balatka; Festival March, by Lortzing; Aria from Linda, by Donizetti; ballad, "Good night," by Balfe, sung by Miss Hattie Brown Miller, the excellent soprano of Trinity Church, of this city. The orchestra was a fine one, composed of fifty performers.

A few weeks ago the Musical Union brought out a German Opera, translated into English by Hans Balatka, the "Czar und Zimmermann," by Albert Lortzing. The performers were all "home talent," and it was produced in a style worthy of Maretzek or Leonard Grover.

The new Opera House, which promises to be the finest of its kind in the United States, fast approaches completion. It will probably be finished about the first of April, when it is to be dedicated by a grand season of Opera, with artists procured expressly for the purpose in Europe. More in regard to it another time.

CHICAGO.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, DEC. 10, 1864.

Otto Dresel's Concerts.

The first of the series of five concerts, announced by Mr. DRESEL, took place at Chickering's Rooms, on Saturday evening, Nov. 26. The hall was full, the choicest music, with such guaranty of fine interpretation, commanding for a certainty the choicest audience;—"fit audience, though few,"—and yet not few for a feast so fine. The appetite was sharpened, too, by the artist's long refusal of himself to public hearing; and expectation heightened by reports of his earnest summer studies on the very matter of these concerts; his searching over all the good fields of pianoforte music, which might yield something fresh and valuable; his labors in digesting and arranging from the scores of larger works, concertos, &c., to make them available without an orchestra, and yet without essential loss; and of the intense and critical practice of a pianist to whom it is easier to please everybody than to satisfy himself. The result appears in most unique and admirable programmes. Such selections are presented by no other concert-giver; it implies not only the uncompromising taste, the sympathy with genius, and the willing, practised art and power to interpret, but shows such extensive musical reading as probably no other pianist in this country has. Every genial writer for the instrument, from Bach to Schumann, Liszt, and Hiller, must yield hidden treasures out of stores so seldom even half explored. But a short series of concerts can exhibit only a small part of the fruits of these researches; and some limitation is therefore necessary to a certain type or style of programme, from which indeed great things might be missed, were not all that enters into their composition so choice, and the unity of each fresh bouquet so charming. If we were to suggest any modification of the plan, it would be to ask (most of the audience adding their voices, we have not a doubt) that Sonatas should not be excluded; what so edifying always, and to the greatest number of such listeners as Mr.

Dresel plays to, as the Sonatas of Beethoven? Or, if we must have something still more untried and out of the common course, there are the wonderful Sonatas of Franz Schubert, which, if faulty in some points of form, teem with most precious inspirations of genius. But we will not quarrel with what we get; it is so clear a gain, that the other things may well wait for their season to come round again.—Here is the first programme:

1. Concerto for three pianos, (C major,) (Accompaniments arranged for a Fourth).....J. S. Bach Allegro—Adagio—Finale.
2. Crakowiak, Rondo, Op. 14.....Chopin
(Orchestral parts arranged for a Second Piano.)
3. Weber's slumber Song, transcribed by.....Liszt
4. Songs by.....Robert Franz
"Hör ich das Vöglein singen," (Op. 24.)
"Im Wald, im Wald," (Op. 14.)
5. Three Piano Pieces by.....Robert Schumann
a. Intermezzo (op. 26).—b. Adagio (from Carnival, op. 9).—c. Finale from Kreisleriana, (op. 16).
6. Valse-Caprice after Waltzes by Schubert, E major.....Liszt
7. Adagio and Finale from 2d Concerto, F minor.....Chopin
(Orchestral parts arranged for a Second Piano.)

Old Bach heads the list, as he is likely to do in each of the five concerts. Mr. Dresel, in this, is undertaking for us the same good service that Mendelssohn did for Germany; he means to put to flight, if possible, the Bach bugbear, by practically showing that Bach's music can be entertaining and delightful, as well as learned and profound. The piano compositions of the great master afford ample material for this, utterly different as they are from any of the modern piano music. Should these succeed in dissipating the bugbear, and actually prove enjoyable to a whole room full of people, then it may be hoped that soon a beginning will be made of some acquaintance with his vocal works, when all who have any piety or music in their souls will be astonished at the revelation of such depth and tenderness of feeling, such unsurpassed richness, truth and beauty of expression, and own that religious music, as such, whether Catholic or Protestant, has reached its highest, purest utterance in Sebastian Bach. The Great Organ is already doing its part—or a part of its part—to prepare the way; but these piano (or clavier) compositions are perhaps the readiest entering wedge into the tough knot of anti-fugue and anti-scientific prejudice, since, instead of trying to cleave it by main force, they will gently, unawares, loosen its grasp by showing the old master under a pleasing aspect,

Untwisting all the chains that tie
The hidden soul of harmony.

The experiment, this first time, was signally successful. We verily believe that no piece on the programme was enjoyed so much, on the whole, and by the largest number, as the triple Concerto in C major. The charm, to be sure, was partly that of admirable rendering. The three pianos (Chickering Grands), which share equally the exposition of the themes, were played with perfect clearness, evenness and nicety of expression, and with that absence of all exaggerations of effect, which Bach's music requires, by Messrs. HUGO LEONHARD, B. J. LANG, and J. C. D. PARKER; while the original accompaniments for the quartet of strings were consolidated by Mr. Dresel upon a fourth piano. Mechanically, it all moved like clockwork, wheel within wheel, quietly and beautifully. And such satisfying, rich, fresh, wholesomely stimulating sonority; such full, clear, sweet, delicious euphony! The sound was all-pervading; it seemed to come in all round us and behind us like water, welling up from exhaustless springs of sweet and wholesome harmony. The first Allegro is remarkable for the exceeding simplicity of its theme, and for the wondrous art with which it is made interesting throughout such long and complex development; its re-appearance now in this and now in that part of the harmony, now in one and now in another piano, being always perfectly natural, so much so that for most hearers the art was hidden in the charm. The expression is simply happy, healthy, sunshiny, full of joy in even-tempered life and solid work. The Adagio touches a deeper chord. That solemn minor phrase in the bass and tenor, which ever slowly climbs and falls, so boldly pronounced through the whole, is most impressive, and haunts you afterwards as it haunts the music. The Finale is a little more formal and less interesting than the other movements. We do not often hear of four pianos working together to so good a purpose.

Next to this in interest,—equal perhaps, only in another way—was what was played from Chopin's F-minor Concerto. Pity only that the great length excluded the first movement! The Adagio is a marvellous creation. After a few delicately suggestive orchestral phrases (played, like all the accompaniments, on a second piano by Mr. Leonhard), it sets forth on a bold, soaring eloquent career of melody, gathering up flowers and pearls and rainbows by the way, the main thought never lost or weakened by the exuberance of flowery fancy; and then it grows dramatic, with long and still flowery sentences of most original impassioned recitative, which, having wreaked itself upon expression to the full, subsides into the continuous melody again. We never heard piano-forte more eloquent than under the hands of Mr. Dresel in this piece. The Allegro vivace, brilliant, piquant, graceful, long sustained, and very difficult, was also executed to a charm. We could have wished the orchestra for the sake of the inviting little horn figure; but the second piano, so well had Dresel arranged and so well did Leonhard play, furnished a perceptibly true background.—The other Chopin piece, the Rondo, whose odd name we take to be tantamount to Cracovienne, is exceedingly quaint, bright and imaginative, though dealing throughout with a dance form and variations. It leaps and scintillates with life, dainty, yet strong, and represents a mood so individual, with such felicity of utterance, that we shall be glad to hear it again. It realizes Liszt's descriptions of those Polish dances. There's a poetic flash to this dance, like wings of swallows circling in the sun.

There is no need to tell how exquisitely Mr. Dresel plays the Lisztian version of Weber's "Slumber Song." The triad of smaller pieces from Schumann's earlier piano works, written when he was raising his young David standard to do battle against musical old-fogyism and Philisterei, and wooing Clara Wieck, were less familiar; to some, perhaps, a little strange and puzzling. The Adagio, at least, was lovely and entirely clear. The Intermezzo, fiery, rapid, unrelenting, with its spasmodic, still reiterated figure, breaks out like a sort of long pent up divine rage, and storms itself away before the wondering listener. Fully as the master had it in his fingers, its intensity perhaps told more than its beauty to many of the audience. The third piece, from those moody fancies which Schumann has named after Hoffmann's "Kapellmeister Kreisler's" Sufferings," is full of interesting matter, and would be better appreciated on a second hearing. Liszt has woven a number of the charming little waltzes, which Schubert flung off without stint so easily, into a very pretty chaplet, adding gay ribbands to the gathered fresh leaves.—In all these pieces, we may say, that Mr. Dresel never played with surer, fleetest finger, with finer accent, more consummate taste and mastery inspired with truest musical feeling, nor with such calm superiority to his own nervous temperament, which he thus turned to exquisite advantage, as in this return to concert giving.

As for the singing, it was an act of pure loyalty and kindness in Mr. KREISSMAN to appear at all. He was suffering with a physical trouble too near the vocal organs, and the only wonder was that he sang the two Franz songs so well. He did it rather than disappoint the expectation of song entirely; and he was ready to sing other things, in case he found himself in fit condition.

SECOND CONCERT, Saturday, Dec. 3. Some expressed disappointment that there were so many little pieces in the first programme. This time there was unmixed satisfaction.

1. Concerto for three Pianos. In D minor. . . . J. S. Bach
[Accompaniments arranged for a fourth].
2. Gavotte from Orchestra Suite, and Pastoral Symphony from the Christmas Oratorio, arranged for Two Pianos. . . . Bach
3. Serenade and Allegro Gioioso. . . . Mendelssohn
[Orchestral accompaniment for a Second Piano].
4. Serenade, from Don Giovanni. . . . Mozart
5. Three Piano Solos:
  - a. "Novellette," . . . . . Rob. Schumann
[E major]
  - b. Notturmo. . . . . Chopin
[E major, op. 9.]
  - c. Valse Caprice after Waltzes by Fr. Schubert. . . . . Liszt
[A minor.]
6. Three Mazourkas. . . . . Chopin
E minor, op. 41; E major op. 6; and C sharp minor, op. 41.
7. Two Songs. . . . . Rob. Franz
8. Adagio and Rondo from first Concerto. . . . . Chopin

This time Bach advanced still further into the affections of the audience, and still further into the middle of the programme. The Gavotte, arranged by Mr. D. from an orchestral Suite de pieces, has an irresistibly quaint, life-like charm; it was as fresh as if composed to-day; something triumphantly, playfully good and right about it; not a learned manufacture merely, but a bright poetic God-send. The Pastoral Symphony from the Weihnachts Cantata, did it not remind you of Handel's? But it is even lovelier, and has more in it. The triple Concerto in D minor (Bach wrote but two of them, though several for two pianos, and for one, and one for even four, all with stringed quartet accompaniment) is the more important of the two, richer in ideas and feeling, equally perfect in art. It is more often played abroad. Mendelssohn played it in the Leipzig concerts with Moscheles and Clara Schumann; also in London, with Thalberg and Moscheles, where Mendelssohn outshone them both when it came his turn to extemporize a cadenza at a given point in one of its three movements. Our artists (Messrs. LANG, LEONHARD and PARKER) attempted no such flights, but kept to the written text, Mr. DRESEL again playing the string parts on a fourth piano. We shall not soon forget the time when Mr. Dresel introduced it here before, nearly twelve years ago, in the first concerts that he gave in Boston. Then the three pianos were played by Jaell, Scharfenberg (of New York), and Dresel, and with the string quartet in kind (Schultze, Meisel, Meyer and Bergmann). It has been played in Boston twice since, we believe; but never so effectively, and with such appreciative audience, as this time. We have no room for what we have to say about it now, but shall return to it. It was a complete success.

Mendelssohn's Serenade and Allegro Gioioso has never been played here before. Next to the two Concertos, it is the largest, the fullest of matter, the most interesting, and by all odds the most difficult of all his piano compositions. It was a consummate feat of execution on the part of Mr. Dresel. Mr. Kreissmann being still disabled, the Don Juan serenade was very kindly sung and very acceptably, by an amateur, a pupil of Mr. Dresel, whose capital arrangement of the staccato accompaniment for two pianos was anything but labor wasted; we would that Mr. Dresel's spirit might enter into all the pianists who sit down to accompany singers in our concerts.

Now for the "little" pieces,—yet not so very little. The Novellette, by Schumann, is one of his most fine and fascinating little poems; the B major Nocturne of Chopin, one of the most bewitching of the lovely tribe; and could either of them have been played more perfectly? Another Liszt-ian wreath of Schubert waltzes, and more interesting than the other. We had grown almost cloyed and wearied with Chopin's Mazourkas (such moods will come upon one even with regard to some of the best things); but these three sprang up into new, fresh bloom before us, under the artist's magic touch.

For a finale the Adagio (rapturous love dream of a poet's heart), and the delightful playful Rondo, from Chopin's E-minor Concerto, with orchestral parts on a second piano by Mr. Leonhard. This was always one of Mr. Dresel's favorite pieces, and one of his most perfect renderings. To many of us it recalled many a sweet hour and company, to hear it.

Obituary.

GEORGE SANGIER died in this city, November 28, 1864, aged 28 years. He was born in Durham, in England. Developing at an early age a great fondness for music, he became one of the choir boys in the Cathedral of that place. In this position he was found fourteen years ago by one of our most distinguished native musicians, who, attracted by his beauty of person and disposition, and his charming voice, took him under his protection. Since then he has been to this gentleman as an adopted son. During the greater portion of the time, he has been his constant companion in his sojournings in different parts of Europe and this country, co-operating in his various musical enterprises, singing in the choirs under his direction, assisting in the compilation of the works which he has edited, and adding his own exquisite taste and talent to those of his patron in all his labors. For several years he has resided in this city, where he has been well known to all lovers of music, and has won the regard and affection of a large circle of acquaintances.

Mr. Sangier has been for some months suffering from heart-complaint, and his sensitive constitution, enfeebled by disease, was recently still more broken, by distress at the death of an old and dear friend, closely followed by that of a beloved sister. While in this state, he was a few days since attacked by three ruffians in soldiers' dress, whose drunken brawling he had attempted to pacify, and, though defending himself manfully for a time, was overpowered by numbers and fearfully beaten. By this injury, his nervous system was finally shattered, and he was thrown into violent delirious fever. After the lapse of four days, his fever abated to such an extent, that his adopted father, who had nursed him tenderly by day and night, left him late in the evening in charge of the physicians at the hospital, and went home for a few hours' rest, confident that he should find him convalescent in the morning. Another paroxysm of delirium shortly ensued, which however soon passed away, leaving him calm and tranquil as before. At midnight he started up with a groan, pressing his hand to his heart, and then sank back and died as quietly as a child falls asleep.

It appeared upon examination that he could have lived at most only a few months longer; but the disease of the heart which caused his death, was undoubtedly more speedily brought to its fatal result by the injury which he received.

So has passed away George Sangier, perhaps in good time for himself, for his sensitive temperament and facile disposition were hardly fit to withstand the shocks and temptations of the world. But the void he has left in the life of those who have known his noble qualities of mind and heart, have felt the kindly warmth of his nature, loving and tender as a woman's, and have appreciated the delicate refinement of his character, will not easily be filled.

As these friends gathered to see him laid beneath the church where his voice had so often been heard, there were tears in the eyes of the listeners, and in the voices of the choristers, while they sang, to his loved patron's exquisite music, of those tears which God shall wipe away from all eyes, and of his sun which shall no more go down.

GOUNOD'S "FAUST." Messrs. Ditson & Co. have added to their long list of beautiful editions of Standard Operas, this last favorite, complete, and in their best style. The music is in large, clear and attractive type; the piano part enriched by indications of the orchestral instrumentation. The words are given in Italian and English, the latter being Mr. Chorley's translation, with the exception of those fitted to the principal songs, which were translated, with fidelity and taste, from the original French text by Mr. J. C. Johnson.

Here now is a capital chance for the admirers of "Faust" to revive its fascinations as often as they wish, and for others to satisfy themselves at leisure whether it is indeed a work of genius or not.

This vocal score is soon to be followed by a Piano-forte Arrangement of the opera, which will also be useful.

PROSPECTS. Mr. ZERRAHN'S subscription lists for three Orchestral Concerts, Sunday evenings, at the Melodeon, will be out to-day.—The MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB have not abandoned the field, we are glad to say, but will resume their Chamber Concerts on the 20th, playing Beethoven's great B-flat Quartet (posthumous) among other good things.

HANDEL AND HAYDN. The oratorio "Eli" drew a moderate audience, and so much of it as we witnessed (for "Eli" has no charm for us so potent as Mr. Emerson's lectures) was well performed. The chorus force was large and well drilled; Mrs. CARY sang the part of Samuel with touching simplicity and truth of feeling, as well as rich contralto voice; Miss HOUSTON was earnest and brilliant; and Mr. WHEELER and Mr. RUDOLPHSEN, the former especially, did themselves much credit. We do not think quite so badly of Costa's work as "Timothy" upon another page; and we do think that a well-conceived, musician-like work, not strikingly "new," is often worth more than such bold, vague aspirations after novelty as set up claims to our attention in these days. Still we agree, that "Eli" is neither a very original nor a great work, and wish the H. & H. Society would spend the same amount of time on matter of more moment.

FOR READERS OF GERMAN. Messrs. De Vries and Iharra, in the Albion building, are issuing a series of charming little German books, in a most tasteful style of print, chiefly for the use of young ladies who have German lessons, but attractive to all friends of German literature. Among them is "Prinzessin Ise," an exquisite Märchen of the Harz mountains; "Was sich der Wald erzählt," by Patitz; and now a couple of Art Essays, on the "Venus of Milo," and on "Raffaël and Michael Angelo," by HERMANN GRIMM, the author of the "Life of Michael Angelo," and son of one of the famous brothers Grimm. He is a devout Art student, a man of fresh, vigorous high thought, greatly in sympathy with our Emerson, to whom these "Zwei Essays" are dedicated.—These little books are cheap, as well as models of artistic print.

CROWDED OUT.—A string of notices of smaller concerts, &c., already in type.

Fine Arts.

Two old landscapes are particularly charming and instructive, for they exhibit what our landscape painters lack, for the most part, altogether, poetry of feeling and imagination. One by Cole, with a fine sentiment for the grand and distant and aerial, in nature; a rare ripeness and mellowness of tone and color pervading the wide air and tender sky. Incorrect, it is yet deeply poetical, steeped in, and inspired by, the feeling, as is the grand picture of the Shepherds by the same great artist on the Athenæum staircase. The man was a real and great poet in art and has not left his successor. This scene well befits the most tragic and fascinating of Cooper's stories, the Last of the Mohicans; which is in literature precisely what this is in art, an extravaganza, yet a poetic and beautiful work.

The other landscape ascribed to Zucharelli, full of poetic significance and a sweet serenity of feeling, so clear, calm, cool, suggestive of an ideal world. It is an abstraction of the poetic elements in nature, and a composing therewith, out of the mind and fancy and feeling, a thing, to be sure, which has no foundation in real life, but which is nevertheless delightful and beautiful.

More real than living things
Nursling of immortality.

There is a kernel of truth, and genius and beauty, somewhere in the old masters, even the landscapists, which preserves them. An appeal to one's sentiment, one's aspiration, one's longing. Let our men paint with as much poetry and they will delight the time to come. It is a dealing with the world after the poet's own heart. No literal, dry transcript of reality, which, unless it is inspired, impregnated, transmuted with, the artist's feeling, his soul, and imagination, is ever a caput mortuum.

It is true there is little study of nature, no knowledge of rock form; geology, stratification, granulation; substance, texture or color. Exactness is not studied; the beauty of detail not apprehended or felt, nor the geology known; but there is a charm of sentiment and feeling—true, poetic, deep, refined,—there is romance, tone, harmony which comes from the taste, heart, soul; and with which nature, in her loveliness and her perfection, has inspired them; which has entered into their natures, and dwelt there, and is expressed with the added beauty of the spirit which preserves and will continue to do so against all the assaults of modern criticism, its barren knowledge and empty soul.

Imagination redeems a carnal, sensual, material world. It is the heart of humanity, the kernel of hope, the soul of faith, the looking for things to come—This explains the long livedness of the old masters, (poetic name) and their hold upon men's feelings. They touch the heart, and are seated in the warm imagination like a friend. Guests at the hearth, and dear and loved companions for every vacant, casual hour, when they awaken us to new and unexpected beauty. For art like nature and poetry, has many meanings:

A thing of beauty is a joy forever,
It's loveliness increases,

"All high poetry is infinite. It is the first acorn which contained all oaks potentially. Veil after veil may be withdrawn and the inmost naked beauty of the meaning never exposed. * * *

The source of an unforeseen and unconceived delight."

It is vain to suppose they will ever be obsolete. Any work which has passed the ordeal of successive centuries, and survives to our time, contains within itself the principles of its own immortality. Two centuries are as good as an eternity. Such works are sure to have something precious in them, and to be possessed of genius, which we must labor to find out; and not falsely believing we know more than they, insult their aged fame with doubt and ignorance. You cannot unseat the old deities, or reverse the verdict of posterity. Logic will not do it. The Greek deities will live as long as the world, alive in the imagination, if dead in the faith. Feeling is finer than thought, truer and keener than knowledge, else had our beliefs long ago vanished, and our faiths dwindled to naught.

The little unfinished picture by Greuse; whether by that master or not, is an exquisite piece of painting, for richness and freshness, and sentiment—very instructive to every artist. The drapery has the character of Greuse, and we cannot judge what it might be had the artist finished it. Perhaps the ivory, enamelled finish, like porcelain, of the picture in the next room, belonging to the Athenæum, would have been given to this. We think it is more beautiful as it is; for exquisite as is the beauty, truth of tint, in that picture, and perfect the silver harmony, yet it is not nature; it does not give the feeling of flesh as this does. Appropriate, if any where, to the subject of a young girl, who in her freshness and perfection, is like a bit of the enamel of nature, it is still hard, and does not please us as this unfinished work, which has more of the true texture, and richness of nature and life. It is like much of the exquisite works of Carlo Dolci, particularly the St. Cecilia at the Manfrini at Venice and the Dresden Gallery; the perfection of prettiness and doll-like beauty in the painting, but a false porcelain style to be done on canvass. But what can exceed the tremulous, budding freshness of the youthful girl, flushed with a breathing beauty; the melting tenderness of youthful feature; sensitive, exquisite form and color; a deliciousness of beauty which makes us think of the old poet:

There is a garden in her face
Where roses and white lilies blow,
A heavenly paradise is that place,
Wherein all pleasant fruits do grow;
There cherries grow that none may buy,
Till Cherry-Eripe themselves do cry.

The picture 443, by Sassoferrato, wrongly put down to Lo Spagno, is a very beautiful and genuine specimen of this peculiar and refined old master. The harmony of it, in this key of white color, relieved by blue, is very perfect, and the hand a wonderful piece of painting. Never was the softness, and roundness, and exquisite beauty of the female hand better given. The delicacy and refinement of it, as to color and feeling, harmonise with the purity of the face. One would make it his fetiche, kneel down to it, worship it, as a savage his idol; for beauty on the sensitive and artistic nature, takes almost the hold of worship. Poets and artists are pagans all, from Schiller to Wordsworth; both lamenting the decay of the antique, which Keats recreated, with refreshed and added glory.

"The intelligible forms of ancient poets,
The fair humanities of old religions."

The peasant girl, 357, by Dana is one of this very artistic artist's best things. Painted in a very free manner, and far removed from hardness or dryness, we have all we need in art; or, at least, the best thing it can give us, the sentiment and feeling of things; not the dull, dreary reality, the poor approximation to the fact, without fancy or feeling, inferior artists give. The French style of Mr. Dana is steeped in sentiment, which is the characteristic of that school, a little too facile,—fatal facility and chic sometimes. It neglects form and line and figure, which were the aim of the old Italian schools—the classical style—for the romantic method,—a thing essentially modern, gothic, reformatory, and which began about the time of Watteau in art, who was followed by Gainshorough and Constable. These men broke up the old schools and introduced the modern feeling.

This picture has great beauty of color, and the face and posture a winning charm. Mr. Dana has great facility, and a wide range, and will do much good, we think, in this country, where although we are not ready to acknowledge it, art is yet in its very infancy.

How delightful is old Vandervelde! He delights in lagoon, which are among the most poetical things in nature, shadowy with clouds, picturesque with craft, burnished with sunsets; gleaming in long, lustrous, lazy lines of silvery light and calm placid as an infant in its sleep, smiling all the day ineffably; as one sees them in Holland, or in the watery enchantment of Venice, where the Alps sun themselves in the sea, reflecting old watch towers and the harbor piles.

"In likeness of a peak of clumped isles"

"Where from their many isles in evening's gleam,
Its towers and its palaces did seem Like fabrics of enchantment piled to Heaven."

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

O blow me a kiss on the wind! Ballad.

C. M. E. Oliver. 30

A very pretty idea for the young sailor and his sweetheart. The music is very sweet.

Jessy Gray. Song and Chorus. E. L. Hime. 30

An English ballad, very simple and pretty. Jessy is the May Queen in the first verse, is loved and deserted in the second, and, of course, rests in the village church yard in the third verse.

The Soldier's request. Dr. Haynes. 30

Another of the appropriate war songs. Soldier's families appreciate and like them all.

I wait my love. Song. H. West. 30

A pleasing and simple ballad.

Happy Boyhood. Song. C. Blamphin. 30

A fine English ballad.

Instrumental Music.

Delta Psi Waltz. H. W. and A. T. S. 30

A decidedly good waltz, and not difficult. The D. P.'s to whom it is dedicated, should take it in hand, and cause it to be generally known.

Bay of Quinte. Polka Mazourka.

H. F. Chaloupka. 30

Quite a brilliant piece, and easy for those who play octaves with tolerable facility. Dedicated to the bachelors of Belle-ville, where the belles will play it often, it is to be hoped.

Un ballo in maschero. (Revue melodique, four hands). F. Beyer. 60

Contains the favorite melodies of the "Masked Ball." A very expressive piece. The practice of good duets, by learners, cannot be too highly recommended.

Orfa, Grand Polka. Seven Octaves. 30

Of medium difficulty, and quite light and graceful in character, although showing considerable of that power which is characteristic of "Seven Octaves," compositions.

La Chant du Martyrs. Grand Caprice Religious. Seven Octaves. 30

Very powerful, grand and impressive. It is somewhat difficult to perform, but well worth the time taken in learning it.

Pensive Polka Mazourka. Seven Octaves. 30

A good piece by the same author as the others.

Books.

ORGAN GEMS.—A collection of Offertoires, Elevations, Communion, Preludes, Fugues, &c. By Andre, Baiste, Brosig, Hesse, Freyer, and others. Arranged and edited by Frederick S. Davenport. Cloth, $3.00; Boards, $2.50

It is getting to be a necessity with organists to have a library of compositions for the instrument. Many to be sure, have great power of extemporisation, but the greatest inventor cannot invent always; and it is quite a relief to have a book of good music to fall back upon, for part or the whole of a voluntary. There is also an evident use and satisfaction in practising the works of the most skillful performers in the world.

The "gems" of the present work are carefully selected. Baiste is organist of the great organ in the church of St. Eustache, in Paris. Hesse, recently deceased, was considered, next to Schneider, to be the best organist in the world.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 619.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, DEC. 24, 1864.

VOL. XXIV. No. 20.

Bach's "Triple Concerto" in D minor.

A REMINISCENCE OF BOSTON CONCERTS IN 1853.

The interest attending the revival of this work in Mr. Otto Dresel's present series of concerts, carries us back to the scene of that gentleman's earliest concerts here, held far above the crowd, as it were, in a remote little "upper chamber" upon Tremont Street,—there being no nice Chickering hall at that time. Then it was that he, with brother artists, gave us a first and memorable impression (to "fit audience, though few") of Bach's D-minor Concerto, the last of the two which the grand old master composed for three pianos, or more properly clavichords, with accompaniment of two violins, viola and violoncello. Partly to strengthen by comparison the impression made by that work now, and partly for the pleasure of recalling the fine group of pianists who were its interpreters at that time, we reproduce here some portions of our record of Mr. Dresel's fifth and last Soirée, March 5, 1853. (The other numbers of the programme were a highly original and interesting Trio of Mr. Dresel's for piano, violin, and 'cello; Beethoven's Sonata for violin and piano in F; Etudes and other smaller pieces from Chopin and Stephen Heller; and Hummel's Septet, the piano part played by Scharfenberg with full accompaniments—flute, oboe, horn, viola, 'cello, and double-bass, by member of the old "Germania Society."

THE CONCERTO

From the newest to the oldest;—yet to the audience literally new, while in quality it has the perennial newness and freshness of genius. The Concerto of Sebastian Bach, for three pianos, with string quartet accompaniment,—this was really the great feature of the evening. This work has been much played in Germany of late years; and it is the piece in which Mendelssohn once, in London, distinguished himself to such advantage over Moscheles and Thalberg, by the remarkable cadence which he extemporized, after each had by previous understanding essayed the like at points indicated in the preceding movements; that remarkable triumph has become a tradition in London. Our three pianists attempted no such flights, but adhered to the written text. This Concerto was only for the first time published in 1845, and owes its origin, it is said, to the fact that the father wished to exercise his two oldest sons, W. Friedemann and C. Ph. Emanuel, in all sorts of delivery. Friedemann left the paternal house and went to Dresden in 1733, at the age of twenty-three; Emanuel went to Berlin in 1738, at the age of twenty-four. Hence it is presumed that this Concerto was composed before 1733, and in the most brilliant period of the grand old master's creative activity. The editor of the score directs by way of preface that: "The string accompaniments should be kept subdued and delicate; the three pianos must be of equal strength and excellence, but all the better for a little variety in coloring of tone. The three players must wholly lay aside the more modern style of playing, never raise the dampers, but carry their parts through with sobriety, delicacy, and in strict time. Neither one must wish to be prominent over his fellows, since they all three have equal right, and there are only a few passages more for the first piano. The hammering and lifeless mode of playing, now-a-days sometimes esteemed Bach-ish, must be utterly avoided; for the old pianists (harpsichordists) sang upon their instruments and delivered the music with warmth, nay with inspiration, and yet con discrezione,—or with modesty, as they used to call it."

We think we may say that these conditions were on Wednesday evening pretty nearly fulfilled. Jael took the first piano, his by right of almost unlimited facility of execution; and his was most distinctly heard, as a matter of course, being the highest part and having more of the expansion and ornamental part of the melody; yet that the second and third, Scharfenberg and Dresel, were not wanting, was evident from the perfect unity with which all moved together, and from the general breadth and fullness of tone, especially where the vigorous and noble themes so often ran in unison. The pianos were three of Chickering's newest, (not exactly equal, the first being of seven, the others of six octaves,—but either of them a "Grand" compared with anything that old Bach's boys had to play on;) all of beautiful and refined tone, and great evenness throughout, surpassing even those esteemed his best before his manufactory was destroyed by fire; indeed these new instruments seemed to have come out tried and purified, as it were, from "the refiner's fire." The accompaniments, by Messrs. Schultze and Meisel (violin), Meyer (viola), and Bergmann and Balcke ('cello and contra-basso, on one part,) were delicately and neatly given, though it was difficult to subdue the piercing violin tones fully to the standard of the pianos. Of the music itself what shall we say? Let no one henceforth talk of Bach as "dry" and learned; for here every movement was full of charm, of humanity, of poetry, of wisdom,—in a word of genius, the most sound and wholesome and harmonious. With no pretention, none of the modern straining for effect, no curious episodes, or strange modulations, how the mingling strains of melody flowed on like a full, clear, limpid river, as if from an inexhaustible source, yet with no waste, and to an unwavering goal! The neatness, the transparency, the easy continuous on-flow of the music, so large and strong in the first movement, were perfectly refreshing to the sense and satisfying to the soul; here was "no nonsense," and no stupid gravity in the avoidance thereof. It realized the most loving traditions of Bach. The second movement, in the six eight Siciliano rhythm, opens with the daintiest, and most delicately piquant style of melody that could be imagined—sweet and full of sensibility and poetry, however,—and soon proves its right to be dainty, by melting and running away in a right hearty, frank and affectionately cheerful stream of melody, until the pause, filled by the airy little cadence from Jael's flying fingers, and the good old-fashioned, orthodox Adagio half-close, leading at once into the Allegro Fugue; of course Bach could not get through without that. And how beautiful the theme of that fugue! how gracefully passed about, till its outline, everywhere reflected in the mingling currents of the instruments, had that unity in variety that you see in the wavy surface of the full mountain brook, descending to the plain, and spreading swiftly yet composedly along over the motley, fairy pebbles and mosses. Every now and then there seemed to be little momentary breaks, where one part after another would nimbly shoot across in a spray of soft and rapid little demi-semi-quavers,—and so, merrily and swimmingly on to the end, which seems the outlet into wider and still waters.

THE THREE PIANISTS.

The Septet was a luxurious feast of tones. So was indeed the entire concert. And looking back upon it, one of the most interesting features was the marked, yet harmonious contrast of the three pianists. Dresel, nervous, fastidious, self-exacting, critical, anxiously loyal to an artistic ideal, caring mainly for the music and the master's thought, and despising all parade of mere performance, somewhat moody withal, and with a touch of genius in him;—Jael, happy as the day is long, plump-full of music to his fingers' ends, revelling in unbounded faculty of execution, able and happy to interpret (and always with true and characteristic, as well as polished, elegant expression) the works of all sorts of masters,—a sort of young Rossini or Alboni of the piano; and Scharfenberg, the quietest, and most balanced of the three, with less of genius than the first, less of child-like exuberance of strength and nervous energy than the second, yet more of the sound and practical morale of a substantial artist, perhaps, than either. He is the natural middle of the group; and all are large and genuine enough to meet like brothers on the common ground of Art. The contrast in their styles of playing is in correspondence with the characters and faces of the men. Jael has a touch unrivalled for limpid purity and roundness of tone, never shows a painful sign of exertion, and marches smilingly through all the difficult music that anybody ever wrote, as through a perpetual banquet hall. Dresel is as unlike this as possible; his nervous manner, as if in close mortal conflict with difficulties, his crisp, staccato, critically nice touch, his sacrifice of literalities and common readings to carefully refined, characteristic conceptions of an author or a tempo, his tendency to be himself the poet in his readings of the great-tone poets,—all this charms the like-minded and wins upon the thoughtful, but is apt to prepossess unfavorably those who look most to externals, or who regard a pianist more with reference to his instrument and the right humoring thereof, or his public and the right humoring thereof also, than they do with main reference to musical expression. He does not pretend to the character of a great executant and many times would rather see Jael ride some cheval-de-bataille of a favorite master, than mount the hard-mouthed Pegasus himself. Scharfenberg, like a sound, loyal artist, renders all his music with unblemished accuracy, and manly absence of all nonsense and weakness. We may think it a privilege to have heard them all. Would that such fortunate conjunction of good stars might longer last!

Death of P. Scudo.

(From the Lower Rhine Musik-Zeitung.)

It is not long since Fiorentino died, and musical criticism in Paris has again suffered a severe loss: Pierre Scudo, the musical critic of the Revue des deux Mondes and some other Parisian periodicals, fell a victim, on the 21st October, at Blois, to the attacks of madness which, for some months previously, had prevented his pursuing his professional avocations and necessitated his retirement from public life.

Scudo was born on the 8th June, 1806, at Venice. He went, however, at an early age to Paris, and, when about eighteen, was admitted into Choron's Musical Institute. How he found his way to France, and what took him to Paris is something we do not know. His eccentric manners rendered him a favorite with his fellow students, among whom was Duprez, afterwards so celebrated as a singer. Choron usually called him his Court Jester. His voice was insignificant, and his musical knowledge still more so; but he possessed an intelligent mind, to which were added the impulses and nature of an Italian, together with great confidence in himself. As he was continually engaged in musical pursuits at the Institute, his practical education was advanced by the study of classical works, which Choron made his pupils sing, almost to the exclusion of all others. Technical vocal instruction, properly so called, was imparted only in a defective manner, so that Scudo never properly learned how to sing. Notwithstanding this, he was selected, owing principally to his nationality, to sustain a second part in Il Viaggio a Reims, an opera composed by Rossini expressly for the coronation of Charles X. in 1824.

In consequence of the Revolution of 1830, Choron's School for Church-Music was closed, and Scudo compelled to look about for some means of gaining a livelihood. From this period, M. Fétis, as he tells us in his Biographie Universelle, vol. VII, lost sight of him, but was informed that he became a clarinet player in a regimental band, and, in 1832, was stationed at Nantes. He is said, at the same period, to have plunged into the writings of the theosophers Jacob Böhme, Van Helmont, St. Martin, and others. Fétis mentions the fact as a mere report, but if it be true, now, that Scudo has so unfortunately fallen a victim to mental derangement, it carries with it greater weight than would otherwise have been the case, since it is suggestive of a previous eccentric tendency in his mind. That, however, he devoted the period in question to the task of making up for lost time seems highly probable, and may be asserted with tolerable certainty, from his subsequent appearance as an author.

After his return to Paris, he gave lessons in singing. He wrote, also, a large number of songs, or romances, many of which were published, and, for a time were popular among dilettanti. Fétis gives the title of two or three dozen, but passes a very severe judgment on them. What we remember to have seen of them proves, it is true, that composition was not the sphere in which Scudo was destined to shine. In the accompaniments, also, of these romances we perceive what was either a striking want of acquaintance with the elements of harmony, or unpardonable haste.

He did much more in the way of musical criticism, or, perhaps, to speak more correctly, of reporting matters connected with music; for he did not possess sufficient acquirements to write sterling criticism founded upon theoretical analysis of a work of art. We should, however, be doing him injustice were we to go so far as to deny him the musical knowledge necessary for an independent æsthetic opinion on music; and in exactly the same degree that the judgment Fétis passes on him as a composer is correct, what he says about him as a writer on music is ill-natured and unjust. If we leave out of consideration a partiality for the Italians, his countrymen, which sometimes exercised a strong influence on him, Scudo was, above all, one of the few Parisian critics who gave utterance to his conscientious convictions, and never allowed himself to be swayed by any considerations whatever save those of art. He possessed, moreover, a polished and attractive style, especially and laudably remarkable from the fact of his being free from that continual striving after esprit which besets so many feuilleton writers, and of his never being tempted into coloring his judgment one way or the other for the sake of a witty idea, or into wounding any one personally, although, especially in the last years of his life, he despatched many subjects very curtly, and was frequently harsh and dogmatical. As one of the writers, for many years, on the Revue des deux Mondes, he had, it is true, succeeded in making himself a sort of authority on musical matters, and in asserting his equality with the other talented contributors to that periodical.

His articles in the Revue and other publications he gave to the world under various collective titles in the years 1850, 1854, 1859, 1860, and 1864. He wrote, likewise, a kind of art-romance: Le Chevalier Sarti, which has been translated into German. The Niederrheinische Musik-Zeitung also reproduced many his articles, though often obliged to oppose him, especially in his opinions on German art. On the other hand, however, he expressed unbounded admiration of German and especially Rhenish concert performances, with which he became acquainted only a few years since, while, according to his own assertion, the oratorio choruses transported him into a completely new sphere of artistic enjoyment.

His intellect began to be deranged at the commencement of the present year, and at last, his disease degenerated into downright madness, so that his death—which occurred on the 21st October—must be looked on as a blessing, by all who felt any interest in him.

L. BISCHOFF.

Cologne, November 5.

The London Athenæum, in announcing the death of M. Scudo, says:

The rank of French journalists has been just narrowed by the death of M. Scudo, whose writings on music have been long popular with a certain section of connoisseurs, and by the chastity and elegance of their style have made themselves welcome elsewhere than in Paris. Tried, however, without reference to manner, their essential weakness, absence of generosity, and ignorance of all that passed, save in one dearly beloved corner of the world of art, render them valueless for the purposes of reference. Devoted to the elder school of Italian Opera composers and singers (many of whom he idolized only by hearsay), M. Scudo was, among all specious critics of modern times, the most resolute to hold no communion with all that was passing round him. It was so easy to talk of La Coltellini (afterwards Madame Mericoffre) as a singer to whom no woman in the later degenerate days was worthy to hold the candle; so easy to repeat, for ever and ever, raptures over Cimarosa's "Matrimonio," and Mozart's "Trio of Masks," in "Don Juan," and "Voi che sapete." Nothing could be more absurd (because of its contemptuous ignorance) than the manner in which M. Scudo would lay down the law concerning music in England, which country (he once avowedly declared in our hearing) contained nothing worth the trouble of a visit. And yet he did not hesitate, therefore, to speak, ex cathedra, of our oratorio performances, and of Handel as a fossil composer, and to insult Mendelssohn! M. Scudo became more dogmatic and slighter in his criticisms as years went on; more and more obviously carried away by that overweening temper which, by its bigotry, fancies it can defy time and its inevitable changes of loss and gain. At length his mind, which could never have been a strong or healthy one, gave way; and, after a short period of violent distemperature, he died at Blois, in confinement. —The successor of M. Fiorentino as a dramatic critic, M. Horace Viel-Castel, —a duller writer but a far more honest judge than that avowedly purchasable person,—also, died a few days since, in or near Paris.

Musical Correspondence.

HALLE, PRUSSIA, Nov. 13.—I promised to write as soon as I should have anything to say; four weeks have passed since my arrival, but only the last has brought fruits worth storing. Halle, indeed, is by no means an unmusical place: how could it be so, when it is the residence of ROBERT FRANZ? But it has its season, and that has only just commenced. Every winter brings a series of four classical subscription concerts, alternating with five of the "Berg" Association, a sort of social club. These, as well as the frequent performances of the "Sing-Akademie," are under the direction of Franz, to whom, also, the University Choir (consisting of students) owe their perfect rendering of the sentences, motets, &c., at the bi-weekly academic service. For years past, too, all the artists, great and small, who visit Leipzig, as the central point of all musical interest, let their light shine also upon Halle, and find there a critical and appreciative audience.

But also in humbler spheres, a healthy taste and love for music cannot but be cultivated, when an obscure restaurant advertises, joined to creature comforts, programmes like this: Trio by Beethoven; 'Cello Solo by Kummer; Quartet by Haydn; or: Sonata for Piano and Violin by Beethoven, Trio by Hummel, Quartet by Mozart;—or when an amateur orchestral Union promises (to the accompaniment of beer and pipes, and for a mere nominal price of admission) Beethoven's 7th Symphony, a Pastoral by Bach, Mendelssohn's "Fair Melusina," and a Fantasia from Lohengrin! Several times a week, too, the ears of the people are fed by grand old Chorals and Motets, or beautiful secular Quartets by Mendelssohn, Hauptmann &c., from the throats of the singing boys (the same institution to which Luther belonged in his youth) as they wander through the streets and sing before the houses of their patrons. True, distance sometimes lends enchantment to the sound; for a sensitive musical ear may be hurt by an occasional swerving from the true pitch of one or the other of the fresh young voices; but the music still remains, and cannot fail to find its way into the hearts of the hearers.

No less impressive is another old custom still extant in Halle. Every evening, at 9 o'clock, from one of the five towers that lend such beauty to the market-place, the Thürmer, or watchman, on some wind instrument, plays a solemn choral, repeating it to each quarter of the globe. Often this is followed by the touching hymn for the dead: "How they so gently rest," ordered by bereaved friends in memory of their departed. The effect is most beautiful: one would almost imagine the strains to come direct from heaven.

The first subscription concert took place last week; the first of the "Berg" series last evening. The orchestra consists of about 40 performers, who are admirably drilled by their leader, E. John, and inspired by Franz as conductor, and they play with much spirit. An orchestra Suite by Bach, Mendelssohn's "Scotch Symphony," a Symphony in D by Haydn, and Cherubini's overture to Les deux Journées were the compositions I heard from them. The first pleased and interested me most, in every way. It consists of a Prelude, Aria, Gavotte, Bourrée, and Gigue, characteristic of the composer throughout, and yet in his most popular and comprehensible style. The first violin was taken by Ferdinand David, (who was announced as one of the solo-performers of the evening), and it was delightful to see how evidently he enjoyed his part, and with what zest Franz and the whole orchestra entered into the thing. The Aria was a violin solo inexpressibly beautiful, like a soul; soaring heaven-ward and most exquisitely was it rendered by David. Then came the merry Gavotte; fresh and charming as if composed yesterday (only that no one living could have written it); the rough, heavy Bourrée, and the stately Gigue—calling up to our fancy's eye the lords and dames of old, whose measured movements perchance followed these same strains. In his regular solos, David rather disappointed me. They were more bravura pieces: a Concerto by Viotti, and a composition of his own; and though his execution was admirable, I found the performance rather tedious. Far more gratifying to me was the playing of Edmund Singer, "Court-virtuoso," from Stuttgart, who appeared at the "Berg" concert. (Query: If a piano-virtuoso is one who is perfect on the piano, a violin-virtuoso, ditto on the violin, what is the perfection of a "Court-virtuoso"?) He produced a violin Concerto of Paganini, and Bach's Chaconne, in a manner which carried away all his hearers. Ease of execution, breadth and purity of tone, depth of feeling, artistic refinement, all these are his to a rare degree. I suppose none but Joachim can do justice to the Chaconne of Bach, or make it quite clear to to the unprofessional hearer; but Singer threw more light on it than any one from whom I have ever heard it, and overcame its marvellous difficulties in a masterly manner. The vocal part of these concerts was not of sufficient importance to require particular mention.

A few days ago I had the great satisfaction of hearing, for the first time in my life, a "Gewandhaus" concert in Leipzig. It was with strange feelings that I entered that hall, so far-famed in modern musical history, so fraught with associations of the deepest interest. A description is unnecessary, as better ones than mine would be have repeatedly appeared in your Journal;—but for which, indeed, I should have been sadly disappointed in the size and locality of the room. As a whole, the programme was not as perfect as I could have wished to hear; but two of the four numbers were alone worth coming across the ocean to hear.—They were Cherubini's sparkling, vigorous Overture to "Les Abencerrages," and Beethoven's Eroica. The perfection, the spirit, the elan with which these were rendered, surpassed my highest expectations, and delighted me beyond measure. The instruments were so marvellously balanced, the shading so exquisite! there was such unanimity and precision! In the overture, there occurs a piano passage for the violins: I never heard anything so beautifully rendered; it was like the soft rustling of the wind in the tree-tops. And in the crescendos, the forte passages, there was a vigor, a life, that made one's pulses throb. But all my expressions of enthusiasm will give no adequate impression of the reality to those who have never been so fortunate as to hear this wonderful orchestra; all that I can say of it only appears very tame compared to my recollections.

The remaining numbers of the programme were a Characterbild, "Faust," by Rubinstein, magnificently played, but inappreciable at one hearing; and a Piano Concerto by Mr. Jacques Rosenhain, performed by himself:—a modern composition, executed with modern brilliancy, and in my humble opinion hardly worthy of a place in a Gewandhaus-concert.

At present the good people of Halle are all excitement over the expected advent of Carlotta Patti and companions. While all laugh and pretend to be disgusted at Ullmann's flaming placards and pompous advertisements, and groan at the unheard of price of tickets, (1½ and 2 Thalers), the latter are nearly all disposed of, and nothing else is talked about. In my next I will tell you how H U M B U G, though not as much at home in Germany as in America, is as omnipotent here as there.

M.

[The following letter, from our Regular Correspondent, though duly mailed, failed to reach us in season for the last number.]

NEW YORK, DEC. 6.—I read your melancholy article on the lost [?]; musical importance of Boston, with the greatest sympathy, and now regret that I have no softer balsam for your wounded heart to offer, than a report of such harmonious enjoyments as you seem so much to feel the need of. And yet you have a splendid organ, around which all the Boston music-making seems lately to have concentrated itself; organists of all kinds springing out of the earth like grass. We have no such organ here; but we have a Philharmonic Society in New York; one in Brooklyn; and, lest a week should pass without a symphony concert, Mr. THEODORE THOMAS has conceived the happy idea of giving five "Sinfonie-Soirées" during the winter, in which, besides the classical orchestral works of Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schumann, and Mendelssohn, novelties of all kinds will be produced.

The first Soirée took place in Irving Hall on the 3rd December. The orchestra, numbered some fifty or sixty of our best orchestral players. Here is the programme:

Symphony No. 8. Op. 93. F major. . . . . Beethoven.
Scena and Aria, "Non plu di fiori," (Clemenza di Tito.) . . . . . Mozart.

Miss Fanny Raymond.

Concerto in F minor. Op. 21. . . . . Chopin.
Larghetto and Finale.
Mr. S. B. Mills.

Suite, Op. 118. D. . . . . Fr. Lachner.
1. Præludium. 3. Variationen und Marsch.
2. Menuetto. 4. Introduction und Fuge.
(First time in America.)

Orchestra.

Cavatina, "Ab s'attento," (Donna Carlotta), . . . . . Mendelssohn.
Miss Fanny Raymond.

Dramatic Symphony, Romeo and Juliet, Op. 17. . . . . Berlioz.

Second Part.

"Romeo seul"—Tristesse—Concert of Bal.—Grand Fête chez Capulet."
(First time in America.)

Beethoven's 8th Symphony was a happy choice; every time I hear it, I am struck with the absurdity of Fétis' division of Beethoven's works into three styles, or periods. As he already discovers traces of the third style in the 7th Symphony (op. 92), I presume that he classes the symphony in question as belonging to the third manner. Lenz, however, (and of this Fétis seems to be ignorant), proves that the 8th symphony was composed before the 7th. Here is what the learned Directeur du Conservatoire de Bruxelles says of the third period: "Without his (Beethoven) being aware of it himself, his originality lost something of its spontaneity in becoming systematic; the bounds within which he had heretofore retained it, were overthrown. Repetitions of the same thoughts were pushed to excess; the development of the subject he had chosen became rambling; the melodic thought was less clear, as it became more dreamy; the harmony bore a certain stamp of hardness, and seemed, from day to day, to bear witness to the weakening of his memory of sound. Finally, Beethoven affected to find new forms, less from the effect of a sudden inspiration, than to satisfy the conditions of a meditated plan. The works written in this direction of the artist's ideas, comprise the third period of his life, and his last manner. This style is already to be noted in the Symphony in A."—Fétis, who piques himself on having discovered a philosophy of music, by which he is enabled to judge the wanderings of our great masters from the path of the beautiful, has made himself ridiculous by his criticism of Beethoven's works. And this very 8th Symphony leads us to suspect that his philosophy is founded upon little else than arrogance. For this work is so very clear, fresh, original, euphonious in every bar; such a happy mood reigns in the whole, that Beethoven must have been in an excellent humor when he wrote it. Beethoven's philosophy pleases us more than that of M. Fétis.

The orchestral execution was, on the whole, good, although a certain haste and uncertainty were perceptible, especially in the last two movements. It is to be regretted that only two rehearsals were had; and such rehearsals are rather a going through than a thorough study of a work; of course, in them an intelligent penetration of works in all their formal and orchestral details is not to be thought of; nor can the director do everything with his bâton.

The Suite, by Fr. Lachner, was played here for the first time. In a favorable sense, it is excellent capellmeister music; originality does not come out so strongly in it as the formal and contrapuntal cleverness of the composer; and the effective and thoughtful instrumentation bears witness to the experience of the master in the orchestra. The work pleased very much, and we hope soon to hear the second Suite, which lately appeared, by the same composer. The extract from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony pleased us better than most that we have heretofore heard by Berlioz. But in all his works we experience the feeling of "much ado about nothing." If Berlioz had only as many happy ideas as orchestral effects, he would be a great master. Depth of conception, free contrapuntal handling of his motives, and their organic development into significant periods, is in a great measure wanting to him. This poverty is not to be ignored, in spite of the most refined orchestral effects.

Miss RAYMOND made her début in New York in this concert. The young lady in appearance is pleasing; her voice, a powerful and sonorous mezzo-soprano, exactly fitted for the execution of the broad dramatic cantilena. Her upper tones are superb; the medium, of softer timbre; and the lower, not yet compact enough. Her choice of the great Mozartean aria from La Clemenza di Tito, showed that she had no desire to tread the broad road, laid down with throat-flexibility, which is trodden by most of our concert singers; although in the aria by Mercadante, she gave signs of a desire to acquire the Italian style also—but only as means to an end—not with the selfish aim of satisfying personal vanity. How often has it not been regretted, both publicly and privately, that the choice of arias by our concert singers proves their musical poverty and ignorance! Always the same worn-out arias, the same stereotyped cadenzas, the same ear-breaking high tones, the same sentimental trem o-lizing! If our young singers would only search a little among the rich leaves of the seldom heard Italian, French, and German masters, they would not so soon go out of the "fashion," and we would forgive them a little of their silly "execution." Miss Raymond is at present in the right path, and will not, we trust, wander from it. The Mozart aria she sang finely, and with dramatic truth she gave the great recitative. In the last movement we could have wished for a little more fire; but the miserable accompaniment of the orchestra was anything but encouraging, and had she not been an excellent musician, she could not have carried the aria through in spite of it. In her second aria she was fortunate enough to be really supported by the piano-forte accompaniment of one of our best musicians, Mr. Mosenthal. Miss Raymond had every reason to be satisfied with her success, and the artistic position which she desires as a singer is certain to be hers. We hope to hear her, as she is mistress of the German language, in the songs of Schubert, Schumann, and Robert Franz.

Of the Mozart aria, Otto Jahn says: "The second aria of Vitellia is the pearl of the opera, and unquestionably one of the finest ever written. In a decisive moment, Vitellia resolves to sacrifice her dearest hopes, her life, to the nobler impulses of her soul, whose ambitious striving has been too long directed to a false goal, and raises herself to true greatness thereby. The music characterizes this situation throughout; it becomes a psychological picture which holds its independent signification in itself, and has but a slight connection with the earlier part of the opera, so far as concerns the part of Vitellia. By means of this air, indeed, she steps out of the frame of the opera, and treads the ground of concert music, partly through the introduction of the corno di bassetto, which does not shine by bravura, but is used as a concertizing instrument in response to the voice. Here we have all the elements of perfect unity, the perfect beauty of musical form, while the sharp contrasts of the different motives finely translate the different phases of feeling in detail; and the whole is penetrated with a poetic breath, and is so noble, that the artistic satisfaction it awakens; makes us forget that it is somewhat out of place amid its surroundings in the opera. The introductory recitative is a masterpiece of wonderful expression; and the proud beauty of the aria is filled with deep and heavy melancholy, that ever increases its charm; as, when we gaze on the Niobe, the feeling of pity is transfigured and purified by that of lofty nobleness."

The clever pianist, S. B. MILLS, played two movements from Chopin's F-minor Concerto admirably. His execution is almost blameless. His touch is capable of every shade; and he possesses the certainty and self-possession necessary to play a Concerto. If we have sometimes to find fault with his conception, yet his technical ability is so satisfactory, that it makes us forget in some measure what is lacking in that respect. Mr. Mills has long promised to give soirées of piano-music by classical masters, both old and new. We wish that he would not stay short at promises; he would certainly not fail to obtain the necessary support.

The success of Mr. Thomas's undertaking was encouraging for him. We have seldom seen a more musical and critical audience gathered together. If he could manage to squeeze a few more rehearsals out of his orchestra, (for his players were among our best, so that we should have to attribute failure, not success, to accident), his mission would be satisfactorily fulfilled.

LANCLOT.

(Second Letter from the Same.)

NEW YORK, Dec. 19.—The second Philharmonic Concert took place at the Academy of Music on Saturday evening last. The programme was this: Symphony No. 3, in A minor, Op. 56.....Mendelssohn. Chorus for Male voices, "Die stille Wasserrose".....Abt. German Liederkrans of New York. Under the Direction of Mr. Agricola Paur. Concerto for Violoncello.....F. L. Ritter. Composed for and Dedicated to Mr. F. Bergner. Overture to "The Magic Flute".....Mozart. Chorus for Male voices, "Festgesang an die Künstler".....Mendelssohn. German Liederkrans of New York. Descriptive Overture, "King Lear," in C.....Berlioz. Conductor, Mr. Theo. Eisfeld.

It is so long since we have had a Mendelssohn Symphony on the programme, that the fine "Scotch" one seemed to us almost a novelty—and a very acceptable one. The performance of the orchestra was hardly so careful and refined in some of its shadings as this symphony requires; still the execution was, on the whole, creditable. Strange to say, the lovely "Magic Flute" overture, the marvel of melody and science, was received with almost perfect indifference by the audience. But the sentimental chorus for male voices, by Abt. (well sung, however, by the Liederkrans) was re-demanded. Can it be possible that twenty-three years of Philharmonic concertizing has not yet raised the taste of the New York public above such a stand-point? If this be the rule, and not the exception, then the society must feel but little encouraged in its efforts. Mr. BERGNER played the violoncello Concerto finely. His tone is clear, pure, and full, and he possesses much power of expression, with a rare mastery over his instrument,—and, what is rarer still, a truly earnest and artistic spirit. Berlioz's overture to "King Lear" closed the concert. We like the work much; it opens with a grandiose theme, which, variously treated, leads into a spirited Allegro; the principal motive of this is contrasted with a somewhat tame cantilena, to which, however, much interest is lent by the fine instrumental coloring which is one of Berlioz's peculiar characteristics.

L'homme propose, mais—sometimes engagements interpose. We were sorry we were unable to attend Dr. CUTLER's (so-called) historical concert at Trinity church, which, from all reports, was interesting. Choruses and solos from the best sacred works were performed, besides various organ solos, sacred—and profane. Much good might be accomplished towards the improvement of church music in this city,—for, with some few honorable exceptions, the standard of musical taste in our choirs is at a fearfully low ebb—by more frequent undertakings of this nature.

Italian Opera still goes on at the Academy. "Don Sebastian," by Donizetti, has been the last novelty. The melodies of this opera have less freshness than those of his best compositions, but there are some good dramatic points about the work.

LANCLOT.

(Communicated.)

CHORAL FESTIVAL AT TRINITY CHURCH.

NEW YORK, DEC. 10. The long expected Choral Festival proved so important and interesting that it demands special notice. The inauguration of the new Chancel Organ was made the occasion for the Festival, and it would have been almost impossible to carry it through successfully without the aid of the new organ, which is intended to supplement the Grand Organ in the Choral service of Trinity Church. It is not a large organ; but a very effective one. It has two manuals, of a compass of 4 1-2 octaves, and a Pedal of a compass of 29 keys; and has 24 registers. Though the number of stops is comparatively small, yet the fact that they all run through the manual will show it to be an effective instrument. It was built by Hall & Labagh, after plans by Dr. Cutler. It occupies a position on one side of the chancel, elevated about eight feet from the floor, and is supported by a frame work extending through the stone wall which divides the chancel from the aisle. It has no case, but the larger metal pipes are displayed at full length, both in front and on the sides, and are to be decorated in gold and colors.

The Festival was of a character common in England, but never before introduced in this country. The exercises began on Wednesday, December 7th, at noon, and were performed by a choir of one hundred male voices, mostly boys, being the united choirs of Trinity Church, New York, Holy Trinity, Brooklyn, and Church of the Advent, Boston, under the direction of Dr. CUTLER, the accomplished organist of Trinity. The singers were clad in surplices, after the manner of the choir boys of the Church of England. The first part of the programme was an interesting lecture on music, by Rev. Dr. VINTON, of Trinity Church, which was illustrated by several choral performances of different styles of music, as follows:

1. Gregorian Chant.....Gregory the Great, A. D. 590. "Cantate Domino Novum."
- All voices on the melody, without organ, as in ancient times.
2. German Chorale.....Luther, A. D. 1529.
3. The Angel Trio.....from Mendelssohn's "Elijah."
- Masters Coker, Ehrlich and Grandin, of Trinity Choir.

This was magnificently sung and commanded the most earnest attention of the audience.

4. Chorale.....James Turle.
5. Chant "7th Psalm of the Psalter."
6. Organ Performance.....Selections from Handel's "Israel in Egypt."

In which Mr. George W. Morgan displayed his wonderful command of the pedals.

7. Organ Fantasia. With Pedal Oblivato.....Cutler. Founded on the Rev. John Henry Hopkins's celebrated Carol, "We three Kings of Orient are."

This fantasia was in polyphonic style, in which Dr. Cutler is especially admirable, both as composer and executant.

8. Solo and Chorus.....Handel's "Messiah." "O thou that talkest."
- Solo by Master Grandin.

Contralto of Trinity Choir. Sung in a very clear and effective voice.

9. Duet and Chorus.....Handel's "Judas Maccabæus." "Hail Judea, happy land"
- Duet, by Masters Tate and Jamison.

10. Solo.....Handel's "Samson." "Total Eclipse."
- Mr. Samuel D. Mayer.

Mr. Mayer's clear voice rendered this beautiful solo with excellent effect.

11. Solo.....Handel's "Messiah." "I know that my Redeemer liveth."
- Master Ehrlich.

One of the sopranos of Trinity Choir. Sung with excellent finish and expression.

12. Luther's Judgment Hymn. Organ Accompaniment by Mr. S. P. Taylor, probably the oldest organist in this country.—Born soon after Handel's time.—Now eighty-five years of age.—Began his musical career seventy-six years ago as a choir boy in England.—Has played the organ since the age of twelve.—Came to America in 1806.—Was appointed organist at Christ Church, Ann Street, New York in 1807.—Was the first to introduce the chant in church service in New York.

Part II.

1. Solo.....Handel's "Judas Maccabæus." "Sound an Alarm!"
- Mr. George L. Weeks, Jr.

This was given in a very energetic and effective manner. It was accompanied on the Chancel Organ by Mr. W. H. WALTER, of Trinity Chapel, and on the grand organ by Dr. CUTLER.

2. Solo.....Mendelssohn's "Elijah." "Hear ye, Israel."
- Master Richard Coker, First Soprano Trinity Choir.

This was the most interesting solo of all. Master Coker's beautiful soprano voice created a marked sensation, and was listened to with breathless attention.

3. Air.....from Haydn's "Creation." Mr. George E. Alken.
4. Gloria.....from Haydn's 8d Mass.

The solos were finely rendered by Masters Coker and Pratt, and Messrs. Weeks and Giles.

5. Offertoire, for the Organ (abridged).....L. Wely. Mr. George W. Morgan.
6. Quartet.....from Mendelssohn's "Elijah."

This beautiful Quartet was without accompaniment, and was given with fine feeling and delicate expression. The voices were well balanced.

7. Toccata in F.....Bach. Mr. Charles J. Hopkins.

Here was the true organ music, and justice was done it by Mr. Hopkins. The effect was glorious. If there is an organ in the country which for power and grandeur may dispute the palm with the Great Organ in the Boston Music Hall, it is that of Trinity Church. Let the reader may regard this as an exaggeration let him consider that there are upon the Manuals of this organ six sixteen-foot stops, two of these being 16 feet reeds; besides these, a 32 feet open stop in the Pedals. ["If," indeed.—Ed.]

8. Handel's Grand Hallelujah Chorus.

Accompanied by the full power of both organs, and rendered with splendid power and precision. The vast edifice seemed to surge and rock as wave after wave of the rich music poured into it from the laboring organs and the pealing voices of the choir. It was an admirable and fitting climax to all that had preceded.

The accompaniments on the Grand Organ, whenever it was used in connection with the Chancel Organ, were by Mr. W. H. WALTER, organist of Trinity Chapel, New York.

Though the weather was exceedingly unfavorable, on Wednesday, the church was well filled. It was repeated on Thursday evening, and so great was the desire to attend, that though it was advertised to commence at eight o'clock, at seven every seat and every spot of standing room was occupied; it was estimated that over one thousand persons were unable to gain admission.

For this reason, it was repeated again on Friday evening, and to a crowded audience. It was a notable event in our musical history and will be long remembered by every one who took part in it, or had the pleasure of listening. It is intended to make it an annual Festival, and it will become an important institution; it must have a most pure and healthy influence upon public taste, especially in the matter of Church music. The superiority of a choir of male voices over one of mixed voices, in the elements of unity, precision and energy, must be apparent to every listener. [?—Ed.] The admirable fullness, nerve, and vigor of the boys' voices is the proper counterpart to the solid and substantial timbre of the voices of men.

The responsibility of this Festival has been entirely on the shoulders of Dr. Cutler, and to his untiring zeal and energy is due the credit of it. Those who assisted have faithfully done their best. Their reward will be the remembrance of a true success. * * *

PHILADELPHIA, DEC. 18.—The first soirée of Messrs. WOLFSOHN and THOMAS was a most agreeable affair. The Schumann quartet (piano and strings) was the chief attraction. Mr. Thomas played Vieuxtemps' Concerto Appassionata. Despite fine fine performance, it seemed out of place in a classical concert. The same may be said of Mr. Wolfsohn's "Faust" transcription. A suite of short piano pieces ("Album-Blätter"), by Mr. Wolfsohn, was much admired.

Another active agency in encouraging and improving the taste for good music is the "Philadelphia Quintette Club." This organization was formed early last summer, and consists of Messrs. GARTNER, JARVIS, M. H. CROSS, PLAGEMANN and CHARLES SCHMITZ. Their weekly matinees are well attended, and the enterprise seems successful.

Mr. C. SCHMITZ has been frequently mentioned in these letters as one of our most excellent performers on the violoncello. He was recently elected as conductor of the "Germania Orchestra," vice CARL SENTZ. As Mr. Schmitz is the youngest member of the society, this confidence implies a great compliment. We can only regret that the Germania is the best and largest orchestra we dare boast of. There is certainly enough material among us for the composition of a band larger and better than Mr. Schmitz's orchestra. Why will none of the musical fraternity do something to prove that large orchestral works can be produced in one city. S.

Music Abroad.

Paris.

THEATRE LYRIQUE. The correspondent of the Orchestra, Nov. 1, writes:

M. Carvalho, in resuming the management of this theatre, has completely changed the character of its repertoire, and with the exception of "Faust," and Grétry's "Epreuve Villageoise," seems to count on the importation of the works of Italian and German composers as the surest way to induce the public to patronize his theatre. The first opera he produced, "Rigoletto," was successful; "Don Pasquale" was also favorably received, and his third essay, "Violetta," with Mlle. Nilsen as the heroine, will, I think, encourage him to persevere in his idea.

Mlle. Nilsen is a pupil of M. Wartel, who, many years back, held an honorable position in our opera as the supplement of Adolphe Nourrit. Latterly he has devoted his attention to teaching, and his first pupil was Mlle. Trebelli, now Mlle. Trebelli-Bertini. You see he began well. His second is Mlle. Nilsen, for I can hardly mention his son, who has not voice enough to count as one of the singers of M. Carvalho's troupe, but whose excellent qualities as comedian render him very useful in such parts as Sparafucile, in "Rigoletto," Francotrippe, in "Reine Topaze;" in fact what are technically termed "character" parts. Mlle. Nilsen (country-woman of Madame Lind-Goldschmidt) is very young; only nineteen. She is tall, with fair hair, expressive features, extremely lady-like, and has one of the most beautiful voices (particularly in the upper notes) I have heard for a long time. She was very nervous, and the "Brindisi" was not given so brilliantly as a more experienced artist would have sung it; but she fought bravely against her emotion, and at the end of the first act had made a favorable impression on the audience. This impression increased as the piece went on, and at the end she had achieved a decided success. She sang much better the second time, on Saturday. Some few days ago I expressed a wish that this year might give us some Malibran "en herbe." I'm not quite sure that Mlle. Nilsen will not turn out to be the treasure we seek. If she works carefully, I believe in a great success hereafter. The only objection I have to make is, that I think her a year too young for a Paris theatre. Had she spent some few months in trying her powers in the provinces, I think it would have been wiser. The house was crowded on the first night; and among the persons assembled to witness the début I noticed Mlle. Adelina Patti, and Madame Doche, who first played the part at the Gymnase.

THEATRE ITALIEN. Among the performances of the last month were Roberto Devereux, with Fraschini, Delle Sedie and Mme. De la Grange; L'Elisir d'Amore, with Adelina Patti, Naudin and Scialese (whom some call the best buffo since Lablache); Rigoletto, Il Barbiere, Traviata, and Don Giovanni, of which the Musical World's correspondent says:

On Sunday Don Giovanni was given at the Italiens with the following cast:—Donna Anna, Madame Lagrange; Elvira, Mlle. Vanderbeck; Zerlina, Mlle. Adelina Patti; Don Giovanni, Signor Delle-Sedie; Ottavio, Signor Baragli; Leporello, Signor Scialese; the Commendatore, Signor Antonucci. Take away Mlle. Patti, Signor Scialese, and perhaps Mlle. Vanderbeck, whose Elvira was more than respectable, and the cast is literally below criticism, and quite unworthy of the Italian Opera of Paris. I did not witness the performance on Sunday, but shall attend the next, were it for nothing else than to hear and see Mlle. Patti in Zerlina, which is adorable. The Sisters Marchisio appear shortly in Semiramide.

BRIGNOLI—our spoiled tenor—after hissing discomfort in Spain, which they say was undeserved—made a successful debut Nov. 27th in Marta; Patti singing the part of "mi-lady;" Mme. Meric-Lablache, that of Nancy, and Delle-Sedie and Scialese the other male parts. Patti was to sing also in Linda, and as Ninetta in La Gazza Ladra.

GRAND OPERA. The new piece, Roland à Roncevaux, by M. Metmel, appears to hold its ground, and has had frequent repetitions, breaking the never-ending round of the Meyerbeer, Halévy and Rossini Grand-Opera works par excellence. Of these, during November, there came round La Juive, with Villaret as the Jew, Obin, the Cardinal, Mlle. Sax, Rachel, Mlle. de Taisy, the princess, and Warot, as the prince; Guillaume Tell, Le Trouvère (Trovatore) with Mlle. Sax and Sannier, MM. Morère and Dumestre; Huguenots (Sax, Morère, Obin and Faure); Rossini's Comte Ory, and on the same evening the first performance of a Conservatory prize Cantata, Ivanhoe, by M. Sieg, pupil of Ambrose Thomas.—The Orchestra correspondent has had a peep at Meyerbeer's mysterious posthumous "L'Africaine," now under rehearsal, and lets this much of the cat out of the bag:

In Act 1 the scene is laid in Lisbon, and we find Inès (Mlle. Marie Battu) deploring the loss of her lover, Vasco di Gama. She is confirmed in her belief in his death by her father, L'Amiral (M. Castelmary), and her future husband, Don Pedro (M. Belval), for whom (he being a basso) she has not the slightest affection. (Did you ever hear of a basso who was successful in his love-making? I except of course Peters in the "Etoile du Nord," but even he is now played by a baritone.)

Vasco di Gama is not dead; he has returned from his voyage, and in the finale we find the Grand Inquisiteur and other wise men of Lisbon assembled under the presidency of Don Pedro to discuss the plans he proposes for a second voyage. He recounts his travels, tells of the countries he has discovered, and the perils he has passed through; and to prove the truth of his statement, he brings forward, as witnesses, two captives: Celika, Queen of Madagascar (Mlle. Saxe), and Nelusko (M. Faure). They, however, disappoint his expectations, and refuse to say a single word. The council in a scene of great confusion, some being for and some against Vasco, proceed to vote; and the result proclaimed by Don Pedro (who intends turning his rival's discoveries to his own advantage), is unfavorable to our hero. He, forgetting the respect due to the court, abuses his judges, and is recompensed by a most effective anathème pronounced against him by the Grand Inquisiteur.

In the second act, Vasco is in prison. He sleeps; and in his dreams pronounces the name of Inès, much to the sorrow of Celika, who, notwithstanding her attack of muteness in the previous act, is devotedly attached to him. Nelusko enters, designing to revenge himself on Vasco by taking his life. The air sung by Faure in this situation is one of the great effects of the two acts now ready, and will become classic in the Baritone repertoire. Vasco awakes, and this would be assassin retires in confusion. Our traveller's thoughts dwell continually on his voyages, and he draws a rude map of his discoveries on his prison wall. Celika, who observes him attentively, and who appears to have a natural genius for geography, corrects the faults of his design, and points out the real track he has until now sought in vain, and he in his thankfulness tells her he loves her (of course the "je t'aime"), and we have the necessary "situation" for a love duet. Inès and Don Pedro, attended by Nelusko, arrive just in time to witness the end of this tender scene. Inès tells her lover that she has married Don Pedro in order to secure his liberation from captivity. Vasco declares that he has never loved but her; that Celika is only a slave, and that he gives her into her power. Don Pedro, who has also something to say, announces that he is named by the Council chief of the expedition which Vasco had promised to undertake, and the second act ends with a finale in which the despair of Inès and her lover are the most prominent features.

The song at the commencement of the opera in which Inès mourns the loss of her lover is thoroughly German in character, and is one of the most charming "Lieder" I have ever heard. A well written terzetto for Inès, her father, and Don Pedro follows; but the great effect of the first act is in the finale. It begins with a march as fine as that of the "Prophète," which is followed by a phrase sung in unison by the basses, which plays a great part throughout the finale, and is worked out with all the science for which Meyerbeer was so distinguished. We have Vasco's grand recitative, the anathème, and the act finishes with a well written and exciting allegro. In the second act I noticed a berceuse for Celika, the second part of which, sung when she hears Vasco pronounce in his sleep the name of Inès, is by its passionate character in strong opposition to the quiet charm of the opening phrase. I have already mentioned the great effect of Faure's air. In the finale there are a fine sextuor without accompaniment and a well written strette; and the act concludes with a new effect, an unaccompanied ensemble which (unlike "La Caltunnia" in Rossini's "Barbiere") va diminuendo until the curtain falls. Every one is doing his best to make the execution worthy of the great composer. The two chefs de service, MM. Vanthrot and Victor Massé, are indefatigable. M. Naudin is working hard to rid himself of his Italian accent, and no doubt when the opera is ready for the public our new tenor will be quite equal to the difficult task he has undertaken.

PARIS POPULAR CONCERTS.—A correspondent of the London Musical World, writes:

"Being in Paris last Sunday, the 6th inst., I attended the "Concert Populaire" of classical music, given at the Cirque Napoléon, under the direction of M. Pasdeloup. It is now four years since M. Pasdeloup so successfully inaugurated these Sunday afternoon concerts; and the one I am going to notice was the third of the first series of the present season. The following was the programme:—

Overture, "Ruler of the Spirits".....Weber.
Symphony in G minor.....Mozart.
Allegretto un poco agitato (Lobengang).....Mendelssohn.
Concerto in B flat (No. 2).....Beethoven.
Suite in D, for Orchestra.....Franz Lachner.

I was agreeably surprised to find a closely packed audience of nearly 4000 persons, listening with the most religious attention from first to last, to a kind of music with which certainly they are not familiar, and showing, throughout, real judgment in their manifestations of approval. The orchestra over which M. Pasdeloup presides is both numerous and efficient, and I was particularly pleased with the precision and brilliancy of the stringed instruments. The double basses especially (twelve in number) appeared to me strikingly sonorous. The flutes, oboes, and clarinets on the contrary, I found rather weak, and altogether not to be compared with the performers in our London orchestras. Weber's overture was correctly played, but lacked spirit and enthusiasm. Mozart's symphony went better, although the andante was taken provokingly quick. The minuet, however, made amends, and pleased so much that it was vociferously encored. The beautiful movement in G minor from Mendelssohn's symphony to the Lobengang, was taken a shade too fast, and was rather deficient in accent and color. A repetition, nevertheless, was unanimously called for, and granted accordingly. Beethoven's easy, but not the less acceptable, piano-forte concerto was the most complete and satisfactory performance of the whole concert, firstly because M. Ritter really played it to perfection (introducing a clever and effective cadenza of his own); and, secondly, because it was splendidly accompanied by the orchestra. M. Ritter was greatly applauded at the end of each movement, and after the finale was rewarded by a general call, in which the orchestra joined. Of F. Lachner's Suite, the variations had the lion's share, being the most attractive part of the work, and meeting with a very animated performance on the part of the orchestra. As conductor, M. Pasdeloup seems very zealous and painstaking, though at times he is over anxious and gets fidgety in consequence. His readings are generally correct enough, but mostly wanting in refinement.

DRESDEN.—Here is the programme of the whole series of the six monthly subscription Concerts by the Royal Capelle (orchestra), beginning October 26th :

Among the works performed will be, at the First Concert : Overture to Anacreon, Cherubini ; "Suite," No. 2 (E minor) Franz Lachner (first time) ; Sinfonia Eroica (No. 3, E flat major), L. v. Beethoven.—Second Concert : Overture to Byron's Manfred, R. Schumann ; Serenade, composed in 1779 at Salzburg ; Mozart (first time of performance ; this work is at present entirely unknown) ; Concert-Overture (A major), J. Rietz ; Symphony (D major), J. Haydn.—Third Concert : Symphony (D minor), R. Volkmann (first time) ; Overture to Die Schöne Melusine, Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy ; Concert-Overture (D minor), F. Heller (first time) ; Symphony (No. 1, C major), L. v. Beethoven.—Fourth Concert : Overture, Op. 124, L. v. Beethoven ; Symphony (A major), C. Reinecke (first time) ; Concert-Overture (D major), F. Grützmacher (first time) ; Symphony (D major), Joseph Haydn, No. 33 of Simrock's edition.—Fifth Concert : Symphony (F major), Theodore Gouvy (first time ; Overture, Scherzo, and Finale, R. Schumann ; Symphony (No. 3, A minor, Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy.—Sixth Concert : Overture ("Im Hochland" N. W. Gade ; Symphony (No. 1, C major), C. M. von Weber ; Overture to Rom-munda, F. Schubert ; and Symphony (No. 4 B flat major), L. v. Beethoven.

LEIPZIG.—Classical Leipzig has been wandering after strange gods, going into a furor about Ullman's blazing posters and his Carlotta Patti concerts. Shades of Bach and Mendelssohn, what are we coming to ! "All we like sheep have gone astray !" Luckily a day of repentance was at hand ; the good old Saxon autumnal Bussstag (i. e. Fast Day), which was improved (so writes the Orchestra man) after this manner :

On the Bussstag itself, as is here the custom, the Riedelscher Verein gave a concert of sacred music in the Thomas Church. Herr Riedel may have thought that our constitutions were so enervated by the Patti dissipation of the previous days that nothing but a strong course of Bach could restore their tone ; for the programme was entirely selected from the works of that uncompromising composer, who himself, though, dearly loved a trip to Dresden to hear the "pretty Italian songs." The specimens selected were the "Magnificat," the cantata, "Gottes Zeit ist die allerbeste Zeit," and the Second Part of the "Weihnachts-Oratorium." The unfavorable position of the orchestra and the bad acoustical properties of the Thomas Church are even more painfully perceptible in the elaborate part-writing of Bach than in the broader style of Handel. Few of Bach's works are more elaborate than this five-part "Magnificat," for to these five voice parts a most complicated orchestral accompaniment is added, the instruments themselves being sometimes divided into two, at times even into three, choirs. The performance, mainly, perhaps, owing to the above-mentioned causes, was most unsatisfactory. But some parts still showed how grand they might be if heard under favorable conditions.

The "Weihnachts-Oratorium" is a collection of six cantatas written for the festivals at Christmas, New Year, and the Epiphany. Bach could never write a piece of music at any length without some amount of complication ; but, as a whole, the "Weihnachts-Oratorium" is less elaborate and more genial than many of his larger works. It also offers a striking instance of the great Cantor's prudent economy. In his time hardly any festive event was celebrated without the aid of music, and composers were continually called upon to provide occasional compositions, which, as is, and has been, the fate of such works, enjoyed (and deserved) the most ephemeral existence. Bach was not content to compose worthless music, even to oblige a crowned head ; still less to allow his work to fall into oblivion. He set himself to the task with a will, and generally, although the texts he had to set to were anything but inspiring, succeeded in producing a masterpiece. But how was a piece written for a special occasion to survive for future generations ? Bach went very simply to work ; he merely struck out the old text, and with little or no alteration of the music, except, perhaps, occasional transpositions and changes of obligato instruments, substituted a new text suitable to some church festival. Such proceedings were only possible at a time when the distinction between church and secular music was so little marked. No less than eleven of the most important numbers of the "Weihnachts-Oratorium" owe their origin to occasional cantatas in praise of various royal personages. The portion heard in this performance treats of the Angelic vision of the Shepherds. The Pastoral Symphony is most lovely ; the orchestra is divided into two groups, one consisting of flutes, strings, and organ, the other of two oboi d'amore and two oboi da caccia, now represented by clarinets and "English horns ;" these two choirs respond to and mix with each other, but always keep their own character. Very sweet and soothing is the alto air "Schlofe mein liebster," in which the four oboes are again employed ; few more tender cradle songs have ever been written. The "Angels' Hymn" is a noble composition. In the last number, a choral, the four oboes bring in, as a counterpoint, the subject of the opening symphony. The whole oratorio would be too long for performance, but a most interesting selection might be made from it ; it would show the master in his most amiable, as well as in his learned humor. The solo singers were Fräulein Alvsleben and Frau Krebs ; Michalesi of Dresden, Herr Schild of Leipzig, and Herr Krause of Berlin. They all acquitted themselves satisfactorily ; of the chorists I have already spoken. The orchestra could hardly be recognized as that which plays in the Gewandhaus, so deleterious is the effect of the locality. When will wealthy Leipzig build a proper concert room ?

DRESDEN.—The Dresden Theatre has been trying an interesting experiment—the performance of Sophocles, great trilogy, on three successive evenings. The first tragedy "Oedipus," was given with Lachner's music ; the others, "Oedipus in Colonus" and "Antigone," with Mendelssohn's. Some friends who were at the second concert of the Dresden Court orchestra speak of a serenade by Mozart, composed in 1779, but only now publicly performed, as an unlucky experiment in exhumation, the work being tedious and without a spark of the Mozart fire. The orchestra, they add, is not to be compared with that of the Gewandhaus.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, DEC. 24, 1864.

Mendelssohn Quintette Club.

SIXTEENTH SEASON.

A fine clear winter evening, a rarity in these times, favored the opening of a new series of classical chamber concerts. Right welcome was the opportunity, for some time deferred and doubtful, to not a few who hardly know how to pass a winter without any hearing of the Quartets, Quintets, Trios, of Mozart, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, &c. We are sorry that our friends of the Quintette Club felt obliged to begin so timidly, announcing only half as many concerts as they used to do in better times, when they occurred once a fortnight. Now the promise is of four monthly feasts. So few, and far between, they ought to be very good ones ; so choice in programme, in style and feeling of interpretation, and in the quality of the outside assistance, as to really satisfy the exacting few who can always be relied upon to show an interest in such concerts when they are up to the mark, and to radiate abroad some new and more wide-spread enthusiasm for the thing. Last Tuesday's experiment was measurably successful. The audience at Chickering's was more than middling, though not so large as we could wish to see ; nor did it contain nearly all of just the persons whom one likes to see. The Club, so far as their own performance went, seemed to have studied well to do their best, and in their rendering of the two main articles, the Quintet and the Quartet, were at least well up to the more creditable records of their fifteen years' experience. The concomitant "attractions" (to speak after the manner of managers) were more or less potent and rewarding as they chimed in with the tone and temper of this, that and the other individual listener. Let the programme tell the story.

1. 15th Quintet, in C Minor—in four parts.....Onslow.
  1. Moderato espressivo.
  2. Presto (Dellre).
  3. Andante (Convalescenza).
  4. Allegro Vivace (Guarigione—Recovery).
2. Songs, "Supplication" and "Summer".....Robert Franz.
  - Miss Addie S. Ryan.
3. Rondo Brillant, for Piano and Violin.....Frans Schubert.
  - Allice Dutton and Wm. Schultz.
4. Song, "The Cottage," No. 1. Op. 119. Robert Schumann,
  - Miss Addie S. Ryan.
5. Scherzo, in B flat Minor, for Piano Solo.....Chopin.
  - Allice Dutton.
6. 13th Quartet, in B flat. Op. 130.....Beethoven.
  1. Adagio non troppo and allegro.
  2. Presto.
  3. Andante con moto ma non troppo.
  4. Allegro Assai—Alla danza tedesca.
  5. Adagio con molto espressione—Cavatina.
  6. Finale—Allegro.

The great feature of this concert was, of course, that second of the six so-called "posthumous" Quartets of Beethoven. As long as we could have that alone, we had no right to complain. The Club first introduced it to us four years ago, when they played it twice ; since then they have suffered it to remain silent, while they have given us some first tastes of the next in order of those great and wonderful tone-poems, the Quartet in C-sharp minor. Who was not glad to come back to this one in B flat again ? It is the more readily appreciable of the two ; at least, the more engaging at a number of points which are pretty sure to take hold of the listener and carry him along with wonder and delight. If we could judge by our own feeling, and by that sort of still magnetic sense of sympathy which one always has in a like-minded audience, the power and beauty of the work as a whole were generally felt and owned, however imperfectly it was understood. To know and understand such a work fairly, is only possible after many closely attentive hearings and in happy moments. It is no small credit to the skill and unanimity with which the performers dealt with this difficult problem, that they secured such continuous and pleased attention throughout the six important movements. The first movement is a perpetual struggle and alternation between two moods, the sombre, musing Adagio, and impatient snatches of Allegro, in which one of the four parts by a sort of pointed challenge seems to set the others whirling off in mad roudades ; these two moods dispute the field a long time. What does it mean ? Why ask ? The Presto in B-flat minor is exceedingly bright and light and humorous ; and the way that the Trio thereof (in the major) seems to weep itself down through several chromatic scales, in the upper violin, back to the minor theme, is strangely original. The long Andante (No. 3) is most crowded with meaning and with original traits of beauty, as well as most complicated in its polyphonic structure, its interweaving and offsetting of voices, its restless refinement of rhythmical variation. Yet what a unity you feel in it, what a hold it keeps on you ! What a richness of soul in it ! Surely loneliness and deafness had their compensation ! Again the mood shifts from serious to gay ; the Danza Tedesca, German dance, is so exquisitely graceful, with such a swing to it, that you are at once among the Bürschen and the Mädchen joining hands and swinging with the music. What remarkable variations it takes on too, as it waxes more excited ; how the quick semiquaver figure of the violin keeps widening its intervals, like the widening circles of a top wobbling off its centre ; think of the caprice of letting the upper violin, going on in this swift figure, suddenly dip once from the G in alt to G below the lines, three octaves, and back again ! No wonder the other parts just touch a note here and there breathlessly, in their effort to keep up. And then the dance retreats in fragments out of hearing, like the waltz in Frey-schütz. The Adagio (No. 5) has a heavenly depth, serenity and fulness; and then the Allegro Finale goes off happy and jubilant, with a sort of pastoral contentedness; some marked phrases, especially one that runs along in the bass, recalling well-known features in the Pastoral Symphony.

The Quintet by Onslow undertakes a like variety and contrast of expression, but how much more consciously and superficially! We liked the first and third movements best; especially the third, which treats of "convalescence," and by its rich, tranquil harmony, relieves the not very edifying "delirium" of the Presto.

Miss ALICE DUTTON, "the child pianist," pupil of Mr. Lang, has most remarkable execution and musical memory for a child. If this were not the age of "wonder children," it would have been astounding to hear her play that Scherzo of Chopin so correctly, clearly, with instantaneous firm grasp of its crowded chords, with due regard to contrast, and entirely without notes. So too in the Schubert Rondo with Mr. SCHULTZE. Extraordinary for a child; but then these things are not child music. They belong to the deeper experiences of adults. No child can feel them, or do more than imitate their outward expression from some model;—at least, except in the cases of rare spiritual precocity and genius. There was nothing to show that this precocity was anything more than mechanical, executive, this expression anything more than imitation. The inevitable consequence is, that a real lover of such music misses the soul of it in any such rendering, however remarkable in a technical point of view. What deeper and more inward qualities are yet to develop themselves in this young girl, we may not conjecture; but now it looks very much as if all composers, all music of all moods, were pretty much alike to her, and that the docility and energy and skill we see were merely gymnastic. It is well to learn all that, and we hope it is laying the foundation for much more in due time. But we do not believe in bringing child players before the public, for their own sakes; while, for the sake of classical music and classical audiences, we think the Quintette cannot hold their own by bringing in the aid of "wonder children" instead of artists. The selection of the music, however, showed the best intention. So did the selection of Miss RYAN's songs. She sang the two by Franz better than that by Schumann, especially the first one: "Weil auf mir, du dunkles Auge. Her voice grows richer and more sympathetic, with a little too much still of the unmodulated all-open organ tone. The songs required a finer and less mechanical accompaniment.

The second concert will take place on Tuesday evening, Jan. 17.

Otto Dresel's Concerts.

Mr. DRESSEL must have the feeling of success, both with himself and with his audience; such success as does not always crown effort so high and uncompromising. His last two concerts came upon the stormiest and worst of nights; and yet all were there, and many more. The last time, Chickering's Hall was more than comfortably filled.—The programme of the third Concert (Dec. 10) was as follows:

1. Concerto for Three Pianos in C major... J. S. Bach.
2. Pastoral Symphony from the Christmas Oratorio, J. S. Bach.
3. Concerto... Rob. Schumann.
4. Intermezzo and "Phantasietück"... Otto Dresel.
- Impromptu, E flat... Ferd. Hiller.
5. Larghetto, from 2nd Symphony... Beethoven.
6. "Novelette," E major... Rob. Schumann.
- Liszt's Transcription of "Der Schalk," Song by Rob. Franz.
- "Child falling asleep" from the "Kinderszenen" Schumann.
- Liszt's transcription of "Der Bote," Song by Rob. Franz.
7. Adagio and Finale from Second Concerto... Chopin.

The selections from Bach and from the Chopin Concerto were repetitions from the two first concerts. The triple Concerto was played by the same three pianists (Messrs. LANG, LEONHARD, and PARKER), and with the same admirable artist unity and true feeling as before, Mr. Dresel playing the string accompaniments on a fourth piano. We need not say that it was keenly relished. Still more so the Pastoral Symphony; that leaped into popularity at once. The two pianos (Dresel and Leonhard) embodied, we suppose, the two contrasted groups of orchestral instruments described in the account of a Fast Day concert in Leipzig (in Bach's own Thomas-Kirche) in another column.

The principal novelty of the evening was the Concerto by Schumann (orchestral accompaniments on a second piano), which is a work of great reach and remarkable interest. It is as brilliant as it is genial, taxing the powers of the pianist to the utmost. The first and last movements may have seemed long to many; and indeed they are long, considering to what an intense pitch the appassionato is strained up. But the lovely Intermezzo is a most refreshing rest between the two; and there are charming and original side thoughts and surprises in the midst of the two long fiery movements, especially that staccato chord theme in the first, which relieve the strain. The execution was masterly.

Of the smaller piano pieces, none seemed to give greater satisfaction than the two of Mr. Dresel's own composition; dainty thoughts moulded into perfect form. The Novelette by Schumann, was a most acceptable repetition. Liszt is the master of masters in the art of transcription of songs, making the piano at the same time sing the song, clothe it with its own accompaniment, and illustrate it with significant embellishment which is the true reflection of its own poetic spirit. It is here, we think, that we find Liszt's genius, rather than in his large efforts at original production. "Symphonies-Poetiques," or what not. It is to his credit that he so appreciates and loves to illustrate the songs of Franz. Nothing could be more exquisitely fine and truthful than his æolian harp-like embellishments of the song "Der Bote," which means "The Messenger;" the maiden hangs her cytherea at the door, and tells the night breeze to creep over its strings and bear the tones away over the hills to her sweetheart. It was played to a charm.

Mr. Dresel finds great enjoyment in arranging choice movements of Symphonies, &c., for the piano. And few musicians can do it so well, retaining and reproducing so much of the essential instrumentation; in fact, giving a faithful and effective line engraving, as it were, of the masterpiece of painting. We have heard orchestras play that Larghetto of the 2nd Symphony when we have realized its beauty less. After such a study, you will hear it from an orchestra the next time with a new interest and a more clairvoyant sense.

This was the programme of the fourth concert:

1. Concerto... Rob. Schumann
2. Mazourka, B major, op. 66... Chopin.
- Etude, G flat... Chopin.
- Mazourka, B minor, op. 68... Chopin.
- Impromptu, F sharp... Chopin.
3. Brakowiak, Rondo... Chopin.
- (Orchestral accompaniment for a Second Piano).
4. Sonata, D minor... Beethoven.
- Allegro appassionato. Adagio. Finale.
5. "Kinderszenen," Etude... Moscheles.
- Liszt's Transcription of the Hungarian March, by Schubert.
6. Recitativo and Finale from Second Concerto... Chopin.

This time, for a variety, nothing of Bach. The old fellow will be the more eagerly welcomed the next time. In place of him we had the splendid Schumann Concerto again, placed at the beginning, while all were fresh, so that its length did not dull the sensibility to its beauties. And, better still, what almost everybody would have asked for had he dared, a Beethoven Sonata,—one of the most thoroughly poetic and romantic of them all, that Sonata in D minor, concerning which and the other in F minor called the "Appassionata," Beethoven said to some one curious about the origin: "Read Shakespeare's Tempest." How much of the "Tempest" may be traced in it, depends on the ingenuity or fancy of the student. All that we feel with certainty is, that the spirit of the music and the spirit of the play are one; they leave a wonderfully like feeling in the mind. It is the same sort of enchantment, though the language and the action differ. How wild, tempestuous and billowy, how full of awe and marvel, is the first part! You may fancy, if you please, that you hear the pleading voice of Miranda in those human bits of recitative after the repeat. The stately, full-fraught, deep Adagio is at least in keeping with the wisdom and moral majesty of Prospero, and the sublime sentences oft quoted from his lips. The Finale is the airiest of inspirations, graceful and fine and free as Ariel. But it is idle to carry the correspondence into any detail. Never have we heard the Sonata so poetically rendered as it was, its delicate life so clearly liberated from all clogging thought of notes or mechanism; and we are sure that to the greatest number that was the most quickening and most satisfying thing of the whole evening. Chopin's "Krakowiak" lost nothing of its piquancy and brightness by this repetition.

The four smaller pieces by Chopin were delightful. The Etude in G flat, a rapid, sparkling figure carried through in octaves, seems to play upon the walls like dancing sun-gleams from the water. The Impromptu, in F sharp, with its thoughtful opening in which the chord of the ninth is so characteristic, then the sudden change to a bold martial motive in D, then the rapid, liquid, running variation, surprised and charmed alike by its originality and by the masterly perfection of the execution.

The glory of these concerts goes out with the old year,—but, like that, to be renewed, we trust. Mr. Dresel's fifth and last concert, skipping Christmas Eve, will be given on Saturday evening, Dec. 31.

CHRISTMAS MUSIC. True to the good old custom, the Handel and Haydn Society will perform Handel's "Messiah," not only this evening (Christmas Eve), but to-morrow (evening of Christmas) also. And to add interest to repetition, they have engaged different solo singers for the two performances. To-night we have the old favorite and Queen of Boston Oratorio, Mrs. ELLIOT, (formerly Miss ANNA STOWE) in the great soprano solos; there will be great interest to hear her voice after so many years of residence in another city; also that delightful singer, Mrs. M. H. SMITH, Miss RYAN, contralto, Mr. WHEELER, tenor, and Mr. WHITNEY, bass. To-morrow evening, these (except Mr. Wheeler) will be replaced by Mrs. LONG (another of the long withdrawn), Mrs. J. S. CARY and Mr. RUDOLPHSEN. ZERRAHL conducts, as usual, and LANG rolls in the floods of the Great Organ behind the mighty choruses; SCHULTZE will lead the orchestra.

"OUR YOUNG FOLKS." Here it is! Number One, January, 1865, of the Illustrated Monthly Magazine for Boys and Girls, which Ticknor & Fields have been promising to Young America. And it comes with such a radiant, handsome, happy, wholesome, generous face, so full of intelligence and entertainment, so trustworthy and good, so moral without intrusive sentimental moralism, that all we children, young and old, feel we have got a new friend. Blessed be they, and are they, who know how to write for children. And here the "Atlantic" publishers have brought them together and set them to work under the inspiration of the pleasantest surroundings; for what an attractive exterior the young Monthly has! how elegant in paper and print, how beautifully and copiously illustrated, by the best designers, such as Darley, how tasteful and refined in its whole aspect, (assuming, very properly, that all American children shall be young gentlemen and ladies); and then how large and generous in quantity! The vignette on the outside is really artistic. Inside we have a fine steel portrait, full length, of a capital friend of boys, the author of "School days at Rugby." Then there are fairy and giant pictures, patriotic pictures, pictures of travel and adventure, &c., &c., illustrating admirable articles.

Mrs. Beecher Stowe leads off with a pretty narrative called "Hum, the son of Buz." Lucy Larcom sings the young "Volunteer's Thanksgiving," brave and glad-hearted, though away from home and turkeys. "Thumbling," of course, is little Thumb, and of course, outwits a giant and marries the king's daughter; this purports to come from the Finnish. Gail Hamilton overhears and tells the life of the little people of Leaf-land, under the title of "The Red Coats." J. T. Trowbridge's patriotic little poem, "The Color Bearer," has poetry and vigor. Dr. Dio Lewis gives good hints about health, with pictures of boys in all sorts of postures. Carleton begins "Winning his Way," which as a real live boys' story would be hard to beat. But we cannot name all, and there is Mrs. L. M. Child yet to come; and Miss Allcott, and Rose Terry, and Whittier, the poet, and no end of wise and clever and counsellors and entertainers, bards and sages and romancers, whose own hearts are fresh and childlike.

We are almost alarmed to find ourselves enjoying 's young Magazinery so much; it makes us suspect ourselves too near the second childhood of old age. But is it not the best test of such story-telling that, while it interests the children directly, it interests grown people indirectly and directly too? Here is a happy hit for a beginning, we are sure. The book is as good as music; it rings with the frank, fresh, merry voices of children; it is brave and wholesome in its tone; it has the sparkle and the sweetness of clear cold winter days; and therefore is well-come at Christmas!

MISCELLANEOUS CONCERTS; BIRDS OF PASSAGE. (Crowded out last time). The list recorded as in prospect, in our last, furnished a few pleasant notes.

1. We gladly recognized a most agreeable baritone in Mr. CAMPBELL; a rich, telling, unctuous voice, with ripe and easy style, and a certain aplomb, both in singing and in personal bearing, which we are sure would make their mark in the best comic operas. Mr. CASTLE's tenor, too, has gained in firmness, evenness and roundness, and he sings so well that we try in vain to recall an American tenor who can dispute the palm with him. Miss STOCKTON was not in voice; and the selections were quite humdrum: Verdi, Verdi, Balfe, Balfe, Verdi, Balfe, and so on.

2. Sig. MORRELLI (one of the few good Don Giovanni) is an excellent baritone, especially in comic pieces like Figaro's Largo al Factotum. Miss LUCY

SIMONDS, young and slender, both in voice and person, has a very flexible and rather high soprano, trained to great agility in florid airs like Qui la voce, the Faust waltz, &c., but distressingly afflicted with the chronic tremolo, screaming in the highest tones; true in intonation; style mechanical. And we must protest against such heavy and mechanical accompaniment as Sig. MUZIO's; how can a delicate wildflower of song thrive under such hard wheeling of the dusty highway! Mr. GOTTSCHALK was as usual.

3. We own to being much charmed by the singing of Miss LAURA HARRIS. A youthful, pretty, petite person, she has a small, but musical, penetrating, and so to speak, elastic soprano voice, always true, and with very facile and expressive execution; and she sings as if she dearly loved it, from a bird-like uncontrollable impulse of song. Her manner is uncommonly natural. Miss BLANCHER CARPENTER, too, a pupil of Wm. Mason, surprised us by the remarkable perfection of her pianism. And Mr. FARLEY, from Dublin, for some time in the German Opera, a man who looks not unlike Salvi, showed himself, in Il mio tesoro, much more than an average tenor; a sweet, firm voice, and refined style. Boston desires more of their acquaintance.

WORCESTER, MASS.—The Spy understands that arrangements have been completed for a series of five grand choral concerts at Mechanics Hall during the present winter, which will bring out the great power, beauty, and variety of the Worcester Organ, in connection with a heavy chorus. Four of the series will be given under the auspices of the Worcester Mozart Society, and one by other eminent musical talent. The Mozart Society will perform Handel's Oratorio of the Messiah at Christmas, and the Oratorio of the Creation on the evening of our annual Fast, with full organ accompaniments by Mr. B. J. Lang, organist of the Boston Handel and Haydn Society. The intervening concerts will be of a miscellaneous character, yet of the same high order of merit as those first named. The programmes will contain a great variety of choruses, quartets, duets, solos, and organ pieces from Beethoven, Handel, Haydn, Mozart, and other distinguished composers.

PHILADELPHIA. The last programme of the Germania Orchestra "Rehearsals" was as follows:

1. Overture, Le Roi d'Yvetot. . . . . Adam.
2. Song, Parting, Cornet Solo. . . . . Boettger.
3. Waltz, Hymen's Festive Sounds. . . . . Lanner.
4. Second Part of Symphony No 2 . . . . . Beethoven.
5. Overture, Melusina. . . . . Mendelssohn.
6. Second Finale from the Merry Wives of Windsor. . . . . Nicolai.
7. Galop, Ching Kong. . . . . Toller.

CINCINNATI. The first "Concert de Salon" of Messrs. KUNKEL and HAHN took place Dec. 8. Their programme contained Beethoven's piano and violin Sonata, No. 1, op 12; tenor solo, "Thro' the forests," from Freyschutz, sung by Mr. E. M. Powers; Liszt's 2nd Polonaise (in E); Prume's La Melancholie (violin solo); three piano solos (Jaell's arrangement of the everlasting "Faust" march, a Gondellied of Mendelssohn, a Danse rustique of Schullhoff); a cello solo, "Last Rose," &c., by Matter M. Brand; tenor song, "The Recognition," by Proch, and Trio (piano, violin and cello) by De Berliot.

ST. LOUIS PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY. The second concert, under the direction of E. SOBOLAWSKI, was given Nov. 24, with this programme: Overture to La Gazza Ladra; Chorus "All we like sheep," Handel; Mendelssohn's D-minor Concerto (piano); Septet from Lortzing's "Two Hunters;" Overture to "The Secret Judges" (Vehmgericht), by Berlioz; Introduction and Bridal chorus from Lohengrin; Adagio and Minuet from Haydn's Symphony, No. 8; Cavatina by Mercadante; Finale of "Autumn" in Haydn's "Seasons."

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC. Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

I'm a child of the mountain. Song. W. Kittredge. 30
Destined to be very popular. It is in the compass of almost every voice, is simple and easy, and yet spirited.

Taploca. Minstrel melody. E. Warden. 30
A jolly negro song, more like those that are really sung at the south than the generality. The words are nonsense of course, but the music is very taking.

A horrible tale of the suicidal family. E. L. Blanchard. 30
A "horrible tale" surely, intended as a solemn warning to us all, not to have the blues. The music is striking and animated.

Make your home beautiful. Song and Chorus. H. S. Chandler. 30
A plan for beautifying home with flowers and all other refining things that can surround it. The poem is capital, and the music well adapted to the words.

Three fishers went out sailing into the west. F. Boott. 30
Kinsley's well-known poem, set to music.
The black friar. Song for Alto and Barytone. F. Boott. 30
Like the above, a song that may not take perfectly on its first appearance, but improve on acquaintance, and likely to have a lasting reputation.

Instrumental Music.

Morgenblätter Walzer. (Morning journals waltzes). J. Strauss. 60
A set of brilliant dances, in Strauss' best style.

Overture to "Poet and Peasant." Four hands. Fr. von Suppe. 1.00
A good overture to an opera not generally known. It is not difficult, and is excellent practice. Its novelty also recommends it.

Three offertories for the organ. Eugene Thayer. 50
Grand offertoire de concert. 30
La Priere. Offertoire for bassoon. 30
La Meditation. Offertoire for vox humana. 30
Three very acceptable additions to our musical literature. The vox humana and bassoon are not as yet common stops in our organ, but the melodies prepared for them can be very well played upon corresponding stops. Send for the piece, and introduce them in your course of voluntaries.

Books.

THE MODERN SCHOOL FOR THE ORGAN.—A new, progressive, and practical method. In three parts. No. 1; History and description of the Organ; elementary instruction and voluntaries in all styles, (without pedals.) No. 2. Pedal playing. No. 3. Combinations of stops; voluntaries, and pieces suited to all occasions. By John Zundel. $4.00

A new edition of this standard work, brings it again under the eye of the reviewer. It has been a noted book from the time of its first publication, and is valuable to any organist. The parts may be had separately, at $2.00 each.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 620.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JAN. 7, 1865.

VOL. XXIV. No. 21.

Music at the Foundling Chapel, London.

[The following is one of a series of articles. In the Orchestra, on "Church Music in London."

Some apology may be necessary in an article ostensibly on London Church Music, for the discursiveness of the following remarks; but the Foundling Hospital has been so long and so intimately connected with musical progress, and the nature of this connection is so little known or appreciated by the musical world, that we think our readers will pardon the introduction of matter apparently remote from our immediate subject, for the sake of its intrinsic interest. The mention of this Institution at once brings to the mind the extraordinary efforts of the founder, Captain Thomas Coram, who some hundred and thirty years ago—when the frequent destruction, unhappily again prevalent in our own time, of illegitimate children by their mothers, horrified and alarmed society—took the work in hand of providing an asylum for Foundlings, which had been often talked of and recommended, but the institution of which was owing to the indomitable energy of the staunch sea-captain, who devoted his whole fortune and nearly twenty years of his life to the carrying out of his darling project. In the year 1739 he succeeded in obtaining a Charter appointing a goodly corporation of peers, judges, distinguished lawyers and others, including Coram himself, to carry out his views and administer the affairs of the new institution, which found a local habitation in Hatton Garden in the following year. Four years after, a portion of the present building—the facade of which has been pronounced the ugliest in the world—had been opened, but the Chapel was not commenced until 1747. In April, 1751, this building received the remains of the Founder, which were deposited immediately under the altar. He had attained the age of eighty-four, and, as we have said, had sacrificed his whole fortune, so that about two years before his death a subscription was opened, and arrangements made which would give him a sum of about 160*l.* annually. The funeral, conducted with great solemnity, took place in the evening, when the chapel was filled with a crowd of notabilities, the St. Paul's choir performing the burial service, and Dr. Boyce presiding at the organ. This tribute of respect and affection to Captain Coram, was also a solemn inauguration of the building, which was afterwards to become celebrated by its connection with the greatest musician that ever lived, as well as for those musical services in which the children themselves take so conspicuous a part, and which, instituted at a period when no church music worthy of the name was to be heard away from our cathedrals, have not only maintained their interest and prestige, but have now reached a degree of excellence unsurpassed—probably unequalled—by anything of a similar kind. Though our present concern is with the Chapel and its services, perhaps a few more words may be excused with respect to the Hospital itself. It was originally intended to receive applications for the admission of children, but the provision for Foundlings became so popular that, with Parliamentary authorization and assistance, the Governors made arrangements for receiving all children—without inquiry—under twelve months old, taking care thoroughly to advertise the comprehensiveness of their benevolent intentions. They had soon enough on their hands, for from three to four thousand children were annually deposited at the Hospital, during the four years this system lasted. We have no space to go into detail, but after a fearful mortality, and the establishment of various evils in connection with an organized supply of infants, the Parliament—having incurred a liability of above half a million sterling—abolished their rule of indiscriminate admission, and gradually the establishment has been brought to its present state.

The Institution now maintains some 500 illegitimate children, received after application by their mothers, who must be qualified by previous good character, poverty, desertion by the father, and the prospect of retaining or regaining their position—in other words, of concealing their misfortune from the world. It will be perceived that there is a question of dubious morality involved here, on which, however, we need not linger. The Hospital undertakes the sole charge of the children, who of course, after their abandonment by the mother, have no natural tie whatever; they are for a time sent into the country to nurse, and on their return are educated and cared for in the Institution until they attain the age of fourteen, when they are apprenticed to various trades, or sent out as domestic servants, &c. The musical instruction which the boys receive here in connection with the Chapel services, and from the establishment of a band of wind instruments, procures appointments for many of them in regimental bands, in various parts of the kingdom. The Hospital always assumes to stand in loco parentis, and the well conducted may receive advice and necessary assistance in any critical part of their future lives.

Ere we return to the immediate subject of our paper, we may notice the obligations of the Hospital to Hogarth, who, after Handel, was its greatest benefactor. Many of his finest pictures were painted for and presented by him to this Institution, and still adorn its walls; perhaps the most interesting, the portrait of Captain Coram, now in the girls' dining-room.

What alone would suffice to render the Foundling Chapel celebrated is its connection with the immortal Handel, who, in aid of its completion, conducted a concert of his own compositions, including his "Fireworks Music," which produced a considerable sum, in gratitude for which he was enrolled as a governor of a Hospital. Here, too, "The Messiah" was performed year after year, the composer himself, even after his blindness, presiding at the organ—his own munificent gift, eleven performances realizing about £7,000 to the charity; while after Handel's death, seven more performances, conducted by his amanuensis Christopher Smith, and eight by John Stanley (the blind organist), brought in above £3,000 more. The governors' attempt to monopolize all property in "The Messiah" is well known, and they certainly evinced little gratitude for the great obligations they were under to the composer. It was, indeed, proposed that he should be buried in the Chapel, but his own wishes and the public voice demanded a grave in Westminster Abbey.

Some fourteen or fifteen years after this a project was discussed, which, had it not been nipped in the bud, might, perhaps, have prevented the establishment of that laughing-stock of foreigners—our Tenterden-street Academy. This was the proposal by Dr. Brnney to establish a musical school, somewhat similar to the continental "conservatorio," the pupils to be selected from such children in the Hospital as had natural musical gifts. From the high patronage this scheme obtained, and its favorable reception by the governors, there seemed a fair prospect of its being carried out; but ultimately, after discussing the matter with great display of metaphysical subtleties, and curious disquisitions on the comparative social status of the children, &c., it was negated by the governing body, apparently on the ground that the profession of music was too agreeable and too aristocratic for the poor little foundlings. And yet the weakest and most helpless of these were destined to form the nucleus of the present Chapel choir. Three blind singers and a blind organist, all foundlings, comprised the first regular musical establishment in the Chapel, which was afterwards to engage the highest talent that could be procured, and a place in which was to be sought after and considered as a mark of professional eminence.

It was not long before the Governors, seeing the use that might be made of a musical service in the Chapel, resolved to engage a party of highly cultivated professional singers, and at the same time to have the children taught sufficiently to take part in the music performed—and this arrangement has obtained to the present time, with the exception of a short interval. This occurred during the attempt, some dozen years ago, to do away with the professional ladies engaged, and to assimilate the service as much as possible to that of a cathedral. Accordingly, four men and half a dozen boys were robed in surplices, and the latter (selected from the foundlings) received some extra instruction. But cucullus non facit monachum, and the surplice did not create the choir; while the music to which the congregation had been accustomed became impossible, and what was possible was very indifferently executed. The folks who had been accustomed to the mellifluous vocalization of Louisa Pyne, were by no means contented with the interesting efforts of "little Squeaky;" and the great purists were forced to confess that the surpliced foundling was but a very poor apology for his bonneted and crinoline-dressed predecessor. The attempt, having given rise to great dissatisfaction, was therefore abandoned, not without reluctance on the part of some of the Governors; but though the experiment failed, the result was good: for all the children who sing are now well-grounded in the rudiments of music, and thoroughly practised in the occasionally difficult pieces they have to execute.

Proceeding to the present state of affairs, we may remark that the interior of the Chapel has a very fine effect; it is surrounded by galleries receding from the lower walls, the end opposite the altar being occupied by the organ, on either side of which are ranged the children, forming one of the most interesting and impressive sights possible. Paintings and engravings of this portion of the Chapel are, no doubt, familiar to many of our readers; a peculiar effect is commonly shown, produced by rays from a yellow skylight being thrown on the gilded front of the organ; but the case of the present instrument has been brought more forward, and though the skylight exists, the peculiar effect is gone. It is difficult to look unmoved on this body of boys and girls cut off as they are from all those ties which form the happiness of other children. Some of the girls are strikingly handsome; in many a sad, in some a playfully mischievous expression shows in the countenance; but almost all appear bright and intelligent. The boys are less remarkable, and they have a generally morose aspect, while an intellectual countenance is the exception. The occupation of the girls in looking after the younger children and other domestic duties may possibly account in some measure for their superior and more kindly appearance. After the children, the most attractive feature is the organ, which has attained a development unimaginable by the donor of its first predecessor. Handel's original instrument had been from time to time altered and added to, while some kind of partial enharmonic arrangement had been attempted with the usual unsuccessful result; but under the care of Mr. Bishop the organ had been brought to a considerable pitch of excellence, though far behind modern requirements. In the year 1855 the governors determined to have it entirely remodelled and rebuilt, and the task was assigned to Messrs. Bevington, who, in accordance with the plans drawn out by the present organist, have produced one of the finest instruments in London. It contains all that was worth retaining of the previous one, and has sixty stops, with the usual composition pedals and couplers. Some of the solo stops are very fine, but the pedal organ is hardly satisfactory.

In the front of the organ, and between the boys and girls, are seated the five professional singers—two ladies, soprano and contralto; and three men, alto, tenor, and bass. As occupants of their pew, without going far back, we recall the names of Atkins, Pyne, Hobbs, Lawler, Hawkins, Horn-castle, and Robinson; of the Misses Cause, Miss Birch, Miss Rainforth, Miss Dolby, Mrs. Lockey, and Miss Lonisa Pyne. With these recollections we can hardly assert that the present singers—excellent though they be—surpass all that went before them; but the musical proficiency of the children has never been so conspicuous as at present. They chant the Psalms admirably, take part in the 'Services' of our best cathedral writers, and in their anthems, as well as in adaptations (not, by the way, always most happy as regards the words) from Handel, Beethoven, Mozart, Mendelssohn, Hummel, Gluck, Himmel, and Spohr; and in these they will take up a point or a difficult lead with a readiness and certainty not often found in a "professional" vocalist.

But seeing that the girls sing the treble and the boys the alto, and the choir contains only one tenor and one bass, it is obvious that there must exist a disparity between the parts which no exertion on the part of the singers, or skill of the organist, can conceal; and we would suggest that if, as we are informed, the contributions to the Chapel funds yield a considerable surplus, a portion of this might be devoted to the engagement of three or four tenors and basses for the chorus. If, indeed, the governors, in addition to this, would also double their present quintet, we think little more could be desired; but the adoption of the former suggestion would remove the weakest point in the present arrangements.

Our visit to the Foundling was on the first Sunday of the ecclesiastical year, when we found "Comfort ye" posted on the door as the anthem to be sung. But, though Mr. Sims Reeves was not the tenor to whom the solo was allotted, a severe hoarseness, we presume, or some other ailment incidental if not peculiar to tenors, caused the substitution of "O thou that tellest," which was assigned to and very tastefully executed by the contralto—if our vision served us, Miss Lascelles; Mozart's accompaniments being capably played on the organ. The chorus was given with the greatest effect, the precision of the children not being inferior to that of Mr. Costa's Exeter Hall chorus. Indeed, Mr. Costa himself paid the children and their instructor the highest possible compliment, when, not very long ago, he wished some of the boys to assist at the Sacred Harmonic Society's concerts, although the governors saw objections which prevented their entertaining his proposal. We were glad to find that the Advent Hymn did not necessarily involve Madan's puerile tune. It is the practice here for five principal singers to sing one verse of the psalm or hymn without accompaniment, and the effect is certainly very good when executed as we heard it; for the changing of the anthem seemed to have had a curative effect on the tenor's indisposition. A somewhat florid Jubilate, we know not by whom, was very nicely executed, as indeed was all the music; and the whole service reflected the greatest credit on the organist, who, we believe, has the entire musical training of the children, and direction of the Chapel choir.

In concluding our lengthy and discursive sketch, we would recommend such of our readers as may think it more panegyric than critical, to go and judge for themselves; and we are confident that every one—musical or not—will experience a new and highly-refined pleasure from their first visit to the Foundling Chapel.

Donizetti's "Don Sebastian."

The following description of one of the novelties promised us by MAREZK in the present series of Italian operas, at the Boston Theatre, is from the Evening Post of Nov. 26. It was written by an enthusiast about the modern Italian music after the first production of the work, with unusual pomp and splendor, at the New York Academy of Music:

THE PLOT.

As opera-goers will find it in their libretto, we consider that one such an infliction will be enough for them; and we prefer here to give a briefer synopsis, which will merely give the outlines of Scribo's play and Cammerano's translation, on which this opera is founded.

Don Sebastian was a King of Portugal, who lived in the sixteenth century, and is deemed important enough to find a place in biographical dictionaries, and in that enormously wide field known as "the pages of romance." Don Sebastian, with a laudable desire to carry the war into Africa, embarks, says the libretto, "at the head of a valiant army," to subjugate the Moors in Algiers. About to sail, he is detained by a soldier, who addresses him on the wharf, and proves to be the Portuguese poet, Camoens, who is patriotic enough to volunteer to go to Africa without a bounty, for martial purposes. As a casual incident, Zaida, a lady of African descent, passes by, on her way to the scaffold—for all the world as if it were a pleasant morning stroll—where she is to be burnt as a witch. Camoens, the poetical soldier, begs from the King her pardon, and she is sent back to her father, who is an African prince, and has probably been awaiting her for some time "beneath the cocoa-tree."

In Africa Zaida has a lover, an Arab of the Othello type, called Abaidlo, played here by Lorini, the mildest and most polished of gentlemen. Zaida is played by Zucchi, Camoens by Bellini, and Sebastian by Massimiliani. The king is beaten in the great battle of Alcazar Gebir, —si cadde di Alcazar nella pugna famosa, as the libretto hath it. But he is only wounded. And Zaida, who is prowling around the battle-field, begs his life of Abaidlo, informing him that she had been saved in Portugal by a Christian, and had vowed in return to save the life of some poor wretch of a European. Abaidlo, after ejaculating Ma perché? and receiving a satisfactory explanation, gives the wounded soldier life and liberty—never for a moment suspecting he is the king. An accommodating gentleman, named Enrico, had kindly sacrificed himself for the king, the libretto "argument" thus tersely, if not grammatically, relating the incident:

"The battle is fought on the field of Alcazar Kebir, and Sebastian is mortally wounded. His true friend Enrico lays him down, when the victorious Abaidlo and his Arabs arrive in search of the king. Enrico, asked whether he has seen Sebastian, says: 'I am it!' and is killed immediately; Sebastian remains fainting on the battle-field, where he is found by Zaida, who has followed the warriors. She promises to save him, but he refuses, until she declares that she loves him."

Conspirators in Portugal, thinking and desiring to think that the King is dead, make peace with the Arabs, by whom the fierce Abaidlo is sent as an ambassador. Zaida accompanies him; but they must have proved a rather inharmonious pair; for, in the inimitable language of the "argument,"

"He takes Zaida with him, who has shown him her contempt. When she asks him why he has taken her with him he tells her that he wants to revenge himself on her, and will treat her as his slave. She scorns his threats, and tells him that she is ready to die for Sebastian, whom he has pardoned upon her promises to marry him (Abaidlo), and whom she represented to be a poor soldier, while he was the King."

Camoens and Sebastian, having both escaped from Africa, meet in the streets of Lisbon in time to encounter an elaborate funeral procession in honor of the King, who is supposed to be dead. Not approving of these premature posthumous honors, Sebastian declares his identity, but is treated as an impostor and put into a prison instead of on a throne.

A trial takes place, at which Zaida appears as a witness. Women's rights movements were at that period unknown in Portugal, for the chorus of judges lift their hands with horror and exclaim:

"A woman!"

Whereupon Zaida argues the point, and the following characteristic lyric conversation ensues:

ZAIDA. Why not?
Cannot a woman tell the truth?
Listen! Abaidlo has been imposed upon,
I swear it. The man whom he saw fall
Was the noble Don Enrico,
Who died as a hero for his master!

Giov. What did you say?

ZAIDA. The king was saved
By a woman.
Who loved him!

Giov. What new trick is this!

SA. O, noble heart!

ZAIDA. Hear then! The woman
That saved the king's life,
I swear it before God. [unveiling herself.
It was me! [The judges rise up in surprise.
My heart is in uncertainty
Between hope and terror!
O, if I could save his life
By my death!

Of course this leads to a concerted piece, in which various characters express their feelings simultaneously. Zaida observes:

I am not guilty! Thy furor
Is little to me. You cannot Take away my honor.
Which will accompany my death!
The pang of a poor
Faithful girl are joy for thee!
Heaven will punish you
I leave to it my vengeance.

Sebastian at the same time remarks:

Miserable! Your furor
Is not satisfied by my death?
Pity does not enter their hearts;
There is no more hope!
The death of an innocent girl
Is joy to them!
You are blessed by Heaven
And by me!

And Abaidlo, Giovanni and some fifty or more miscellaneous people vent their emotions in the following mild adjuration:

Go, perjured woman! My wrath
Is not satisfied by thy death!
Shame and dishonor
Shall accompany it!
For thy wickedness
Death at the stake is not enough;
Go to death cursed
And lost forever.

Zaida and Sebastian are sentenced to death and imprisoned in the Tower of Lisbon. To save her life he is willing to sign a paper stating that he is an impostor; but she will not permit it. Camoens finds his way to the prison, provided with ropes, and all the three lower themselves out of the window, intending to reach a boat in the water below. And now occurs one of the oddest catastrophes any dramatist ever thought of. While the soprano, the tenor and baritone are sliding down their rope, that villainous creature Abaidlo comes in and cuts the rope with an axe. "A cry is heard, and the fugitives are precipitated into the abyss." This, at least, is the catastrophe mentioned in the libretto; but it has been altered in the version given here, and the unfortunate trio are shot while embarking in boats from the outside of the tower of Lisbon.

THE MUSIC—ACT I.

To this tragical plot Donizetti has wedded some of his most pompous and elaborate music. He has aimed at grandeur and colossal effects more than in any other of his works, and though he has not equalled Meyerbeer in this respect, he has yet produced some very effective and telling results.

The work is preluded not by an overture, but merely by two pages of musical preface, in which the chorus of nuns and the dead march of the third act are foreshadowed; and which leads into a jubilant chorus in D major—Su presti all'opra. Several pages of recitative are next followed by an indifferent baritone air for Camoens, in which the poet modestly praises his own poem, "the Lusiad," and expresses his desire to go the war. More recitative, a brief soprano romanza, Signor, clementi, and a piece of concerted music, lead to a "prophecy" in which Camoens predicts the success of the African expedition, closing with a spirited air and chorus—Su Corriamo—which will soon be whistled and street-organised all over town. A sonorous concerted piece and chorus, in which the composer makes a liberal use of the unison effects for which Verdi is hyper-criticized, finishes the act, as the King of Portugal sets sail, amid the blare of trumpets and the booming of cannon, for his expedition against the Moors.

The second act opens with a delicate little chorus for female voices, something in the style of Bellini. It is pretty, without being specially noticeable, and is followed by an elaborate romanza, Terra adorata, sang by Zaida, and written in Donizetti's most graceful manner.

The ballet is here introduced, and the composer has written for it some very taking and sprightly music, which will soon find its way to our theatre orchestras. Most of it was omitted at last night's performance, but enough was given to show how light and sparkling Donizetti could be in ballet music. Ernestine and Auriolo were the leading dancers, and were cordially applauded.

The course of the opera is resumed, after some not injudicious cutting, with a noisy chorus of Arabs, who fortunately unite brevity with a musically chaotic fierceness; and a charming duet for soprano and tenor follows, in which the orchestral accompaniment is unusually neat and elegant. The allegro movement of this duet—

Fa cor, mio re, fa core!
La gioia è presso al duol;
Pi notte al cupo orrore
Succede il chiaro sol—is a bold stirring strain, in character very much like the popular closing duet of the last act of "Favorita," and demanding the passionate vocalization of a Zucchi for its proper effect. It is, indeed, one of the most taking numbers of the opera.

More Arabs and chaos are followed by what will be considered by many to be the gem of the opera—the exquisite tenor air, Deserto in terra, one of the sweetest strains that Donizetti ever produced. It is a melody which will soon find its way into the concert room and parlor. But it must be transposed for ordinary use, as it is written in D-flat major and runs up to C and even the D flat above the staff—a round in the musical ladder of ledger notes which it needs an extraordinary voice to climb to.

ACT III.

The act is preluded by a short and exquisitely beautiful orchestral introduction, in which the theme is played in ear-haunting thirds, the violoncello being the prominent instrument. A duet between Zaida and Abiallo is omitted, and we then come to the simple and beautiful romanza for the baritone,

O Lisbon, alfin ti miro, in which Bellini made so handsome a success. The air is of that kind which is sure to have a concert room popularity, though it is not followed by the usual allegro.

In the next scene occurs the meeting and recognition of Sebastian and Camoens, and the quaint duet "O fausto di," which follows, will attract attention rather than admiration.

Then comes the celebrated funeral procession. The voices of choristers inside the cathedral are heard singing the hymn Eterno riposo, broken into by the beat of muffled drums and the subdued fanfare of trumpets.

The orchestra plays the slow, well-marked march, and the chorus take up the solemn strain. The imposing effect of the stage, crowded as with "an army of banners," the glare of torches, the solemn darkness of standards draped in crape, and the sable gloom of the funeral catafalque, the steady throb of the dead march, all combine to make it difficult to judge dispassionately of this scene apart from its accessories. Yet there is no doubt that the march is really grand; it is simple rather than sensational; and must ever be considered one of the leading features of the opera. The concerted piece which follows and concludes the act is, however, something of an anti-climax, and is more noisy than meritorious.

ACT IV.

This act is devoted to the trial of Sebastian and Zaida. A stately prelude and chorus is separated by a gulf of recitative from the septet, on which, as in that in "Lucia di Lammermoor," the eminent composer seems to have showered his richest wealth of harmony, melody and characteristic effect. It is one of those pieces which will most frequently challenge an encore. A martial air for the baritone, reminding one of the Speranza di Vendetta in Verdi's "Lombardi" (though, of course, the resemblance is but accidental), is the next feature, and leads to an intricate and long concerted piece, which closes the act.

ACT V.

An orchestral reverie on a theme which is subsequently sung by Bellini opens the fifth act. Dialogue in recitative is followed by an allegro air for soprano—(omitted here)—and a plaintively pretty duet in A flat—Me qui desio—for tenor and soprano, which closes with a curious and highly passionate allegro. Suddenly there is heard outside the prison where the scene takes place the voice of Camoens singing, by way of signal to the prisoners, a gracefully undulating barcarole, in which some novel enharmonic changes vary without disturbing the wave-like flow of the melody. As an invisible chorus re-echoes the strain, Camoens enters, and a very pleasing trio,

"Moriam guardighi," sung sotto voce, may be considered the musical finale of the opera; for the few remaining pages are but recitative or orchestral, leading to the catastrophe.

Fine Arts.

The Old Masters as Portrait Painters, and the Modern. — Copley and Stuart. — Staigg's Portrait of General Stevenson.

Perhaps the greatest portrait painters who ever lived were Titian, Vandyke, Velasquez, Rembrandt. They were great men—great painters—painting portraits; but they would have been great had they painted nothing else but portraits; for there can be no finer field for the highest artist's genius than to do justice to the human face divine.

These great artists painted their figures so that they seem projected on space and retire in a dream land, ("gorgeous land," as Coleridge says of cloud land), in that ideal region of the mind, that pale-clear visionary world, where the old portraits dwell, and which they seem naturally to possess and gracefully to occupy. They pass by in their graciousness and beauty. There is something ineffable about them, and mighty in the eye, looking out of the depths, as in a vision; as if the subtle spirit had indeed been arrested in its mortal transit, and fixed forever there for posterity's admiration. They are refined into spirituality, poetry and truth; and look as we would one should look, or come back to us, in spirit, when one is gone, defecated of the mortal and taking on immortality, when with Cowper, gazing, we exclaim, "Oh! that those lips had language!"

These great old masters abstracted by their insight and their art, their genius and sympathy, the fine essence, the soul of the man. Working from within outward, through matter to spirit, substance to soul, form to feeling: evolving the character, developing the individuality, the personality, they gave the soul looking through the eyes, speaking in the form, shining in the movement, in the hue, the presence, the pose.

No obstructive accessories served to disturb and distract the senses, or jarred upon the finer feelings of the mind. All was harmony and highest truth, because they felt—and knew because they felt—the higher law of their art, which assimilates and subordinates all things to imaginative impression. Art is valueless without ideality, and is ever wrong in proportion to the straining after reality and illusion; its function being, to paint the soul as it inheres in, and informs the body; not body without soul, the objective without the subjective, as Copley painted.

Titian painted senatorial dignity, the presence and bearing, and the superb character of Venetian beauty, which may still be found lingering in the obscure, decaying lanes of the princely city, in a style which was dignity and splendor itself. Vandyke, patrician elegance, courtly refinement and high breeding, in a style itself high-bred. Velasquez, the Spanish character, firm and tenacious; the grandees of the empire, and the princess, with something of their own pride and mastery—a style incomparable for breadth and execution; quiet yet powerful, solid yet fluent and free, secure yet easy. Rembrandt gave the picturesqueness of his age, its light and shade; the Cavalier in his dark, slouched, feathered hat, broadly shadowing the massive features, the superb costume; and his style is picturesqueness itself, unique and inimitable. Each of these great masters, inspired by the times, did all that was suitable and successful. We call them up in their majesty and refinement—these impressive figures—from their stately shrines, the galleries and palaces of Austria, Spain and England, and they come home to us like a poem. We are afraid to say what we think of a great picture, for we feel as if Nature were there, and we had met her. Such things seem painted, as Hawthorne said, with bated breath.

If we will compare this supreme manner, so powerful, majestic, intense or refined, according as in the hands of Velasquez, Titian, Rembrandt or Vandyke, with what has, but now, been seen at the Athenæum, we shall notice the essential difference, the distance most modern portraiture holds (excepting Allston) when compared with the glorious old masters. Allston was an old master, in the same sense as Shelley said Keats was a Greek, and Goethe, by common consent, a Pagan:—the four imbued with their ideal, and full of sensuous, yet ideal and intellectual beauty.

In these regards how different the old masters from the later schools, and from modern art, where the figures come inharmoniously forward, and protrude, in their coarse reality and cold materiality, from the wall; as if the canvas disdained, and could not contain them, and the frame rejected and cast them forth. They spring upon you, worry you, and obtrude themselves. The old works are as agreeable as a vision. Portraiture, through genius, lifts the life, the person, the object, into poetry and ideality; or, through literalism and materialism, degrades it into prose, mechanism, daguerrotype.

If what we have said about the old art be true—and who is presumptuous enough to dispute the verdict of ages—all works which survive through many generations, and pass the ordeal of many times and countries, and the varying and diverse judgments of men, are sure to contain within themselves the principles of their own immortality. Hence the incomparable fame of the old masters, coming down through the centuries, growing with age, and culminating in endless time.

Stuart had a feminine refinement and delicacy, but also a feminine weakness of style, at his best: a thinness and wateriness or looseness of color, and flatness of painting, which fails to give form, or convey the sense of body and substance, yet fresh and silvery, and pleasing for its healthfulness, its truth and harmony. He gives a prim, precise elegance of expression, and a formal character of refinement, especially as to the eyes,—a little stiff and meagre—which makes one think of old maids rather than men. He painted easily and freely, but too slightly and slovenly. The expression not unfrequently degenerates into a mild insipidity, an amiable vacuity of look (too much the case with the unfinished Washington). The countenance was washed of all strength and manliness. It expresses a conscious effeminacy, a painful, constrained desire to be elegant or mild, correct and well-mannered—a something provincial, as if the sitter did not feel quite assured of himself and his position, and were doing his best to look brave and fine for posterity. His own portrait, by Neagle, strikes us as more vigorous and successful in his own vein and manner.

Stuart had a nice sense and fine sensibility to the impression of things, but lacked genius to give their full imaginative significance, an achievement which is the last success of art, whether music, poetry, sculpture or painting. His painting is refined and delightful, but too much on the surface, and wants intellectual depth and vigor of style. He painted the impression, and in so far is imaginative; but he failed in that subtle apprehension and feeling for life in portraiture, the indwelling spirit, in its meaning and expression, which alone makes portraiture high art, and lifts it into the universal, from which it flows (of which the absence leaves it dead, flat, unprofitable; mere dexterity, vacuity and prettiness):—into those fields of truth and beauty where all art and perfection meet in one supreme accord, unity and congruity, dwelling in effluence and light:—which makes the great masters immortal, and stamps God-like character upon the figures of the Parthenon, and the Venus of Milo, alone worthy to be the divinities of time.

In the endeavor to give the gentleness of gentility, he sometimes fell, though refined in feeling, into sentimentality, and a kind of mawkish sweetness. Yet we would not depreciate the refinement, far removed from coarseness and brutal materiality—from the aggressive insolence of bearing, the pert conceit and consequential air, of Copley—which honorably distinguishes Stuart's pleasant and harmonious pictures. He would not, could not, paint where he did not fancy the subject, the sitter. In this, sensitive, as every true artist must be.

His style is charming in its kind and degree. It is easy, fluent, graceful, rapid and free, but superficial, and is achieved at the expense of depth, emphasis, contrast and chiaroscuro. It is deficient in subtle life; shadow, gradation, suggestion; area and atmosphere—the spiritual vitality; the wondrous imaginative sense; the depth, the subtle withdrawing, and tracing of life upon space and consciousness, of the old masters—their high poetry of feeling and of thought.

It is almost impossible to paint in high lights throughout, and produce harmony, and a sense of space. Rubens and Paul Veronese, alone, have done it perfectly.

Let all Stuart's excellence be acknowledged and receive its due praise; only forbear to exalt his elegant, but precise manner, and formal expression into comparison with the grand style. He painted the impression, and in so far, was spiritualistic and true, in his art; but the impression was weak, and the objectivity, the strength, the body and form were wanting. Copley painted the converse of this. The one painted feeling, the other fact; the one the impression, the other the reality; the one the thing, the object, the other the idea, the spirit, the subject. In Copley's realism and objectivity, there is no sense of the impression or the subjectivity and soul. The one was materialistic, the other supersensuous—refined to effeminacy.

The harsh, strong rendering by Copley, of what we may call the objective personality, the manners and body of the dignified, but provincial figures of the last century, with all their pert conceit which stares you out of countenance and seems to say, still, from the canvas, "I am better than thou"—the consequential air and aggressive superiority; the cold, indifferent look, with hardly a glimpse of the soul or inner man afforded through all these clothes and postures, almost gives one pain, so materialistic is it in feeling and mistaken in tendency. It gives the idea of refinement, it is true, but in the painter, not in the style. It is apparent that Copley was a gentleman and a most vigorous, prolific painter, but no poet: that he possessed no imagination, without which art is but an indifferent thing, and dry as verisification without sensibility, fancy or feeling. He knew not how to give attraction to the face, to seize it in its best hour and momentary elevation. There is no softening of ugly feature. He made plain people plainer by his manner of doing them; by his cold hard lines; his implacable rigidity, grim reality, and almost ghastly presence. His truth consists in costume, and occasional brightness and beauty of positive color, with no imaginative sense of it; and this in clothes rather than in flesh painting, in which, though truthful in tint, and sometimes soft and delicate, he was deficient in the luminous transparency and sensuous life of the great painters. Fidelity to facts, fabrics, forms and features; no softening of harsh, hard lineaments and outlines, or subtle mastery of expression; no poetry of nature. But it is the inner man we prize, need for our consolation, and value for our delight. We do not want haberdashery, nor the fantastical fashions of the past. We want the man as he lived, as he loved, and as he moved; his firmness; his heart and soul; his strength, reliance, gentleness, and spirit.

These remarks are needful if we would enter into the excellence of Mr. Staigg's work; needful to interpret and illustrate the rare excellence of his performance; for he has succeeded in doing something of that which made the old masters so great and enduring.

If Mr. Hunt's portraits recall the ineffable refinement, the grace, elegance, and fineness of Vandyke, with something, in his grand portrait of the late respected Chief Justice, of the power and mastery of Velasquez; Mr. Staigg's work, with less subtlety of execution, less perfection of practice and handling; and a certain lack of clearness in the painting, makes one think of the Venetians, the dignity of Titian, the luminous richness, power and breadth of Rembrandt. —The picture is a little thick in color, lacks clearness and transparency, though eminently luminous. It is vitalized throughout—a quality we admire in Turner, and the present French school: Lambinet, Brissot, Micas, and others—the feeling for nature in parts and detail, as well as in the whole and in the impression—a true pre-Raphaelism. With a certain brilliance throughout, it is nicely graduated from the tender, suggestive shadow below, to the high lights centred very properly on the face, and the broad commanding brow. We think the sword is worn a little wrongly, and should have been more by the side. Forbearing theinsano attempt to paint up to life and nature, and rival her lights—a mistake so common and fatal to modern art; but the rather subduing all things to the one grand impression of life, form, and character;—representing nature, not reproducing, Mr. Staigg has achieved a work, which, for harmony, brilliancy, beauty and richness of color, and true grandeur and dignity of style, would do no discredit to the old masters; a work which is rarely equalled, certainly not excelled in our time and country.

The aplomb; the soldierly air and bearing; the firmness, strength, self-reliance; the innate manliness; the dignified yet youthful features, the peculiar and luminous purity of the lofty brow; are all admirably given. The strength tempered with gentleness, heroism with tenderness: that rare perfection and chivalric ideal of manly character, which endeared the lamented dead—the soldier, the hero, the friend, and favorite—to all who were fortunate enough to know him, and who are now called upon to lament, at the same time that they rejoice in, a death heroic and glorious as a martyrdom.

The work is a triumph, and the artist may be congratulated in words that are, at once, his best eulogy and highest reward, that it is done in a manner worthy the hero it represents, whose noble patriotism and self-sacrificing devotion may it serve to transmit for the admiration of posterity, among the generous youth who have fought for liberty, and offered up their lives, as Mr. Emerson has said, that all life may be more precious, more noble, and more free! The likeness, we are told, by one of all others best qualified to judge, is natural and perfect. Here is preserved all of that mortality which in life charmed, and was held precious and inestimably dear to family and friends; to all who knew General Stevenson, and the entire community, which loved and honored him living, and now laments him dead; which cherishes his memory; and mourns in his untimely end, a patriot and a Christian—a youthful sacrifice upon the altar of his country's good.

Catching sight of this picture in the front room of Messrs. Child & Jenks, before it was taken away, it came across us with a fresh sense of its beauty, and gave us a new insight into its peculiar merit and charm. A luminous picture is its own light. It glows, illuminates, and seems to give forth its indwelling life and splendor, irradiating the darkness—spreading a subtle charm—emitting light. In old halls and palaces, Newsteads and Hampton Courts, how the majestic past comes again to life—the ancestry traced upon canvas—and "walks abroad in the storm," and in the dusk twilight is all about us in the room, as if the life of the spirit were indeed there—nothing less than the soul itself—inhabiting those cold walls, powerful to attract and cunning to detain! We are held by strong portraits. Titians look down upon you, and follow you about through the vast galleries: Vandyke's courtly company passes by, and melancholy Charles, with a sadness which is immortal.

Subdued, reflected light is better than direct, which glitters, distorts and reflects. It tempers the hardness, tones the freshness, not yet passed, into harmony.

Seeing the fine face so expressive, we could not but call to mind all his fellow soldiers have told us, of his womanly care and tenderness; the authority tempered with kindness and concern: a solicitude and respect, mutual and profound, honoring human nature, which all true authority inspires. We thought of the sentinel, whose guard he kept, while: he went for his capote, dispatched by his commander: of the inexpressible tone of kindness, solicitude, and commiseration, mixed with confidence and command, with which he ordered his corps to the front at Newbern, which, as one of his officers has told us, would have sent them all, officers and men, through fire and death to obey him and to serve—a tone inspiring heroic daring.

The "Messiah" was performed on Monday evening, Dec. 19, in New Haven, by the Mendelssohn Society of that place, with the aid of Mr. J. R. THOMAS, basso, of New York, and with full orchestra, Mr. GUSTAVE J. STOECKEL conducting.

Musical Correspondence.

CHICAGO, DEC. 24, 1864.—Since I last wrote, cal matter have been active here. The GOTTSCHALK-SIMONS Troupe has given five concerts in Smith & Nixon's new Hall, which, by the way, is a very valuable addition to Chicago. The first night the Hall was filled, a large number being present to view the new Hall, and not on account of the music. The succeeding nights, the audience were thinner, being composed mostly of music lovers.

It is the prevalent opinion here, that these concerts, musically considered, were inferior to those which have been given by Mr. Gottschalk in this city on a previous occasion. A large amount of dance music was played by Mr. G.; which may be very pretty, but which we do not think is worthy of his abilities. Two Sonatas were given for piano and violin, one of Mozart and the other of Beethoven, played by Mr. Gottschalk and Herr Doehler. These Sonatas were not given as they should be; as Mr. Gottschalk evidently performs his own compositions with better relish. However, we have said enough about the noble chevalier. Let him rest in peace.

Miss Simons created a very agreeable impression here. She has a clear, sweet, flexible voice, and has evidently been well trained. Miss S. was suffering from a severe cold during the whole of her stay, which of course marred in some degree her execution. Still it was made manifest that Miss Simons is an artist of more than ordinary talent. Of Signor Morelli and Herr Doehler, we need not speak. Both are careful, conscientious performers.

On Monday, Jan. 2d, Grover's German Opera opens at McVickers's Theatre for a season of fifteen nights. Mr. Grover promises us Faust, Mireille, Huguenots, Fidelio, La Dame Blanche, &c. We hope that he will take as much pains to please our Chicago audiences as he did those of Eastern cities,—and we can assure him that he will meet with a hearty reception.

The third Philharmonic comes off on Wednesday evening next. A brilliant programme is announced, which I will discuss in my next. A new soprano will then make her appearance: Mlle. Maria De Rhode, of Cincinnati, formerly a pupil with Colson at Paris, and, like her, a member of the Conservatoire. We anticipate a highly successful concert.

CHICAGO.

NEW YORK, DEC. 19, 1864.—The Choral Festival at Trinity Church, incident to the opening of the new chancel organ, has been the musical feature of the season. Performances were given on Wednesday, the 7th inst. at noon, and on Thursday and Friday evenings. The whole entertainment was one of rare merit and success, and reflected great credit upon Dr. CUTLER, who has been the leading spirit in personal services and means, not only in the preparation for the festival, but in the purchase and erection of the new organ. The fact that he has contributed so largely from his own funds, is a somewhat unusual instance of liberality on the part of a church organist. ***

The chorus consisted of over one hundred male voices, boys and men, selected from the choir of the Church of the Holy Trinity, Brooklyn, the Church of the Advent, Boston, and Trinity Church of New York. Dr. Cutler presided at the new Chancel organ, and Mr. W. H. Walter of Trinity Chapel, at the large organ, the two playing in unison, and with great success, considering the distance and the position of the organist. ***

The choristers were robed in white surplices, and entered the chancel in procession, preceded by the rector and ministers of the parish, together with Bishop Talbot and several other representatives of the clergy. After the intoning of several of the prayers of the church, one being a special one for a blessing upon the performance, Dr. Francis Vinton ascended the pulpit, and began the programme, by reading a short sketch of the rise and progress of church music from the time of the Jewish nation to the present day. The music of the different eras was interpreted by the choir at intervals during the lecture, and opened with a Gregorian chant of the sixth century: "Cantate Domino Novum," all voices singing the melody unaccompanied. A German Choral of 1529, by Martin Luther, illustrated the reference made to that person. The peculiar feature of this was the playing between lines instead of verses.

Some very interesting facts in relation to Handel were given, and his compositions illustrated by an organ performance—on the large organ—of selections from "Israel in Egypt," by Geo. W. Morgan. In addition to this the following vocal selections: Solo and Chorus, "O thou that tellest," from the "Messiah," by Master Grandin; Duet and Chorus, "Hail Judea, happy land," from "Judas Maccabæus," by Masters Tate and Jameson; Solo, "Total Eclipse" from "Samson," by Mr. Samuel D. Mayer, an effort which in any other place than a sacred edifice would have demanded and received a most hearty encore; Solo, "I know that my Redeemer liveth," by Master Erlich; Solo, "Sound an alarm," from "Judas Maccabæus," by Mr. Geo. L. Weeks, Jr.; and the grand Hallelujah Chorus, by the full chorus of over one hundred voices, with the powerful accompaniment of the two organs. Mendelssohn was represented by the following: Solo, "Hear ye Israel," from "Elijah," by Master Richard Coker, the first soprano of Trinity Choir; and Quartet, "O come, every one that thirsteth," from "Elijah," by Messrs. Mayer and Giles, and Masters Coker and Grandin. Mr. George E. Aiken, the basso of the Broadway Tabernacle Church, sang "Now Heaven in fullest glory shone," from Haydn's "Creation," and in an artistic and finished manner, showing an admirable control of voice, and an enunciation most remarkable. Every word could be heard at the remotest part of the church, and nothing gave more general pleasure and satisfaction than this gentleman's rendering of the portion of the programme allotted to him. A "Gloria in Excelsis," from Haydn's 3d Mass was also sung by a quartet and chorus.

The instrumental portion of the programme consisted, further, of one of Wely's "Offertories," by Mr. Morgan; Bach's "Toccatina" in F, performed in a very creditable manner, by Chas. Jerome Hopkins, and an Organ Fantasia with pedal obligato, by Cutler, founded on Rev. John Hopkins's Carol, "We three Kings of Orient are," a curious theme admirably worked up and performed by Dr. Cutler.

One of the features of this festival was the introduction of Mr. S. P. Taylor, probably the oldest organist in this country. He was born soon after Handel's time, being now in his eighty-fifth year. He began his musical career seventy-six years ago as a choir boy in an English Cathedral, and has played the organ since he was twelve years of age. He came to America in 1806, and was appointed organist at Christ Church in Ann Street, this city, in 1807. Mr. Taylor was the first to introduce the chant in church service, and under his supervision Oratorios were performed in St. Paul's Chapel.

During the festival Mr. Taylor, a venerable looking old gentleman, ascending the Chancel steps, preceded by Mr. Cutler, and seating himself at the Chancel Organ, played the accompaniment to Luther's Judgment Hymn, with a firm touch, and with a look of childish pleasure. Seventy-three years at the organ board! What a crowd of memories must have flashed through his mind as he sat at that organ playing that grand old choral!

T. W. M.

[Occasional].

NEW YORK, DEC. 30, 1864.—Our Philharmonic Society, besides the works of masters, has occasionally given room to productions of composers who live among us, and are unknown as yet to fame or established reputation. It is undoubtedly right to encourage the aspirations of rising minds, and bring their efforts to the verdict of the musical community; provided, however, that the Society watch with a jealous eye against a latitude which would open the door to intruding nepotism, and make the concerts the workshop of some musical alchemist.

Among the "novelties" of the season, there was one in the last concert, which deserves more than the passing notice of your regular correspondent. I mean the Concerto for Violoncello, by Mr. F. L. RITTER.

It is a composition of no common merit. He has given us a work, which, while it is pleasing and adapted to the capabilities of a mixed audience, is still a work of art; it possesses that substantiality which satisfies the thinking musician. It has nothing of that hollow emptiness of a gaudy bravura, laden with flimsy ornaments, or that sickly sentimentality of the salon-piece, that catching after effects by means of musical monstrosities, which only violate the better feeling. There is an earnestness, a certain dignity in the natural flow of the melodies, true to the character of the instrument, interspersed just sufficiently with passages to give life and brilliancy. The conception is modern, the elaboration is of that compact solidity of by-gone days, with rich harmonies, and an instrumentation sometimes really exquisite. There is musical logic in it. Clear, digested, matured, it shows that mastery of the techniques of composition, which is the result of deep study and intimate acquaintance with the masters. We miss that in our composers here, and miss it sadly. A happy idea, sketched on paper, is not yet a work of art. One flash of bright imagination shows the chaos only to be still—void and without form. It is the composer's business to make the idea of his soul a reality, and that requires work, artistic work. Mr. R. showed in the Concerto that he understood himself, and knew how to handle his ideas. The fine nose of the critic may "smell the oil of the nocturnal lamp;" when the morning mists disperse, his eye must see order, symmetry and beauty, those eternal principles which, like adamant columns, support the arch that the builder in sound rears heavenward.

Mr. R. has solved his problem well. We do not mean to eulogize him; but in justice we are bound to acknowledge, that there is musical form, musical workmanship in his composition. And that is his merit.

It is a great gain, a decided progress in the growth of music, to have this fact once acknowledged and appreciated. It will lead further. It will induce the student to look closer at works hitherto neglected; the player, to select more carefully and delight in a better class of compositions; and even the musical public, to demand a higher style, which, in the end, will give more real satisfaction, and a higher enjoyment than they ever had before.

We only hope that Mr. R. will follow up the course he has begun, and that we, at no distant day, shall hear again from him, and see him supported by the friends of music in raising the standard of art.

EFFENEZ.

Music Abroad.

Leipzig.

The correspondent of the Orchestra continues his interesting letters as follows (Dec. 2):

With full readiness to recognize the enterprise of the directors of the Gewandhaus concerts as deserving the highest praise, it may yet be questioned whether three new works in one evening, as was the case in the seventh concert, are not too great a tax upon the audience. The first of these novelties (which, by the way, though new in the Gewandhaus, was written some four years ago) is an old friend in a new dress—Bach's well-known organ Toccata in F major, instrumented by Herr Heinrich Esser of Vienna. The effect is excellent; especially successful is the treatment of the pedal points. It is curious how the sense of life and intellectual strength manifested in Bach's compositions invest them with a charm we should hardly look for in works where sensuous beauty is so frequently absent.

Burgmüller's Symphony, No. 2, in D, which was the second novelty, is but a fragment, the composer, who died in 1836, in his 27th year, having only lived long enough to write three movements, and even a portion of the last of these had to be instrumented by Schumann from the composer's sketches. Burgmüller's life was one of great suffering, and yet, as Dr. Hauptmann says of him: "There is not a trace of anything sickly or morbid to be found in his works."

All that he has created is poetically and artistically healthy, has a natural flow, and is of the most beautiful proportion and construction. Would that our young, healthy, not talentless composers, who so often fall into assumed despair, and thus would make themselves interesting, would give us anything so healthy as one who had to struggle with troubles of so many kinds! It is difficult to be entirely just to a work which is not heard until 30 years after its composition. This symphony shows how great was the composer's promise; what there is, is good; but Burgmüller had yet to learn that in a long movement contrast of themes is necessary, if monotony is to be avoided; this want is most felt in the first and second movements; in the third, the Scherzo, there are life and spirit, and some very happy changes of rhythm: the instrumentation is good in all the movements.

The third novelty was a Concerto (MS.) for the violoncello, by Herr Kapellmeister Reinecke. I had hoped that the scanty repertoire of the violoncello would have been enriched by a really valuable work; but it seems as if a fatality attended all who write for that instrument. That the Concerto is musical and elegant is a matter of course, when Reinecke is the composer; but it lacks distinctive features; it is not solid enough for a great musical work, nor brilliant enough for a display piece. The slow movement pleased the most. Herr Grützmacher, formerly first violoncellist in the Gewandhaus, and a master in the Leipzig Conservatorium, but now a member of the Court Orchestra, enjoys the reputation of being a brilliant player. Upon the present occasion he seemed to be suffering from indisposition, and hardly did himself justice. In addition to the Concerto, he played a Nocturno and a Burlesque of his own composition; the former is graceful, but too long; the latter is so burlesque that it sometimes exceeds the bounds of good taste; as a display piece, however, it showed what Herr Grützmacher could do in the way of overcoming difficulties.

The singer of the evening, Fräulein Amélie Weber, from Strasburg, had but just recovered from a severe and long continued indisposition, during which she had entirely lost her voice. Under these circumstances, coupled with the evident nervousness from which she was suffering, it would be unfair to express an opinion as to her powers. The "Der Freyschütz" overture, with which the concert closed, was a glorious performance. The last part of it was a wonderful example that railroad speed may be combined with perfect clearness of detail.

In the second Gewandhaus Chamber Music Concert, Herr Grützmacher took the place of Herr Lübeck, the other performers being, as usual, the Herren Reinecke (piano), David and Röntgen (violins), and Hermann (tenor). The works selected were Cherubini's Quartet in E flat, Mendelssohn's Sonata for pianoforte and violoncello in D, and Schubert's Quartet in D minor. The grand Cherubini Quartet at once excited the enthusiasm of the audience, who insisted on the Scherzo being repeated. Full of beauties as is Schubert's Quartet—the slow movement being one of the most touching things he ever wrote—it suffers from its extreme length, a fault which characterizes too many of its composer's works; the effect is not felt so much when listening to them, for then the beauty and interest keep the attention alive; but fatigue and exhaustion come when the performance is over.

The fifth Euterpe concert was devoted to chamber music, the performers being the Gebrüder Müller. These gentlemen are the sons of one of the four brothers who years ago enjoyed such a reputation for the excellence of their ensemble playing, and the fine artistic elegance of their reading. The present quartet may be said to have inherited, to a certain extent, the reputation of the elder, but more so in exquisiteness of ensemble than in the very highest musical endowments; the quartet is the strongest in the violoncello and tenor, these instruments being most excellently played. The programme consisted of the following quartets: Haydn, D major; Schumann, A minor, Op. 41, No. 1; and Beethoven, E flat, Op. 47. In Haydn's quartet the playing was perfect; but in the other a greater amount of warmth was wanted. Schumann's quartet, as is the case with so much of his chamber music, is not (!) enjoyable; the want of clearness, the prevalence of gloom, and the apparent groping for something which never comes, are at length painful. Beethoven's quartet, in itself a work difficult of comprehension, demands higher musical qualifications in its interpreters than were to be found upon the present occasion.

A most remarkable appearance has been that of Herr Satter, a pianist from Vienna, who at the invitation of the directors has played in the Conservatorium. His brilliancy of execution and strength of finger surpass anything I have ever heard. In a transcription of the Tannhäuser overture the violin passages, which are difficult enough to play smoothly in single notes, were given by him in octaves; the rendering of the orchestral effects was marvellous. Nor is it only as a player of display pieces that he excels; his interpretation of the piano-forte part of Mendelssohn's quartet in B minor was excellent in every respect. He also possesses the gift of musical extemporizing—one now so rarely cultivated. Two themes by Gluck and Weber were given him, and he at once sat down and worked them out so as not only to dazzle by the mechanical brilliancy, but also to astonish the mind by the exceeding cleverness of the work. The highest judges here, who have heard him in private, speak of the extraordinary instinct with which, when playing at sight, he seems at once to grasp the intentions of the composer.

BERLIN.—The Government has ordered of Micheli, the sculptor, a marble bust of Meyerbeer, to be placed in the concert hall of the Schauspielhaus.

The passage of the Austrian troops through Berlin, on their way back from Denmark, suggested to Herr Emil Bock the idea of a grand concert of military music, in which the Austrian and Prussian bands took part both together and separately. It is still a question which of those two organizations of military music is the best; but opinion was nearly unanimous in according more of fire and brío to the Austrian, and more of precision and artistic sentiment to the Prussian. The Prussian bands are all subject to the uniform rule of a great generalissimo in his sphere, Herr Wiprecht, who has even drilled monster bands of many hundreds of wind instruments to perform symphonies of Beethoven, arranged for them by himself!

The "Dom-chor," or royal Cathedral Choir of Berlin, now justly celebrated for the best church music in the world, commenced its annual series of concerts on the 1st December. The programme contained an Adoremus of Peri, a motet of Bach, a Salve Regina of Barnabei, the 100th Psalm of Mendelssohn, Handel's Hallelujah, a couple of church airs sung by Fräulein Malvina Strahl, and a Pater Noster by Meyerbeer, which excited particular interest.

COLOGNE.—Herr Richard Wagner's opera of Rienzi has been produced on a scale of almost unequalled splendor. The scenery was beautiful; the dresses gorgeous; and the number of supernumeraries greater, perhaps, than was ever known in this ancient city. Herr Niemann represented "the last of the Tribunes." The public were divided in opinion as to the merits of the music, but they all agreed in praising the magnificence of the mise-en-scène, and the manner in which singers and musicians performed their respective tasks. The Concerts at the Gürzenich, which have now become a regular institution, calmly and triumphantly pursue their course under the excellent guidance of Herr Ferdinand Hiller. The programme of the third concert commenced with Beethoven's Symphony in F major, No. 8. This was followed by a manuscript Agnus Dei and Dona nobis Pacem, from the pen of Cherubini, for Chorus and Orchestra. On the copy in Cherubini's own hand is the inscription: "Agnus Dei à 4 parties avec accompagnement à G. O. (Grand Orchestre), composé à Paris par L. Cherubini, et offert par le même à son cher ami Ferdinand Hiller." It contains an Adagio of thirty-one bars (4-4, in G minor) and a second movement, "Modéré sans lenteur," of 106 bars (3-4 in G major).—This was succeeded by two movements (the Adagio and the Allegro) from Spohr's Concerto, No. 6, played by Herr Joachim; the Overture, by Niels W. Gade, to Hamlet; Fugue, No. 3, in C, by Bach, played by Herr Joachim; "Abschiedslied" by Schumann: "Es ist bestimmt in Gottes Rath"; and Beethoven's Fantasia, No. 80, Herr Ferdinand Hiller taking the pianoforte part.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JAN. 7, 1865.

Christmas Music.

Our old HANDEL and HAYDN SOCIETY, "in accordance with a time-honored custom," gave their annual Christmas Oratorio—Handel's "Messiah" of course—on Saturday evening, Dec. 24, Christmas Eve, and repeated it the following evening, changing the group of solo singers, with the exception of the tenor. The Sunday evening performance was by far the best, and had the inspiration of by far the greatest audience; indeed it was a scene not surpassed by the Birmingham Festival,—our Music Hall, with its imposing Organ front, its bronze colossal Beethoven, and so utterly crammed as it was that night with so fine a looking and so enthusiastic a multitude.

On Saturday evening, church or home engagements probably kept many away; yet the Hall was quite well filled. The Oratorio did not seem to begin with the usual spirit; nor, through a large part of it, did it so deeply appeal to us, or transport us with the old feeling of its sublimity and beauty, its holiness and tenderness, its joyful encouragement and glory. It was, perhaps owing partly to our own mood and mental condition; in the case of a very familiar great work, like the "Messiah," the interest of the listener must be more or less accidental; and we, with all our old admiration unabated, still find it hard sometimes to hear it otherwise than listlessly and dully, unless there be some rare and special excellence in the performance,—a great singer, for instance, one of genius and inspiration, as well as noble voice and art, to rekindle its divine fire. Every habitual concert-goer, of course, has had more or less of this kind of experience; and it becomes a question, therefore, whether it is doing justice to any great work, even Handel's greatest, to let it get identified with conventional and periodical occasions, lest it should contract some of the dullness of all ceremonial ordinances whatsoever. But not all musical occasions are for the habitué; he must remember, what the Society does remember, that every year there has a fresh crop of eager audience grown up; a new generation has musically come of age, as it were, who wish to realize in their turn all that enthusiasm with which we, their elders, may have talked to them of Handel's great work. And it speaks badly for ourselves, too, if (in spite of occasional moods or accidents) we cannot feel more and more that speaks to our inmost soul in it as we grow older.

One experience in regard to the "Messiah," we are sure, many old lovers of the music must share with us. We found on Saturday, what we have found more and more from year to year, that it is the latter portions of the work which take the deeper hold upon us, and to which we listen with the fresher interest. The profound passages relating to the Passion; the choruses:

"Behold the Lamb," "And with his stripes;" the Quartet and Chorus: "Since by man came death," &c., as well as the great solos:—these reveal more and more musical and spiritual beauty and significance; they come nearer and fill out more of the whole after impression of the oratorio; and so it should be, naturally, with more experience of life.

It seemed to us on Saturday that the singers warmed up to their work more as they passed the middle portion. The latter choruses, and solos also, were given with more unction and effect. As for the artists, if they were not great, they were all good ones. Mrs. ANNA STONE ELIOT, returning to the scene and the great music of her old Boston triumphs, could not but excite much interest. She sang the great soprano recitatives and arias with the intelligent, well-studied conception and the same largeness of style as formerly—better, if anything, intellectually considered—and with only something less of the old brightness and clarion ring of voice. This time she took what is commonly given to a contralto, the air, "He was despised," with fine expression. Mrs. SMITH sang "Rejoice greatly," and "How beautiful," with charming purity, sweetness and evenness of voice, and with simplicity and truth of feeling. Miss RYAN did herself credit in the contralto pieces, the chief drawback being that she over-exerted her voice, very naturally magnifying to herself the terrors of singing for the first time in the great Hall. Mr. WHEELER, who sustained all the tenor solos on both evenings, having scarcely risen from an illness of some weeks, deserves praise for such loyalty to art; his voice was weaker than we could have wished, although it seemed to summon up a good degree of power in "Thou shalt dash them;" but all his renderings were musical, refined and tasteful. Mr. M. W. WHITNEY made a decidedly good impression in the bass solos, both in voice and execution; his tones and manner are alike musical and manly.

On Sunday evening, the special feature of interest was the re-appearance, after several years retirement from the concert room, of Mrs. J. H. LONG, who took upon her the entire soprano part with even more acceptance, more sustained ease, power, eloquence of delivery, more sweetness, evenness and reach of voice, more finish and maturity of style, than in the days when these great songs were thought to be hers by right among all our native singers. There are singers in the world, to be sure, in whom one feels, besides all this, the spell of genius, and of that more inward, soulful character of voice, which sometimes works rarer miracles with less art. But certainly Mrs. Long's delivery of "I know that my Redeemer liveth," is no ordinary achievement. She seemed to have the sympathies of the vast audience completely. We need not say that Mrs. J. S. CARY's warm and sympathetic contralto made itself felt, and made those sweet and touching strains felt. The bass songs fell to the share of Mr. RUDOLPHSEN, who continues to acquire more mastery of our English accent, and whose substantial bass voice sustains itself through the Handelian roulades gracefully and well. The choruses went remarkably well that night, the Great Organ accompaniment by Mr. LANG replenishing them with great waves of harmony; and, as we said before, the whole ensemble, chorus, orchestra and soli, must have lifted the heaviness of labor into the joy of success for Mr. ZERRAHN and the Society whose forces have grown into such good rapport with him as teacher and conductor.

We hear of numerous performances of the "Messiah in smaller cities, in some cases for the first time as a whole. In Hartford, the "Beethoven Society" gave it, assisted by the "Germania Orchestra," under the direction of Mr. BARNETT, with the soprano and alto arias distributed among a large number of singers. Dr. GUILMETTE in the bass, and Mr. WANDER in the tenor. In Worcester, it was given on Tuesday evening by the "Mozart Society" without orchestra, Mr. LANG accompanying on the great Worcester Organ, and Mr. B. D. ALLEN conducting. Both of these performances were eminently successful, it would seem. The Christmas musical service in many of the churches of this city and vicinity, was in some instances rare. Most noteworthy must be reckoned the performance of Beethoven's earlier Mass (in C) at the Church of the Immaculate Conception, under the direction of Mr. WILLCOX, who played the orchestral accompaniments on the noble Organ which the Messrs. Hook have placed there. It was an enterprise quite honorable to Mr. Willcox and his choir, and we regretted that we could not be there to hear.

Otto Dresel's Concerts.

Mr. Dresel's fifth and last concert shared the stormy fate of the four others with regard to weather. Yet the audience, which quite filled the Chickering Hall during the fourth Saturday snow-storm, more than filled it this time. So large, so eager, so respectful and even appreciative an audience for piano music of the finest and the rarest sort is seldom seen in an American city, if indeed anywhere. These were the compositions interpreted:

1. From the "Skizzen für den Pedalfügel," (op. 58. No. 1.) Schumann.
Sarabande and Rondo from Partita, in G minor. J.S. Bach.
From the "Skizzen für den Pedalfügel," (op. 58. No. 2.) Schumann.
2. Sonata, E flat (op. 31). Beethoven.
Allegro. Scherzo. Menuetto. Presto con fuoco.
3. Gigue. . . . . Mozart.
Allegretto in form of a Canon, from the "Studien für den Pedalfügel," op. 58. Schumann.
4. Presto Scherzando. . . . . Mendelssohn.
5. Septet. . . . . Hummel.
(Arrangement for Two Pianos).
- Allegro con spirito. Scherzo. Andante con Variazioni. Finale.
6. Notturmo, (D flat, op. 27). . . . . Chopin.
- Valse, (A flat, op. 31). . . . . Chopin.

This programme was in some respects a departure from Mr. D.'s original intention, which included still a third Concerto by Bach (for two pianos, with accompaniments on a third); but the third pianist was called to other and sadder duties. One change (where programme-making is an art) involves another; the same cause robbed us of Chopin's remarkable Fantasia on Polish airs, which would have been a fresh addition to our knowledge of him. But it gave us, in the place of both, another Beethoven Sonata, one of the most interesting, finely imaginative, delightfully original and Beethovenish of them all, the op. 31, in E flat. Surely it would be hard to name anything by any composer, which the more musical, or indeed the larger, portion of that audience would willingly have taken in exchange for it,—at least after such a masterly, thoroughly poetic and sympathetic, as well as technically perfect rendering as we had of it. It was the very soul of Beethoven that vibrated upon those strings and through us all.

We could not but admire the happy grouping of the three (or rather four) little pieces included in the opening number of the concert. How bright and altogether piquant and delightful the Saraband and Rondo of Bach sounded between the two more deeply shaded "sketches" which Schumann wrote for a piano-forte with pedal bass, hence somewhat in the organ style. Mr. LEONHARD played the pedal part on a second piano. Both are compositions of great beauty, dignity and rich suggestion, especially the second one. But it was a nice thought to place the Bach things between them; it set them in the clearest and most genial light and made them unmistakable.

This placing of a piece in a programme is as important as the hanging of a picture in a gallery; the best thing of a quiet sort may be extinguished, all its light put out, by the wrong sort of neighbors, or be framed into its own native halo by the right ones. Everybody was charmed by the leisurely, composed, thoughtful movement, the quaint imaginativeness and grace of the Bach Sarabande, and by the dancing sunshine of the Rondo, which is a perfect instance of the art of composition in only two parts, each part so covering, answering to, reflecting and illustrating the other, so flinging back the same ideas and phrases with new flashes of meaning, that all the purposes of full four-part harmony are virtually answered by this interplay of two twin melodies.

Mendelssohn's Presto Scherzando is one of his finest and freshest piano-forte creations; full of fire and life, and charming in the more quiet cantilena-like episodes. The Septet by Hummel was far more effective than we should have imagined without the wind instruments. The witching little horn passage in the Trio of the Scherzo was palpably enough suggested, and the perfect grace and neatness of that little movement made a repeat imperative. The whole work is full of elegance and genial beauty, and it brought Mr. Dresel's cleanness, fluency, brilliancy and consummate grace of execution to the most triumphant test. It is not necessary to tell again (or rather, try to tell) how he interprets Chopin.

These concerts have been a most remarkable success in all respects; and there is a very general and eager appetite for more from the same source.

Italian Opera.

MAX MARETZKE, with his Italian singers and singers in Italian, holds the Boston Theatre this week and for a few weeks to come. Our New York correspondence has already furnished us with some anticipations of the artists and the repertoire. Donizetti's Polio (or, "The Martyr,") was chosen for the opening on Monday night; a very poor, uninteresting opera, as many of us had had cause to know before; and a thin house was the consequence. Indeed we can think of no work even of Donizetti's which is so commonplace (hear the beginning of a melody, and you know just how it will end); so full of the feeble intense as a make-believe for passion; so empty and so noisy, trying to hide the lack of inspiration, or to enforce the semblance thereof, by dreadful hounding on of drums and brass. This is strikingly the case in the overture—especially if you happened to sit near the drum end of the orchestra, where you could hear almost nothing else. The arias d'entrée in which the tenor, the soprano and the baritone respectively introduced themselves, are all uninteresting. In the finale of the second act there is some pomp and grandeur of musical ensemble, as well as of scenic display; but you almost fancy you are listening to Lucia again, and wondering whether it is quite the same. The part which brings the house down, more thanks to the singers than the music, is the duet of the martyr lovers in the prison scene; but here the rapid final movement, coupled with the most exalted situation, and designed to express the heavenly ecstasy of wedded souls about to lay down their lives for truth, is a most trivial, unmeaning, vulgar brass band sort of tune, strangely belying the rapt faces and the earnest tones and gestures of the singers.

The piece was doubtless chosen for the leading singers, and not the singers for the piece. Mme. CAROZZI ZUCCHI, the new prima donna, is evidently, at home in parts of such tragical intensity and vehemence. Her voice is large, clear, firm, alike telling in the higher, middle, and lower registers, and able to cope with long and arduous reaches of such music. She has a fine presence, a great deal of dramatic force, filling out the part completely and not overdoing. There was no lack of delicacy in the tenderer passages; yet the voice, although not unsympathetic, has not the fine, soulful quality, which would lead us to remember her with Bosio, Griis, Lagrange, Frederici, and others. It is of somewhat coarser fibre, more physical in its intensity, and indeed one of the better instances of the kind of voice which seems naturally to grow out of the singing of the Polio and the Travatore kind of music.

Sig. MASSIMILIANI, the new tenor, has little grace of person, and a rather hard, close quality of voice; yet some splendid tones came out of him, as he warmed up into greater freedom and abandon; for he began with saving his real force. It is said that Polio-to and Polio are his peculiar parts; if so, his sphere is not a very thankful one. BELLINI, the able baritone of last year, sang and acted admirably, so far as an uninteresting part allowed him. A second tenor, Herr REICHART, in the smaller part of Nearco, made a good impression as far as it went. The chorus, male and female, was quite full and strong and accurate, and the orchestra excellent, bating the excess of drums and brass.

Martha was performed on Tuesday, to a large house, with Miss KELLOGG, Miss MORENSI, and Sig. or Herr LOTTI in the principal parts. We were not able to be present.

On Wednesday night, an uncommonly good performance of Don Giovanni, which drew the first really large audience. The orchestra was admirably subdued and true to its fine task; as well it might have been, seeing that CARL BERGMANN occupied the conductor's seat. The leading parts were remarkably well cast; very seldom do we have all three prime donne so effective. Mme. CAROZZI's Donna Anna was full of dignity, dramatic truth and force, not of the finest kind, but always effective, especially in the excited recitative and aria in which, he denounces Don Juan. She did not sing the "Letter" aria. Nor did MORENSI sing Elvira's best piece: Mi tradi, with the recitative preceding; but her rich and powerful contralto voice, well trained and even, of good compass, her broad, true, honest style of singing, her grace of person and dramatic truth of action, made hers one of the best of the Elviras. Miss KELLOGG, as Zerlina, sang more exquisitely than ever, and she was full of life and pretty by-play; but we cannot like her conception of the character; it lacks simplicity, unconsciousness, and that refinement which the music reveals in the nature, underneath the rustic garb, of the innocent little coquette. M. DUBREUIL is always in his right place as Masetto; he does it to the life.

BELLINI made an excellent Don Juan; courtly, splendid, fascinating, with no trait of vulgarity. His voice told far more effectively than poor SUSINI's, who either had a very bad cold, or is losing the lower part of his once kingly basso. He grew more and more husky; yet his Leporello had excellent points. There was by no means a Commendatore comparable with that of Hermanns; but Herr WEINLICH's voice, though hard and rough, was telling, and filled out the trio of busses very well.

LOTTI's small, sweet, flexible tenor, has some very fine notes; his rendering of Il mio tesoro, and of all the music was artistic and agreeable. His fine extra song, too, (Dalla sua pace) was omitted. Strange to say, it was as a whole a better performance than the Germans gave us. But there can be no question that Don Giovanni sounds better than Don Juan; the Italian language suits its musical periods best; for it they were originally written.

[The most of the following paragraphs were prepared for our last paper, but crowded out for want of room.]

"COURS D' HARMONIE." We had the pleasure of witnessing the first of Mlle. GABRIELLE DE LAMORTE's lessons in the rudiments of Harmony; and we were astonished at the clearness and fluency, the mastery of her subject and of the English language, with which she explained point after point, with illustrations on the black-board. Her ideas are well systematized, (making of course no pretension to novelty,—though there was a certain originality in the way of presenting the thing); her method lucid and progressive; and the wonder was that she held the attention of her class throughout two hours, without once touching a piano or letting the ear realize a single tone. We cannot think, however, that she will go on far teaching the science of tone only through the eye.

FROM THE MOUNTAINS. There is to be a grand choral visitation from New Hampshire to our Music Hall, on the evening of January 6th. The "N. H. State Musical Convention," holding its annual session that week at Concord, is to descend upon us, a thousand voices strong, under the direction of Mr. L. O. EMERSON, and sing great choruses from Handel, Mendelssohn, &c., in connection with the Great Organ. May they bring as bracing an air with them, as the annual descent of the Yorkshire singers upon London!

MR. HERMANN DAUM. This gentleman, as many of our readers are aware, has been for many months confined by painful and exhausting illness, disabling him entirely, and for some time to come, we fear, from all professional exertion. We are glad to hear that his fellow artists are arranging a concert for his benefit, to take place in a few weeks, when many of our best singers and players (The Mendelssohn Quintette Club, the "Orpheus," Miss Houston, Miss Ryan, Mr. J. K. Paine, the organist, &c.,) will do their best to make a most attractive programme. It will be but a just tribute to one of our most earnest, accomplished and amiable musicians and teachers. Further particulars in due time.

Messrs. Hook, the builders of the celebrated Worcester Organ, have finished a large and beautiful instrument for Sacramento, Cal. It comprises two complete manuals, in which every stop extends through the whole compass of 56 notes; and two Pedal stops of two octaves.

The case is of Romanesque design, built of black walnut, forming a pleasing contrast to the rich silvery appearance of the front pipes, which are of burnished tin.

The organ contains many excellent solo stops, which allow of the most beautiful combinations and orchestral effects. The effect of the full organ is exceedingly grand and beautiful, giving a volume of tone full and broad in its foundation, and very rich and brilliant in choruses.

Great care has been taken in the selection of materials and in the workmanship throughout, to make this a model organ. Indeed we think it just the instrument to be sent to California as a representative of Boston skill in organ building, which, having reached a very creditable height before, has been so greatly quickened by the presence of the magnificent German Organ in the Music Hall.

A NEW BUFFO COMPANY. The Evening Post tells us of a new Italian buffo company, with an American prima donna, consisting of Laura Harris, Mongiardini, Ardiani and Fellini, which will play next week at Niblo's Saloon and in Brooklyn. The programme includes Rossini's "Gazza Ladra," which has not been sung here since the days of Steffanone in 1852—and his "Barbiere." Donizetti's "Don Pasquale" and "L'Elisir" will also be produced. As this troupe will appear in unpretending style and a small room, adapted to the light voice and florid execution of the young prima donna, there is every prospect of the enterprise meeting with success.

A SCOTCH CRITICISM.—The New York Albion, in noticing the last Philharmonic concert, has this queer theory of the origin of Mendelssohn's A-minor Symphony. We do not think, however, that the composer visited Scotland with any such malice prepense. And we suspect that this Englishman underrates Mendelssohn's genius quite as much as most Englishmen are inclined to overrate it.

Mendelssohn was not blessed with the lazy inspiration of genius. His was a talent of the highest possible order—but still a talent, and dependent therefore on industry, taste, and outside impressions. After much reflection he thought, in the present case, that he would write a Scotch Symphony. When he had entirely mustered this resolve, there remained but one other preliminary—namely, to buy a portmanteau and go at once to Scotland. There, amid wild glens, the shimmering lochs, the towering bens, did he conscientiously study the style and form that were needed. To us—of grosser fibre—who have smoked cuttie pipes, and laddled out punch by the hour, there is nothing very strong in the flavor thus laboriously procured. A gentleman who habitually took snuff with a spoon, and lived a life of bound captivity in a plaid shawl, once informed us that "Maindlesoon" couldn't play the pipes. This we readily can believe; but this in the mind of our Northern friend, accounted for all the imperfections of his character, and, if we are not mistaken, explained the reason why he had a cough. It may also serve as a key to the defects of the symphony. The scherzando is dimly sprinkled with Ess. Caldonia, but it lacks the true Northern strength, bearing to the latter about the same relation that Charlotte Russe does to Uggis. Nevertheless it is piquant and pleasant. The fourth movement is really grand, especially the "Finale Maestoso." Throughout the entire work there are indications of extreme care, of exquisite taste, of thorough culture, and of supreme talent. For these reasons, it must always afford pleasure to a cultivated audience, to hear this composition carefully performed—and the more cultivated and refined the audience, the greater will be the esteem in which the master is held. He is essentially a carpet musician. Nothing on earth could have induced him to stagger into society, with dirty boots and a belcher handkerchief round his throat, like that great shaggy Beethoven.

QUEER MISPRINT. The mischievous small types smuggled into our last number, in the programme of Mr. Dresel's concert, an R instead of a K, which ludicrously changed the meaning. Kindermärchen (or, fairy tale for children) is the title of the little piece by Moscheles; it was printed "Rindermärchen," or fairy tale for cattle!

POUGHKEEPSIE, N. Y. Our columns of Musical Correspondence have before now borne witness to the great attention paid to music, and especially to classical music, at Cottage Hill Seminary, the flourishing school for young ladies, of which the Rev. GEORGE T. RIDER is the Principal. Not only is music treated as one of the most important branches of a lady's education; not only does the pupil have good music set before her for practice, instead of glittering trash; but the aid of artists is from time to time called in, to let the pupils and their friends hear a concert made up from the works of the master composers. The last occasion of the kind was on the evening of Dec. 22, when the first "Soirée Classique," or "Evening with the Great Composers," was given by a quintet of solo performers from the West Point Band, under the direction of Mr. APPELLES, Band-master, assisted by Miss GEORGINA PAIGE. The programme included: Quintet (strings) in G minor, by Mozart; Scene and Aria from Der Freyschütz, by Miss Paige; a Violin solo, by Klingebiel, played by Appeltes (not the old Greek painter, any more than a certain Herr Plato whom we saw in Berlin, is the old philosopher); Quartet in G, op. 96, by Haydn; Adagio from Spohr's Quartet, op. 43; song, Beethoven's Adelaide; Solo on the French Horn; and Quintet in E-flat, op. 4, by Beethoven.

NEWPORT, R. I. Music has been paying pleasant winter visits to the all-the-year-round inhabitants of the famous old watering place, in the shape of a series of Chamber Concerts by the MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB, assisted by Miss RYAN, the singer. The Newporters appear to appreciate the privilege, which is something new to them, and which they owe to the zeal for all good things æsthetic, as well as patriotic and humane, of Col. T. W. HIGGINSON, who is passing the winter with them.

THE QUESTION SETTLED! A certain "Aylmer" writes a musical letter to the Springfield Republican, about the late "Choral Festival" in New York, in which he tilts against the windmill of Bach's Fugues, with such annihilating vehemence, that the opinion of Mozart and Mendelssohn, and all the really great composers, not excepting jovial Rossini, must henceforth pass for nothing. Read! Master Paine, and tremble, and be silent evermore:

Mr. C. J. Hopkins gave the Toccata in F, which has claimed an ex-officio place upon many of the programmes of the Boston Music Hall, and—shades of Bach, forgive—it was, as usual with fugues, a chaos of sound and fury, signifying nothing. It is all very well to talk of the fugue as classical. Is it any more classical than the chromatic scale? And is there any music in the chromatic scale itself? If any disciple of Bach can tell what the fugue means, he will seem to many to hold a more reasonable position after he has interpreted it, than while he rails at the multitude for their lack of appreciation.

Read, Master Dresel, and forsaking the wrong way, humbly crave permission to sit at the feet of Master Gamaliel Gottschalk! As for you, Master Robert Franz, what can you do but leave editing of Bach, and devote the rest of your life to pious meditation on the operas of Verdi, or the pretty Offertoires of Batiste; or come over here and fatten on the broad fields and pastures green of Yankee psalmody? Peradventure, in due time, you may become sleek and prosperous enough to exchange the German Doctorate for a fresh "Mus. Doc." from some New York University.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- Gentle mother calls us home. Song with Cho. H. Fontrill. 30
A very sweet poem, with music better than common.
- Molly Bawn Asthore. Ballad. H. S. Thompson. 30
Mr. Thompson seems to catch the spirit of Irish song with ease, and his music warbles about the charming Molly with a very perfect "at home" air, as if used to the green bogs and brass of the "old country."
- Little Nell's lament. Song & Cho. H. Fontrill. 30
So little yellow Nell has come North at last; and the contraband's daughter seeks an audience. A simple and natural ballad.
- Home once more. Ballad. S. Glover. 30
A "homeward bound" song, with good words, and good, classical melody.
- Janet's bridal. Claribel. 30
A simple and pure song of a country bridal morning. The bride rejoices in her "chaplet of blue-bells," which "Donald" has sent her, and prepares to walk over the path, strewn with flowers by "sweet Mary and Alice." Melody pretty.
- Meet me down by the sea. Song. H. Fontrill. 30
Like the others by the same author, better than the average, and has a good melody.

Instrumental Music.

- Sonata for the Organ. Mendelssohn. Op. 65, No. 3. 75
This will rank in the first class of published organ compositions. It combines richness of harmonic texture with delicacy of expression and deep feeling. There is a part for the pedals, of considerable variety, but not especially difficult. It was introduced to the public at the Inauguration of the Great Organ by Mr. Lang.
- Fragment of the Andante of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. Transcribed by E. Batiste.
Our organ repertoire grows richer, weekly. This skillful arrangement adds one to those of lasting value to buy and retain.
- Whippoorwill polka. G. F. Spalding. 30
Introduces the call of the whippoorwill, with brilliant variations, which the bird would do well to learn. Quite pretty.
- Turkish March, from the "Ruins of Athens." For violin and piano. Eichberg. 35
Another favor to the public by this excellent leader and composer. Buy it soon, so as to be able to play it these winter evenings.
- Toujours mobile. Galop. A. Birgfeld. 35
Peggy Brown. Waltz. J. P. Clark. 60
Two good pieces by well-known composers.

Books.

- Excelsior Collection for the Accordion. 75
Excelsior Collection for the Violin. 75
Excelsior Collection for the Flute. 75
By S. Winner.
These three books are similar in design, and each contains a large number of pleasing familiar and unfamiliar melodies, selected and arranged with the tact and skill for which Mr. Winner is so noted.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 621.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JAN. 21, 1865.

VOL. XXIV. No. 22.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

The First Opera.

A NOVELETTE OF THE PAST (1555).

Translated from the French of HECTOR BERLIOZ

by KATHARINE FRANCES M. RAYMOND.

ALFONSO DELLA VIOLA TO BENVENUTO CELLINI
Florence, July 27, 1555.

I am sad, Benvenuto; I am tired, disgusted; or rather, to tell the truth, I am ill; I feel myself growing thin, as you grew thin before you had revenged the death of Francesco. But you were soon cured, and will the day of my cure ever arrive? God knows. Yet what suffering is more deserving of pity than mine? To what unfortunate would Christ and his holy mother render more justice in according to him that sovereign remedy, that precious balm, which has most power to calm the bitter pains felt by an artist, outraged in art and in his person, vengeance? Oh no, Benvenuto, no; without wishing to deny your right to stab the miserable officer who had killed your brother, I cannot help placing an infinite distance between your offence and mine. What had that poor devil done, after all? Shed the blood of the son of your mother, it is true. But the officer was commanding a night round; Francesco was drunk; after having insulted and thrown stones at the detachment, without any reason, he even went so far, in his extravagance, as to try to carry off the soldiers' arms; they made use of them, and your brother perished. Nothing was more easy to foresee, and you must admit that nothing could have been more just.

But I am not in such a position. Although they have done worse than to kill me, I in no way deserved my fate; it was just when I had a right to reward, that I received insult and outrage.

You know with what perseverance I have striven for long years to increase the force, to multiply the resources of music. Neither the ill will of the old masters, nor the stupid jokes of their pupils, nor the mistrust of the dilettanti, who look on me as an eccentric man, more nearly allied to folly than genius, nor the material obstacles of all kinds created by poverty, have been able to arrest me, as you know. I may say it, as in my eyes the merit of such a course is perfectly null.

The young Monteccho, named Romeo, whose adventures and tragic death made so much noise at Verona a few years ago, was certainly not able to resist the spell that attracted him to the lovely Giulietta, daughter of his mortal enemy. Passion was stronger than the insults of the Capuletti, stronger than the steel and the poison with which he was ceaselessly threatened; Giulietta loved him, and for the sake of an hour passed near her, he would have braved death a thousand times. Well! my Giulietta is music, and, by heaven! I am loved in return.

Two years ago, I formed the plan of a theatrical work unknown until now, in which singing, accompanied by various instruments, was to take the place of spoken language, and to awaken, by means of its union with the drama, impressions such as even the highest poetry has not yet produced. Unfortunately, this project was very expensive; only a sovereign or a Jew could undertake to realize it.

All our Italian princes have heard of the bad effect of the pretended musical tragedy executed at Rome towards the end of the last century; the ill-success of the "Orfeo" of Angelo Politiano, another essay in the same style, is not unknown to them; and nothing would have been more useless than to request their aid in an enterprise in which old masters had so completely failed. I should have been taxed anew with pride and folly.

I did not think of the Jews for a moment; all that I could reasonably hope from them, was to be shown out, on the simple enunciation of my plan, without insult, or the hooting of the servants; besides, I did not know one sufficiently intelligent for me to count on so much generosity with certainty. I renounced hope, not without sorrow, you may believe; and with an oppressed heart I again returned to the obscure labors, by means of which I live, but which are only accomplished at the expense of those which would probably be rewarded by fame and fortune.

Another new idea began to trouble me soon after. Do not laugh at my discoveries, Cellini, and beware, above all, of comparing my young art to yours, long ago formed. You know enough of music to understand me. In good faith, do you believe that our heavy madrigals in four parts are the last degree of perfection to which composition and execution may attain? Does not good sense tell us, that, in regard to expression and musical form, these boasted works are mere childishness and stupidity?

The words express love, anger, jealousy, courage; but the melody, always the same, resembles the dull psalmody of the mendicant friars. Is this all that melody, harmony, rhythm, can accomplish? May there not be a thousand applications of these different parts of the art which are yet unknown to us? Does not an attentive examination of what is, lead us to a presentiment of what will and ought to be? And who has drawn all their power from the instruments? What is our miserable accompaniment, which does not dare to leave the voices, but continually follows them in the unison or octave? Does instrumental music, individually taken, exist? And in the manner of employing the voice, what prejudices, what routine! Why always sing in four parts, even when it is a person complaining of his isolation?

Is it possible to hear anything more unreasonable than the canzonets lately introduced in tragedies, where an actor, who speaks in his own name and appears alone on the stage, is nevertheless accompanied by three other voices placed behind the scenes, from whence they follow his voice as well or ill as they can?

Be sure, Benvenuto, that what our masters, intoxicated with their works, call the height of art to-day, is as far from what will be called music in two or three centuries, as those monstrous little bipeds, made by children out of mud, are far from your sublime Perseus, or the Moses of Buonarrotti.

There are numberless modifications to be brought into an art as yet little advanced—it must yet make immense progress. And why should I not help to give the impulsion that will produce this?

But, without telling you of what my last invention consists, it will suffice for you to know that it was of such a nature, that it could be brought out with the aid of ordinary means, and without having recourse to the patronage of the rich or great. Only time was wanting, and, the work once finished, it would have been easy to find an opportunity of producing it during the festivals, which attract to Florence the elect among the noble and the lovers of art of all nations.

Well, here is the cause of the heavy and bitter anger which gnaws at my heart:

One morning, while I was busied on this singular composition, the success of which would have rendered me celebrated all over Europe, my Lord Galezzao, a confidant of the Grand Duke's, who, last year, much liked my scene of Ugolino, came to me and said:

"Alfonso, your day is come. There is no more question of madrigals, cantatas, or canzonets, Listen to me: the marriage festivals will be splendid, and nothing will be spared to give them a brilliancy worthy of the two illustrious families about to be allied; your last successes have created confidence; at they court they believe in you now.

"I knew of your plan of a tragedy set to music, and have spoken of it to my lord; your idea pleases him. Set to work, then, and may your dream become a reality! Write your lyric drama, and fear nothing as to its execution; the best singers of Rome and Milan will be ordered to Florence; the best virtuosos of every kind will be at your service; the prince is magnificent, he will refuse you nothing; if you equal what I expect from you, your triumph is certain and your fortune made."

I cannot describe what passed within me on hearing this unexpected intelligence. I remained silent and motionless. Astonishment and joy deprived me of speech and gave me the air and attitude of an idiot. Galeazzo understood the cause of my trouble, and, pressing my hand, said: "Adieu, Alfonso; you consent, do you not? You promise me to give up all other composition, to devote yourself exclusively to that which his highness demands of you? Remember that the marriage will take place in three months!" and, as I only answered by an affirmative movement of the head, without being able to speak, "Come, be calm, Vesuvius, adieu! To-morrow you will receive your engagement; it shall be signed this evening. It is a settled affair. Courage! We reckon on you."

When I was alone, it seemed to me that all the cascades of Terni and Tivoli were seething in my head.

It was worse when I fully comprehended my good fortune, when I again pictured to myself the grandeur and beauty of my task. I throw myself on my libretto, which had been yellowing in a corner so long; I once more behold Paolo, Francesca, Dante, Virgil, the shadows and the damned; I hear that ravishing love sigh and complain; tender and graceful melodies, full of abandonment, melancholy, chaste passion, unroll themselves within me; the horrible cry of hatred of the outraged husband resounds; I see two corpses roll together at his feet; then I find the ever united souls of the two lovers, wandering and blown by the winds through the depths of the abyss; their plaintive voices mingle with the dull and distant noise of the infernal floods, with the hissing of flame, with the agonized cries of the unfortunate whom it pursues, with the frightful concert of eternal torment.

For three days, Cellini, I walked about without an object, in a continual vertigo; during three nights I was unable to sleep. It was only after this long attack of fever, that clear thought and the feeling of reality returned to me. I needed all this period of ardent and desperate struggle to conquer my imagination, and control my subject. At length I became the master of it.

In this immense frame, every part of the picture, in simple and logical order, revealed itself little by little, clothed in simple or brilliant colors, in half-tints or decided tone; human forms appeared, here full of life, there under the pale and cold aspect of death. The poetic idea, always submissive to the musical sense, was no obstacle; I strengthened, embellished, and enlarged one by means of the other. Finally I did what I would, as I would, and with so much ease, that at the end of the second month the entire work was finished.

I confess that I felt the need of repose; but in thinking over all the minute precautions which I must take in order to ensure the success of my work, vigor and vigilance returned to me. I superintended singers, musicians, copyists, machinists and decorators.

All was put in order with the most astonishing precision, and this gigantic musical machine was about to move majestically, when an unexpected blow broke the springs, and annihilated at once, the fine endeavors, and the legitimate hopes of your unhappy friend.

The grand duke, who of his own free will had requested this drama in music from me; who had made me neglect the other composition on which I counted to render my name popular; he whose gilded words had swollen the heart, and inflamed the imagination of an artist,—he plays with all this now; he tells this imagination to cool itself, this heart to calm itself or break; what does it matter to him! He is opposed, in short, to the performance of "Francesca;" the Milanese and Roman artists have been ordered to return home; my drama will not be placed on the stage; the grand duke does not want it any more; he has changed his mind. The crowd already assembled in Florence, attracted less by the splendor of the marriage festivities than by the interested curiosity awakened throughout Italy by the promise of a musical festival,—this crowd, hungry for new sensations, deceived in its expectations, inquires what may be the motive which thus brutally deprives it of the spectacle it sought, and unable to discover it, does not hesitate to attribute it to the incapacity of the composer. Every one says: "This famous drama was absurd, no doubt; the grand duke, aware in time of the truth, is not willing that the powerless attempt of an ambitious artist should throw ridicule on the solemnity in preparation. It cannot be anything else. A prince does not break his word in this way. Della Viola is still the vain, extravagant fellow we knew him to be; his work was not presentable, and, out of regard for him, they abstain from saying so openly." Oh, Cellini! oh, my noble, proud, and worthy friend! Reflect an instant, and judge from yourself of what I must have suffered from this incredible abuse of power, this unheard of violation of the most formal promises, this horrible and unexpected affront, this insolent calumny on a production which no one in the world, save myself, knows yet.

What is to be done? What is to be said to the herd of imbecile cowards who laugh when they see me? Who is the author of this diabolical plot? and how to be revenged? Cellini! Cellini! why are you in France? why can I not see and ask advice, aid, and assistance from you? By Bacchus, they will make a madman of me! Cowardice! Shame! I feel the tears in my eyes. Away with all weakness! On the contrary, strength, attention, and coolness are indispensable to me; for I will revenge myself, Benvenuto, I will. When and how, matters not; but I will be revenged, I swear to you, and you will be content. Adieu! The fame of your new triumphs has reached us; I congratulate you, and rejoice with you on account of them, with all my soul. Heaven grant only, that king Francis may leave you sufficient time to answer your suffering and yet unrevenged friend!

ALFONSO DELLA VIOLA.

BENVENUTO TO ALFONSO.

Paris, Aug. 20th, 1555.

I admire, my dear Alfonso, the candor of your indignation. Mine is great, be convinced of that, but it is more calm. I have too often met with similar deceptions, to be astonished at what you have lately passed through. The trial of your youthful courage was rough, I allow, and the revolt of your soul against an insult so grave and so little deserved, is as just as it is natural. Your retired life, your meditations, your solitary labors, can teach you nothing of the intrigues that agitate the loftiest regions of art, or of the real character of men in power, who are too often the arbiters of an artist's destiny.

Some events in my own history, of which I have until now left you in ignorance, will suffice to throw some light on our position in general, and yours in particular.

I do not fear the effect of my story on your constancy; your character reassures me; I know it, I have studied it well. You will persevere, you will arrive at the goal in spite of every thing; you are a man of iron; and the stone aimed at your head by the low passions that lie hid on your road, far from bruising your forehead, will strike fire from it. Learn, then, all that I have suffered, and may these sad examples of the injustice of the great serve as a lesson to you.

The bishop of Salamanca, ambassador to Rome, had requested me to make a large ewer for him, the workmanship of which, extremely minute and delicate, occupied me more than two months, while it had almost ruined me, in consequence of the enormous quantity of precious metal necessary to its composition. His Excellency was lavish in praise of the rare merit of my work, had it taken away, and left me for two whole months without mentioning anything more of the payment than if he had received an old saucepan, or a medal of Fioretti from me. Good fortune ordained that the vase should again fall into my hands for a small repair which it needed; I refused to give it up again.

The cursed prelate, after having covered me with insults, worthy of a priest and a Spaniard, tried to get from me a receipt for the sum which he still owed me; but as I am not a man to be taken in so coarse a trap, his Excellency sent his valets to attack my workshop. I expected the trick; so, when the rascals advanced to break down my door, Ascanio, Paolino and I, armed to the teeth, gave them such a reception, that the next day, thanks to my carbine and my long dagger, I was paid at last.*

Something worse happened to me afterwards, when I had made the celebrated button for the pope's cape, a piece of wonderful workmanship, which I cannot help describing to you. I had placed the large diamond precisely in the centre of the work, with the figure of God above, in so easy an attitude, that the jewel was not at all embarrassed by it, but a fine harmony resulted from it; he gave the blessing by raising his right hand. Below, I had grouped three little angels, who sustained him with upraised arms. The centre angel was in alto, the two others in basso-relievo. Round them were a number of other little angels arranged with other precious stones. God, the Deity, wore a floating mantle, from which issued cherubim and a thousand ornaments of admirable effect.

Clement the Seventh, full of enthusiasm when he saw the button, promised to give me all that I asked. But the affair stopped there; and as I refused to make a chalice for him which he asked from me besides, always without giving me the money, the good pope, become as furious as a wild beast, had me sent to prison for six weeks. That was all that I ever obtained from him.* I had not been at liberty a month, when I met Pompeo, the miserable goldsmith who had had the insolence to be jealous of me, and from whom I had for a long time defended my poor life with difficulty. I despised him too much to hate him; but, on seeing me, he affected an air of raillery that was not common to him, and which, embittered as I then was, I found it impossible to bear. At the first movement I made to strike him in the face, fear caused him to turn his head, and the dagger stroke hit him just above the ear. I only gave him two, but at the first he fell dead. It had not been my intention to kill him, but in such a state of mind as I was, who can be sure of his blows? And so, after having suffered an odious imprisonment, I was obliged to fly, because, under the impulse of the just anger caused by the avarice and bad faith of a pope, I had crushed a scorpion.

Paul the third, who overwhelmed me with commands of every kind, did not pay me for them more punctually than his predecessor; but, to make it appear as though I was in the wrong, he invented an expedient worthy of him, and truly atrocious. My enemies, of whom I had a great number about his holiness, accused me one day to him, of having stolen the jewels belonging to pope Clement. Paul the third, who was well aware of the contrary, affected, notwithstanding, to believe me guilty, and had me shut up in the castle of Saint Angelo; in the fort which I had so well defended some years before, during the siege of Rome; under the ramparts from whence I had fired off more shots than all the cannoneers together, and from whence I had, to the pope's great joy, killed the constable of Bourbon. I succeeded in escaping. I reached the exterior walls; suspended to a rope above the moat, I invoke God, who knows the justice of my cause, and cry to him, as I let myself drop: "Help me, oh, Lord, since I help myself!" God does not hear me, and in my fall I injure a leg. Exhausted, dying, covered with blood, dragging myself along on my hands and knees, I reach the palace of my intimate friend, Cardinal Cornaro. This scoundrel traitorously gives me up to the pope, in order to obtain a bishopric.

* Historical.

Paul condemns me to death; then, as though he repented of putting too speedy an end to my tortures, orders me to be plunged in a fetid dungeon, filled with tarantulas and venomous insects; and only at the end of six months of such suffering does he, gorged with wine, in a night of orgy, accord my pardon to the French ambassador.*

Such, my dear Alfonso, are terrible sufferings, and persecutions difficult to support; do not imagine that the wound recently given to your self-love can yield you a just idea of it. Besides, does not an insult addressed to the work and the genius of the artist, appear more painful to you than an insult intended only as a personal one? And tell me if I failed to experience such a one, at the court of our admirable grand-duke, when I cast Perseus? You have not forgotten, I think, either the grotesque surnames which were bestowed on me, or the insolent sonnets which were placarded every night on my door, or the cabals by means of which they persuaded Cosimo that my new method of casting would not succeed, and that it was folly to confide the metal to me. Even here, at this brilliant French court, where I have made a fortune, where I am powerful and admired, have I not to struggle every instant, if not with my rivals (they are now disabled), at least with the king's favorite, Madame d' Etampes, who has taken a deep dislike to me, I cannot tell why? This wicked creature says all the bad things she possibly can of my works,* seeks, by a thousand means, to injure me in the opinion of his Majesty; and indeed, I begin to be so tired of hearing her constant barking on my trail, that were it not for a great work that I have recently undertaken, and from which I hope for more honor than I have obtained from my preceding works, I should be already on the road to Italy.

Go to! I have experienced every species of evil that fate can inflict upon an artist. And yet I am alive, and my glorious life is the torment of my enemies. And that I foresaw. And now I can overwhelm them with my contempt. This revenge marches slowly, it is true, but for the inspired man, sure of himself, patient and strong, it is certain. Think, Alfonso, I have been insulted more than a thousand times, and I have only killed seven or eight men; and what men! I blush to think of it. Direct personal vengeance is a rare fruit, and not given to everyone to gather. I never got the better of Clement the Seventh, Paul the Third, Cornaro, Cosimo, or of Madame d' Etampes, or of a hundred other powerful cowards; how then will you revenge yourself on this same Cosimo, this grand duke, this ridiculous Mæcenas, who knows no more about your music than my sculpture, and who has so stupidly offended both of us? At any rate, do not think of killing him; that would be undoubtedly folly, and would have by no means doubtful consequences. Become a great musician, and when your name is illustrious, should his silly vanity one day prompt him to offer you his favor, refuse it; accept nothing from him, and never do any thing for him. This is the advice I give you, this the promise I require of you; and, believe in my experience, it is also the only vengeance within your power.

* Historical.

I have just told you that the king of France, more generous and more noble than our Italian sovereigns, has enriched me; it is then for me, an artist who loves you, to keep the promise of the heartless and mindless prince who cannot understand you. I send you ten thousand crowns. With this sum, I think you may succeed in worthily mounting your musical drama; do not lose an instant. Let it be performed at Rome, Naples, Milan, Ferrara, anywhere but at Florence; not a ray of your glory must be reflected on the grand duke. Adieu, dear child; vengeance is fine, and for its sake one may perhaps be tempted to die; but art is far finer, and never forget, that in spite of all, we must live for that.

Your friend,

BENVENUTO CELLINI.

(Conclusion next time.)

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

An American Standard Diapason.

The observation has been made, wherever and whenever proper attention has been paid to the subject, that the Musical Pitch has been, and is still rising, through causes not sufficiently ascertained.

The following brief explanations may render this assertion more intelligible to the less initiated in musical science, (who nevertheless are invited to take an interest in this matter).

Sound.—Tone.—Pitch.

If by any means the air is put in motion, a noise is produced. If there is a continuity between such noise and our hearing apparatus, we hear the noise. Any thing audible, or perceptible by the sense of hearing, we call sound. If the motion of the air is produced by the vibrations of certain regularly shaped solid bodies, and the air is kept moving in regular vibrations, and if these vibrations are numerous enough within a certain given time, tones are produced. Each tone, then, is a sound, but not vice versa. This quality of a sound which renders it a tone is called musical pitch, for the discernible degree of height or lowness of a tone. The pitch of a tone is entirely dependent on the rapidity with which the vibrations of the air follow each other within a given time. We say a tone is higher in pitch than another, if it is the effect of a larger number of air-vibrations within the time of a second. About 500 vibrations of the air, for instance,—caused by a wire about 4 feet in length during a second of time—produce a tone, which we call in music the once marked C, or tenor C, which is the middle C on the piano-forte, and is represented by a note standing just above the lower, and just below the upper staff in music, with an additional line through its head, thus:

Any tone higher than this is produced by more; any tone lower than this, by fewer vibrations in a second.

According to these explanations, neither time nor place should seem to have the power to create a change in the pitch of a given tone; and yet the fact is that in different times and places the middle C has been considered to be the result of from 480 to 560 vibrations of the air in a second; and, as above stated, there is still a rising tendency in pitch, where steps have not been taken to check it.

For the fact that this rise in the musical pitch has really taken place, abundant and undeniable proofs exist. Organs built one hundred years ago, or still farther back, are tuned to such a pitch that other instruments (wind or stringed) can hardly be tuned low enough to be fit to accompany them. In some instances the organ accompaniment has had to be transposed even a whole tone. Gluck's Operas, Handel's Oratorios, and the productions of their contemporaries, prove by the arrangement of the vocal parts that, at those remote times, the pitch must have been much lower. It occurs in them that the Bassi are required to sing the Tenor A. Moreover at the Grand Opera in Paris, a record is kept in regard to this rising tendency in the musical pitch, dated back as far as 1699, when for the middle C, four hundred and eighty vibrations were recorded. From 1699 until 1857, a period of one hundred and sixty years, the pitch of this tone had risen sixty vibrations per second, which is equal to three-quarters of a tone; and in London, Petersburg and Berlin, the opera standard was at that time even higher by nearly twenty vibrations.

No one will deny that such a state of things can only be productive of very great inconveniences; nay, to some it must prove very annoying and detrimental; particularly as recent composers of the Italian school have, in spite of this already too high pitch, written vocal parts in their operas so enormously high that very few singers could or would attempt them. Besides this danger resulting from an enormously high pitch, to which all singers more or less have to expose themselves, the inconvenience to instrumentalists coming together from different countries in Europe for international mass performances, by the difference in pitch in their respective native countries, was felt so intensely that for more than thirty years it has been under consideration to settle this matter in some way satisfactory to all concerned.

The first proposition in regard to checking the rising tendency in the musical pitch, that has come to my knowledge, was made in the year 1830 by Dr. Muzenbecker, the president and director of a musical society in the city of Altona (Holstein). He gave, in one of his annually published reports on the progress of his society, a scientific deduction on the matter of pitch in general, and showed the necessity of devising means to regulate it by the introduction of a universal standard diapason.*

In 1832 an attempt was made by Broadwood, in London, to introduce a tuning fork for the Philharmonic Society in that metropolis, giving the middle C at five hundred and twenty vibrations per second.

In 1834 we find a number of German musicians, convened in Stuttgart, adopting a diapason or tuning fork, producing A (of the middle or once marked octave) by eight hundred and eighty vibrations;

* The word diapason, used in this connection, means a certain simple contrivance, in the shape of a steel fork or tube, for the purpose of producing a certain tone always of the same pitch. Most of the diapasons give the tone C or A.

which is equal to five hundred and twenty eight vibrations for the C of the same octave.

In 1842, Mr. Hullah introduced tuning forks in London, producing C at five hundred and twelve vibrations. The year 1858 was marked by an act of the French imperial government with a view to regulating the matter in question. A committee was appointed to inquire into the best mode of establishing a "Diapason Normal." Meyerbeer, Berlioz, Auber, Rossini, Halevy, and other distinguished musical men belonged to this committee, which, in 1859, presented its voluminous and highly interesting report.* In this report it was unanimously admitted that the standard of pitch in music differs very materially in different countries, and even among different musical establishments in the same country. It was stated that there still exists a tendency every where to a rising of pitch, and that great inconvenience and confusion must come of it.

Tuning forks from all parts of Europe had been collected by the committee; they had tested them and solicited opinions about their possessing the best requirements for a standard and normal Diapason. Finally they concluded that the wishes of nearly all musical people would be met by lowering the Paris Opera pitch about one half-tone. Consequent upon their recommendation to lower the Opera A fork from eight hundred and ninety-six to eight hundred and seventy vibrations per second (equivalent to lowering middle C from five hundred and thirty-eight to five hundred and twenty-two) a decree of the Emperor Napoleon sanctioned this standard pitch, and this "Diapason Normal" is now in force in France since July 1859. No musical instrument is admitted into public establishments, unless constructed and attuned to this standard. Besides having rendered a material service to all interested in musical matters, Napoleon in the meantime has created by this decree a new income to the state; as every instrument has to be marked by a government officer, to show that its maker has complied with the law, for which service of the officer a certain fee has to be paid to the government.

Since the introduction of this Standard Diapason in France, the same has been adopted by Russia, Austria, Saxony and some other minor states in Europe. In Vienna, Marschner's opera "The Templer and Jewess" (Ivanhoe) was the first performance (November 4, 1862), after the adoption of the new pitch in Austria.

Notwithstanding the political entente cordiale between France and England, they have not been able to agree in musical matters. In 1859, Henry Chester and Mr. Dilke, both members of the Council of the Society of Arts, suggested that the Society convene a conference of musical magnates, amateurs as well as professors, composers, instrument makers, vocalists and instrumentalists, to discuss the subject whether the Society should frame a resolution to have it extensively signed in favor of the newly adopted French Diapason. In the absence of any legal authority, such proceedings of the Society of Arts would be received as a kind of voluntary law, and public opinion, thus manifested, would lead the instrument makers to conform to that standard.

In a meeting called by the Society of Arts for this purpose on the 3d of June, 1859, a strong muster of musical men of all classes, (among whom was one lady, Mrs. Jenny Lind Goldschmidt,) was present, all agreed, like those meeting for the same purpose in other countries, that the pitch had been and was still rising; that a further rising should be checked, and that this could be accomplished only by the adoption of a Standard Diapason once for all. A committee was then nominated and charged with an examination of the subject. While this committee were engaged in their investigations, Sir John Herschel sent to them a communication expressing his opinion in favor of adopting five hundred and twelve vibrations for middle C, instead of five hundred and twenty-two, adopted by the French, on account of its being better divisible for the C's of lower octaves (viz., two hundred and fifty-six, one hundred and twenty-eight, sixty-four and thirty-two.) In June, the committee reported. They had decided in favor of five hundred and twenty-eight vibrations per second for middle C, this being the Diapason established in 1834 by the Stuttgart musical conclave. The instruments generally could not well be brought down from five hundred and forty-six to five hundred and twelve, but easily to five hundred and twenty-eight, which is midway between the two. By a nearly unanimous vote this compromising step was sanctioned, and five hundred and twenty-eight vibrations thereby acknowledged to be the standard pitch for middle C in England at the present time.

* This Report in full was printed in Vol. XV. of this Journal.—Ed.

Nobody will deny that matters on this side of the Atlantic are just as bad in regard to equality of musical pitch, as in Europe before the adoption of five hundred and twenty-two or five hundred and twenty-eight vibrations for middle C, and many will agree that a change with us in this respect might be acceptable.

As a first step toward accomplishing this object, the writer of this communication solicits the co-operation of his musical brethren throughout the United States, and the Canadas, requesting those who take an interest in the matter, to furnish him a written statement in regard to the pitch of several keyed instruments, or orchestras or bands, in their respective places of residence, according to the following model:

Statement of Pitch,
as ascertained in Chicago, (Ill.) in January, 1865.
by ——— Prof. of Music.

- 1st Organ at St. Mary's Episcopal Church.
Maker (H. C. Erben) of (New York), A 1-4 of a tone below accompanying fork.
- 2nd Piano (grand), maker (Steinway Bro's. New York), A 1-4 of a tone above accompanying fork.
- 3rd Philharmonic orchestra. A 1-2 tone above accompanying fork.

Such statements from East and West, North and South, accompanied by the tuning forks according to which the pitch was ascertained, would give a true picture of the enormous variety in pitch in this country. The writer of these lines would publish, at some future time, the results of his experience in this matter, and would return, with thanks to their owners, the tuning forks, with a statement in regard to their Pitch, as compared with the new French five hundred and twenty-two vibration C, "Diapason Normal," imported by him from Paris.

EDWARD WIEBE.
Box 79, Brooklyn, (N. Y.) P. O.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, JAN. 15.—The second Symphonic Soirée given by Mr. THEODORE THOMAS, took place in Irving Hall, on the evening of the 7th. I enclose the programme.

- Symphony, No. 2, Op. 61, C.....Schumann.
1. Sostenuto assai.—Allegro ma non Troppo.
2. Scherzo.—Allegro vivace.
3. Adagio espressivo.
4. Allegro molto vivace.
Aria, "Di' placar"—(La Gazza Ladra).....Rossini.
Mrs. Jennie Van Zandt.
Concerto for Piano, No. 5, Op. 78, E flat.....Beethoven.
1. Allegro. 2. Adagio un poco moto. 3. Rondo.
Mr. Carl Wolfsohn.

- Toccata, F.....Bach.
Arranged for Grand Orchestra by H. Esser.
(First time in America.)
Aria, "Qui la voce"—(I Puritani).....Bellini.
Mrs. Jennie Van Zandt.

Fantasia, for Piano (Reminiscences of Robert le Diable.)
Liszt.

Mr. Carl Wolfsohn.
Overture.—Euryanthe.....Weber.

The manner in which the orchestra played Schumann's Symphony betrayed the interest taken by the members in that most beautiful work. The first movement was taken a little too slow; but, on the contrary, the last movement was justly given in a slower tempo than we have been accustomed to hear it in New York; the effect was consequently that intended by Schumann; and the Allegro came out more clearly, and not less brilliantly. The beautiful Adagio was especially well rendered, and its details carefully brought out. The whole Symphony made a deep impression on the audience.

Bach's Toccata has been finely instrumented by Esser; to be sure, the rolling swell of the 32 foot pedal could not be altogether supplied by the basses; but the noble composition is, to say the least, unspoiled by its transportation to the orchestra and concert room.

Weber's Euryanthe overture was brilliantly played, as usual. Mrs. VAN ZANDT was the vocalist on this occasion. The lady has a naturally facile, but inexpressive and somewhat hard voice. She sang the two arias with piano-forte accompaniment.

MR. CARL WOLFSOHN, the well-known pianist from Philadelphia, was the "guest" of the evening. This was, we believe, the gentleman's first appearance before a New York audience; his selection of Beethoven's Concerto showed that he aims at a high position among our virtuosos, and we must, of course, honor him for that aim; since Beethoven's piano-forte music is too seldom heard in our concert rooms. Mr. Wolfsohn has already attained considerable facility of execution, although his trill leaves something to be desired; his touch gives rather the impression of an industrious than a genial artist; his piano passages are neat and clear, rather than mellow; in his forte we miss breadth. Although Mr. Wolfsohn's rendering of the Concerto gave us a great deal of pleasure, we should have been better pleased, could we have more frequently lost sight of him and felt more impressively the true Beethoven spirit. The orchestra accompanied him admirably. The attempt to establish Italian buffo opera at Niblo's Garden has fallen through "for various reasons." The Philharmonic Society is now rehearsing Schumann's Symphony in B flat, Beethoven's "Egmont," and Gluck's "Iphigenia" overtures.

MASON's and THOMAS's soirées for classical chamber music, will commence here shortly. The first programme will include Beethoven's delightful Septet, a Sonata by Chopin for Piano and Violoncello, and Schumann's A-minor Quartet.

LANCLOT.

PHILADELPHIA, JAN. 15.—The season is at its height, and concerts follow one another so rapidly that it is difficult to keep the run of them.

I cannot forgo mentioning Mr. JARVIS's performance of the Mendelssohn D-minor Concerto, in a recent public rehearsal of the Germania. His conception of the composition was truthful; his interpretation of it artistic. He never played better, and in the somewhat sentimental Adagio actually surprised some of his friends by the fine feeling with which he rendered it. The orchestral accompaniments were too loud. Were it not that the piano tone was of a different quality from those of all the other instruments, Mr. Jarvis's performance would have been drowned by the Germania. It is to be hoped that future artists may receive the benefit of more judicious accompaniment.

The Quintette Club gives its matinées weekly, and generally presents interesting programmes. As the gentlemen who compose the club probably expected more pleasure than profit from their enterprise, it may well be deemed successful.

Hitherto, classical concerts in this city have not been remarkable for crowded audiences. Now and then some extra attraction, in the shape of a favorite singer, would draw some of that large and estimable class that "don't like concerted music." The few who usually attend such entertainments are, for the greater part, well known to each other, and from this circumstance, a gathering of this kind occasionally bears some resemblance to a family party.

From some occult cause or other, the soirées of Messrs. CROSS & JARVIS are exceptional in this respect. With a programme on which there was no bait for the unmusical, there was a crowded house. The Foyer of the Academy was actually filled and, with the exception of some magpies from a notable boarding school, the audience seemed to enjoy the music. There can be no doubt that they applauded judiciously, since they showed their approbation of every thing but the Schumann Andante and variations, though these were well performed. Messrs. C. & J. deserve congratulations upon the fact of their great success.

This is the programme of their first soirée.

Triola E flat.....Schubert.
Paraphrase de Concert, "Midsummer Night's Dream,".....Liszt.
Andante and Variations, for two pianos.....Schumann.
Quintet in E flat (op. 16).....Beethoven.

Mr. CARL SENTZ contemplates giving a series of Symphony concerts. Mindful of a concert in which Beethoven's Fifth Symphony drew an audience which scarcely outnumbered the orchestra, he has wisely chosen to secure a sufficient number of subscribers to insure the success of his undertaking. It will be well for all of us if he meets with the support so well deserved by him.

JACUINO.

PHILADELPHIA, JAN 18.—The first of the series of CROSS & JARVIS's Classical Soirées was given on Saturday evening at the Foyer of the Academy.

[Programme in preceding letter.]

It is to be borne in mind that these concerts are intended to be as popular as possible for entertainments of this character. The aristocratic and exclusive tendencies of classical music in general, are to a great extent disregarded; and with the purpose in view of dismissing the audiences in as pleasant a frame of mind as may be, the arrangers of the programmes eschew the more severe of the musical classics, and introduce matter of which the above well-known items are fair specimens.

Somewhat difficult is it, indeed, to write anything new of these compositions, so thoroughly familiar as they are to the musical world;—though one may refer to the performers in place of any reference to the music. So it is worth while to chronicle the universally expressed opinion that Mr. Jarvis never played so well, despite a "Steck" piano. The performance of Mr. Gaertner was in marked contrast to his fine playing of the ever welcome though secular-classical "Fesca No. 2," or of "Rode's" Concerto at the Quintette Club matinee at the Assembly Buildings on Wednesday last,—and,—to anticipate,—to what, it is believed, will be his equally artistic rendering of the "Kreutzer" Sonata of Beethoven, with Mr. Jarvis, at this week's matinee.

The well known Beethoven quartet for piano and wind instruments, which seems to have been, and naturally enough, a great favorite of the composer, was creditably rendered. The opportunities presented to wind instrumentalists for performances of this music, are so unfrequent, that one may hardly look for a perfect performance even though the parts are filled by thoroughly skilful artists. I augur a happy result, if the concert-attending public,—that public that rushes so readily to hear Gottschalk & Co. bang away at the inveterate "Faust" march on five grand pianos,—can be induced to patronize the matinees of the Quintette Club in great numbers. But progress in these matters is especially slow, and classical concerts, but a recent novelty in Philadelphia, have yet many obstacles to overcome in the way to substantial popularity.

Mr. WOLFSOHN's next soirée will shortly take place. It is one of the greatest pleasures a real lover of the art can anticipate. Mr. Wolfsohn's character as a conscientiously true musician, is a guarantee to all who have a true feeling for the highest and best in that art, that nothing will ever be done by him to inspire aught but the most elevating sentiments. It is gratifying to know of this gentleman's recent very successful appearance in New York. His cordial reception there was a deserved testimony to his great ability and eminent talent. I may refer, in this connection, and with approbation, to a series of "Album Leaves," by Mr. Wolfsohn, recently published by André, and dedicated to Miss Mary Howell of this city. They are all very creditable to the composer, and it is allowing much, to say that each is up to its subject. I beg to commend them to the notice of your readers,—suggesting as a trifle of criticism, the propriety of exchanging the titles of the last two of them.

Recent advices from across the water report our old friend and artist, Mr. CARL HOHNSTOCK, —whose violin, I trust, I may hear once at least, before all earthly sounds shall cease to echo in these ears,—physically and musically flourishing.

Admirers of superior church music may be greatly gratified by a visit to St. Stephen's Church in this city. The choir is composed of very excellent material, and justice is done here, where the most flagrant injustice is so generally perpetrated elsewhere. The soprano is Miss SOLLIDAY, whose voice and method are of the finest, and especially adapted to the requirements of sacred music. I recall with much pleasure and satisfaction this lady's singing of "He shall feed his flock," at the performance of the "Messiah" last winter, and great was my regret after anticipating the pleasure of hearing it from her lips, that a lady so inferior to her in voice and style, should be intrusted with "I know that my Redeemer liveth." While upon the subject, might I suggest a more than probable benefit to the public from the republication of a short article on "Church Music," signed "J. S. D.," and originally published in one of the numbers of the "Christian Examiner" for the year 1836?

MERCUTIO.

CHICAGO, JAN. 10.—As you are not overburdened with correspondents from this place, I propose contributing my portion. "Grover's German Opera Troupe" is "all the go;" and having gone to hear them in "Faust," "Don Giovanni," and "Der Freischütz," I wish to "speak my sentiments."

But before commencing, I would say that "Faust" is the only opera to be repeated. Now manager Grover knows his own business, but I doubt that this repetition is in accordance with the musical taste of our people. The performance of "Don Giovanni" and of "Freischütz" was good enough to satisfy even critical Boston; indeed it is safe to say that the rendering of "Freischütz," by the troupe is unequalled in the annals of opera in the West. (I profess to know good music when I hear it). Grau's apology for an opera is now glaringly absurd; let him not repeat the inflection.

Having carefully listened to "Faust," I conclude that the instrumentation is the most elaborate treatise on the art of modulation ever heard out here. Now if this is superior to the treatment of "Giovanni," "Freischütz," and other operas of the older German masters, then have I been misled and fooled by my teachers.

To-night we are to have "Fidelio," and we anticipate a rich treat. The orchestra under Anschütz is good; there is a bassoonist among the performers who excels any performer on that instrument I have ever heard.

The state of Church Music, so-called, in Chicago, is nothing to boast of. Most of our organists are sadly in want of a teacher. They will roar you Verdi like any nightingale. Baumbach, Knopfel, McCurly and Byrd constitute the pick.

Our Opera House is fast approaching completion, and when finished will be a very great addition to the town.

MUSICUS.

CHICAGO, JAN. 14. Grover's Opera Troupe has just closed its second week here, there being one week more of a musical feast such as Chicago has never before enjoyed. The orchestra and chorus are all that can be desired, and we have rarely had a better company of leading artists.

The operas presented are, with a few exceptions, new in Chicago, and have been put upon the stage in a fine manner.

The first week opened with the ever pleasing Martha, and was followed by Faust, Dame Blanche, Don Giovanni, La Juive and Stradella. Faust, Don Giovanni and La Juive drew crowded houses,—La Dame Blanche had the smallest audience of the season.

This week we have had crowded houses to hear Der Freyschütz, Fidelio, Robert, Faust again, and Tannhäuser. To-night we are to have Martha once more, with "A Night in Grenada" at the Matinée. Der Freyschütz, Fidelio and Tannhäuser were the chief attractions, and were brought out in a superb manner.

For a wonder, the artists have all been in good voice, with the exception of FORMES, whose once noble organ is evidently failing him. HERMANS, HABELMAN and HIMMER are superior artists, and have made themselves great favorites here,—while FREDERICI and JOHANSEN, by their powerful and graceful acting and fine voices, have established no ordinary claims. Frederici, as Margaret in Faust, Agatha in the Freyschütz, and Alice in Robert, has displayed great dramatic talent, and a splendid voice and execution, worthy of the first artists of the day. TAMARO, STEINECKE, LEHMANN, GRAFF, CANISSA, and DZIUBA have also acquitted themselves very creditably in their respective roles!

Too much praise cannot be awarded to the superb orchestra and chorus, which under the able direction of CARL ANSCHÜTZ have gained for themselves unbounded applause and admiration.

Next week, the last of the season, opens with the "Barber of Seville" and the "Magic Flute," which will undoubtedly be brought out in a fine manner. We hope that this will not be the last time that Mr. Grover favors us.

CHICAGO.

Music Abroad.

Paris.

THEATRE ITALIEN.—We have already spoken of the successful debut of Brignoli, which was more than confirmed in his second appearance. Here is the opinion of La France Musicale, of Dec. 1864, as translated in the Philadelphia Bulletin:—

Brignoli wanted not an ordinary success, but a triumph, such as he obtained among the Americans of the North. He must feel satisfied. His second appearance, which took place on Wednesday last, in Don Pasquale, was truly an event. Mario, in his best days, never sang the serenade better, and that piece, it must be remembered, was the favorite one of that tenor. In the rest of the role Brignoli completely outstrips him. He must be heard in the duo with Mlle. Patti, as well as in the quatuor. What charm in his voice, and what power of expression! But, let us add, what gratification, what jubilee for the appreciators of fine singing!

We have stated with what sweetness he sang the serenade; all we could add would convey but a feeble idea of the enthusiasm he produced.

To the soft murmur of approbation which served as an accompaniment to his singing, succeeded the warmest and most enthusiastic applause, and after being twice recalled, Brignoli had to sing over that admirable melody. He had been recalled after the duo in the first act, as well as after the quatuor in the second; he was called for again with his companion artists, after the rondo finale, which Mlle. Patti carried with dazzling effect.

The part of Norina, we have repeatedly stated, suits admirably this young Diva. This last representation has given new proof of it; it is impossible to sing it with more spirit. We could not state how often she was recalled; but we can assert the fact that at no time since the opening of the season did she exercise such a fascination.

The duo of Scaless and Delle Sedie was encored. It was but just. Those two artists are in every respect irreproachable. To conclude, Don Pasquale left no room for criticism, and will undoubtedly be an epoch during the present season.

(Signed) E. ESCUDIER.

The "Société des Concerts du Conservatoire" gave its second extra concert Dec. 17. The programme was as follows:—

Symphonie No. 23. en Sol. Haydn.
Psame à Double Chœur. Mendelssohn.
Concerto en si bémol pour piano. Beethoven.
(Solo de Piano, par M. Theodore Ritter.)

Ave Verum (Chœur. Mosart.
Symphonie en Ut mineur. Beethoven.

M. Pasdeloup inaugurated the second series of popular concerts on the same day. The programme included Beethoven's Entr' Actes to "Egmont" and Mr. Wallace's charming overture to "Lovelei," which was as successful as at the previous concert. The Opéra Comique announces "Le Capitaine Henriot" for next week, and at the end of the year we are to have a new theatre opened on the recently constructed Boulevard Richard Lenoir, near the Bastille. Vaudeville, Drame, Comédie, and Operette are to be given. Two performances daily are announced, and the prices are very low: the dearest places being 1fr. 25c. M. Offenbach's "La Belle Héloïse" was given on Saturday at the Variétés with doubtful effect.

VIENNA.—Mlle. Artôt commenced a starring engagement, on the 10th Nov., at the Imperial Opera-house. The part she selected for her first appearance was that of Angela in Auber's Domino Noir. The local papers praise her singing, but say that in her acting she is inferior to Mlle. Wildaur. The engagement of Mlle. Artôt is about the sole present fact worthy of being recorded in connection with the Imperial Opera house. According to report, the management intend to produce shortly in addition to Löwe's Concino Concino, Spontini's Vestalin, with Madame Dustmann, Mlle. Bettelheim, and Herr Schmid, in the principal characters. Should the report be true, the Imperial German Opera will possess as satisfactory a repertory as can possibly be desired; for among their stock pieces will be Die Vestalin, Iphigenia in Aulis, Euryanthe, Fidelio, Don Juan, Die Hochzeit des Figaro, Das Nachtlager, Die Zauberflöte, Jessonda, Der Wasserträger, etc.

The first Philharmonic Concert, under the direction of Herr Dessoff, opened with Mendelssohn's magnificent overture to Athalie. This was succeeded by Bach's antique "Suite" in D; and Beethoven's Symphony in C minor. The whole concert went off splendidly, though Bach's "Suite" did not, it is true, meet with quite the reception it deserved. At the first concert to be given in the Imperial Redouten-Saal by the Society of the Friends of Music, under the direction of Herr Herbeck, the attraction was to be Handel's oratorio of Judas Macabbeus, the principal parts being sustained by Madame Wilt; Mlle. Seehofer and Waldmann; Herren Walter and Panzer. The Society will give four ordinary concerts this season, and produce the following interesting and classical pieces: new "Suite" in E minor by Franz Lachner, under whose personal direction it will be performed; the "Sanctus," never before heard here, from Bach's Grand mass in B minor; two scenes from Franz Schubert's opera: Fiera bras; a Fantasia on Schubert's "Wanderer," and F. Liszt's "Ungarische Rhapsodien," performed by Herr Taussig; a Violin Concerto, with orchestra, played by Herr Joachim; and several smaller instrumental pieces. At the two extraordinary concerts given by the Society, on the 18th of December, and on Shrove Tuesday, 1865, the works performed were to be Beethoven's Grand Mass in A, and Bach's Matthäuspassion. Dr. Gunz, of Hanover was engaged to sing the tenor music in the last.

Leipzig.

GEWANDHAUS CONCERTS. In the eighth concert the orchestral pieces were Haydn's E-flat Symphony (the one with the roll of the drum), and the "Dance of the Spirits of the Blessed" and the "Furies' Dance" from Gluck's Orpheus. Fräulein Julie von Asten, from Vienna, played Beethoven's first piano Concerto (in C), a Novellette by Schumann, and a Scherzo by Mendelssohn,—in a manner refined and musical, rather than dazzling, we are told. The singer was Fri. von Edelsberg, from the court opera at Munich, a contralto of rich, extensive voice, dramatic instinct, but more dash than schooling; she sang airs by Mozart and Pergolesi, and Lieder by Schumann. She seems to have been more successful at the Leipzig theatre in the parts of Romeo, Rosina and Nancy.

Schumann's Manfred overture and Beethoven's 4th Symphony were the orchestral features of the ninth concert. The pianist Lübeck, of Paris, played Mendelssohn's G-minor Concerto, with more of virtuosity (it seems) than feeling; also "own compositions" and a Tarantelle by Heller. Herr Dagele, of the Dresden opera, sang arias from Marschner's Hans Heiling and Boieldieu's Jean de Paris.

The tenth Gewandhaus concert, just before Christmas was devoted to a couple of choral works: Reinecke's "Belshazzar," and Mendelssohn's "Walpurgisnacht." Of the former, the Orchestra's correspondent writes:

Herr Kapellmeister Reinecke's cantata, which was first produced two years ago, has for its subject the last days of Belshazzar's life, the text being written by Fr. Röber; both in words and construction this text is miserably inferior to the simple grandeur of the Bible narrative, besides violating historic truth and probability. Successful as Herr Reinecke has been in works where his thorough command of form and instrumentation were employed to illustrate graceful and elegant ideas, his style is less suited to subjects where strength and grandeur are required. The cantata consists of an overture and eleven numbers. The overture seems intended to depict the arrogance and tyranny of the Babylonians, and the longing for release of the oppressed Israelites, the latter being suggested by the introduction of an ancient Hebrew melody. The construction and instrumentation of this overture are excellent. No. 1 is a chorus of Babylonians, who are taking part in a wild orgy, and ascribe divine honors to the king; the music is spirited; the almost savage exclamations, "Belshazzar ist Gott!" contrast well with the fugal treatment of the words with which the people urge each other on to still wilder revelry; a remarkable effect, too, is gained by the introduction of the theme afterwards heard accompanying the handwriting on the wall, and which, whenever it is heard, seems for a time to check the blasphemy and revelry of the people. In the midst of this wildness, a very graceful melody for the soprano solo, afterwards repeated by the female chorus, represents the women of the royal harem paying homage to their king and god. These "dark-eyed" beauties seem to be very closely related to the hours and gipsies of whom Schumann has sung. In No. 2, Belshazzar asserts his divinity, and orders the sacred vessels of the Hebrews to be brought to add to the splendor of the banquet table. Musically this number is not very successful; the tone is somewhat commonplace. No. 3 brings the prophet Daniel before us. Nowhere throughout the cantata is this great character worthily treated by the composer. It is difficult to imagine why, when the prophet is expressing his righteous indignation, and is calling down the fires of heaven to consume the blasphemers, he is made to speak in the form of a short and by no means spirited recitative. A short contralto recitative leads to No. 4, a prayer for help uttered by the Israelites. This is the gem of the cantata, and is a beautiful composition; even by itself it would be most effective. In No. 5, in some very clever canon writing, the Babylonians demand that the Israelites shall be forced to join in the worship of Belshazzar. This is also an excellent piece of choral composition. The next number is given to an Israelite and a chorus of her people, who express their determination to die rather than apostatize. No. 7 consists of a double chorus (Babylonians and Israelites) and tenor solo (Daniel). The musical construction is elaborate, but the result is less commensurate with the labor expended upon it. The subject of the part in which the Israelites call upon their God to awake and deliver them (the Babylonians meanwhile defying Belshazzar, and calling for the destruction of the captive people), is of too familiar a cast to express the character of prayer to an Almighty Being. No. 8, containing the scene of the miraculous handwriting, ought to have been the culminating point of the cantata; but to do it justice, requires a composer with qualifications the very opposite of those which Herr Reinecke possesses. The means by which the awful terror of the scene are depicted are far too stagey. The writer of the text has here gone very awkwardly to work; he makes Daniel appear as if he had been present during the whole of the banquet. Quite out of keeping, too, with the character of the Jews, is the next number (9), a lament for Belshazzar—sorrow for the sufferings of one's foes was reserved for a purer religion to teach. The music, however, is good. In the following numbers (10 and 11) the author has been guilty of a strong violation of historic truth; he makes the restoration of the Jews follow immediately upon the death of Belshazzar. Daniel, in a recitative and arioso, proclaims the freedom of his people, who, in the final chorus, express their joy at the prospect of their return to Canaan. This chorus is written with much spirit, and contains an excellent double fugue. Should Herr Reinecke again attempt a choral work, it is much to be desired that he should choose a subject the prevailing tone of which is lyrical or elegiac. Should he do this, I have very little doubt that he would produce a work that would live; whereas, in "Belshazzar," the weakness of what should have been the grandest scenes will, I fear, act as a bar to its frequent repetition, and thus prevent much that is really of high merit from being appreciated as it deserves.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, JAN. 21, 1865.

Concerts.

MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB. The second concert (Tuesday evening, Jan. 17) was particularly enjoyable; and there were a goodly number to enjoy it, in spite of the snow-storm. Mendelssohn's early Quintet in A, written in the same year with the "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture, at the age of sixteen, carried us back to the early days of the Quintette Club, and sounded delightfully buoyant, fresh and clear. The first Allegro is in the vein of the "Heimkehr" overture and the opening of the Italian Symphony; the Scherzo is one of his earliest and happiest visitations from the fairies. The instruments went truefully and well together. The novelty of the evening was the Quartet in F (No. 2 of op. 41) by Schumann; a charming composition, thoroughly clear and genial, though a much lighter work (excepting the Finale, Allegro molto vivace) than the two which the Club gave us a year or two ago. The first Allegro is pleasantly suggestive in its simplicity and brevity; the Andante quasi variazione (why quasi?) is full of originality, and interesting, sometimes startling transformation and development. This too sounded finely on the strings. WULF FRIES played a fantastic and yet tasteful Reverie for violoncello, by Bergner, in his finest style and feeling. Mrs. H. M. SMITH's clear and sweet soprano, and her chaste and honest style of singing, albeit a little cold, gave general pleasure. Her selections, too, were excellent: a noble Mozart song, that of Sextus from the "Clemenza di Tito" ("Parto, ma tu ben mio"); "My dream of life is over," by Spohr; and Schubert's "Hark, hark, the lark," in which he has caught the very ecstasy of Shakspeare's strain;—all well accompanied by string quartet with clarinet.

ORCHESTRAL UNION. Orchestral concerts after all! Let us be thankful, though it be on a small scale. The first was given in the Music Hall last Wednesday afternoon, at rather short notice, or the audience would doubtless have been larger. The band is about the same as last year, with four violins on each part. In the opening piece, the only one our engagements allowed us to hear, the instruments sounded remarkably well together. The selections, too, were good: for an overture, that fine concert one in A by Julius Rietz; for a Symphony, Gade's in B flat:—both of them novelties of last year. The rest was lighter miscellany. Can we not have two good overtures each time, one solid classical, one light?—especially now that the orchestra is "uncoupled" from the Great Organ, and is making music purely on its own account.

MR. J. C. D. PARKER'S SINGING CLUB. Invited

audiences, such as one only sees on choice occasions, have filled Chickering's Hall on the last two Monday evenings, to listen to some of the very best of amateur singing, in choral compositions by the highest masters. The voices are more numerous (about thirty) and better even than in former years, and their singing was so admirable, so pure, refined, well blended, nicely shaded and euphonious, as to reflect the highest credit on their devoted teacher and themselves.

The first piece was a noble Choral by Bach, harmonized as Bach alone could do it, unaccompanied, very impressive. It went particularly well the second time. Then came Mendelssohn's beautiful Hymn: "Hear my prayer," the soprano solo sung by a young lady, lately returned from studies in Europe, with finely cultivated voice and style. Then a couple of capital part songs: "Hunter's Song," by Schumann, and "The Nightingale," by Mendelssohn.

But the chief subject of the winter's practice has been Schumann's Cantata, "The Rose's Pilgrimage." The poem is quite a touching and imaginative little romance, relating how the Rose longed to be like the maidens, and to love and be loved, and how the fairies granted her wish and let her try it. The ideas are beautiful, and the translation shows here and there fine touches of a poet's practiced hand. We would fain copy it entire, but for its length. There is much fine music in it, though as a whole it is far inferior to "Paradise and the Peri." Often the inspiration flags; the long narrative recitatives, given to the tenor, seem monotonous and forced, making the singer's task not a grateful one. So too, several long stretches of dialogue. But there are some exquisite choruses, such as the light ones of the Fairies, the chorus of Hunters (as fresh and ringing as that in Preciosa), the funeral chorus, and "O happy time," with its solemn, pensive hopefulness. The opening soprano solo, duet and trio about Spring are delicately Spring-like, and were charmingly sung.

All the music of the Rose is beautiful; and we wish we had words to convey our sense of the truly musical, artistic, heart-felt, womanly style in which it was sung by a lady whose retirement from public life is a perpetual theme of regret with music lovers. Among all our native singers, we know no voice so musically bright and sympathetic, so fresh in its maturity, no art so simple and so perfect, no clearer instance of fine musical feeling. Here was the spirit of Schumann's melody completely realized. Our comfort is, that what is lost to the concert room comes back to the musical community in another way, that, namely of wise and quickening influence upon eager troupes of pupils. We can scarcely speak less warmly of a short contralto solo by Mrs. J. S. CARY (we may mention her); it was a gem of song. If other nice contributions are not named, it is not because they did not deserve it. The accompaniments were very tastefully played by Mr. Parker on a most melodious Chickering "Grand."

We must again reluctantly postpone our review of the Great Organ concerts, notices of new music received, welcome to a whole crop of new musical journals lately sprung up in New York, and many other matters.

Italian Opera.

The first week closed, as it began, with pieces quite familiar to opera-goers. Nor did the week offer any thing very notable, except that performance of Don Giovanni, which we have already said was an uncommonly good one. But this was not saying that it was the best we had ever had here, or that any one rôle in it had not been better filled before. Admitting that Bellini's Don and Morensi's Elvira do not suffer by comparison with any of their predecessors, who will say that the very effective Donna Anna of Carozzi is yet equal to that of Grisi, or Lagrange; that Kellogg in Zerlina is as beautiful as Bosio, Sontag or Patti; that Susini has not been many times outdone in Leporello; or that Iotti in Ottavio can make us forget Mario or Habelmann? But Maretzek does well to announce it again for the matinée of to-day; for as a whole it is one of his most successful productions. If he will only restore one or more of those missing arias, which belong to the very best part of the music, the success will be still greater; indeed such completeness would count more, in our estimation, than the acquisition of the best of singers in any one part.

We willingly take the word of others for it, that Il Trovatore was performed as well as it deserved and better too. There can be no doubt that Carozzi and Morensi, Massimiliani and Bellini would do it well. Gounod's Faust, on Friday, made one of the best of occasions for Miss KELLOGG, who is in remarkably good voice this time, not only as to flexibility and sweetness, but also as to substance, roundness, power of tone, and whose Gretchen everybody must admire, even if it have not all the natural and native charm of Frederici's. LOTTI can sing sweetly, but lacks presence, magnetism, force, for Faust. The part of Mephisto suddenly fell to the lot of BELLINI, who sang the music glibly and with all his might, but not subtly or Mephistophelishly, while he looked the bravo rather than the polite, intellectual fiend. He won those unstinted plaudits which mere intensity and vigor are so sure of in a distinctively Italian Opera audience. The pretty little part of Siebel was very nicely filled, both in voice and person, by Mlle. MORENSI. The same young lady, in the following day performance, left very little to be desired in the music or impersonation of Maffeo Orsini; rich and well trained in voice, graceful in person, true to character throughout. In singing she has much improved. With CAROZZI and BELLINI as the Duchess and the Duke, with LOTTI's tasteful if not powerful singing, and with good ensemble generally, the old charm of Lucrezia Borgia did not fail.

The second week (last week) was wholly occupied with the two novelties of the repertoire, except Saturday's matinée, which brought Faust again. The first of these novelties (if anything by Donizetti now can be a novelty) was Maretzek's great card in New York, his famous "twelve-thousand dollar" piece, which ran "twelve nights" there, "Don Sebastiano." This we had on Monday. Tuesday and Friday evenings. It is the last but one or two in the list of Donizetti's 64 operas, and was composed at Paris in 1843, for the Grand Opera. The rapid composer, happiest in his least studied efforts, laid himself out here, and sought to produce something larger, more elaborate, learned, finished than before. He had trouble enough with it; manager and singers plagued him in rehearsals; the piece utterly failed before the public. It is said that this was the beginning of the melancholy, followed by the insanity, which lasted till his death in 1847. Probably the piece was not judged fairly at that first performance.

We can give only an honest impression from two hearings of the opera. We think "Don Sebastiano" is by no means the worst, nor yet the best of Donizetti's operas. In real musical interest, invention, beauty, it will not compare with Lucrezia Borgia; it seems less inspired in the same degree that it is more elaborate. To us it lacks, save in certain passages, the genial element, which makes Lucrezia, and even so light a work as L'Elisir d'Amore, more sure and more worthy of immortality. Great men, like Mozart and Beethoven, and Rossini too, are genial in all, even their most serious works; Donizetti can be genial in light efforts, but grow solemnly tedious, feebly, painfully intense, when they strain themselves to do great things. In "Don Sebastiano" there are large, involved, ingenious combinations; a few concerted pieces, like the Septet (or Quartet, eked out with ejaculations from bystanders) in the fourth act, the funeral march, &c., in the third, which are effective and imposing; there are conscientious and nice traits of instrumentation; there are a few, and but a few, taking bits of song, neither of them first-rate or in a particularly new vein; but there is more, much more of music which is coarse and noisy, brassy and fatiguing, where physical intensity of effort seeks to hide intrinsic feebleness and lack of inspiration.

The general result of the whole is heaviness, unedifying, unrefreshing. You do not go away from it feeling better, feeling lifted up and lighter, stronger, with new life and faith in you, as you do after the most serious and yet most cheerful of all operas, Fidelio. It carries the house by storm sometimes, and you sit there cold and unmoved as you might under a loud-voiced, rhetorical, physically forcible revival preacher, all too eager to be carried away if possible, yet experiencing no transport, never losing yourself in it, and rather demoralized and stultified than blessed or quickened by all this desperate assault upon your sensibilities; and yet how often have they yielded, unsuspectingly and sweetly, to a mere whiff of playful melody out of the musical heart and brain of a genius like Mozart! But we have been describing the whole modern fashion of Italian opera. Perhaps the most genial touch in "Don Sebastiano" is the little Zitti, Zitti-like trio, sung sotto voce, just before the end. The barcarole (serenade), sung by BELLINI, in the part of Camoens; the well-known tenor air of the king: "Deserto in terra," finely sung by MASSIMILIANI, a duet between these two, a duet between the king and Zaida, the Arabian girl, and much of the music of the latter, in which CAROZZI-ZUCCHI sang and acted finely (in spite of that unheard of, shall we say hermaphroditic sort of costume), are among the best things in it that appeal by beauty and expression, rather than by weight and grandeur. As a whole we find Don Sebastiano heavy. Fortunately, its music does not haunt us. Of the performance, including the scenical splendors, we can speak in high praise.

Far more enjoyable was the light and playful Fra Diavolo of Auber, in the Italian dress he gave it a few years ago. It is a charming opera and wears as well as ever. By no means equal to another light French opera which we have lately been enjoying, the La Dame Blanche of Boieldieu. There is more heart and feeling in La Dame Blanche; more that is sincere and earnest. Equally bright and graceful, equally light and unpretending, it goes deeper. Auber is fairly characterized in these words of a German critic:

"Auber wants for a complete genius the heart of Boieldieu. He has esprit enough for three Frenchmen, and melodies worthy of the richest Italian. He is elegant as an Athenian, and as full of imagination as a Southerner; but deep passion he is as little capable of feeling as expressing; in this he distinguishes himself from Meyerbeer merely by the fact that he does not try to express any. He often lacks in unity and grandeur of song, but he supplies this want by elegance and richness. Auber is an individuality, a French individuality, and even in his orchestration he has the precision, the clearness, the sparkling, many-colored quality of the French mind, but at the same time its superficiality and limitation. As a spring breeze merely stirs the surface of the lake to gentle ripples, so the music of Auber merely moves the surface of our sensibility."

There is no need to speak of the musical, the comical, the melo-dramatic qualities of Fra Diavolo, made familiar, long ago, to us by the Seguius, by the Louisa Pyne and other English troupes. Suffice it to say, that it never was so capably done for us before. Orchestra, chorus, principal singers and actors—all but one—were as nearly perfect as we could wish. It all flowed and sparkled musically, naturally, clearly; all entered into the humor of the thing delightfully; and it was picturesque from first to last. The one drawback was, that Herr LOTTI could not by any miracle of art swell to the dimensions, vocal, personal, or histrionic, of the daring brigand chief.

That was not his fault; he won respect by his painstaking fidelity to just conceptions of the part and by several pieces of sweet and tasteful singing. But for Miss KELLOGG this Zerlina was just the part; it suits her far better than the other Zerlina, sweetly as she sang that also. This was in all respects a capital performance, as naive, natural and lively as could be wished; as pretty and as graceful; while her principal melodies, and the highly florid, graceful bravura piece, full of rapidly descending scales, in the chamber scene, was of the purest and most liquid sort of vocalization. BELLINI, in grotesque make-up, voice and action, caricatured the travelling English milord, after the continental tradition, to a charm; it was inimitably droll. Mlle. MORENSI looked and sang the handsome young milady capitally also. And there was no end of true Italian brigand by-play and clever mimicry in DUBREUIL and WEINLICH. In short, Fra Diavolo is the thing which this company do the best, and, after Don Giovanni (a long way after), it is the best thing they do. It was given on Wednesday and Thursday of last week, and on Monday of this week, and the week is filled out with Ernani, La Fille du Regiment, Lucia, Don Sebastian, and Don Giovanni.

A DESERVED COMPLIMENT.—Mr. J. Q. WETHERBEE, one of the best vocal artists and teachers in our city, and a gentleman of high character and culture, not long since honored with the diploma of the Royal Academy of Music, in London, has received the following flattering note from the Old South Society, accompanied by a handsome New Year's gift:—

Boston Jan. 24, 1865.

"J. Q. Wetherbee, Esq.:—

"Dear Sir.—At a meeting of the Standing Committee of the Old South Society, held this day, before the transaction of the regular business of the meeting, conversation was had in reference to the Old South choir, and a cheerful recognition of their services was expressed by all the members of the committee present. And they desire to say to you, that during the nearly eight years of your connection with them as conductor of music in the Old South, they have had the highest appreciation of your excellence in the whole matter;—and especially do they desire to say, that during the six months last past the singing on the Sabbath has been uniformly better than at any former period. The committee would also add, that they have enjoyed their intercourse with you as a Christian gentleman, and are happy to have, as the conductor of so important a part of the religious services of Sunday, one for whom they cherish so much regard, and in whose moral character they can place so much confidence. They need not speak in this connection of your reputation in your profession, for that the community know and appreciate as well as ourselves.

"Please accept the enclosed sum, as a slight expression of the kind regards of the committee.

"George Homer, Chairman.

"James C. Howe, Charles Blake, Simon G. Cheever, Joshua B. Kimball, Increase N. Withington, Samuel Coverly, Samuel Johnson, William Hilton.

"Loring Lothrop, Clerk of the Corporation.

VICTOR SCHÖLCHER. Among the deputation from the British Emancipation Society, who waited upon the American Minister to offer their congratulations on the re-election of President Lincoln, was the biographer of Handel, who, as every true lover of great and generous music naturally must be, is a friend of freedom and humanity. The London correspondent of the Independent says of him:

There was one man present at the interview with Mr. Adams, of whom I should like to say a word or two. I refer to Victor Schœlcher, formerly Under Minister of Marine in the French Provisional Government of 1848. M. Schœlcher suffers greatly in his bodily health, and his public appearances are, therefore, few and far between. He is a Republican, and has been an exile since the coup d'état. He is a scholar no less than a politician, and his "Life of Handel" has given him a conspicuous place in the ranks of literary men and musical critics. Need I say more to enlist your sympathy? But I can say very much more. To him more than to any other man in France is due that noble act of the Provisional Government which emancipated the slaves of the French colonies. He framed the measure and gave it effect; and, through good and evil report, he has been true to this cause during the weary years of his exile. Victor Schœlcher is the Wilberforce of France; and, although Imperial usurpation may defraud him, while living, of the homage which is his due, it requires no prophet to foresee that posterity will be more eager to erect his statue than that of the hero of the 2d of December.

Mr. HERMANN DAUM.—Once more, and very earnestly, we beg our readers hereabouts not to forget the Complimentary Benefit Concert to be given to this gentleman by a large number of his fellow artists. Seldom are such compliment and such benefit more justly due; for it is the case of a musician of right pure and earnest purpose, loyal to the noblest models, accomplished as an interpreter of the classics of his art, faithful as a teacher, amiable and esteemed wherever known, relying on his art and pupils for support, and now for the larger part of the year past precluded from all professional activity by a most painful and exhausting illness.

The time of the concert is fixed for next Saturday evening, Jan. 28, at the Boston Music Hall. The names of the artists who have volunteered their services are guaranty enough of an excellent entertainment. They are: the Orpheus Musical Society, led by Mr. KREISSMANN; the Mendelssohn Quintette Club; Miss HOUSTON and Miss RYAN, as solo singers; Mr. LANG and Mr. DOWNS, as pianists; and Messrs. PAINE, TUCKERMAN, WILCOX and THAYER, as performers on the Great Organ.

SACRED CONCERTS.—Two concerts of church music ("grand" of course, like everything else in these days) are in preparation at our Music Hall. The first, to-morrow evening, is under the direction of Dr. S. P. TUCKERMAN, and will engage the choir of St. Paul's, the choir boys of the Church of the Advent, Mrs. SMITH, Mrs. FISK, Mrs. GILBERT, Mr. WHITNEY, and Mr. POWERS, as vocalists, and Mr. GEORGE WHITING, the new organist of King's Chapel. The selections will be interesting, of a similar character with former concerts of Dr. Tuckerman, and partly historical, including the famous Miserere of the pope's chapel.

The second, on the 7th of February, will be a repetition of the late "Choral Festival" at Trinity Church, New York, under the direction of Dr. CUTLER, who brings with him his famous choir boys, and other valuable assistants. The whole solemnity, as we understand, will be literally (as far as possible) retransacted in front of our Great Organ. We had the pleasure a few days since of hearing Master COKER, the leading choir boy of Trinity, and must say that it is the most remarkable boy soprano that we ever heard, in point of beauty, power, expression, even development and training. From such a voice, (with such a talent), could it only last, what might not be expected!

CHOICE SPECIMENS OF TRANSLATION.—Did you ever compare the Italian with the English in the librettos sold at the Italian Opera? It is amusing. In the book of "Don Sebastiano," for instance, the line:

Già d'Imen le faci splendono.

(Already the torches of Hymen shine), is thus ingeniously turned: "The faces were resplending from love!" "Signor clemente e pio" is rendered: "Mild and pious Sir!"

HARTFORD, CONN.—The "Beethoven Society," which performed the "Messiah" during Christmas week, numbers, we are told, over 200 intelligent vocalists, mostly of the élite of Hartford, and is conducted by Mr. BARNETT, an Englishman long resident in this country, a graduate of the Royal Academy of Music, London. He is an earnest, thorough musician, perhaps too modest for this brassy age in music as in all things. Under his direction, the Society last year gave the "Elijah" twice, and with great success. No other "provincial" town has yet had the courage to attempt a work so difficult. Such aspirations surely must bear good fruit, and help to make our people truly musical.—Apropos of the performance of the "Messiah," we may print the following testimonial, which speaks for itself:

HARTFORD, Dec. 30th, 1864.—At a meeting of the Board of Conductors of the Beethoven Society held on the evening of Dec. 30th, 1864, Dr. C. A. GULMERT, of Boston, was elected an honorary member for life without fee.

WILLIAM HILLS,
Secretary Beethoven Society.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

- Beauties of Don Sebastian. Donizetti.
The night is serene (La notte è serena). Barcarole. 40
While on earth lonely. (In terra solo). Song 30
Lisbon dear, at length I see thee. (O Lisbona, alfin ti miro). Song 40
O happy day! O day of pleasure! (O fausta di! Suprema gioia!) Duet. 40
"Don Sebastian" is most known as an opera of splendid pageants and tableaux, but contains, nevertheless, a good number of gems of song. The first, mentioned above, is a charming serenade, sung by Camoëns before the King's prison. The second is widely known and used, the third is the singer's welcome to his native city, and the fourth is the duet between Don Sebastian and Camoëns. All are of standard merit. Two favorite instrumental pieces are noticed below.

- When you and I were soldier boys. Song.
J. G. Clark. 30
A reminiscence of war scenes. Good for "Johnny" to sing, in the months and years after he "comes marching home."

Instrumental.

- Beauties of Don Sebastian.
March Funebre. (Funeral march). 30
Pas des Esclaves. 35
The first piece mentioned, is the impressive march, heard and witnessed by the returned king, who had the gratification of being present at his own funeral. The second belongs to the scenes in Africa.
Choice Morceaux from Beethoven's Symphonies.
Arr. for Organ, by Batiste.
Communion. Andante. Fifth Symphony.
Op. 32. No. 2. 50
An organ is surely the next best thing after an orchestra, for Beethoven's immortal works. This is a skilful arrangement, and the set are well worth having.
Social Pastime. Violin and Piano. S. Winner.
Sultan's Polka. 30
Peabody Schottische. 30
Easy and pretty air.
Radiense. Grande valse de Concert. Seven Octaves. 1.50
Another production of this powerful composer, whose fictitious name illustrates the breadth of his genius.
Bridal Wreath Polka. A. P. Lighthill. 30
Pretty and original.

Books.

- TECHNICAL STUDIES FOR THE PIANOFORTE.
By Louis Plaidy. Professor of the Pianoforte at the Conservatorium of Leipsic. Published with American, and also with Foreign fingering. 2.00

These truly valuable studies are extensively used by teachers, yet many, doubtless, have not heard of them. They are by an eminently practical man, and contain, in addition to a very sensible theory of piano study, exercises in scales, five finger runs, arpeggios, thirds, sixths, and octave passages of all possible variety, and all carefully fingered. Few will wish to use all of them, but one can select just what he wants from them.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 622.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, FEB. 4, 1865.

VOL. XXIV. No. 23.

"With Heaviest Sound a Giant Statue Fell."

So fell our Statesman, for he stood sublime
On that proud pedestal, a people's heart,
As when some image, through the touch of time,
That long was revered in the public mart,
Or some tall clock-tower that was wont to tell
The hour of duty to the young and olden
With tongue most musical of every bell,
Bends to its base and is no more beholden.
So fell our Everett; more like some great elm
Lord of the grove—but something set apart—
That all the tempests could not overwhelm,
Nor all the winters of its seventy years,
But on some peaceful midnight burst his heart,
And in the morning men behold the wreck,
(Some with grey hairs who cannot hold their tears,)
But in the giant timber find no speck
Nor unsound spot, but only wholesome wood;
No secret worm consuming at the core
The stem that ever seemed so fair and good;
And aged men that knew this tree of yore
When but a sapling, promising full well,
Say to each other, this majestic plant
Came to full growth: it made no idle vaunt;
From its own weight, without a flaw it fell.

T. W. P.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

The First Opera.

A NOVELETTE OF THE PAST (1555).

Translated from the French of HECTOR BERLIOZ
by KATHARINE FRANCES M. RAYMOND.

(Concluded from page 379).

BENVENUTO CELLINI TO ALFONSO DELLA VIOLA.

Paris, June 10, 1557.

Wretch! College-scout! Merry-Andrew!
Mountebank! Flute-player!* Was it worth while to cry so loudly, to breathe forth so much flame, to howl about insult and revenge, rage and outrage, to invoke hell and heaven, and finally to arrive at so vulgar a conclusion? Mean and impotent mind! Was it for you to utter such threats, while your resentment was of so weak a nature, that, scarcely two years after having received the insult, you kneel like a coward to kiss the hand that inflicted it upon you?

What! Neither the promise you made to me, nor the eyes of Europe fixed upon you, nor your own dignity as a man and an artist, were able to preserve you from the seductions of a court, where reign intrigue, avarice, and dishonesty!—a court where you were disgraced, despised; from which you were driven like a faithless varlet! Is it true, then? you compose for the grand-duke!
It is even said that there is a vaster and bolder work in question, than any you have hitherto produced. The whole of musical Italy is to take part in the festival. They are arranging the gardens of the Pitti palace; five hundred expert virtuosos, united under your direction, in a vast and splendid pavilion decorated by Michael Angelo, will pour the waves of your splendid harmony over a panting, delighted, enthusiastic people. It is admirable! And all this for the grand-

* It is well known that Cellini professed a strong dislike to this instrument.

duke, for Florence, for the man and the town that treated you so unworthily! Oh! what ridiculous faith was mine when I strove to calm your anger of a day! Oh! the miraculous simplicity that made me preach continence to the eunuch, slowness to the snail! Fool that I was!

But what powerful passion has brought you to such a degree of baseness? The thirst for gold?
You are richer than I am, now. The love of fame? What name was ever more popular than that of Alfonso, since the prodigious success of your tragedy of Francesca, and that, no less great, of the other three lyric dramas that followed it? Besides, what has prevented you from choosing another capital as the theatre of your new triumph? No sovereign would have refused you what the great Cosimo has just offered you. Your songs are now loved and admired everywhere; they resound from one end of Europe to the other; they are heard in town, at court, in the army, at church; king Francis is never tired of repeating them; Madame d' Etampes herself thinks you are not without talent for an Italian; the women, the priests especially, universally profess a real worship of your music; and if you had chosen to carry to the Romans the work you are preparing for the Tuscans, the joy of the pope, the cardinals, and the whole ant-hill of Monsignori would only have been surpassed by the frenzy, the transports of their fair friends.

Perhaps pride has seduced you.—or some puffed up dignity—some vain title—but I lose myself in conjectures.

Whatever it may be, remember this; you have been found wanting in nobility, pride, and good faith. The man, the artist, and the friend have equally fallen in my eyes. I only accord my friendship to upright people, incapable of a disgraceful action; you are not one of these; my friendship is therefore not for you. I gave you money, you chose to return it to me; we are now quits. I am about to leave Paris; in a month I shall pass through Florence; forget that you have known me, and do not seek to meet me.
For even though it were on the day of your success before the people, the princes, and the (to me) far more imposing assemblage of your five hundred artists, should you accost me, I would turn my back upon you.

BENVENUTO CELLINI.

ALFONSO TO BENVENUTO.

Florence, June 25, 1557.

Yes, Cellini, it is true. To the grand-duke I owe an unpardonable humiliation; to you I owe my celebrity, my fortune, perhaps my life. I swore to revenge myself upon him, and I have not done so. I promised you that I would neither accept labor or honor at his hand; and I have not kept my word. It was at Ferrara that "Francesca" was heard (thanks to you), and applauded for the first time; at Florence it was treated as a work devoid of sense or reason. And yet Ferrara, that asked my new composition from me, has not obtained it, while I offer it as homage to the grand-duke. Yes, the Tuscans, formerly so disdainful in regard to me, rejoice at the preference I accord to them; they are proud of it; their fanaticism for me far surpasses all you have told me of that of the French.

A real emigration is commencing among the greater part of the Tuscan towns. The Pisans and the Siennese, forgetting their old hatred, implore in advance, for the great day. Florentine hospitality. Cosimo, delighted at the success of him he calls his artist, founds brilliant hopes on the results which the drawing together of three rival populations may have for his politics and government. He loads me with flattery and kindness. Yesterday, he gave, in my honor, a magnificent collation at the Pitti palace, at which all the noble families in the town were present. The beautiful countess of Valombrosa was lavish of her sweetest smiles to me. The grand-duchess did me the honor of singing a madrigal with me. Della Viola is the man of the day, the man of Florence, the grand duke's man; there is no one save him.

I am very guilty, very contemptible, very mean, is it not so? Well, Cellini, if you pass through Florence on the 28th of next July, wait for me from eight to nine o'clock in the evening before the Baptistery gate, and I will seek for you there. And if, in the very first words I utter, I do not completely justify myself from all the crimes with which you reproach me, if I do not give you an explanation of my conduct with which you may confess yourself perfectly satisfied, then redouble your contempt, treat me as the worst of men, tread me under foot, strike me with your whip, spit in my face, and I will acknowledge in advance that I deserve it all. Until then, preserve your friendship for me; you will soon find that I was never more worthy of it.

Ever yours,

ALFONSO DELLA VIOLA.

On the evening of the 28th of July, a tall man, of gloomy and discontented appearance, directed his steps through the streets of Florence, towards the Place of the Grand-duke. Arrived in front of the bronze statue of Perseus, he paused, and looked at it for some time in deep thought: the stranger was Benvenuto. Although the answer and the protestations of Alfonso had made but a slight impression on his mind, a sincere and lively friendship had so long united him to the young composer, that it was impossible for a few days to efface it forever. Besides, he felt that he had not courage enough to refuse to hear what Alfonso might have to allege in his defence; and it was while on his way to the Baptistery, where Alfonso was to join him, that Cellini desired to see once more, after a long absence, the masterpiece that had once cost him so much fatigue and chagrin. The Place and the adjoining streets were deserted; the most profound silence reigned in this quarter, usually so noisy and populous.
The artist contemplated his immortal work, asking himself whether obscurity and an ordinary intellect would not have been better for him than glory and genius.

"Why am I not an ox-herdsman of Nettuno or Porto d' Anzio!" thought he; "like the animals confided to my care, I should have had a coarse and monotonous existence, but sheltered, at least, from the agitations that have tormented my life since childhood. Perfidious and jealous rivals—unjust or ungrateful princes—implacable critics—stupid flatterers—incessant alternations of successes and reverses, splendor and misery—excessive and always renewed labor—no repose, no comfort, no leisure—using one's body like a mercenary, and ever feeling one's soul burnt or paralysed—is this living?"

The noisy exclamations of three young artisans, who rapidly emerged on the Place, interrupted his meditation.

"Six florins! 'tis dear!" said one.

"And if he had asked ten," said another, "we should have had to submit to it. Those cursed Pisans have taken all the places. Besides, think, Antonio, the gardener's house is not ten steps from the pavilion; seated on the roof, we shall be able to hear and see wonderfully well; the door of the little underground canal will be open, and we shall enter without difficulty."

"Bah!" added a third, "to hear that, we can well afford to fast for some weeks afterwards. You know what an effect the rehearsal produced yesterday. Only the court was admitted to it; the grand-duke and his suite never ceased applauding; the executants carried della Viola in triumph, and finally, in her ecstasy, the Countess of Vallombrosa embraced him; it must be wonderful."

"See how empty the streets are already; all the town is already assembled at the Pitti palace. It is the moment. Let us be off!"

Cellini only then understood that the day and hour of the great musical festival had already arrived. This circumstance in no way agreed with the choice Alfonso had made of this evening for his meeting. How, in such a moment, could the maestro abandon his orchestra, and leave the important post, to which so great an interest attached him? It was difficult to comprehend.

Cellini, nevertheless, walked towards the Baptistery, where he found his two pupils Paolo and Ascanio, and horses; he was to depart that very evening for Leghorn, and was to embark there for Naples on the morrow.

He had waited but a few moments, when Alfonso, his face pale and his eyes burning, presented himself before him with a sort of affected calm, that was not natural to him.

"Cellini! you are come; thanks."

"Well!"

"It is this evening!"

"I know it. But, speak; I await the explanation you promised me."

"The Pitti palace, the gardens, the courts, are crowded. The people cover the walls, the roofs, the trees, the basins half filled with water, everything."

"I know it."

"The Pisans are here, the Siennese are here."

"I know it."

"The grand-duke, the court, the nobility are united, the immense orchestra has assembled."

"I know it."

"But the music is not there," cried Alfonso,

"the master is not there! you know that also?"

"What do you mean?"

"There is no music, for I have carried it off; there is no maestro, for here I am; there will be no musical festival, for the work and its author have disappeared. A note has just informed the grand-duke that my work will not be executed. 'It does not suit me,' I wrote, making use of his own words; 'in my turn, I have changed my mind.' Fancy the rage of these people, disappointed for the first time! of the people who have left their towns and occupations, and spent their money to hear my music, and who will not hear it! Before joining you, I took a glance at them, and saw that impatience was beginning to master them, and that they would visit it on the grand-duke. Do you see my plan, Cellini?"

"I perceive it."

"Come, come, let us get a little nearer the palace, let us see my mine explode. Do you not already hear the cries, the tumult, the curses? Oh my brave Pisans, I recognize you by your imprecations! Do you see the stones, the branches, the broken vases flying? Only the Siennese can throw them in that way! Take care, or we shall be thrown down. How they run! Those are the Florentines; they mount to the assault of the pavilion. Good! there is a block of mud in the ducal box; it was a lucky idea for Cosimo that he left it. Down with the platforms! down with the desks, the benches, the windows! down with the box! down with the pavilion! There it falls. They ruin everything, Cellini! It is a magnificent riot! Honor to the grand-duke! Ah! the devil! you took me for a coward? Are you satisfied? Tell me, is not this vengeance?"

Cellini, his teeth fixed, his nostrils extended, watched, without answering, this terrible spectacle of popular fury; his eyes, in which a sinister fire burned, his square forehead, down which rolled drops of perspiration, the almost imperceptible trembling of his limbs, testified the savage intensity of his joy. At last, seizing Alfonso's arm:

"I am going to Naples at once; will you come with me?"

"To the end of the world, now."

"Embrace me, then, and to horse! You are a hero."

Obituary.

WILLIAM HENRY FRY.

(From the New York Tribune.)

The death of our friend and fellow-laborer, William Henry Fry, took place on the twenty-first of December at Santa Cruz, whither he had recently gone for the benefit of his broken health. For several years past he had been the victim of consumption; his physical sufferings at times were of a severer form than was known except to his most intimate friends; he cherished the habitual consciousness, that his recovery was past hope; yet the force of his masculine will was an almost perpetual triumph over the ravages of disease, his cheerfulness never forsook him for a moment, and often rose to the tone of joyous hilarity; his interest in his favorite artistic pursuits scarcely abated till his final departure from among us, and his energy of thought and expression remained in striking contrast to the effects of his malady as seen in his wasted frame and faded cheek. Mr. Fry was born in Philadelphia, and had attained the age of about fifty years at the time of his death. He was the son of William Fry, a prominent journalist of Philadelphia, and proprietor of the celebrated "National Gazette," which under the editorship of Mr. Robert Walsh formed a new epoch in the history of the American press.

He received his early education partly at the schools of his native city, and partly at the Roman Catholic College of Mount St. Mary's at Emmittsburg, Md. At an early age, he exhibited the talent for music, in which he subsequently attained such honorable distinction. His first orchestral compositions were four overtures performed by the Philharmonic Society of Philadelphia, for which he was complimented with an honorary medal. In 1845, he wrote the opera of "Leonora," which was produced by the Seguin company at the Chestnut Street Theatre, in the month of June of that year, and an Italian version was performed at the Academy of Music in New York in the Spring of 1858. After a connection of several years with the Philadelphia press, in 1846 Mr. Fry visited Paris, and other European capitals, where he remained for six years. His vigorous and racy correspondence from the former city with the Tribune, attracted not a little attention, and designated him as one of the most original and brilliant off-hand popular writers on the staff of American journalism. After his return to this country in 1852, he delivered in New York a remarkable series of lectures on the history of music, illustrated by two new symphonies of his own composition, which, with two others symphonies, "Santa Claus" and "Childe Harold," were soon after played by M. Jullien's orchestra in many of the principal cities of the United States. His next original work was the music to an ode written for the opening of the Crystal Palace in New York in 1858. In 1855, he composed a "Stabat Mater" with full orchestral and vocal score for performance at the New York Academy. During the past year, his "Leonora" was produced with great splendor in Philadelphia, for the benefit of the Fair of the Sanitary Commission. For the last twelve years, Mr. Fry had been attached to the editorial corps of this journal, and our columns richly attest the remarkable fertility of his mind, his lively and opulent imagination, the acuteness and subtlety of his critical powers, and his peculiar gift of quaint and striking, though not unfrequently erratic expression. Mr. Fry was an ardent and efficient politician. Never a seeker of office or emolument from the public service, he was greatly in earnest in his devotion to principle. His convictions possessed the tenacity of steel, and flamed out like the fires of a glowing furnace. For everything that approached the character of compromise, of faltering conciliation, of a dread of consequences, he exercised a sovereign and refreshing scorn. On several occasions, he took an active part in election campaigns, and always made his mark where his foot was planted. He possessed, in no small degree, the eloquence of nature, but held in cordial aversion the oratory of the schools. His public speaking was vehement, impulsive, caustic, often extravagant, no doubt, but always terribly in earnest, tearing up the soil like a ploughshare. As a man, Mr. Fry was generous to a fault, of a convivial temperament and fond of the excitements of gay companionship. He expressed himself with impetuosity, with none of the usual caveats of reserve or discretion, and for this reason, was probably often misunderstood. But no one could call in question the native kindness of his heart, the sincere earnestness of his apparently reckless individuality, or the shining originality of his mental endowments.

(From the Independent.)

William Henry Fry, musical composer, and long an editor of the N. Y. Tribune, died at Santa Cruz, December 21st, in the 50th year of his age. For several years before his death, Mr. Fry steadily declined in health, showing in his face and frame signs of a slow consumption. When in November last he sought a warmer climate, it was with no hope of recovery, but only of relief; yet, like many other invalids he breathed the West Indian air only to taste its disappointment, expressing his regret at quitting the colder and more bracing climate of New York. Incautiously one day falling asleep on a sofa where a draught of air blew upon him, he awoke to find himself seized by a violent cold and fever, which so prostrated his feeble strength as to give his physicians no hope that he would rally under the attack. His last hours, which came speedily, afflicted him with weakness rather than with pain. When death threatened, he was asked by his brother Horace, "Do you know you are dying?" "Yes," he replied, and, after partaking of the sacrament, in a few hours breathed his last. A private letter tells us that his face in death wore a look of unutterable majesty and nobility. His last intellectual work was a musical mass, which he began and completed shortly before his death—leaving on his writing-table the corrected manuscript, concluding with the grand old words (the last his pen ever wrote) Dona nobis pacem! ("give unto us peace!") Not a more eccentric, nondescript, unaccountable man have we ever known than William Henry Fry. And to all others who knew him, he was the same delightful enigma. Chiefly a musician, his genius nevertheless was universal—running like a gadding vine over almost every subject. An orator, a writer, a politician, a conversationist, he was one of the most versatile of men—a rare wit, a self-poised gentleman, a true friend, a charming playmate of children, and one of the most unselfish of human beings. Frailties, virtues, and genius all had equal part in this strange and fascinating man. By none who intimately knew him can he ever be forgotten, or will his name be ever spoken untenderly. He was as rare a man as "rare Ben Jonson."

The Brooklyn Philharmonic Society.

(From the New York Tribune, Jan. 24.)

Brooklyn was for many years dependent upon New York for its amusements; our Opera House, out concert rooms and our theatres derived an immense revenue from the inhabitants of the City of Churches, voluntarily given, but given at a large sacrifice of time and personal convenience. Especially did the New York Philharmonic Society profit by this outside contribution, and no small amount of its pecuniary success in the past may justly be attributed to that source. For fifteen years Brooklyn paid tribute to New York, and certainly, as far as the N. Y. P. Society is concerned, the account is square, and may be written down, so much paid, for which full value was received.

Eight years ago a number of the prominent musical amateurs of Brooklyn, who were at the same time thorough business men, determined to establish a Philharmonic Society in that city, so that they might enjoy the performance of the highest class of instrumental music, nearer home, than heretofore. At first it was hard to make the people believe that anything good could be got up within the circle of their own city limits; but the directors of the enterprise pursued their course with dogged perseverance, calculated their resources, secured the co-operation and advice of Mr. Theodore Eisfeld, the most experienced of our Philharmonic directors, and after the expenditure of much patience, and the sacrifice of much time and unusual labor, to say nothing of personal obloquy and ungenerous innuendoes, finally succeeded in arousing the local pride of the citizens, and the Philharmonic Society became an established fact in Brooklyn, and may now be considered the sister society and the only rival of the New York Philharmonic Society on the continent.

Its constitution differs from ours, inasmuch as it pays all its performing members, orchestral and solo, from the funds derived from the subscriptions and the sale of tickets, the surplus receipts being reserved for contingencies which might occur, the creation of an extensive musical library, or such other objects as properly belong to such an association; while ours is purely a professional society, governed by professional members, the performing members being paid a pro rata dividend from the proceeds, while the residue, which may be called profits, is funded for certain purposes, which have yet to be developed.

The labors of the gentlemen who first took the matter in hand have been crowned with a success which has exceeded their most sanguine expectations. Commencing in a small way in all except the excellence of their orchestra and its director, they gave their concerts in a hall of small dimensions; but year after year their audience increased in numbers, until now, the eighth year of the existence of the Society, the Brooklyn Academy of Music is too small to accommodate its subscribing members and casual visitors. This is the natural result of a broad and liberal management, which looks to excellence as the end, and spares no expense, consistent with the amount of its resources, to secure its aim. At one time it adopted our system of changing conductors for each concert, but this season, taking the common sense view of the subject, it has appointed one conductor for the whole series, thus securing a unity of action and an intelligent correspondence between the leader and those who are led. This Society can better afford to pursue this wise system than we can in New York, where there are so many aspirants to the distinguished position of conductor, all of whom have friends in the Society to urge their claims, and to deny, whether justly or not, the right of any one man to an eminence so coveted.

On a permanent basis the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society has built up its success, and it is a point of gratification to all who have the true interests of music at heart that there is yet one more society laboring honestly, intelligently and earnestly in the good cause.

The first concert of the eighth season, though unnoticed in our columns, was excellent, both as regards selections and performance. The programme of the second concert, which took place last Saturday, the 21st inst., at the Academy of Music, was as follows:

Symphony No. 3 in E flat major. (first time.) Haydn: Cavatina—"Linda"—"O luce di quest' anima." Donizetti. Miss Laura Harris; Solo—violin—Andante et Rondo Russo. De Beriot. Madame Camilla Urso; Second Concerto, for the piano-forte, in B flat. (first time in America.) Beethoven, (with Cadenza by Ant. Rubenstein.) Mr. J. N. Patterson. Intermission. Poeme Symphonique. Tasso. "Lamento e Trionfo." Liszt: Solo—violin—Elegie, Ernst. Madame Camilla Urso; Cavatina—"Lucia"—"Ritorno nel silenzio." Donizetti. Miss Laura Harris; Festival Overture. (by request) Ries.

The Symphony by Haydn is fresh and charming, the introduction grave and thoughtful, the Vivace light, pleasing and melodious, but small in its general attributes. The Adagio is graceful and tender, containing some lovely passages for the wood instruments, in which the bassoon is treated admirably, and finding its relief in a holder subject before its return to its first theme. The Scherzo is light and sprightly, and has a graceful and lovely Trio. The Finale is a vivacious movement, containing a clever fugue, and drawing its contrast from a marked change in the tempo, which is both artistic and effective. Its execution throughout was excellent. It was marked by delicacy, refinement and precision. Clearness of outline and attention to detail were particularly observable, and the minute and beautiful coloring so imperative to a just rendering of Haydn's music, and so different from the broad and massive effects of Beethoven, was developed with a poetic sentiment but rarely found in our orchestral performances. But charming as this Symphony is, it is not strong enough as a pièce de resistance of a Philharmonic concert. It would have opened the second part advantageously as a sequence to a Symphony by Beethoven, Mendelssohn or Schumann, and one of the solo performers could have been well dispensed with. It would be still better, in our judgment, to have such a work for the closing piece of a concert, instead of a lesser work, such as an overture, as it would be certain, from its importance, to retain the audience to the end.

Miss Laura Harris sang two Italian operatic scenes, which are entirely out of character at such concerts, while we have so many grand concert arias which should be heard very acceptably. She has a light and charming voice, small in its volume, but neither thin nor wiry. It is, however, quite unadvised to the expression of passion or emotion, but well adapted to the demands of ornate and superficial compositions. Her voice is fresh, having lost nothing of its spontaneity; her intonation is admirable, and her execution is fluent and well-defined. She was well received, and her two solos were spontaneously encored.

Madame Camilla Urso also played twice. She is an artist of unquestionable ability. The violin, by usage, is not a lady's instrument; but the mastery of such as the sisters Milanollo, and now of Camilla Urso, may make it a disputed point between the sexes. Camilla Urso has acquired a fine tone, full and equal throughout; her intonation is pure and just, whether in single or double stopping, and through all the intricacies of the manipulation. She has exquisite taste, tenderness of manner and delicacy of refinement, but her style is small, and unequal to the broad interpretation of the larger pieces of the master-writers of the violin. Still she plays delightfully, and we listen to her with pleasure as the exponent of the tender, sentimental, dreamy and sensuous elements of violin music. Both her pieces received and merited the redemand which was awarded them.

The most important solo of the evening was the Beethoven Piano Concerto, performed by Mr. J. N. Patterson. It is no child's play to interpret such a work where the piano-forte has to contend with the orchestra, the plan of the composition being carried out with equal importance to both, but with inevitable disadvantage to the single instrument. Beethoven never lowered the artistic standard. He always preserved the unity of thought, and never exalted the solo instrument at the expense of the integrity of the whole idea. It is therefore no slight task to undertake to interpret a piano concerto by Beethoven. Mr. Patterson brings many requisites to develop the undertaking. He has a fine technique, an excellent equality in the education of both hands, a scholastic appreciation of the subject, and he is besides, an earnest and faithful worker, acting under the belief that diving below the surface is the only sure way to develop the inner heart of the composition. His performance was in every way satisfactory, in some parts admirably and beautifully played, with the single exception that a certain breadth was lacking in the general development of the idea—a something of grandeur that was needed to fill out the simple majesty of Beethoven's thought. Still, we acknowledge it as a performance of great merit, and in the added Cadenza by Rubinstein, we recognize a facility of manipulation, a comprehension of the scope of the thought in connection with the leading idea of the movement, and an appreciation of the relations one to the other, which prove that Mr. Patterson is on the right path, and needs but a little longer experience to walk upright before the best interpreters of the works of the great masters.

The Poeme-Symphonique, "Tasso," by Liszt, is a work of unequal merit, of rare apparent beauty, and of metaphysical mystification difficult for the hearer to trace out, unravel or comprehend. It is replete with instrumental resources, and the episode of the Gondolier's song is wonderfully treated by varied and imaginative figures, but the general effect is that of a thought undefined, an undeveloped transcription of an idea, which the creative faculty of the author could not master.

The Festival Overture by Ferdinand Ries is an antiquated specialty not worth reusucitation by a Society where the concerts are few and the repertoire of first-class works unlimited. The programme for the third concert offers a selection far more worthy of the Society than the one under notice. The instrumental performance throughout the evening was in every way worthy the high reputation of the orchestra, and of the acknowledged skill of the conductor, Mr. Eisfeld.

Music Abroad.

London.

THE MUSICAL YEAR OF 1864.

The Orchestra furnishes the following review of the music of the metropolis during the past year.

As the most important period in the musical history of the year, the Italian operatic season claims precedence in our record. Both opera houses were open this year—Covent Garden under Mr. Gye, with Mr. Costa as conductor; Her Majesty's under Mr. Mapleson, with Signor Arditi as conductor. The Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden, opened on Tuesday, March 29th, with Bellini's "Norma," Madame Lagrue making her first appearance in this country as the Druid Priestess. She subsequently appeared as Demonia in "Otello," and Leonora in "La Favorita," and established a position for herself as one of the best tragic singers now on the stage. Flotow's "Stradella" was the only novelty produced during the season, but with little success. Meyerbeer's "L'Etoile du Nord" was performed for the first time in the new theatre at the end of the season, Saturday, July 23rd, and on Saturday, July 30th, the season ended with a representation of the same opera. The extensive repertoire of the establishment was well used during the season, each performance being distinguished by that attention to detail and lavish expenditure so characteristic of Covent Garden Theatre. Signor Mario, made his re-appearance in "Masaniello" on April 5th, appearing frequently during the season, principally in "Faust," and despite occasional drawbacks manifesting that he still remains in the proud position; so many years accorded to him, of primo tenore. Herr Wachtel appeared as Manrico in "Il Trovatore," on April 7th, subsequently appearing as Arnoldo in "Guglielmo Tell," John of Leyden in the "Prophete," and Stradella in Flotow's opera. Gifted with a magnificently powerful voice, he created his greatest success by the unsparing use of a high C chest tone, which, on his first appearance, threw his critics into ecstasies. Mdlle. Pauline Lucra created a strong impression in her favor by her singing in the "Huguenots" and "Faust," but from some unexplained cause her engagement came to an abrupt termination after she had appeared but a few nights. Mlle. Artot also essayed the part of Marguerite in "Faust," and much additional interest was given to this already popular opera by the various readings given to the part of Marguerite by the several primo donne who represented it. Principal among these was Mlle. Adelina Patti, who, by her original rendering and exquisite singing, added to her many triumphs. She continued, as in previous years, one of the chief attractions of the season, appearing for the first time on May 9th in "Il Barbiere." Madame Didiée, Mlle. Frizzi, Signor Tamberlik, M. Faure, Signori Ronconi, Graziani, Naudin, and other less prominent artists, contributed their share to render the season one of the most brilliant on record. Few weeks passed without four and sometimes five performances. On Thursday, April 14th, a state visit was paid to the opera by General Garibaldi, when Bellini's "Norma" was performed.

The season at her Majesty's Theatre commenced on Saturday, April 9th, with a performance of Verdi's "Rigoletto." The mainstay of the season was undoubtedly Mlle. Tietjens, and that lady fully maintained her great reputation, singing nearly every night. The novelties produced were Nicolai's "Falstaff," on May 3rd, and Gounod's "Mirella," on July 5th. Beethoven's "Fidelio," revived on June 23rd, was an event of real importance. Weber's "Oberon" was revived after the regular season was ended. These operas, added to the repertoire of the establishment, gave the public an opportunity of seeing and hearing Mlle. Tietjens to the best advantage. Mlle. Bettelheim made her first appearance on the opening night, and filled for some time the place of Madame Trebelli, whose indisposition kept her from fulfilling her engagements. Signor Giuglini shared with Mlle. Tietjens the honors and at first the hard work of the season, and being in better health and voice than he was the previous season, increased his popularity. Towards the end of the season the principal tenor work was shared by Signor Gardoni and Dr. Gunz, the latter making his first appearance in this country as Florestan on the production of "Fidelio." Mr. Santley retained his position as leading baritone singer, and worked hard to gain those laurels which he so richly merited. Madame Trebelli joined the company some time after the season had commenced, adding to her customary rôles the part of the old fortune-teller in "Mirella." Other prominent members of the company were Mlle. Volpini, Mlle. Liebhart, Madame Harriers-Wippen, Mlle. Grossi, Signor Junca, and Signor Gassier. Of the operas produced during the season, "Faust" bears the lion's share in number of representations; "Mirella" was performed nine times, "Falstaff" seven times, "Roberto" six times, "Traviata" seven times. General Garibaldi also paid a state visit to this house on Tuesday, April 19th, when "Lucrèzia Borgia" was performed. The subscription season ended on July 16th, but a series of "farewell performances at cheap prices" was continued until August 13th. A short season, during which "Faust" monopolized the greater number of nights, was commenced on October 24th, ending November 5th.

At the concerts of the Sacred Harmonic Society, all departments of band and chorus under the direction of Mr. Costa maintained their high state of proficiency. Haydn's "Creation" was given on January 15th; Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" and Rossini's "Stabat Mater" on January 29th and February 8th; Handel's "Israel in Egypt" on February 19th and May 13th; "Judas Maccabeus" on March 11th and December 9th; the "Messiah" on March 23rd, December 16th and 23rd; Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" on April 15th and November 25th; "Elijah" on April 29th, and "Samson" on May 27th. This latter brought the thirty-second season to a termination, and that of 1864-5 commenced on Friday November 25th. The principal singers during the year have been Mlle. Parepa, Mlle. Sherrington, Mlle. Rudersdorff, Mlle. Sinton-Dolby, and Mlle. L. Baxter; Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. W. H. Cummings, Mr. Santley, Mr. Weiss and Mr. Patey.

The National Choral Society, under the direction of Mr. G. W. Martin, now in its fifth season, gave performances of Mendelssohn's "Elijah" on February 3rd, March 2nd, and December 14th; "Messiah" on March 21st; Dr. Arnold's new oratorio "Ahab" on April 5th; Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" and Rossini's "Stabat Mater" on June 8th; "Judas Maccabeus" on July 6th. The concert of June 8th was remarkable as affording the first appearance of Signor Giuglini at Exeter Hall. The other principal singers during the year have been Madame Rudersdorff, Madame Sherrington, Madame Parepa, Miss Palmer, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. W. H. Cummings, Mr. Santley, Mr. Weiss and Mr. Patey.

Madame Lind Goldschmidt sang at several concerts during the year, attracting on all occasions large audiences, composed of those who, with the recollection of Jenny Lind in their minds, came to recal past times, and of a younger generation wishful to hear that voice that had so enchanted their predecessors. Her first appearance in 1864 was in the "Messiah" at Exeter Hall on Tuesday, January 5th. On this occasion the performance was for the benefit of the funds of the Friends of the Clergy Corporation.

Gounod's "Faust," the greatest success of all operas of the present age, was brought out in English for the first time at Her Majesty's Theatre on Saturday, January 23rd; libretto by Mr. H. F. Chorley. The music was already familiar to the opera-goer, and the numerous arrangements and adaptations for all instruments, from the full orchestra to the barrel organ, had rendered the principal airs of the opera tolerably well known to the general public; but it was reserved for Mlle. Lemmens-Sherrington, Mr. Sims Reeves, Signor Marchesi, and Mr. Santley to interpret in a style worthy of an English opera house the enchanting music of Gounod. * * *

The Musical Society of London commenced its sixth season on Wednesday, January 27th, at St. James's Hall; other concerts were given on April 21st and June 15th. Original works by J. F. Barnett, Harold Thomas, &c., were produced, besides instrumental works of classical composers, varied by occasional vocal pieces, which were rendered by Mesdames Dustman-Meyer, Bettelheim, Liebhart, and Parepa, and Mr. Santley.

The Philharmonic Society took the occasion of the first concert of their fifty-second season, Monday, February 29th, being the birthday of Rossini, to concoct a commemorative programme, six out of the ten pieces performed being by that composer. Other concerts were given by this old-established society on March 14th, April 18th—this concert was announced as "in connection with the tercentenary anniversary of the birth of Shakespeare," and consisted of a selection of compositions illustrative of the poet's writings; May 2nd, May 16th—Prince and Princess of Wales present; May 30th—first performance of Schumann's second symphony; June 13th—"by special desire," the Princesses Helena and Louisa present; and June 27th, at which last concert, the Prince and Princess of Wales present, and a new violin concerto by Herr Joachim and a new symphony by Professor Bennett were performed.

The twentieth season of the Musical Union commenced on Tuesday, April 5, and terminated on Tuesday, June 28. The concerts of the year preserved the reputation of the Musical Union as expositors of the highest class of music, and experienced, as in previous seasons, the most distinguished patronage.

The season of opera concerts at the Crystal Palace commenced on Saturday, May 7, terminating in July. These concerts were as successful as their predecessors had been, and the services of artists of both opera houses were engaged. The series of Saturday Winter Concerts commenced on October 8. Madame Grist sang at the concerts of December 17th and 31st. This series of concerts is characterized by the production of classical and popular music performed in the best style by Mr. Mann's band; several symphonies, &c., have been here performed for the first time in this country.

The English Opera Association, which had been formed a year or two previously, having failed in effecting the purpose of its formation, was, about the end of June, wound up and its business transferred to the hands of the "Opera Company, limited," authorized capital £30,000. In the preliminary prospectus issued by the directors, it was stated that "the first operations of the Company would be the production and performance in this country of English Operas, of adaptations from the foreign schools, and for other musical purposes." Great things were expected from this company: it was rumored about that now at last we were to have an independent management, who would foster and encourage native talent, bringing out works of English composers, and engaging the best English singers. Time will show how these expectations will be realized. Large promises are made of the production of works by our leading English composers; but those produced since the opening night are hardly likely to keep a place on the stage. With regard to engagements of singers, the directors allowed Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Santley, and Miss Louisa Pyne, certainly the three leading stars among English singers, to be engaged elsewhere. Covent Garden Theatre was opened under the auspices of the company on Saturday, October 15th, with a performance of "Masaniello," introducing Mr. Charles Adams, an Englishman by birth, an American by education and musical training, as the mad fisherman king. Macfarren's "Helvellyn" was produced on Thursday, November 3rd; Hatton's "Rose" on November 26th; and Benedict's "Bride of Song" on Saturday, December 3rd. The company have since produced a Christmas Pantomime, expending an enormous sum in its preparation, in which Donato, a young Spaniard, who performed evolutions on one leg, and who was paid for so doing £40 per night, appeared. So much has been done this year for English art by the company that was to found a home for English Opera.

Mr. Alfred Mellon's Promenade Concerts, a most acceptable annual to a very large section of the public, commenced at Covent Garden Theatre on Monday, August 8th, and terminated on Saturday, October 8th. During this, his fourth season, Mr. Mellon maintained his well-earned reputation, collecting a band of one hundred of the best performers, engaging Miss Carlotta Patti for every concert, with Mr. Santley, Mr. Thomas, Madame Parepa, and others occasionally, and concocting programmes which included music of all kinds, from the symphony to the polka; it is scarcely necessary to add that, as usual with these concerts, the theatre was crowded every night.

M. Jullien commenced a series of promenade concerts at Her Majesty's Theatre in the month of September. Mr. Santley and Mlle. Liebhart were the vocalists, and on Sept. 26th a party of Danish vocalists with the band of the Danish Guards made their first appearance in London.

It would be impossible, within our limits, to give an account of all the benefit concerts of the year, or of the concerts given by professors and teachers of music, to audiences of admiring friends and pupils. It would be unjust, however, to pass all over, and we, therefore, give a list of the principal. Madame Sinton-Dolby and Mr. Sinton gave a morning concert at St. James's Hall, on Wednesday, June 1st. Mr. W. G. Cousins' annual concert took place at the same hall on Wednesday, June 8th. Mr. Lindsay Sloper gave two performances of pianoforte music, assisted by other artists, at the same hall, on June 15th and 20th. Mr. Benedict's annual concert is always one of the attractions of the season, the programme being longer, and the number of artists larger, than generally provided; this year was no exception to the rule, and accordingly his concert held at St. James's Hall, on Monday, June 20th, was very numerous attended. Mr. Kuhe gave a recital of ancient and modern pianoforte music at the Hanover Square Rooms on Thursday, June 23rd. Signor Ciabatta's Concert, at St. James's Hall, on Saturday, June 25th, was remarkable as affording one of the very few appearances in London of Madame Grist. Series of concerts were given by the pupils of the Royal Academy of Music. The Mouday Popular Concerts continued their course, and as rendering the works of the best composers popular, at the same time in the best manner, reflect very great credit on their spirited promoter, Mr. Arthur Chappell.

Mr. Howard Glover gave several concerts in the course of the year, the first being at St. James's Hall, on Saturday, January 2nd; a series of "Grand Musical Festivals" was commenced by him at Drury Lane Theatre, on Saturday, October 1st. It is sufficient for us to say of these concerts that all available talent was engaged by Mr. Glover, and that all classes of artists, from Signor Mario and Madame Grist downwards, sang or played.

Mr. Henry Leslie's Choir, the best in the metropolis for the performance of glees, madrigals, and part-songs, gave concerts at intervals, the subscription season, 1863-4, ending Thursday, May 26th.

Musical Correspondence.

BERLIN, DEC. 1864. Carlotta Patti's concert in Halle, an account of which I promised in my last, was as great a success as I anticipated. Every regular seat in the very handsome new hall of the Volksschule, (people's school), was engaged several days beforehand, at the unprecedented price of 1-2 Thalers (the front rows even at 2 Thalers), and the aisles and corners were filled with extra benches, swelling the number of seats to 700, and leaving but little room for those unfortunates who had paid a Thaler for a "standing-place." A concert audience in Germany has a much more brilliant appearance than with us, owing to the custom which requires the ladies to dress more, at least to remove their bonnets and cloaks, and wear light or gay colored dresses or wrappings. The programme was a very miscellaneous one of the kind that has for years been stereotyped in America, only that the quality of some of its ingredients was superior. Among Mlle. Patti's assistants, I recognized two old acquaintances: Alfred Jaell and Vieuxtemps, who opened the concert with the Kreutzer Sonata, or rather two movements of it, omitting the first for some unaccountable reason. In point of execution, blending with each other, and even spirit, their playing was faultless, but it did not warm the listener. The same could be said of the respective solo playing of the two. A violoncellist named Steffens showed his instrument to best advantage in some sentimental French composition. Patti, charming and blooming as ever, delighted her hearers much as would a bird, by her wonderful roudades, trills, cadenzas of every kind, and by her really marvellous high notes, struck by her clear ringing voice with unwavering precision. She sang: "O luce di quest' anima," the shadow dance from "Dinorah," a Mazurka for the voice, and in answer to an encore, a laughing song by Auber, which latter was rendered with charming naïveté and astonishing skill. Yet it was nothing but skill, and a wonderful natural gift—the soul, the feeling, were wanting, as also the higher cultivation which could make of so glorious a voice what ought to be made of it, and render it capable of worthier efforts and the interpretation of nobler works. A small portion of the audience felt this, but the greater part were dazzled by the brilliant halo of humbug around the whole affair, and overflowed with blind, unqualified admiration and enthusiasm. In short, Ullman has played his cards so well, that another concert was announced, which, when I left, promised to be as great a success as the first.

And now, how shall I begin to tell you of Berlin, and all the attractions it holds out to the lover of music! Oh for the time, the physical and mental endurance, and the money, to give heed to them all! What a store of treasures one might lay up in the course of a single winter! To begin with concerts, those of the royal orchestra, of the Cathedral choir, (Dom-chor), the Sing-Akademie and the Sternsche Verein occur, in regular series, every year. Besides these there are Quartet, Trio, and miscellaneous classical Soirées by eminent artists, mostly in series of three or more, not to mention occasional concerts of the most attractive kind. These are the expensive aristocratic entertainments; but in addition to these, every day of the week brings one, if not two cheap concerts, at 5 Silbergroschen (or by subscription 3) a ticket, held in the various "Locale," i.e. halls attached to coffee gardens where the same entertainments are held in summer. The best of these are those of Liebig, well-known to Americans who have ever been in Berlin. But he has a worthy follower in Oertling, whose orchestra plays nearly as well as Liebig's, and who also has established a series of cheap Quartet concerts; in which, however, there is room for improvement as far as execution is concerned. At these concerts the audience are none the less attentive because they are seated at small tables, drinking coffee or beer, and often smoking, and the ladies with their work. They are, indeed, so much frequented by ladies, that within a few years an attempt has been made to do away with the smoking, at least on some days of the week, which has been partially successful. The programmes are never poor, and often faultless; as for instance, one which I heard recently, when the pieces played were Mozart's "Jupiter" and Beethoven's 5th Symphony, the Overtures to Coriolanus and Melusine, and an exquisite "Nordisches Lied" by Schumann.

The Sternsche Verein have opened their season with "St. Paul," and the "Creation;" the Sing-Akademie with the "Seasons;" the Cathedral Choir, incomparably fine as ever, have given one of their regular concerts, at which nothing but sacred music, ancient and modern, is performed, and are now singing twice every afternoon in connection with the Christmas exhibition of Transparencies, which is held every year for several weeks at holiday time. This exhibition is unique of its kind. In a darkened room, a quiet, expectant audience is assembled. Suddenly the lights are entirely extinguished, and a heavenly music begins. At the same time a curtain opens, and an illuminated transparent painting, on some Scriptural subject, appears. The music continues while the curtain is open, and is of a character befitting the subject of the picture. The effect of the whole is indescribable. A sort of hushed awe pervades the audience; no one speaks above a whisper; there is something magic in the transparencies, and the voices of the invisible singers seem like those of angels. This year there were six paintings by resident artists: the Annunciation, the Baptism of Christ, Christ and the Samaritan woman, the Adoration of the Magi, the two Mary's at the Tomb, and Resurrection of Christ. The music was mostly modern, by Reichardt, Taubert, Nicolai, Naumann, and Reissiger; the only exception, and the pearl of the whole, was a composition by an unknown composer of the 15th century: "Alla trinità beata," &c., a work of strange beauty and simple grandeur. The Cathedral choir can still be heard every Sunday at the regular service in the Cathedral or "Dome;" and on high festivals, as well as at the liturgic service on the eve of every holiday, their singing is peculiarly impressive. They were called, not long ago, to mourn the loss of Dr. Neithardt, their leader and instructor for many years; but as yet no had effect of his absence is discernible in their singing.

I regret not to be able to speak as favorably of the Opera here in Berlin as of concerts. That institution is in a very indifferent state. A few stars serve to attract audiences; but when they are announced, it is almost impossible to get tickets at ordinary prices, on account of the impudence of the ticket speculators, who buy them up, and sell them at enormous premiums. In this way the residents of Berlin, with the exception of the wealthy Jews, are kept away, and the audiences are composed mostly of these same Jews and strangers, with whom it is a point of honor to have heard an opera in Berlin. The forces of the opera are very unequally balanced, there being, for instance, three superior sopranos, with two or three good ones, but no mezzo-soprano or alto worth speaking of, and, shame to say, no tenor of peculiar merit. This "Tenor calamity," as a Berlin daily calls it, has lasted for some time, and various attempts have been made to end it, but without success. Theodore Formes's voice has lost sadly with time, it being twelve or thirteen years since he was engaged for this stage. A short time ago it was thought that the rara avis had been hit upon, and a gentleman named Woworski was engaged, but only to raise vain regrets for overhastiness. It is curious that one of the best of the tenors employed here is said to be an American by the name of Adams, who was formerly connected with some minstrel troupe at home. The basses are not much better represented: Krause, Fricke, and Salomon, are all old stand-bys. The first is decidedly the best, and a real artist, with a fine voice. Of the sopranos, Lucca is decidedly the favorite. Owing to the difficulties above mentioned, I have not yet heard her, nor De Ahna, nor Harriers-Wippert, whom the best judges place in the same rank with, if not above her. The "Marriage of Figaro," in which the three appear together, is called the best-performed opera now on this stage, and I hope in a further letter to give you an account of it. So also of Gluck's Orpheus, in which Wagner-Jachmann still appears occasionally, the title-part being the only role to which her voice is still equal.

Altogether, my next letter will treat more of particulars; in the present one I wished to give your readers a general idea of what is done for music in this capital, and as more details would lead me too far on this occasion, I reserve them for another time.

M.

PHILADELPHIA, JAN. 28.—Mr. GOTTSCHALK has been crowding Concert Hall with his "Concerts d'Adieu," of which there have been three,—in which we may fancy the amiable, but lackadaisical pianist emulating the love-lorn Romeo in his protracted parting from the indulgent Juliet:—

"Good night! good night! parting is such sweet sorrow,
"That I could say good night! till it be morrow!"

It was my misfortune to be present at one of these painful leave-takings, and I rejoice to note that "the great American pianist" seemed to be in no wise melancholy or depressed. I presume the grief of the parting hour was greatly assuaged by the prospect of the pecuniary benefit following the presence of large audiences. Yet the triumph of a resolute mind was never more completely manifested than by the serenity and cheerfulness, withal, with which the illustrious artist contemplated the separation from his dear public.

It is, indeed, somewhat strange that people will deplete their resources to the extent of One Dollar per capita, for the sake of hearing "Faust" on five grand pianos, when one can hear it any day of the seven, on twenty-five, with the additional pleasure of having the tempo varied according to individual caprice by each performer, and on instruments of the most diverse qualities and pitch.

Mr. Gottschalk's concerts are not, it must be owned, rendered additionally attractive by the presence and assistance of either Miss Lucy Simons, or Mr. Muzio. The lady has a voice rather inferior in quality to that of the fine Chickering piano which is half the pleasure of the pianist's performance;—and Mr. Muzio, competent as he may be as an entrepreneur, plays accompaniments as wretchedly as I suppose is possible. He is the very worst of that class of musicians that I have ever heard. Really, there is truth in that oft quoted bit of Brillat-Savarin's pleasantries, that a pianist can be made, but accompanists are only born.

To refer to something attended with more grateful reminiscences:—the second of the WOLFSOHN and THOMAS series of Classical Concerts was given on Saturday evening, Jan. 21, at the Foyer of the Academy. The programme was the following.

- Trio—(D minor, op. 62.) Piano and Strings. Schumann.
Messrs. Wolfsohn, Thomas and Ahrend.
1. Andante and variations for Piano and Cello, Mendelssohn.
Messrs. Wolfsohn and Ahrend.
2. Ballade—(G minor, op. 23.) ..... Chopin.
Carl Wolfsohn.
Quartet—(F major, No. 1.) ..... Beethoven.
Messrs. Thomas, Roggenburger, Kammerer and Ahrend.

The Schumann trio, undoubtedly one of the most enduring monuments of the composer's genius, was very finely performed. Naturally enough, it did not excite a great deal of enthusiasm in the audience, select though it was,—a hundred and odd people having braved a terrible storm to be present. It was its first production, I think, in this city; of course it did not receive the welcome it deserved, although the discriminating few who know Schumann were enraptured with the many beauties that were made manifest through the superior playing of Messrs. Thomas and Ahrend. Mr. Thomas was unable to perform the Tartini Sonata, which was advertised, in consequence of a recent injury to his hand, and the exquisite Duo of Mendelssohn was substituted.

The Chopin Ballade in G minor, although a work replete with beauties, is not, to my fancy, one of his best efforts; why Mr. Wolfsohn should have selected it, I can scarcely imagine, especially when there are others of his works to which many of us are entire strangers, and which it would have afforded greater delight to hear.

All present agree that such perfect quartet playing had never been heard as delighted us in the Beethoven String Quartet. The Adagio, in the hands of four such artists, was a revelation even to many who had thought themselves familiar with its many beauties.

At the 11th Matinée of the Philadelphia Quintette Club, Jan. 25, the following programme was presented:—

- Quartet, op. 76, in C.....Haydn.
Messrs Gaertner, Jarvis, Cross and Schmits.
Sonata, C major, op. 58.....Beethoven.
Mr. Jarvis.
Quartet, C major.....Mozart.
Messrs. Gaertner, Jarvis, Cross, Plagemann, and Schmits.

I was present and particularly delighted with the conscientious rendering of the Beethoven Sonata, by Mr. JARVIS. I hope to find it in the programme soon again. If Mr. GAERTNER could for once relieve himself of that habitual nervous irritability which seems so often to possess him in his climaxes, and which too often sadly mars the beauty of his performances, and endeavor to be more like those, "who, moving others, are themselves as stone," the distance between him and the summit of perfection would for once be greatly abridged.

Mr. ISAAC L. RICE, the youthful pianist, whose hopeful debut, some two years since, was noticed with commendation in your columns, gave a concert, on the evening of Jan. 26, which proved to be a very pleasant affair. I add the programme:—

1. Duo—Sonata in B, op. 45, Piano and Violoncello.
Messrs. I. L. Rice and Theodore Ahrend.
Mendelssohn.
2. Song—Romanza, "Va, dit elle."—Robert le Diable.
Meyerbeer.
Miss Henriette Behrens.
3. Violoncello Solo.—Fantasia—Lucia.....Platti.
Mr. Theodore Ahrend.
4. Piano Solo—Rigoletto—Paraphrase of Concert...Liszt.
I. L. Rice.
1. Violin Solo—7<sup>me</sup> leme Air varié.....Beriot.
Mr. A. Roggenburger.
2. Song—Serenade, [first time.].....Behrens.
Poetry by Marie de Marguerittes.
Mrs. Henriette Behrens.
3. Piano Solo—Scherzo in B flat minor.....Chopin.
I. L. Rice.
4. Song—Valse de Concert—"L'Ardite,".....Arditi.
Mrs. Henriette Behrens.
5. Piano Solo,—{a. Au Bord du Ruissseau.....Gutmann.
b. Redowa de Concert.....Wolfssohn.
I. L. Rice.

To succeed in attaining the perfection necessary to a correct performance of such music as the Mendelssohn Sonata, and the Chopin Scherzo,—by which I choose rather to rate Master Rice's ability, than by the less exacting "Rigoletto" Fantasia—is creditable to the young artist's industry, and, unquestionably, indicative of talent. Should he continue to progress in the future in proportion to his past advancement in the mastery of the instrument, and a true idea of art, his friends may, I think, confidently anticipate for him no mean position in the ranks of our native virtuosos.

MERCUTIO.

CINCINNATI, JAN. 27.—Our three choral societies have been very active this winter. What we lack, is a good orchestra. We have the materials for it; but we have here every evening such a crowd of shows and popular amusements, and our musicians are thereby so much engaged and divided up in their respective little bands, that it is impossible to unite the best of them, to form an orchestra of a higher order, and to find the time for proper rehearsals. Notwithstanding this difficulty, our active leader, Mr. BARUS, has managed with his German Society, "the Maennerchor," to get up another short season of German Opera, and to have a pretty good orchestra to accompany them. This year they have given us Masaniello, Stradella, and La Dame Blanche. As professional assistance they had Madame Rotter, of the New York German Opera, who made a very agreeable impression as a careful and expressive singer and a good actress. The performances have been quite pleasing, and certainly very creditable for amateurs. As in former years, they excelled principally in the choruses.

Our American choral society, the "Harmonic," Mr. Barus leader, gave a largely attended concert a week ago with a chorus of about 80, and about 30 in the orchestra, when they performed the first part of the "Messiah" and the "Song of the Bell." The performance was good, but might have been improved by a little energy and more attention to light and shadow. The chorus sounded full and well balanced; the Society is very flourishing.

The German "Cecilia Society," who are in their ninth season, gave us some very interesting compositions at their concert last night; viz: the "New Year's song" by Schumann, "Spring's Message, by Gade, and the Finale from the unfinished opera "Lurline" by Mendelssohn. The chorus numbered 40, and was accompanied by a Steinway Grand piano; but the singers are so well drilled by their new leader, Mr. Andres, and the piano was played so finely and with so much force and expression by him, that the result was a very artistic and highly enjoyable performance. May we have many more such concerts, with a truly fine programme and a skilful rendering of it.

In a week we shall have the New York German Opera with us.

X.

CINCINNATI, JAN. 16. The second "Concert de Salon" of Messrs. KUNKEL and HAHN came off on the 12th inst., and was attended by a highly appreciative audience. It is really gratifying to see the marked attention of the listeners throughout, and the very enthusiastic reception of each piece. It speaks well, not only for the performers, but for the decidedly growing musical taste of our "Western Village."

Mr. Hahn is fast gaining favor as a vigorous and correct performer. With an even tone, graceful and easy bowing, well marked staccato, and a tasteful discrimination, he renders anything which he undertakes in a masterly and impressive style.

The Nocturne, Op. 38, of Chopin, and "La Truite," op. 38, of Heller, were finely performed by Jacob Kunkel, pupil of his talented brother, Chas. Kunkel. This Nocturne is without doubt one of the finest inspirations of Chopin, and was handled with that delicacy and spirit which showed the careful and appreciative study of the performer. In the Transcription by Heller he developed great clearness of execution. The triplets in the right hand were perfectly distinct, and pearl-like throughout; his improvement has been very marked and rapid.

The artistic inspiration with which Charles Kunkel played the Nocturne of Schumann, and "Auf Flügeln Des Gesanges," by Heller, rendered them the gems of the evening. Schumann's noble Nocturne, with its rich harmony, and Heller's exquisite Improvisata, which Mr. Kunkel had the kindness to give us complete, with the beautiful middle part in C minor (as published by O. Ditson & Co.) were faultless in the rendering. In fact, in the West, Mr. K. has no superiors, and very few equals as a pianist.

G.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, FEB. 4, 1865.

Concerts.

As our review must be brief, we begin with the long neglected, and, looking over the programmes of two months and more, endeavor to bring down to the present time our

GREAT ORGAN RECORD. Since the last Saturday in November we have not reported, inasmuch as things were going on in pretty much the same way as during the whole summer and autumn, while other and newer musical doings claimed precedence. The Wednesday and Saturday "noonings" and the somewhat graver Sunday evening concerts have been uninterruptedly kept up; the audiences small, to be sure, but often numbering two or three hundred people, mostly visitors drawn by enthusiasm or curiosity to see and listen for the first time to the wondrous instrument. Each time you see for the most part new faces; and it is pleasant to observe the rapt attention and radiant expression. Properly speaking, there have not been many real organ concerts, concerts of organ music; for the noonday performances are mainly convenient opportunities for seeing and hearing the Organ as such, (although the Sunday evening concerts serve to some extent a more purely musical purpose). There has been a great deal of light and pretty and showy music, of course; more of transcriptions, orchestral imitations, Vox Humana and other solo exhibitions, fantastic variations, vague improvisations, than of strictly organ compositions; more of Harlequin than of Bach. And yet, considering the circumstances, it is remarkable how much the name of Bach has figured on the programmes,—almost always once, on Sundays twice or thrice—and how many times several of his grandest pieces have been played. Naturally, too, there has been a great deal of repetition; each organist has settled into a certain round of pieces, which he can feel sure of doing well, and which he has "tried on" so often that he knows that they will please; yet one or two are more adventurous and use the "noonings" also for explorations into fresh fields, for readings of hitherto untried compositions, thus enlarging the repertoire, sometimes with valuable accessions.

Of the organ concerts, in a general way, we have only a note or two more to make. In the first place, it is remarkable in what perfect tune and working order, the most complicated instrument has been kept through all the variations of weather; the like has never before been known, we suspect, of organs in this country; we can only remember one or two days, of sudden and extreme cold, when one or two stops were out (in the wrong sense). The limited supply of Cochituate power, too, while the lake ran low, not only threw the organist out of practice, but may have at times balked somewhat his intentions in the public concert.—Again, it is undoubtedly an accident, and yet remarkable, that among so many organists, this great organ has never once been played upon by a German (!)—although Germans built it, a German keeps it in tune, true organ music is mostly German music, and in all our cities the Germans make most of the good music for us. The organists who have sprung up at the call of the Great Organ are nearly all Americans; the exceptions English.—Still more remarkable is it, that Mr. PAINE, our organist par excellence, at least when we speak of the great school of Bach, has not once been called upon to play during the last three months or more.—And now for our very brief review.

Mr. LANG, in the two months past, has taken his turn six times. Of Bach, he has played a Prelude and Fugue in C; a sweet and naive Pastorale in F; the deep, majestic Grave for full organ from the Fantasia in G; a Prelude and Fugue in E flat from the Well-tempered Clavichord (twice), and the Allegro from a Concerto in G. From Schumann, twice more the Fugue on B, A, C, H.—Mendelssohn: the third Sonata again, and the Allegro of the first Sonata.—Rinck's Flute Concerto, twice.—He has eschewed the French Offertoires, but has dealt largely in transcriptions, to-wit: Overtures to Dinorah (twice), Egmont, Freyshütz, "Midsummer Night's Dream;" also Wedding March and Nocturne from the last; March from "Eli," &c.—The Quartet from Fidelio, Beethoven's Hallelujah; Dresel's "Slumber Song," and a Danish melody figure among his always graceful and effective arrangements. Of his improvisations, too, we might recall pleasant things, if memory served.

Mrs. FROMOCK has played seven times. Bach: Toccata in F, and a new one, less interesting, running a long way in unison, in C; Fugues, the great one in G minor (twice), the smaller one in the same key, and one in G major. Mendelssohn; 4th Sonata; 1st do, in F minor, twice; Prelude and Fugue three times. A curious, dry old Fugue in G by Zachan, Handel's master; a fine Adagio in A flat by Fischer; Schellenberg's Fantasia on "Ein feste Burg;" Kullak's Pastorale; Rinck's variations on an air by old Corelli (twice); a Battiste Offertoire; Variations on a Russian Hymn, and Concert Fantasia in F minor, by Freyer:—thus much of organ music. Her transcriptions have included Handel's chorus: "He led them," &c.; Andante (with var.) from 7th Symphony, and an Adagio, by Haydn; a splendid and exuberant Fantasia (orchestral) by Mozart (three times), and a Jesu bone pastor in the lighter style of his masses; a pleasing Pastorale (three times) from Beethoven's "Men of Prometheus;" an Allegretto by Schumann; a Franz song and an Idylle by Lysberg for the Vox Humana; Overtures to Oberon and Tell; Wedding March; Beethoven's Turkish March; and the Andantes to his first and fifth Symphonies. Mrs. F. is one of the most earnest, most technically skilled, intelligent, most enterprising in the enriching of her repertoire, and least condescending to clatter, of all the organists.

Mr. THAYER, six times. Bach: Toccata in D minor, twice; smaller Fugue in G minor, twice; grand Prelude in B minor, truly grand; Trio Sonata in E flat, twice; La Musette (new) twice. Handel's Pasacaglia again (three times over) has been one of the most rewarding of Mr. T's explorations. Mendelssohn: 2nd and 3rd Sonatas (twice each); Fantasia in D minor. Schumann: Prelude in C, and Canon in C, from op. 56, for pedal piano (new). An Offertoire by Battiste; a Pastorale (new) by Kullak. The name of Thayer has appeared more often than any other; his three secular Offertoires (for Vox Humana, for bassoon, and de Concert) have had another turn each; his Variations on the "American Hymn" also, thrice; a Sonata in F, and a Canzonetta from another; and two quite popular little fancies, which he calls "Reverie of Home" and "Idylle of the Rose." In the shape of transcriptions, we have had from him: slow movements from the 2nd, 5th and 7th Beethoven Symphonies, and a "Marche Religieuse" by Beethoven, which we did not hear and can but guess what work was meant; Overtures to Semiramide, Tell, Dame Ilanche, and (Heaven save the mark!) Balfe's "Bohemian Girl"; Wedding March from the Huguenots; Incarnatus from Mozart's 12th Mass, &c. Mr. T. is as enterprising and as popular as ever; but popularity is a much greater danger to a young artist than the want of it.

Mr. G. E. WHITING (just transplanted from Albany to King's Chapel in this city) has played thrice. Two good Bach fugues, in G minor and E minor; the 1st Sonata by Mendelssohn; Fantasia and Fugue in A flat, by Brosig; Wely's Offertoire in G, and a Fantasia by his master, Best, of Liverpool, for organ compositions. Transcribed overtures (Oberon, Preciosa, Tell); the Larghetto from Mozart's Quintet, op. 18 (twice); Andante of Beethoven's 1st Symphony; Minuet from "Samson;" Chorus: "Be not afraid," from Elijah; Weber's "Mermaid Song" (on Vox Hum.); part of a Vesper Service by Donizetti, and an air from his Don Sebastian, for the rest. Mr. W. has a very clear, firm, ready mastery of the instrument; we have had to miss most of his concerts, and have not yet heard him enough to fully judge of his tone as a musician.

Mr. WILCOX has played once. Programme: Credo, Et incarnatus, and Et vitam, from Haydn's 1st Mass; Andante, Beethoven's 1st Symphony; Offertoire, Battiste; Andante, Wely; Improvisation; Kyrie, Haydn; Fugue in D minor, Wely.

The only new addition to the list of organists has been Mr. JAMES PEARCE, Cathedral Organist at Quebec, a well-trained, intelligent, modest, manly young English musician, whose two performances (Dec. 31st and Jan. 1st) made a particularly good impression, so much so that we hope he will repeat the visit. His clear, firm, easy handling of the Organ, after only a couple of days acquaintance with it; his tasteful and ready selection of stops, through a large range of combinations; his precision of touch, well outlined phrasing, and unswerving tempo, quite surprised us. And there was no nonsense about it. His programmes covered a wide range. That of Saturday: Prelude and Fugue in E flat, by Bach; Schubert's Ave Maria, Haydn's motet: Insane et vana caræ; Mendelssohn's 4th Sonata; Barcarole, transcribed from Bennett's 4th piano Concerto; a part-song: "The last night in the year," by young Arthur Sullivan; and a chorus: "Fixed in his everlasting seat," by Handel. On Sunday evening: March from Athalie; German Choral, varied by Rinck; Agnus Dei, from Mozart's 1st Mass; Kyrie, from Haydn's 2nd; Andante (varied), Beethoven; Allegro, by Rinck; Bennett's Barcarole again; Aria, "Battle Prayer," by Himmel; Prelude by E. J. Hopkins (of Temple Church, London), and Chorus: "Sing unto God," Handel.

ORCHESTRAL UNION. The audience and the interest at the Wednesday Afternoon Concerts keeps increasing. The second, last week, offered Stern-dale Bennett's best work, the "Naiads" overture; a Strauss waltz; Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony; Schubert's "Serenade" (with solos for 'cello, oboe and cornet, by WULF FRIES, RIBAS and ARBUCKLE); Chopin's Marcia funebre, arranged for orchestra, which we should have been curious to hear; a caprice heroique by Kotsky, called "The rousing of the Lion," which must have been very terrible.

The third concert was equally interesting, and particularly good in execution. The Overture seemed shy of answering to its name; one printed bill said Rossini's "Siege of Corinth;" another, "Fra Diavolo;" but the first burst of the tutti revealed our old friend "Die Felsenmühle," by Reissiger. The Strauss waltz was a new one, "Carnivals Botschafter" (Carnival messages), quite original, piquant and luscious; the mysteriously solemn introduction (cloud out of which the auroral streamers spring) very clever. Mozart's exquisite Symphony in E flat, with its profoundly beautiful Andante and captivating Minuet and Trio, followed, and held the audience in silent delight. The rendering was good, but might still be refined upon to the last degree of light and shade and fine nervous accent. The Finale to the last act of Der Freyschütz, richly and broadly instrumented, was quite effective. The Concert concluded with Schubert's "Elogy of Tears" (arranged), and a Gallop (new) by Somerlatt.

DR. S. P. TUCKERMAN'S Concert of Sacred Music, on Sunday evening, Jan. 22, was eminently successful. The programme was largely made up of the same materials as his concerts at St. Paul's church in past years. The pieces were all good, or historically curious; but, short as they were most of them, there were too many (23 numbers in all), and not all so well related to each other as to prevent the impression of a medley, which is always more or less wearisome. For instance, the two organ solos by Mr. WHITING, introduced in the middle of the concert, between the Miserere and "The Lord is a man of war," sounded apropos to nothing: the first (Prelude in G, by Mendelssohn) startled by harsh contrast of stops, while the second, the jubilant March finale from the C minor Symphony, had no possible connection with it, or with the tone of the whole concert, as truly set by Dr. Tuckerman's chaste opening voluntary.

The most impressive things of the evening were the Chorals: that from Mendelssohn's "St. Paul," that by Bach ("Jesu, king of glory") in four and five parts, and "Ein feste Burg" in unison, with organ accompaniment, at the end of the concert. The Anthem by Mendelssohn, opening with the Choral, "In deep distress I cry to Thee," followed by Soprano solo, sweetly and purely sung by Mrs. GILBERT, and closing with Quartet; the Terzetto for female voices, two on each part, also by Mendelssohn; the Benedictus (Quartet) from Haydn's 15th Mass, were all interesting.

Part II. and the first number of Part III. consisted of curious specimens of ancient church music: from St. Ambrose, Guido Aretinus, Palestrina; an anthem by Dr. Croft (17th century), in which a bass solo was bravely rendered by Mr. WHITNEY; and Allegri's Miserere, with responsive choirs, one outside of the Hall, which must have given some faint notion of its peculiar effect in the Pope's chapel.

Bravely sung, too, was the duet from Israel in Egypt: "The Lord is a man of war," by the strong bass voices of Mr. POWERS and Mr. WHITNEY. Other capital solos, both in voice, style and feeling, were the Ave Maria of Franz, by Mrs. SMITH, soprano, and "O rest in the Lord," by Miss ANNIE L. CARY, contralto. The anthem by Farrant, the Benedictus from Weber's Mass in G (Mrs. Smith, Mrs. Shattuck, Mr. —, and Mr. Powers), and Dr. Tuckerman's beautiful Quartet for female voices: "Their sun shall no more go down," were all finely rendered. The Angel Trio from "Elijah" by the three boys from the Church of the Advent, had the charm of fresh, pure, penetrating voices, and of good ensemble, though it was taken too fast, and lacked the soul and feeling of women's voices; there is a crudity, after all, about the best of boy singing, which is less offensive, however, where they are massed in chorus. It pleased the multitude, of course, and had to be repeated.

MR. HERMANN DAUM'S Concert was a "Benefit" indeed. The great assemblage at the Music Hall, last Saturday evening, showed the esteem and sympathy in which the young artist is held. The concert musically was of a high character, for so miscellaneous a programme resulting from the eagerness of so many brother artists to testify their good will. Mr. J. K. PAINE (his first public appearance for a long time) opened it with a noble organ Prelude in E flat, by Bach, played in a noble manner, and not unappreciated. Other good things and good people followed, more than we now have room to notice.

ITALIAN OPERA.—The season at the Boston Theatre came to an end on Wednesday afternoon, three extra performances (Faust, Norma, and Martha), having been added to the four weeks. Since our last record it has offered nothing new, except a new soprano, Mrs. JENNIE VAN ZANDT, of New York, in Lucia, of whom report speaks well. Ernani has been given twice in a very spirited, intense, loud style, to the delight of a loud audience; Sig. MACCAFERRI, as Ernani, made up in energy and gesture what he lacks in sweet or agreeable quality of voice; and all went with him, loud and harsh, in the famous ensembles; in truth it seemed to us not only a "spirited," but a tearing performance; it was the Verdi style of singing run mad. But it is peculiar to Italian Opera audiences, to be carried away by anything that is physically intense and strong; they love whatever is done much, as A. Ward would say, whether it be done well or not. Let the baritone spread his arms, and rush to the footlights, roaring out a long loud note, the basso receiving him in like style, and Oh! how happy the burly "gents" are who haunt the opera lobbies, just as they haunt the door-steps of hotels! how the house comes down! But do not think that we deny all merit in that performance of Ernani.

CAROZZI'S Norma was superior, chiefly in the intenser tragical parts, such as the denunciatory passages and Trio of the second act. There it rose to tragedy-queen dignity and fire. Her singing of Casta Diva lacked fineness, sweetness, and was full of tremolo. MORENSI'S Adalgisa was excellent; so was MASSIMILIANI'S Pollio. Altogether we prefer this troupe, as we do most Italian operas of late, in their lighter and more natural pieces, those in which Miss KELLOGG finds her best parts, as Linda, La Figlia, Sonnambula, and above all (as the best success of this time), Fra Diavolo. Most of the tragedy of recent Italian opera, like most of the serious plays in the theatres, tries to make physical intensity pass for passion, startling sensation for wholesome quickening of heart and brain, sentimentalism for sentiment, and lacks the genial element.

Our New York "Regular" fails us again, and so New York does not report herself; but she has "five new musical journals" of her own.

Do not forget the Choral Festival in Music Hall on Tuesday, nor Master COKER'S Concert on Wednesday, evening. Nor the Quintette Club on the 14th.

A MUSICAL CONSERVATOIRE IN RHODE ISLAND.—We find the following in the Providence Daily Post, under the head of a "Proposal for a Musical Conservatory at Elmwood :"

"Prof. EBEN TOURJEE, the accomplished head of the Musical Institute, connected with the Providence Conference Seminary at East Greenwich, proposes the establishment of a musical college or conservatory at Elmwood. His plan is the formation of an association or corporation with a capital of $100,000, and the purchase of a section of land at Elmwood, with the erection thereon of suitable buildings, to be furnished with the necessary furniture and instruments, said buildings and movable property to be leased to him for a term of years, at a rent equivalent to eight per cent. per annum on the amount expended.

Mr. Tourjee brings to the enterprise, as his contribution towards his carrying out the plan, an experience of fifteen years as a successful teacher, an extensive acquaintance with the musical men of the country, and the benefits derived from a tour in Europe, embracing visits to the principal cities and towns, and an investigation into the different methods of instruction pursued in all the principal conservatories and musical schools. This plan has the warm sympathy and approval of our most eminent clergymen, musical men and public educators."

HARTFORD, CONN. Here is a record of musical performances in Hartford and vicinity during the month of January.—The Meriden Musical Association, numbering one hundred voices, gave a fine performance of Haydn's "Creation," under the direction of Mr. J. G. Barnett, of Hartford, with Mr. C. J. Preston, Mr. Sumner Smith and Mr. Geo. E. Aiken for the solos.

"A concert by the singers of Hartford, for the benefit of the poor. Haydn's 3d Mass, Beethoven's 5th Symphony, and "William Tell" Overture, with two classical songs, resulted in a crowded house, and $600 in the poor box.

"A Chamber Concert in the Seminary, at which were performed Spohr's Nonet, Schumann's Octet and other classical gems. In West Hartford, an exhibition of a new and beautiful organ, built by Johnson of Westfield; several of the best of the Hartford singers had the benefit of a fine sleigh ride and sumptuous supper, prepared for them by the good people of West Hartford; in return, they paid them by some delightful notes, manufactured by Mendelssohn, Spohr, Handel, Himmel, Rossini, J. G. Barnett and others. Mr. Barnett presided at the organ, and his long experience as a musician and organist enabled him to bring out all that was grand and beautiful in the instrument.

"A Grand Promenade Concert and Donation Supper, for the purpose of aiding in the establishing of a Soldiers' Home for disabled and invalid soldiers, comes off Friday night; it will be a great success.

"The Beethoven Society, under the direction of Mr. J. G. Barnett, will also perform the "Creation" for the same special object in the course of a few weeks.

"Another new $2000 organ will be exhibited by Mr. J. G. Barnett at West Winsted, on Friday evening. The organ is built by Johnson of Westfield, and is said to be a very perfect instrument. A quintet of the best voices of Hartford, will perform some fine selections from the "Creation," "Messiah," "Fall of Babylon," and other classical works.

"In Rockville, also, there is a very fine organ now being put up by the above named builder.

"The instrumental portion of all the above named concerts came, with two exceptions, from Boston, and consisted of the Quintet Club, a part of the Germania Band and others. No performance is now satisfactory unless the above named skilful and long tried musicians form a part of the programme.

There have also been Masonic and Burns Festivals, at which music has been a great and interesting feature of the entertainment."

NEW HAMPSHIRE STATE MUSICAL CONVENTION.—Such is the title of the gathering which took place at Concord in the first week of January. One who "assisted" sends us the following account:

This Convention held its first session last year, in response to a call from Messrs. J. H. Morey and B. B. Davis, teachers of music, of Concord, for the singers in different parts of the State to meet together for one week, for the purpose of mutual improvement. Mr. L. O. Emerson was engaged as conductor, and the experiment was successful beyond the most sanguine expectations, 750 singers being present.

The session of this year was organized Monday, Jan. 2, in Eagle Hall, a large number of singers being present. Mr. L. O. Emerson was again conductor.

On Tuesday the numbers rapidly increased until Eagle Hall was nearly filled with singers, and by Wednesday the number had reached one thousand—the largest gathering of singers ever convened in New England, outside of Boston.

A part of each day was occupied in the practice of church music from the "Harp of Judah;" an hour for the practice of songs, quartets, piano-forte solos, &c.; an hour for remarks from different members of the convention on musical topics; and the remainder of the time in the practice of choruses from the Messiah, Creation and Elijah.

Mr. Emerson conducted the various exercises with evident satisfaction to the singers, and much credit to himself. He is especially happy in his manner of rendering church music, much attention being given to the sentiment of the words. We were somewhat surprised to hear so many good voices, and find so many good leaders in such a miscellaneous crowd. The oratorio choruses were taken up with as much readiness as our Boston chorus societies would take music with which they were not fully acquainted. Public concerts were given on Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday evenings. Among those taking prominent parts we remember the names of Miss Anna Granger, of New York (formerly of Boston), Mrs. Wadleigh, Miss Theresa Davis, Messrs. W. Perkins and H. E. Holt, of Boston; Miss Jenny M. Keyes, of Hartland, Vt.; Mr. E. P. Phillips, of St. Albans, Vt.; Mr. James Whitney, of St. Johnsbury, Vt.; and Mr. A. N. Whitney, of Derby Line, Vt. Among those from New Hampshire, whom we recollect as worthy of mention, are Mrs. Martha Dana Shepard, the talented pianist, of Holderness; Miss Kate Wood, of Concord; Miss White, of New London; Mr. C. C. Gibson, an excellent violinist, of Herkimer; and the "Arion Glee Club," of Nashua, consisting of Messrs. C. N. Merrill, N. O. Prescott, A. B. Dodge, and V. B. Watson.

On Thursday evening a series of resolutions, highly complimentary to the conductor and the managers of the convention, and to the citizens of Concord, were unanimously adopted. On Friday morning a very pleasant episode occurred. Mr. Emerson dropped his baton, and Mr. J. H. Morey, who was presiding at one of Chickering's Grands, asked Mrs. Shepard, who was sitting on the other end of the stage at another Chickering Grand, to come forward, as he wished to speak to her. She did so, entirely unconscious of what was about to occur, when Mr. Morey, in behalf of the convention, presented her with a handsome solid silver tea-caster, as a slight token of their appreciation of her valuable services as pianist. This was well merited, as Mrs. S. had been at her post early and late, and exhibited an amount of skill, energy and strength which not many ladies possess. Many of your Boston readers remember the performances of this lady—Miss Martha Dana—at the Temple (about two years since, if we recollect rightly).

The closing concert, Friday evening, passed off to the satisfaction of all, and the convention adjourned to meet again the first week in Jan. 1866. Saturday morning there was an informal meeting at Eagle Hall, to exchange congratulations, say "good bye," and express the hope that all may meet again next year. Much praise is due to Messrs. Morey, Davis, Jackman and others for the successful management of the enterprise, and to the citizens of Concord for their hospitality. An announcement was made in our daily papers that the convention would make an excursion to Boston and give a concert in the Music Hall. It is to be regretted that they did not do so, as they would have been sure of a full house. As it was, five or six hundred people sought admittance to the hall at the appointed hour, although notice had been given of its postponement. It is due to the managers of the convention to say that no blame can attach to them, as the arrangements were made in good faith; but the members voted, at a late hour, that they thought it best to remain and continue the regular exercises.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC. Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

On guard to-night, or The Soldier's dream. Song with Chorus. W. O. Fiske. 30

This is one of a series of "Songs of Home" by the same author. The words were written by one of our soldiers, who was killed in the battle of the Wilderness, and are very good.

Won't you tell me why, Robin? Song. Claribel. 30

A very pretty and plaintive song, and is commended, especially, to any young lady who is having a "miff" with her lover. Sing it. It is just the thing to bring him round!

A welcome home to thee, my boy! Song.

J. Harrison. 30

A hearty home welcome to the returned son and brother, who left, a boy, and returns, "a stately man." The chorus may be added, or not, at pleasure.

At last I've found some one to love me. Song with Chorus. C. Blamphin. 30

A pleasing ballad with a good sentiment.

Jolly old Pedagogue. Song. E. Bruce. 30

Mr. Bruce here sets to music the capital poem of the old schoolmaster, who was so fond of looking on the bright side of things, and who, a poor man, was exceeding rich in love and cheerfulness. It will do you good to sing the song.

Pompey Jones. Song and dance. F. Wilder. 30

A lively "colored" song with a merry dance at the end.

Instrumental.

Carnaval's Botschaft Waltzes. Strauss. 60

A set of brilliant waltzes, in Strauss' well-known style.

Love me dearest, (A te, O cara). Operatic tit-bit, No. 39, from I Paritani. C. Grobe. 40

Good piece for learners, and contains a favorite melody.

De quella pira. My pulse with anger. Op. tit-bit, No. 40. From Il Trovatore. C. Grobe. 40

A companion to the above. Skillfully arranged by Grobe.

Fantasia brillante. "Masked Ball." Leybach. 1.00

A most admirable and showy piano piece.

Croquet Galop. With colored title. Coots. 75

The fascinating game of Croquet deserves, surely, music in its praise; and the composer has done the best he could, and produced a very sparkling, pretty, and easy piece, which is adorned with a fine illustration of the game.

La Muscovite Mazurka. Piano and Violin. Social pastime, No. 6. Sep. Winner. 30 Light and pretty.

Books.

CHORAL CLASSICS. A collection of Cantatas and Choruses, with Solos.

"Many times, choirs and musical societies are 'hungry' for new music, and yet they do not wish to buy expensive collections to supply the want. These little books contain nothing but good music. One has Mendelssohn's 'Lauda Sion,' another Mozart's 'Ave Verum,' others, 'Hymn of Praise,' 'Hear my prayer,' 'Praise of Friendship,' 'The Lord is my Shepherd,' 'Chorus of Pilgrims,' from 'Tanhauser,' 'Armida,' 'Miriam's Song' by Schubert, 'The Morning' and 'The Calm at Sea.' Cost from 30 to 50 cts each, only, and any choir can afford that.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 623.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, FEB. 18, 1865.

VOL. XXIV. No. 24.

Laus Deo!

(From the Independent, Feb. 9)

BY JOHN G. WHITTIER.

On hearing the bells ring for the Constitutional Amendment abolishing Slavery in the United States.

It is done!

Clang of bell and roar of gun
Send the tidings up and down.
How the belfries rock and reel,
How the great guns, peal on peal,
Fling the joy from town to town!

Ring, O bells!

Every stroke exulting tells
Of the burial hour of crime.
Loud and long, that all may hear,
Ring for every listening ear
Of Eternity and Time!

Let us kneel:

God's own voice is in that peal,
And this spot is holy ground.
Lord forgive us! What are we,
That our eyes this glory see,
That our ears have heard the sound!

For the Lord

On the whirlwind is abroad;
In the earthquake He has spoken;
He has smitten with his thunder
The iron walls asunder,
And the gates of brass are broken!

Loud and long

Lift the old exalting song;
Sing with Miriam by the sea:
He hath cast the mighty down;
Horse and rider sink and drown;
He hath triumphed gloriously!

Did we dare

In our agony of prayer
Ask for more than He has done?
When was ever his right hand
Over any time or land
Stretched as now beneath the sun!

How they pale,

Ancient myth, and song, and tale,
Is this wonder of our days,
When the cruel rod of war
Blossoms white with righteous law,
And the wrath of man is praise!

Blotted out!

All within and all about
Shall a fresher life begin;
Freer breathe the universe
As it rolls its heavy curse
On the dead and buried sin!

It is done!

In the circuit of the sun
Shall the sound thereof go forth.
It shall bid the sad rejoice,
It shall give the dumb a voice,
It shall belt with joy the earth!

Ring and swing,

Bells of joy! on morning's wing
Send the song of praise abroad;
With a sound of broken chains
Tell the nation that He reigns,
Who alone is Lord and God!

Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy.

HIS PERSONAL APPEARANCE AND CHARACTER.

[Leypoldt, of Philadelphia, has in press the "Life of Mendelssohn," by LAMPADIUS, translated and edited by WILLIAM LEONARD GAGE, from which we are kindly permitted to make the following extract in advance of publication.]

*** He was a man rather under the ordinary stature and size, somewhat neglectful of his personal appearance, yet graceful in his walk and bearing. His head was covered with glossy black hair, curling in light locks; his forehead, as befitting the head which teemed with such a burden of thought and feeling, was high and arched; his features sharply cut, but noble. His eyes were unspeakably expressive: when they glowed with indignation, or looked at you with estrangement, too much to bear; but, in his general friendly mood, indescribably charming; his nose, noble, and inclined to the Roman type; his mouth, firm, fine, in his serious moods more than dignified, authoritative I might say, yet capable of the sweetest smile and the most winning expression. In this graceful, finely moulded form was hidden not only a royal spirit, but a most kindly heart. To speak out in a single word what was the most salient feature of his character, he was a Christian in the fullest sense. He knew and he loved the Bible as few do in our time: out of his familiarity with it grew his unshaken faith, and that profound spiritual-mindedness without which it would have been impossible for him to produce those deep-felt sacred compositions; and, besides this, the other principle of the genuine Christian life, love, was powerful in him. God had blessed him with a large measure of this world's goods; but he made a noble use of them. He carried the biblical injunction into effect, to "visit the widow and the fatherless in their affliction;" and he knew that to feed the hungry and to clothe the naked is a fast acceptable to the Lord. His threshold was always besieged by the needy of all sorts, but his kindness knew no bounds; and the delicacy and consideration with which he treated the recipients of his bounty largely increased the worth of his gifts, valuable as they were, even in a merely material sense. Since he died, deed upon deed has come to light, which I am not at liberty here to relate, out of courtesy to the receiver, out of consideration to the giver, which only shows how literally he fulfilled the Saviour's injunction, not to let the left hand know what the right hand doeth.

But what is to be reckoned largely to his credit is, that, with his worldly advantages, he cherished such a love of work; that he was a man of such restless activity. Many successful workers of the German Muse have been the children of poverty, and, without the stimulus of necessity, would have always been unknown: in many a man of genius, the sad experience has been repeated, that, so soon as Fortune smiled, his genius has been soothed to easy slumbers; but Mendelssohn, born in the lap of luxury, never gave himself with easy resignation to a life of contentment with worldly comforts: he only used his wealth as a means of giving his talents the more exclusively to his art; he did not compose in order to live, but he lived in order to compose. I must grant that this impulse to labor was the law of his nature. To be idle was for him to die. Sometimes, while his pupils in the Conservatorium were engaged on their tasks, he would execute charming little landscapes with his pen, which he used to gather up, and carry home. No little thing was able to disturb him when he composed. The place was indifferent. Sometimes, on his journeys, he would seat himself at a table as soon as he had reached an inn, and had established himself for a tarry, long or short, for dinner or for the night, "to write his notes," as he used to say. What he was to his wife and his children, despite this ceaseless activity, I need not try to tell. Enough to say, that he was the most devoted of husbands, the most affectionate of fathers. Whoever did not know him intimately, and perceive how careful he was to shield himself from over-excitement, and every kind of influence which should jar upon him, would hardly suspect that his heart was framed for friendship, and that he was a very approachable man. But the large number of his intimate correspondents; the openness with which he revealed himself to them; the hearty interest in their work and welfare; and especially the close bonds which bound him to his friends in Düsseldorf, London, and Leipzig; the rich store of communications which his friends still hold,—declare the very opposite. Of course, a man like him could not open his nature to every one who approached: this was sheerly impossible. He was in much the same position as Goethe, though with a far warmer and more communicative nature than he. But Mendelssohn carried to an almost morbid extent an unwillingness to allude to anything pertaining to himself. From principle, he almost never read what was written about himself; and he was very unwilling that anything, musical criticism excepted, should be published about him. The will of a living man must be law in such a matter as this: I trust that a desire to paint him worthily, now he has left us, would not offend his pure nature. Enthusiasm, such as greeted him so often, indeed so constantly, was not grateful to him: he had seen so much that was factitious, that he distrusted the real, excepting upon the fullest evidence that it was real. Discriminating praise, however, gratified him. That he was sometimes irritated, and out of tune, so to speak, as one may of a musical artist; that he was occasionally subject to a temporary ill-humor,—no one who knew him well, will deny: but so finely strung a nature must be exceedingly sensitive; and one who carried in his mind such a burden of thoughts might well be pardoned for neglecting other men's talk sometimes, and giving full vent to himself. His whole education and training had been such as to fit him for the most polished society. In large gatherings he was, for the most part, very much reserved; especially where he did not think it worth while to make much effort: but, if he did once break the silence, word followed word, each weighty and comprehensive; his enunciation became very rapid; his countenance was all aflame; and, as his knowledge compassed all departments of learning, he wandered at his will over the whole domain of science and art. In circles of his nearest friends, where he felt entirely at home, and did not fear being misunderstood, he was often merry and free to the very last extent of unrestraint. Larger circles he used often to enliven with graceful contributions of his art; and the social gatherings of the Leipzig singers remember his presence with the greatest interest. Especially his four-part songs, both in the rehearsals and when they sang them at the table, gave to all the highest pleasure. At such times, Mendelssohn was the very picture of amiability, the personification of a lovely character.

A very beautiful feature in Mendelssohn is his treatment of other artists, particularly those whose direction differed widely from his own. That he should be on the kindest terms with such men as Moscheles, Rietz, and David, whose career ran in parallel course with his own, and who were, moreover, his personal friends, is not at all to be wondered at. Yet it would not seem surprising, if, with the singleness of his devotion to his profession, and the intense earnestness with which he approached music, with the exactness—and perhaps I might say, the rigid severity—of his self-discipline, he had turned away somewhat coldly from those whose life's course did not coincide with his own. Yet this was very seldom the case. In his judgments on the efforts of artists personally unknown to him, he was very careful and considerate; yet the play of his features was an excellent barometer of his feelings. The vast numbers of virtuosos whose merit lies alone in their rapid execution, he bore with great patience. He did not refuse to acknowledge this kind of skill, while often pained to the soul at the ill-treatment which great masterpieces suffered at the hands of such interpreters. But, where soul and taste were associated with the mechanical talent, he was the first to express his satisfaction, and to speak words of approbation; and to such artists he was the kindest benefactor. Some examples may show this. In January, 1840, Franz Liszt came to Leipzig, for the first time, to give concerts. By reason of the somewhat mercantile aspect of his agent's conduct, and the prominence which the latter gave to the preliminary business arrangements, together with some unwonted changes which he made in the Music Hall, the public judgment was arrayed against Liszt, even before he made his appearance. When he seated himself at the piano, he was not only not greeted with applause, but there were actually a few hisses heard. Liszt cast a defiant glance at the audience, and struck out into his finest style, fairly compelling the disaffected to forget their prejudice for the moment, and applaud. Still for this there was an unpleasant gulf between Liszt and the Leipzig musical public. The reconciliation was but momentary. In this emergency, what did Mendelssohn do? He gave Liszt a brilliant soirée in the hall of the Gewandhaus, to which he invited half the musical world of Leipzig; and provided not only a feast of melody fit for the gods, but a substantial banquet of earthly delicacies besides. It was a party on the grandest scale; and he and his wife played the parts of host and hostess in the most graceful and winning style. Madame Mendelssohn, clad in a simple white dress, moved up and down among her guests like a fair visitant from heaven. The music on that brilliant occasion was equal to the demands of the hour; and it may be said without exaggeration, that perhaps Liszt never heard finer in his life. At his desire, there were given the then new "C-major Symphony" by Schubert, the Forty-second Psalm, and some passages from Mendelssohn's "St. Paul." At the close, Mendelssohn played Bach's triple-concerto with Liszt and Hiller. The manner with which the great Leipzig master comported himself towards the unwelcome stranger completely won over the musical public of the city; and, when Liszt gave his next concert, he was received and dismissed with the greatest applause.

The next instance of Mendelssohn's magnanimity occurred in 1843. In February of that year, Hector Berlioz came from Weimar to Leipzig. He knew that his own direction diverged fundamentally from that of Mendelssohn's, and feared that his reception by the latter would be rather cool. Chelard of Weimar encouraged him to write to Mendelssohn. Mendelssohn's answer was as follows: "Dear Berlioz, I thank you heartily for your pleasant letter, and am rejoiced that you still remember our old friendship in Rome. I shall never forget it in my life, and shall be glad to talk it over with you. Everything that I can do to make your stay in Leipzig agreeable to you, I shall make it equally my duty and my pleasure to do. I believe I can assure you that you will be happy here, and be satisfied with artists and the public." (Then follow some passages regarding the preliminary details of a concert.) "I charge you to come as soon as you can leave Weimar. I shall rejoice to give you my hand, and to bid you welcome to Germany. Do not laugh at my bad French, as you used to do at Rome, but remain my friend, as you were then; and I shall always be your own Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy."

Berlioz came to Leipzig during the rehearsals of the "Walpurgis Night," which appeared to him a masterpiece. He reminded Mendelssohn of their residence* at Rome, and their experience at the Baths of Caracalla (where Berlioz had made fun of Mendelssohn's belief in immortality, retribution after death, providence, &c.); and asked him to make him a present of his director's staff, which Mendelssohn willingly gave him, only on this condition, that Berlioz should give his in return. Although, with the repeated rehearsals of the "Walpurgis Night," Mendelssohn was completely exhausted, yet he helped Berlioz to organize his own concert, and treated him, to use his own words, like a brother.

But one of the fairest honors which one great artist ever paid another was the brilliant soirée which Mendelssohn gave in honor of Spohr's visit to Leipzig, the 15th of June, 1846. Only selections from Spohr's music were given,—the overture to "Faust," an aria from "Jessonda," the violin-concerto in E minor (played by Joachim), two songs with clarinet accompaniment, and the "Consecration of the Tones." It must have been a rare pleasure to Spohr to have seen his works brought out in the perfection of the Leipzig Conservatorium, and under Mendelssohn's direction; and, to the public, it was a great delight to see these two eminent composers side by side. At the close, Spohr went into the orchestra; and, to manifest his pleasure at the manner in which his pieces had been brought out, he directed the last two movements of his symphony with all the old fire of youth.

* One evening we were exploring together the Baths of Caracalla, debating the question of the merit or demerit of human actions, and their remuneration during this life. As I replied with some enormity, I know not what, to his entirely religious and orthodox opinions, his foot slipped, and down he rolled, with many scratches and contusions, in the ruins of a very hard staircase. "Admire the divine justice," said I, helping him to rise: "It is I who blaspheme, and it is you who fall!" This impiety, accompanied with peals of laughter, appeared to him too much, it seemed; and from that time, religious discussions were always avoided."—Berlioz's Musical Tour in Germany.

Beethoven and the Various Editions of his Works.

Beethoven's Works in the Edition Published by Breitkopf & Härtel.

BY OTTO JAHN.*

It has, for some time past, become a custom among us to publish editions of the complete works of popular authors; friends and admirers have taken steps to collect and arrange the scattered works of deceased writers, and even some living ones have themselves been induced by the favor of the public to collect their own works. Recently, complete editions have grown to be a decided matter of fashion, and long rows of the complete works of German classics, of very varied classicality, fill the book-shelves. It is no longer an unheard-of occurrence for authors, at the outset of their literary career, to think of a collective edition of their yet unwritten books, and to publish annually three or four volumes of their complete works. It is, however, satisfactory that, in this manner, the gross amount of our literature is perfectly kept up, and rendered accessible for the enjoyment of readers, and the studies of investigators; and though, in too many cases, the practicability of such collections is based more upon a love for collecting and a pleasure in perfect sets, than on any sterling interest in the literary productions themselves, we must not find fault with the fact, for in this case, as in all matters where an important result can be attained only by the participation of the masses, we may be very well satisfied when the taste and sympathy of the public are in anywise directed to what is right and good. In what each individual conceives the common aim to consist; to what an extent he takes part inwardly in the general movement; and what lasting gain he is able to derive from such efforts are questions we may confidently leave every one to decide for himself. As a rule, however, people in Germany are far from entertaining the opinion that the public are bound to prove their interest in literature not alone by reading, but also by purchasing; that they are under certain obligations to the author with whose productions they would not like to dispense; that they only discharge those obligations by rendering him materially free and independent to pursue his labors in art; and that, by so doing, they also are working, according to a natural law, in the cause of literature, the prosperity of which is acknowledged by every one as the ornament and pride of the nation. While in England and France a man who is in easy circumstances, and makes any pretension to education, regards himself as bound in honor by that very pretension to set aside a reasonable sum in his household expenditure for literature and art, in the corresponding classes of society among ourselves, to buy books is still regarded as a most superfluous piece of luxury. The majority of the purchasing public is, consequently, composed of those who cannot well do without books as the implements of their profession, and such persons form neither the largest nor the most affluent section of the reading public.

* Translated, (for the London Musical World) by J. V. Bridgeman, from the original in Die Grenzboten.

The position of the public with respect to the music-publishing trade is essentially different to its position towards the bookselling trade. Music is purchased beyond comparison most extensively by those who themselves play and sing, and consists, therefore, only of such as comes within the sphere of their powers of execution and of their taste. Thus the regular market depends upon the majority of half-educated amateurs, whose taste is influenced in the course it takes principally by the music master, or the performances of virtuosi. The wants of Vocal Associations and Concert-giving Societies are of a different kind. Very limited, on the other hand, is the number of thoroughly educated musicians, who purchase music with independent judgment and serious interest, in order, for pleasure or for instruction, to gain a comprehensive view or a connected knowledge of their art, either in certain special branches or on a more extended scale. Professional musicians have not always the education or the wish, and frequently not the leisure, for pursuing studies of this description. In most instances, the necessary means are wanting. Even at the present day, it is but seldom that music is made the object of really scientific, and more especially historical research, demanding a comprehensive apparatus, and consequently there is an almost total want of great collections, commenced and continued on a definite plan. With the exception of the great libraries of Berlin, Munich, and Vienna, there is, probably, scarcely a library in Germany that recognizes and fosters music as a subject entitled to a separate department of its own; even the Conservatoires and similar institutions appear not yet to have experienced the necessity of musical collections calculated for something more than the mere passing requirements of the moment. The system of supporting public libraries, a system of such moment in the case of literary enterprises of more than ordinary extent, is so seldom available for the music-trade that it can scarcely be regarded as an element to be taken into consideration. The music-trade is, therefore, immeasurably more dependent than the book-trade upon the wants of the day and all its caprices; and this affinity with the fashions explains many a peculiar phenomenon, such, for instance, as the decoration of the title-pages, to which we may generally apply the words of that modest critic who said: "It may not be in good taste, but still it is an ornament;" the custom, so unfavorable to historical research, and even to mere curiosity, of omitting the year of publication; and much more of a similar description, giving a volume of music the look of a book of fashions. Though certainly arising in the first place from the fact that, on account of its having to be engraved, music costs more to print, in proportion to the average sale, than books cost, the high price of music is connected with the above considerations. It results from the constitution of the public that large editions constitute rare exceptions in the music-trade, and that those works that do not go off at all or in only small numbers bears a larger proportion to those which find a sale than is the case in the book-trade. A popular work has, therefore, to make up for the losses occasioned by a number of works which have not proved successful, and it need not be remarked that works which are good in a business sense are not always so in an artistic one. A piratical publisher can, for this reason, easily sell at low prices, as he pays the author nothing, and prints only what his experience tells him has a large sale without his being obliged to purchase that experience by ventures which do not cover the expense of production. The high price is connected, likewise, with the exorbitantly heavy discount usually allowed to the retail houses; but it also results, at least partially, from the peculiar position occupied by the public of musical amateurs. As an almost general rule, the music-masters undertake to be the agents between the music-publishers and the purchasing public; the allowance which they claim has gradually become, in their eyes, a well-earned right, or, at least, an item of revenue they cannot conveniently spare, and which they possess sufficient influence to maintain. With such deductions, we can very well understand that the shop-price must be fixed very high.

Though we may assume that what is printed in the way of books rightly represents, on the whole, the state of scientific and artistic production in literature, we cannot assert this, to anything like the same extent, of music. Until the last third of the eighteenth century, in Germany as in Italy, an overwhelming majority of compositions were circulated only in manuscript copies, that is, in every respect, in a highly unsatisfactory manner. It certainly sometimes happened that, in order to ensure greater publicity for them, composers etched their own works, as, for instance, we know that Bach and Telemann did. At that epoch, therefore, mere casual circumstances exercised the greatest possible influence in determining which compositions should become extensively known, and which be hoarded up for, and rendered accessible only to a subsequent generation. Thus the most uncertain standard for forming a just appreciation of any master is that furnished by his printed compositions; we have no right to assume either that the works of the best masters, or the best works of such masters were made public by means of the printing-press. A striking instance of this is furnished by Johann Sebastian Bach, of whom only very little was published during his lifetime. Even that little included not his great masterpieces, but merely the instrumental compositions, for which, at any rate, a considerably extensive public of pianists and organ-players was to be expected. It was not till after the revival of the Matthäuspassion, by Zelter and Mendelssohn, that Bach's vocal compositions began to be snatched from oblivion; and for years and years to come the Bach Society may go on publishing unprinted works, not one of which is without its peculiar significance. Of such a master as Hasse, who for more than a generation reigned supreme on the stage of Germany and Italy, only detached compositions have been made known by means of the press—in short, it is an exception when the labors of a celebrated composer are to be estimated by his printed works. In London, on the contrary, most of Handel's grand compositions were immediately printed, and in Paris it was even the rule for operas to be engraved on being performed, a fact to be explained by the grand scale on which things are done in both those cities. The system, it is true, has, since then, been completely changed, and, at the present time, it is more especially the music-publishers of Germany who keep in view the high mission of permanently preserving great works of lasting value. But though, now-a-days, nearly all the works of any importance written by the principal masters, masters who exercise a determining influence, are printed, and thus preserved for the enjoyment and study of future generations, such works constitute only an extremely small portion of the mass of music brought into the market. Nor does this music, in the majority of instances, at all represent those superior, sterling composers, men with high and noble aspirations, who only under especially favorable circumstances succeed in seeing printed what they have created in true devotion to art; it represents only the caprice that changes with the hour, and the defective education of amateurs, who will never be at a loss for complaisant pens. Hence we may assert that, on the whole, the labors of the composers of our time, even though the history of art may never or only imperfectly become acquainted with them, are more serious and more important than the mass of printed works would lead us to expect—a fact which cannot, in any way, be declared of literature.

(To be Continued.)

Beethoven's Biographers.

The following is the Preface to HERR LUDWIG NOHL's new life of Beethoven, of which the first volume, Beethoven's Jugend (youth), 1770-92—has recently appeared in Vienna. The translation, which we find in the London Musical World, is there offered as "quasi-literal."

The following Biography of Beethoven is founded entirely upon my own researches. On this occasion, I had not, as I had with my Mozart, merely to fashion matter already collected from the best authorities by a celebrated scholar, and to present to the gaze of every one the image of a great man in art in all his grandeur and with the charm of life; in doing which, I may observe parenthetically, I have to regret that the execution of my work, in other respects my own, bears trace of the materials in question and of their scientific treatment. My present task, on the contrary, was principally one of historical investigation: partly to verify, by documentary evidence, existing materials, and partly to discover fresh.

That this leading duty of a historian, namely the collection and sifting of materials, has either never been performed at all, or not performed in a satisfactory manner by any of Beethoven's biographers up to the present day; and that none of the existing works are really biographies of him, are facts on which people have long been agreed. It was this state of things which called forth the following attempt to write a life of the master founded upon unimpeachable authorities and at the same time completely exhaustive. The first part, together with the authorities I have consulted, is now submitted to the impartial judgment of my professional colleagues, and, more especially, to the friendly consideration of the general public, for whom, in particular, the text at least of the book is intended.

In this place, I need speak only briefly of preceding Biographies, for Beethoven's youth is altogether neglected in them. As a general rule, one author has simply followed the other, without original criticism or further investigation.

First comes the work, in two volumes, of one of our leading musical scholars: "Ludwig van Beethoven, Leben und Schaffen, von A. B. Marx. Berlin, O. Janke, 1859." For this, I refer the reader to the criticism of the American, Alexander Thayer, in Vienna, who for years past has been devoting himself to the most careful study of Beethoven's life, and, in Dwight's Journal of Music, Boston, 1860, No. 420, has conclusively settled, with as much outspoken frankness as learning, the value of the biographical portion of the book. Unfortunately, too, I must remark that in the second edition, published last year, the worthy author did not consider it necessary, after having suppressed a few small errors, to proceed himself to the investigation of his materials. It seems as though he intended the biographical element merely to illustrate subordinately the master's creations. That this, namely the æsthetic-critical consideration of Beethoven's works, constitutes the chief value of the book I showed, a short time since, in a notice in the periodical called Orion, Hamburg, Hoffmann and Co., vol. II., p. 1, et seq., though I shall not be able properly to estimate his analysis till I come to those parts of my own work where I treat of these things.

The five-volume work of the Livonian, Wilhelm von Lenz, Russian Councillor of State, "Beethoven, eine Kunststudie, 1855-60," which, in its first part, appears to have served as the basis of Dr. Marx's book, while it is itself, without any particular criticism of its own, taken from the writings of Wegeler and Ries, Schindler and Seyfried, contains only in the last three volumes—"Kritischer Katalog sämtlicher Werke"—new historical matter, a portion of which was extracted by indefatigable questioning from the chronicler Schindler, and a portion, certainly not without great industry and trouble, collected from other sources; but, apart from the fact that it is a work of only small importance, to the disgust of so many admirers of Beethoven in quest of information, it labors under a truly chronic untrustworthiness. It cannot, however, be denied, that the German Russian, with his education of a thorough man of the world, and likewise the clever but eccentric Oulibicheff, have succeeded in obtaining many a glance into the universal nature of the master, and that, despite all monstrosities of style as of matter, there lurk in the book the elements of highly varied interest. As, however, almost nothing at all is to be found in it relating to Beethoven's youth, we must defer until later passing a final opinion on it.

Possessing a value of their own and constituting a genuine authority for Beethoven's youth, and, consequently a basis for all future works, are the Biographische Notizen, by Dr. Wegeler and Ferdinand Ries, which were published, in 1838, at Coblenz. The value of the information they contain will be self-evident in the course of our Biography. Whatever Wegeler says is, with the exception of some few pardonable errors, perfectly and historically true. But it is, as a rule, with Ries's anecdotes as with those of the Chevalier Ignaz von Seyfried, which are contained in the appendix to a work of his, Beethovens Studien, published in 1832, and which were, a short time since, proved, by a practised hand, to be utterly worthless. Both these writers narrate, it is true, from their own experience, but they are at the same time giving us their reminiscences of a period since which nearly a generation has passed, and over which, moreover, a gloom appears only too often cast by personal feeling.

Much valuable information concerning Beethoven's youth is contained, also, in the memoranda which, under the name of the Fischhof'sche Handschrift are preserved in the Berlin Library. These memoranda were drawn up for the purpose of a biography, which, immediately after Beethoven's death, was undertaken by a society consisting of friends of his, but which a multitude of obstacles caused to miscarry. They are founded upon communications of Beethoven and persons who enjoyed his intimate friendship, and we shall find the facts they contain confirmed elsewhere as perfectly correct.

Finally, the best work in a historical sense which exists concerning Beethoven, a work with which every one is tolerably acquainted, Anton Schindler's Biographie von Ludwig van Beethoven, which, as far back as 1860, reached its third, or, more properly speaking, second edition, is of the greatest possible value as an authority, but, as far as the master's youth is concerned, gives us very little more than Wegeler's Notizen. In the summer of last year I once again met this most meritorious historiographer of Beethoven. I had been previously well acquainted with him. Whoever could have beheld the sincere friendliness with which the strange old gentleman, with his mummified exterior, received me in his house, and how he treated me, though I intended to graze in the kitchen garden he had so carefully cultivated—whoever could have beheld the unwearied attention with which, for days together, he went through, corrected, and completed, piece by piece, the materials I had gathered—the disinterested readiness with which he read or showed me a great deal in Beethoven's papers, and the tears, eloquent proofs of emotion, which the lively recollection of his deceased great friend and of better days called forth in the old and lonely man, over whose head those days had long since passed—whoever, finally, could have heard the animated and encouraging greeting with which he took leave of me, the young biographer, who was preparing for my task not without deep anxiety, and how he loudly bade me be of good courage—whoever had experienced all this as I did, would also, as I do, willingly forget all the rudeness and all the wrong of which the somewhat obstinate and imperious old gentleman, who had accustomed himself to regard the knowledge of Beethoven's life and deeds as his own domain, may have been guilty, though mostly when irritated into such a course, against so many. Nay, such a person would not fail to pay a certain degree of respect to the fidelity with which the only one of Beethoven's friends who was not to be scared away constituted himself, after Beethoven's death, his invariably devoted servant, willingly accepting all kinds of neglect and many a slight in order to continue serving his great lord and master. It is such rare fidelity as this which also deserves a crown!

At present he is dead, this true squire of the Master's! He died too soon, far too soon, for me, and for everyone who cares aught for accurate knowledge of Beethoven. With him there sank into the grave a rich store of reminiscences, of which neither he himself knew how to profit fully nor any one else to secure. His work, however—though the want of plastic power and high mental cultivation on the part of the author prevents it from possessing the value of an actual picture of Beethoven's life—will, especially in the later portions of our biography, prove not merely a perfect mine of wealth in the shape of knowledge of Beethoven's actions, but will be, also, for every future biographer a kind of standard of rectification for Beethoven's character, of the real nature of which, though he was only able to unfold it piecemeal in his work, Schindler appears to have possessed an incomparably deeper presentiment than any of his successors.

Of the way in which I myself have understood my task, how I have conceived Beethoven, and how I have divided his career, it is not for me to speak here. It must be explained by the book itself, especially as the reasons influencing me are given either in the body of the work or in the remarks. In placing the great Master of Music in the centre of the history of his own times, and not simply in the centre of art, I am only continuing the attempts of all my predecessors, each of whom felt, more or less, that the intellectual efforts of the age were united in this artist's individuality, and that the social and political life especially of that grand period found so strong an echo in Beethoven that he must be regarded as one of the principal supporters of the most productive ideas of the present century. Therefore do I hope that both the body of my book and the appendix to it, will not be considered as an important authority for the history of music alone.

If I can by any means succeed in mastering the extraordinarily extensive mass of literature connected with the subject, I think I shall be able to complete the following volume, "Beethovens Mannesalter, 1793 bis 1814," also during the current year. This will be followed first by "Beethovens letzte Jahre, 1815-27," and, finally by "Beethovens Werke."

It still remains for me to express my warmest thanks to all those gentlemen who have assisted me in my labors. If, instead of naming them all, I mention here merely Dr. Hanalick; Dr. von Sonnleithner; Dr. Standhartner; Dr. Weilen; Dr. C. von Wurzhach, with his very valuable Beethoven Collection; Herren Fr. Espagne in Berlin; H. M. Schletterer in Augsburg; and J. J. Maier of this town, I must, at the same time, confess that, without the assistance of the many remaining, I should scarcely have collected such a rich store of materials, as that with which I trust, in the following volumes of my work, to delight all the friends of our Master. Should I, however, have, moreover, succeeded in imparting to my narrative something both of that high earnestness and of that heart-rejoicing humor which, on the one hand, caused Beethoven himself to be an object of such deep reverence, and, on the other, so often enabled those around him to overlook the instances of unevenness in his behavior—if, in other words, this first part of Beethoven's life should give a clear idea of that peculiar greatness which elevates this artist, in his character as well as in his creations, above his contemporaries, and places him side by side with the greatest men of any age, the object of my labors will be attained, and many an hour of severe exertion amply rewarded.

L. NOHL.

Munich, the 10th March, 1864.

Fine Arts.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Harriet Hosmer's Zenobia.

Zenobia, the royal Palmyrene, dethroned, deserted by her followers, enchained, and forced thus ignominiously to walk in the train of her conqueror;—mute, dejected, heart-broken, surely!

But when we enter that presence we are undeceived; for in the marble before us seem embodied all of lofty sadness, noble endurance and calm despair, the dark voices of which find utterance in the Polonaises of Chopin, and we instinctively pay our homage to royalty, for Zenobia stands revealed to us,—a queen.

The figure is erect, but there is nothing of defiance; the head is bowed, but there is nothing of concession;—simply majesty.

If, at some future day, she does succumb to Aurelian, it is plainly no part of her purpose now; the mouth perpetual abiding place of all expression, tells us that. The lips, quiet and firm, seem to hold in check all of pride and indignation that lives and burns within, as though even this were something too sacred to meet the eyes of her captor. There is little here to gratify the vanity of Aurelian. He cannot meet that look of calm disdain, which says so plainly:

—“This hast thou done; be glad! now, seek The strength to use which thou hast spent in getting!”

without feeling that, in truth, she is as much above all need of him as when she sat, enthroned, with a nation at her command.

Miss Hosmer leaves much for us to divine in her statue. She has not endeavored to reproduce, in the face of her heroine, those delicate feminine traits and emotions which she feels, as only a woman can feel, and which the artist understands, as only a woman can understand, for these lose much of their intensity in the effort to find expression; but she has suggested them all by one master-stroke of art,—the drooping appeal of the right arm, which addresses itself directly to the heart of the beholder. Here alone does the Queen betray any hint of that weakness which is her glory, inasmuch as without it would be no strength. The face is a riddle, like that of the Sphinx, and the right arm its solution.

Hope is lost,—the scourge is inexorable; she is crowned with sorrow, but she wears it regally as should a queen.

In the contemplation of this admirable conception are conveyed many impressions which cannot be analyzed or traced to any distinct cause to attempt; this, is to destroy them; therefore we did not purpose to criticize, and we have already rendered our modicum of praise.

A. A. C.

Music Abroad.

Leipzig.

The Orchestra's correspondent writes, under date of Jan. 6th.

On New Year's Day Music holds her court in Leipzig, and readmits the guests who desire to pay her homage. Whatever day in the week it may be, the first of the second half of the Gewandhaus concerts is held then. As is fitting upon so solemn an anniversary, the music is mostly of a serious character. This year the concert opened with Mendelssohn's impressive eight-part Motet (a capella), "Mitten wir im Leben sind mit dem Tod umfungen." I have previously had occasion to speak of this beautiful motet; the composer seems to have been deeply imbued with the simple solemnity of Luther's words. Although the intonation of all the singers was not quite perfect, the effect of the motet, sung by a larger body of voices than I had yet heard it, was most touching. Dr. Hauptmann's "Kirchenstücke" for chorus and orchestra—anthems we should call them in England—are of a different character, and have a more modern coloring. That they are models of form and harmonical treatment is implied by the fact of Dr. Hauptmann having written them; the greatest living authority on the theory of music could not be otherwise than correct. But besides this formal merit, each of these anthems has a distinct feeling of its own. In the first, "Und Gottes Will' ist dennoch gut," it seems as if it were intended to represent the almost passionate assertion of trust in the goodness of the Divine Love, even while suffering involuntary stirs up the doubts, which faith forces to be still. The second, "Nicht so ganz wirst meiner Du vergessen," is more calm; the beautiful grace and flow of the melody tell of a soul in which faith has mastered all doubts, and which firmly believes that though "heaviness may endure for a night, joy cometh in the morning." These anthems are frequently sung in the Thomas Church, and may be strongly recommended to any choral societies possessing a good orchestra; for English church use I do not think they would be entirely suitable, as it would be difficult to arrange the accompaniment effectively for the organ.

The instrumental solo pieces are precious "nuggets" just brought to light. The first is a Concerto for the Violin (D major) by Mozart, written at Salzburg, in October, 1775, when he was in his twentieth year. The work, which is still but in manuscript, is in the possession of Herr André. How any thing so pleasing could so long have been kept in the dark is hardly conceivable. It had, I believe been shown at various times to several violinists; they must have glanced at it very superficially not to have appreciated its many beauties. I will not say that it is a great work, but it has the genuine Mozart grace of beauty and sound; the andante has a tone of sweet melancholy which is very charming—it is a genuine love-song. The accompanying orchestra consists of the string quartet, horns and oboes. Neither the clarinet (for which Mozart had afterwards so great an affection) nor the bassoons are employed. Herr David, who performed the concerto, has enriched it with some excellent cadenzas, which, while giving it brilliancy, do not disharmonize with its style; but it may, perhaps, be questioned whether the pieces of "passage-work" in the cadenza inserted in the slow movement are quite in the character that Mozart would have sanctioned. The other solo was exhumed from the rich stores of Bach's forgotten or unknown works. It is the Prelude, Sarabande, and Gavotte from Bach's fifth suite for the violoncello, which Herr David transposed and arranged for the violin, and has added a supporting accompaniment for the pianoforte. If I am not mistaken, this suite is the one in which Bach directs the highest string of the violoncello to be tuned a note lower than the usual pitch: it is difficult to imagine what could have been his motive for doing this; to the performer the difficulty of execution must have been greatly increased. The three movements are beautiful specimens of Bach's best style. I hope that the publication of this and the other companion pieces upon which Herr David is still at work will make these compositions accessible to those who like to play and listen to the highest style of violin music. But whoever takes them up must not approach them as mere mechanical studies—they are true musical poems.

The orchestral works were Cherubini's "Solemn March," written for the funeral of Charles X., a simple but impressive composition, and Beethoven's symphony in C minor.

In the fourth Gewandhaus Chamber Music Concert, a new work (MS.) by Gade was performed—a Sextet (for two violins, two violas, two violoncellos). It would be unjust to the composer to form a final opinion from a single hearing of a work on such a scale, and the score of which is not published. The second movement (Scherzo) seemed to please the most; it is really very clever and worked out with much spirit. The first and third movements are graceful and pleasing, even although they may be somewhat monotonous. The subject of the fourth movement is hardly marked enough; the extreme rapidity with which it was taken made it almost unintelligible. The other numbers were Beethoven's Sonata for pianoforte and violoncello, excellently played by the Herren Kapellmeister Reinecke and Lübeck; and Mendelssohn's Octet, the marvellous Scherzo of which produced its never-failing effect.

Very generous gifts have already been made by the Mendelssohn family from the proceeds of the sale of the Mendelssohn Letters. The Stadt Rath of Leipzig have just made known another noble present. The Herren Paul and Dr. Karl Mendelssohn have entrusted the Stadt Rath with a further sum of 1500 thalers from the same source; the interest of this sum is to be given yearly on the 3rd February, Mendelssohn's birthday, to a pupil of the Leipzig Conservatorium.

Some quarter of a century ago, much interest was excited in the musical circles of Leipzig by a young Englishman, who passed a winter there for the sake of enjoying Mendelssohn's instruction, and of profiting by the rich stores of music there to be heard. We have but to turn to the various articles which Schumann wrote about that time to see how high was the opinion of the "young Englishman's" talents; and we may also discover how cordial a spirit then prevailed in Leipzig, how delighted the leading musicians were to discover promise of high endowments, and with what warm encouragement the young men were met by those who had already advanced further on their way. Would that this same cordiality, this readiness not only to acknowledge, but to seek for, talent from names as yet unknown, were still to be found amongst the critics and the concert audiences of Leipzig! In the twelfth Gewandhaus concert, the warmth of his reception told Prof. Sterndale Bennett, the "young Englishman" of the time to which I have referred, that he had not been forgotten by his old friends. He had brought with him the Allegro, Menuetto and Rondo finale (a series which I hope will soon, by the addition of a slow movement, become a complete symphony), which was first brought out in London last summer at a Philharmonic concert. Knowing how exhausting is the life of a London music-teacher, especially of one so much sought after as Prof. Bennett, there were some who feared that the delicate fancy, which in the beginning of his career had given to the world pieces so charming as the Wood Nymph and Naiades overtures, the F minor pianoforte concerto, the three "Water Sketches," &c., &c., might have begun to dry up. It was a great pleasure to find that these fears were groundless. The Allegro and Menuetto are so fresh and graceful that they may be ranked among the best Prof. Bennett has written; in the Rondo the interest rather falls off.

The simple, natural beauty of the music, the clearness of its construction, and the excellent taste with which it was instrumented, were at once appreciated by the audience, who expressed their pleasure by loud applause, and by a recall of the composer.

The pianist in this concert was Dr. (!) Satter. His performance of Beethoven's concerto in G showed that although he is essentially a solo pianist of the most modern and brilliant school, he can give a respectful interpretation of the works of the great masters; there was no attempt to substitute brilliancy of finger for chastened taste.

The name of the singer, as announced upon the programme, was Canzoni Gastold; report says that a very short time ago the lady was known by a more familiar German name: her voice is a contralto of some compass, and of a pleasant quality; her style, though not so purely Italian as her name, is good, and her execution sufficient for the pieces she selected—an Aria from Handel's "Semele," and Schubert's "Wanderer." Judging from her performance on this occasion, she may be considered a singer of good promise.

The other orchestral pieces were Cherubini's overture to the "Wasserträger" (better known by its French title "Les deux Journées"), and Beethoven's great (No. 3) "Leonore" overture.

The sixth Euterpe concert brought out two pieces hitherto unheard here. The first was the Andante from Schubert's "Tragic Symphony." As the whole work has not yet been printed, it is impossible to say how far it bears out the title its composer has given it. The fragment performed this evening has not that depth of feeling which would be expected in tragic music; judging it apart from its title, the Andante is a graceful piece of music, but will hardly bear comparison with its composer's greater works. The other novelty was an overture to "Prometheus," by Woldegar Bargiel. In almost all the works of this composer which I have yet heard there is a strong tendency to gloom, and, as the Germans call it, Weltschmerz; what light there is, is lurid rather than healthy sunshine. But still there is no doubt that Herr Bargiel has at times moments of inspiration which show him to possess real poetic fire. There are some fine passages in the overture, but I would prefer to express no positive opinion till I have heard it again; the performance was too unsatisfactory to make it possible to judge fairly; the wind instruments, which have a very important part in the score, were unusually out of tune. The other orchestral pieces were Bach's vigorous concerto for three violins, three violas, three violoncellos and contrabass, and Beethoven's Symphony in A. The Concerto, which has nothing for the wind instruments to do, was the most satisfactorily performed of the two; it is a wonderful example of the manly strength and joyous humor of the old cantor.

At the usual Friday evening soirée of the pupils of the Conservatorium last week Professor Bennett was present by invitation of the directors. All the music, with the exception of a quartet by Beethoven, was selected from the Professor's compositions. It included the Capriccio in E (Op. 22), "Suite de Pièces" (Op. 25), Sextet in F sharp minor, first and last movements (Op. 6), and the Pianoforte Concerto in F minor, first and second movements. The Professor expressed himself as much pleased with the way in which the various pieces were performed.

PARIS.

MUSICAL DOINGS IN 1864.—The most important event of the year is undoubtedly the Imperial Decree, dated Jan. 6th, 1864, authorizing the "Liberté des Théâtres." This decree came into force on the 1st of July. Until that time the repertoire of each theatre was restricted to a certain class of piece (Tragedy in one, Drama in another, Opera in a third, &c.), to which the manager was bound to adhere. But since the above date, and as the regulation now stands, there is nothing to prevent the Théâtre Français from playing "Athalie" and the "Wandering Minstrel" with a hornpipe between the acts, or the opera playing "George Barnwell" and "Roland," on the same night. What the result of this measure will be remains to be seen. At all events it will do no harm, and will still the fearful complaints of many would-be managers, who were sure of making their fortunes were they allowed to do as they pleased. They have now a chance of displaying those talents which up to the present seem to have been "born to blush unseen;" and as soon as they make up their minds to do something worthy of applause we are ready to burst our white kids as a token of gratitude and appropriation. By the same decree, a change has been made in the manner of awarding the musical Grand Prix de Rome, which until this last year was decided by the entire Académie des Beaux Arts; (Institut), the works by the competitors for the prize being judged in the first Section de Musique, and afterwards confirmed by the whole body of Academicians. At the present time three out of the six gentlemen forming the Section mentioned are professors at the Conservatoire; and it has rightly been deemed improper that they should judge the works of their own disciples. The prize (which gives five years residence in Rome, with a liberal pension to its lucky holder) is now awarded by a jury of nine, chosen by lot out of a list of some thirty of the most distinguished musicians. This arrangement has brought another change. The successful cantata is no longer performed at the Institut, but is honored by a really "public" performance at the opera. Another excellent measure is the obligation imposed on the manager of the Théâtre Lyrique (as an acknowledgment of his subvention), to mount every year an opera in three acts, by one of the Roman pensionnaires, who has not already had a work performed in Paris. This is a great boon to those gentlemen, who after five years' residence in the "Eternal City," find themselves on their return to Paris lost amid the crowd of "jeunes compositeurs," whose name is legion, and who pass their time in sadly wandering through the streets in search of that rara avis, a libretto. Now they have a chance of being successful at the concours, which awaits them on their return to France; and the thought of that will doubtless incite them to harder work than what they generally indulge in Italy, and which, according to tradition, consists in buying a ream of scoring paper, smoking cigarettes, and doing the dolce far niente worse than a lazzarone. The Emperor of the French and the Ministre (Le Maréchal Vaillant), whom these affairs regard, have both of them the reputation of being confirmed anti-musicians. This may be the case; but certainly the three new measures adopted, and the reception of the author of "Roland" (M. Mermet) as a guest at the Compiègne, prove that if the head of the Government does not care for music himself, he certainly shows great consideration for those who do. The theatres, particularly the opera, have done good business during the year. The revival of "Moïse" took place a few days before the 1st January, and was very successful. This was followed by a ballet in three acts, "La Maschera," in which Mlle. Boschetti made her début. Shortly after, "Le Docteur Magnus," an opera in one act, by M. Duprato, was given; but the great production was "Roland à Roncevaux," which, as far as the treasury is concerned, has been more successful than any work produced for the last thirty years. "Nemee," a ballet in two acts, was also played with moderate success. The Cahier des Charges of the Opera contains an article setting forth that two operas and two ballets, one of each grand, and the other petit, are to be given every year; and M. Perrin, the present manager, is the first for many years who has carried out these conditions to the letter. Two Chanteuses légères, Mlle. Camille De Maesen and Madame Pascal, and a basse noble, M. David, made their débuts successfully, and now form part of the troupe; and among the first appearances in the ballet we have Mlles. Roschette (a demi-succès), Salvoni, and Laure-Fonta.

The Opéra Comique began the year with "La Fiancée du Roi de Garbe," libretto by the late M. Scribe and M. D. St. Georges, music by M. Auber. This was not the "dessus du panier" of M. Scribe's poems, and although the music showed that M. Auber had lost none of the qualities which distinguish his early productions, the work had a "succès d'estime" and no more. "Lara" by MM. Cormon and Haillart, and a revival of Halévy's "Eclair" came next, and the theatre was closed for repairs. Since the re-opening in September "Les Absents," "Le Trésor de Pierrot," and "Le Capitaine Henriot" have been produced, and noticed in your columns, so recently that I need mention them "que pour mémoire."

The Théâtre Italien has presented no novelty, but has revived two operas, "Roberto Devereux," and "Linda di Chamounix," the first a failure, the second, thanks to Mlle Patti, a success. An attempt made to introduce a ballet was a decided failure, and M. Bagier has done well to give it up. The only new comer was M. Brignoli, who made a very favourable impression. Madame de la Grange, MM. Delle Sedie and Scalse, Madame de Méric-Lablache, and Mlle. Patti, are still with us; and with the exception of the opening night, an unfortunate attempt at "Norma" which was brought to a close at the end of the first act pour cause d'indisposition, generally the performances have been good. Mlle. Patti, being of course, the "bright particular star."

Théâtre Lyrique also has been doing a good business, "Rigoletti," "Don Pasquale," "Violetta" (with Mlle. Nillaen), and "Faust," have drawn good houses. The success of "Mireille" was very doubtful on its first appearance; but in its new form it was revived a few weeks ago, and answers well. Works of a lighter class have not been neglected; and "L'Alcade," "Béguements d'amour," and "Le Cousin Babilas," &c., have been well received.

M. Offenbach has turned Secessionist, and has left the Théâtre des Bouffes Parisiens to its fate, which appears to be a lively one, for the "Serpent à plumes," music M. Léo Delibes, and the stock pieces of the repertoire are very successful under the new management.

WEIMER.—From January 1st, 1864, to January 1st 1865, the following operas were performed at the Grand-Ducal Theatre: Le Maçon and Fra Diavolo, Auber; Béatrice et Bénédict, Berlioz; Fidelio (twice), Beethoven; La Dame Blanche (twice), Boieldieu; Les deux Journées (twice), Cherubini; La Fille du Régiment (twice), Donizetti; Martha and Stradella (twice), Flotow; Faust, Gounod; La Juive, Halévy; Zampa, Hérol; Die Katakomben, Ferdinand Hiller; Des Sängers Fluch (twice), Langert; Czar und Zimmerman, Lortzing; Robert le Diable (three times), Le Prophète, and Les Huguenots, Meyerbeer; Le Nozze di Figaro, and Don Juan, Mozart; Orpheus in der Unterwelt (twice), Offenbach; Die Statue (three times); Reyer; Il Barbiere and Guillaume Tell (twice), Rossini; Il Trovatore (twice), and Hernani, Verdi; Tannhäuser (twice), Rienzi, Der Fliegende Holländer (three times), and Lohengrin (twice), Wagner; and Der Freischütz, Carl M. von Weber. In addition to these performances, there were five concerts, at which the following works were executed: Harold en Italie, symphony by Hector Berlioz; Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, Symphony in C minor, and Symphony in A major; and Columbus, a musical Sea-picture, by J. J. Abert. The operatic novelties were Ferdinand Hiller's Katakomben; Reyer's Statue; and Langert's Sänger's Fluch.

MUSICAL ITALY.—The notion that musical taste in Italy is at the lowest ebb, and that people no longer worship any composer but Verdi, is altogether an erroneous one. It may, on the contrary, be asserted that classical music, including the music of the new German romantic school, was never before cultivated with such ardor, and in so comprehensive a manner. Milan and Florence (the new capital) are especially distinguishing themselves, and the programmes of their serious concerts contain hardly any other names than those of the great German masters, Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven, Weber, Mendelssohn, and Schubert, and those of their worthy Epigoni. Even Schumann is becoming naturalized in Italy, his compositions having already been performed with great success at concerts of chamber music. This was the case at a Quartet Soirée in Milan, when the Quartet, Op. 47, commenced the evening. Bazzini, who is at the head of this Quartet Society, took the violin, and Luca Fumigalli, the pianoforte part. The Quartet was received with genuine enthusiasm, especially the Scherzo. It was followed by Mozart's Quintet in D minor: Three Pieces in form of a Sonata, Op. 44, by Bazzini; Chopin's Notturmo, Op. 15; Scherzo, Op. 16, by Mendelssohn; and, to conclude, Op. 59, No. 3, by Beethoven. At the last Soirée but one of the Società del Quartetto, at Florence, the pieces selected for performance were Beethoven's Quartet, Op. 47 (1); Mozart's Quintet, with clarinet; Spohr's Double Quartet, Op. 87; and the first movement of Mendelssohn's Octet. The first violin was taken in turns by Papini and Sasso. At the following concert, on the 3d inst., only works by Mendelssohn, Hummel, and Georgetti were performed. At the concert of the Royal Musical Institute of Florence only two works were played, but they were works of the first class; Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, and Mendelssohn's "Walpurgisnacht." This, by the way, was the first time the latter work had ever been performed in Italy. The band and chorus rivaled the soloists in excellence. The above programmes, to which many more might be added, are sufficient to show the progress the taste for classical music is making in Italy.—German paper.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, FEB. 18, 1865.

Dr. Cutlers's Choral Festival.

Vast throngs of people paid their dollar and were happy to secure a decent seat in the Music Hall on Tuesday evening, Feb. 7. They went with very various expectations, for the entertainment (concert, service, what you please) presented very various faces. The great majority were church people, of the English Episcopal faith, who went anticipating a model, an authoritative perfect specimen, from famous, fashionable Trinity, New York, of their own, the only true Cathedral musical service. These were reinforced by hundreds of all classes interested in the general problem of church music, and who came with more or less confidence of witnessing a beautiful solution. Others (few comparatively) were caught by the historical aspect of the thing; they were to have the whole history of sacred music spread before them by brief lecture and examples. Some were drawn by the personal bait of this and that highly reported singer, this and that organist, Mr. Morgan on the organ, Mr. Paine in the old Bach vein, &c. Some by the great agglomeration of materials:—the united choirs of Trinity, New York, with all its twenty or more boys, its tenors and its basses, the Advent Choir of Boston (boys), with a chorus culled from the Handel and Haydn Society, the Great Organ, four organists, historical lecture crumbs scattered along at intervals, and all under the direction of the new-made "Mus. Doc.," whose exemplary administration of the musical service at Trinity is understood to have earned him this honor at the hands of a New York University. (Who shall doubt the musical authority of such a jury of experts as the faculty of an American College!) But the bright particular attraction was the singing of the Boys, particularly Masters Coker, Ehrlich, and the rest, of Trinity. This was the real magnet, without which the others would have been feebly operative.

The singing of the boys was indeed extremely interesting; all found it so. The "Choral Festival," as a whole, was extremely long, heterogeneous and tedious; all felt it so, however bound in courtesy to be delighted. That great audience will hardly be drawn together a second time.

The fault lay here: the Festival purported to have an idea to illustrate; yet unity of idea, of plan, of purpose, is precisely what was wanting. There was really no central and controlling mind or thought in the whole business. It was not historical; it was not cathedral, nor ecclesiastical in any sense; it was not catholic, either in the technical or the general sense; it was not a service, and not exactly, that is to say not frankly, an exhibition, but a little of both, especially the latter; it was not so much lesson as it was entertainment; it was not so good an entertainment as it would have been without the lesson. It tried to be all these things at once; no wonder it was neither of them. And yet the stirring up of all these ingredients in the cauldron served the main chance admirably; the crowd set the seal upon it as a business speculation. Let us pass the different elements of the entertainment in brief review.

1. Historically, it was next to nothing. The "remarks explanatory and historical," by the Rev. JOHN W. SHACKLEFORD, might have been omitted to advantage. They told us nothing, and conveyed no idea of the way in which, the steps by which, the old plain chant of Ambrose and Gregory grew up into the highest complex, glorious forms of sacred music. Both in the remarks and specimens two steps exhausted all there was of history that evening. Starting with a Gregorian chant, in unison, unaccompanied: "Cantate Domino" (in which the boys' voices sounded wonderfully clear, firm and precise, and all the voices well), the first step brought us to a chant in parts, sung antiphonally (yet with a modern English name attached—Dr. Turle). A very long stride this; and not a word to tell how harmony grew up, or by what barbarous scholastic harmony, of fifths and fourths, this modern harmony of Dr. Turle's chant was preceded. (In the singing, the boy sopranos and alti told beautifully, but the tenors and basses only murmured faintly as if doubtful whether their part was required; their shadowiness against the boy brightness rounded the thing into something like the new moon in the old moon's arms). A second long stride landed us away down in Luther's times, and we heard a German choral, "Ein feste Burg," sung with a very strange, adventurously figurative organ accompaniment, but without "interludes between the lines," which was about the only peculiarity of the German Chorale which the lecturer described to us. After this an English Chorale of king Charles's time—a noble, sterling one—and then all historical order was abandoned, and the rest of the concert made up of fragments of modern Oratorio, Mass and Organ music, from Handel to Mendelssohn, from Bach to Cutler, most miscellaneous mingled. We were not told how the Chorale was treated, harmonized, by Bach and others, and how Bach worked it up, transformed it, as a vital germ, into the highest forms of Protestant religious music. Nor was there a word about, nor a sound from Palestrina, nor any of the old Italia nor Flemish masters. What did the concert or the lecture teach us of the Chorale? An excellent and hearty protest, to be sure, the clergyman made against operative airs and fashions in our choirs and organ lofts; when instantly the Great Organ lifted its thousand voices, for what? to show us the true, the chaste, the real sacred style? On the contrary, to tickle the ear with the most operative of all organ music, with one of the French Offertoires, by Wely!

2. The "Choral," or Cathedral element. To examine the claims of the exclusive validity of boy choirs would cost a long argument, which we have no room for here. No doubt the charm of the concert was the singing of the boys. It has great peculiar beauty. There is the tone of innocence and freshness, a clear bright-facedness, a healthy, lusty vigor, a delicacy and purity withal, and a certain charm of docile, passionless impersonality, in their young voices, which is not only beautiful in a mere æsthetic view, but grateful to the religious sentiment, because impersonal and unsophisticated and neutral as to earthly passion; suggestive, also, of angelic, or rather of cherubic choirs. This is the poetic side of it, which easily runs into the sentimental. Into their music enters not the glow, the thrill, the pathos of earthly love; does it therefore follow that the heavenly love touches its lips with fire? On the contrary, it is without fire, it is simply neutral. Of expression, it can have only what is inseparable from the music sung, if only sung correctly and with sweet, pure voices. Of the external, sensuous charm of euphony, sonorous beauty, trained ensemble, good vocal method, and even of a high degree of execution, it can have much; these boys of Trinity are among the finest instances that we have heard since the famous Dom-chor of Berlin, which we believe to be the best choir singing in the world.

Still we must suspect that there is a great deal of sentimentalism in all this excitement which is springing up here about boy choirs. It is a monastic idea; it began in convents; and it implies (though nowadays it would scarcely dare to utter) a notion that there is somewhat rather unholy in the participation of women's voices in the music of the sanctuary. With those who believe this, it were idle for us to argue. With those who do not believe it (and do we not all pride ourselves on this crowning grace of Christian civilization, the respect for woman?), does not the claim necessarily sink to a sentimentalism, a pleasant dream, like that of the revival of the age of chivalry? Boys can and do sing admirably in choirs; but it appears that Bach and Handel and Mozart, and Mendelssohn, and the greatest masters of the great age of music, have thought-mixed choirs better and have composed accordingly. For our part, we follow our masters. There are great advantages of drill and habit and facility in boys set apart, apprenticed to a Cathedral service; there are the peculiar charms already mentioned in their voices; but the highest charm, of soul, expression, fervent rapture, prayerful pathos, dear-bought experience and conviction from the inmost heart, how can there be? What high counter-part, or complement, shall match the manly tenor and bass, for that, except the heart-felt, ripe soprano of the woman?

This thought indicates the limits of boy singing. The boys are best in masses, singing together in chants, chorales, contrapuntal choruses; that is, in music which is the most impersonal. This is the true use of them. To hear the Dom-chor (60 or 80 boys and 30 men) render the music of the old Flemish, Italian, German masters, as well as the more modern, is perhaps the most edifying musical experience which any Church anywhere affords. Dr. CUTLER's boys gave admirable proof of native quality and training in all they sang the other evening in this way; in the chants and chorales already mentioned, in the choruses from the "Messiah" and "Judas Macabæus," and best of all in the Gloria from Haydn's third Mass. These choruses, however, were less perfect in the grown men's parts, and suffered from had organ accompaniment.—Take notice here, too, that this cathedral service concert was mainly made up of oratorio and organ pieces, and therefore wholly disappointed those who sought example, or solution of the problem, of church music.

All praise, therefore, to the boy singing in chorus. But when it comes to the matter of expression, solo-singing, it is more questionable. The positive excellences, the positive charm, were great; but the something wanting was greater. Yet it was in solo-singing that these boys won their brightest laurels. They certainly did sing charmingly. The "Angel Trio" (Elijah) by the three best was truly exquisitely rendered; save that the third voice, by its manlier quality, stood off too much against the others; but these boys are no angels, and Mendelssohn's mind's ear heard women when he wrote it. Master COKER's singing of "Hear ye, Israel" was as remarkable for well-trained, well-phrased, facile, bright and clean delivery, for even an artistic exertion, as his soprano voice is singularly beautiful, clear, flexible, rich, delicate, and ringing in the highest notes of its great compass. But who can find the heart, the life of that song even in the ideal of boy singing, when he has heard it sung by Jenny Lind? A song written out of the depths of a tried soul's experience, to be so innocently, carelessly, dashing, felicitously thrown off! Is this the real thing, or only clever imitation of the thing? "Let the bright Seraphim" suited him much better; his strong, bright voice had the trumpeting thereof. Master Coker has the larger, stronger, brighter voice; and there is more dash and freedom in his singing and whole nature; he is more of a "sensation" boy; but the quiet little German from the Dom-chor, Master ECKLICH, with his smaller, sweet voice, showed a finer touch of feeling and of style, a something more sincere and inward, in his really beautiful rendering of "I know that my Redeemer liveth," although that is about the last song in the world to be allotted to a child. Master GRANDIN's manly, richly colored alto, and chaste, firm, noble style, made an excellent impression in "O thou that tellest." The two lads of the Advent Choir, who sang Handel's "Lovely Peace" duet, have sweet voices, and gave pleasure, though lacking the culture and the method of the New York boys.—It is sad to think that these rare voices must in the course of nature change so soon; but what their possessors have learned of vocal method, and to know and feel of noble music, will be theirs for life, invaluable.

3. Other solo-singing. Mr. MAYER showed an uncommonly large, firm, manly tenor voice, at times a little hard, but generally sweet and musical, and sang with taste and feeling, in the air "Total Eclipse." Mr. GEORGE HARRISON, young Coker's teacher, could not appear to sing "Sound an alarm." Mr.

THOMAS, basso, was not in good voice, so that "It is enough" was really too much. Why these solo performances at all in such a choral service concert? Simply to display the individual singers: an instance of the mixed motives, baffling all unity, in the Festival. The same must be said of the

4. Organ performances. These were entirely superfluous, so far as the concert was churchlike or historical. Nobody went there to hear the organ, but to hear the boys. The selections were not churchlike. Of the French offertoire, brilliantly of course played by Mr. MORGAN, we have spoken. His other selection, grand indeed, was from Oratorio, "Israel in Egypt." Dr. CUTLER's "Chaconne" with "pedal obligato," had less of pedal passages than one expected, and seemed a thin, albeit ingenious piece of contrapuntal triviality, not contrapuntal earnest. Mr. CARTER's treatment of the Dead March in "Saul" (what a cheerful selection to relieve so long and serious a programme!) was simple outré and grotesque; the cheap thunder on the pedals reminds us of an organ concert advertisement in a Worcester paper, from which you would think that the Organ was a gigantic electrical machine, for it coolly announces that "Mr. W. will electrify the auditory with the 'Thunder Storm' and other popular pieces" (!) This trick was vehemently applauded, particularly by the boys, and though the concert had already run the usual length, and full a third of it was yet to come, Mr. C. responded with Mendelssohn's "Spring Song" as an encore piece. Bach's great Pascaglia, grandly played by Mr. PAINE, and hitherto a favorite in the purely organ concerts, was too much for the late hour and for the occasion; such works must be principal and not accessory; this time its opportunity was spoiled by all that came before it.

The lighter and more secular solo concert given the next evening in the name of Master COKER, was doubtless more enjoyable, because less pretending; but we did not hear it.

Concerts.

MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB.—The largely increased attendance at the third concert, last Tuesday evening, seemed to show a perception that the programme was uncommonly well selected. There were just four pieces, all of the choicest, well contrasted, so that there was no disturbance to the sense of unity, and no fatigue. First came a Quartet by Mozart (in F, No. 8), light, facile, genial, happy, exquisitely moulded in its quick movements, rich and full of deeper sentiment in the slower Allegretto. The rendering was on the whole satisfactory, though the first violin was not always quite true in the higher notes, and there was something too stiff and wooden in the tone of the viola in passages which call it into marked activity.

A novelty, a quaint one and, as it proved, quite captivating, was a Concerto by Bach, in G minor, for Piano with quartet of strings. Mr. LANG played it with delicacy and nicety, entering into the wholesome, racy humor of it; and it gave great delight, especially the first and middle movements. After this experiment, and those of Mr. DRESEL, may we not say that the Bach bugbear is already vanishing?

The Allegro Moderato and Larghetto from Spohr's Sextet for two violins, two violas, two 'cellos (op. 140, in C), sounded remarkably rich, full and broad, and freer from Spohr's peculiar mannerism than most that we have heard of him. It lay well on the strings, and was very euphonious and enjoyable.

Finally, Mr. Lang played the really "Grand" Piano Trio in B flat, by Beethoven, with Messrs. SCHULTZE and FRIES on the violin and 'cello parts. Its charm is infallible, if decently well played, and this time the interpretation was masterly; the profound beauty and feeling of the Andante Cantabile was completely absorbing; and the imaginative wealth of thought, the exquisite surprises, the tempting and rewarding digressions, the logical unity of the whole work, brought every listener under the spell of Beethoven's genius.

But one concert of the series remains, and that will be on the 14th of March.

THE ORCHESTRAL UNION in their two last concerts have adopted our suggestion of giving each time two overtures, a solid and a light one, besides the Symphony, and the dainty little entremets; and they seem now to have settled into just the right ideal of programme, to interest the best taste and culture of so large an audience as they would woo into the Music Hall.

The fourth Concert opened with the great Leonora overture, in C, with trumpet, which, for so small a number of strings, was impressively rendered. It closed with the sparkling overture to Fra L'incanto played to a charm. The Symphony, which they well place as number three, was this time (following a waltz by Lumbye) Mendelssohn's "Italian," No. 4. It could have been more nicely rendered; but its beauty told upon the audience. It was followed by an arranged Scene and Duet from Marciner's Hans Heiling, and a Serenade, with horn obligato, by Reissiger, both interesting.

The fifth concert gave us Julius Rietz's concert overture in A once more, and a genial composition of real artistic unity and eloquence, which grows upon us, and is worthy of Mendelssohn's successor to the Leipzig baton. Then the Strauss waltz, "Carnival messages." Then Beethoven's second Symphony, in D; a performance of average excellence, though sometimes certain wind instruments were out of tune or coarse in sound. Mr. ARHUCKLE, on his trumpet, sang a German song: "How fair thou art," very smoothly; then came an orchestral version of Chopin's Morceau funèbre, which was very solemn and impressive; but the soft, pathetic second subject seemed to us too slow. Then for the light, closing overture, Rossini's ever jovial and graceful one to La Gazza Ladra. We hope the Union will keep on reviving this class of overtures; there are plenty of them, which show genius with their lightness; there is Il Barbiere and many more of Rossini's; there are more by Auher; there is the Dame Blanche, Weber's Preziosa, and so on.

Mr. J. H. WHEELER, the successful teacher of Cultivation of the Voice and Singing, of this city, has located in New Haven, Conn. We wish him all the success his efforts demand, and congratulate our readers in that lovely city on possessing so competent an instructor.

Musical Correspondence.

(From our Regular Correspondent.)

NEW YORK, FEB. 13.—Mme. Urso's concert! Miss Brainard's concert! Mr. Kerrison's concert! Mr. Pattison's concert! Miss Harris's concert! Coterie concert! Church concert! Mutual admiration society concert! Concert posters on the walls, concert bills on the shop counters, photographs of concert celebrities in every music-seller's window. And here comes a Russian lady violoncellist from Belgium, Mlle. de Katow, who is decidedly no "de," perhaps no "Mlle." nor "Katow" either; and a pianist, James Wehli, whom nobody knows anything about except that he is not the French Lefebure-Wely by any means, and just as certainly not Charles Wehle of German renown; possibly he is from Palestina. And the implacable Journal of Music expects a report of all this? And still worse, expects me to listen to it all, before reporting? And how shall an unfortunate correspondent preserve his good temper, his digestion, and his musical health and sanity, through such an ordeal?

No, no! here goes with the cream of the last two weeks, and let the rest aller se promener!

The PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY gave, in their third concert of this season, as orchestral works, Schumann's first Symphony, in B flat; Gluck's overture to Iphigenia, and Beethoven's Egmont overture. The Symphony, through its melodic charm, its rhythmic and harmonic richness, its perfect form in every movement,—the whole enhanced by a masterly use of orchestral means,—at once placed the immense audience in a happy mood, and gave a wholesome lesson to those hardened sinners against Schumann's genius, who, from their own intellectual poverty, are unable to discover anything in him but melodic deficiencies and abstruse harmonies. Let us hope the lesson may not escape their memory in future. The orchestra played the noble work with pleasure, apparently; although here and there a finer shading of this or that passage, a more distinct bringing out of a motive, and decidedly a slower tempo in the first movement, which would have made the swift passages, and sudden modulations of the leading motive clearer, were desirable. Still we have to thank both director and orchestra for the manner in which the whole was performed.

The overtures, glorious favorites, long naturalized in the hearts of all true artists and lovers of art, were played with the right elan.

Mr. WILLIAM MASON performed Schubert's piano forte Fantaisie in C major, opus 15, with Liszt's instrumentation. Liszt, by his effective and finely worked out orchestral accompaniment, has raised this fine fantasia to a first rank among concert pieces. In this peculiar gift of transcription of orchestral or vocal pieces for the piano, and of added orchestration to the works of distinguished masters, Liszt is truly great; he seems to have the faculty of penetrating into the most secret corners of such works, and of translating and re-echoing their true sense with the very spirit of the composer whose creations he takes in hand, while his coloring is so rich, that it rarely spoils the original intention. Mr. Mason has once before delighted us with his artistic interpretation of this work. If, on this occasion, he was scarcely himself, yet we could not but wonder that he found it possible to play in the manner he did; for he was ill and lame, and only carried his task to an end by means of great mental exertion.

Madame CAMILLE URSO played two salon pieces with orchestral accompaniment: "Souvenirs de Mozart," by Alard, Vieuxtemps' Fantaisie Caprice. Mme. Urso is well-known as a technically correct violin player; her trills, staccato, harmonics, passages, and all the rest of the witchery of a violinist, she carries to an uncommon degree of perfection; that her delicately feminine tone, her soulful expression, are always sure to delight the public, we need not say. But we only recognize in her as yet an interpreter of virtuosic violin music, such as soon fatigues the attention; and we cannot but regret that so much talent is never used in the interpretation of compositions of a high degree of value.

MME. VARIAN sang Beethoven's "Adelaide;" an unfortunate choice on the part of the lady, as this noble song can only be given with its true effect by the voice (tenor) for which it was intended.

Genuine pearls among the concerts with which our city is blest in winter, are the soirées of classic chamber music to be passed in the society of Messrs. MASON, THOMAS, &c. They are true artistic family gatherings. A refined audience, not attracted by frivolous fashion, but by sincere love and intelligent comprehension of Music, is to be found there year after year. The circle is not a large one, but every season increases the number of believers. To be sure, a few of the uncivilized and uninitiated find place there also, and disturb their neighbors with irreligious behavior, such as nodding the head and tapping with the foot (out of time) in the Minuetto, chattering loudly during a delicate Scherzo, or giving vent to a sonorous snore while a pathetic Schumann Andante is in progress; but these find the air a great deal too pure for them, and they do not come often, or stay very long when they do come, fortunately. The executants, the usual party, MASON at the piano, THOMAS, MOSENTHAL, MATZKA, BERGNER, the quartet—all artists of the right stamp—are always careful to give us the best chamber music that our great masters have written, without neglecting new productions of merit. And it is hardly necessary to say, that a practice of eight years together has given the quartet an ensemble and perfection of execution that enables them to interpret their programmes in the correct style and spirit.

Two of these concerts have already been given this winter; one in Steinway's exceedingly small room, which being found too much en miniature for the audience, the quartet moved on the second evening to their old quarters in Dodworth's building. Here are the programmes, which were excellently selected on both occasions. First Soirée:—Septet, E flat, op. 20, by Beethoven; Sonata for Piano and Violoncello, G minor, op. 65, by Chopin; Quartet, A minor, op. 41, by Schumann.—Second Soirée:—Quartet, E flat, op. 12, by Mendelssohn; Trio, C minor, op. 102, by Raff; Quartet, E minor, op. 59, by Beethoven.

The ITALIAN OPERA is again in progress, but the company has not done anything, since its return from Boston, worthy of special remark. Polio, Norma, Trovatore, Traviata, Faust, Ernani, repetitions all, have been the order of the nights; Verdi's Forza del destino is promised; and rumor hints at Le Prophète, with d'Angri in the part of Fides.

LANCELOT.

PHILADELPHIA, FEB. 13.—At the last matinée of the Quintette Club, we had a revival of Mendelssohn's quartet for piano and strings. It is one of his earlier works, and though lacking the breadth and power of many of its successors, is yet interesting and delightfully characteristic. Ernst's Elegie (performed by Mr. GAERTNER), and the storm quintet concluded the programme. These matinées are well attended, and programmes as well as performances are in keeping with the high musical position of the gentlemen composing the Club.

At the Germania rehearsal of last Saturday, the Scherzo of the "Eroica" symphony was performed for the third time. We owe thanks to Mr. SCHMITZ for his persistence in so good a cause. The third performance evidenced great improvement upon the first and the second, and established the possibility of a correct rendering of this movement, beyond peradventure. The French horns should be looked to, however. Their strains are invariably wrinkled. (I shall charge nothing for this metaphor, but will send you a better one as soon as the Germania improves).

Messrs. CROSS and JARVIS had their second soirée last Saturday evening. As usual there was a large attendance. The programme comprised.

Quartet. Piano and strings (E flat)..... Mozart.
Sonata in A. Op. 47. Piano and violin..... Beethoven.
Ballade..... Chopin.
Quintet. Piano and Strings..... Hummel.

Mr. Cross played the piano part in the Mozart quartet. The Beethoven Sonata was rendered by Messrs. Gaertner and Jarvis. Upon this composition and the Chopin Ballade the chief interest was concentrated.

The "Kreutzer Sonata" is so familiar to all who have any acquaintance with Sonata literature, that I shall attempt no description of it. How few violinists ever play it correctly! The opening chords (pons asinorum of fiddlers) were correctly intoned and nobly played by Mr. Gaertner. The ensuing difficulties, equally distributed between piano and violin, received full justice at the hands of the performers. Exacting criticism might note slight insecurity of intonation in the beginning of the fourth variation, as the only blemish in a performance otherwise eminently satisfactory.

Grover is in the newspapers with flaming advertisements of the approaching season of German Opera. To eke out a list of artists, formidable rather in quantity than in quality, he prints the names of the chorus singers and the members of the orchestra. We have the promise of certain operas we should much like to hear, and symphonies, as well as solos, in addition; respecting all of which I hope to inform you in due season.

JAQUINO.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

My heart is light. Song. Antonio de Anguera. 30

An excellent song throughout, in easy flowing style, and the words, by "Lilly," cheerful and pretty.

Mongengruss. Good morning, maiden fair and bright F. Schubert. 30

This is No. 8 of a series of 20 songs, or a "cycle" as Schubert calls them, all having some reference to the fair "Maid of the Mill." The set is pretty, and this morning song is one of the best.

Signor, elemento e pio. O king, thy deed of mercy. "Don Sebastian." 30

This is the admired air sung by Zayda in the first act of the opera. Not difficult.

So many flowers of azure hue. Song. Schubert. 30

A sweet little melody, and belongs to the set of the "Maid of the Mill." The flowers are "Forget-me-nots."

Their sun shall no more go 'down. Quartet for female voices. S. P. Tuckerman. 40

A quartet prepared for a funeral occasion, and of a chaste and beautiful character.

Flower girl. Song. L. O. Emerson. 30.

A sweet and simple ballad.

The Lord upholdeth those that are falling.

"Fall of Jerusalem." 30.

A sacred song of classic merit.

It's just as well to take things in a quiet sort of way. H. Sydney. 30

An English comic song, in which the title, at least, has a good "moral." Good melody.

Instrumental.

Oh! Whisper what thou feelest. Fantasia de Salon. E. Hoffmann. 75

Quite an elaborate piece of medium difficulty, and showing a most refined and delicate taste in the setting of its gems of melody.

Everett's funeral march. Burditt. 40

The impressive march played at the funeral of our great scholar and statesman. It was much admired at the time, and is now made accessible to the public.

Dorothea; a dramatic scena for Cabinet organ. L. H. Southard. 50

A kind of lament for a friend lost in the war, expressed however, not in vocal, but instrumental language. The idea is well carried out in a number of plaintive strains.

Dresden march. (4th battalion). For Brass Band. Burditt. 1.00

A favorite piece, skillfully arranged.

Funeral march, from Beethoven's Sonata in A flat op. 26. For violin and piano. Eichberg. 30

Another of these very acceptable arrangements. Lady players should get them, to enhance the pleasure of their musical evenings, and afford employment for their violin-playing friends.

Books.

THE MUSICAL LYRA. A new collection of Glee and Operatic Choruses. By F. H. Pease. $1.38

It is quite a common inquiry, "What can I get for a good, new, and easy Glee book?" Get the Musical Lyra. It is but a few months old, the glees are fresh, spirited, new and easy, and it is not at all likely you will be disappointed in it.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 624.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MARCH 4, 1865.

VOL. XXIV. No. 25.

An Infant Terrible of a Piano.

From "Les Soirées de l'Orchestre" of HECTOR BERLIOZ.*

THURSDAY, JULY 23.—I cannot help laughing all this morning at an accident which befell M. Erard, and with which the whole quarter where the Conservatory stands is amused. Here is the fact in all its simplicity.

The examinations at the Conservatory commenced last week. The first day, M. Auber decided to take the bull by the horns, as they say, and examine the piano classes. The brave jury charged with hearing the candidates learned without apparent emotion, that there were thirty-one in number, eighteen women and thirteen men. The piece chosen for the examination was the Concerto in G minor of Mendelssohn. Unless an attack of apoplexy should prostrate one of the candidates during the performance, the concerto would have to be played thirty-one times in succession, they knew that. But what perhaps you do not know and what I am still ignorant of, not having the temerity to assist at this experiment, is what was related to me this morning by one of the boys of the Conservatory class. "Ah! poor M. Erard!" said he, "what a misfortune!" "Erard! what has happened to him?" "What! then you were not at the piano examination?" "No indeed! what happened?" "Fancy, Mr. Erard had the kindness to lend us, for this occasion, a magnificent piano, which he had just finished, and which he counted upon sending to London, for the Universal Exposition of 1851. It is for you to say if he was pleased with it. A wonderful tone, a bass such as was never before heard; in fact, an extraordinary instrument. The piano was only a little hard, but that was the reason he sent it to us. M. Erard was cunning, and said to himself: the thirty-one pupils, by force of hammering at that concerto, will enliven the touch of this piano, and that cannot but do it good. But he did not know, poor man, in what a terrible way his piano would be enlivened—a concerto executed thirty-one times in succession, the same day! Who could calculate the result of such a repetition? The first pupil came forward and found the piano a little hard. The second, idem. The resistance was not so great to the third, and still less to the fifth. I do not know how the sixth found it. At the moment he came forward, it happened that I had to go for a bottle of ether for one of the gentlemen of the jury, who felt sick. The seventh had finished when I returned, and I heard him say, in coming behind the scenes: 'That piano is not as hard as they say; on the contrary, I think it is excellent, perfect in all respects.' The ten or twelve others were of the same opinion; the last ones even asserted, that, instead of being too hard to the touch, it was too easy.

"About a quarter to three, we had arrived at number twenty-six; they had commenced at ten o'clock; it was the turn of Mlle. Hermance Lévy, who hates hard pianos. Nothing could have been more favorable for her; each one said now that the keyboard could not be touched without making it speak. Thus she carried through the concerto so nicely, that she clearly obtained the first prize. When I say clearly, it is not exactly so; she shared it with Mesdemoiselles Vidal and Roux. These two young ladies also profited by the advantage which the easy touch of the piano gave them; so easy, that the keys commenced to move themselves, merely by being breathed upon. Did any one ever see such a piano? At the time of hearing number twenty-nine, I was once more obliged to go out and seek a physician; another of the jurors became very red, and it was necessary that he should be bled instantly. Ah, the piano examination is no joke! And, when the physician came it was only just time. When I reentered the lobby of the theatre, I saw number twenty-nine coming out—little Planté—he was very pale and trembled from head to foot, saying: 'I don't know what ails the piano, but the keys move all alone: one would think there was some one inside, moving the hammers. I am afraid.'

'Go away then, you are stupid,' said little Cohen, three years older than he. 'Let me pass. I am not afraid.' Cohen (number thirty) came in; he sat down without looking at the keys, played the concerto very well, but after the last chords, just as he was rising, the piano recommenced the concerto quite alone! The poor young man was brave, but after standing petrified an instant, he started off as fast as his legs would carry him. From this moment, the piano went on its way (the sound always increasing) playing scales, trills, arpeggios.

"The public seeing no one near the instrument, and hearing it sounding ten times louder than before, moved about all over the house, some laughing, others beginning to be frightened, everybody in such a state of excitement as you may imagine. But one juror in the back of the box, not seeing the performance, believed that M. Cohen had recommenced the concerto, and screamed out: 'Enough! enough, stop! Let number thirty-one, the last one, commence.' We had to call to him from the theatre: 'Sir, nobody is playing; it is the piano which has got the habit of playing the Concerto of Mendelssohn, and executes it quite alone.' 'But this is dreadful. Send for M. Erard. He will perhaps be able to conquer this frightful instrument!'

"We sent for M. Erard. During all this time, the piano, which had finished the Concerto, had not failed to begin again at once, without losing a minute, and with always increasing force; one would have said there were four dozen pianos in unison. There were scales, tremolos, parts in sixths and thirds redoubled in octaves, chords of ten notes, triple trills, a perfect avalanche of sound.

"M. Erard came he no longer recognized the piano. He sent for holy water, which he threw on it; there was no effect, a proof that there was no witchcraft about it, and that it was a natural effect of the thirty performances of the same concerto. They took down the instrument; took out the keyboard; the keys kept on moving; they threw it in the middle of the court of the Garde Meuble, when M. Erard had it chopped in pieces with an axe. Well, this was still worse; each morsel jumped, danced, frieked, from side to side, over the pavement, over our feet, against the wall, everywhere, until the locksmith of the Garde Meuble collected an armful of this enraged mechanism, and threw it in the fire of his forge, to end it. Poor M. Erard! such a beautiful instrument! That affair almost broke our hearts. But what was to be done? There was only this way of delivering ourselves from it.

Thus a concerto played thirty times in succession, in the same room, the same day, was the means of the piano getting the habit of playing it. M. Mendelssohn could not complain that his music was not played; but you see the consequences.

Beethoven and the Various Editions of his Works.

Beethoven's Works in the Edition Published by Breitkopf & Härtel.

BY OTTO JAHN.

(Continued from page 205.)

After what has been said, it will easily be understood that there is immeasurably more hesitation among composers than among literary men in bringing out editions of their complete works. The purely material question of space is a question of no slight weight. Notes require a large-sized page, and only very few of the persons who cultivate music are prepared for a long series of folios; yet it would scarcely be possible to do without such a series, for most of the great composers were very prolific, and volumes multiply rapidly in cases where scores are concerned. Scores are, generally, a stumbling-block. Among amateurs, there are not too many so thoroughly educated as to be able to derive pleasure from them—nay, it is said that there are even learned musicians who have no liking and no aptitude for availing themselves of scores—and yet they will always constitute the principal stock of masters of importance, and accommodating arrangements of them be only partially available. This is another proof of the great dissimilarity inherent to the very varied interests of the musical public, the different sections of which do not all derive equal satisfaction from such collections; this, it is true, holds good in literature as well. There is no doubt that whoever now-a-days reads Lessing earnestly, will like not only Nathan and Minna von Barnhelm, but draw, with as much pleasure, recreation and strength from the Dramaturgy, the Antiquarian Letters, and the writings on Theology and Freemasonry; all this, however, is quite different with Herder. If, in the case of Schiller, poems and dramas sufficiently compensate those readers who take no delight in the philosophical works, it becomes a matter of doubt whether the comprehensiveness and variety of Goethe did not prove impediments to his achieving similar popularity, and whether a division of his works into various categories would not be attended with a highly advantageous result. Far greater and practically important is the diversity exhibited by most leading composers. Certainly, were the collected—we can scarcely say—works of Hüntten, Ch. Voss and * Translated for this Journal by Mrs. H. A. VAN ARSDALE.

Oesten, published, we should not have to complain of versatility; but this is not so with the masters who have proved their greatness by the greatness of what they did; the church, the stage, the music of the concert-room and that of the house, presented each of them with tasks of the most varied kinds, and not interesting equally the same public, which was frequently the smaller in proportion as the publication of the works was more expensive.

There is another circumstance no less beset with difficulties. Among the reading public, there has sprung up almost universally an historical interest, vividly displayed in studying the development of literature generally, as well as, more especially, the gradual progress made by particular authors; youthful essays; first plans; fresh versions; and, in a word, things which do not so much afford absolute enjoyment as promote a more intimate knowledge of the process of mental productivity and labor, excite even in large circles an active interest, which, like all historical investigation and knowledge, demands, of necessity, to be extended and perfected. It is true that an historical interest of this description has, for some time, reigned in musical circles likewise, but it is infinitely rarer in the latter than in literary circles. Little interest of this description, however, is evinced not only by the listening public, who demand from music, if not a mere means of passing their time, at any rate, no more than an immediate sensation, as well as by amateurs who sing and play themselves, and the great mass of whom are equally limited both in their wishes and powers, but, as a rule, even by musicians. The fact of entering upon a system of historical treatment presupposes not merely a certain amount of acquirements, but, also, the deliberate intention of viewing a work of art in another light than that of mere enjoyment, and further, the capability of disregarding, at least partially, customary forms, without, in either case, weakening one's susceptibility for what is really musical and artistic—demands not easily satisfied, especially in this department of art. If, therefore, any great consideration were paid to this historical interest in publishing a collection of the works of even eminent composers, such a collection would be scarcely possible. An edition of Gluck's collected works—to say nothing of Hasse, Graun, and others—is something hardly conceivable, however interesting and important it might be to follow up the development of a man of a reforming mind in the compositions written at various periods of his life, and, from works composed at different times and for different purposes, to decide his position with relation to the manifold demands of his day and of his vocation; at present, those works of Gluck which are known, and which generally serve as the foundation for the notion people form of him, belong to one class only. If Gluck's labors, confined, as they were, nearly exclusively to opera, be surrounded with difficulties, such difficulties would be rather increased in the case of other masters by the latter's versatility. Joseph Haydn's popularity reposes upon the works of the last twenty years of his long life; we are acquainted more especially with the Haydn after Mozart: the struggling Haydn, the Haydn who freed and built up instrumental music, is as good as forgotten, if we leave out of consideration a number of his Quartets; what he did in the way of sacred music is imperfectly known, and what he produced as an operatic composer has never been known at all. But if we succeeded in collecting the 119 Symphonies which he himself noted down in an autographic list "of compositions which, for the nonce, he remembered having composed from his eighteenth to his seventy-third year inclusive;" the 163 pieces for the Viola di Bordone, Prince Nicholas Esterhazy's favorite instrument, the innumerable Cassations, Divertissements, Nocturnes, Scherzandi, Fantasias, Concertos, Sonatas, &c., for a greater or less number of instruments, 18 Italian Operas, with several German ones, and, finally, his various compositions for the Church, who would ever deem it possible to find a public of purchasers for such a collection? However great the circulation attained by numerous works of his of nearly every kind; however wide-spread and profound their influence; and however general their popularity, even at the present day, were anyone to think of collecting, in one edition, all the 626 works contained in Köchel's model catalogue, a number of amateurs and collectors might be found to purchase it, but scarcely a public. Nor is Mozart's case different. However fine and important may be, also, a considerable number of the works of Mozart, works hitherto either not made known at all, or mutilated and disfigured; however great and just the interest which most of them excite, in so far as they exhibit the development of his powers, and, at the same time, the nature of the musical productions of the period, it is, beyond a doubt, principally the historical interest which finds satisfaction in the many operatic, sacred, and instrumental compositions of the Vienna period, and this is not the sort of interest felt by the musical public at large.

There is, consequently, not much to be reported about editions of the collected works of celebrated composers. Such an edition of Hasse's operas was to have been published at the expense of the Elector of Saxony; but at the bombardment of Dresden, in 1760, the whole of the manuscript, which was quite ready for the press, was burnt. At the suggestion, and with the assistance of Duke Charles of Wurtemberg, a Recueil des operas composés par Nicolas Jomelli à la cour du serenissime duc de Wurtemberg, was commenced, but was not carried out beyond the first volume, which contained the Olimpiade. Greater progress was made by the collective edition of Handel's works, begun by Arnold, at the instance of George III., in 1786. Thirty-six volumes appeared, but this edition, like the rest, was never completed.

These enterprises would hardly have been commenced, but for the prospect of princely munificence being exerted in their favor. When, after his death, the publishing house of Breitkopf and Hartel announced an edition of Mozart's works, they had not the slightest intention of publishing all of them; the Oeuvres complètes really comprised only those pianoforte and vocal compositions which interested the majority of the musical public; the Pianoforte Concertos formed a series of their own, while the sacred and the operatic music, again, appeared apart, without any importance being attached to completeness or uniformity in the various publications. This collection was quickly followed up by an edition, carried out in the same spirit, of the collected works of Haydn; and those green and red volumes, which attained such a circulation as had previously never been known, exerted upon musical progress in Germany an almost incalculable influence. The reason is, that they made this capital of German house-music common property; they afforded healthy nourishment to the practice of music which was penetrating more and more among all classes of the people; they became the ever stable foundation of musical education; and contributed most materially to create a community of musical feeling. By their resemblance to Anthologies or Chrestomathies, a resemblance they shared with many Oeuvres, which followed them, of Dom. Scarlatti, Clementi, etc., they certainly exerted a deeper and more permanent influence upon the age in which they appeared, than could then have been exerted by collective editions, properly so called, and carried out in an historico-philological spirit.

The idea of issuing an edition of Handel's works, really based upon completeness and authenticity, was conceived by a Society of musical amateurs in England. From 1844 to 1853, they published fourteen volumes, got up with all the English splendor; but, since then, the undertaking has come to a standstill, apparently forever.

The fundamental notion of this Society was taken up in Germany, first by the Bach Society, which was founded in 1850, a hundred years after Bach's death, and announced as its object the publication of a complete critical edition of all the works written by Joh. Seb. Bach, as a monument to so great a composer. Entering into detail with regard to the mode in which their project was to be executed, they said: "All such of Bach's works as, by certain tradition and critical investigation, can be proved to emanate from him, will be admitted into this edition. In every instance, the original manuscript, or the printed copy sanctioned by the composer himself, will, if possible, be taken as a guide, and, if not, the best available resources, for giving the public the work in its current form as authenticated by critically tested tradition. Nothing like arbitrariness in altering, omitting, or adding, will be permitted." Eight years afterwards, the Bach Society was followed by the German Handel Society, which, founded on a similar plan, and governed by similar principles, has undertaken to publish the collected works of Handel. By the admirable manner in which they have been got up—at the establishment of Breitkopf and Härtel—and by the critical care, greater than that ever previously known in any instance of the kind, which has been bestowed upon them, to ensure a trustworthy and correct text, a stately series of volumes, regularly issued up to the present date by both Societies, proves in what a serious and lofty spirit the undertakings are conducted, and justifies the hope that the persons concerned will steadily go on with them to completion.

Bach and Handel possess, indisputably, an especial right to have their collected works preserved, in all their purity and authenticity, and rendered universally acceptable for all times, since, owing to the spirit in which they were conceived, and the art with which they were carried out, those works are essentially monumental. They not only afford remarkable testimony of what great and beautiful things eminent individuals were, at a given period, capable of producing, but they lay claim to an absolute value, which—independent of the age that gave them birth as well as of the age that is now intent upon republishing and enjoying them—forms an inalienable quality of the loftiest creations of human art. Different as the two masters are, and astounding as is the rich fertility of their productive powers in various ways, we shall find scarcely a single work that does not, by its novelty and originality, excite an independent interest of some kind or other; display the composer in a new light; or genially unfold the very essence of art, and present us with perfection itself. The lofty and great spirit which pervades all these works, and, seriously and vigorously, admonishes the hearer to soar into the ideal regions of genuine art, will secure for them a lasting and profound influence on all those for whom music is a real inward necessity, while that no artist, be he a master or a disciple, has ever exhausted the study of Bach and Handel, is a fact which must not be questioned even by the admirers of "surmounted points of view."

Of late years, zealous and gratifying efforts have been made, by public performances of every description, and by naturalizing them in the narrower circles of household music, to render the vocal and instrumental compositions of Bach and Handel accessible and known to everyone—to promote, in every way, the comprehension, and, with it, the true enjoyment of them. That composers, who in their works bestowed so little thought upon dilettanti, should present no slight difficulties to a public consisting essentially of dilettanti, may easily be supposed. Many and many a requisite for the complete comprehension and enjoyment of their works will have to be acquired by artificial means; for however much the two were raised above their age, in that age were both the base and the point of departure for their ideas. It will not, therefore, be invariably possible to avoid going back to these, if we would attain perfect comprehension of conception and form; though, on account of the composer's universal significance and grandeur, this may be achieved without any very great exertion or difficult preparations, supposing always the existence of real musical talent and a serious feeling for art. The publications of the Bach and Handel Societies are the more effective in thus popularizing their composers, from the fact that both Societies are either the first to publish the greater portion of their immortal works at all, or at any rate, the first to give them to the world correct and undistorted, as the composers wrote them. People are only beginning to learn what a treasure there was here, now that the treasure is being dug up for them, and many generations will have plenty to do in employing it best for the true development of art. The organization of the two Societies proves, however, that neither Bach nor Handel is yet sufficiently popular to enable the Societies, in their publications, to reckon upon the general mass of the musical public, and it was, therefore, necessary to consult the taste of artists, amateurs, and collectors. As we are all aware, every member of the Societies pays a certain annual subscription, and the sum total of such subscriptions is expended in publishing. Of the works which the Societies are thus placed in a position to print every year, each member receives a copy. In all this, there is nothing like publishing speculation; no regard is paid to the public outside the Societies; and the partial acquisition of one or more volumes is not permitted. It was only by keeping strictly in view the principal object, namely: to publish the collected works in a critically correct form, and to secure the possession and enjoyment of them for future generations, that the purpose of the Societies could be carried out at all. To the zeal of artists and the activity of trade we may confidently leave the task of coining the bars of precious metal here presented us; of satisfying, by editions of detached portions, pianoforte arrangements, and separate parts, the wants of individuals; and of propagating and introducing to the public piecemeal what it is not so easy to circulate as a whole; indeed, not a little has been effected in this way already. It is a royal palace which the Bach and Handel Societies have undertaken; the carters will have plenty to do in the conveyance of materials.

From what we have said, our readers will perceive it is quite another thing when the firm of Breitkopf and Härtel announce an edition of all Beethoven's collected works as a business speculation, which, without anything like extraordinary support or favor, and despite immense competition, appeals entirely to the wants and sympathies of the great mass of the musical public, whom it promises worthily to satisfy. Just let the reader recollect that Beethoven's works are already in the hands of the public—those still unprinted would not incline the scale much; that the compositions which command the attention of the masses circulate everywhere in numerous editions, contenting both just and immoderate expectations; and that now there appears a collective edition comprising everything, great and small works, popular and forgotten, thankful and unthankful ones, edited in conformity with the strictest requirements of scientific criticism; splendidly got up; and sent forth under conditions presupposing and rendering possible a widespread co-operation on the part of the musical public. There is one fact which, above all others, is proved by this, namely that, at the present day, Beethoven enlists the sympathies of the entire musical public far more than all other composers, and, on that account, rules the musical market. It may, perhaps, be difficult to obtain exact and reliable statistical returns of the sale and circulation of musical productions; but one thing is certain beyond the shadow of a doubt, and that is: no composer, either classical or fashionable, can be, in the most remote degree, compared with Beethoven as far as regards the continuous and extraordinarily increasing sale of his works. It is, indeed, even asserted that if the entire number of Beethoven's compositions which pass through the hands of the music-trade in any one year were placed in one scale and all other musical works published in the same year were laid in the other, the scales might possibly tremble, but that Beethoven alone would balance all the rest. As may be supposed, it is the compositions and arrangements for pianoforte which produce this result, for some of them are circulated in incredible numbers; that this sovereign sway, however, exerted over the musical public of all classes and creeds is no transient and fashionable caprice of dilettante-ism, but a gratifying proof how deeply and how generally a feeling for, and an interest in, genuine and lofty art are already spread among us, is a fact to which testimony is borne by the new collective edition. For a great artist to enjoy such universal respect, and for his works to exercise so immediate and vivid an influence that a collective edition undertaken with care and earnestness, and, in every way, thoroughly and worthily carried out, shall be joyfully received and supported by the public, is, certainly, a remarkable and unusually pleasing phenomenon. The difficulties besetting on all sides an enterprise of this kind are so great and varied, that it is only the general and continuous co-operation of the public which can supply the courage and power to overcome them and complete the work.

(To be Continued.)

Mendelssohn's Letters.

(From the Atlantic Monthly, Jan. 1865.)

Letters of FELIX MENDELSSOHN BARTHOLOMY from 1833 to 1847. Two Volumes. Philadelphia: F. Leypoldt.

There are many people who make very little discrimination between one musician and another,—who discern no great gulf between Mendelssohn and Meyerbeer, between Rossini and Romberg, between Spohr and Spontini: not in respect of music, but of character; of character in itself, and not as it may develop itself in chaste or florid, sentimental, gay, devotional, or dramatic musical forms. And as yet we have very little help in our efforts to gain insight into the inner nature of our great musical artists. Of Meyerbeer the world knows that he was vain, proud, and fond of money,—but whether he had soul or not we do not know; the profound religiousness of Handel, who spent his best years on second-rate operas, and devoted his declining energies to oratorio, we have to guess at rather than reach by direct disclosure; and till Mr. Thayer shall take away the mantle which yet covers his Beethoven, we shall know but little of the interior nature of that wonderful man. But Mendelssohn now stands before us, disclosed by the most searching of all processes, his own letters to his own friends. And how graceful, how winning, how true, tender, noble is the man! We have not dared to write a notice of these two volumes while we were fresh from their perusal, lest the fascination of that genial, Christian presence should lead us into the same frame which prompted not only the rhapsodies of "Charles Auchester," but the same passionate admiration which all England felt, while Mendelssohn lived, and which Elizabeth Sheppard shared, not led. We lay down these volumes after the third perusal, blessing God for the rich gift of such a life,—a life, sweet, gentle, calm, nowise intense nor passionate, yet swift, stirring and laborious even to the point of morbidness. A Christian without cant; a friend, not clinging to a few and rejecting the many, nor diffusing his love over the many with no dominating affection for a few near ones, but loving his own with a tenacity almost unparalleled, yet reaching out a free, generous sympathy and kindly devotion even to the hundreds who could give him nothing but their love. It is thought that his grief over his sister Fanny was the occasion of the rupture of a blood-vessel in his head, and that it was the proximate cause of his own death; and yet he who loved with this idolatrous affection gave his hand to many whose names he hardly knew. The reader will not overlook, in the second series of letters, the plea in behalf of an old Swiss guide for remembrance in "Murray," nor that long letter to Mr. Simrock, the music-publisher, enjoining the utmost secrecy, and then urging the claims of a man whom he was most desirous to help.

The letters from Italy and Switzerland were written during the two years with which he prefaced his quarter-century of labor as composer, director, and virtuoso. They relate much to Italian painting, the music of Passion Week, Swiss scenery, his stay with Goethe, and his brilliant reception in England on his return. They disclose a youth of glorious promise.

The second series does not disappoint that promise. The man is the youth a little less exuberant, a little more mature, but no less buoyant, tender, and loving. The letters are as varied as the claims of one's family differ from those of the outside world, but are always Mendelssohnian,—free, pure, unworldly, yet deep and wise. They continue down to the very close of his life. They are edited by his brother Paul, and another near relative. Yet unauthorized publications of other letters will follow, for Mendelssohn was a prolific letter-writer; and Lampadius, a warm admirer of the composer, has recently announced such a volume. The public may rejoice in this; for Mendelssohn was not only purity, but good sense itself; he needs no critical editing; and if we may yet have more strictly musical letters from his pen, the influence of the two volumes now under notice will be largely increased.

It is not enough to say of these volumes that they are bright, piquant, genial, affectionate; nor is it enough to speak of their artistic worth, the subtle appreciation of painting in the first series, and of music in the second; it is not enough to refer to the glimpses which they give of eminent artists,—Chopin, Rossini, Donizetti, Hiller, and Moscheles,—nor the side-glances at Thorwaldsen, Bunsen, the late scholarly and art loving King of Prussia, Schadow, Overbeck, Cornelius, and the Düsseldorf painters; nor is it enough to dwell upon that delightful homage to father and mother, that confiding trust in brother and sisters, that loyalty to friends. The salient feature of these charming books is the unswerving devotion to a great purpose; the careless disregard, nay, the abrupt refusal, of fame, unless it came in an honest channel; the naive modesty that made him wonder, even in the very last years of his life, that he could be the man whose entrance into the crowded halls of London and Birmingham should be the signal of ten minutes' protracted cheering; the refusal to set art over against money; the unwillingness to undertake the mandates of a king, unless with the cordial acquiescence of his artistic conscience; and the immaculate purity, not alone of his life, but of his thought. How he castigates Donizetti's love of money and his sloth! how his whip scourges the immorality of the French opera, and his whole soul abhors the sensuality of that stage! how steadfastly he refuses to undertake the composition of an opera till the faultless libretto for which he patiently waited year after year, could be prepared! We wish our religious societies would cull out a few of the letters of this man and scatter them broadcast over the land: they would indeed be "leaves for the healing of the nations."

There is one lesson which may be learned from Mendelssohn's career, which is exceptionally rare: it is that Providence does sometimes bless a man every way,—giving him all good and no evil. Where shall we look in actual or historic experience to find a parallel to Mendelssohn in this? He had beauty: Chorley says he never looked upon a handsomer face. He had grace and elegance. He spoke four languages with perfect ease, read Greek and Latin with facility, drew skilfully, was familiar with the sciences, and never found himself at a loss with professed naturalists. He was a member of one of the most distinguished families of Germany: his grandfather being Moses Mendelssohn, the philosopher; his father, a leading banker; his uncle Bartholdy, a great patron of art in Rome, while he was Prussian minister there; his brother-in-law Hensel, Court painter; both his sisters and his brother Paul occupying leading social positions. He was heir-apparent to a great estate. He was greeted with the applause of England from the outset of his career; "awoke famous," after the production of the "Midsummer Overture," while almost a boy; never had a piece fall short of triumphant success; in fact, so commanding prestige that he could find not one who would rationally blame or criticize him,—a "most wearying" thing, he writes, that every piece he brought out was always "wonderfully fine." He was loved by all and envied by none; the pet and joy of Goethe, who lived to see his expectation of Mendelssohn on the road to ample fulfillment; blessed entirely in his family, "the course of true love" running "smooth" from beginning to end; well, agile, strong; and more than all this, having a childlike religious faith in Christ, and as happy as a child in his piety. His life was cloudless; those checks and compensations with which Providence breaks up others' lot were wanting to his. We never knew any one like him in this, but the childlike, sunny Carl Ritter.

We still lack a biography of Mendelssohn which shall portray him from without, as these volumes do from within. We learn that one is in preparation; and when that is given to the public, one more rich life will be embalmed in the memories of all good men.

We ought not to overlook the unique elegance of these two volumes. Like all the publications of Mr. Leypoldt, they are printed in small, round letter; and the whole appearance is creditable to the publisher's taste. The American edition entirely eclipses the English in this regard. Though not advertised profusely, the merit of these Letters has already given them entrance and welcome into our most cultivated circles: but we bespeak for them a larger audience still; for they are books which our young men, our young women, our pastors, our whole thoughtful and aspiring community, ought to read and circulate.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

Mr. Fry and his Works.

The obituary notices of WILLIAM HENRY FRY in the last number of your journal, contain but a meagre list of his musical works. Appended is one more full and complete. No composer was ever through life so persecuted and denied a hearing as he; the doors of every opera house in New York, where he lived, having been for twenty years closed against him, through a well-known cause disgraceful to that city. Not a few critics, professional as well as amateur musicians, who heard his two operas in Philadelphia, ranked him not only as the ablest composer this country has produced, but as a musical genius of the first order, not second to Bellini, Donizetti, Verdi, Meyerbeer. He composed with the utmost fluency. The physician who attended him in his last illness, stated in a communication published in The World newspaper, that he was only thirty-two days engaged in composing his last opera, Notre-Dame of Paris. He was then suffering with consumption and hemorrhages of the lungs, which diminished his ability to labor continuously. Notre-Dame, like his other operas, is a technically "grand opera," that is, sung throughout, the recitatives being accompanied by full orchestra; and is as large a work as The Huguenots or The Prophet, being, like them, written to display the vast orchestral, choral and scenic resources of the grandest opera houses. Mr. Fry was the first modern composer to write "grand operas" to librettos in the English language, as he had a marked aversion to the style of operas called English—melodramas with interjected musical pieces, vulgar hodge-podges of songs and dialogue.

New York is the only city in the Union where the opera has existed, if not absolutely, at least in some degree, as an institution, which a native composer might reasonably have regarded as possessing resources to produce original works and a public to sustain them through representations enough to reward both manager and composer; and in that city Mr. Fry persistently endeavored to obtain that hearing for his operatic works which was so shamefully denied. The New York opera-going public is, however, not to be censured in the matter. They would have sustained Mr. Fry, had they been allowed to hear his operas, and would have afforded him incentives to produce forty instead of the four he has left. Now that he is dead and gone, now that he is past suffering through the devices of malignant hate, it may be hoped that a hearing will be accorded to the few operatic works he has left. But if the opportune moment be not yet reached, it will assuredly come. The name of William Henry Fry will one day take its place among the world's few great operatic composers, and with his works will live when his foes have passed from earth and the memory of man.

As a writer for the press, as well as a composer, Mr. Fry's faculty of production, when roused to action by an adequate incentive, was something marvellous. He could only write and compose rapidly and seemingly under inspiration, when ideas crowded almost too swiftly for utterance by words or notes. Had he not been driven from the path of musical composition to the less congenial pursuits of politics and journalism which mainly occupied his life, he would probably have left a record as the most prolific composer who ever lived. As it was, with scarcely any opportunities to have his works performed, and consequently almost without stimulus to produce them, he is known to have composed the following; though this list may not be complete, as he was in some things very careless, never numbering his works or keeping any record of all he had produced.

4 Grand Operas: The Bridal of Dunure, English libretto; Aurelia the Vestal, English libretto, with an Italian version, called I Cristiani ed I Pagani; Leonora, English libretto, with an Italian version under same title; Notre-Dame of Paris, English libretto, with an Italian version called Nostra-Donna di Parigi.

1 Cantata: The Fall of Warsaw, for principal singers, chorus and orchestra.

1 Stabat Mater, for four principal voices, chorus and orchestra.

1 Hallelujah Chorus, with orchestral accompaniment.

1 Kyrie Eleison, chorus with orchestral accompaniment.

1 Mass, complete, (composed at Santa Cruz a few days before his death).

1 Magnificat, for three voices with organ accompaniment.

20 Psalms and Hymns for four voices, with organ accompaniment.

1 Grand Scena for Bass Voice: "The Crucifixion."

1 Ode Symphony, for chorus and orchestra, composed for the opening of the New York Crystal Palace.

12 Waltzes for the Piano, called "The Musical Circle Waltzes."

5 Waltzes for the piano.

10 Ballads, Songs, Cavatinas.

12 Quartets for 2 violins, viola and v'cello.

6 Overtures for grand orchestra: Macbeth, never played; Evangeline, played in New York; and four without titles, played by the Philadelphia Philharmonic Society.

4 Symphonies for grand orchestra: A Day in the Country; Childe Harold; The Breaking Heart; The Christmas Symphony; played at Jullien's Concerts and Fry's Lectures on Music.

The music illustrating Fry's lectures on music. In 1852 Mr. Fry delivered at Metropolitan Hall in New York—a magnificent building like the Boston Music Hall, with seats for 3,000 persons, afterwards destroyed by fire—a course of 10 lectures on the Science and Art of Music. Probably no course of lectures on any subject, delivered anywhere, was ever illustrated on so vast a scale; the musical illustrations having been given by the principal singers of Mme. Sontag's opera company, a chorus of two hundred and an orchestra of eighty-six. The illustrations of rare and curious music included ancient Greek, Egyptian, Siamese, Chinese, East Indian, mediæval European, &c. Many of the pieces, being melodies only, were harmonized by Mr. Fry for chorus and orchestra; and a number of pieces were also composed by him for the lectures. These lectures, displaying Mr. Fry's vast stores of learning and absolute mastery of the subject in detail, were popular and gave pleasure to thousands of auditors. The audience was particularly delighted when he analyzed the structure of melody, showed how its beauty was derived from the language for which it was composed, showed why Italian melodies were more elegant than others, and, taking native East Indian melodies, probably hundreds of years old, composed to soft Hindoo words, proved them by performance to be not only similar to but almost identical with the loveliest melodies of Bellini and other Italian masters. These lectures were so unique, so comprehensive, so exhaustive of the whole subject, that the annexed syllabus may be regarded as almost a musico-literary curiosity.

LECTURE 1. Introduction to the general subject, —Music. Musical sounds; definitions and characteristics. Music as a language. Its history; its universality. Formation of sounds. Exemplifications vocal and instrumental.

LECTURE 2. Acoustics. Music as a science at different periods and among different nations. Melody and Harmony. Examples of curious Music, —the ancient and the rude. The earliest written choruses. Performance of some remarkable ones by the grand chorus. Simple and scientific music, —the popular and the true meaning of these epithets discussed and illustrated.

LECTURE 3. The Voice. Intonation in speaking and singing distinguished. The different qualities and capacities of the masculine and feminine voice. Exemplifications by the principal vocalists and chorus. Method and style. Sources of expression.

LECTURE 4. The Ballad.—sentimental and descriptive music. Its variations among different nations. National songs, their distinctive features, poetical and musical. Vocal illustrations, with and without accompaniments.

LECTURE 5. The Orchestra. All the instruments explained; their past and present treatment by composers practically demonstrated by the great orchestra. Sinfonia and overture. Military Music. Illustrations by the military band.

LECTURE 6. Church, Oratorio, and Chamber music. Subjects, meanings and aims of the several species. The organ, piano, harp and guitar. Styles of different composers. Performances of selections from rare, curious and great works.

LECTURE 7. Nature and Progress of Musical Ideas. Similarities in the melodic phraseology of different composers—how far referable to the nature of the art. Improvements in Orchestration, and the general scope of Music. Exposition of the different schools of Music, exemplified in the compositions of old and modern masters. Palestrina, Jomelli, Purcell, Gluck, Handel, Piccini, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Rossini and others. The difference between formal and inspired music.

LECTURE 8. The Lyrical Drama. Origin of the Opera. Its progress and peculiarities on the Italian, German, French and English stage. Defects and merits of the Opera in general, as an exponent of dramatic character, passion and action. Selections from various operas illustrative of these topics.

LECTURE 9. The Lyrical Drama continued. Considerations of the fitness of the English language for dramatic Music. Exemplifications in recitatives, arias, etc. The Ballet, its characteristics. Orchestral illustrations of them. General considerations of the proprieties of the lyrical stage. Its traditions, requisite reforms, capabilities and influences.

LECTURE 10. The connection between literature and oratory and music. Music as a part of collegiate education. The national defects of intonation and pronunciation. The connection between music and its public diffusion with the national taste in other arts. Its connection with health and morals—the family circle and society. The dignities and shames of art. The actual relation of the artist to private and public life. His rights under American institutions contrasted with his disparagement under the ancient and feudal system. American Music. The Artistic future.

Musical Correspondence.

BERLIN, JAN.—I proposed, in my last, to give you an account of some of the best of the many concerts which can be heard here. Among these the series given by the "Brothers MÜLLER" and ROBERT RADECKE takes a prominent place. Years ago, the original "Brothers Müller" were celebrated as the finest Quartet players in Germany; they were, however, but mortal, and their fame now lives on in a second Quartet of the same name, consisting of the sons of either one or several of the original "Brothers." The playing of the latter is, to me, as near perfection as can well be imagined; but I am told that it does not equal that of the predecessors. Robert Radecke, who joins in the concerts of these gentlemen, is a young pianist of very great merit, whose playing, full of freshness, health, vigor and sentiment, infects the hearer with the spirit the performer throws into it, and carries him away with it in delicious excitement. The wife of the first violinist, Frau Müller Berghaus, varies these concerts by her excellent and really classic singing; it is only a pity that her voice, originally a full, rich, powerful mezzo-soprano, is evidently impaired by ill-health. Her upper notes are often shrill, and even the middle ones are sometimes so veiled that is almost painful to listen to them. The following programmes will show you how worthily all this artistic excellence was employed:

1st Concert.

- 1 Quartet (C sharp minor, op. 181).....Beethoven.
- 2 a) Romanza from "Zemire and Asor".....Spohr.
- b) "Am Meer".....Schubert.
- 3 Rondo for Piano (fr. op. 53).....Schubert.
- 4 a) Zuleika.....Mendelssohn.
- b) "Hark, hark, the lark" etc.....Schubert.
- 6 Quintet for Piano and Str. Instr.....Schumann.

2nd Concert.

- 1 Quartet (A minor, op. 182).....Beethoven.
 2 a) "Thou art like a flower".....Schumann.
 b) Margaret at the Spinning wheel.....Schubert.
 3 March of the "Davidbündler," for Piano.....Schumann.
 4 a Spring Song.....Mendelssohn.
 b Persian Song.....Rubinstein.
 c Kinderlied.....Taubert.
 5 Trio (A flat M.S.).....Radecke.

3d Concert.

- 1 Serenade f. V. Va., Cello, op. 8.....Beethoven.
 2 a The Fair Maid of Inverness.....Beethoven.
 b Venetian Gondoller's Song.....Beethoven.
 3 Sonata for Piano and Cello, Op. 102, No. 2.....Beethoven.
 4 a Persian Song.....Rubinstein.
 b "Er ist gekommen".....Frans.
 5 Quartet for Piano, etc.....Rubinstein.

Of this rich array a few numbers deserve particular notice. So, for instance, Schumann's Quintet, which I cannot fancy more exquisitely rendered, in all its parts—Always a special favorite with me, its place in my memory is now surrounded by a halo of perfection which no lapse of time will efface. The two Quartets of Beethoven, too, usually considered so incomprehensible, were rendered sources of great enjoyment, by the wonderful clearness with which they were played. Much, of course, still remained dark, (particularly in the second) upon which only very frequent hearing would throw light even to the most profound musician; but the immense difficulties of these compositions were mastered with so little apparent effort, that one seemed almost to be listening to a quartet of Haydn or Mozart. And yet what a contrast was there between these stupendous works, and the Serenade in the third programme! Ah! it was the contrast between the light-hearted youth, with life and hope before him, and the morbid, stricken, lonely man, to whom life had brought so little, and hope had proved so false. The Serenade is charming; full of life and love, of grace and tenderness. It consists of five parts: an Allegro, slow movement, Minuet, Variations and Finale, and is a companion piece to the lovely Sextet for quartet and two horns, which I heard here in Berlin many years ago. I have always regretted its never being produced in America, and can now only advise our artists across the sea to give both it and the Serenade a place in their repertoire. I must not omit to mention that Herr Radecke's Trio placed him in quite as high a rank as a composer, as he occupies as a pianist. It was very original, and will, I am sure, when published, take its place among the favorite compositions of the present day.

A few days ago, I had once more the pleasure of hearing the Müllers in a concert for a benevolent object. They again played Beethoven's Serenade, a lovely Quartet by Haydn, and, with Kapellmeister TAUBERT, Mozart's charming Piano Quartet. Taubert's playing is extremely neat and precise, but it does not warm one; I would have preferred Radecke. Frau Müller Berghaus repeated some of the songs mentioned above. The most beautiful of these was Beethoven's Scotch Song, "The lovely maid of Inverness," which the musical critic of a Berlin daily truly calls tear-laden. A more mournful, heart-seizing song I never heard. Its beauty was enhanced by an obligato accompaniment of violin and violoncello, and the sighing of the latter was well suited to the deep sorrow of the song.

A most enjoyable little Trio Soirée was recently given to a select, but very appreciative audience, by three young artists, ARNOLD (Piano), MARX, (Violin), and ZURN (Cello). The programme contained only three numbers: one of Beethoven's Op. 70 Trios, Mendelssohn's B flat Sonata for Piano and Cello, and Schubert's Trio, op. 100. It was this which attracted me, without my knowing anything of the performers. And I was well repaid for going. The pianist was unusually good, and if there was room for improvement in the other players, there was also a fair promise of it.

SIGISMUND BLUMNER, (a brother of Martin Blumner, the second director of the Sing-Akademie in this city) who has been spending some years in England, made his debut here not long ago before an invited audience. He plays with much brilliancy and power, and will probably take his stand here among the first pianists. OLB BULL has also been renewing his acquaintance with the Berlin public, in a series of concerts given in the Royal Theatre. His playing is said to bear all its old characteristic features. A Fraulein DECKNER, a female violinist from Hungary, and a Herr FRANZ BENDEL, have recently appeared together, and Herr and Frau von BRONSART, pianists, as well as a Herr PEPPER, violoncellist, are very highly spoken of. I reserve for my next letter an account of a concert by CLARA SCHUMANN and STOCKHAUSEN, which I have had the great pleasure of attending; it would go beyond my present limits of time and space. But I cannot keep from your readers the very unpleasant intelligence of an accident which has befallen Madame Schumann. She fell while walking, with her whole weight upon her hand, and sprained her wrist, or arm, so seriously that weeks at least, if not months, must pass before she can again use her hand, and it is even doubtful, according to some accounts, if she will ever regain the full strength of the injured member. She has the warm sympathy of every one, for a greater misfortune could hardly befall her, who has already had so much to struggle with in life. Let us hope that the matter is not as serious as is now feared. M.

NEW YORK, FEB. 27.—The third "Symphonie Soirée of Mr. THEODORE THOMAS took place on Saturday evening, Feb. 18, at Irving Hall. The programme, of which the two main features were new to an American audience, was as follows:

- Symphony, "An das Vaterland" op. 96, D.....Raff.
 1. Allegro.
 2. Scherzo—Allegro molto vivace.
 3. Larghetto.
 4. Allegro Drammatico.
 5. Larghetto sostenuto—Allegro deciso Trionfante.
 Aria, "Che farò senza Euridice" (Orpheus).....Gluck.
 Miss Adelaide Philipps.
 Concerto for Piano, Violin and Violoncello, with accompaniment of Orchestra, Op. 56.....Beethoven.
 Messrs. Mills, Mollenhauer, Bergner and Orchestra.
 Cavatina, "Una voce poco fa" (Il Barbiere).....Rossini.
 Miss Adelaide Philipps.
 Overture, (Jesonda), Op. 63.....Spohr.

The event of the evening was Joachim Raff's Prize Symphony. The work was written by the composer in illustration of the following plan,—printed on the programme by the express wish of the composer:

"Few Germans who have feeling and enthusiasm for their nation, have been left, by the events of these last years, without a deep impression. Although the tone-poet is not brought into contact with certain outer forms of these events, still his soul is filled with lasting impressions, which finally force him to give them an artistic utterance. In this way arose the following series of movements.

"In the first of these, the poet attempted to describe the lofty flight of the mind, deep power of thought, purity and gentleness and perseverance unto victory, as important elements in the natural disposition of the German, which, in many ways, complete and imply each other.

"The second movement should conduct the hearer to the chase with the men in the German forest, where the horn sounds loud and clear; then lead him, to the gay sound of national songs, with the youths and maidens in their merry walks through the fields rich with harvests.

"In the third movement, the composer would invite us to the homes and firesides of his countrymen, which seem to him hallowed by the chaste Muses, and the faithful love of wife and children. But these cheering aspects no longer present themselves when the tone-poet directs his glance to another side of the German national life.

"In the fourth movement, are described repeated attempts for the unity of the fatherland, which are frustrated by a hostile power. The composer has introduced in this movement, as a symbol of the condition of his country, a melody which is known wherever Germans live, "What is the German's Fatherland" (Was ist des Deutschen Vaterland.)

"In the fifth movement the poet does not attempt to suppress the melancholy with which he is filled by the want of unity in his country. But hope now draws near, and led by her, he sees with longing and prophetic eyes a new and victorious uprising of his country in unity and majesty."

This Symphony was begun late in the summer of 1859, after the peace of Villafranca, and was ready for publication in 1861, when the attention of the composer was called to the fact that the Society of "Musik-Freunde," of the Austrian Empire, had offered a prize for the best Symphony which should be sent to them. He was encouraged by many to send this work to compete for the prize, and it was preferred by the judges to any other of the thirty-two symphonies which were submitted to them. The composition was publicly performed at Vienna on the 22d of February, 1863, and was received with great applause by a large and critical audience.

I shall not here enter into a minute analytical detail of the beauties and defects of this unusually large score which occupied an hour and twenty minutes in performance; it will be sufficient for me to say, at present, that it is a work of uncommon merit both as regards conception and technical execution. Each movement presents many interesting points, and the composer has not been sparing of his contrapuntal resources; on the contrary, he has been rather too lavish in the exercise of them and, heaping detail upon detail, has spun the movements to an excessive length, which is in some measure injurious to the effect of the meritorious composition. But, if we consider how difficult and ungrateful a task it is for the composer of our days to accomplish anything remarkable in this form, while he has to endure a comparison with such predecessors as Beethoven, Schubert, Mendelssohn, Schumann, we must allow that Raff has been on the whole successful; and we will hope that a composer who has been capable of doing so much will in the future do yet more. The instrumentation is, throughout, fine, and in many places remarkably original.

Another novelty to our audience was Beethoven's Concerto. This is a work that is rarely heard, on account of the difficulty of finding three efficient artists for the solo parts. It is not a work of such calibre as his violin or some of the piano-forte concertos; but it bears the noble Beethoven stamp throughout.

Miss ADELAIDE PHILLIPPS, whose appearance was a welcome one to her many old friends and admirers, sang the Gluck Aria with fine expression; but we must make some objection to the changes which she made, not only in the tempo, but also in the notes of the morceau; it is in itself so perfect, so simply beautiful, that any change is for the worse. In the Rossini aria, Miss Phillipps displayed uncommon bravura execution; her fine and open trill is especially remarkable. This lady is too seldom heard in public; we have here very few singers of equal ability.

Mr. Max Strakosch has produced his "lately imported artists" (to use the very commercial language of some of our daily papers): the lady violoncellist, and the gentleman pianist, in three or four concerts here, and then in Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, we believe; you will probably hear them soon in Boston also. The lady (Mlle. de KATOW) produces a clear, but weak tone from her instrument; her execution is not remarkable, and she shines best in light sentimental compositions. Mr. WENZL's principal merit consists in uncommon technical facility with his left hand. He is of the Thalberg school, but is decidedly behind that leader in finish and correctness; and his performance of the few good compositions to be found in his public repertoire is by no means a good interpretation.

Verdi's "La Forza del Destino" was brought out last week before a large audience at the Academy. The opera has made a favorable impression on our habits, and promises to have a successful "run." It presents many points of dramatic interest, and more repetitions and reminiscences. The plot is heavy and improbable, and the whole work exceedingly long, not to say tiresome. In my next I will give a more detailed account; the artists were not all in the best voice on the first representation, nor did the whole go off so smoothly as it will on a future performance.

Here is the programme of MASON and THOMAS's third soirée of Chamber Music:

- Quartet, String, (D minor).....Haydn.
 Trio, Piano, (F, Op. 80).....Schumann.
 Quartet, String, (F minor, Op. 95).....Beethoven.

LANCELOT.

PHILADELPHIA, Feb. 27.—The Third of the WOLFSOHN and THOMAS soirées was given on Saturday evening, Feb. 25. The following was the programme:

1. Sonata, (G major, op. 96) Piano and Violin.....Beethoven.
  2. Fantasia, (Robert le Diable).....Liszt.
  3. Sonata, (Trille du Diable) Violin.....Tartini.
  4. Quintet (B flat major, op. 44) Piano and Strings.....Schumann.
- Messrs. Wolfsohn, Thomas, Roggenburger, Kammerer, and Ahrend.

There was a fair attendance though the weather was very unpropitious. I can only refer in general terms to the concert, in remarking that, as usual with these gentlemen, there was little to complain of and much to commend.

The Liszt fantasia on "Robert" is one of the most difficult of the great pianists' productions, but Mr. Wolfsohn has bravely mastered it, and reproduced its effects with considerable skill.

On the afternoon of the same day, the Germania Society, which has shown considerable enterprise since the assumption of the baton by Mr. SCHMITZ, performed the "Heroic" Symphony of Beethoven, entire. It was creditably produced for a "Rehearsal;" there was a noticeable lack of strings, and this deficiency frequently interfered with a just rendering of this majestic work. It is scarcely fair, however, to criticize such a performance in the same spirit that we might a regular Orchestral Concert, where the price of admission is fourfold that of a Germania ticket.

For one, I think that there is such a thing as getting and giving music too cheaply, "Selling most cheap what is most dear;" there are people under present circumstances not to be enumerated on one's fingers, who do not value music enough to pay for it what it is really worth. These individuals make the Hall a resort for gossip of a Saturday afternoon, and sadly interfere with one's enjoyment and comfort. An advance in the price of tickets would undoubtedly suggest to these the propriety of discontinuing their patronage; at the same time the Society could afford to employ an increased force, and succeed in performing their selections with that carefulness and attention to detail, the want of which we have so often occasion to regret.

The Grover German Opera Company have been producing the items of their repertoire in the most negligent and shabby manner. Everything has gone wrong since the opening night, there being some inexcusable shortcomings on every occasion.

At the Fourteenth Matinée of the Philadelphia Quintet Club, the following pleasant programme was presented.

1. Quartet, No. 5, in A major.....Beethoven.
  2. Etude, C Minor.....Chopin.
  3. Quintet, B flat major.....Mozart.
- MERCUTIO.

Music Abroad.

Paris.

The Orchestra's correspondent, Feb. 6th, writes:

The third concert of the "Société des Concerts du Conservatoire" was given yesterday, with the following programme:

- |                                   |             |
|-----------------------------------|-------------|
| Symphonie en Si bémol.            | Beethoven   |
| Ave verum.                        | Halevy      |
| Concerto en Sol mineur.           | Mendelssohn |
| Finale du 2me Acte de La Vestale. | Spontini    |
| Overture de Zampa.                | Herold      |

Monsieur Georges Hainl conducted. Beethoven's Symphony, the fourth he wrote, was well executed by the orchestra, and Halevy's Ave Verum for two soprani soli and chorus produced a very great effect and was deservedly applauded. The solists were Mdlle. Marie Sax and Mademoiselle Barthe-Banderli. Mendelssohn's splendid concerto in G minor served to introduce M. Louis Diemer, a young pianist of great promise. The rest of the concert was a decided failure. Mdlle. Marie Sax, who sang the soprano in the finale of "La Vestale," seems to have successfully studied in a school whose aim appears to be the serious cultivation of what Mozart bitterly called

"un urlo Francese," (a French yell). When she acknowledges to the Grand Prêtre that she has broken her vows, she gives her confession "mouth" in such a violent manner that M. Belval, her partner, seemed quite astounded; and instead of upbraiding a despairing culprit in a manner befitting the dignity of his position and the depth of his voice, seemed to be timidly expostulating with a virago de la première catégorie. The public were extremely ill-natured during the whole concert.

The Théâtre Italien has got into difficulties with Madame Veure Scribe, who has brought an action against M. Bagier, to prevent him performing "La Sonnambula," "L'Elisir d'Amore," and "Un Ballo in Maschera," on the ground that these pieces are translations of "La Sonnambula," "Le Philtre," and "Gustave III.," all three written by her late husband. The decision of the judges was in favor of Madame Scribe, but M. Bagier appeals, and until the final judgment is given, the pieces will be played as usual. "La Sonnambula" is announced for to-night with Brignoli as Elvino, and a slight change has been made in the title of the opera, which is now baptized "La Villanella Sonnambula."

M. Valentino, who for some years shared with Habeneck the post of chef d'orchestre at the Opera has just died at Versailles at the age of seventy-eight. He was highly esteemed by all the musicians placed under his direction, and had the reputation of being one of the best conductors of his day. He was the originator of the "Concerts Populaires de Musique Classique," which he founded in 1836. These concerts were given in a large hall situated in Rue St. Honoré, and which still bears the name of Salle Valentino; but has fallen from its high estate, and is now used as a Casino. The concerts were given daily, and the price of admission was a franc. The programme included a symphony, generally by Beethoven, and the best overtures and instrumental soli, performed by such artists as Remusat, (flute), Seligman and Deloffre, (violins), Verronst, (hautbois), Jancour, (bassoon), &c. The public of that day were not sufficiently enlightened to appreciate and encourage the Valentino's efforts to cultivate a taste for good music, and, being made too soon, the attempt was an utter failure. Twenty-five years later, a gentleman who at that time held the modest rank of kettle-drummer in Valentino's orchestra, succeeded in turning to good account his former conductor's ideas, and M. Pasdeloup, at the Cirque Napoléon, is every week reaping what his predecessor had sown. His seventh concert (2nd series) was given yesterday, Mozart's "Jupiter Symphony," and Beethoven's in C minor, and the Freyschütz being the principal morceaux.

At the Opera, "Roland" and "Motse" keep their places on the bills. The rehearsals of "L'Africaine" are progressing rapidly, and are conducted with the greatest secrecy; even the artists in the cast seem to know but little of the piece, with the exception of their own scenes; they are called from the foyer when they are wanted, and are not allowed to stand at the wings. I hear great things of a scene on board ship in the third act, which is said to be something marvellous.

At the Opéra Comique, "Le Capitaine Henriot" is highly successful; the last receipts are officially announced as amounting to 7,482 francs (nearly £300). This is satisfactory, but astonishing; for the Opéra Comique, standing-room taken into consideration, is supposed to hold when crammed to suffocation about 7,000 francs.

At the Théâtre Lyrique, we have had "L'Arenthier," "Mirille" and "Faust." Verdi's "Macbeth" and Mozart's "Mystères d'Isis" ("Die Zauberflöte"), are in rehearsal.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, MARCH 4, 1865.

MUSICIANS' UNION BENEFIT FUND. The musicians of Boston, members of the various orchestras and bands, have formed a league of mutual interest and kindness, under the name of the "Boston Musicians' Union." One of their first objects is to establish a fund for the benefit of sick and needy musicians; and all the friends of music, all who reflect how hard the work and poor the pay of most of those who live by making music for us, all whose hearts have ever been lightened, and whose lives sweetened by their instrumentality, will wish a hearty God-speed to this enterprise, and feel it a happiness to help it so far as in them lies. Surely there are few, of those who profit either outwardly or inwardly by "the divine Art," who cannot afford to contribute one day's income to this fund. The example has been set in the quarter of large incomes: are there not plenty who will follow? Who grudges a day's work for a sick friend, or a sick stranger, or for any noble cause, or even any hobby? A poor man's day's work is a larger contribution than the rich man's check for tens and hundreds. Many a hard day's work has many a poor musician (sometimes worthy of the name of artist too) been contributing to the general fund of social good cheer, harmony and health. Now it is our turn.

The special object of these remarks just now is, to call attention to the concert to be given at the Boston Theatre to-morrow (Sunday) evening, by the united musicians (instrumental) of our city, to establish the nucleus for the Fund proposed. It will be in many respects, apart from its fraternal purpose, a concert of peculiar interest, quite unprecedented here. It will be a very large concert, and the word "Grand" for once is used with some significance. The instrumental combination, which has been announced to number 150 performers, includes the Orchestral Union, the Mendelssohn Quintet Club, the Boston Theatre Orchestra, the Museum Orchestra, Gilmore's Band, the Brigade Band, and even the leading orchestras of white negro-minstrel-dom. Moreover, volunteer aid is contributed by the "Orpheus Musical Society," Mr. A. KREISSMANN conductor; by Mrs. J. S. CARY and Mr. RUDOLPHSEN, who will each sing an air from Elijah; and by Mr. B. J. LANG, who will play an "Andante and Capriccio," for the piano, by Mendelssohn. The whole under the direction of CARL ZERRAHN.

The programme, otherwise, is rich. Beethoven's Fifth Symphony and great Leonora Overture will be played, and by an orchestra of such proportions as Boston never yet has furnished of its own means:—think of nine double-basses, fifteen or more first violins, and as many second; when it comes to cellos and violas, alas! the proportion cannot be kept up, poor little Boston has them not; but there will be no lack of trumpets, horns, trombones and clarionets. This metallic wealth is wisely made available in the production of certain pieces of effect music, such as Wagner's Rienzi overture, Meyerbeer's Fackellanz (torch dance), and an arrangement of Chopin's Funeral March. It cannot be expected that the orchestral renderings will be perfect; but many passages will be uncommonly imposing, and there will be some effects which we shall rarely have an opportunity of appreciating.

Unfortunately this has to be called a "Sacred Concert," otherwise it could not be given at all. It is the fault of the law, and not of the musicians. They can only give their concert on a Sunday evening, because the most of them are bound to service in the theatres on every other evening of the week. Properly speaking, and in sober verity, all good music is sacred, inasmuch as it springs from, expresses, and appeals to the purest emotions, and, more than any words, it is the native language of the religious sentiment. No music, at least no instrumental music, can be the opposite of sacred, can be sinful, hypocritical, selfish, viciously seductive, morally corrupt or corrupting, tempting a soul to hide its face from God. Common sense has long since settled it, that a Sunday evening may be more sacredly spent with pure and noble music, such as has no associations with any levity, than in that negative abstinence from all spontaneous life and occupation, which is mere mental and moral inanition and vacuity, and which is in the majority of cases the whole result of what is called literally and strictly keeping the Sabbath. But the old Puritan law is not yet wiped from the statute book, and some less of that sour old public opinion yet linger in the cask. The letter of the law still prohibits all public entertainments, except Sacred Concerts, on Sundays; the only effect of it is, a direct premium on humbug and lying. Music we must have; society demands it; they that furnish it are compelled to lie, and announce their symphonies, their overtures, their organ miscellanies, their Italian operatic "gems" as "sacred" concerts! And no old Puritan starts up out of his grave to question the rightfulness of such use of the adjective. Let us purify ourselves of all this sham! Let us join hands, every music lover, let us shout it into the ears and conscience of the fathers, let us fill the newspapers with it, let us preach it from the pulpits, let us memorialize the General Court, and get this foolish, this unjust lie abolished!

In the present case, however, the charitable and fraternal end may well be deemed to make it a "Sacred" Concert. Some of the holiest of music, too, is in its programme. We are glad to hear that there has been a great demand for tickets, and we trust no music-lover will neglect it. Let it be, as we have no doubt it will, a great success; encourage the musicians; this is one of the best ways to make the music better in our city in the times to come.

THE LATE WILLIAM HENRY FRY.—Those who are curious to know what musical productions sprang from the ever active brain and pen of this eccentric and (in his life, if not in his music) original and brilliant individual, and what claims of musical genius and musicianship are made for him by his intimate friends and admirers, will read with interest a contribution in another column. Of course in publishing it, it is impossible that we should endorse its opinions. In spite of radical differences of taste and conviction with Mr. Fry, which we have often in times past had occasion to express, we print the article, not because what little of his music we have heard or seen has seemed to us to show genius or originality; but because we feel in duty bound to grant a hearing to claims, so strongly urged, which we have not the means of settling to our satisfaction; and more, because of the esteem in which we have long held Mr. Fry, personally, knowing him to be a man of many generous and noble qualities, thoroughly independent and above all moral cowardice, genial, sincere and charming among friends, filled with a great enthusiasm and reverence for Art, if not for its conventional idols, indignant that meaner, worldier, more bustling and selfish faculties should overshadow and crowd out the priests and ministers of the Ideal. To all this, and to his brilliant and intensely active mental powers, displayed in conversation, action, speech and writing, we would fain pay an humble and sad tribute.

Reports of some of Mr. Fry's Lectures on Music will be found in one of the earliest volumes of our Journal (1853).

CORRECTION.—In our account of the late "Choral Festival," our memory (not seldom muddled by the medley of allsorts of music which it is our doom to hear and try to recall and write about perhaps weeks afterwards) betrayed us once. We were mistaken in saying that interludes were not played between the lines in the singing of the Choral: Ein feste Burg. No sooner had we got it into print than the sound of the thing came floating back upon our mind, and behold, there were pauses (of an instant only) of the voices, filled by the overlapping of the figurative organ phrases. This is not worse than the mistake of another critic (writing in a newspaper) who says that it was sung "with Bach's harmony," when it was sung in unison. Our types, too, were sometimes treacherous; for instance, where we wrote "the trumpet ring" of Handel's "Let the bright Seraphim," we were made to say "the trumpeting!"

ORCHESTRAL UNION.—The sixth Afternoon Concert was postponed to last Wednesday, as Washington's Birthday claimed the Music Hall on the 22nd ult. The audience was large, intelligent, and remarkably attentive to the execution of the following programme:

Overture to Oberon.....	Weber.
Waltz "Prometheus".....	Strauss.
Third Symphony in A minor.....	Mendelssohn.
(First time in Four Years.)
Serenade—arranged for Orchestra.....	Eisoldt.
Finale from Der Freischütz.....	Weber.
Overture to the Comic Opera of La Sirene.....	Auber.

Oberon's wonder-horn had lost none of its magic, nor Mendelssohn's Symphony any of its sea-shore, wondrous Scotch charm; it was a timely and a happy revival. Our wonder always is that our little orchestra can render us so much of the life of these good things.

Next Wednesday the Orchestra are again obliged to omit the concert; but on the following Wednesday, March 15, they will play Liszt's "Preludes", and what that lacks of being a symphony will be made good, we doubt not, in the performance of Mendelssohn's admirable Violin Concerto by Mr. HENRY SUCK, his first appearance as a soloist since his return from studies in Europe.

MUSIC HALL ORGAN. The Wednesday and Saturday afternoon, and Sunday evening concerts are still continued, and with a goodly number of listeners, whenever the weather is inviting. The organists of the past month have been Mrs. Frohock, Mr. Whiting, Dr. Tuckerman, Mr. J. K. Paine, Mr. Morgan, Mr. Lang and Mr. Willcox. Mr. Paine's return to the organ has been most welcome to the lovers of real organ music, and both he and his master, Bach, are gaining ground even with many who make no pretension to classical taste or knowledge. He has played thrice during the month. Bach has been pretty largely represented in the whole course of concerts. Mrs. Frohock and Mr. Whiting, also, have each played three times, and always very acceptably. A more particular review we hope to give in our next.

Review.

Album-Blätter, by CARL WOLFSOHN. (G. André & Co., Philadelphia.)—These six little pieces for the piano, "Album Leaves," show such delicate and true musical feeling as is not very often found in the "original" compositions published in this country. Several of the ideas are happy, and the structure and the general tone artistic. In character they vary with their titles. "Vergissmeinnicht" (Forget me not) is quiet and sustained; "Sehnsucht" (Longing), slow and as its name suggests; "Hoffnung" (Hope) is sunny, clear and lively, pleasing, if not particularly original; "Abschied" (Farewell) breathes out its song slowly, feelingly and tranquilly, the accompanying chords being at length reflected up above the melody into the aerial octaves. "Trauer" (Grief) is very slow and melancholy, and, we fear, a little harsh and unwinsome in some of its harmonic steps. "Trost" (Consolation), mystical and tender, is perhaps the best.

1. Inquietude; 2. Eloge; 3. La Belle Americaine, by KARL MÉRZ (Nos. 1 and 2, published by G. D. Russell & Co., Boston; No. 3, by S. Brainerd & Co., Cleveland, O.).—Under these fanciful titles are separately printed three movements of a regular piano-forte Sonata, marked Op. 50! We wonder if all the 49 preceding opera have been equally classical in form. The first Allegro ("Inquietude"), in C minor, after a short Andante preface, starts off quasi Presto, and is developed in a perfectly regular Sonata form. The example is worthy of praise, for such form is in itself interesting, although it is not a work of genius and the ideas are somewhat commonplace. But it is so much better than the thousand and one effect pieces which only aim at popularity! The Adagio has dignity and fulness, singing itself feelingly without running into poor sentimentality. The third movement (Rondo Scherzando) is in a brilliant bravura style, graceful and even genial, at least natural and pleasing, and not very difficult.

The Vocalist's Companion, by EDWARD B. OLIVER (O. Ditson & Co.).

Those who are acquainted with the history of Vocal Art have doubtless been interested in the remarkable career of the celebrated tenor Caffarelli, the elements of whose success were contained in a course of vocal exercises written by his master, Porpora, upon a single page of music paper. (See also "Consuelo"). The exercises of the Vocalist's Companion, with the accompanying instructions in attaquer, portamento, breathing, &c., were received by the compiler from the celebrated chor-master Miesch, of Dresden, by whom he was instructed, and who in his youth received the same exercises from his master, a pupil of Porpora. A suitable accompaniment has been adapted to them by Mr. Oliver, and their faithful, daily practice will prove a broad and firm foundation for whatever farther exercises may be desirable, and for the continued development and strengthening of the vocal organs. They fill a place unoccupied by other studies for the voice, and the oral instructions are here given fully for the first time in the English language, and will be appreciated by those who, remembering the fine style of Sontag, Lind, and Laborde, desire to follow in their footsteps.

There is trouble among Mr. Grover's operatic colony now in Philadelphia. Formes declines to sing, and thus necessitates the sudden changing of the opera. Besides this, "The Jewess" was given the other night with the part of Eleazar—the leading tenor role—omitted. Grover has issued a card in which he lays down these axioms:

"Opera is an exotic, or sensitive plant, of a peculiar and embarrassing nature. The illness, the indisposition, or the absence, from any cause, of any one of the numerous artists incidental to the cast of a grand opera, necessitates insurmountably a change. To direct grand opera for a considerable length of time, with any other path of preferment and profit open, is to merit—and most likely to receive—incarceration in a lunatic asylum.

"Especially is this the case in America, where the public regards with jealous eyes the slightest deviation from the public announcement."

Mr. Grover then announces a performance to which all the disappointed auditors of the previous incomplete representation will be admitted gratis.—Eve. Post.

GOTTSCHE appears to be in a melancholy mood, in spite of orders. During his present concert tour (that "farewell" tour that has been going on a year or two) his programmes bear this lugubrious "card":

"To my friends and the public:
"On the eve of my departure from this country—my native land—the land of my earliest affections—I feel that I must express my heartfelt regrets on parting with the public, whose kindness has sustained me throughout my public career. To all my friends, who have given me so many proofs of warm interest, I bid a fond farewell. The clouds that conceal the future are transparent and bright only in the morning of life. I have already come to the age when they show more deceptions than joys. Even, as I say to you all, farewell, methinks a distant echo faintly answers 'adieu!' A last, a long—farewell."

MILWAUKEE, WIS.—The Sentinel of Feb. 8, describes the inauguration of the new hall of the Milwaukee Musical Society,—a hall of which it is said that larger cities might be proud. The exercises were opened by John Nazro, Esq., who gave a brief sketch of music in Milwaukee, from the time when the Musical Society numbered sixteen persons, to the present time when it numbered over six hundred. He was followed by G. W. Allen, Esq., who spoke glowingly of the kindred inspirations of architecture and music. Then came a performance by the Musical Society (chorus and orchestra numbering 150 persons) of Mendelssohn's oratorio "St. Paul," Mr. Abel conducting.

The opening chorus showed satisfactorily the excellent drill of the singers; every sound in the vast body was exactly responsive to the wave of the conductor's baton. With one or two slight exceptions this perfection of discipline was observable throughout the oratorio. The choruses of the Hebrews, "Now this man," and "stone him to death!" were given with the utmost possible energy and exactness. The chorus of gentiles "O be gracious," is one of the best numbers of the whole piece—we think the most effective of them all. The instrumentation, always matchless with Mendelssohn, is here particularly interesting.

The solo parts were taken: Paul, by Mr. Neymann; Stephen, Mr. Jacob; and the two sopranos by Misses Babcock and Kavanagh; the mezzo soprano by Miss Brandeke. Miss Babcock created a more marked sensation than she had ever done before, being warmly applauded. Miss Kavanagh sustained her former reputation. The others elicited considerable applause. Mr. Neymann has some excellent lower notes, and sang with a good deal of style. His aria "O God have mercy upon me," was decidedly good.

Before the oratorio was concluded, some of the "cream" rose and left the hall, somewhat to the detriment of the final chorus, which is a fit climax to a composition so grand. The extreme length of the performance—some three hours—was doubtless the excuse for this untimely emueute.

Mr. Hans Balatka of Chicago, well known to all old residents of Milwaukee as the father of the Musical Society, and for many years its honored leader, was present, having come from Chicago for that purpose. Mr. Balatka expressed himself highly pleased with the chorus and general ensemble of the oratorio:

We have also the impressions of an anonymous correspondent after the same festival, of which the following choice specimen will suffice:

"The extreme length of the performance detracted somewhat from the merits of the composition" [indeed], "while an opera [!], which might have been given with no more expense attending, would have made a better impression. However, as the oratorio is better than nothing [!] I hope to see it repeated."

ST. LOUIS.—The programme of the third Philharmonic Concert (Jan. 3.), E. Sobolewski conductor, was as follows:—Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony; Recit, angel Trio and Chorus from Elijah; Introduction and Scene from "Jeanne d'Arc," for male voices, by C. K. Weber; Overture to Olympia by Spontini; Chorus: "O fly with me," Sobolewski; aria: "La Potenza d'Amore," Tadolini; Chapel scene and Finale from Masaniello.

The fourth concert (Feb 16), offered Schumann's B-flat Symphony (first movement only); overtures to Oberon and to the Poet and Peasant (Suppe); a violin solo; a male Quartet by Kreutzer; Beethoven's Hallelujah chorus; Finale (vocal) from the 1st act of Cherubini's Wassertrager; Entr' act and chorus from 2nd act of the Huguenots.

SAN FRANCISCO.—A Philharmonic Society has been organized in the "golden gate" city. It is an association of professional musicians (instrumentalists), for "mutual improvement and the advancement of the interests of the Art," and proposes series of subscription concerts, like other Philharmonic societies, in which the "works of the great masters" will be produced. The first concert took place at Platt's new Music Hall, on Wednesday afternoon, Jan. 11, with the following programme:—Inauguration March, composed expressly for this concert, G. Koppitz; Overture—"Egmont," Beethoven; Scene and Aria from "Der Freischütz," Weber, Mlle. Louisa Tourny; Symphony—"Jupiter," Mozart; Overture—"Poet and Peasant," Suppe; Hymen's Feier Klaenge, Lanner; Cavatina—"I Lombardi," Verdi, Mlle. Louisa Tourny; Grand Potpourri—"Paganini in China," Massak; Finale—Gallop, Faust.

ANOTHER GREAT ORGAN.—The Messrs. HOOK, the celebrated organ builders of this city, have contracted with the trustees of the Plymouth Church, (Henry Ward Beecher's), N. Y., to build them an organ of the largest dimensions, and to be of superior tone, compass and power. The contract price is $20,000, and the instrument to be finished by the 1st of January, 1866.—Boston Post.

WORCESTER, MASS.—The "Messiah" was performed in Mechanics' Hall about the first of February, by the Mozart Society, in aid of the Soldiers' Relief Society. The great Organ furnished the accompaniments. The Palladium says:

"Among the noticeable features of the evening's performance were Mr. Thayer's playing, previous to the oratorio, of Bach's Fugue in G minor, (No. 2), which was substituted for the overture to the Messiah; his performance of the Pastoral Symphony, and other points of interest in the oratorio; Mr. Whitney's excellent rendering of the ponderous bass-solos, which are seldom sung well; Miss Fiske's singing of the leading soprano airs; Mrs. Manroe's of the contralto solos.

The same Society are rehearsing the "Creation" for Fast Day.

"Stella" utters a mild complaint about the musical situation in these words:

In music this winter we have stood still, under the shadow of the great Organ. The experience of Boston, a year ago, gave us warning that such would be our fate; but in our joy to possess so noble an instrument, we accepted the future calmly; more especially as, in those first weeks of Organic excitement, we did have several first-class concerts, with real organ music that did one's heart good to hear—so far "up country," too! But—how much lies in that three-lettered stumbling block of a word! then came the sober reality, if not of an "organ-debt," of something very much like it, for the Mechanics' Association had incurred considerable expense in altering and repairing their Hall for the instrument, and were looking to the tuneless guest to pay its board-bill. In a word it was found advisable to have its harmonious "notes" convertible into "green-backs;" and so, however many of the Association regretted the necessity, it was decreed that the concert-field for the season should be leased to the Association alone. A series of concerts was projected in connection with one of our choral societies, and the consequence is that we are having the best music that can be furnished at such short notice, but not such as we trust another winter will bring to us. We have not a word to say against this series of concerts; we only deplore the necessity that shuts us out from all other music. When the series is finished—and we hope its pecuniary result will be satisfactory—then may this "winter of discontent" be made "a glorious summer," and the Hall and its Organ be opened to any and all who have music to offer worthy of the place!

Prince Poniatowski's "L'Aventurier" has been produced at the Lyrique, Paris; the libretto by M. de Saint Georges. The story is founded on one of the victories which France has acquired in the Mexican campaign. Rossini, Mme. Walewski, Mlle. Hausmann, and Augustine Brohans, Vicomte Darce, and Count Tallyrand-Perigord, Auber, and Gounod were present. The piece was an acknowledged success.

All reports from Berlin chronicle the repeated success of Mr. Charles Adams. He has recently been playing Manrico in the "Thyrotore"—the part, by the way, in which he stood his Probegastspiel, or dramatic examination, at the time when the General-intendant engaged him. The Manrico is peculiarly suited to Mr. Adams's voice, and we are not surprised at the impression he has made in it. At a late Court concert, at which Mr. Adams, Herren Woworski, Betz, Salomon, and Ole Bull and Damen Lucca, De Ahna, and Artôt appeared, their Majesties summoned Mr. Adams and felicitated him in the most flattering terms.—Orchestra.

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

The Arrow and the Song. M. W. Balfie. 40
A poem by Longfellow, with just the right music for it. The musician and the poet march well together.

What does little birdie say? Cradle Song. J. H. McNaughton. 30

The words are by Tennyson, who has composed a charming little nursery song,—not so easy a thing to do as you might think. The music is very sweet.

Up with the flag of the stripes and the stars! T. H. Howe. 30

A stirring patriotic lay.

Four sacred quartets, arranged from Beethoven. A. Davenport.

No. 1. Trust in God. Sopr. solo and quartet 30
2. O Lord, veil not thy face. 50

Quartet choirs, and quartets in choirs, will certainly be pleased with these pieces, which are arranged with great taste and skill. They have been already tried by good singers, and are not found wanting.

Love me, darling, love me long. Song. O. E. Dodge. 30

It is a pleasure to praise this really fine song; the more so, as Mr. D.'s extreme modesty and diffidence may prevent him from bringing its merits properly before the public. Decidedly good.

Instrumental.

Dolorsolatio Waltz. By W. Miller. 60

This composition (whose name one may possibly speak in one breath), is a sparkling one, containing among other things, "The Perfect Cure," and one or two other favorites, a fragment of a song about the famous Dolorsolatio, &c., and is, altogether, quite a taking piece.

God bless the Prince of Wales. Brinley Richards. 50
Mr. R. has introduced a number of agreeable variations on the new national air, none of them difficult, and the whole good for practice or performance.

Rappelle Toi. Bagatelle de Salon. G. Forbes. 30
A piece of no great difficulty, with a good, flowing melody, and a few measures of sparkling arpeggios.

The Russian Polka, arranged as a rondo, by F. Beyer. 30

A well-known Russian air, but newly and capably arranged, in rondo form. Moderately easy, and excellent for learners.

Slumber Song, for Piano. S. Heller. 20
One of the prettiest of lullaby songs.

Extravaganza Galop. C. Coote. 30
As its name denotes, rattling and brisk in character, but not difficult.

Books.

ELY. An Oratorio. Words selected and written by William Bartholemew. Music by Michael Costa. Cl. $2.50 Paper, $2.00

It was first performed at the Birmingham musical festival, in 1855. Without coming up to the level of the best works of the great masters it is new, meritorious, interesting, and, most of it, not especially difficult. Perhaps it will just fit the capacity of a number of our musical societies.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

WHOLE No. 625.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MARCH 18, 1865.

VOL. XXIV. No. 26.

For Dwight's Journal of Music.

On the Character of the German Operetta.

From "Das Deutsche Singspiel," &c., by H. M. SCHLETTENBERG.

Translated by KATHARINE FRANCES RAYMOND.

While we may say of the grand opera, that it arose from a union of tragedy and music, so we may regard the Singspiel as an alliance between music and comedy. This musical melodrama, or operetta, is usually of lesser dimensions than the opera, its subjects ordinarily taken from common life, its meaning worked out in a facile manner; its characters,—although they should always be poetically sustained,—such as we are not unlikely to encounter in the street or in society. While it voluntarily renounces the purely lofty and ideal, but without giving up a certain idealization, it moves principally in a national, civic, or rustic sphere. Music is ordinarily interspersed with dialogue; but this is not its principal distinction from the opera, for in Italian operettas there is no dialogue. This interchange of song with speech, always unpleasant to the ear, necessarily concentrates all the lyric element in the musical numbers, and this causes the prose to appear still more prosaic. This clinging to dialogue is only explicable by the bad pronunciation of our singers, which, in uninterrupted song, would render the text, and consequently the whole business of the piece, unintelligible. Originally, when the operetta was rather a comedy interspersed with singing, it was customary to excuse the introduction of the vocal pieces by a general summons to sing, or by the reminder that a promise to sing something had been given, &c. As the necessity for vocal numbers of greater consequence became felt, concerted pieces and finales were added to the songs and ariettas.

The character of operetta music is above all things national, intelligible, pleasing and simple; half gay, half pathetic, finely or broadly comic, it is yet pre-eminently the servant of joy. The business should move forward in a quick and lively manner; the characters must be distinctly marked; poet and composer must never forget that they are working for the general public. The former must know how to invent popular forms with facility; the latter must clothe them in natural and familiar expression. The operetta soon became the rendezvous of the fabulous and wondrous—although not in the sense of the later romanticists—of the pathetic and comic; an extract of drama, spectacle, comedy, and farce. Knights and squires, witches and kobolds, fairies and enchanters, shoemakers and barbers, doctors and apothecaries, fools and pedants, dunces and sharpers, tender lovers and kind-hearted or blustering uncles, sympathizing aunts and quarrelsome cousins, nephews, nieces, and wards, servants, peasants, soldiers; such are the characters which it presents to us. Always a child of its day, no matter how serious may be its object, it is never without cheerful and comic elements. But as comicality always changes with time and place, and is only a reflection of the general grade of cultivation in the public, we may understand the sometimes almost incredible success and immediate fall into oblivion of most of these works; and as they are nearly always written with a view to passing occurrences, and grow up exclusively from the time, which gives them their enlivening elements, judgment and valuation of them is difficult. He who has not lived, and even felt at home in the living, feeling, thinking of a certain period of a certain people, yes, sometimes even of a certain city, can never obtain a broad and unfailing judgment upon these peculiar musical creations.

The great mass of the public turned with exclusive preference to the operetta. If a great part of any audience is willingly moved to tears, to admiration, to deep emotion, even to a feeling of horror,—still, those characteristics which are the distinctive mark of the grand opera, and which lend to it its principal charm, such as lofty and powerful characters, proud kings, and blood-thirsty tyrants, rebels and heroes, violent and unfettered passions, battles, pompous decorations, &c., will never eventually outweigh the attractions of the operetta. Jest and caprice, wit and humor, tenderness and roguish mischief, love's torments and nonsensical jokes, patriotism and homely prudence, apparitions and wonders that are not too alarming or inexplicable, all the small but essential parts, from which the operetta takes its graceful and alluring form, are certain to obtain the victory. At the same time, the true operetta is never defiled with the vulgarities of low life; it preserves, or should preserve, under all circumstances and even in its broadest humor, a character of refinement, elegance, attraction, and perhaps of elevation and nobleness. The very nature of music is an assistance of peculiar value to subjects of this mixed kind; for although at one moment it seems exactly suited to the expression of passion, pathos, or gaiety, the next instant it lends additional force to clever farce, and gives such a charm to the comic and laughable, that its power goes far beyond that of speech, pantomime, or dance. Certainly, to a nice and correct use of music, a fine tact and an intelligent handling of means must be united. It would be a ridiculous violation of good taste, should a composer, in order to enhance a comic effect, imitate in music the bray of the donkey, for example. True musical comic effect lies in a witty and whimsical contrast between jest and earnest, in childlike, naïve delineation of intricate yet cheerful moods of humor, and of the pleasing accidents of ordinary life. But in spite of all these acquirements, the musical drama remains simple, modest, unassuming, as if sprung from a cheerful mind, intelligible and national. Making no pretensions to the finer and more subtle artistic form of the grand opera, neither does it ask the highest qualifications from its representants.

It is a pity that operetta composition has almost gone out of fashion in our day. Our composers will write nothing but grand operas, musical dramas full of unfathomable originality, models of astonishing effects. And even when one of our masters has written a work that is nothing more than an operetta, a Singspiel, he will not condescend to baptize it as such. It is true that the composers of our day are deficient in those requisites necessary to the production of a successful operetta; facile invention, flowing melody, natural song, measured, unsought, and yet original expression, and clever technic. Here, in short, there is no question of creations that aim at immortality, a by-path into which one is so apt to stray when a great work is undertaken (though it would be wrong to say that an immortal operetta is an impossibility); here new and undreamed of harmonies are not to be revealed, or as yet unexisting combinations of chords to be invented; here the most refined orchestral combinations are matters of secondary consideration. The dramatic music of to-day is, with some rare exceptions, the product of reflection, calculation, and effort; in the fullest sense of the word, a child of sorrow. Gone is the enchanting humor, the roguish caprice, the naïve naturalness, the penetrating, exciting nationality of the past.

One consequence of this desire for originality, this stifling reflective force of our day, is a great parsimony in the production of extensive works, which is the more to be regretted, as it is but seldom that one of the few that are brought out here and there attains a thoroughly genuine success. It was very different formerly. The true operetta composer, carelessly throwing new and merry tunes to the wind every day, was able to create innumerable works; the charge of overwriting, which people are so ready now-a-days to lay to the account of every productive talent, was not then so quickly pronounced upon the man who, working swiftly, did not suffer eternal labor pains, and who wished to move his audience to other feelings than those of fatigue and satiety. Children of their time, and thoroughly fitted to that day alone, the operettas, that once warmed our fathers to rapture and enthusiasm, have disappeared almost without a trace in the shadows of oblivion. It is seldom that we encounter one of them in pianoforte arrangement or an old score; still more rarely do we meet such pieces on the stage; and yet, setting aside the fact that we find much that is antiquated in them—it must necessarily be the case with such works—we cannot refuse our respect to these, for us, almost fabulous masters, on account of their powers, their knowledge, and the robust substance that even our over-strained demands must recognize in their music, which it is impossible for us to hear without receiving a deep impression, in spite of all our prejudices. Compare this music of then and now, and who can resist a sentiment of melancholy?

Among the many composers belonging to the flourishing period of German operetta, twenty or thirty of them, such as Von Klauer and Wenzel Müller, left nearly 200 pieces behind them. What a power of creation, what imagination, what freshness of intellect must be required to form such a multitude of musical works! It would be unfair to use the strictest judgment in regard to the separate achievements of such immense productivity, and it would be absurd to expect perfection and value in all of them; much is worked out easily and superficially, but almost every work of the above named composers, bears witness to the talent, versatility, and even a certain geniality in them; as a proof of this, I need, to be credited, merely mention the "Doctor and Apothecary," "Little Red-cap," "The Nymph of the Danube," "The Devils' Mill," "The Sisters of Prague," &c.

If we speak a word here in favor of works, and, of an aim, such as the composers of our day regard with little esteem, and even with contempt, let us not be misunderstood. We also are thoroughly convinced, that art in general, and music in particular, does not exist merely to flatter the senses, to lend an added charm to the passing moment, to be made use of as an opportunity of empty enjoyment, of indulging caprice or fashion. No, the end and scope of music is higher and holier. But let us not forget, that while lofty and earnest striving is the particular vocation of art, it is also her mission to brighten and beautify our poor existence with flowers of joy, to dissipate our cares, to animate us to new industry; and that when she thus becomes the provider of noble pleasure, she fulfils by no means the smaller part of her purpose. The providential foresight that gifted us with the blessing of art, intended her to be a consoler, a joy bestower, a graceful and enlivening associate in our lives. From this point of view, the German operetta has as perfect a right to exist, as the children of spring, and the brilliant butterflies that dream away their short hours of life within and about their chalice. If we acknowledge this, we must doubly regret that the freezing coldness and dryness of our day should stand in the way of a new growth and bloom of operatic music; and we must hope that a less blasé public, one with more capacity for enjoyment, and less pretentious, and more easily productive composers than we now possess, will again turn their sympathy and attention to this genre of composition.

The text of the German operetta was often translated from the Italian, French, and English. Our German authors found great difficulty in attempting to attain the experience and acquaintance with the stage which we find in the libretto poets of other nations, both in regard to invention and execution; indeed, we may say, that they are, even to-day, nothing but pupils of the others. The poetic humor of the English, the airy grace of the French, the jovial merriment of the Italian, are equally removed from them. What they themselves invented was only too often blunt, trivial, incongruous, and disconnected. The music of the old German operetta is usually far better than the text; and perhaps one reason why they are not fully enjoyable to us, lies in the fact that the plot, the action, the whole invention and arrangement of them strikes us as stupidly contradictory. But a need for them existed; the public wanted to see and hear, the musician to compose them; so they took hold of anything; and no composer was unwilling to set to music, anew, a text that others had frequently composed for before him. Manifold were the new musical settings by many composers to operetta texts by Brandes, Bretsner, Gotter, Michaelis, and especially Göthe.

Beethoven and the Various Editions of his Works.

Beethoven's Works in the Edition Published by Breitkopf & Härtel.

BY OTTO JAHN.

(Continued from page 408.)

Beethoven had an idea, on various occasions, of publishing a collective edition of his works himself. In the year 1816, a proposal was made him, by the firm of Hoffmeister in Leipsic, to bring out an edition of all his pianoforte compositions, but nothing came of it. No better result followed his negotiations with Steiner and Co., of Vienna, who wished to take his collected works, and bind him to make over exclusively to them, for a certain stipulated tariff of remuneration, all that he might subsequently write. But Beethoven never abandoned his purpose. In the year 1820, he still entertained it, as is proved by the Note-Books; and in the summer of 1825 he wrote to the music-publisher, Peters, of Leipsic, after placing at his disposal several unpublished compositions: "More than all this I have at heart the publication of my collected works, as I should like to superintend it while I am alive; I have, it is true, had many proposals made me, but there were difficulties scarcely to be removed by me, and which I neither would nor could fulfil. In two years, nay, possibly in one year, or in a year and a half, I would, with the requisite assistance, manage, or entirely edit, the publication of the work, and furnish a new composition of each kind, for instance, a new book of Variations in the Variations, a new book of Sonatas in the Sonatas, and so on, for every kind in which I have ever done anything, a new book; and for all this, together, I demand ten thousand florins, sterling coin." It is not quite clear whether, in this instance, any thing more than a collection of the pianoforte compositions was intended, but the idea of a more extensive undertaking was entertained by Matthias Artaria. It appears from the negotiations carried on between him and Beethoven towards the end of the year 1823, that he desired to begin with the publication of the works for pianoforte alone: these were to be followed by the compositions with accompaniment, a volume of about thirty sheets to appear every month, and all the overtures to be in score; nothing is mentioned about Symphonies or vocal music. As Beethoven did not close with this project, an old and tried friend, Andreas Streicher, addressed him, in the September of the following year, a fresh proposition. "I have frequently reflected on your position," he writes, "and especially how and in what way you might derive greater advantages from your extraordinary talent. I now take the liberty of submitting this to you, and, actuated by genuine good feeling, beg that you will subject to serious consideration what you read here." The first proposal relates to regular subscription concerts, to be got up in the winter by Beethoven. "The second thing I propose, which it depends entirely on you to carry out, and which, if carried out, must bring in at least 10,000 florins current coin, or 25,000 florins Viennese—is an edition of all your works, like the edition got up by Mozart, Haydn, and Clementi, of theirs. This edition would be announced, too, as to be published by subscription, or for prepayment, and, according to the number of persons paying beforehand, an agreement concluded with the publisher who offered the most advantageous terms. If in your announcement you mention, 1: that you intend to alter here and there, and arrange for the instruments now in use, all the pianoforte compositions written previously to the introduction of pianofortes of 5 1-2 octaves, and if, 2: you add to the pianoforte things some few unpublished works, this edition ought to be regarded as a completely fresh and newly composed work, and would have to be purchased even by those possessing your earlier works. The affair cannot possibly occasion so much trouble for you not to be able to undertake it. It is a duty you owe yourself, your nephew, for whom you can then more easily do something, and posterity. Receive what has been said as the sentiments of a friend, who has known you for quite six-and-thirty years, and whom nothing would so much delight as to see you free from anxiety." Like all other advice, this friendly counsel was prevented by Beethoven's want of resolution in practical matters from being carried into execution, though the project of a collective edition was always cherished, being made, in the year 1826, the subject of verbal negotiation with Schlesinger of Berlin, during his visit to Vienna, and afterwards of written negotiation with Schott of Mayence, but, as usual, without any result.

We need scarcely regret this want of practical results, for an edition, as perfect and dependable as that now offered us, would then have been hardly possible. No one would have had the courage to publish in score all the vocal compositions, headed by Fidelio; the great instrumental works; and the Concertos. It seems as though the unusual success achieved by the performances of the A major Symphony and of the Battle Symphony in 1812 and 1814, first caused it to appear practicable at once to publish symphonies in score, for at that time they used to be lithographed in a rather modest form. The subsequent compositions of the same kind were also immediately published in score, but the scores of by far the majority of the earlier Symphonies, Overtures, and Quartets, now to be found on the desk of every student in a Conservatory, were printed by degrees, and most of them not till after Beethoven's decease: the score of Fidelio was first printed, with a French translation, in Paris, and then, but not till long afterwards, by Simrock in Bonn.

The fact of Beethoven's taking an active share in the publication would have been attended by incalculable advantages in various important respects, and many difficulties, at present not to be solved, would never have existed as such; but there is cause for fearing that it would have been followed also by a considerable drawback, for Beethoven had a notion of lengthening certain parts of his compositions. We have already mentioned one species of alterations. A considerable number of the earlier pianoforte works are written for instruments of only five octaves, and we cannot help perceiving that, in many instances, this limited compass fettered the efforts of the composer. We can plainly see that in cases where a melody or passage is repeated in a position where the instrument is not high enough to reproduce it perfectly, changes have been necessitated by merely material obstacles. Many of the cases are so clear and simple that any judicious player can now himself make the transposition which is undoubtedly required. But in other places it is at least uncertain whether, in addition to the limited compass of the instrument, there were not other and inward motives which brought about the change, while lastly, there is no deficiency of passages, where the alteration, even when occasioned by material necessity, has called forth some new beauty, or lent the whole a peculiar charm, which no one would now like to relinquish. A thorough revision of the earlier pianoforte compositions, so that the equality of parallel passages, such as some persons have really desired, should be strictly preserved according to the standard of the extended compass of the instruments, cannot, at present, be introduced into any edition; it is left to every player or teacher to decide what he thinks he must do to carry out Beethoven's intentions. To Beethoven himself the right of authentic interpretation would certainly have belonged; such a course of revision undertaken by him would have cut the ground from under that pedantry which pins its faith to mere literal fidelity, as well as from under the capricious love of alteration, and would, therefore have been valuable, even supposing that a beauty had, here and there, been sacrificed to consistency.

But it is not to be supposed that, if he had again gone through his earlier compositions, Beethoven would have limited himself to such harmless alterations, or that he would always have made no others. It is well-known that, in after years, he was not at all contented with many of them; he allowed that they were marked by "a certain amount of talent and good intention," but he grew angry if any one praised them. When, in the year 1814, he again took up his opera Fidelio, he wrote to Treitschke, the dramatic author: "But the whole operatic business is of the most wearisome description in the world, for I am dissatisfied with most of it, and there is scarcely a piece in which I should not have been obliged, here and there, to patch my present dissatisfaction with some sort of satisfaction." It is fair to assume that the pianoforte compositions would not have met with very different treatment, and the discrepancy between the conception and the realization would, no doubt, have come out with incomparably greater sharpness. However much magnificent new matter might have been introduced in detached cases, the works which not only marked the development of the composer's mind, but had become the common property of the musical public, whose education had been essentially advanced by them, would have been altered, and this would have been a certain loss, while the gain would have been doubtful. When an artist has once given his work to the public, and, through it, exercised a decided and permanent influence, he can no longer claim unconditional sovereignty over it: what strikes him, looking at the subject in the light of subsequent ideas, as an undoubted amelioration, in very few instances proves to be such, because the public have already taken a different position with regard to the work, and that position they maintain even when the originator himself of the work is concerned; very frequently, too, they are, in this, guided by the proper instinct for the something which operated in those works with primitive strength, and which they will not allow to be weakened by isolated ameliorations. The existence of genuine creative genius is, it is true, demonstrated by self-criticism going hand-in-hand with production—and, perhaps, in this respect especially, Beethoven is one of the most remarkable and glorious examples we have—this criticism, however, is inseparable from the process of creation; the one permeates the other; but towards a work of art when finished, and sent forth to the world, the criticism of the originator is not seldom partial. To what a depth, however, Beethoven was capable of introducing the critical knife is evident from the single fact that, as Schindler informs us, he seriously entertained the idea of entirely omitting Menuet and Scherzo from several Sonatas, in order, as he said, to attain greater unity!

(To be Continued.)

From Novello's Musical Times, Feb. 1.

Two Musical Biographies.

Louis Spohr's Autobiography the German London: Longman & Co.
Furioso; or Passages from the Life of Ludwig van Beethoven.
From the German. Cambridge: Deighton, Bell & Co.
London: Bell & Dally.

SPOHR.

Of the two works lying before us, the life of Spohr undoubtedly claims our principal attention. Not only because, unlike the second on our list, it traces the life of a great artist from birth to death, but because it is an autobiography, and consequently liable to no shadow of doubt as to its authenticity. Spohr's own hand traces his career from his childhood to the year 1838; and from this date to the time of his death the events are narrated from diaries kept by his wife, and reliable materials furnished by other members of his family.

The early life of Spohr showed that genius such as he possessed must break through all the barriers opposed to his progress. His father had originally intended him for the medical profession; but having purchased a violin at the yearly fair, his enthusiastic little son practised upon it so vigorously that he soon learned to play the melodies he had been accustomed to sing; and after receiving a few lessons from Herr Riemenschneider, he relates that he was so elated at the sound he could produce simultaneously on all four strings that he hastened into the kitchen to his mother, and arpeggiated the chord to her so incessantly that she drove him out of the room. After various hard battles with his grandfather, "whose idea of a musician," he says, "was limited to that of a tavern fiddler who played to dances," he was allowed to take lessons in composition; and produced, at a very early age, duets for two violins, which he played with his master at his father's musical soirées.

"To this day," he writes, "I recollect the proud feeling of being already able to appear before the friends of the house as a composer. As a reward, I received from my parents a gala dress, consisting of a red jacket, with steel buttons, yellow breeches, and laced boots with tassels, a dress for which I had long prayed in vain." It was whilst at school, too, that he made the first attempt at the composition of a little opera, the text of which he took from Weisse's Kinderfreund. "It may be mentioned," he says, "as characteristic, that I began with the title-page; and first of all painted it very finely with indian ink; then followed the overture, then a chorus, then an air, and then the work came to a stand-still."

We dwell upon these trifles in the youthful days of our artist because we here see so much of that peculiar character in the child, which afterwards strengthened and developed in the man. The minuteness of attention which he bestowed upon the title-page of his juvenile opera is to be traced in the composition of his ripest works; the violin bought at the "yearly fair," laid the foundation of one of the soundest schools of violin playing the world has yet seen; and we are inclined to think that much of that inward pride in his own achievements—which too often shuts out the power of duly appreciating the efforts of others—is to be seen when he strutted about in his "gala dress," given him as a reward for his performance of his own composition, which, even at a much later period of his life, he describes as "incorrect and childish," but possessing "a certain form and a flowing melody."

His patron, the Duke of Brunswick, deserves every credit for so carefully fostering the talent which he foresaw must one day make itself known throughout the world. To the great annoyance of the Duchess, who could not bear her game at Ombre to be disturbed, the young violinist continually played at the court concerts, which were given in the apartments of the Duchess; and as cards and music did not agree, a thick carpet was spread out under the orchestra to deaden the sound, the leader left out the trumpets and kettle-drums, and insisted that no forte should be played in its full strength. This expedient for enjoying the cards at the expense of the music seems to have been seldom resorted to when the Duke was present. "One day," however, Spohr writes, "when the Duke was not there, and for that reason nobody was listening to the music, the prohibition regarding the forte being renewed, and the dreadful carpet again spread, I tried a new concerto of my own. I can only call these performances rehearsals, because no preparation was ever made beforehand, excepting on the days upon which we knew that the Duke would be present. Engrossed with my work, which I heard for the first time with the orchestra, I quite forgot the prohibition, and played with all the vigor and fire of inspiration, so that I even carried away the orchestra with me. Suddenly, in the middle of the solo, my arm was seized by a lacquey, who whispered to me, 'Her Highness sends me to tell you that you are not to scrape away so furiously.' Enraged at this interruption, I played, if possible, yet more loudly; but was afterwards obliged to put up with a rebuke from the Marshal of the Court."

Being asked by the Duke to choose a teacher from amongst the great violinists of the day, he at once named Viotti; but on being applied to in London, it appeared that he had set up as a wine-merchant; and it is related of him that, on being asked by a nobleman why he had abandoned his art and become a dealer in wine, he replied, "My dear sir, I have done so simply because I find that the English like wine better than music." Ferdinand Eck, who was then in Paris, was next written to on the subject; but he declined to give lessons; and eventually the young Spohr became a pupil of Francis Eck, a brother of the great violinist, and immediately started with him on an artistic tour to St. Petersburg. The details of this journey are full of interest; and no doubt on his return to Brunswick his talents had so far ripened as to justify him at once in aiming at the highest position in his profession, both as a composer and an executant. During his next tour he was appointed concert-master at Gotha, where he was married to Dorette Scheidler, an eminent performer on the harp; and in his diary the account of his courtship and betrothal is placed before the reader with that child-like simplicity which formed an integral portion of his character to the day of his death.

Whilst in the zenith of his fame, he travelled through Switzerland and Italy, giving concerts with his wife, and establishing his fame in all the principal cities. As a composer, too, he was most prolific, the journal recording the names of many works which were produced during his travels, some of which still live, but many of which have sunk into obscurity. Indeed, it is during these bright days of his early life that we cannot but see how much he had narrowed his ideas on art; and—unlike Mendelssohn, who thirsted for fresh inspiration wherever he could find it—how thoroughly he worked on the model formed at the outset of his career, and regarded all who departed from his standard as inbreds in art. Impatient of advice, he worked in solitude; and, though a giant in his strength, he was merely placidly indifferent to those who doubted it. No man perhaps ever held a higher opinion of his own powers; and even where a composition of his did not satisfy him, he could not endure that others should think the same. After playing one of his quartets on one occasion, Romberg said to him, "Your quartets will not do yet; they are far behind your orchestral pieces." Much as I agreed with him, Spohr continues, "yet it wounded me to hear another express that opinion. When, therefore, a few years afterwards, I wrote some quartets in Vienna, which seemed to me more worthy of my other compositions, I dedicated them to Romberg, in order to show him that I could now write quartets 'which would do.'"

As a critic on contemporary composers, Spohr, as we have before mentioned, was illiberal; and, as time has proved, utterly wrong. Formed on the model of Mozart, he at once rejected all whose compositions soared beyond his ideal of the dignity of art. It is not to be wondered at, therefore, that he was totally unable to comprehend the meaning of Beethoven's later works; and especially looked upon the ninth symphony as trivial and utterly unworthy of being wedded to the poetry of Schiller. It will scarcely be credited that he broadly asserts, after hearing this composition, that he is now firmly convinced of what he before remarked in Vienna, that Beethoven is "wanting in æsthetic feeling, and in a sense of the beautiful." Weber's operas he could not endure; and of Rossini he remarks, that "had he been scientifically educated, and led to the only right way by Mozart's classical master-pieces, he might readily become one of the most distinguished composers of vocal music of our day; but as he now writes, he will not raise Italian music, but much rather lower it." This strange desire to cut down genius of all kinds to one recognized pattern, would seem strange indeed, were it not upon record that much of this criticism upon his fellow artists' arose, in reality, from the total want of interest he felt in the contemporary composers, a fault by no means limited to Spohr, since in his own account of a meeting with Beethoven, he remarks: "He spoke of music but very seldom; when he did, his opinions were very sternly expressed; and so decided as to admit of no contradiction whatever. In the works of others, he took not the least interest; I therefore had not the courage to show him mine."

His first journey to London, his performance at the Philharmonic Society, and his concert at the New Argyll Rooms in June, 1820, will call up many reminiscences of the state of music in England at that time; and Sir George Smart, who conducted his first concert on this occasion, will read with interest his description of the excitement in London on that morning, on account of the entry of Queen Caroline into the metropolis, to make her defence before Parliament. That Spohr was warmly received by the artists of England is fully attested by his own journal; but his meeting with Rothschild is too good to be past over, in proof of the British mercantile view of art. After glancing over the letter of recommendation which Spohr handed to him: "I have just read," he said (pointing to the Times), "that you managed your business very efficiently. But I understand nothing of music; this is my music (slipping his purse), they understand that on the exchange. Upon which, with a nod, he terminated the audience. But just as I had reached the door, he called for me: 'You can come and dine with me, too, out at my country house!'"

We omit what is said of the production of Spohr's Oratorios in England, of his death in 1859, and of the merits of his works, as matters more familiar to the reader, who is probably more curious to know what the romantic volume about Beethoven amounts to: fair game, we fancy, for one of those indignant, scorching criticisms of our friend A. W. T., whose very initials should be a caution to the sentimental romancers who trifle with the lives of great composers.]

BEETHOVEN.

With every respect for the good faith of Professor Wegeler, on whose private diary the strange work called Furioso is based, we must confess to a feeling of disappointment when we find that, instead of detached passages in the life of Beethoven, the book is dressed up in the form of a narrative. It is difficult to conceive how Dr. Wolfgang Müller, to whom the diary was presented by Professor Wegeler in his last illness, could have gained the knowledge of Beethoven's thoughts, feelings and actions, day and night; and have the power of relating conversations with individuals at all times, when, according to Wegeler's own account, he was not himself present. The opening chapter of the book is conventional enough to usher in a common-place Romance. "One bright June morning," it commences, "in the year 1782, might have been seen among the low grounds at the foot of the Seven Mountains, lying between Königswinter and the Oelberg, a slight, well-grown youth, in the dress of a student of the period." The slight, well-grown youth is Professor Wegeler, who in his wanderings in search of plants and insects, is overtaken by a violent thunder-storm. The rain poured down in great heavy drops," (we are told), "the lightning was incessant, whilst the convulsed atmosphere sought relief in continued discharges of thunder." In the midst of this deluge of rain, Wegeler beholds "a short muscular form, whose long black hair and garments were alike the sport of the tempest." The "singular individual," as he is called, unmindful of the drenching he was receiving, proceeded with a stick, which he held in his right hand, to conduct the thunder storm: "Now an allegro!" he cried. A flash of lightning succeeded his command, terminating in a roll of continued thunder. "Adagio maestoso!" he then vociferated. And, apparently upon his bidding, followed an equally protracted growl of thunder. "Prestissimo furioso!" shouted the weather director; and exactly as if the heavens were really subservient to his commands, now resounded a tumultuous crash of elements, answering to a wild symphony, in which one strain or instrument strives to drown another." Students of Beethoven who would wish to trace, through the pages of Dr. Wolfgang Müller, how the "child" was "father of the man," may accept this as a fair specimen of the style of the book; and we can assure them that there is no little ingenuity displayed in forming a continuous story out of such materials as were furnished by the simple diary of Professor Wegeler. The introduction of the young Beethoven (or "Furioso," as he is nicknamed) to Count Waldstein, who becomes his firm friend; his intimacy with the Von Breuning and Von Honrath families, with all his love affairs, are told with surprising accuracy; as also his interview with the Emperor Joseph II., where he meets a "little man," with whom the Emperor is evidently on the most friendly terms.

"Have you already played Mozart's music?" demanded Joseph of Beethoven, winking at the little man.

"Certainly," answered the youth.

"And what is your opinion of him?"

"That he is the most melodious, graceful, and inexhaustible master that the world has ever known," said Beethoven. "Perhaps Sebastian Bach stands higher in church music, and Handel in Oratorios; but on the stage the Salzburg composer excels even Gluck in finish, and in a characteristic representation of individuals and scenes."

After Beethoven had played an air of Mozart's, upon which he extemporised some variations, and a pianoforte composition of his own, which the "little gentleman" pronounced "not only of the highest order, but original throughout," the climax is brought about with a thorough knowledge of effect, thus:

"And your conclusive opinion of this young Bonn musician?" asked the Emperor of his companion.

"He will be among the first masters of the art," he said emphatically; and he reached Beethoven his hand.

"And do you know who delivers this judgment?" said the Emperor, turning to the youth.

Ludwig looked steadily at the little man. "No," he answered.

"It is that of Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart," said the Emperor, with emphasis.

Beethoven's heart bounded within him.

The career of "Furioso" is carried on until the year 1791, when he settles down at Vienna, as Ludwig van Beethoven, at the age of twenty-one. It must not however be understood that upwards of two hundred pages can be filled with the bare facts to be found in Wegeler's diary; so that we have, in addition to a record of Beethoven's early life, a long history of the Abbey of Heisterbach, a glance or two at the political aspect of the time, an account of the founding of Bonn University, and many other matters which keep our hero waiting, and somewhat mar the effect of a continuous narrative. At the gates of Vienna Beethoven is left for fifty-three years; and in the next chapter Bonn is celebrating a festival in which a statue of the great composer, who died in 1827, is to be unveiled to musical honors. Men who knew him intimately, now grown old, but fresh in their love for his genius, meet and talk openly of the great departed. Franz Liszt, the conductor, raises his staff, "and chorus and orchestra burst forth in a hymn composed in memory of Beethoven, and arranged to suitable music." The bronze figure, revealed in the full sunshine, becomes the centre of attraction to the vast multitude. "Then one long continued shout rose up to heaven." So ends the book; leaving the impatient worshipper of Beethoven in doubt as to his power of separating Wegeler from Müller, so as to be justified in remembering the one and forgetting the other. We have been candid in our opinions respecting this work, because we feel that the life of an artist is a matter of the utmost importance to art; and that no trifling with facts for the sake of bookmaking should be permitted by those who have any power in guiding the public taste. That Furioso is of this class, we do not positively affirm; but we confess that the fine writing and melodramatic effects of Dr. Wolfgang Müller—even supposing that they were intended to ornament, and not to distort, the truth—do not prevent our regretting that the simple passages in the interesting diary of Professor Wegeler were not given to the world precisely as they were originally jotted down. We must add, in conclusion, that the work is exceedingly well translated; and that it is published in England with the full approval of Dr. Wolfgang Müller.

Music Abroad.

LEIPZIG. We have copied largely from the reports of the Gewandhaus Concerts; but they have interest enough to justify it: where else do we find programmes so full of choicest matter and of novelty? And now we are again indebted to the very faithful and intelligent correspondent of the London Orchestra for an account of one of the most interesting.

The fifteenth Gewandhaus Concert was one of the most enjoyable of the whole season. It commenced with Beethoven's Overture in C (Op. 124), written at Baden Baden in 1832 for the opening of the theatre in the Josephstadt suburb of Vienna, which took place on the Emperor Franz's "name-day." This grand composition, only less grand than the great Leonore Overture, is, as Marx says, more fitting for the consecration of a church than for the opening of a suburban theatre. In this overture Beethoven confessedly attempts to assume Handel's style; successful as he is in this, it is yet remarkable how Beethoven's individuality is everywhere to be felt; the younger giant may put on the older giant's robes, but his own figure is not to be concealed. In the rich sonority of the instrumental combinations he has been especially successful in imitating his model; this is a secret, the study of which should be more inculcated; it is not to be gained by employing noisy instruments, and by an extravagant use of ff's, but by an instinct for proportion, and by an intimate knowledge of the nature of each instrument or voice, so as to know what is the richest and fullest part of their registers. It is the mastery in this which makes Handel's music so effective, even when given by the handful of voices in a cathedral choir; while other composers deal with far larger masses, and even then are noisy, but not sonorous. A very curious effect is produced by the florid part given to the bassoons; but to bring it out duly the parts must be doubled, as is the case in the Gewandhaus. Exciting is the effect of the accelerando which ushers in the great double fugue, and brilliant is the coda which closes the overture. The performance was admirable—very different from that which the overture had to suffer when it was first heard; then no one knew his part; the parts were full of mistakes, and the composer himself, made more anxious by his increasing deafness, added to the confusion by holding back the time while trying to listen to what was going on.

The other orchestral composition was Haydn's Symphony in G, No. 7, of Bote and Bock's edition. This is one of the symphonies which has hitherto been heard but seldom. The first movement, it is true, is somewhat antiquated, but the other three are delightful—true sparkling gems, different as is the light which shines from each. So intense was the enjoyment that a repetition of the finale was demanded; it was played with such a "will" as to show that the performers were as delighted to tell the tales as the audience to listen.

The instrumental solos were intrusted to Herr Concert-director Joachim, who first gave us his new Violin Concerto in G. That it was marvellously played is a matter of course; the richness of the tone, and the combined pathos and fire of the player, lead the judgment captive for a time; but impartial re-fection decides that as a composition the concerto, interesting as it is in many parts, has not the symmetry, the completeness demanded by a work of art. As in Herr Joachim's other compositions, there is a wildness both of humor and of sadness, which seems to be innate with the Magyars; but there is also a feverish unrest, a disproportion of effect to means, which prevent unmixed enjoyment. Besides the concerto, Herr Joachim played a Barcarole and Scherzo, by Spohr, and a Bourrée and Double, and, upon being encored, the Garotte, Rondo, and Menuet (from the Sonata in E) by Bach. All of these were magnificently given; but most exquisitely beautiful of all was his playing of the Barcarole. The pleasure with which Herr Joachim was welcomed was increased by his being accompanied by his wife, who, as Fäulein Weiss, had already secured the good will of the Gewandhaus public by her fine singing. For this evening, she had selected airs from Handel's "Theodora," and Mozart's "Titus," and two Lieder by Schubert, Memnon and Der Lindenbaum. Frau Joachim has a rich mezzo-soprano, almost contralto, voice; the quality of the tone is of rare beauty; the management of the voice makes it evident that the singer has been trained in an excellent school. But far higher than any acquired powers are the mental endowments which give the special charm to this lady's singing; this was most shown in the delivery of Schubert's rarely heard Memnon song; it is long since I have listened to anything which has impressed me so deeply; such must have been the song of which the poet dreamt who first gave form to the deep mysticism of the Memnon myth.

Strongly as I am prejudiced against the Männergesang movement, I am yet quite willing to admit that if such societies are allowable anywhere, they are especially so in universities; the more so when they are so well conducted as the Pauliner Gesangverein of the Leipzig University, under Dr. Lange's direction. This society has just given its annual concert in the Gewandhaus, and, as is usually the case, has brought before the public new works by men of mark. The 150th Psalm for Männerchor, and great orchestra, by Franz Lachner, is an ambitious work; but unfortunately this composer is least effective where he wants to be grand; in a graceful style, as in his Second Suite for orchestra, he is masterly; but in the Psalm, not being able to command grand thoughts, he resorts to noise; the whole tone is too secular.

Of far greater interest are the "Scenes from the Frithjof-Saga" for soli, Männerchor, and orchestra, by Max Bruch. The text is a translation of parts of Bishop Tegner's poetical version of the old legend. The Bishop's poem has been translated into almost every European language. The events upon which it is based are said to have occurred in the 8th century, and the earliest written version dates from the 13th. The subject turns upon the persecution which the Norse hero Frithjof suffered from King Hølge, because he loved Ingeborg, the King's sister. Herr Bruch has divided his work into six scenes; in the first we have Frithjof's return from an adventure upon which he had been sent by Hølge, who had promised him Ingeborg if he were successful. In the second we see how the hero was deceived. Hølge had been defeated by the old King Ring, who also is in love with Ingeborg. To save himself from utter destruction, Hølge sends his sister to King Ring. In the third, Frithjof appears before Balder's temple; he tells the priests, who are waiting for Hølge's coming, that he has slain their king, and then tears from Balder's image the golden bracelet he had given to his betrothed, but which Hølge had forced from her and consecrated to the gods. In his rage he sets the temple on fire, burns down the grove, and is cursed by priests and people, and sentenced to banishment. Scene the fourth is devoted to Frithjof's departure from Norway, accompanied by his faithful followers; and the fifth, to Ingeborg's lament, who has watched the lessening sail, and caresses the falcon her lover had given her. The sixth and last scene is on the Viking's ship. Frithjof encourages his companions on the voyage, and promises to lead them to adventure and booty. Herr Bruch has made a great mistake in not adhering to his first intention of writing for a mixed chorus. Nothing but a positive necessity in the nature of the subject can justify the composer of an extended work in wilfully depriving himself of the materials essential to the construction of a perfect work of art. The higher voices are as essential to real choral writing as are the violins to orchestral. It is true that orchestral works have been composed where the violins are excluded, but the effect is very heavy. In these Frithjof scenes not only might female voices have been used, but there are places where they seem actually demanded, and where the effect would have infinitely gained by their employment. As things are now, it may be easier to find a good Männerchor than a mixed chorus; but no musician who has any love for his art, least of all one with so much talent as Herr Bruch possesses, should condescend to encourage a disastrous and downward movement. But passing over this most serious objection, the music is certainly of great, if not of equal merit. It would be disrespectful to the composer to speak in detail of a work upon which he has evidently bestowed much thought, after but a single hearing, and with no opportunity of studying it. Perhaps one of the weakest points is the want of clear, distinct melody in the solos. At the same time it is but fair to add that Ingeborg's lament is very touching. There are some fine passages in the march and chorus in the second scene, where Ingeborg is going sadly on her way to the hated King Ring, as also in the scene of the burning of the temple, and on board the Viking's ship. The instrumentation is effective, and the whole construction is full of interest. Herr Bruch is one of the younger composers whose career is worth watching. His work was warmly applauded. The solos were carefully sung by Fräulein Thelen of the Leipzig Theatre and Herr Sagemann of the Hanover Opera, who also sang the air "Now heaven in fullest glory shone," from the "Creation."

COLOGNE.—On Friday last we witnessed the performance of a new opera by Ferdinand Hiller, entitled "The Deserter." The popularity which the clever composer enjoys at Cologne is so great that any new work of his is sure of a warm reception, and a deserved success; but on this occasion, the interest shown was beyond the average. So far F. Hiller had been known only to the public as a composer of serious classical music, but he has now produced a work of an entirely different character. The new opera is light in subject and composition. The scene is in a German village, and the principal characters are—Liesel, the village belle; Mehul, her betrothed; his parents, the village schoolmaster, and a messenger. The plot to our mind, has a weak point, inasmuch as a "deserter" is the hero of the piece.

In spite of this little drawback, the piece is full of characteristic and entertaining situations, in each of which the composer does not fail to evince the versatility of his powers. The whole is full of fresh and original melodies. Several of these delighted the audience so much that they were most enthusiastically redemanded, and at the end of each of the three acts the composer (who, by the by, conducted as usual) was loudly called for, and, as he appeared before the curtain, was crowned with laurels; for real, substantial bays were thrown to him from all sides.

HANOVER. JOACHIM, the violinist, a great favorite of the old king, has resigned his position as Concert-director. The London Musical World has sifted the matter and arrives at the following explanation.

After Herr Kömpel, the Chamber-Musician, had left, Herr Joachim was officially requested to fill up the vacancy thus occasioned, and, from among several candidates, Herr Grün, then a member of the Ducal Chapel in Weimar, and not a pupil of Joachim's, was selected, with an express promise that he should eventually succeed to Herr Kömpel's appointment. Joachim's letter on the subject to Grün was written at the particular wish of the Intendancy, and the promise contained in it made upon authorization delegated for that object. There was no question of any qualification being required beyond the range of art. After Herr Grün had served with distinction several years as a member of the Royal Chapel, Joachim reminded the Intendancy of the obligation they had contracted to give Herr Grün a permanent engagement. He received from the Intendancy the astounding answer that insurmountable obstacles, consisting probably in the fact of Herr Grün's professing the Jewish persuasion, would be found to the appointment. Herr Grün, naturally feeling no inclination to continue a member of the Chapel, simply on sufferance, and without any hope of advancement, tendered his resignation. Joachim, on his side, finds it equally natural to perceive in the practical denial of his authority to make the offer an imperative ground for asserting his position by resolutely throwing up his place.

The costly contents of Meyerbeer's library, which hitherto were scattered and imperfect, have now been gathered and are to be assigned to the Royal Library, Berlin, according to the will of the late owner. The collection contains a valuable treasure, namely old, rare, and in many cases long-lost scores from the earliest days of opera, as well as many costly prints and manuscripts belonging to all ages of music. Only so assiduous an antiquarian as Meyerbeer, and one of equal means, could ever have collected these valuable works.

FELICE ROMANI, the writer of the librettos of Norma, La Sonnambula, Lucia di Lammermoor, &c., died recently, at Turin, after a short illness.

Musical Correspondence.

NEW YORK, MARCH 13.—Piano-forte playing has of late years been so prominent an element in our concerts, that it fast promises to become, not merely (what it is already, except when of the very highest stamp), a bore, but a positive nuisance, for which we can see no remedy except in some such law as that which has of late been passed in England, to the detriment of organ grinders, and to the delight of all who have ears to hear, and nerves to suffer. The principal cause of this excess of piano-forte study is, doubtless, to be found in the comparative ease with which a certain degree of perfection may be attained on the instrument, and the consequent security to the student of a means of daily bread in the exercise of his acquired dexterity. Another cause is, doubtless, the increased and continually increasing improvement made by various modern manufacturers in their instruments. A third, probably, is the mania among sheep of the human species to "follow the leader," for, piano playing is unquestionably "fashionable" in our day. Of course this mania will have its reaction, like all others; then we shall see the piano take its proper place among first-class concert instruments, though it will be less inordinately pre-eminent than in our day. At present, however, the violin, harp, &c., step decidedly into the background in the majority of concert programmes; while that noblest of all instruments, the human voice, seems to have been also infected with the vulgar epidemic of "execution" at all hazards, and is too often, when naturally fine, made a mere medium for shallow feats of flexibility, the result of patient study of mechanism, admirable in its way, but despicable when made the aim, and not the means, and then a certain proof of senseless, soulless lack of artistic inspiration. But all pianist concert-givers do not care to introduce even this rival, or shall we say, fraternal element into their programmes; with some of them, he or she is the singer most to be desired, who will "assist" for little or no compensation, and whose artistic, or executive merits are not likely to interfere with his claim to the admiration of the quiet connoisseurs, or the applause of the noisy trick lovers among his audience. It is not to be supposed that New York is free from what Heine has called "the piano-forte curse;" on the contrary, on looking over the concert programmes of this season, we find that concerts either given by pianists, or in which a pianist has been set forth as the principal attraction, have been so far in the largest proportion. Foremost, or most frequently to be heard among the pianists now before our public we find MILLS, WEHLI and PATTISON.

There are people, who, possessed of limited intellectual resources, are yet determined to penetrate into the world of art; although the sphere of mediocrity is that to which they really belong, although they are disregarded by all intelligent connoisseurs, they have boldness to make use of any means, by the aid of which they may attain a position, to which they have not the slightest claim by right of talent or knowledge. We honor the aspiring man; but in our day, only remarkable natural gifts and uncommon mental cultivation give a right to assume the title of artist; a position, resting on puffery alone, is only for the moment, and utterly valueless in the kingdom of art. Mr. PATTISON is not a musician from inward, spiritual necessity; but as a tradesman selects the business of a baker, shoemaker, tailor, etc., so has he chosen the piano-forte as his business. By means of an industry that does him credit, he has attained a moderate degree of technical facility, sufficient to impose on a certain class of people, but not enough to give him a right to step within the artistic circle, even on the score of an artist's least qualification, "execution." His playing is in the highest degree incorrect; he has a hard and disagreeable touch; while in quick passages of chords and octaves it seems almost a matter of indifference to him what keys he strikes. Not the faintest breath of poesy floats through his playing. Pattison has given several "Soirées Musicales" this winter; his repertoire consists in great part of pieces of his own manufacture. But he also honors the compositions of Mendelssohn, Chopin, and others, with his own very peculiar interpretation. His fourth soirée, however, completely outshone the rest. Here you have printed what he proposed to do, and what he actually accomplished:

Mr. Patterson takes pleasure in announcing that, in addition to the modern works for the Pianoforte, he proposes to present to the public (for the first time in this country) illustrations of the earlier schools of Pianoforte compositions extant in the 16th century, commencing with selections from Scarlatti, Chambonnières, Pergolesi, Rameau and Balbastre, he having secured an instrument similar to those used at that time to aid him in the more perfect representation of the music of that date. The instrument used was made one hundred and twenty years ago, in London, and is the Harpsichord and Piano combined. It was purchased by Mr. Jonas Chickering (the founder of the house) half a century ago as a curiosity, and is kindly loaned for these Soirées by Chickering & Sons. (Here follow the historical numbers of his programme):

4. { A. Gallardo. . . . . Chambonnières (born 1620)
5. { B. Sonate. . . . . Domenico Scarlatti, (born 1685)
6. { A. Grande Étude—op 10—No 12. . . . . Chopin
7. { B. Rhapsodie (octave study) . . . . . Dreychook
8. { A. Prelude. . . . . Sebastian Bach
9. { B. Andante and Minuet. . . . . Mozart

The reader will perceive that a century more or less does not matter to him. He advertises to commence with compositions extant in the 16th century, and yet Chambonnières, Scarlatti and Bach were born in the 17th. (The same date was advertised in large letters on our walls.) We heard the spinet; we heard Mr. Pattison play the compositions of the old masters thereon; and we convinced ourselves in that moment, that there is but one step from the sublime to the ridiculous. Pattison has not even an idea how to handle this respectable old instrument, or to interpret these old, and in their way, characteristic compositions. He renders the history of the piano as ridiculous as that of piano-forte composition. An old recollection came over us as we first listened to the sound of the spinet; a pleasant one, because it reminded us of the days of our first student years, when, free from cares and duties, we had to play our not always conscientiously practised Sonatas of Pleyel, Kozeluch, and Clementi, variations of Steibelt, Sterkel, Mozart, Nicolo, on just such an instrument, to our worthy teacher, the grumbling, stubborn old Cantor; unpleasant, because, with their recollection, a certain burning of the ears returned to us, and we involuntarily started back; for we feared lest Pattison's playing might conjure up the angry spirit of the departed Cantor. Had it done so, we are very sure that the modern pianist would have received such a chastisement, as would have entirely deprived him of the slightest desire to parody these works in such a manner in future.

The merit of the newly arrived pianist, WEHLI, consists in an uncommon mastery of the resources of mechanism with both hands. Scales, whether chromatic or diatonic, single, or in thirds, sixths, octaves, the various arpeggi, trills, etc., he accomplishes with much perfection and facility, in the most rapid time. He has the technical means at his command, wherewith to overcome the material obstacles of the most difficult compositions. But he is one of those virtuosos, whose hands we desire to see while he plays, because he does not touch the feelings in even the faintest degree. Where is the use of all the "execution" in the world, unless the poetic, soulful breath of life enlivens the tone form under the fingers of the performer? When we listen to Wehli, we say to ourselves: "He must have practised with wonderful patience and perseverance." But the only true virtuosity is that, in which we forget the player in his playing. He who cannot accomplish this, belongs to the category of vulgar rope dancers. M. Wehli plays his own compositions in preference. These pieces, however, do not deserve the name of compositions; they are concocted out of the most ordinary material, with the view of displaying this or that pianistic dif-faculty. However, M. Levi—we beg his pardon, M. Wehli—desires to make money; his public is also mainly formed from the amusement-seeking mass. The following "puff" which was prefixed, by the management we presume, to the programme, is a curiosity, even among those curiosities of humbug, imposture and puffery, which so fearfully corrupt the public atmosphere of New York. immortalize it by publication, Mr. Dwight; but when our grandchildren consult your musico-historical pages, heaven forbid they should conclude that, in our day, the New York musical public was entirely composed of ignorants, without the knowledge necessary to form an opinion of their own regarding the merit of an artist, though this must be decidedly the conclusion of the individual who framed the following:

Mr. Wehli will perform, this evening, his celebrated Fantasia on airs from Meyerbeer's Grand Opera, the Huguenots, pronounced by the Paris and London Musical Critics to be the chef d'œuvre of Pianoforte compositions. The passages, which consists of sixths and thirds, are such as have never been introduced in modern pieces; they have been considered an impossibility, but Mr. Wehli has overcome the difficulty, and performs them with perfect ease. There are certain passages taken alternately by each hand, but the subject is still preserved intact. The finale is a perfect hurricane of octaves, amongst which the Chacaré [Chorale] of the Opera is distinctly heard.

The Manager draws the attention of the public to this piece, it being a composition the playing of which seems incredible. When its performance took place in Paris before Erard, in the presence of Thalberg, Liszt, Rubenstein, Leopold De Meyer, Dreyshock and other most famous Pianists and Composers, it was considered the greatest feat ever performed on the Pianoforte.

Among the New York pianists Mr. MILLS takes a prominent position. And not merely on account of his finish as a virtuoso, but also that he endeavors earnestly to remain true to the spirit of art. His musical cultivation is not one-sided; he does not strive to awaken astonishment by means of this or that species of charlatanism, or to make a speculation out of it;—no, he appears to have a higher aim. He endeavors, by means of untiring perseverance, to become master of the greatest difficulties, and then use those means with a noble object in view: the worthy interpretation of the works of our great masters. Mr. Mills's taste is not one-sided; if he seems to have a preference for this or that master—and who has not his favorite?—he does not exclusively devote himself to any one composer. Whether he plays the works of the classic or modern romantic school, it is with the same care and attention. We may be occasionally of a different opinion with him in regard to the manner in which he interprets this or that composition, the tempo he takes, his rhythmic handling of the phrase, &c.; still he always gives so fine a picture of the idea laid down by the composer, that we must thank him for a noble enjoyment. If Mr. Mills continues to grow; if his intellectual and technical acquirements continue to keep step one with the other, we shall follow his artistic development with the greatest interest, and gladly see him enter the ranks among the greatest pianists of our day.

Mr. Mills is at present giving a series of soirées for pianoforte music; here is the programme of the first. It is quite unnecessary to say anything about the value of these compositions; each one bears the stamp of its gifted creator.

Rondo, for two Pianos. . . . . F. Chopin.
Sonata, in D. . . . . Scarlatti.
Prelude and Fugue, C minor. . . . . Bach.
Intermezzo, Op. 4, bk. 2. . . . . R. Schumann.
Allegretto semplice. . . . . Allegro moderato.
Finale Allegro.

Etudes { a. No. 7, Op. 25. . . . . } F. Chopin.
{ b. No. 5, Op. 10. . . . . }
Rhapsodie Hongroise, No. 10. . . . . Liszt.

While we are on the subject of pianists, we cannot omit mentioning the name of one of our resident artists, who is only too seldom heard in public—especially since he has just given us that opportunity—we mean Mr. RICHARD HOFFMANN. In the Philharmonic concert of last Saturday evening he played Beethoven's Concerto in C minor. Mr. Hoffmann, in appearance and manner, as well as in his playing, makes the favorable impression on his audience of a modest, amiable, and conscientious artist. Without attempting to make a "sensation" in any way, he seems busied with the task alone. He played the concerto with correctness; every passage and trill clear and pure; in short, the whole composition was well interpreted. The only thing we could have desired in addition, was rather more breadth and passion in some places, even at the expense of a few false notes; Mr. Hoffmann's delivery was a little too elegant, especially in the first movement—Beethoven strikes as with an iron mallet sometimes—but it is always done with art, of course. Mr. Hoffmann's technical capabilities are uncommon, but he is too sparing of his fine talent; art needs all her apostles to preach the true Evangel, for we have too many Pharisees here, who defile the temple. Here is the programme of the Philharmonic concert:

Symphony No. 1, in E flat. (1st time). . . . . Haydn.
1. Adagio and Allegro con spirito. 3. Minuetto.
2. Andante. 4. Allegro con spirito.
"Frates Ego," Chorus for mixed voices. . . . . Palestrina.
German Liederkrans of New York.
Under the direction of Mr. Agteil Paq.
Third Concerto, for the piano, Op. 37, in C minor.
Beethoven.

1. Allegro. 2. Largo. 3. Rondo Allegro.
Mr. Richard Hoffman.
PART II.
Overture, "Medea," Op. 22, in F minor, (1st time).
Bargiel.
"Credo," from the Grander Mass, for mixed Chorus. . . . . Liszt.
Orchestral accompaniment.
German Liederkrans of New York.
Overture, "Le Carnaval Romain," Op. 9, in A. . . . . Berlioz.
Conductor, Mr. Carl Bergmann.

The overture, to "Medea," written by a comparatively young, and not widely known composer, is in every respect a noble work. The influence of Schumann is not to be mistaken in the composition; but it is not so conspicuous as to be detrimental to its originality. This overture bears witness to the genial talent, and studious cultivation of its author, and lends us to expect much that is remarkable from him. The Liederkrans sang badly on this occasion, and the director of the society did not appear to have the faintest idea of the spirit of Palestrina's music. Again, Liszt's Credo would have gained much more, had the director's baton been given to the hand of M. Bergmann. At least, we might then have had some inkling of what Liszt intended when he wrote that Credo; at present we are in total darkness on the subject.

The principal event of the Italian Opera season, of late, has been the production of Verdi's latest opera, "La Forza del Destino." As to the plot, suffice it to say, that it is a horrible one, more horrible than tragic in the noble sense; that while the incidents of the libretto offer much opportunity for brilliant stage effects, there is a great deal in the book that causes such interest as it awakens, to tire; and the whole needs important cuts and alterations, before it can become thoroughly successful with even that superficial class of opera goers, to whom Verdi's operas are especially dear. The music is full, not only of reminiscences, but of proofs palpable of Signor Verdi's study of Wagner, Gounod, and Weber. We never regard it as a sign of deficiency of genius or native originality, when a youthful writer at first shows a disposition to tread in the steps of his gifted predecessors; on the contrary, we regard it as a mark of that studious diligence, that reverence for lofty ideals, that timid doubt as to his own innate strength, which infallibly accompanies the young and inexperienced composer of genius. But when we see a man of long and practised experience, like Verdi, past his fiftieth year, giving unmistakable signs of a disposition, not to a change of one original style for another—that is often seen—but to the imitation of his successful contemporaries, we are led to one of two conclusions: either that the composer is conscious that his own well-spring of inspiration is becoming so dry, that it is necessary for him to dip his pitcher at the fountain of others; or that he has become convinced that his life-long course of composition has been in a false direction, and that perhaps it is still not too late to mend. Suppose we give him credit for the latter conviction; we honor him from the bottom of our heart, provided he acts truly up to it, while, at the same time, we cannot avoid a doubtful shake of the head. The most successful numbers of the opera in question are undoubtedly the choruses and concerted pieces; that of the muleteers, students, pilgrims, &c., in the first scene of the second act, that of the monks, at the conclusion of the same, perhaps the best. The viandière chorus is much applauded, but is trivial in the extreme. There is also a scene between Militone and beggars, not without comic character. In the solo numbers, Verdi's deficiency of melody, and abundance of reminiscential idea, is most conspicuous; however, the music given to the heroine, Leonora, has much nobility of expression. The part of the baritone is effective, that of the tenor of less importance; the part of the mezzo soprano, Preziosilla, a gipsy, is capable of being made very characteristic in the hands of a singer of powerful voice and dashing action; and having two or three numbers of a light and popular style, is effective even as we have the part represented here. Mme. ZUCCHI, as Leonora, is careful and dramatic; but her intonation has become so false since the commencement of the season, owing either to the trying climate, or over-exertion, that it painfully mars her best efforts. MASSIMILIANI is quite inadequate to the position as primo tenore here, although he shows signs of improvement. The opera is put on the stage with much display, and more incorrectness. Ask the traveller, or the historical student of costume, what is his opinion of those extraordinary dresses, which we are told to accept in the opera as old Spanish and Italian? (Mme. Zucchi should be excepted from censure, however.)

LANCLOT.

Dwight's Journal of Music.

BOSTON, MARCH 18, 1865.

END OF THE VOLUME. The present number closes the 24th Volume, and the thirteenth year of DWIGHT'S JOURNAL OF MUSIC. The two volumes, 23 and 24, will bind together conveniently as one, and with this view the pages of the two are numbered continuously; and a common Title Page and Index replace, this time, the usual four pages of Music.

Concerts of the Past Fortnight.

BOSTON MUSICIANS' UNION. The two Sunday evening concerts by the united forces of the orchestras and bands (comprising not "a mammoth orchestra of 150 accomplished musicians," but a large orchestra of from 90 to 95 musicians, many of them accomplished), were remarkably successful. The Boston Theatre was crowded to excess the first time, making the repetition on last Sunday evening imperative. The charitable, or, what is better, the fraternal object of the concerts must have been largely furthered, and a substantial nucleus formed for a mutual Benefit Fund for sick and needy musicians.

Musically, the concert was a great deal better than we had dared to hope under the circumstances. Ninety musicians brought together for the first time, to play the C minor Symphony (many of them for the first time), might keep time together and give a spirited performance, as they did, for they all seemed excited and inspired beyond their wont; but that there should not be roughnesses, was too much to expect. The Music Hall would probably have revealed more of these; on the stage of the Theatre they were in a measure swallowed up. The audience were delighted with the sonorous masses of the various tone-colors: it was refreshing for once to be able to hear the violins, and even the violas, and to feel the weight and volume of nearly a dozen double-basses. There was more effect, more even of light and shade, than we had thought possible. In size, this extempore orchestra was just about equal to what is called the grand orchestra in the leading Operas and Symphony Concerts in Europe, as Leipzig Gewandhaus, Berlin Royal Orchestra and Royal Opera, Grand Opera in Paris, Covent Garden, Dresden Opera, &c. But the proportions (not to speak of efficiency) were very different. There, wind is represented by the usual pair of each instrument of wood or brass, with double pair of horns and trumpets, and a small reserved force, for special purposes, of extra trombones, fagottos, &c., leaving all the rest to the great mass of strings. Here we had 16 first violins, 16 second, only 7 violas, only 4 or 5 violoncellos to 11 double basses; 3 flutes, 2 oboes, 4 clarinets; only one fagotto (the second), with a 'cello to replace the first; from 6 to 10 trumpets (according to the piece,) 6 to 8 horns, 6 or 7 trombones, and sometimes three huge ophicleids. Brass predominated, because most of our musicians are workers in brass; brass bands are our fatality. Hence the programme had to be so composed as to make them all available; and our brass musicians are skillful in their way. But we cannot agree with Mr. Zerrahn, that it was wise to load the last movement of the Symphony, the march, with half a dozen trombones and three ophicleids; power and full blaze it gave, to the three chords especially, but at the same time coarseness and a loudness, more fatiguing than edifying, to the whole finale.

The Leonora Overture (No. 3) also had some good effects; the trumpet flourish was never rendered more expressively here. But the best success of this peculiar combination of forces was in the "Fackeltanz" by Meyerbeer; there we had beautiful traits of sonority achieved, now by half a dozen trumpets playing softly, now by a crackling blaze of as many trombones and now by a solid, tranquil, rich mass of violin tone. Wagner's Rienzi overture, which opened the concert, opens well, with a single prolonged trumpet tone, smoothly, finely swelled and diminished by Mr. ARBUCKLE, followed by a deep murmur of double basses, which moved firmly and solidly together. Indeed, the first half of the overture is interesting and exciting, but in the latter half it runs out into noisy commonplace. Chopin's Funeral March, as arranged for orchestra (by whom we know not) sounded in the main quite impressive; but we were puzzled (the last time) to conceive what could be the meaning of that odd reiteration of the closing phrase, like Yours, &c., three times over, at the bottom of a letter.

Mr. LANG played the Andante and Capriccio (op. 22) of Mendelssohn very beautifully on a Chickering Grand Piano of remarkable power, as well as pure, sweet, musical quality, or the performance would have been lost in that place. The Orpheus sang a part song, Hauptmann's "Abendruhe," finely, without accompaniment; but the place did not favor their voices. Mrs. CARY's rendering of "O rest in the Lord" was artistic and with true feeling, as usual; and Mr. RUDOLPHSEN never did himself more credit than in the noble bass air: "It is enough;" indeed we are not sure that it ever was done better in this city.

In the repetition, the "Tell overture was substituted for Leonora; and made an immense effect; Mr. WHEELER sang Handel's "Thy Rebuke," and Miss HOUSTON "Hear ye, Israel," both very acceptably; and Meyerbeer's March in "The Prophet" closed the concert.

We wish, now that the musicians have found that they can work so well together, they would keep more in this line of practice, and give us concerts of this sort more frequently—only with somewhat less of brass; more 'cellos, bassoons, &c., will come along we trust, before a great while, if such occasions are created for them. The musicians were happy in their success, and they had a right to be. They testified their satisfaction with their leader, Mr. ZERKAHN, by the presentation of a sumptuous bâton.

THE MENDELSSOHN QUINTETTE CLUB, for their fourth and last subscription concert, which was an uncommonly interesting one, and eagerly attended, gave us this programme.

Quartet in D. op. 18. No. 4. . . . . Beethoven.
Prayer, by. . . . . Stradella.
Mrs. J. S. Cary.

Quartet in A minor, op. 13. . . . . Mendelssohn.
Adagio and Intermezzo.

a) "The Angel's Call." . . . . Franz.
b) "I saw in my Dreams." Poem by Helne. . . . . Parker.
Mrs. J. S. Cary.

Piano Trio in D minor, op. 63. . . . . Schumann.
Allegro—Scherzo—Adagio—Finale—Allegro.

We have only room to say that the Schumann Trio, exquisitely rendered by Mr. J. C. D. PARKER, was listened to with wonder and delight, and left a strong desire to become more familiar with it, and that the singing by Mrs. CARY was all of a truly high order, chaste and artist-like, the song of Mr. Parker's composition giving a great deal of pleasure.

ORCHESTRAL UNION: The Symphony of the last concert was Beethoven's No. 1, in C, which, although the least and youngest of the nine, is heard every time with an increasing interest; we have rarely heard the humorous finale brought out so well as it was this time. The overtures were Herold's to Zampa for entrée, and Auber's to La Sirène for entrée; the waltz, "Carnavals-Botschafter" by Strauss. The solo-playing was of rare excellence; Mr. ARBUCKLE's trumpet sang a German ballad with a remarkably smooth and sweet, yet manly tone. The great feature, however, of the concert was the young Mr. HENRY SUCK's playing of Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto (in E minor). Mr. S. has certainly improved vastly by his study abroad; he is now an artistic master of his instrument. In truth and purity of tone, in even execution and nice phrasing, in chaste style free from all affectation, he is what a sound taste could wish.

The want was that of strength, power, broader tone and stronger grasp; we could not always fairly hear him; in those long and trying bravura passages the fire seemed to go out; the strength failed him in leading up through those vigorous crescendos to the tutti forte of the orchestra. How far this was only fear for the time being, and how far temperament, we cannot say. The piece presents a formidable task, we can only wonder that he acquitted himself so well; the slow movement was beautifully played.

Mlle. HELENE DE KATOW AND MR. WEHLI—

We have little taste for virtuoso concerts, generally, but we must own to having spent a pleasant evening in listening to the fair Russian violoncellist and the English pianist, in the Tremont Temple, on Wednesday evening. It was a pretty thing, also, to hear the flexible and clear high voice and facile florid execution of Miss LAURA HARRIS, albeit it was passionless and Sontag's "Echo Song" found but a feeble echo in this little maid. We were chiefly interested in the Russian lady, as being the most unique and, we may say, musically possessed phenomenon. Her generous face and figure, the whole form, full of life like some noble animal, her tasteful costume, graceful movement, and a certain effusion of musical expression over the whole of her, prepossessed you in her favor. As she gracefully and almost passionately clasps her instrument, it seems to be a parcel of her life, and she looks like a muse, not the tragical Grecian muse, but with a certain Slavic fire in her. She discourses excellent music; the tone not the strongest and broadest, but rather feminine, and true, musical, searching and expressive. The movements of her hands and arms, as well as the vibrating strings, seem instinct with the music in her soul.

Mr. WEHLI played only his own compositions (if such they can be called), which are mainly in the Thalberg style. He has wonderful execution, with a quiet, refined, gentlemanly manner. His touch is exceedingly delicate and vital, his passages, trills, floriture, and all that, as fine and even as can be desired. His great forte is playing with the left hand, entire pieces, broadly harmonized, of great difficulty;—such pieces as might be played just as well with both hands; therefore why not do it? And of what worth are all the feats of execution when not subordinate to musical intentions? But we think it due to Mr. Wehli to say that his superiority is not merely mechanical; there is more than that in it; there is an exquisite grace of expression, shown for instance in his fine rendering of a simple melody, like "Oft in the still night;" there is a pervading refinement; there is a fine instinct of symmetry, shown in the construction of his slight and showy but yet felicitous fantasias on which he strings his points of execution; there are fancies airy light and pleasant, sometimes original, like the bridge he flings across from the slow trio to the lively strain in his Norma fantasia.

IN PROSPECT.—There are fine things in preparation for us, both on the grandiose scale and in the select, quiet way. The quiet will come first. OTTO DRESLET is to give another series of Piano forte concerts—eight of them! and such piano concerts as do not fall under the ban of Sir "Lancelot's" displeasure. A main feature in them will be the interpretation of quite a number of Beethoven's latest Sonatas, his 32 wonderful Variations on a little theme in C minor, &c. &c. Also numerous Preludes and Fugues of Bach; besides Schumann, Chopin, and the rest. The concerts will be given at Chickering's on Saturday afternoons, beginning a week from today.

Then there looms large before us the great Festival of the Handel and Haydn Society, which will occur near the end of April or the beginning of May. The choral forces have been industriously rehearsing all the winter, and we may hope to hear Israel in Egypt, Elijah, the Messiah, Hymn of Praise, &c., in grand style; besides some Beethoven Symphonies by a Grand Orchestra worthy of the name.

MISS HOMER'S "ZENOBIA."—This noble statue is soon to be withdrawn from public view, and those who delay their visit, at the beautiful store of Messrs. Childs & Jenks, will be disappointed. As a memorial of the pleasure it has given to thousands, Messrs. C. & J. have issued a fine photograph of the work.

Important Musical Invention.

THE CYCLOID PIANO-FORTE.

Under this heading, the New York Tribune claims superiority, over all others, for a Piano of decidedly novel construction, to say the least. It is certainly interesting and plausible to read about, and the idea is so pleasing to the theoretic fancy that one cannot help hoping that it may stand the long test of experience. But newspaper articles so often turn out to be business advertisements in disguise! and, fortunately, there is time enough, and no lack of excellent piano-fortes ad interim. One can afford to wait, so long as he has a Chickering, nicht wahr?—We make room for the larger portion of the Tribune's article.

There is no article of home luxury to the improvement of which such earnest attention and such costly experiments have been directed as to the piano-forte. During the past twenty years great changes have taken place in the internal construction of the instrument, especially as regards the scale, which has been enlarged so as to admit of a greater length of string. The instrument is now strung with heavier wire, an increase of nearly double over the old style of stringing; the case is also, generally, larger both in depth and length. It would be useless to chronicle the thousand small inventions which were claimed as positive improvements upon the piano, but which were radically of but little importance. Sound boards have been crumpled up, on the plea that increased vibratory surface was obtained; plates have been insulated and completely detached; bottoms have been taken out; a second sound-board has been added; hammers have been made to strike downward; the case has been half filled with blocks of wood, and again the case has been left entirely empty; the oblique strain of the strings is claimed to have been remedied; iron has been substituted for wood for the cases; the key-board has been arranged with a semi-circular sweep: tuning forks, or metallic tongues, have been substituted for strings; but none of these infinitesimal inventions have succeeded in establishing their claims as permanent improvements. The improvements which have really been accomplished in the past twenty years are, first, the enlargement of the scale; second, the increased length of the string; third, the heavier stringing; fourth, the increased area of the sounding board; fifth, the increased power of the action and heavier hammers; sixth, the scientific adaptation of the iron plate, combining the utmost possible strength with lightness; and, seventh, the system of over strings in the bass.

These accepted and permanent improvements are now adopted by every maker, and the superiority of any one instrument is dependent upon fortuitous circumstances—such as the best-seasoned material, the most skillful artisans in the various departments, and the amount of honest care bestowed upon the manufacture.

The Cycloid piano, made and patented by Lindeman & Sons, of this city, presents a radical change in the form of the piano, and while adopting all the improvements which have resulted from past experience, exhibits a novelty in construction which adds a value to all that has gone before, and presents increased advantages of such importance that they cannot be overlooked. The form of the Cycloid may be described as a square piano with the back corners rounded off. The sweep is very graceful, and the ugly square box is transformed into an elegant piece of furniture, beautifully finished all round, forming an ornament to the parlor, and taking up much less space than the ordinary square piano.

The object designed to be obtained by this change of form is elegance, compactness and strength. In the square piano the sides and back are glued together, and to strengthen these weak points heavy blocks of wood are inserted, so that the whole space of the two back corners is utterly useless for reverberating purposes. They are simply wasted wood, and are only valuable inasmuch as the blocking they contain strengthens the inherent weakness of the square case.

The Cycloid piano achieves the form of the arch, which is recognized as the type of strength, and is in fact a solid case, in one piece, with no weak spot about it. By the system of constructing the case, more strength is obtained than could be got from a solid block, either cut out, or bent to the cycloid form. The case in fact consists of from twenty-four to twenty-six veneers, one-fourth of an inch thick, of maplewood, glued together; these are placed in a press of the cycloid form, to which are affixed screws of great power. This force is applied equally to every part, which forces out the superfluous glue, and, when cold, these veneers come out a solid mass, having the required cycloid form, with all the strength of an arch, and capable of sustaining any strain of strings that can be applied to it, without "giving" a hair's breadth. The scale of the instrument follows the circle of the case, so that not an inch of space is lost; and there is not an angle in the interior to break the continuous flow of the sound. The theory of acoustics in its general laws, as laid down by Chladni and others, may be looked upon as exact and thorough, but individual cases seem to defy all rule and set the most well-considered theories at defiance. Whether the cycloid form or the square form is the better in theory is a point for savans to decide upon, but the result of the two forms is palpable to every ear, learned or unlearned. The tone of the cycloid is as solid as that of a grand piano-forte; it is not merely loudness, which is always liable to impure and loose vibrations, but it is the largest amount of sonority, with the greatest purity in quality of tone. A powerful player can use it as he would a grand, and he cannot break the tone; he cannot thin it or confuse it by forced diverging vibrations. Gottschalk tested it in every way to the utmost, and acknowledged that it triumphed over the test that he had applied.

But it is not in force alone that the purity of the Cycloid is pre-eminent; in the medium tone and in the pianissimo it is surpassingly beautiful, and even the soft pedal can be used without destroying the pure and individual quality of the tone. In addition to this, while each tone is round and distinctive, in close or spread harmony, no one tone predominates, but a perfect accord of combined tones swells up to the fingers, and dies out without one dominant vibration. The "singing" power partakes of the same purity of quality. It can be prolonged in a remarkable degree, and the quality of the vibration does not change or "lift," but preserves its roundness until the sound has ceased. The Cycloid possesses one other point of superiority over the common square piano, namely the power of standing in tune. The whole structure is so compact, so solid, so rigid and unyielding in its strength, that it will remain up to concert pitch from its first tuning, allowing for the stretching of the strings, and will not fall a shade for months.

WORCESTER, MASS.—The "Star" of the Palladium describes the last concert of the Mozart Society:

The fourth concert of the series, given by this Society and the Mechanics' Association, was one of the best of the season, despite the absence of two of the leading vocalists, Miss Fiske and Mr. Richards, whose places were filled, at a late hour, by Mrs. A. S. Allen and Mr. Hammond, who acquitted themselves most creditably, in the somewhat difficult solos of Romberg's ode, the "Transient and the Eternal." The performance of the work, was, for the most part, excellent. The choruses were sung in good time and tune, and with that expression which this especially requires. In this the society was materially assisted by the organist, Mr. Lang, of Boston, whose merit as an accompanist wins attention by its unobtrusiveness. Under his fingers the organ becomes secondary to the singers, and yet leads them, so far as an instrument should lead or support. Among the best points of the performances were the choruses, "The cedar braves the storm;" Mr. Thompson's recitative, "Dust shall be dust;" the trio, "Though the lark mourn;" Mrs. Allen's solo, "A holy spirit loving goodness;" the duet "There the tints of the mourn fade not;" and the fine concluding chorus, "There dwells the theme of Klopstock's holy hymn," and the final quartet, "To the spirit." After the Ode—which will bear repetition another season, Mr. Lang played selections for the Organ, introducing several of the softer stops, flute, vox-humana, melodia, &c., and, in answer to an enthusiastic encore, played Otto Dresel's delicious little "Cradle Song," the "Sweet and low wind of the western Sea," of Tennyson's; Mrs. Duane sang, and finely too, "Consider the Lilies!" Mrs. Munroe gave Gottschalk's "Cradle Song" in a most acceptable manner. One of the leading features of the concert was Mr. Stearns's "Tantum Ergo," a composition of intrinsic excellence, performed for the second time, and improving with acquaintance, which cannot be said of the works of all American composers. It was sung by a quartet and semi-chorus. Mr. Stearns's compositions are of a high order of excellence, far better, to our thinking, than the showy but empty music of Lambillotte, which seems to be stereotyped for the programmes of concerts of sacred music, and to which rule this was no exception. The concert ended with Organ selections by Mr. Lang, and "Dona Nobis," from the "Twelfth Mass"—which will probably remain accredited to Mozart, whether or not he composed it.

At the concluding concert of the series, on Fast evening, Haydn's Oratorio of "The Creation" will be performed.

CHERUBINI'S MEDEA.—The Medea of Cherubini is to be one of the principal novelties this season at Her Majesty's Theatre. It has never yet been heard in England. The Medea will of course be Mlle. Titiens, who in that great part is likely to present to the operatic world a new Fidelio. Another novelty is to be Mozart's Die Zauberflöte (Il Flauto Magico).

A new opera, "Concini," by Thomas Löwe, has been given with doubtful success in Vienna. The critics blame the composer for slavishly copying Meyerbeer and Wagner, and being trivial in his melodies, and noisy to excess in his instrumentation. Herr Beck is much praised in the part of Concini, Herr Wachtel much abused as Robert.

The director of the Leipzig Theatre is about to try a bold experiment. Between the present time and June, the whole cycle of Shakespeare's Historical Plays from "Richard II." to "Richard III." will be put upon the stage in chronological succession. The arrangement will be that made by Herr Dingelstedt of Weimar, where the same cycle was given in two series of successive evenings.

In the library of San Marco, in Venice, nineteen songs written by Stradella have been discovered. They have been put into Halévy's (?) hands, who has written a pianoforte accompaniment to them.

OPERA IN ITALY. A correspondent of the London Musical World, writing from Genoa, Feb. 4th, thus describes the condition of affairs:

For some time now, I have been wandering about, from city to town, and from town to village, for here in Italy, during the Carnival, even large villages have their opera. I have heard a super-abundance of Verdi, and very little of either Rossini, Bellini, or Donizetti, numberless squalling prime donne, a quantity of tenori robusti, who seem now to be as plentiful as blackberries, and who, to judge by the applause lavished on them, are the favorites with uneducated audiences; and a certain number of very fair baritones, the preponderance of really good voices decidedly falling to these last, whose principal failing, however, is to roar. In a word, I have heard an immense deal of what was not worth hearing, and therefore not worth recording, though at the same time I must acknowledge that some performances which I have attended and a few singers whom I have heard, I have listened to with pleasure and moreover think them worthy of notice. I will, therefore, first give a list of the various operas with which the eighty-four theatres in Italy commenced this Carnival season, whereby some idea may be formed as to the amount of popularity in which certain operas and composers are held at the present time, and I will then proceed to give a few particulars of what I consider most deserving of mention. The Scala of Milan and the Pergola of Florence opened with Petrella's Contessa d'Amalfi, the Regio of Turin with Verdi's Simon Boccanegra, the Carlo Felice of Genoa with Ferrari's Ultimi giorni di Suhi, Parma with Guglielmo Tell, the Apollo of Rome with a new opera by a Maestro Secchi (the Government having prohibited the Due Foscari) and Bologna with Il Barbiere. Eleven theatres commenced the season with Il Ballo in Maschera, two with Cagnoni's Michèle Perrin, one with Romeo and Juliet, one with Don Bucefalo, one with Attila, two with Vittor Pisani, one with Marino Faliero, five with La Traviata, nine with La Favorita, four with I Lombardi, one with Maria di Rohan, one with Scaramuccia, four with Rigoletto, four with I Due Foscari, one with Aroldo, (the least known of Verdi), one with I Vespri Siciliani, two with Ernani, one with Lucia, seven with Pedrotti's Tutti in Maschera, (one of the most charming little operas ever written, and which seems to enjoy a popularity almost equal to that of Il Ballo in Maschera), three with Il Trovatore, one with Robert le Diable, one with Poluto, two with Mercadante's Leonora, one with Roberto Devereux, and ten with operas by composers of no reputation. Four years ago 15 theatres opened with Il Trovatore and 23 with La Traviata; but by the above list it will be seen that this year there is an improvement upon that, which was undoubtedly a proof of the degenerated state of musical taste in Italy; though even this year Verdi was represented in no less than 37 theatres, while the ever fresh melodies of Rossini were heard in only two towns; and Meyerbeer, one of the most distinguished composers of modern operatic music, held possession of but one solitary theatre, his Robert being given at Pisa, about the most miserable theatre in Italy, with a band and chorus, the execrable of which is not easily surpassed, although when I had the misfortune of being there it was at least equalled by that of the principal singers.

Of the operas by unknown composers with which the remaining ten theatres commenced this Carnival season, I have nothing to say excepting that Robert le Diable, with which the season was inaugurated at Vercelli, was not Meyerbeer's, but the joint production of Signors Cordiali and Derina. (The rest next time).

Special Notices.

DESCRIPTIVE LIST OF THE LATEST MUSIC.

Published by Oliver Ditson & Co.

Vocal, with Piano Accompaniment.

Banting. Comic song. Howard Paul. 30

Shows the misfortunes of a fat gentleman, who, by the advice of Prof. Banting, undertook to diet, and became a lean man. Come picture on the title page.

Betty Sands; a sequel to "Johnny Sands."

J. Sinclair. 30

Very good. It seems that Betty was not drowned, after all, but returned home, a cooler, wiser, and wetter woman. It is gratifying to know, that the pair lived together in great harmony afterward, and that this "was the cold water cure" of "John and Betty Sands."

Home and friends around us. F. Abt. 30

A noble song, the words by Charles Swain, and the melody by Abt, in his best style.

You'll not be long away, be sure.

J. H. McNaughton. 30

A song of classical merit, with a good, harmonious chorus.

In patient love. Song. W. Davenport. 30

Mr. D. has successfully interpreted the fine words of Hood, and gives us a melody quite in the style of a "Gem" from the "German."

I heard a wee bird singing. Linley. 30

One of the charming ballads, sung by Miss Ryan at the concerts of the Mendelssohn Quintette Club.

We'll soon be marching home. J. Harrison. 30

We all hope so, and shall be very glad to see you; but in the mean time, here is a good thing for the "boys" to sing around their camp-fires.

Instrumental.

March of the Medes and Persians. R. Nordman. 30

By this formidable name, is known a brilliant, easy march, which the Medes and Persians might have marched to, had they not, unfortunately, appeared on the stage a few centuries too soon.

Schubert's Serenade. Transcription. B. Richards. 50

Schubert's famous "Ständchen," newly arranged. Always good, in this new form it will have a new lease of life.

Thou art so near, and yet so far. For piano and violin. 30

Bright star of hope. For piano and violin. 30

Two excellent pieces, arranged in easy style for home use. They are among the best of the series.

Ravelin Waltz. H. H. A. Cameron. 30

The composer, who hails from the army, naturally gives a warlike title to his waltz, which is quite spirited.

Books.

THE HAPPY HOUR. A music book for Grammar schools. J. B. Sharland. 25

A nice little affair for the boys and girls, quite a number of whom appear in the attractive picture on the title page, engaged in the exercises of their "happy" musical "hour." The compiler is a teacher in our Grammar schools in Boston, and the songs are very carefully selected.

MUSIC BY MAIL.—Music is sent by mail, the expense being two cents for every four ounces, or fraction thereof. Persons at a distance will find the conveyance a saving of time and expense in obtaining supplies. Books can also be sent at double these rates.

MUSIC LIBRARY

MLI

D 993

V. 23 1/2

DATE DUE

APR 26 1976